In the Alliance's sweeping victory in 1955, the first general elections ever held in the Federation of Malaya, Leong Yew Koh was elected member for the constituency of Ipoh and Menglembu. He was appointed minister for health and social welfare in Tunku Abdul Rahman's cabinet. The government held discussions with the British colonial secretary on self-government in Malaya and Leong represented the MCA in drawing up proposals for merdeka, or self-government. After independence in 1957, he was appointed the first governor of Melaka (1957-59). Two years later, he returned to active politics, becoming a senator, and, eventually, leader of the Senate, and later minister of justice. He was made a "Tun", the highest award created by the Government of Malaysia.

In 1917 Leong married Ho Yoke Lan, the second daughter of Ho Pak Leng of Batu Gajah, a former Chinese interpreter in the High Court and later a tin miner. They had four sons and three daughters. He was a devout Catholic. Two of his daughters became nuns.

A keen hunter in his younger days, he shot a notorious maneater, dubbed "The Tiger of Yunnan" when he was serving in Yunnan.

He was an equally staunch anti-Communist. The MCA was made up of many members who were members of the Kuomintang. During the Emergency — the communist uprising from 1948–60 — the communists targeted MCA members. In 1949 some communists surrounded his holiday home in Cameron Highlands, where his daughter, Agnes Leong Kok Loon, was alone. They wanted to abduct her for ransom. But knowing her father very well, she told them bluntly that they would never get a cent from him even if they were to dismember her and send her body parts to him. Frustrated by her stance, they finally left, but not without slaughtering the entire herd of some thirty cattle — as a warning to him. When Leong arrived from Ipoh, he surveyed the carnage and said stoically, "All is fair in love and war."

Tun Leong was first and foremost a patriot. In the 1950s, before merdeka, the queen of England offered him a knighthood. He turned it down, saying, "I will only kowtow to the sovereign King of an Independent Malaya, not to a foreign Queen." He died on 11 January 1963.

Li Boon Tin

(李文珍, Li Wenzhen, 1892–1961)
Community leader, Myanmar

Li Boon Tin was a leader in many aspects — during the war, in business, education, etc. The Burmese Government honoured him with the title "Wunna Kyaw Tin", literally meaning "The Most Beautiful", for his charitable acts and contributions to society. According to his grandchildren, he could speak read and write fluently in Burmese and English, and spoke Hokkien and Hindi.

Li, born in Burma on 2 April 1892, was the third son of Li Eng Hean (李永响), a Chinese migrant from Fujian Province, China. His ethnic Chinese mother, Daw Hnin Mai, was locally born in Kha Hti Ya Village, Twante township, located in the Irrawaddy delta of Lower Burma.

In October 1938, travelling by Dutch Airlines, Li led a team of overseas Chinese, representing the huaqiao in Burma to Singapore to attend the meeting of the Nanyang China Relief Fund, organized by Tan Kah Kee in support of the war victims in China.

In 1940, when General Aung San was fighting the British for the independence of Burma, Li was reported to be instrumental in arranging the general's secret trip on board the M.V. Haili Rangoon to Japan, where he secretly received his training. At the time, Li was a merchant trading at Tye Moh Company Limited, an import-export firm. The same year, Wu Tie Cheng (吴铁城), a Guomintang (KMT) envoy to Southeast Asia, recruited him to be a member of his party.

When the Pacific War broke out in 1941, all the Chinese associations in Burma could not continue their social activities. However Li took charge of collecting letters and documents on behalf of the associations to maintain contact with one another.

On 3 March 1942, KMT leader, Chiang Kai Shek (蒋介石), summoned prominent Chinese leaders to meet at Lashio, the capital of Northern Shan State (near the Sino-Burma border). Li was at the time the team leader, making the best effort to assist all his Chinese compatriots in Myanmar to return to China during the Japanese Occupation (1942–45). He was also evacuated from Rangoon to China, and stayed in Chongqing, where the KMT headquarters, to render his support in the war against the Japanese invaders. After the war, he returned to Rangoon.

During the Japanese invasion, he met the former managing director of the Overseas-Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC, Singapore), Tan Sri Tan Chin Tuan, twice — in Chongqing and in India. He then became one of the shareholder directors of OCBC from 1946 to 1951. When the Burma Chinese Chamber of Commerce was revived after World War II in June 1946, Li became its first president. He was also made chairman of Hua Qiao Zhong Xue (华侨中学), the then largest and most prestigious Chinese school in Rangoon (Yangon). In 1949, when China became a communist country, Li was pressured by a group of pro-Beijing members of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce to approve the raising of the PRC flag, instead of the KMT's, at the building of the Burma Chinese Chamber of Commerce. He refused and was then forced to step down.

From the records supplied by Li's daughters, Li was the president of the Burma (Mynamar) Chinese Chamber of Commerce from August 1946 to 1950, and president of Kian Teck Organization (建德总社), a Chinese secret society of Myanmar. He was also president of the Li Clan Association in Yangon (李氏陇西堂), founded in 1894 and revived in 1945 after the Japanese Occupation; and president of the old Hokkien Kuan Im Chinese Temple (Qing Fu Gong, 庆福宫) in Yangon, president of the Chinese Red Cross Society, president of the Rama Khusna Hospital and the Rangoon Free Hospital. Li was also the organizer of the celebration of the Sarsana 2,500 Buddhist anniversary in 1956.

Li passed away on 30 August 1961, and the death of his wife, Daw Than Tin, a Chinese migrant, followed soon after that. The couple had five children: The eldest daughter was Daw Ohn Kyi (Li Swan Po, Mary), who was married to U Chein Ho (Tan Chien Ho), a Chinese migrant who became the chief forestry conservator of Burma. Both have passed away. Li's second daughter, Daw Khin Than Myint (Li Swan Tee, Cissy), an arts and law graduate from the Rangoon University, is still alive today. Li's first son, U Mya Kyaing (Li Eng Chye, Water), was chief cashier at Tye Moh Co. Ltd. in Rangoon when Li was the managing director. Mya Kyaing passed away in Canada. He had married Tan Hui Cheng (Betty), daughter of Tan Hong Ghim, then a senior manager of OCBC, Singapore. Li's second son, U Thein Zaw (Li Eng Hoe, Arthur), was director of Thant Zin Co., a trading firm in Rangoon. He had married Dr Daw Thein Kyi, the medical superintendent of the Children's Hospital of Rangoon. He passed away in 1998. Li's youngest daughter, Daw Kyi Hla Win (Li Swan Kee, Ruby) was married to U Maung Maung Win (Taw Boon Seng), the chief engineer of the State Timber Enterprise and also the director (Planning) of the Paper and Chemical Industries, Ministry of Industry. The grandson of Li, Paw Hoon, also the only son of U Mya Kyaing, is now a Canadian citizen, and currently a professor in the English Department of the University of Toronto.

Liang Wern Fook

(梁文福, Liang Wenfu, 1964–)

Writer, maestro, scholar, Singapore

Liang Wern Fook is one of these rare figures who splendidly bridge both literary and music scenes in Singapore. The achievements he made in each of these scenes are brilliant, and include many literary works, lyrics, and songs that have generated spectacular impact in Singapore and beyond. He is also a scholar specializing in traditional Chinese literature and teaching courses in that field.

Liang Wern Fook was born in 1964 in Singapore. His father was a journalist and his mother an acupuncturist. The Liang family traces its ancestral roots to Xinhui, a Cantonese-speaking county in Guangdong. He received his primary and secondary education at Catholic High School and went on to Hwa Chong Junior College, now renamed Hwa Chong Institution. He furthered his studies at the National University of Singapore, where he notched the top student position for Chinese Studies and the Arts faculty in 1988. He graduated with a Bachelor of Arts degree with Honours in Chinese literature in 1989 and a Master of Arts degree in 1992. He received a PhD from the Nanyang Technological University in 1990, with a thesis on the poems of Meng Haoran, a poet of Tang dynasty.

Audiences give high recognition to Liang not merely for his songs and lyrics, but also for his role as a singer. His talent in music started to shine as early as the age of sixteen, when he wrote his first song, "Sing a Song for Hwa Chong" (唱一首华初的歌). His first commercial song, "A Song for You" (写一首歌给你), was released in 1984 by the Ocean Butterfields, one of the important production companies that popularized Singaporean music. He was one of founders of the Xinyao（新谣，Singapore Songs） movement, a cultural phenomenon in the 1980s and 1990s that reshaped tremendously the music scene and taste with locally produced songs and homegrown singers. He was the first among his Xinyao peers to release his own music and lyrical works, which amounted to five albums.

Liang Wern Fook also plays an important role in promoting musicals in Mandarin. In 1996 he produced and composed songs for Singapore's first Chinese musical, December Rains (雨季). In 2007, his songs were featured in a local Chinese musical of If There're Season (天冷就回来), presented by The Theatre Practice. In 2010, his musical, December Rains, was re-staged at the Esplanade Theatre.

So far Liang has more than 200 musical compositions and songs to his name. Many of his musical works bear national significance in Singapore as they were performed at national events such as Sing Singapore and the National Parades. "Singapore Pie", the title for his solo event in 1991, has become a national catchphrase for reflecting the characteristics and subjective of Singapore and Singaporeans. His musical imprints also go beyond to other places using the Chinese languages and his songs are sung by local singers, such as Stephanie Sun, Kit Chan, and Joi Chua, and also by international pop stars, including Jacky Cheung, Andy Lau, Leon Lai, Tony Leung, and Alex To.

Also remarkable is the contribution Liang Wern Fook has made to Singapore Chinese literature. To date, he has more than ten publications of literary works, in the genres of poetry, essay, and short story. His 1988 collection of essays, The Last Years of Kreta Ayer (最后的牛车水), represents how the Chinese-educated people of his own generation mourn the gradual loss of Chinese culture and identity in the midst of modernization. The concerns about Chinese ethnicity in Singapore remain an important thread in his literary works and his lyrics for songs. Over time, however, his confidence in Singapore as a nation has become pronounced as well in his creative writings. His 1989 poetry collection, In Fact I am in Love with Time (其实我是在和时光谈恋爱), and The 21 Dreams of Liang Wern Fook (梁文福的21个梦), in 1992 record the changes to mentality from peer pressure and life in a postmodern society.

Liang also has a part to play in academia, apart from the literary and musical scenes. He is an adjunct assistant professor at the Division of Chinese, Nanyang Technological University. He also lectures at the National Institute of Education and National University of Singapore. The courses he offers are on topics pertaining to the Chinese language, Chinese literature, and Chinese creative writing. He also runs a Chinese-language enrichment centre for primary and secondary school students, which he founded in 1997 with his wife, Liu Xiu Mei.

Liang has received many awards for his outstanding achievements. Most recently, in 2010, he was awarded the Singapore Cultural Medallion for his contributions to music, literature, and academia. In 2008, he was given the Nanyang Alumni Achievement Award by the Nanyang Technological University.

For Singapore literature in particular, Liang Wern Fook was voted "Most Popular Writer" in 1990 by local students in a poll organized by the local Chinese newspaper, Lianhe Zaobao. In 1992, he received the National Arts Council's first Young Artist Award for literature. He won the Singapore Book Prize in 1996.

In the music scene, Liang was voted "Person Who Best Represents the Xinyao Spirit", in a 2003 poll conducted by the Composers and Authors Society of Singapore (Compass), which also placed seven of his songs among "the ten greatest xinyao songs", with "Friendship Forever" (细水长流) in top position. His achievements include: the Sing Music Highest Honour Award (1988), Xinyao Festival Best Lyrics and Music Award (1989), Singapore Hits Highest Honour Award (1994), Singapore Hits Best Local Lyrics Award (1995, 2001, 2003, 2005), the Meritorious Award from Compass (1999), Best Original TV Series Theme Song at the Asian Television Awards (2002), Outstanding Achievement Award (Music) at the Singapore Entertainment Awards (2010), and Best TV Drama Theme Song Award at the Star Awards (2010).

Liao Kongpo

Community leader, businessman, Thailand

Liao Kongpo was a Chinese community leader who was highly regarded by the Thai authorities and the Nationalist government. He was bestowed the title Khun Setthaphakdi by Rama VII, and was selected to represent the Chinese in Thailand to attend the National Assembly after World War Two had ended. He was also a successful businessman who expanded his family business greatly. He was recognized for his contributions to promoting good Sino-Thai relations and various philanthropic acts for the Thai-Chinese community.

Liao Kongpo, also known as Zhensong, was born in Nakhon Si Thammarat Province in southern Thailand on 20 November 1892. He was the second son of Liao Baoshan (廖葆珊), a famous businessman who had migrated from Chenghai, Guangdong, and laid the family's business foundation in Thailand. Liao Baoshan was bestowed an official title by King Rama VI.

Liao Baoshan sent Liao Kongpo to China to receive his education when the boy was young. Before that, he engaged private tutors to teach his son Confucian thought and supervised his studies strictly. On returning from China, and from the age of fifteen, Liao Kongpo started assisting his father in the family business. After his father's death, Liao and his brothers took over the business and developed it successfully according to their father's will. They set up a large number of companies, such as the Liao Rongxing Bank (廖荣兴银行), Rong An Insurance Company (荣安保险公司), Rongxingzhan Rice Mill (荣兴栈碾米厂), Rongchengli Rice Mill (荣成利火砻) and Rong Fengsheng Shipping Company (荣丰盛船务公司) in Bangkok and other cities. They even set up the Rong Feng Long Store (荣丰隆号) in Hong Kong.

With the wealth accumulated from his businesses, Liao Kongpo donated generously to public walfare. He presented large amounts of money on several occasions to Xinmin School (新民学校) in Bangkok and Taoying School (陶英学校) in Suratthani Province.

After the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War in 1937, the Association for the Promotion of the Sale of Municipal Bonds, Siam Branch (全国劝募公债暹罗分会), was set up, which appealed to the ethnic Chinese to help save China by donating generously. Seow Houtseng Sribunrueang was the chairperson of the association, and Liao Kongpo, together with many other Chinese community leaders such as Chuan Tanthana, was a vice-chairperson. Later, Liao contributed to the establishment of the Teochew Association of Thailand and the Hua Chiaw Poh Teck Tung Foundation. He was elected as vice-chairperson of the Teochew Association of Thailand and, as such, was involved in the setting up of a rice exporting company to stop the inflation of the price of rice in Chaozhou County. At the beginning of the anti-Japanese War, there was a serious rice shortage in Chaozhou and Shantou. Many founders of the Teochew Association thus initiated this project. The objectives of the company were to ship rice to Chaozhou county and sell it at a lower price, thus preventing inflation in the price of rice. Liao also joined Chuan Tanthana and many fellow Chinese businessmen in setting up the China Daily (中国报) and Chinese Daily (中原报) in order to publicize ideas of national salvation and anti-Japanese movements.

When the Japanese army gained access to Thailand, Liao Kongpo and thirteen other ethnic Chinese leaders tried to escape from Thailand, but were unfortunately all captured by the Japanese army. As he refused to cooperate with the Japanese army, Liao was sentenced to life imprisonment. He was freed after nearly four years because of Japan's unconditional surrender in 1945. To acknowledge his contribution in the anti-Japanese War, Liao was elected representative of the Chinese in Thailand for attending the National Assembly held by the Nationalist government in Nanjing at the conclusion of the war.

Liao contributed to the industrial development of Thailand through the establishment of factories. After the war, he visited many countries, which broadened his insight and deeply inspired him. He was thus determined to emphasize industrial development in his business ventures and ordered Xixun (锡勋), his eldest son, and Xixiong (锡雄), his second son, to take charge of his ice-making plants in Suratthani, Nakhon Si Thammarat, and Chumphon Provinces. Next, he set up the Thailand Nails Co., Ltd. which was managed by Xihou (锡侯), his fifth son, and the Thailand Iron Forging Co. Ltd., managed by Xisan (锡三), his third son and Xilin (锡麟), his sixth son. With these business ventures, the family business group developed significantly.

Liao was active in various associations in Thailand and was a member of the executive committee of the Thai Chinese Chamber of Commerce, and a governor of Tien Hua Hospital (天华医院). He was also well-known for his donations to various hospitals and supported the Lili Hospital (里叻医院), Suratthani Provincial Hospital, Chumphon Provincial Hospital, and Nakhon Si Thammarat Provincial Hospital. He sponsored free medical services by contributing a total of 2.6 million baht to hospital funds. He made another donation of 1.3 million baht to the Hua Chiaw Hospital (华侨医院) through the Poh Teck Tung Foundation. Besides supporting hospitals, he funded various associations. He contributed 100,000 baht to the Teochew Association of Thailand and 900,000 baht to the Liao Clan Association (廖氏宗亲总会) in Thailand.

Liao Kongpo was not only concerned about matters in Thailand, but also matters regarding China, and the relationship between the two countries. Even after the establishment of the People's Republic of China, Liao paid attention to China's development, and the relationship between China and Thailand. He was also highly regarded by the Communist government of China, and was visited by many high ranking officials, for example, Deng Xiaoping and Deng Yingchao, when they visited Thailand.

Liao Kongpo died on 9 November 1980, at the age of eighty-nine years old. Before his death, the Thai king bestowed on him the Member (Fifth Class) of the Most Exalted Order of the White Elephant and Commander (Third Class) of the Most Noble Order of the Crown of Thailand. His family also received condolences from Liao Chengzhi, who represented the Overseas Chinese Affairs Office (中央侨务办公室) in China.

Liaw Yock Fang

(廖裕芳, Liao Yufang, 1936–)

Leading expert on Malay/Indonesian language and classical literature, prolific writer, Singapore

Liaw Yock Fang is an internationally recognized expert on Malay classical literature and Malay grammar, as well as a prolific writer of a series of very popular handbooks on learning Malay and Indonesian. He is the only Chinese in Singapore and Malaysia to have obtained a doctorate degree from Leiden University in the field of Indonesian language and literature.

Born on 14 September 1936 in Singapore to a humble family, Liaw Yock Fang's China-born father, Liao Hongpei (廖鸿培), ran a laundry shop. Liaw Yock Fang has three brothers and three sisters and he is the eldest son. In December 1965 he married Kum Lai Chun, a law graduate from Singapore University and they have a son and a daughter.

Liaw himself received his early education in a Chinese primary school in Terengganu Malaya. After finishing his primary education, he returned to Singapore where he received his secondary education, first at Yuying High School, and later Chung Cheng (Zhong Zheng) High School and Hua Chong (Hua Zhong) Chinese High School. In 1957 he went to the Nanyang University (Nantah) to study English language and literature, but that year Malaya achieved independence and there was a sudden rise in interest in studying the Malay language among Chinese students. Liaw was affected by this and began to pay special attention to the Malay language and literature. Gradually he became really interested in Malay and Indonesian, and in 1960, when he was in his third year at Nantah, he and another Nantah student, Tan Ta Sen, were selected by the Ministry of Education in Singapore to study Indonesian at the University of Indonesia (UI) from which he obtained a Sarjana Muda (B.A.) degree in 1963 and a Sarjana Sastra (equivalent to B.A. Honours) degree in 1965. From this point in time, he embarked on a road of no return and dedicated his whole life to the study and research on Malay/Indonesian language and literature.

In 1965 Liaw returned to Singapore from Indonesia and began to teach Malay at the Tun Sri Lanang High School where he taught for four months. He later lectured in Malay language and literature at Nantah where he served for fourteen years. Liaw was not satisfied with his earlier achievements in Indonesia and decided to enrol at the University of Leiden (Netherlands) where he received his Drs (Doktorandus) degree in the Indonesian language and Literature in 1971. In 1976 he obtained his Doctor of Literature (D. Lit) from the same university. His doctoral thesis was on "Undang-Undang Melaka" (The Laws of Malacca) under the supervision of a leading Dutch scholar on Malay classics, Professor R. Roolvink. The dissertation was published as a book in 1976 and has been acclaimed "one of the milestones on the study of the Laws of Malacca" by both Western and Malay scholars in the field. It has become a classic and has been widely quoted in academic literature.

Liaw served as a lecturer at Nantah from 1966 to 1980. When Nantah merged with the University of Singapore and became the National University of Singapore (NUS) in 1981, he moved to NUS to become a lecturer, and a year later, was promoted to senior lecturer. Ten years later he was promoted to associate professor, a position he held until he retired in 1996. After retirement, he did not stop writing. On the contrary, he became a very prolific writer.

Liaw's achievements can be divided into four fields: his publications on Malay classical literature, Malay grammar, translations, and textbooks. As early as 1975, he published a textbook entitled, Sejarah Kesusasteraan Melayu Klasik (a history of classical Malay literature). The book has been used by many high schools and universities and was reprinted twice (1978, 1982). Some critics noted that the book still adopted the traditional approach of R. W. Winstedt, who published an English book entitled, A History of Classical Malay Literature in 1940. Nevertheless, Liaw's book was in Malay and covered a much wider aspect and provided a deeper understanding of Classical Malay literature than that by Winstedt. Many universities, including SOAS (London University), the University of Indonesia and the University of Malaya used it as a major reference book. Examination questions based on Liaw's arguments in the book were asked in university examination papers, implying the importance of his work.

However, Liaw was not satisfied with the book and began to do a revision. The revisions were so extensive that the book was published in Indonesia in 1991 and 1993 in two volumes. The revised version has become a major reference book for Malay classical literature in many Indonesian universities. Peking University has selected this revised edition for translation and it was published in 2011. In the same year, Liaw published a new Indonesian edition in one volume, and the English translation, which is based on this new edition, is forth coming. Apart from this book, Liaw's "Undang-Undang Melaka", which was first published in English in 1976, was later published in Malay together with the "Undang-Undang Laut" (Malay's Laws of the Seas) by Yayasan Karyawan in Kuala Lumpur, in its Karya Agung (Great Work) series in 2003. It was the only publication in the series to be done by an ethnic Chinese.

His achievements in Malay grammar: Between 1967 and 1970, Liaw began to write about Malay grammar systematically and published his articles in Dewan Bahasa, a prestigious Malay language monthly in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. These articles were the basis of his later book, Nahu Melayu Moden (Modern Malay Grammar), which was published in 1985. His fresh perspective resulted in debates with some of the Malay grammarians. However, his grammar book received the attention of many scholars in Malaysia and Indonesia and has become one of the standard reference works for Malay grammar. He was invited to comment on the new grammar book published by the Indonesian Institute of Language. One Indonesian Language professor described Liaw's analysis of "Parts of Speech in Malay" as "the most comprehensive and explicit of all the existing [explanations] Malay/Indonesian grammars".

Liaw's success in translations: Soon after his graduation from the UI, Liaw translated articles on English literary criticism into Malay. In 1970 he published a book entitled, Ikhtisar Kritik Sastra (Synopsis of Literary Criticism). With the help of H.B. Yassin (a leading Indonesian literary critic), Liaw also succeeded in translating the complete poems of a talented Indonesian poet, Chairil Anwar (1922–48), into English. The book was published in 1974.

His contribution to school textbooks (for primary and secondary schools) and handbooks on learning Malay and Indonesian: Unlike many scholars who shy away from writing school textbooks, Liaw felt that he had the responsibility to write textbooks for Singapore's students. He completed a Malay language textbook for Singapore primary schools in 1983 and the following year, he also completed and published a Malay textbook for Singapore secondary schools. Both textbooks were used in Singapore primary and secondary schools as Malay textbooks. In the 1990s, he felt that some of the English books which helped adults learn Indonesian and Malay were dated. He thus began to write handbooks. To date, he has published more than ten handbooks in the "Times Learn Malay" and "Times Learn Indonesian" series, including, Standard Malay Made Simple and Standard Indonesian Made Simple. Many titles have been reprinted many times. Liaw has also been invited to write special column regularly by Berita Harian, a Malay daily in Singapore. He is the only non-Malay who has received such an honour. He has served as a member of the Singapore Malay Language Council, and has represented Singapore to attend international meetings. He has also been invited to various academic conferences to present papers. On 30 July 2011, the Singapore Malay Language Council eventually conferred upon him the Anugerah Khas Persuratan (The Special Literary Award) in recognition of his major contribution to Malay language and culture in Singapore.

Lie, Dharmawan

(Lie Tek Bie, 李德美, Li Demei, 1946–)

Thoracic and cardiovascular surgeon, head of the voluntary medical team of Perhimpunan Indonesia Tionghoa (INTI), Indonesia

Lie Dharmawan, better known as Dr Lie, became well known due to his work for the victims of the May 1998 rioting, arson and gang rape of mostly ethnic Chinese women and girls in Jakarta. During that period, he worked with women's organizations, such as Kalyanamitra and Suara Ibu Peduli, which were among the first to come to the rescue of these victims. He also worked with Tim Relawan untuk Kemanusiaan (Volunteers for Humanitarian Work), led by the young Catholic priest, Romo Sandyawan. It was this organization that sounded the alarm in the media with a report on the victims of the riots which contained especially revealing insights into the gang rape.

When the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women, Rhadika Coomaraswami, visited Indonesia in November-December 1998 to compile a report on the May riots, Dr Lie organized her meeting with some of the rape victims. According to Lie, although he has lost contact with many of the victims — who have mostly left Indonesia — he has, since then continued humanitarian work through his affiliation with Perhimpunan Indonesia Tionghoa (INTI), for which he heads its volunteer medical team. The team focuses on relief works in disaster-hit regions. For example, the team was in Aceh before Padang after the devastating tsunami caused by a 9.1-magnitude underwater earthquake on 26 December 2004 struck. It also assisted other victims of earthquakes in Padang, Bengkulu, and Pangandaran, as well as those of the landslide on Flores Island in 1992, and the 2007 major flood in Jakarta. It regularly organizes free medical care in poor areas. Lie has been shown to be a community leader through his work as a socially concerned physician.

Lie's father, Lie Goan Hoey, and his mother, Pek Leng Kiauw, are now both deceased. Born on 16 April 1946, he is the fourth child of seven children. His first three elder siblings are his sisters, and the younger ones are his brothers. His education started in Padang in a Chinese language primary school (1952–58), Chinese language Ying Shih Middle School. After that he switched to an Indonesian-medium junior high school, SMP Katolik Pius (1958–61), and continued his education at SMA Katolik Don Bosco (1961–64), a senior high school. Lie is a Catholic.

For his tertiary education he moved to Jakarta, where in 1965, he enrolled at the Medical Faculty of the Res Publica University, established by the Badan Permusyawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia (Baperki). Baperki was the left-wing ethnic Chinese organization headed by Siauw Giok Tjhan (Xiao Yucan). According to Lie, in mid-October 1965, his university classes had started for only a few days when the university was burned down.

This happened in the aftermath of the terrible upheaval of 30 September 1965, which marked the beginning of the end of the Soekarno regime. Lie then decided to study medicine abroad.

In April 1967, he went to the Free University in West Berlin where he worked to support his studies. He graduated as a general practitioner, in 1974 and earned a Dr Med. (Ph.D.) degree in 1978. Six years later, he finished his specialization as a thoracic and cardiovascular surgeon.

As a student, he was very active in student organizations. In 1972, he founded the Mahasiswa Kedokteran Indonesia di Berlin (Indonesian Medical Students in Berlin), whose members were students of medicine, dentistry, veterinary medicine, and pharmacy. Since the 1980s, he has been a member of the board of the Perhimpunan Dokter Indonesia di Jerman Barat (Association of Indonesian Medical Doctors in West Germany). He was also at a time the representative of students of the Far East in the Student Council of his university. Lie continued this interest in social and organized activities even after returning to Indonesia.

At the beginning of 1985, he returned to Indonesia after an absence of eighteen years. He underwent the "adaptasi" (adjustment) period at the Kariadi Hospital in Semarang to try to get a physician licence in Indonesia. One of the requirements then was that he changed his name to an Indonesian-sounding name and he complied. From mid-1986, he worked at the Rajawali Hospital in Bandung, but at the end of 1988, he joined the Husada Hospital in Jakarta.

Lie acknowledged that on his return to Indonesia, he was most struck by the big gap between the rich and poor. He was also dismayed to find how difficult it was for a private hospital to establish a heart surgery division. Another thing that struck him was the discrimination against ethnic Chinese, which according to him, was felt by every ethnic Chinese. These impressions and memories motivated him to try to help the poor by giving them free medical care and heart surgery whenever required. Although he was certainly enraged by the May 1998 riots, he became more determined to help victims of arson and gang rape. Thus, when the Semanggi incident occurred in November 1998 and students were shot inside the campus of Atma Jaya Catholic University, he risked his life to set up a medical post in a car with a Red Cross flag painted on it. He confessed to being terrified when the shooting started and bullets were flying around him; the fighting consequently killed a student. Although at the time he was advised many times by his brother and others around him to leave the campus, he was determined to stay and had instead asked his brother to take care of their mother and his family if something happened to him. From then on, in his own words, he became an activist, participating in street demonstrations with students and human rights organizations to demand that those responsible for the May riots, the rape, and the killing of students, be taken to court. Like other activists, he received threats, but he persisted, as he said, "To eliminate the image that ethnic Chinese are only economic animals". Lie wanted to demonstrate that among ethnic Chinese, there were those who cared deeply for what was happening around them and, with other like-minded Indonesians, he was determined to fight for human rights and democracy.

From April 1999 to May 2000, he also worked in Germany at the Cardiac Hospital in Konstanz, but since then he has returned to Jakarta to pursue his work as a socially concerned physician.

Lie married Tan Lie Tjhoen (Listijani Gunawan) in 1977 in Jakarta before returning with her to Germany to continue his studies. They have three children: the eldest, a girl, Lie Mei Phing, was born in Cologne and holds a degree in electrical engineering, computer science, and physics from the University of California at Berkeley. She is now working at Sunnyvale; the second, a boy, Lie Ching Ming, was also born in Cologne and has a degree in electrical and computer engineering from Seattle University; he works at Microsoft, Seattle; the youngest child, a girl, Lie Mei Sing, born in Jakarta, is studying at De Anza College in Cupertino, California. His wife and two younger children have been living in the United States since 1998, and the oldest child, since 1996. Lie has an agreement with the Husada Hospital to take regular leave to visit his family.

Lie Kim Hok

(李金福, Li Jinfu, 1853–1912)

Malay-language writer and journalist, publisher, community leader, Indonesia

Lie Kim Hok was a pioneer in the development of modern Malay literature and a key figure in the establishment of Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (THHK) Batavia, the first major modern Chinese association in Java. Renowned for his literary style, he wrote poetry as well as prose, and was for a time active as a publisher.

Lie Kim Hok was born in Bogor on 1 November 1853. His father, a house painter, taught him to read some Sundanese and Malay from the age of seven, but it was not until he was ten years old that he first attended school. His first experience of formal education was at the mission school established in Cianjur by the Dutch missionary, Albers. This education was soon interrupted when his father moved back to Bogor. For the next three years he was exposed to traditional Chinese schooling in Bogor, which consisted of learning to read and write Chinese characters from the Confucian classics, and to pronounce them in the Hokkien dialect (but without being given any instruction on their meaning). He continued his mission education in Bogor when Coolsma opened up his mission school there in 1866. He was to be associated with the school under Coolsma and his successor, van der Linden, for the next eleven years. Under Coolsma (and Albers) school instruction was in Sundanese; under van der Linden, it changed to Malay. His long association with Protestant schooling exposed him to Christian teaching. In his later years at the school, Lie Kim Hok learned Dutch and worked in the mission printing press and also as an assistant teacher in the junior classes. The first of his publications, two short books for children, were printed on the mission press in 1884 and apparently show a clear Christian influence. The following year he bought the press from van der Linden's widow, and in the few years before he sold it, he published eight books with almost all the stories in them set in China. In addition, he used the press to print the newspaper, Pemberita Betawi, which he briefly owned and edited together with W. Meulenhoff. He contributed many articles as a journalist to this and other newspapers, including the mission weekly, Bintang Djohar, and the daily, Perniagaan, of which he was assistant editor. But his three best known publications were not printed on his own press.

One of these was a 200-page story in verse (syair) form called Siti Akbari (1884) which was highly praised. The second was his Malajoe-Betawi (1884), a grammar book in 116 pages, based on the Malay spoken in Jakarta. This is arguably the first modern Malay/Indonesian grammar book and certainly the first to be written by a native speaker. The third of his most well known writings was Hikajat Nabi Khong Hoe Tjoe (1897), a history of the life and teachings of Confucius. Derived from the work of European sinologists and information gleaned from Chinese friends who, unlike him, could read the Chinese classics, his study of Confucius was the first to appear in Malay.

Lie's mastery of the Malay language was widely acknowledged, and not only by fellow Chinese. Other noted writers such as Gouw Peng Liang said that they used his style as a model. Many in later years even referred to him as "the father of Chinese-Malay", but he himself never spoke of his Malay as "Chinese-Malay". In fact, the idea of a Chinese-Malay literature or an ethnically separate variant of the Malay language was not born until about a decade after his death. In Java during his lifetime journalists and writers of different ethnicity (European, Chinese, and indigenous Indonesian) wrote in a similar form of Malay which was commonly called "low Malay". They also often worked together for the same newspapers and even collaborated on the same book, regardless of their different ethnic origins. Among Lie's publications are two 1886 works co-authored respectively with F. Wiggers and W. Meulenhoff.

In 1900, Lie Kim Hok was one of the founders of the THHK (Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan) in Jakarta, an association whose chief initial aims were the promotion of Confucianism and the establishment of modern schools that would teach Chinese so their students could read and understand the Confucian classics. He was the major spokesman for the THHK view that the teachings of the Prophet (Nabi) Confucius were the real religion of the Chinese (agama Cina). Phoa Keng Hek (the THHK president from its foundation to 1923) and Yoe Tjai Siang (another key figure in the Confucian revival movement) had been classmates of Lie Kim Hok at the Bogor mission school. The original concept of the THHK schools must have been developed from their experience at the mission school, but with Confucian teachings as the religion rather than Christianity. At the time there were some Chinese who believed that the establishment of the THHK school was, in fact, a device to lead the Chinese towards Christianity. This was not a view shared by the missionaries, who campaigned vigorously against the efforts of the THHK and the Sukabumi newspaper, Li Po (co-edited by Yoe Tjai Siang), to promote Confucianism as the religion of the Chinese. Lie Kim Hok replied officially on behalf of the THHK, and personally in the columns of Li Po. By the time of his death, however, the THHK had taken a different course, emphasizing secular education instead. In 1909 the imperial Government of China awarded him the order of Kung Pai of the seventh class in recognition of his contributions to the Chinese community in Java. The medal can be seen adorning his chest in the full-page portrait which appears in Nio Joe Lan's history of THHK-Batavia.

His earlier life was marked by tragedy. Within the space of only a few years, he lost a newborn child (1877), his father (1879), his mother (1880), and his wife (1881) during her second childbirth. He died in Jakarta on 6 May 1912 and was survived by his second wife and his four children.

Lie Tek Tjeng

(李德清, Li Deqing, 1931–2009)

Historian, lecturer, senior researcher, Indonesia

Lie Tek Tjeng was for a long time one of the few nationally and internationally recognized Indonesian expert on East Asia whose areas of specialty were China and Japan. His education started in 1950 at the Sinology Institute of the Faculty of Letters of the University of Indonesia (UI) where he obtained his Sarjana Muda (then the equivalent of a B.A.) degree in 1954. He then went on to enroll in a programme on Regional Studies (East Asia) at the Harvard University on a United States Information Service (USIS) scholarship and completed his M.A. course in 1956. Among his professors were two of the best-known experts on East Asia, John K. Fairbanks and Edwin O. Reischauer. To collect material for his Ph.D. thesis he was a Rockefeller Research Fellow at the Institute of Humanistic Studies of Kyoto University from March 1957 to September 1959. He earned his Ph.D. at Harvard in 1962 after having submitted a thesis entitled 'Mutsu Munemitsu: Portrait of a Machiavelli'.

In the same year that he completed his Ph.D. course, he returned to Indonesia and worked as a lecturer at the Fakultas Sastra, Universitas Indonesia (UI). In September 1965, before the upheaval known as the Gerakan 30 September (G-30-S), he was in Beijing attached to the Academia Sinica on an assignment from the Indonesian Ministry of National Research. He stayed in Beijing until March 1966. When he returned to Indonesia, he continued teaching at Fakultas Sastra, and started to explore setting up a department of Japanese Studies. His efforts came to fruition only at the beginning of 1967. Lie became the first head of the Department he founded. In mid-1967 he was sent to Malaysia and Singapore on an assignment of the Army Staff and Command School to study the problem of race relations. One of the worst race riots in Malaysia incidentally exploded in Kuala Lumpur in May 1969.

Since 1962, Lie had been affiliated to the formerly called Majelis Ilmu Pengetahuan Indonesia (MIPI) (renamed as Lembaga Ilmu Pengetahuan Indonesia — LIPI — in 1967). He was a researcher of the Lembaga Research Kebudayaan Nasional (LRKN, National Cultural Research Institute), and became Assistant Director of that Institute from 1966 to 1971. Subsequently he was its Director from 1971 to 1980. Since then he was Senior Researcher in the field of History and Politics of East Asia, and an expert (Staf Ahli) attached to the Head of LIPI in the development of social and cultural studies.

From 1962 until he became incapacitated because of his illness which worsened in mid 2002, Lie Tek Tjeng has devoted all his life to the development of East Asian studies, in particular studies on China and Japan by teaching, researching and writing, at the Fakultas Sastra, Universitas Indonesia and the LIPI.

In addition, he was a lecturer on China and Japan and also on the subject of ethnic Chinese in Indonesia at the education and training divisions of the Armed Forces, in particular the Army, the Staff and Command School of the Navy, Air Force and the Police Force, and the Lemhannas (Lembaga Pertahanan Nasional or National Resilience Institute). The appreciation for his teaching at these institutions was shown by the many awards he has received from the LIPI, as well as the Satyalencana Dwidya Sistha Award from the Minister of Defence. In 1994, for example, he also received the Bintang Jasa Pratama Award from President Soeharto.

Lie Tek Tjeng was usually called Lie by his colleagues and Tek Tjeng by his family and close friends. He is the fourth child of the five children of Lie Seng Jong, his father, and Liem It Nio, his mother. Tek Tjeng was born in Padang on 18 May 1931. His father first went into business, but eventually worked as a civilian with the Air Force in Medan. Tek Tjeng thus came from a modest family. He finished his high school education in Medan, where he graduated from the Dutch High School (HBS-A), then moved to Jakarta to study at the Sinology Institute of the University of Indonesia. While studying abroad, he married in 1957 Sophie Tjia, who has a law degree (SH) from the University of Indonesia. They have four children: the eldest, Lie Jit Hoat (Bobby) who was born in Kyoto, Japan, studied agricultural engineering at the Institut Pertanian Bogor (IPB). The second, Lie Bing Hoat (Vico), born in Boston, studied medicine at the University of Indonesia and specializes in medical rehabilitation. The third, Lie In Hoat (Indrawan), born in Jakarta, has a degree from the Economics Faculty of the University of Indonesia and an MBA from the University of the City of Manila. The fourth, the only girl, Ratna Indrawati, born in Jakarta, also has an Ir degree from the IPB, and an MBA from the University of Georgia in Atlanta.

Lie had his first stroke in 1986, from which he recovered. In 1989 until March 1990, he was in the U.S. for six months at the invitation of the Johns Hopkins University. At the end of 1990, he had a second stroke that impaired his right arm. In 1991, he went to China to seek recovery, but according to his wife, there was no improvement and they returned to Jakarta. In August 2002, he had his third stroke that paralyze his right arm, on 12 January 2009 he passed away in Jakarta.

However, in the beginning of his illness, he continued to go to his office and was active in seminars held at the LIPI and other institutions. He also regularly participated in meetings of the Lembaga Pengkajian Strategi Indonesia (LPSI), set up as a kind of think-tank by a number of high military officers.

He continued writing for newspapers, especially the Kompas Daily. According to his colleague, CPF Luhulima, whose son James Luhulima, is with the Daily Kompas, this Daily still has 46 articles written by Lie from 1990 to 1999 that can still be found in Kompas' website archives. These publications mostly focused on China, and on other East Asian and Southeast Asian countries, which serve as evidence of Lie's keen interest in international and current affairs. In the various conversations, mostly by phone, with this author, Lie had invariably mentioned his two concerns: First, the terms 'Overseas Chinese' or 'Hoakiau (huaqiao)' which are used to refer to ethnic Chinese in Indonesia. In his view, these terms are applicable only to citizens from China or Taiwan who live in Indonesia. Those who are Indonesian citizens should be called 'ethnic Chinese', 'Chinese Indonesians' or 'hua jen (huaren)'. The other concern he had was the change of terms from 'Tionghoa' to 'Cina'. This change was the result of a high-level seminar of military people in Bandung after the G-30-S in 1965. Lie said that he had tried to persuade the military that the term 'Tionghoa' should continue to be used, but he admitted that he 'lost' in that argument. However, he has persisted in his own way. That is, whenever he met someone who wrote about ethnic Chinese, he tried to convince him/her to use the correct terms.

Lie Tjeng Tjoan, John

Admiral, national hero, Indonesia

John Lie Tjeng Tjoan (李正泉，译音), better known as "John Lie", has become a legend in Indonesian revolutionary history. He was the only Indonesian admiral of Chinese descent, as well as the only Chinese Indonesian who was awarded the title of "Pahlawan Nasional" (National Hero). He changed his name to "Yahya Daniel Darma" in 1967, following the national regulation that encouraged ethnic Chinese to change their names.

Lie was born on 9 March 1911 in Kanaka, a part of a Chinese kampong in Manado, North Sulawesi. His father was Lie Kae Tae and his mother, Maryam Oei Tseng Nie. Both came from Peranakan Chinese families. According to their family history, both his parents' ancestors came from Fuzhou or Xiamen and both were the fifth generation of ethnic Chinese who resided in Manado, Sulawesi. Lie was raised with some Dutch education during his early years. He first went to Holland Chinese School (HCS) and later moved to Christelijke Lagere School, a primary school based on Christian teaching. Although his attendance in this Christian school was short, it had a very deep influence on his life. He was a very devoted Christian who always carried a Bible everywhere he went. He used to play around Manado harbour when he was a child and became interested in any work related to the sea, while wishing to become a soldier as well.

Lie left his hometown for Batavia (the name of Jakarta during the colonial time) at the age of seventeen. His departure was not unusual as it is a norm for the youth of the Manado community at the time to venture out to achieve more in life. He did various hard jobs, including coolie chores at Tanjung Priok Harbour, before being employed by KPM, a Dutch shipping company that monopolized shipping services in inter-island communication. Before joining the company as a full deckhand and later navigator — together with nineteen other Indonesians — he was trained in basic sailing skills, along with 1,000 recruits. According to his family recollections, due to the expansion of KPM services, he spent at least fifteen years sailing between Batavia and other islands in the Netherlands India, all over Asia, Africa, and other places. His dream to become a sailor was therefore fulfilled. Another source says that he also sailed between Batavia, Durban, and Shanghai during his work with KPM. But soon after the outbreak of World War II, the Dutch were thrown out of Indonesia by the Japanese invaders. He actively participated in the arrangement for the evacuation of Dutch nationals from Cilacap harbour on the south beach of Central Java, to Australia and Ceylon. The Dutch Government ordered KPM to move all its ships by sailing to Australia, or else they would be destroyed. At the beginning of the war, Cilacap was the only harbour that had not been bombed by the Japanese airplanes.

When the war started in February 1942, Lie and his friends were on assignments on the ship, M.V Tosari, carrying Dutch and evacuees of other nationalities and 400 tons of rubber from Cilacap to Australia, just one day before Japanese planes attacked the harbour. During the journey, Tosari and other ships were continuously under attack from Japanese planes, and several ships were destroyed and sunk. En route to Australia, M.V. Tosari received an order to change course and sail to Colombo. The ship arrived there safely in Colombo, and after disembarking its passengers, sailed to Bombay to deliver the rubber to its final destination, just several days before Bombay was also attacked by the Japanese. M.V. Tosari later received an order to continue sailing to the British naval base in Koramshar, Iran. Lie and his friends, along with M.V. Tosari, were officially part of the British Royal Navy, and assigned to manage the logistics for Allied warships that arrived from Australia. It was during his stay in Koramshar that he was officially baptized, an event he was very proud of. It was also in Koramshar that Lie and his colleagues received training in the art of war at sea, which later motivated him to join the Indonesian Navy, a military force established not long after Soekarno and Hatta proclaimed the establishment of the Republic of Indonesia. They spent about three years in Koramshar, repairing ships as their main occupation and it was there that he and his friends started hearing about the end of the Japanese Occupation, the proclamation of Indonesian independence on All India Radio, and the possible return of the Dutch to Indonesia to re-establish its colonial rule.

Eventually, the British Navy allowed all Indonesian sailors to return to their country, and in February 1946, they left Koramshar for home via Singapore. During his ten-days stop in Singapore, Lie watched and learnt how the British Navy personnel defused and removed sea mines left by the Japanese. On arrival in Batavia, he joined the newly established Badan Keamanan Rakyat Laut (BKR Laut), the navy section of the People's Security Body, as a low-ranking sailor. His section was in Yogyakarta, the capital of the Indonesian Republic during the war of revolution. His knowledge of defusing sea mines came in handy when he was assigned to remove Japanese sea mines in Cilacap harbour. The small harbour of Cilacap was later made the main navy base during the war of independence (1945–50).

Useful though his mine defusing knowledge was, it was his daring smuggling of Indonesian agricultural products, however, that made Lie internationally famous, and he smuggled mainly rubber, one of the most strategic materials at the time. As a nava officer, he was stationed in Singapore and his main assignment was to command a ship, code named ML 366, which slipped through the Dutch Navy blockade along the Strait of Malacca, carrying the strategic material to the Indonesian representatives in Singapore, Malaya, and Thailand. Money from the sale of the raw material was then used to buy arms, medicine, and other supplies for the revolutionary army. On several occasions the ship was nearly sunk by the Dutch Navy and Air Force that patrolled the strait. Lie once said that the well-being and safety of himself and his crew were due to an act of God as he always carried the Bible with him on all his assignments, and the western media thus called him the "Guns and Bible Smuggler". He succeeded fifteen times in penetrating the Dutch blockade in the Strait of Malacca, and his biggest haul was in 1947, delivering 800 tons of rubber to Utoyo Ramelan, the Indonesian representative in Singapore. In 1949, due to his meritorious service during the Indonesian revolutionary war, he was promoted to commander, and as the commander of Gajah Mada Corvett, he played an active role in defeating the Permesta rebels on his native island, Sulawesi, and also the PRRI rebellion in Sumatera from 1957–58. In 1964 (another source says 1960) he was promoted to laksamana muda (admiral).

At the age of forty-five Lie married a woman priest from his native land by the name of Margaretha Dharma Angkuw, who was also a peranakan Chinese. He married Angkuw when he was commander of the Jakarta Maritime Military Area. Lie retired from active duty in 1967 and went into the export and import business until 1980. He died on 27 August 1988, and was survived by his wife. They had no children. In 2009, Admiral John Lie was honoured with an Indonesian Government decree granting him posthumously the title of "National Hero", the first and, so far, the only Chinese Indonesian to be awarded this highest title.

Founder of Ikatan Arsitek Indonesia (Indonesian Institute of Architects), Indonesia

Liem Bwan Tjie was educated in Europe, but was nurtured as a Chinese in an Indonesian cultural environment. As an architect, he blended three elements into a highly versatile creative power. His concept of beauty was based on dignity, prudence, and harmony. He had designed offices, sport facilities, shops, markets, and many houses and villas during his thirty-five year career in Indonesia.

Liem (林) Bwan Tjie was born on 6 September 1891 in Semarang. His great grandfather came to Semarang from Fujian sometime in the early nineteenth century. It was, however, his grandfather, Liem Kiem Ling, who established a cloth shop in 1849 that grew into the biggest importer and distributor of textile and draperies in Central Java. Thanks to this, the family had a good relationship with many Dutch businessmen, who offered to help the Liem children to further their education in the Netherlands. Liem Bwan Tjie was one of the young men who went to Europe. Apparently he had finished his elementary school and basic technical education before joining the college, Hogere Burgereschool (HBS), in Haarlem. After graduation, he worked with various prominent architects in Amsterdam, namely, B.J. Ouendag, Michel de Klerk, Gulden en Geldmaker, and Ed. Cuypers. He was immersed in the Amsterdam School style of architecture and was deeply impressed by de Klerk, who worked together with him in the competition for the Royal Academy for Pure Arts in Amsterdam.

In 1920, after four years of work, he decided to pursue further studies in architecture at Delft Technical University. It was there that he engaged in social and spiritual debates of the time, which reminded him of his status as a second-class citizen back in the Dutch Indies. Social segregation practised by the colonial government placed the Chinese and people of Chinese descent below the Europeans. Along with the wave of nationalism in China, the bitterness made many turn their hopes to mainland China.

Then in 1924, he suddenly decided to go to Paris with some friends, attracted by the charm of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts and the city's intellectual and aesthetic atmosphere. There, he met people from all over the world, including China. After only two years, he moved to Beijing, this time, to Yenching University to prepare himself to become a lecturer. But Japan invaded China, and when the situation was worsening, his family urged him to return to Semarang, Indonesia.

He was back in Semarang in 1929 and began his own architectural practice. One of his first commissions was the headquarters for the Oei Tiong Ham Concern (OTH-C), a big business conglomerate based in Semarang. At the time, OTH-C had just adopted a modern western style management for the company and wanted a building to express this new attitude — western modernity rooted in Chinese tradition. Liem Bwan Tjie simply fitted the bill. The grand building stirred quite a sensation when it was officially opened in 1931. Liem became famous overnight and assignments poured in; he designed offices, shops, cinemas, public swimming pools, in addition to several country houses and villas for the Chinese community. OTH-C also commissioned him to design their branch offices in Surabaya (1935) and Jakarta (1941); the latter was not built. His public swimming pools showed strong influence from Frank Lloyd Wright, but his later works, two cinema theatres in Semarang (1940), betrayed a cubistic tendency rooted in the works of W.M. Dudok.

Liem Bwan Tjie's works could be split into two periods: the Semarang (pre World War), and the Jakarta (post-World War). In the first, the heavy influence of the Amsterdam School, which employed ornamentation reflecting the dynamic quality of life, was vividly expressed. The compact and organic organization of spaces still flowed into the second period, although the forms grew more solid and bereft of ornaments, indicating the influence of W. M. Dudok. The cubistic forms became more majestic in bigger buildings.

However his interiors always conveyed a subdued, restrained atmosphere by his use of low-key colours and controlled lighting. The materials he used were always of the best available quality and craftmanship, betraying a legacy from the Arts and Crafts Movement and the Art Nouveau spirit. He was fully aware of, and responsive to, the tropical climate with its harsh sunlight and the need for shade. Details and ornamentations, where appropriate, sprang from rich Chinese tradition, balancing light and shade, mass and space, yin and yang.

It was his country houses and villas that best expressed his ideas about beauty and respect for the environment. The house he designed for Han Tiauw Tjong (1931) was the grandest of his experiments: two layers of curved roofs formed the horizontal elements facing the valley looking into Semarang, abutted by a vertical mass of white at its entrance. Situated on a promontory, the building jumped out of the landscape in total harmony. Less flamboyant, but no less beautiful is the house for Sih Tiauw Hien (1934) in Pudakpayung, south of Semarang.

The Japanese Occupation terminated his activities and even forced him into hiding. After the war ended, Liem and his family moved to Jakarta (Batavia), where the Dutch administration commissioned him to do an inventory of war damage throughout the archipelago. This brought him in contact with diverse circles and bigger projects. He designed a palatial residence for the president in Jakarta (1947), as well as a hospital and a high school campus in Makasar (1948). However, these designs were never translated into actual buildings as conditions in those times did not permit them.

It was only after the transfer of political power to the Republic of Indonesia that some of his designs came to fruition. The Leper Hospital in Tangerang (1950), Institute for Mouth and Hoof Diseases in Surabaya (1951–58), Ikada Sport Stadium in Jakarta (1951) and Teladan Sport Stadium in Medan (1953) are examples.

Since Dutch architects left Indonesia in the mid-1950s, the need for architect became more acute, while the education of Indonesian architects, which only began in 1950, was also handicapped by the expulsion of Dutch citizens. At the time, Liem Bwan Tjie was working on the Ministry of Agriculture building (1956), the National Police Headquarters (1960), the North Sulawesi University campus in Menado (1961), and the Hospital of Ambon (1962). These buildings were national scale and importance, so they were designed to be extremely functional. Yet their compositions reflect beauty in their simplicity and retain harmonious proportions.

Besides doing big and monumental buildings, Liem Bwan Tjie still reserved time for doing smaller projects such as private houses, for which he could fully express his ideas, even if he could not possibly control the execution of his designs the way he would have wished to. Some building projects had higher spiritual values for him and provided him with opportunities to explore his spiritual quest more deeply: the Chinese temple, Wan Kiap Sie, in Jakarta; a Buddhist vihara in Cipanas; and a Catholic church in Kramatjati, Jakarta. In their designs, Liem showed his deep concern and mastery of details, while sharpening his focus on uniting his three basic elements of dignity, prudence, and harmony into an architectural form. Although he did not hold any degree from any school he attended, he was nominated to be a member of the Royal Institute of Engineers (KIVI — Koninkijke Instituut voor Ingenieurs) because his scholarship was considered well above any academic qualification. The Dutch Union of Architects (BNA — Bond van Nederlandse Architecten) appointed him a member of the Council of Architects, the highest body in the organization. He was also an active member of the Netherlands-Indies Society of Architects (NIAK — Nederlands-Indie Architecten Kring). Later, in 1959, together with some younger architects, Liem established the Indonesian Institute of Architects (IAI – Ikatan Arsitek Indonesia), the only organization for professional architects in Indonesia.

In 1964 his old schoolfriends in the Netherlands suggested that he took a break from his hectic work schedule and invited him to go there. Thinking that his two daughters needed better education opportunities, he decided to accept the invitation in 1965 and go for a trip that was planned for six months. He fell ill in the Netherlands and his return to Indonesia was delayed. His condition worsened and he died at the Rijswijk Hospital on 28 July 1966, leaving behind his wife and two daughters.

Liem Koen Hian

(林群贤, Lin Qunxian, 1896–1952)

Leading political leader before WWII, journalist, Indonesia

Liem Koen Hian was a major political figure in pre-war Peranakan Chinese politics. He founded the Indonesia-oriented Chinese party, the Partai Tionghoa Indonesia (PTI). The post-war Chinese socio-political organization: the Badan Permusjawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia (Baperki [Indonesian Citizens Consultative Body]) shared some of this party's idea, but a rival organization of Baperki, the Lembaga Pembinaan Kesatuan Bangsa (LPKB [Institute for the Development of National Unity]), a semi-governmental organization, claimed the PTI was the vanguard of the "assimilation movement" and indirectly identified Liem as its progenitor. Writers of the younger generation also consider Liem the father of their assimilationist ideas.

Liem Koen Hian was born in 1896 in Banjarmasin, East Kalimantan, the eldest of seven children. His father, Liem Ke An, was a businessman. As was usual among some well-to-do Peranakan families, Liem was sent to a Dutch school for his primary education and it was here that he experienced discrimination which nurtured his anti-Dutch attitude later.

In the early twentieth century when Liem was growing up, local Chinese resented their inferior status and the discriminatory policies against them in the colony. After 1899, the status of the Chinese was lower than the Japanese, who were granted European legal status that year. In 1909, China issued a law claiming all overseas Chinese as its nationals. This prompted the Dutch to declare Peranakan Chinese as Dutch subjects in 1910. To combat the pan-Chinese movement, the Dutch gradually removed the causes of local Chinese grievances. Nevertheless, the pan-Chinese movement continued to gain momentum among the Indies Chinese, at least, up to the second decade of the twentieth century.

After leaving school, Liem worked briefly for the Shell Oil Company in Balikpapan and returned to Banjarmasin where he developed an interest in journalism, and worked for Penimbagan, a Peranakan newspaper, before he made a name for himself in journalism in Java. When World War II broke out, Liem sailed to Surabaya and worked for a Peranakan newspaper, Tjhoen Tjhioe, under editor-in-chief, Tjan Kiem Bie, a Dutch-educated Peranakan journalist. In early 1917, Liem resigned from Tjhoen Tjhioe and published a short-lived weekly of his own, Soo Lim Poo. This led to his withdrawal from journalism for almost a year and a half, while he set up a business in Aceh. In December 1918, Liem was invited to become the editor-in-chief of the Padang-based Sinar Sumatra, the advocate of Chinese nationalism in the Outer Islands; Sin Po at the time was the main advocate in Java.

Under the stimulus of the pan-Chinese movement, the young and energetic Liem declared himself a Chinese nationalist. He later revealed that the humiliation and oppression that he suffered at school contributed to his sentiment. While being editor of Tjhoen Tjhioe in 1916, Liem criticized Dutch policies towards the Chinese in the Soerabaiasche Handelsblad (Surabaya Commercial Magazine), a Dutch news magazine published in Surabaya. He attacked the Dutch Nationality Law which forced the Peranakan Chinese to become Dutch subjects without giving them the right of repudiation. He reiterated his nationalist view when Sin Po launched its campaign against the Dutch Nationality Law in 1919. Sin Po succeeded in gathering 30,000 signatures of the Indies Chinese who opted for Chinese citizenship. Liem joined Sin Po and urged other organizations in Sumatra to launch their protests against compulsory military service and the Dutch Nationality Law. The campaign was unsuccessful because Peranakan leaders with vested interest in the Indies did not support it. The Chinese Government renewed the 1911 Consular Treaty which acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Dutch over the Indies Chinese.

After being editor-in-chief of Sinar Sumatra until late 1921, Liem then accepted an editorial job at Pewarta Soerabaia, a newspaper owned by The Kian Seng, an outspoken Peranakan Chinese nationalist. In March 1925, Liem resigned, probably because his anti-colonial and Chinese nationalist views annoyed the Dutch and Peranakan Chinese advertisers of Pewarta Soerabaia. It was during his time at Soeara Publiek, a Peranakan newspaper which was also published in Surabaya until early 1929, that Liem developed a new orientation towards "Indisch Burgerschap" (Indies citizenship). He now considered the Indies the homeland of the Peranakan, who should have the same rights and obligations as indigenous Indonesians. He developed his concept of "Indisch Burgerschap" into "Indonesierschap" (Indonesian citizenship) when he became editor-in-chief of Sin Tit Po. In his "Indisch Burgerschap" concept, he had not made it clear whether or not Peranakan had to work with Indonesians for self-governance in Indonesia, but he made this explicit in his "Indonesierschap".

Racial antagonism that resulted from the Communist Uprisings of 1926–27 was increasing when Liem became convinced that the struggle between the Dutch and indigenous Indonesians would eventually lead to Indonesia's independence. Liem read Dr Tjipto Mangoenkoesoemo's writings and shared Tjipto's view about the gradual development of an "East Indies Nation" (read: Indonesia), consisting of those who considered the Netherlands Indies their motherland and who actively contributed to developing the country. Peranakan (Dutch Eurasians, Peranakan Chinese, and Peranakan Arabs) formed one of the constituent groups. Liem had thought that the Peranakan should be separated from Totok; however, he considered conversion to Islam and the changing of names and customs personal matters, believing that the future Indonesia would have room for cultural differences. Liem left his party, PTI, to join Gerindo, a party dominated by indigenous Indonesians. After Indonesia's independence, he formed Persatuan Tenaga Indonesia, a multi-ethnic party. This only indicates that he was advocating "political assimilation"; rather than "assimilation" in the sense the LPKB intended it to be.

Liem's ideas conflicted with those of Sin Po which advocated Chinese nationalism among the Peranakan Chinese. Liem was criticized for changing his convictions. He defended himself saying that man continually develops and what was suitable for him at one time did not necessarily mean that it would suit him for the rest of his life. In Surabaya, Liem lived among Indonesian nationalists, and his job kept him in close touch with the Indonesian nationalist movement.

On the initiative of Sin Tit Po and with the support of the nationalist newspaper, Soeara Oemoem, the official organ of the Persatoean Bangsa Indonesia (PBI [Indonesia National Union]), a meeting was held in Surabaya on 8 May 1932. Forty organizations, including political parties and sports associations of the three races (the indigenous Indonesians, Peranakan Chinese, and Peranakan Arabs) sent representatives to the meeting. Liem was elected chairman. A Coloured People's Committee (Comité Bangsa Berwarna), the Commité van Actie Persatoean Bangsa Asia, was formed to organize boycotts of soccer matches. The meeting was for Indonesian nationalists to condemn Dutch colonialism. Liem delivered a public lecture in Surabaya on the three political streams in the Peranakan Chinese community. Where he reiterated his criticisms of the Sin Po Group and was particularly critical of the Chung Hwa Hui (CHH [Chinese Association]), believing that its leaders were pro-Dutch, who also opposed the increase of indigenous representatives in the People's Council (Volksraad). Liem believed that the CHH created an impression that the Indies Chinese sided with the Dutch and their colonial government; thus, for the sake of the Peranakan Chinese, a new Peranakan party was necessary to confront the CHH. He defended his "stream", the pro-Indonesiër stream, and said that the Peranakan Chinese had to be "Indonesiërs" (a Dutch term for "Indonesians").

Baperki argued that the disappearance of the Chinese as a distinct group would only happen after Indonesia became a "socialist society". But its leaders claimed neither the PTI nor Liem as its progenitor for they were afraid that Baperki would be identified as exclusively Chinese. However, Liem's abandonment of Indonesian citizenship in 1951, made the argument as to whether or not he was father of the "integration" or "assimilation" movement irrelevant — he was criticized for repudiating Indonesian citizenship. Liem was ailing by then and he found himself confronted by a racially conscious society where there was no room for partial assimilation. He was painfully in search of an identity, but attained little success. As he could not cope with the situation, he left politics to become a businessman. He ran a dispensary in Tanah Abang (Jakarta) and intended to open a branch in Medan. But on a business trip to Medan, he suffered a heart attack and died on 5 November 1952.

Liem Swie King

(林水镜, Lin Shuijing, 1956–)
Leading badminton player, Indonesia

There are three Indonesian badminton players who are world famous: Tan Joe Hok who is the most senior, Rudy Hartono Kurniawan, and Liem Swie King better known as King. All three have won the men's singles title in the All England Competitions, Hartono and Liem have perhaps given the most memorable performances. Liem's powerful smash, in particular, has left an impression on many badminton fans.

Liem Swie King was born on 28 February 1956 in Kudus, Central Java, the son of a bicycle dealer. His father, Ng Thian Poo, was born in Fuzhou in Fujian, China, where he married Oei See Moi. To escape the hard life Ng emigrated to Indonesia on his own. After he had settled down in Kudus his wife joined him. They had nine children: two boys and seven girls, but the eldest son died in an accident and Liem Swie King became the only son in the family. It seems that many badminton champions in Indonesia come from a family which is interested in badminton. Liem's father was a badminton enthusiast. It was under his father that he received his early training. A few of his sisters were also badminton players, but were not as successful as him. Liem received all his education from primary, junior middle, to senior middle schools in his hometown, Kudus. During his school years, he also joined the Djarum Badminton Club in a local town which produced many outstanding Indonesian badminton players.

The talented local boy emerged as the champion of Central Java in 1972, and the National Junior Champion in 1974. In the following two years, he continued to hold men's singles titles in Indonesian national championships. In 1976 he participated in the All England men's singles. It was in the finals that he was defeated by Rudy Hartono Kurniawan. It was suggested that Liem was asked to "lose" to Hartono as Indonesia wanted Hartono to become an eight-time champion of the All England Competitions, surpassing Erland Kops of Denmark who had won seven titles. The following year, Liem met Flemming Delfs of Denmark in the finals of the All England Competitions and was also defeated. But in 1978 and 1979 he took the men's singles titles. He lost to Prakash Padukone of India in the 1980 All-England Competitions, but regained the title in 1981. It is worth noting that in 1980 Liem participated in the World Badminton Championships in Jakarta and lost to Rudy Hartono.

Nevertheless, Liem was an important member of the Indonesian Thomas Cup team. He took part in the Thomas Cup competitions six times (1976, 1978, 1982, 1984,1986, and 1988) and contributed to Indonesia's winning of the Thomas Cup three times (1976, 1979, and 1984). However, his performance in the Thomas Cup competition in 1984 in the first men's singles was disappointing. He was defeated by Luan Jin of China in the rubber set. Fortunately in the men's doubles, he teamed up with Hariamanto Kartono and the two were able to gain one crucial point for Indonesia. Due to his series of defeats as a men's singles player, he chose to play in men's doubles after 1984 and decided to retire after 1988.

In his heyday, Liem was considered an excellent player. He was fast and his jumping smash was deadly. Nevertheless, he had a weakness. When he was losing a game, he was unable to concentrate and would lose his confidence, especially when he was playing with Chinese players such as Han Jian and Luan

Jin. Liem was a champion in his own right, but as a young man he also made mistakes. He admired Rudy Hartono and followed in the latter's footstep in making a movie. In 1979 he starred in Sakura dalam Pelukan (Sakura in his arms) with Eva Arnaz, a sexy movie star. He was thus criticized for not taking badminton seriously; he himself knew that he was not a good actor. The same year, during the 1979 SEA Games, he overslept and arrived late for the competition. As a result he was penalized for three months.

After being an international badminton star for many years and retiring in 1988, Liem re-emerged in 2009, not as a badminton player, but as the hero of an Indonesian movie entitled, Guntur, which tells the story of Liem himself. The same year, a biography on him was published by Kompas Publishing, entitled, Panggil Aku King (Just call me King). A forgotten badminton idol thus re-emerged in the news. According to the book, he married Lucia Alamsah in 1983 and went into the hotel business. He has one son and two daughters.

It is interesting to note that not many top Indonesian badminton players of Chinese descent retained their Chinese names during the Soeharto era. Perhaps Liem Swie King and Ivanna Lie Eng (Ing) Hwa were the only two. Changing non-Indonesian names to "Indonesian" (-sounding) names was enforced by law by Soeharto at the end of 1966 and implemented the following year. In theory, name-changing is not compulsory, but in reality, especially in the 1960s, changing names was often seen as a symbol of political loyalty to Indonesia. Still, quite a few Chinese Indonesians who were already well established and well known by their Chinese names in their fields did not change their names (for instance, economist Thee Kian Wie and historian Lie Tek Tjeng). In fact, non-Indonesian citizens were not allowed to change their names into Indonesian names. That is also one of the reasons Ivanna Lie kept her name. Ivanna only received her Indonesian citizenship document in 1982 by which time she had already come to be known by her Chinese name. In the case of Liem Swie King, he only got his Indonesian citizenship through naturalization after he had obtained a national junior championship in 1974. Although he also had an Indonesian name, Guntur, he never used it as he was already known as Liem Swie King, abbreviated as King, which does not sound like a Chinese name. It was also interesting to note that the Chinese surname of Liem's father was Ng, not Liem; it is not clear why King adopted a surname different to that of his father.

Liem Thian Joe

(林天佑, Lin Tianyou, circa 1895–1962)
Editor, historian, journalist, Indonesia

Liem Thian Joe was probably one of the first historians among the Chinese in Indonesia — in the sense that he worked with primary sources and interviews. Liem's main work is the history of the Chinese community in Semarang, the most important trading port in Central Java:. This much cited work was translated into Chinese and reprinted in Indonesian fifty and seventy years later, showing that there is still a demand for this classic long after its first appearance in 1933. Aside from his masterpiece, Liem also wrote shorter historical essays on various aspects of Peranakan life in Java, which can be useful for people who study the life of overseas Chinese in pre-war Indonesia.

Liem was born in Parakan, a small town in Central Java in 1895 or 1897. Most studies noted that he was born in 1895, but a contemporary Who's Who gives the year 1897. Liem received his primary education in various languages — Malay, Javanese, and Hokkien — and then completed his studies at the Tiong Hua Hwe Koan (THHK) elementary school of Ngadirejo. To broaden his knowledge, he also learned Dutch. Liem started his working life as a merchant in Ngadirejo, but it was obvious that his heart was in journalism. He developed his talent in writing during his student days, when he contributed his writings to Warna Warta and Perniagaan, Peranakan newspapers in Semarang and Batavia, respectively. From business, he changed his career to work as a journalist at Warna Warta at the beginning of the 1920s. A decade later he moved to Djawa Tengah, also published in Semarang. Due to his achievements, he was given the position of editor of the daily and its monthly, Djawa Tengah Review. During this period his enthusiasm in Peranakan history grew stronger, and later became his main interest, even though he already wrote a few short fiction works that appeared in serial form. He also translated a few Chinese historical novels into Malay. In 1938 he became editor of the literary monthly, Mimbar Melajoe, which was also published in Semarang and carried cloak and dagger stories.

Liem's masterpiece was undoubtedly his historical chronicle cum narrative, Riwajat Semarang which was originally serialized in Djawa Tengah Review between March 1931 and July 1933. Riwajat Semarang: dari Djamannja Sam Poo sampe Terhapoesnja Kongkoan (History of Semarang: From the Time of Zheng He until the Abolishment of the Chinese Council, 1933). The origin of the book started in early 1931, when the government announced plans to close down the Chinese Council (Kongkoan) of the port city. As a journalist, Liem visited the office and was surprised to find "several old archives written by our nation in the past" (brapa tjatetan toea jang dibikin oleh bangsa kita di djaman-djaman jang telah laloe). He also discovered minutes written by Chinese officers from the past. He regarded these as important and valuable enough to be disseminated among his fellow Peranakans. The Semarang Kongkoan archives were a real treasure for the study of the Chinese community in Central Java, but later nobody recalled their existence.

Liem's research showed the importance of Chinese sources in writing the history of Java and Indonesia. He was perhaps the first Chinese "historian" who worked in the modern historian's style: studied primary sources (archives) and crosschecked them with secondary sources (old newspapers, books, journals), along with interviews. He also provided footnotes to clarify some points in the texts. Furthermore, Liem was one of the first Peranakan historians to write their history seriously from "within". His endeavour was later followed by other Peranakan historians from pre-war Indonesia: Kwee Tek Hoay with his research on "The Origins of Modern Chinese Movement in Indonesia" (Atsal Moelahnja Timboel Pergerakan Tionghoa jang Modern di Indonesia), serialized in Moestika Romans from August 1936–January 1939 and Nio Joe Lan, who was commissioned to write the forty-year history of the THHK Batavia, Riwajat 40 Taon dari Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan Batavia (1940).

Liem took the trouble to add relevant information before publishing his series on Semarang into a book of twenty-nine chapters, and thus made the book more comprehensive and detailed than its original form. An example is chapter XI (Djawa Tengah Review, January 1932). The series article mentioned only two names among donors to a major Chinese temple, while the book provided seventeen, along with the amount of their contributions. Liem's interest in Peranakan history grew stronger, partially due to the warm reception of his historical research. From 1938, Liem contributed regularly to the popular monthly, Sin Po Weekblad. It is known that in 1939 he wrote short historical essays on Chinese stories, translated into Javanese, Sino-Malay journalism, and the Chinese language press in the Dutch Indies. He also contributed historical essays to Jade, a journal of the China-Institute in pre-war Batavia. His articles continued to appear in post-war issues of that journal. Despite their short format, Liem's historical essays are also valuable to historians who study the Peranakan in Java.

Liem was highly regarded an authority on the history of the Chinese community of Semarang. Donald Willmott, an American sociologist who wrote a classic book entitled, The Chinese of Semarang (1960), dedicated his book to Liem Thian Joe, "the Semarang historian, journalist and friend who has given this study its foundations in the past". Liem was also commissioned by at least two major Chinese business institutions of the city to write their history: the Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Kian Gwan Trading Company. The former task was completed in 1937, through a book titled, Boekoe Peringetan 1907–1937 Tiong Hwa Siang Hwee Semarang (Semarang's Chinese Chamber of Commerce Commemorative Book 1907–1937). It is an anonymous piece of work, but admitted by Liem to be his in a book published in 1951. The book on the Kian Gwan Trading Company was an unfinished project. Kian Gwan is a legendary business group that was founded by Oei Tjie Sien, father of the well-known business magnate from Semarang, Oei Tiong Ham. In 1963, Kian Gwan celebrated its centennial, and in 1959, commissioned Liem to write a history of the company. Liem was granted access to the archives and correspondence of the Oei family. However, in 1961, the company facing problems with the Indonesian Government and thought it unwise to publish its centennial book. However, Liem's first draft dated 1959 was later purchased by Monash University in Victoria, Australia. It lacks an explanation on Kian Gwan's success and the entrepreneurship of the House of Oei. However, it adds to our knowledge on the extraordinary family from Semarang. Liem passed away in his beloved city in February 1962.

Due to its importance, Riwajat Semarang was translated into Chinese by Li Xue Min and Chen Xuanhua and published in China under the title, Sanbaolong lishi (Jinan University, 1984) and reprinted in Indonesian by Hasta Wahana in 2004 under its original title, Riwayat Semarang. Liem's endeavour in writing Semarang's history was followed by local historian Amen Budiman (1948–95). Drawing from Liem's work, Amen serialized his own Semarang Riwayatmu Dulu (Old Days of Semarang) in the city's main paper, Suara Merdeka, in 1975–77. Amen had planned to publish Semarang Riwayatmu Dulu as his magnum opus in four volumes, but he only managed to publish the first volume during his lifetime. As an admirer of Liem, Amen did not hesitate to note that Liem was "a master in the writing of Semarang city's history" (seorang pendekar dalam penulisan sejarah kota Semarang).

Lien Ying Chow

(连瀛州, Lian Yingzhou, 1906–2004)
Banker, hotelier, diplomat, community leader, philanthropist, Singapore

Renowned for his acumen as a banker, Dr Lien Ying Chow created one of the "big four" banks in Singapore, the Overseas Union Bank (OUB). As high commissioner to Malaysia soon after Singapore became independent, he played a critical role in strengthening ties between the two governments whose relationship at that time was far less than favourable. Lien was one of the prime movers behind the establishment of a number of educational institutions, including the Nanyang University, Ngee Ann College, and National University of Singapore (NUS). He helped to shape the landscape of higher education in Singapore and opened the door for many Singaporeans to acquire knowledge and skills, laying the foundation for economic growth that has helped Singaporeans lead better lives. In 1980, he established The Lien Foundation which continues his legacy of good work in helping the needy and underprivileged in society.

Lien was born in 1906 in Chaoyang, Guangdong province in China. He became an orphan at the age of ten. At fourteen, he arrived in Singapore with only a few coins in his pocket, yet full of hope, vision, and the determination to strive for a better life. He first worked in a provision shop as an assistant while studying English at night. Subsequently he was employed as a shipping clerk and an assistant manager until he started his own company, known as Asian Ship Chandler, when he was only twenty-one. In the same year, he joined some friends to form another company called Aik Hin and two years later established a provision stall known as Wah Hin to supply sundries to the British army and the civil service. It soon became one of the leading firms in food imports from Australia for supply to the British forces, hotels, and other enterprises both in Singapore and across the causeway.

The young Lien emerged as one of the most successful businessmen in town and a prominent leader in the Chinese community. Despite the fact that he was only thirty-four, he was elected as the president of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry (SCCCI) in 1940, the youngest man ever to be elected to this prestigious and influential position. In 1952, Lien was elected president of Ngee Ann Kongsi and contributed to its development significantly. Under his leadership, the association constructed the Ngee Ann Building, a commercial and residential complex comprising luxurious apartments, offices and shops, on the plot of land it owned along Orchard Road. The rent it generated greatly enhanced the financial capability of the kongsi and the complex had been a landmark on Orchard Road before it was subsequently replaced by the present-day Ngee Ann City — an upmarket shopping and office complex. Lien served on many statutory boards, government linked companies, as well as in trade and community organizations. In recognition of his services, he was presented the Meritorious Services Medal, PJG, by the president of Singapore in 1964.

Being the president of the SCCCI, Lien became chairman of the Relief Fund and the Chinese Mobilization Council, providing relief services when the Japanese invaded Singapore in 1942. As a military contractor and community leader, he was in mortal danger so he fled to Chongqing, the wartime capital of China, a few days before the Japanese army occupied Singapore. He sat on the country's Political Council as a representative of the overseas Chinese. In 1943, he was awarded a banking license by the Chinese Government to start the Overseas Chinese Union Bank. In 1945, he visited London as China's special commissioner to discuss matters regarding post-war rehabilitation.

Lien relocated his bank to Singapore in 1949, renaming it the Overseas Union Bank. Lien co-founded the bank with several prominent wealthy overseas Chinese entrepreneurs. OUB was situated at No. 1 Meyer Chambers, the most prestigious commercial building in Singapore at the time. It soon opened several local and overseas branches and by 1983, had become a leading regional bank with a branch network covering all the major financial centres in the world. However it was not until 8 August 1988 that Lien realized his long time dream of developing a magnificent building for his bank. The sixty-storey flagship — the OUB Centre — a key feature of Singapore's cityscape, was officially opened by then Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew who congratulated Lien by pointing out that "OUB Centre is a testimony to the success of Singapore and the part (played) by the entrepreneur and his (Lien) team of people." In the same year, Lien was awarded the Businessman of the Year 1988, which is the most prestigious award of its kind.

In addition to banking, Lien had been actively involved in hotel and property development. He was a director and shareholder of the Cathay Hotel, Ocean Park Hotel, and the Grand Pacific Hotel in Fuji. In 1971, Mandarin Singapore — an international five-star hotel developed by Lien — commenced operations. His hotel business had turned him from a banking tycoon into a man of international acclaim. Lien stepped down as group chairman of the OUB Group of companies in 1995 at the age of eighty-nine. In 2001, the bank merged with rival United Overseas Bank.

Lien was appointed the Singapore High Commissioner in Malaysia from March 1966 to August 1969. With his excellent diplomacy and good relationships with former Malaysian Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman and other key ministers, Lien contributed significantly to improving the difficult relations between the two countries.

Despite being deprived of an education as an orphan, he was instrumental in establishing and developing Ngee Ann College after contributing to the genesis of the former Nanyang University in the 1950s. The college was inaugurated in May 1963 under the umbrella of the Ngee Ann Kongsi and governed by a board of governors headed by Lien. In 1968, the college moved from the Teochew Building at Tank Road to the Kongsi's land in Clementi, changing its name to Ngee Ann Technical College in compliance with the government's emphasis on technical education. To date, the kongsi has contributed an aggregate amount of more than $100 million to the college (currently known as Ngee Ann Polytechnic). As chairman of the University Council (1980–92), Lien also played a vital role in directing the development of the newly established NUS when the government decided to form the university in 1980 by merging the former Singapore University and Nanyang University. He was appointed pro-chancellor in 1992 afte retiring from the council and conferred a Doctor of Letters by the university for his unwavering service to the NUS Council.

Lien was an inspiring example of someone who left his mark not only in business, but also on philanthropic causes. In 1980, he donated 48 per cent of his wealth to establish The Lien Foundation. His passion for education and commitment to the community continues to guide the foundation which has been supporting many social initiatives related to education, eldercare, and the environment.

One could wonder how Lien, who rose from being a penniless China boy, had been able to attain such remarkable achievements. Former cabinet minister Lim Kim San concluded that Lien "made his way through determination, shrewdness for sensing opportunities and a little bit of luck". Former Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew described Lien as "an honest person, capable of networking and cultivating lasting relationships with people from all quarters based essentially on trust. He took calculated risk in his business endeavours and was a master in overcoming obstacles". Goh Chok Tong, then prime minister of Singapore, remembers this man of boundless energy and tenacity most "for his generosity".

Lien died on 6 August, 2004 at the age of ninety-eight, leaving behind his wife, Margaret, eight children, and numerous grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Lim, Alfredo Siojo

Mayor, senator, Philippines

The law applies to all or none at all — so goes Alfredo "Fred" Lim's governance philosophy since he first became mayor of the City of Manila in 1992. He is known for his unorthodox but efficient campaigns against drugs, prostitution, and crime. His contributions in various government offices, especially as mayor of Manila, have helped beautify the city and rid it of many of its unwanted elements.

Lim (林) was born out of wedlock on 21 December 1929 in Tondo, Manila. He was cared for by nuns at the Hospicio de San Jose for the first eight years of his life before being taken in by his grandmother. He worked his way through high school at Far Eastern University, finishing this in 1948. He received his bachelor's degree in business administration in 1951 and bachelor of laws in 1963, both from the University of the East and finished his master's degree in national security administration at the National Defense College of the Philippines in 1981, graduating with honours. Then in 1996, he graduated with a doctorate in criminology from the Philippine College of Criminology.

Lim's career in the police force started in the 1950s, when he quickly distinguished himself as an outstanding police officer. Since then, he has garnered numerous awards such as the Outstanding Achievement Medal for Professional Competence as Philippine National Police Academy superintendent in 1985, the Archdiocesan Plaque of Recognition for Leadership in 1988, and the Most Outstanding Law Enforcer Award from the Consumers Union of the Philippines in 1990. In the same year, he was admitted into the first Hall of Fame, the first time this honour was bestowed on an awardee of the Ten Outstanding Police of the Philippines (TOPP). The honour was given to Lim by the Philippine Jaycees for being the first policeman to have received seven TOPP awards. From 1984 to 1985, he was the superintendent of the Philippine National Police Academy, as well as the director of the Western Police District. In the late 1980s, Lim helped protect the government of President Corazon Aquino against threats, leading Manila policemen to retake government installations against rebels in a coup d'etat attempt in 1987.

In 1989, after his retirement from the police force, Lim was appointed director of National Bureau of Investigation (NBI). He was known for effecting numerous changes within the NBI, such as the lobbying for pay increases for agents and staff, as well as for the establishment of the position of special investigator to help augment the work of regular agents.

He was elected mayor of Manila City, the country's capital, the same year, and was re-elected in 1995, as well as in 2007 and 2010. As mayor of the City of Manila, Lim became famous for his strong law and order programme, which used unorthodox methods against criminal elements — such as the spray painting of public warnings on the homes of suspected drug pushers — earning him the nickname "The Dirty Harry of Manila". When asked about the reason behind his methods, Lim answered: "The language known by criminals and law violators is 'force and violence'. You cannot be soft toward them." Lim also waged a battle against prostitution, targeting nightspots, especially in the areas of Malate and Ermita. His crackdown efforts have helped transform these former red light districts into places of wholesome entertainment. He also concentrated on improving the city's image, which had been tarnished over the years. His television and radio shows were both geared towards crime solving and serving the public. Aside from his widely publicized anti-drug and anti-crime crusades, Lim also focused on education. He set up the City College of Manila, which, along with the Pamantasan ng Lungsod ng Maynila (University of the City of Manila), provides free tertiary education to deserving students. He also helped establish the Museo Pambata (Children's Museum) to help promote the sciences to schoolchildren. When Lim was elected again as mayor of Manila in 2007, one of his first acts was to ensure that the Museo remains in Manila City by granting it a fifty-year lease on the land and building it occupies free of charge.

In 1998, Lim ran for president under the Liberal Party, garnering 8.7 per cent of the votes and finishing fifth in a race of eleven candidates. He served as secretary of the Department of Interior and Local Government (DILG) for 1999 until then president Joseph Estrada was ousted from office in 2001. As secretary of the DILG, Lim ordered a renewed crackdown on prostitution syndicates, as well as on the distribution of illegal drugs in various establishments throughout the metropolis. "Exert all efforts to stop the alleged proliferation of prostitution and drugs in shopping malls by arresting not only the sex workers engaged in the trade, but more importantly their operators and maintainers who field them in said places," Lim said.

Lim ran for senator in 2004 under the campaign slogan, "The law applies to all, otherwise, none at all!", which emphasized his belief that rank or affiliation should not affect the execution of the law. His campaign in the senate race was based on two plays on his name. His platform for government was called "LIM", and had three philosophies — Lead by example, Intellectual honesty, and Masterful governance. The specifics of his platform were expressed in four areas of concern, called "FRED" — Food for the hungry, Reforms and Education to deserving students, and a Drug- and crime-free society. Lim won a seat in the senate, but served only three out of six years, when he was once again elected mayor of Manila.

Lim's term as mayor is marked by the governance slogan, "Linisin, Ibangon (ang) Maynila" (Clean and Uplift Manila) or "LIM" again. Some of Lim's actions as mayor have been dramatic, sometimes even controversial. Soon after assuming office, he approved the removal of illegal settlers in Quiapo after a dialogue with the local imam (Islamic religious leaders) who signified their approval of the mayor's plan to rid the area of crime and illegal drug activities. Lim also talked about petitioning the Supreme Court for permission to set up a Sharia court in the area, as there were about 4,000 families in Quiapo's Islamic Center alone. The mayor also reopened Mendiola, a traditional protest site which was closed off by his predecessor, allowing protest rallies in the area on weekends and holidays. Lim also reopened Avenida Rizal to vehicular traffic. His predecessor had converted the area into pedestrian zones which instead became rife with crime. Another of Lim's actions was to tear down the establishments along Roxas Boulevard (a major thoroughfare that spans the length of Manila Bay), arguing that many of the establishments had no business permits and were selling liquor, which was a violation of a city ordinance that banned the sale in open spaces accessible by minors.

On the other hand, he allows stambulant vendors to sell on Manila sidewalks "for humanitarian reasons". Considering the plight of Manila's poorest, Lim believes that even if these sellers clog the sidewalks, it is still a better alternative than having them lead a life of crime. Lim's methods in his quest for a crime and drug-free Manila may be unorthodox, but there is no question about their efficiency. He is proof that sometimes a little force goes a long way.

Other projects that Lim spearheaded in his three terms as mayor of Manila include the establishment of free hospitalization and the provision of medicine to Manila residents in four hospitals, namely the Ospital ng Maynila, Ospital ng Tondo I, Ospital ng Sampaloc, and Ospital ng (del Pan) Tondo II. He implemented lighting programmes in sixty-five barangays, dug deep well pumps for 169 barangays, and supervised the planting of 80,000 trees along the metropolis as part of his Greening of Manila campaign.

Aside from the awards he won in the police force, Lim was also commended with the President Osmeña Most Outstanding Public Servant Award in 1992, the Dr Jose P. Rizal Immortal Award from the Knights of Rizal in 1994, the Gintong Ama Award in 1994, the Medal Merit from the International Association of Lion's Club in 1996, the Chino Roces Award in 1997, and the The Outstanding Filipino award in 1997.

Lim Beng Thai

(林明泰, Lin Mingtai, 1941–)
Businessman, philanthropist, Brunei

Dato Paduka Lim Beng Thai was one of Brunei's prominent entrepreneurs. On top of his business ventures, he has been very involved in Brunei's nation building as well, being an important economic adviser for the government. Lim was also a philanthropist, having made large donations to Chinese schools, thus earning due respect from the Chinese community. He was also an outstanding sportsman, having represented Brunei in basketball, and was Chairman of the Basketball Association, Brunei for 20 years.

Lim was born in 1941 in Brunei, to Pehin Temenggong Dato Paduka Lim Teck Hoo, one of the most prominent figures in the Chinese community of Brunei. Beng Thai was the 4th of the 14 siblings. He attended Chung Hwa Elementary School in his early years and later attended SOAS College, which was one of Brunei's prestigious colleges in 1954. Lim's family background can be considered as well-off since his family owns a number of businesses such as shipping, brick manufacturing, car dealing etc., which flourished and expanded exponentially till today. In the early years, only children from prestigious family were able to study abroad. In 1963, to further his education, Lim was sent abroad to study accountancy. After graduation, he helped his father in his business and was considered his father's right hand man. He has spent most of his time managing his father's business empire that included car shipping and property development. During his management, he showed relentless effort to further expand the empire. Like his late father, Lim is also a talented business man who possesses an unusual innovative talent that brought about great beneficial changes to the companies he is managing.

In 1993, Lim was appointed Finland Honorary Council. His Majesty the Sultan of Brunei appointed him as a Committee Member of ASEAN Business Advisory Board. Similar to his late father, Lim is also part of the Sultan's Birthday Celebration Committee. In 2004, His Majesty awarded him the title of "Dato Paduka (DPMB)" in recognition of his contributions. He is one of the very few people from the private sector to have gained such a prestigious title.

At present, he is also a member of the Brunei Economic Development Board, which is actively involved with the Pulau Muara Project and Sungai Liang Development. Due to his deep knowledge in economy and business development, his ideas and proposals are highly taken into consideration by the Brunei authorities. He is a great supporter of expanding and bringing in new innovative ideas to improve Brunei's current economy. As a patriotic man himself, he wishes that Brunei will one day be a well developed country that is well equipped and modernized to accommodate and provide the residents with sufficient resources.

The companies under Lim's management are of significant contribution to the economy of Brunei Darussalam. Boustead Sdn Bhd handles a dealership for Nissan and Suzuki motor vehicles and is one of Brunei's best-selling car dealers. Bee Seng Shipping was established in 1955, mainly carrying the building materials like cement and steel bars from Taiwan and China for Brunei's early developments in the 1950s. Lim also established the Brickwork Quarry (Hup Soon Brickworks and Ceramic Sdn Bhd), providing ready cement subsequently in the 1970s. The company was originally run by a few different companies that had struggled to sustain the business. Lim's joining marked the beginning of the company's success and it experienced full swing of its development since then. Now, the company has become one of the Sultanate's major clay brick producer, benefiting from the high demand for construction materials and has had to ramp up their production rate. The company is producing almost 3.5 million pieces of clay bricks per month, to ensure no shortage of one of the most important raw materials for housing construction.

After the demise of his father, Lim became the CEO of Lim Teck Hoo Holdings founded by his late father and has continued diligently and enthusiastically to carry on his late father's legacy. He continued to donate BND$50,000 every year to eight Chinese schools in Brunei, namely Chung Hwa Middle School in Bandar Seri Begawan, Chung Ching Middle School in Seria and Chung Hua Middle School in KB, Chung Hwa School in Labi, Chung Lian School in Sungai Liang, Chung Hwa School in Tutong, Chung Hwa School in Kiudang and Pai Yuek School in Temburong. Lim highlighted that the donations will be given away as scholarships to help provide quality education for the less fortunate children in the school. He has the strong belief that everyone must have the opportunity to receive a good education and must not be deprived from it due to financial and monetary reasons. Up to this date, it has been over half a million worth of donations being made to these eight schools. Lim can be considered not only the major donor but also an influential person who vastly facilitates the development of the Chinese schools. Like his late father, Lim has been well respected by the Chinese community for the contribution and support he has done to the Chinese community in Brunei.

Lim was highly active in academic and sports activities since his adolescence days, even having represented Brunei's basketball team. His enthusiasm for basketball resulted in his active participation in the Basketball Association, Brunei where he had been the Chairman since 1983 till 2003.

Lim Bo Seng

(林谋盛, Lin Mousheng, 1909–44)
War hero, community leader, businessman, Singapore

Lim Bo Seng, who was born on 27 April 1909, in Nan An, China, was the eleventh child of Lim Chee Gee and the first son of the family. When he was sixteen, he came to Singapore to study at Raffles Institution. He later left his education at the University of Hong Kong unfinished in 1929 when his father passed away and he inherited the family businesses, which included the Hock Ann Biscuits and brick manufacturing factories. In 1930, he married Gan Choo Neo, a Peranakan woman with whom he had seven children.

His marital bliss and success in business endeavours were not to last for the 1937 Sino-Japanese War and eventually, the Second World War broke out. As he felt strongly about foreign incursions into other territories, Lim participated in fund-raising efforts against the Japanese invasion and boycotted Japanese goods with the Nanyang Chinese National Salvation Movement at the time of the second Sino-Japanese War. This was not surprising given that he was the leader of the Kuomintang branch in Singapore. Indeed, in the 1930s, Lim used the alias, Tan Choon Lim, to conduct anti-Japanese activities in support of the China Relief Fund. He was particularly successful in that regard so much so that the governor of the time, Sir Shenton Thomas, requested him to form the Chinese Liaison Committee to assist in civil defence activities for Singapore. By the time that the war had spread to Southeast Asia, Lim was already the head of the Labour Services of the Overseas Chinese Mobilization Council, where he was joined by Tan Kah Kee in recruiting and organizing over 10,000 men for the British Colonial Government to construct defences around Singapore, as well as to man essential services. However, when the blowing up of the causeway between Singapore and Malaya failed to impede the invading Japanese forces, Lim, already committed to the cause of freedom against oppression, left his family and fled from Singapore to Sumatra in Indonesia with other Chinese community leaders. From Indonesia, he went to India to recruit and train other secret agents for military and intelligence missions in India and China. Whilst in India, he met Captain John Davis sometime in 1942 and formed Force 136, a Sino-British guerilla group. Using Force 136 as a springboard, Lim and his close friend, Tan Chong Tee, actively conducted anti-Japanese activities until their capture.

By 1943, he was recruiting Kuomintang colleagues in China for Force 136. Once their numbers were sizeable enough, he and his fellow Force 136 members landed in Japanese-occupied Malaya by submarine in 1943 and established an intelligence network in the urban areas in Pangkor, Lumut, Tapah, and Ipoh. This intelligence network eventually became known as Operation Zipper and was targeted at recapturing Malaya with British support by 1945. The network was also simultaneously carrying out Operation Gustavus, which sought to set up an espionage network to gather military intelligence about the Japanese, thereby facilitating British plans to invade and recapture Malaya and Singapore. Lim arrived in Malaya in November 1943 and reassumed his old alias of Tan Choon Lim, the businessman, to avoid identification by the Japanese. Amongst his liaisons in Ipoh, from where he operated, was a Chinese provision shop owner, Jian Yik Jan, who allowed the agents to smuggle messages through his shop by using empty tubes of toothpaste, salted fish, and other provisions.

However, owing to spies within the midst of Force 136, such as Lai Teck, the Malayan Communist Party leader, and Chua Koon Eng, a fisherman, Lim and his compatriots' efforts were crushed. In January 1944, the situation gradually unravelled for Force 136 when the Japanese captured a communist guerilla who revealed the details of the Allied spy network on Pangkor. This eventually led the Japanese to Ipoh where Liza was operating. When Tan Chong Tee got wind of this information, he advised Lim to leave Ipoh. Lim, however, refused to do so until he heard from, another agent who had gone to Singapore to look for funds. Chua revealed everything he knew of Force 136 to the secret police without even being interrogated, and this led to the capture of Li Han Kwang. Although Li cracked under torture, he managed to escape and tried to warn the others. He did not succeed. Within a few hours of Li's escape, the Japanese had raided the network's headquarters, capturing Tan Chong Tee and destroying Force 136, thus wrecking British plans for an early invasion and recapturing of Malaya.

On learning of Tan's capture by the Japanese on 26 March 1944, Lim had initially planed to escape. However, he was convinced to do so the next day. This unfortunately led to his capture by the Japanese as they worked overnight to block all the roads leading out of Gopeng in Ipoh. Lim was eventually caught, interrogated, and tortured, but he displayed great fortitude when he protested against the ill-treatment of his comrades in prison instead of complaining of his pain. The poor conditions in which the Japanese held him, and the constant torture soon took a toll on his health and he became ill with dysentery. Deprived of food, water, and medicine, Lim eventually succumbed to the ailment and died on 29 June 1944 at Batu Gajah Prison in Perak. His death, it seemed, softened the attitude of the Japanese towards prisoners, and for a time, the prisoners were given better food, simple medical treatment, and daily exercises in the prison compound.

When the Japanese surrendered, Lim's widow was alerted to his fate and she brought his remains back to Singapore where he was buried at MacRitchie Reservoir with full military honours. A funeral ceremony was also conducted on 13 January 1946 before the City Hall to mourn his passing. To further honour his memory, the Chinese Nationalist Government posthumously awarded him the rank of major-general and a white pagoda was erected at the Esplanade in his memory.

Lim Bon Liong, Henry

(林育庆, Lin Yuqing, 1951–)

Businessman, Philippines

Henry Lim Bon Liong envisions a better life for Philippine farmers by providing a sustainable, long-term livelihood for them. From a successful business of manufacturing paper products to dreams of alleviating the country's food supply problem through sufficiency in rice production — this is the unusual less trodden path that Henry Lim Bon Liong has taken.

Lim is currently chairman and chief executive officer of the family-owned conglomerate, the Sterling Paper Group of Companies. What started out as a modest producer of photo albums and stationery has expanded to various successful businesses, such as school and office supplies, toys, call centres, real estate, and agricultural ventures, under the able leadership of Lim and his brothers.

In 1997 Lim was already at the top of his game in the world of paper manufacturing and developing industrial estates so planting rice was not part of his agenda. He was a mechanical engineering graduate and, as the eldest son of an enterprising bookstore owner, was trained to take over the family business after the unfortunate death of his father. But an unfamiliar direction was charted out for Lim during his fortuitous encounters with certain individuals.

First, Lim remembered the words of then vice-president, Joseph Estrada, saying that if ever he became president of the Philippines, he would make agriculture his main priority. Second was a serendipitous meeting with Zhu Rongji, the premier of China then.

Lim has been an active member of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry, Incorporated, and in 1997 the Federation had the opportunity to host a lunch for the premier. Lim noted that Zhu, a charismatic leader, was admired by western economists. During the Asian crisis that crippled many parts of the region, China was not affected. Zhu reiterated that even if China was not able to produce a single grain of rice for a year, its people will not grow hungry. This was a far cry from the China of the 1950s to the early 1980s, when ten million people died every year of hunger, even when the government pushed widespread efforts to encourage the people to plant rice, and provided more land for this.

It was only when a high-yielding hybrid rice was found through the pioneering work of Professor Yuan Long Ping, now known as the "father of hybrid rice technology", that China's food supply problem was solved. Lim met Yuan through a mutual acquaintance, and for some reason, the professor immediately expressed his willingness to help Lim in the Philippines, which the latter graciously accepted.

The vast improvements in food sufficiency in China, coupled with a genuine concern for the inadequate local supply of the staple, became the seeds that bore and propagated the vision in Lim's heart to be "the world leader in hybrid rice farming technology" and to "become the industry's model in sound farming management practices for the benefits of the government, its people and the protection of our environment". SL Agritech was born.

The birth and life of SL Agritech is a tribute to Lim's parents, Lim Seh Leng and Maria Co Chiao Ti-Lim, both originally from Quanzhou, China. Lim Seh Leng migrated to the Philippines in 1937 when he was eleven years old and his studies were interrupted when the Second World War broke out. He married Maria in 1950. Initially this young family lived in a one-bedroom apartment in the local Chinatown called Binondo.

Lim learned the virtues of tolerance and diligence through his mother. He was bullied by the kids in the neighbourhood because he was skinny and had light-coloured skin. His mother taught him not to pay attention to the taunts and to pour all his energy onto his studies as this would be his ticket to success in the future. She also advised him not to become a bully when he grew successful.

The importance of sharing was also practised in the Lim household since Lim Seh Leng was still a struggling entrepreneur and they had little resources. During mealtimes they would normally share a piece of fish and fermented bean curd along with rice. This modest fare would be divided equally among the siblings. Lim's mother would always remind him and his two brothers to share everything fairly among themselves.

Lim took to heart everything he learned and excelled in his studies. From his father Lim inherited the legacy of good entrepreneurship and a pioneering spirit. Lim Seh Leng ventured into business in 1946. Along with friends he opened Central Bookstore which catered to the Chinese community, selling books, newspapers and records. Because of Lim Seh Leng's passion for photography, he also decided to make photo albums which eventually gave way to a new enterprise called Sterling Bookbinding in the 1950s, a first in its field. In 1961 the company was called Sterling Paper and Products, along with CBS as its importation unit.

In 1976, while on a business trip in Hong Kong, Lim Seh Leng met with an untimely death. As Henry Lim was the eldest son it was customary for him to take over his father's position in the business. He was twenty-four when this tragedy occurred. With the support of his mother and siblings, Joseph, Willy, and Gerry, the business, which was renamed Sterling Paper Products Enterprise Incorporated (now the Sterling Group of Companies), flourished and expanded. To honour his father's memory, Lim named his latest venture after Seh Leng — SL Agritech, established in September 2000.

The fateful meeting with Professor Yuan Long Ping started the ball rolling for Lim's quest to find a solution for the rice shortage in the Philippines. Lim visited the International Rice Research Institute (IRRI) in Laguna and found that although there were about almost 200,000 varieties of rice stored in IRRI, there was no hybrid rice that could be planted in the Philippines because of the hot climate. Along with Yuan, he then tested about seventy-five varieties of hybrid rice grains from China, but not one succeeded to form grains in the hot local temperature.

Undaunted, Lim took a big risk to develop his own variety of hybrid rice that can adapt to the Philippine tropical climate. He bought forty hectares of farmland in Laguna which would serve as an experimental area, and had Professor Yuan and his three scientists from China to help him.

Yuan's perseverance proved fruitful when he found a wild, male sterile rice flower that can be cross-pollinated (rice flowers are usually self-pollinating so the problem was to find a way to replicate this variety in the tropical region.)

In the year that SL Agritech Corporation was born, tragedy struck the family when a forty-foot container truck hit the vehicle that carried Lim, his mother, and younger brother, Willy. Lim was badly injured, but his mother and brother were killed. It seems that every dreadful event in Lim's life proved to be major instruments for building his resilience. Through this tragedy Lim found a deeper friendship with Yuan as the professor assured him that he would always back him up and also encouraged him to be strong.

On 17 January 2001 a major breakthrough occurred. That morning, Professor Zhang, a lead scientist working with Professor Yuan, followed an inspiration from the dream he had of Lim's mother directing him to the forty-hectare field. He went to the field to inspect the rice flowers and found the good rice hybrid plant he was searching for. This was the discovery of the variety called SL-8H rice, named after Lim's father, Seh Leng, and found in plot number 8.

The same year, the Hybrid Commercialization Program was launched and an agreement with Philippine Rice and Research Institute was signed. Seeds were produced and given to farmers for the next three seasons and Lim remembers that the yields were tremendous as the farmers were able to produce fourteen tons of grains per hectare, compared with the three tons they used to make in the same land area. For the poor farmers of Nueva Ecija, Henry Lim earned the title Nag-iisang Bayani ng mga Magsasaka (the only hero of the farmers).

Lim envisions a better life for Philippine farmers by providing a sustainable, long-term livelihood for them. He noted that in China, farmers are ranked next only to government officials, and are well off, whereas in the Philippines, farmers are among the poorest of the poor. Farmers who have used this variety of high-yielding, high-quality grains have increased their harvest considerably and express their gratitude to Lim whenever he visits the provinces.

As Lim reiterated, "I would like to help farmers improve their standard of living and make our country self-sufficient in food, especially rice. When that happens, I will consider it the greatest accomplishment in my life."

Lim Boon Keng

(林文庆, Lin Wenqing, 1869-1951)

Doctor, unofficial member of the Legislative Council, business leader, social reformist, scientist, philosopher, Confucianism advocate, educationalist, Singapore

Lim Boon Keng was an influential figure in Singapore and Malaya during the turn of the twentieth century. He rose up to the challenges of the era playing diverse roles. Lim passionately served the colonial government and people in Singapore, often performing as the middleman between them. He was also instrumental to local economic infrastructural as well as medical developments. Concerned over political transformations in China, Lim led the Chinese in Singapore and Malaya to support political events in China. He cared for the ethnic Chinese, from the Straits Chinese to Chinese immigrants, promoting reforms, Chinese cultural renaissance, female education, and modern education in Singapore, Malaya, and Indonesia. He eventually ventured out of Southeast Asia to China where he served as the president of Xiamen University for sixteen years, nurturing talents among the Chinese in China and Southeast Asia.

Lim Boon Keng, courtesy name, Meng Qin (梦琴), was born in Singapore on 18 October 1896. A second generation Straits-born Chinese (commonly known as Baba), Lim could trace his ancestry to Haiteng County, Fujian Province, China. His grandfather, Lim Mah Peng, came to Penang, Malaya, to earn a living in 1839 and after his only son, Lim Thean Geow, was born, the family moved to Singapore. Lim's grandmother and mother were Nonyas from Penang and Malacca. As his parents passed away when he was very young, Lim was brought up by his grandfather. Lim's grandfather was a learned man. He named his grandson "Boon Keng", in the hope for auspicious tidings for the boy as well as out of the desire for his pursuing knowledge on the great tenets of Chinese culture. Due to practical concerns over livelihood, however, grandfather Lim decided to enrol Lim Boon Keng in English-medium schools. After Lim graduated from Raffles Institution in 1887, he was awarded the Queen's Scholarship and went to Edinburgh University to study medicine. In 1892, he attained his M.B. and C.M. degrees.

Lim had two marriages. In 1896, he married Margaret Wong or Huang Duan Qiong, the daughter of Chinese Fuzhou scholar, Wong Nai Siong. Wong was a Christian, her knowledge of the Chinese language and her travel experiences in the west were highly complementary to Lim's study of the Chinese language and his social reform career. She passed away in 1905, leaving behind four sons. In 1908, Lim remarried in Xiamen, the sister of his good friend, Dr S.C. Yin. Grace Yin was born in Xiamen. She was bilingual in English and Mandarin, and was also a Christian. This marriage brought Lim a pair of daughter and son.

The period between 1893 and 1921 — after Lim returned from his studies and before he assumed the role of president of Xiamen University in China — was the most colourful time of his life. His contributions to the medical, business, political, social, cultural, and educational fields in Singapore and Malaya were primarily made during this period.

Lim was a pioneer who paved new paths in the medical and business spheres in Singapore and Malaya. After returning from Britain, he established a private practice in Telok Ayer Street and later, with his friends, opened Kiu Su Tong Dispensary, a western clinic at Raffles Place. In 1896, he and a friend assisted the municipal government in conducting the important first city-wide health survey. He was involved in petitioning the governor for the establishment of the King Edward Medical College, eventually becoming one of its founders. Lim was also very active in the business field. He was the director of many companies, including those related to rubber, tin, manufacturing, bank, insurance, etc. His most prominent contribution was the growing of rubber, which successfully brought a new profitable economic resource for Malaya. Thus Tan Kah Kee fondly referred to him as the "Father of Rubber". Apart from the above achievements, Lim had also contributed to the establishment of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Singapore and the Overseas Chinese Banking Corporation.

Lim initiated social, cultural, and educational reforms among the Chinese community in Singapore and Malaya. Possessing a strong ethnic consciousness and communal concern, he was worried about the Straits Chinese's situation and future. Thus, he decided to reform the society and revive Chinese ethnic culture. Some of the activities led by Lim included the launching of the Straits Chinese Magazine, the publishing of Jit Shin Po, the establishing of the Singapore Chinese Girls' School, the initiating of the Confucian renaissance movement, the Mandarin campaign, an anti-opium campaign and the queue-cutting campaign, etc. These activities later developed into 1) cross-communal activities that also made an impact on the Chinese immigrant community; 2) cross-regional activities that influenced Malaya and Indonesia. Lim had foresight and led by example, thus making himself a key pioneering personage in the history of the Chinese in Singapore and Malaya, and also the first community leader to lead a social, cultural, and educational movement. The Mandarin campaign and Confucianism revival movement were taken up a century later by then Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, who by similar efforts, created yet another cultural renaissance.

Indebted to British grooming, and having witnessed the political and cultural vibrancy of Victorian Britain, Lim willingly repaid the colonial master by participating in various British organizations, including the Straits Chinese British Association founded in 1900, and the Chinese Volunteer Company formed in 1901. He had actively led the local Chinese in service of Britain and the colonial government valued him highly. He was appointed an unofficial member in the Legislative Council four times; he was made a committee member of the Raffles Museum Board, Municipal Commission, and the Chinese Advisory Board. In 1897, Lim was accorded the title, Justice of Peace, and in 1918, he was awarded the O.B.E. This was how Lim's name came to appear repetitively in the historical annals of the colonial times in Singapore and Malaya.

Lim also simultaneously heeded China's call; he left his mark on Chinese political and educational history from 1900 to 1937. On the political front, he responded to China's reform movement, received Kang Youwei in Singapore, and took part in the activities of the Emperor Protection Society. He also maintained good relations with the Qing government, representing the Straits Chinese to welcome Prince Chun when he visited Singapore, and visiting Beijing at the invitation of Prince Su. Lim later inclined towards Sun Yat-sen, led the Singapore branch of the Tong Meng Hui, and involved his father-in-law in Sun's activities. On the education front, Lim served as president of Xiamen University at the invitation of Tan Kah Kee in 1921. He took the university through sixteen turbulent years as a private institution, establishing a firm foundation for it in various areas. Thus, Lim certainly carved himself a very deserving place in the overseas Chinese chapter of China's history. As the twenty-first century was being ushered in, Xiamen University erected in stages a pavilion, a monument, and then a statue commemorating Lim.

The greatest special trait in Lim's cultural thought was his turning to Chinese culture from western culture and fusing the two. He accepted western science and was influenced by western humanities, but he also was eager to share these new knowledge and ideas with his ethnic group. However, as someone steeped in western culture returning to his mother culture, he had hoped that those of Chinese descent, who were unfamiliar with the culture of their ancestors and did not appreciate Chinese culture, would have a chance to take a peek at China's five thousand years of civilization. Therefore, he assumed another task, acting as the middleman between Chinese and western cultures, focusing particularly on the transmittance of Chinese culture. This can be discerned from his many writings in the Straits Chinese Magazine, which introduced Chinese history and culture; in The Chinese Crisis from Within, published as a book after its first appearance in the Singapore Free Press in 1900, and in The Great War from the Confucian Point of View, written during the First World War, as well as the translation of Li Sao at the Xiamen University.

In 1937, Lim returned to Singapore from Xiamen University. Five years later, Japan invaded Singapore and Malaya. During the three and a half years of the Japanese Occupation, Lim was forced to assume the leadership of the Overseas Chinese Association, ending his last major role in Singapore and Malaya on a tragic note. In spite of this, many people were able to understand his difficult predicament that came attached with his role; some were even grateful to him for going through hell to save others. For eleven years after the war, he lived as a recluse. On 1 January 1957, he passed away, ending his colourful life on a bittersweet note.

Lim Cheng Choo

(林清注, Lin Qingzhu, 1906–93)
Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Pehin Dato Temenggong Dato Seri Paduka Awang Lim Cheng Choo was a successful businessman who took over his father-in-law Ong Boon Pang's (王文邦) business, and eventually became a leader amongst Chinese businessmen. He also contributed extensively to the education sector, and was a political representative for the Chinese community in Brunei.

Lim was born in 1906 in Xizhai village (西宅村), Xiao Jinmen (小金门) in Fujian, China. He lost his mother to illness when he was only three months old. His aunt, Madam Ang (洪氏), took care of him, and he went to school in his hometown. His father, Lim Wen Ji (林文髻), was already in the trading business and commuting between Brunei and his hometown then. When he was ten years old, his father decided to bring him to live in Brunei. While still in school, he was also helping out at Ong Boon Pang's shop, Teck Guan Company (德源商行), with a salary of $3 a month.

Lim worked officially at Ong's shop when he was sixteen, and Ong spoke very highly of him because of his willingness to learn and hard-working attitude. When Lim turned twenty-six in 1932, he married Ong's eldest daughter, Ong Ming Xuan (王明璇). Dato Lim gained the trust of Ong Boon Pang and was promoted to the role of manager not long afterwards.

When Ong passed away in 1940, Lim was appointed the trustee, and his responsibility was to take care of Ong's younger children, in addition to managing the Teck Guan business. Under Lim's arrangement, Ong's second son, Ong Kim Kee (王金纪), left for Singapore to pursue his secondary education. Lim also assisted Ong Boon Pang's second daughter to study in China.

During the Japanese Occupation, Lim was imprisoned for a week because a Japanese businessman was jealous of his earlier success and framed him for certain wrongdoings. He was later released after a friend helped to clear his name.

After the war, the Chinese population in Brunei grew bigger. To maximize welfare for the Chinese community, and help them with their problems or disputes in business affairs, the idea of setting up a Chinese body emerged. As a result, The Chinese Association (中华公会) was officially registered in 1946. It was actually the predecessor of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce (中华商会). After much discussion and consultation, the committee agreed to the name change, and the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Bandar Seri Begawan was officially established in 1947 and Lim was appointed the first president of the association.

Besides the business sector, he contributed to the education scene as well. In 1941, he took over the chairmanship of the Chung Hwa Middle School's board of directors from Ong Boon Pang, who passed away in 1940, and held this position until 1943, a period coinciding with the hardest years during the war. When Chung Hwa Middle School wanted to build a new two-storey classroom block in 1961, Lim did not hesitate to head the fund raising effort by becoming president of the building construction committee. Under the leadership of Dato Lim, the new block was successfully completed a year later. From the time he assumed chairmanship, Lim was actively involved with the board until he passed away in 1993. He was its longest serving member, giving fifty-two years of his time to it in total.

Due to his charity work and outstanding contribution to the education field, Lim was conferred the title "Pehin Dato Temenggong Dato Seri Paduka" by the late Sultan of Brunei in 1952 when he was forty-six. He was again awarded the S.N.B. medal by the Sultan of Brunei, Al-Marhum Sultan Haji Omar Ali Saifuddien, in July 1969, which signified his importance to the Brunei Government. At the same time, he was also appointed a member of the Privy Council of Brunei and a consultant.

1959 was an important milestone in the history of the political development of Brunei. After reaching an agreement with England regarding the constitution for internal self-rule, Brunei announced the constitution on 29 September the same year. The signing ceremony was held in Brunei, and Lim was the only Chinese among the sixteen representatives headed by the late Sultan to sign the constitution. In addition, he was also one of the representatives to sign the "An Agreement Amending the 1959 Agreement" in 1971 with the British Government. In January 1979, Lim was once again selected as one of the representatives to sign the "Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation", which gave Brunei full independence five years later, in 1984.

Lim was the Chinese marriage registrar, and witness for handling passports, travelling, and government documents. He also founded the Guang Guan Company (光源商行), which is run by his eldest son, Lim Ben Li (林本立). In addition, he was also a keen photographer and owned numerous branded cameras and taken lots of photographs over the years. His collection of photographs was second only to professional photographers.

Lim's wife, Ong Ming Xuan, passed away in 1962. His two sons and six daughters are all married. Before his death, Lim insisted on working three to four hours every day without fail, to serve not only the Chinese community, but also his fellow countrymen.

Lim Chin Siong

(林清祥, Lin Qingxiang, 1933–96)
Trade unionist, politician, Singapore

Alternatively remembered in history books as the man who almost became Singapore's first prime minister as well as a fiery, charismatic, and passionate orator, Lim Chin Siong was something of an enigma during his lifetime and remains so after his death. While we know enough of Lim's life, his political motivations remain somewhat shrouded in mystery. It is known, however, that he was fiercely dedicated to shaping Singapore's political development in the post-World War II years, eschewing personal glory and financial gain, thus setting the stage for the modern PAP's guise of incorruptibility and integrity.

Although he was born in Singapore on 28 February 1933, Lim's primary education was mainly in Johore, Malaya. It was not until 1949 and 1950 respectively that he was admitted to the Singapore-based Catholic High School and Chinese High School. Owing to his participation in subversive activities in the Anti-British League, he was expelled from school. This early brush with "subversive forces" is indicative of Lim's political career. On the one hand, it demonstrated to the ruling powers (whether they be the British colonialists or the People's Action Party post-independence government) that he would do everything he could to subvert their regimes. On the other hand, it demonstrated that he was passionately dedicated to egalitarianism, equality, and democracy.

It is well established that Lim's influence in politics sprang from his role as a paid organizer of the Singapore Bus Workers Union and the Singapore Factory and Shop Workers Union. So successful was he that Lee Kuan Yew recruited him into the People's Action Party (PAP) precisely because of his skills as a Chinese orator. Indeed, his oratory skills and his handsome charm were critical factors that the PAP needed for tapping the support of the Chinese-speaking masses. On joining the PAP in 1954, his popularity soared as he became the leader of Chinese workers, trade unions, and Chinese middle school students in 1950s' Singapore. His popularity with the Chinese-speaking population and his ability to sway listeners with his oratory meant that as early as 1955, the PAP recognized him as a figure to be reckoned with in Singapore politics and within the PAP. Lim continued to dazzle the Chinese-speaking population with his speeches so much so that at the age of twenty-two, he was elected into the legislative assembly as a member for Bukit Timah in 1955. In 1956, he and Lee Kuan Yew represented the PAP in the 1956 constitutional talks in London.

However, it soon became apparent that Lim's strength in garnering the Chinese-speaking population's support for the PAP was a double-edged sword. He instigated the 1955 labour strike by bus workers, which culminated in the violent Hock Lee Bus riots. In 1956, he further added to his reputation as a "subversive force" when he led the Chinese Middle School riots. The chief minister at the time, Lim Yew Hock, cracked down harshly on the riots. As a consequence, Lim Chin Siong and several others deemed pro-communists were arrested. Despite the fact that he was released in 1959 in the aftermath of the PAP electoral victory, his reputation as a "subversive force" and a so-called "communist" led his PAP colleagues to look askance at him. This was unsurprising given the differing views of the main PAP English-educated leaders who subscribed to the notion of the enlightened leadership of the elite and conservative progressivism. Thus the joint events of the PAP's move to rid itself of its perceived left-wing allies and ideological disputes over the issue of the Singapore merger with Malaya — which Lim felt was unfairly represented by the PAP as a "yes with one of three options" vote instead of a clear-cut yes or no referendum — made Lim leave with several members of the PAP to form the Barisan Sosialis Party on 13 August 1961.

Furthermore, the fact that the Chinese-educated elite was regarded as pro-communist did not enhance Lim's reputation. Due to his association with the Chinese trade unions, labour unions, and schools, as well as his past brush with subversive activities in the Anti-British League, Lim was regarded as communist by both the PAP and the British. This was despite the fact that Lim was never linked with any communist organization. Even Chin Peng, head of the Malayan Communist Party stated that Lim was not a part of the party. However, in the eyes of the PAP government as well as the British colonialists, he was one because he had acted "subversively" against their regimes by instigating protests to their policies. Yet, when Lim was in government he so scrupulously adhered to constitutional, legal, and democratic methods of government that it put him at a huge disadvantage. Lim himself claimed he was labelled a communist by the PAP government because it enabled the government to detain him without trial.

It was certain that the break from the PAP marked Lim's downfall in Singapore politics. After the referendum in which there was one reasonable choice (the other two would have reduced Singaporeans to second-class citizens in Malaysia), Singapore merged with Malaysia, and Lim Chin Siong and many opposition party members were detained under the Internal Security Act by the ruling PAP government in "Operation Coldstore" on 2 February 1963. Despite this setback, the Barisan Sosialis contested the 1963 general elections, putting up a good fight, but to no avail. The Barisan Sosialis defeat in the 1963 elections and its boycott of the 1968 elections led to the decline of the party.

Throughout the years of his detention (which under the Internal Security Act meant that the government could detain potentially "subversive" elements to its regime indefinitely without trial), Lim was depressed and tried to take his own life when he was briefly admitted into hospital. He was only released from detention on 28 July 1969 after he agreed to renounce politics. He followed this up by going into exile in London. Despite this exile, he never lost his vision of an egalitarian and democratic Singapore. This was in sharp contrast to the PAP's paternalistic measures of conservative progressivism.

Eventually, in 1979, after ten years in exile, he was allowed to return to Singapore to meet with his family. He shuttled between Singapore and Malaysia until his death of a heart attack on 5 February 1996. Although he had changed from a charismatic national leader to a forlorn political non-entity following his years in detention, Lim's political legacy remains. His dedication and selfless dedication to making Singapore a place truly embodying egalitarian values continues to be the rallying cry of many Singaporean opposition parties. Even the PAP has stated that its current incorruptibility and integrity stem from the example of Lim Chin Siong's dedication to his cause. In fact, it could be deemed a neat irony that the PAP government has modelled itself and its dedication to its brand of conservative progressivism after Lim's dedication to his cause for an egalitarian Singapore, as a means for its continued political legitimacy in Singapore.

Lim Chin Tsong

(林振宗, Lin Zhenzong, 1867–1923)
Tycoon, Myanmar

Lim Chin Tsong was the first overseas Chinese tycoon in Myanmar. He was a gifted businessman who traded in many commodities and was the wealthiest Chinese of his time. He was also the mastermind behind the construction of the magnificent Xie De Garden (协德园), the current Kanbawza Thardi Palace. His enthusiasm in public welfare gave impetus to the education and welfare of Rangoon.

Lim was the son of a Chinese Hokkien migrant, Lim Soo Hean, or Lim Si Xing, from the Tong An county in Fujian province, China. Lim Soo Hean came to Burma in 1861 and started a rice trading firm, Chop Lim Soo Hean. From Rangoon, he distributed rice to Upper Burma, a term used by the British to refer to the central and northern areas of what is now Myanmar. From Upper Burma, he imported agricultural products such as beans and peanuts.

Subsequently, Lim Soo Hean started to export rice to Europe by partnering English and Indian businessmen. In the course of dealing with Europeans, he realized that his poor educational background and his lack of skills in English were a handicap to his business development. He therefore sent his son, Chin Tsong, to St Paul's College once he turned sixteen, with the hope that the youth would one day be competent enough to manage his properties which were proliferating by then. Unfortunately Lim Soo Hean passed away in 1885, and thus Lim Chin Tsong, at the age of eighteen, was bequeathed a well established business he had to manage immediately.

Forced by circumstances, Lim applied what he had learned from his father at a very tender age to the real world of business. He proved to be a clever strategist: he used the Xie De brand as a trademark not only for rice, but also for his other business products such as reprocessed peanut oil, cotton, as well as gold, copper, and tin mining operations, successfully established a corporate identity which was well accepted by the Europeans. With only three ocean-going sea vessels, Lim also began to expand his shipping business from Myanmar to Singapore, Penang, Hong Kong, Guangdong, and Amoy (Xiamen). Together with his rice trading firm, Seang Taik & Company, his enterprise was operating on an international scale. Besides rice, the next essential commodity for his country which he managed to deal in was oil. He attained real fortune when he was appointed the exclusive oil product agent for Burma Oil Corporation (BOC), a large company based in the United Kingdom. Oil offered a profit margin many times that from other food commodities and accelerated his wealth accumulation, earning him the title of "the first tycoon of the overseas Chinese community in Burma".

Eager to flaunt his success, Lim began the construction of Xie De Garden on the eastern shore of Inya Lake located in Kokine Ward of Rangoon. The garden, known as Kanbawza Thardi Palace today, was built of red bricks and green tiles. The main tower was a five-storey building that resembled the Fu Xiang pavilion (佛香阁) in the Yi He Yuan (Summer Palace) of Beijing. It is a luxurious house combining Chinese and Western elements. Most of the materials and craftwork were imported from China, but a fraction were creations of Italian designers. One could say that Lim's residence is a showcase of fine, world-class contemporary craftsmanship. According to estimates, Xie De Garden would cost 400,000 dun (currency unit) to construct, but the actual cost reached two million dun. In those days, an aeroplane was valued at about 25,000 dun, thus Xie De Garden was equivalent to nearly 100 aeroplanes!

It was evident that Lim was not proficient in accounting. He had used much of the revenue that was owed to BOC for his operations and personal expenditures. His flamboyant ways caused BOC to withdraw the exclusive agent rights, which incited him to seek ways to defeat BOC. He raised funds from overseas Chinese all over the country. With the funds, he tried to set up a new oil trading firm. Due to the discriminatory policies of the British colonial government and strong pressures from English businessmen, Lim was made bankrupt when he failed to clear the debts owing to BOC. Selling Xie De Garden became the solution.

On 2 November 1923, three years after the inauguration of Xie De Garden, Lim passed away, a sad and defeated man. His grand construction was pledged to a Japanese creditor, Nanwa Bank, but the Myanmese Government later purchased it from an Indian businessman who had acquired it from the bank, and used it as a state guest house.

In the education and social fields, Lim achieved better results. He exemplified a philanthropist who had made a mark in caring for the sick and poor. His humble beginnings had made him realize the importance of charity. He had reportedly made a large donation to the establishment of a hospital for women in Rangoon.

In 1905, Lim, with several others, founded Zhong Hua Yi Xiao (中华义校), a Chinese school in Rangoon that conducted English language lessons. Soon, however, the English lessons were discontinued due to the shortage of English teachers, funds, and support from the local business community. In 1907, Lim decided to set up a school on his own, which he named Lim Chin Tsong School.

To upgrade its teaching quality, the school was administered by a panel of selected local talents. It also employed teachers from England, and the salaries paid to these expatriates were high. The school was situated in Latha Street in downtown Yangon city, near St Mary Women's School, and was later relocated to Lanmadaw Street. However, in 1928, five years after Lim had passed away, the school had to shut its doors due to a shortage of funds. Over a span of eleven years, the school had produced many English-trained graduates, some of whom were overseas Chinese from Hong Kong and Macau pursuing their education in Rangoon.

Lim Chong Eu

(林苍祐, Lin Cangyou, 1919–2010)
Former chief minister of Penang, political leader, Malaysia

Dr Lim Chong Eu had been actively involved in Malaysian politics since 1957. He had the rare distinction of having served as president for the two largest Chinese-based political parties in the country. He was briefly president of Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) from March 1958 to July 1959, and president of Parti Gerakan Rakyat Malaysia (PGRM) from 1971 to 1980. However, he is better known for serving as chief minister of Penang for twenty-two years, from 1969 to 1990. He was the father of Penang development. To resolve the high unemployment problem plaguing the state in the late 1960s, he launched a bold and innovative model of industrialization, based on foreign direct investment in the then emerging electronics industry. By 1985, Penang state had been developed into a highly successful electronics assembly base in the Far East. The island became a major world producer of semi-conductors and micro-processors. Under Dr Lim's leadership, the Penang economy underwent a significant transformation. The share of the manufacturing sector rose from 12.7 per cent of Penang's GDP in 1970, to 46.0 per cent by the time Dr Lim stepped down as chief minister in 1990. On the other hand, the agricultural sector's share of the GDP declined from 19.5 per cent to 1.93 per cent within the same period.

Dr Lim Chong Eu laid the groundwork for a solid infrastructure on Penang island. Besides the free trade zones and industrial estates, he constructed the sixty-five storey KOMTAR, Penang's most visible landmark towering over the heart of Georgetown, and the 13.5-km-long Penang Bridge, which links the island and the mainland, fostering closer economic and social integration of the two distinct parts of the state.

Lim was born on 28 May 1919 in Penang, the son of Dr Lim Chwee Leong, a medical practitioner who operated Soo Beng Dispensary in Penang. As a boy, Lim Chong Eu attended Penang Free School and later won a Queen's Scholarship to study medicine, graduating with an MBCh in 1944 from Edinburgh University. He began his career as a medical officer in the Chinese armed forces, and returned to then Malaya in 1950 to join as a medical officer in the Malayan Air Force.

He played an active part in politics, becoming a councilor in the Penang Straits Settlements Council in 1951 and he was a founding member of several new political parties: Penang Radical Party (founded in 1951), United Democratic Party (UDP) (founded in 1961), and Parti Gerakan Rakyat Malaysia (founded in 1968). In 1954 he joined the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) and was elected councilor under the MCA ticket. In 1955 Lim became, the chief whip of the Alliance Party, a coalition of UMNO, MCA, and MIC (Malaysian Indian Congress), in the Federal Legislative Assembly. He defeated the incumbent, Tan Cheng Lock, and became president of MCA in 1958, but resigned the next year due to differences with UMNO.

Dr Lim always adopted a multiracial and Malaysian outlook in his politics. The founding presidents of both the UDP and Parti Gerakan, which he helped to establish, were Malays. The first president of UDP was his former school teacher, Datuk Zainal Abidin. In 1968, he brought his UDP supporters to launch the Parti Gerakan jointly, which brought together many Socialist Front leaders, Labour Party leaders, academicians, and trade unionists, who espoused a Malaysian, non-ethnic approach to political struggle. The founding chairman of Parti Gerakan was Professor Syed Hussein Alatas.

In May 1969, Dr Lim Chong Eu spearheaded Parti Gerakan's Penang campaign in the country's third general elections, and succeeded in wrestling the Penang state from the MCA. Lim is regarded as the chief architect of Penang's development. To lead the largely agricultural Penang out of the economic stagnation of the 1960s, he constructed free trade zones and industrial estates which were equipped with basic infrastructure and amenities, and actively courted well known electronics multinational corporations to set up labour-intensive assembly plants there. Within a decade, the manufacturing sector replaced agriculture as the main contributor to, and the growth engine of, the state economy. It accounted for over one third of the state's GDP in 1985.

Besides industrial development, Lim embarked on large-scale urban renewal in the city centre of Penang. The KOMTAR project saw a 65-storey tower erected that housed state government offices and rejuvenated the area as the commercial hub of Georgetown. After lengthy negotiations with the federal government, he managed to secure permission to construct the Penang Bridge. The 13.5-km bridge, completed in 1985, was at the time the longest bridge in Asia. It brought the island closer to the mainland (Malayan peninsula), and fostered closer economic, social, and cultural integration between residents of the two parts of the state. After serving the Penang Legislative Assembly as assemblyman for six terms and chief minister for twenty-two years, Lim was defeated by DAP's Lim Kit Siang in October 1990 by 706 votes in his Kota state constituency. He then retired from politics and concentrated on business, becoming chairman, director, and adviser of several large corporations.

Dr Lim received numerous honours and awards. He was known as "Tun", after being conferred the award Seri Setia Mahkota Malaysia (SSM), by the king of Malaysia. Other honours and awards were: Darjah Utama Pangkuan Negeri (DUPN) (Penang), which carries the title of "Dato Seri Utama"; Datuk Amar Bintang Kenyalang (DA) (Sarawak); Grand Cross 2nd Class Award (Germany); Order of the Rising Sun, Gold and Silver Star (Japan).

In terms of academic and professional distinctions, he was conferred an honorary doctorate of laws by Universiti Sains Malaysia, doctorate in Honoris Causa by Edinburgh University, the United Kingdom; and made a distinguished honorary member of the Academy of Medicine of Malaysia. He was pro chancellor of Universiti Sains Malaysia, and foundation chancellor of Wawasan Open University (Penang).

On 24 November 2010 Dr Lim died in Penang, leaving behind his wife, two sons, and two daughters.

Lim Chong Keat

(林苍吉, Lin Cangji, 1930–)
Architect, botanic scholar, conservationist, Singapore

Datuk Seri Lim Chong Kiat is regarded as one of the most important architects of Singapore and Malaysia. His firms produced seminal architecture of the post-independence period, including the Singapore Conference Hall, the Malaysia Singapore Airlines Building (Singapore), and the Negeri Sembilan State Mosque (Seremban). A gifted designer in the Modern tradition, Lim worked on diverse projects from furniture to urban planning. Within his profession, he was influential as a leader, educator, and journalist, both locally and internationally before his retirement. Lim has been a champion of the arts and heritage, and is a supporter of indigenous peoples in the region. Most remarkably, he has reinvented himself as a botanical scholar and conservationist since the 1990s.

Lim was born into a powerful Straits Chinese family. His father, Dr Lim Chwee Leong, was a physician and community leader in Penang, while his eldest brother, Lim Chong Eu, was a chief minister of Penang. After attending the prestigious Penang Free School, Lim Chong Keat studied architecture at the University of Manchester and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT). At university, he distinguished himself as a scholar and athlete. He was the first Asian to win the Commonwealth Fund (now Harkness) Fellowship and was a serious badminton player, who almost turned professional. While in the west, Lim made contact with leading architectural practitioners and thinkers of the day, including Frank Lloyd Wright and Buckminster Fuller. In particular, he nurtured a lifelong friendship with Fuller, and later organized a series of famed "campuan" meetings, or intellectual exchanges with Fuller and others, in Penang and Bali. The geodesic dome, so closely associated with Fuller, was also a recurring theme in Lim's design work.

Lim returned to Malaya from his studies in 1958 and soon afterwards helped to establish Singapore's first school of architecture. As a lecturer, he was noted for his progressive approach in imparting the spirit and rigour of the Bauhaus school of modern design, which he had absorbed from Gyorgy Kepes at MIT. Known for his charisma, sharp wit, and eloquence, he was a major influence on pioneer batches of architectural students, especially Tay Kheng Soon, who later became one of Singapore's most famous architects. On retiring from practice in 1995, he returned to teaching when he was appointed visiting professor at the University of Manchester, and a quatercentenary visiting fellow to Emmanuel College, Cambridge. In 1997, the University of Manchester conferred on him an LL.B. (honoris causa).

In 1960, Lim was instrumental in co-founding the Malayan Architects Co-partnership (MAC) with William Lim and Chen Voon Fee, with offices in Singapore and Kuala Lumpur. The firm was hailed for its uncompromising modern design and deep sensitivity to local climate and context. From the start, the clarity of concept and attention to detail that Lim brought to the firm's early residential projects were virtually unprecedented in Malaya. The firm made its breakthrough in 1961 when it won the design competition for the high-profile Singapore Conference Hall project. Experts regard the design (renovated extensively since then) as among Singapore's greatest works of modern architecture. Here, Lim and his team handled the modern design idiom with great confidence, producing poetic and dignified spaces. An important feature of the building was how it responded to the tropical climate, using generous sun shading, lofty spaces, and natural ventilation, while local culture was referenced via mosaic tile work that abstracted ethnic Malay motifs. These sensible and subtle gestures set a high benchmark and were a world away from the imported icons or overt symbolism of later "nationalist" architecture in the region.

Despite this success, personality clashes amongst MAC partners led to a split in 1967, and Lim then founded Architects Team 3 (AT3) as a successor firm. AT3 won the competition for the Jurong Town Hall project with an innovative design, and shaped Singapore's skyline in the 1970s with projects such as DBS Building (Southeast Asia's tallest tower at the time) and UOB Building. Indeed, it was among Singapore's most successful architectural practices of that decade. Another milestone was the massive KOMTAR project in Penang, which was completed in 1986 after fifteen years of extensive urban analysis, planning, architectural design, and phased construction. This "city within a city" has been called "the last of the great national symbols of the 1970s". The sixty-five-storey tower was Malaysia's tallest building, although its scale and complexity proved controversial. In recognition of his body of work, Lim was awarded the prestigious PAM Gold Medal in 1997 from Pertubuhan Akitek Malaysia (Malaysian Institute of Architects).

Beyond his work as a designer, Lim was elected president of the Singapore Institute of Architects, and served as editor of the local architectural journal. He was also appointed to sit on Singapore's Housing & Development Board and the U.N. Panel for State & City Planning. For his contributions, he was awarded the Public Service Star (BBM) by the Singapore Government. Internationally, Lim was the founder chairman of ARCASIA (Architects Regional Council Asia) and chairman of the Commonwealth Association of Architects Board of Education. He has promoted the arts in his various capacities — from featuring works by local artists in his architectural projects to setting up a fine arts gallery in Singapore and sitting on the boards of Malaysian museums. He was an early heritage advocate in both Singapore and Penang, and is also known for his collection of historic prints, which he has lent for public exhibition and publication. Lim also has a deep appreciation for music, and is an amateur violin and piano player. Armed with specialist training in acoustics at MIT, he has a body of architectural works that include several of Singapore's early performance venues. Lim was an early promoter of the world-renowned avant garde Singapore pianist, Margaret Leng Tan, and helped organize a concert and live recording album featuring her performance.

Although he was widely seen as a renaissance man with a keen intellect and wide interests, few anticipated Lim's reinvention in his late fifties as a botanical scholar, taxonomist, and conservationist. Around 1988, well before his retirement from professional practice in 1995, Lim began dedicating himself to botanical study. His special interest is in palms, gingers, and other Malaysian flora, especially rare or threatened native plants. In 2000, he initiated Folia Malaysiana, a scholarly journal. It features accounts of new species from the region and is carried by global botanical institutes. Lim is personally responsible for accounts of more than twenty-six new species of palms, more than thirty-five species of gingers, and a new endemic genus, Kedhalia. He has also published in other botanical journals and presented papers at international botanical conferences. Lim served as chairman of the Malaysian Forestry Research & Development Board (FRIM) in 2001–04.

Apart from botanical research and publication work, Lim has established an ex situ conservation garden to study and propagate rare and endangered species, including as yet undescribed taxa. Suriana Gardens (Penang) has amassed a collection of native Malaysian plants that is probably unparalleled globally. As part of this project, Lim supports a group of workers from the indigenous Temiar community through a cooperative enterprise for their advancement, including traditional housing for them and their families. He divides his time between his family's mansion on the outskirts of George Town, his Bellevue Hotel on Penang Hill (where he hosts occasional cultural and intellectual events), and the Suriana Gardens.

Lim Chong Yah

(林崇椰, Lin Chongye, 1932–)
Professor of Economics, Singapore

Lim Chong Yah is best known for his highly-acclaimed list of academic publications, for intermediating between academia and society at large, and for linking up local scholars with those overseas.

Lim obtained a scholarship ("Malacca Settlement Scholarship") in Malacca and entered the former University of Malaya (subsequently known as National University of Singapore) in 1951. He graduated with a BA (1954) and BA Honours (1955) in the field of Economics, and thereafter served in the Singapore Administrative Service before becoming a junior faculty member (the rank of Assistant Lecturer) of the University of Malaya, Kuala Lumpur.

In 1962, Lim graduated from his M.A. programme and was awarded a Commonwealth Scholarship to study at St John's College, Oxford, where he took up a Doctor of Philosophy thesis on Development Economics in 1964. After graduating, he took up the position of the (inaugural) Head of the University of Malaya's Division of Applied Economics from 1965 to 1969.

In March 1969, he entered the University of Singapore as a Reader and did his term as the Acting Head of the Department of Economics before assuming the position of Dean (and Senior Professor) of the combined Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences where he instituted expansion plans.

Lim made many contributions as the Dean, including setting up faculty prizes for outstanding students and also initiating the presentation of university honorary awards to eight prominent Southeast Asian individuals. He also implemented several administrative initiatives.

As the Head of the Economics department, it then became the Economics department's turn to benefit from his leadership. In 1969, the department had eleven staff members and 402 students, but after he assume its leadership in 1978, Lim had thirty-six staff teaching 1,400 students who studied Economics and Statistics, and the department offered thirty-one courses in total.

Lim also directed two major research projects: the CPF Study Group and the Policy Options for the Singapore Economy Study Group that produces important papers with policy impacts. Lim also founded and strengthened the Econometric Studies Unit (ESU), with its econometric forecasting programme and which guides younger staff members in the early stages of their academic careers.

As for student-related achievements, he oversaw five doctoral theses and started a new Master of Social Sciences (Economics) degree programme through course work and dissertation.

Amazingly, despite all this administrative work and programmes, Lim kept up his publishing interest and has twenty-one single-authored and joint authored books in total. Additionally he has written twenty-seven book chapters, forty-two articles in prominent academic journals, and thirty-two monographs/conference papers. He has also written widely on subjects ranging from Malayan economic history to topics on Southeast and North-east Asia. In all, his impressive record of referred scholarly writings exceeds 160 in total.

Amongst his publications, the Economic Development of Modern Malaya (Oxford University Press 1967) became a popular textbook among students. Lim's writings eventually focused on global economic issues in his work Development and Underdevelopment (Longman 1991). The third single-authored seminal work is Southeast Asia: The Long Road Ahead (World Scientific 2001, second edition, 2004).

The books of which he is the main writer or editor includes Elements of Economic Theory (Oxford University Press 1971, third edition 1984), Economic Structure and Organisation (Oxford University Press 1973, revised edition 1977), Report of the CPF Study Group (Singapore Economic Review Special Issue, 1986), Policy Options for the Singapore Economy (McGraw Hill 1988), and Wages and Wages Policies (World Scientific 1999). His writings can be found in Malay, Chinese and Japanese language with a single writing in Braille.

On theories related to economic development, Lim came up with his own EGOIN theory. He introduced economics to more interested parties by writing essays in journals, magazines, and periodicals through his long-held positions of president of the Economic Society of Singapore (1973–91) and chief editor of the Singapore Economic Review (1978–91).

In public service, he was the first chairperson of the tripartite National Wages Council (NWC) that has an advisory role for the Singapore Government on issues pertaining to wage policies. He served in that capacity from 1972 to 2001. Under his watch, all recommendations of the NWC have been approved and carried out by the state bureaucracy. He then edited and penned a series of articles in April 1998 on the 25th anniversary of NWC to explain the organization's operations and activities to interested readers at large. A notable NWC initiative included the "corrective wage policy" (1979) to permit salary hikes. In addition, he was a committee member and deputy chairperson of the Methodist Girls' School board of management. Lim was the initiator and Vice President of the East Asian Economic Association.

Lim also initiated the establishment of the Skills Development Fund (SDF) and was later the chairman of the Fund's inaugural Advisory Council (1979–82). He served with the title of Consultant to the state of Mauritius in the issue of salary changes. In recognition of his public service track record, Lim was bestowed the Public Service Star (1976), the Meritorious Service Medal (1983) and NTUC's Meritorious Service Award (1985), NTUC's The Distinguished Service Award (1999), The Distinguished Service Order (Darjah Utama Bakti Cemerlang (2000) by the state of Singapore.

Lim was also the inaugural Chairperson of the Singapore National Committee for Pacific Economic Cooperation (SINCPEC), established with the view of building linkages outside Singapore taking charge of Singapore's affairs on the International Standing Committee of the Pacific Economic Cooperation Council (PECC). He strongly supported the establishment of the PECC international secretariat in Singapore in 1990.

Additionally he jointly founded the Federation of ASEAN Economic Associations (FAEA) and served as its President at three different times. For this accomplishment, he received the FAEA's Founder's Distinguished Award from the Ikatan Sarjana Ekonomi Indonesia (ISEI) in September 1987. Other international organizations (IO) appointments included Senior Economic Adviser (ECAFER), Economic Consultant for the World bank Lester Pearson Commission on World Development and UNESCO-IAU Commission on Higher Education and Economic Development in Southeast Asia.

Lim retired from academic life at the National University of Singapore in May 1992 at the age of sixty after working in the academic field for twenty-three years, twenty of which as a full professor. By his retirement, the Economics & Statistics department had doubled its staff strength to seventy-five, it had 3,927 students from the faculties of Arts and Social Sciences, Science, Law, and Engineering, and offered eighty-five courses.

Lim was given a warm farewell dinner where his former friends at work commended him and his spouse for their efforts in nurturing the Economics department and for the strong and cordial bonds built among faculty members and with those within the university community who knew him.

Lim was honored with the title of Emeritus Professorship. This honor is given to professors who have worked for the university for a minimum of seven years and has labored distinguished and prominent academic service and scholarship to the university. A professiorship was instituted in his honor. He received the commendations of Doctor Honoris Causa (Soka University), Honorary Professorship and Honorary Chairperson of Hainan University Council (Hainan University) from the Hainanese local government and John W. Ryan Alumni Award for Distinguished Contribution to International Education by Indiana University.

After his NUS service, Lim entered the NTU as Professor of Economics in its School of Accountancy and Business and served as Director of the School of Accountancy and Business Research (SABRE) Centre. He enjoys family time with four kids, seven grandkids and engages in his leisurely activities of golf games, gardening, touring and hiking in mountainous regions.

Lim Chooi Kwa

(林水檬, Lin Shuigao, 1942–)
Scholar, educationist, cultural figure, Malaysia

Lim Chooi Kwa is a prominent scholar, educationist, and cultural figure in Malaysian Chinese society. He has devoted himself to (work related to) education for over forty years, and his biggest contribution is in nurturing many students, especially those involved in Chinese education. After his graduation from university, Lim Chooi Kwa worked as a secondary school teacher and principal, a lecturer at the MARA Institute of Technology (1977–80), and then for eighteen years at the Department of Chinese Studies, University of Malaya (1980–97). After retiring from the University of Malaya, he became the director of Centre for Malaysia Chinese Studies (1998–2002) and helped set up, as well as teach, the courses at the Department of Chinese Studies at Universiti Tunku Abdul Rahman (UTAR) in 2002. He was the head of Chinese Studies Department and professor (2005–2008), and has been member of the senate (since 2008) at UTAR.

Lim was born in 1942 in the village of Lana Bulu in the Kubang Pasu District of Kedah, in the northern part of peninsular Malaysia. When he was ten years old, his family moved to a village six kilometres away from the town centre called Tambun Tulang, in Simpang Empat, Sanglang District of Perlis. His father, Lim Poon Chut (林木朮) was a paddy farmer and businessman. There were nine members in the family and Lim was the fifth child. Life was hard. Sometimes there was rice, but no dishes, so Lim would have to try catching fish from the river or paddy field. During the Pre-Independence era, there was no mandated age for a child to go to school. Hence, Lim only attended school when he was eleven years old. As a student of Simpang Chinese Primary School, he had to walk six kilometres on mud road before daybreak to get to his school. This moulded him into a diligent and assiduous student. Also, while growing up in his poverty-stricken village, Lim enjoyed fishing, bird hunting, rowing, swimming, tree climbing, fruit picking, etc. The simple rural setting made Lim into a creditable, sincere, down-to-earth, honest, kind, generous, and helpful person. As there was a lack of reading materials in the village when he was young, Lim got hold of a version each of Romance of the Three Kingdoms (三国演义) and Outlaws of the Marsh (水浒传) with no punctuations from his brother. After reading them several times, he began to understand the stories. That was when he started to develop an interest in Chinese. During his primary school years, Lim was also very interested in calligraphy and put in a lot of effort to hone his skills. Though he seldom practises now, he can still produce marvellous calligraphy which is much sought after by his students.

Lim acknowledges that though he was not particularly hardworking in his studies when young, he was top of his class every year. He was the type of student who pay close attention in class and remember all the passages taught by the teacher. Besides his kind, friendly, and approachable demeanour, Lim has an exceptional memory and can remember the names of students he taught more than a decade ago. Similarly, he can recite Chinese classic poetry at the drop of a hat and have it at his fingertips; his specialty in academia happens to be Chinese classic poetry. He was once the protégé of Professor Emeritus Yeh Chia-ying (叶嘉莹) at the University of British Columbia, Canada, when he was studying under her for his first degree at the Taiwan University and his master's degree at the University of British Columbia, Canada. During his attachment with the Department of Chinese Studies at the University of Malaya, he obtained his doctorate while teaching there as an academic staff member. Before entering academia as a lecturer, he was Principal of Beaufort Middle School (保佛中学) in Sabah and Kwang Hua (Private) High School, Selangor.

Although Lim specializes in Chinese classical literature, his contributions to the research of the Malaysian Chinese is more significant. Earlier on, he co-edited A History of Malaysian Chinese with Loh Cheng Sun (骆静山) (published in 1984), and then co-edited three volumes of A New History of Malaysian Chinese in 1998 with Ho Khai Leong (何启良), Hou Kok Chung (何国忠) et al. Also, while serving as the director of the Centre for Malaysian Chinese Studies, he co-conducted a research project on "Malaysian Chinese History and Figures" with Ho Khai Leong and Hou Kok Chung in 2001. This project was funded under the Program for Southeast Asian Area Studies, Academia Sinica, Taiwan. The outcome of this research has filled a void in the study of the Malaysian Chinese.

It is also worth mentioning that since 1993, Lim has been collaborating with Hou Kok Chung in organizing many large-scale international academic conferences for a few successive years. Some well known international scholars were invited to attend such as Tu Wei-ming (杜维明), Yu Ying-shih (余英时), Liu Chun-ren (刘存仁), Chen Ku-ying (陈鼓应), King Yeo-chi (金耀基), Li Zhehou (李泽厚), and Liu Zaifu (刘再复), etc. Organizing these conferences not only brought a breath of fresh air to the local Chinese academic research scene, but also set a model for local scholars and institutions in organizing international academic conferences.

In 1997, Lim led the Universiti Malaya debate team in the International Varsity Debate held in Singapore and emerged as champion after beating the teams from Taiwan, Hong Kong and China. This was the first time in the Asian Varsity Debate Competition since 1986 and in the International Varsity Debate soon after that the championship went to a team outside China or Taiwan. It is indeed of great significance that a Malaysian team managed to defeat three teams across the Malaysian straits. This not only enhanced Universiti Malaya's reputation, but raised the standing of the National Varsity Chinese Debate.

In Malaysia's cultural circle, Lim is a well known figure. He is frequently invited by local cultural and education organizations to give talks or to act as adjudicator especially in areas related to Chinese culture or the contents of Malaysian Chinese education. For instance, Lim was president of the Malaysian Lantern Riddles Society.

Recently Lim published a book entitled, hua tou hua wei (话头话尾) (Threads of Discourses) (2007), compiled from the prefaces and postscripts he had written for his own books and those of others and some speeches, research proposals, congratulatory texts, correspondences, etc. Through the articles in this book, we can roughly see the close ties he has kept in cultural and education circles, and also his extensive network of contacts and excellent interpersonal relationships.

This book also includes eight articles related to the Centre for Malaysian Chinese Studies. Since Lim became its director, he has basically established its role as a research institute, focusing on the study of the local Chinese. Moreover, together with the centre's president, Professor Tan Chong Tin (陈忠登) and others, Lim has diligently raised funds for the Centre for Malaysian Chinese Studies. Because of his outstanding interpersonal connections, he has managed to obtain some financial aid for this non-governmental research institute, gradually putting its operations on the right track.

Among the teaching staff of the Chinese Studies Department at the University of Malaya, Lim is one of the professors whose students celebrate his birthday for him. On both his sixtieth and sixty-fifth birthdays, his students organized birthday feasts of more than ten tables of guests, indicating how popular he is among his students. In 2006, Lim was conferred the honorary title of K.M.N. by the king. A group of his graduate students published a laudatory message titled, you jiao wu lei (有教无类) (educate regardless of the backgrounds of the students), in a newspaper in honour of him. This compliment is indeed a good reflection of Lim's character and contributions.

Lim is grateful that during his learning process, he was lucky to have met excellent teachers who motivated and cared for him. As such since young, Lim has aspired to be a good teacher.

Lim and wife Madam Lim Beng Yin (明燕) has two sons and a daughter. The eldest is daughter Yun Hsuan (韵璇), the second and the youngest are the two boys, Ting Song (挺松) and Ting Nan (挺楠) respectively. Both Yun Hsuan and Ting Song are doctors; Ting Nan is in the financial sector.

Lim, Elena Sen

(林孙美玉, Lin-Sun Meiyu, 1930–)
Entrepreneur, Philippines

Elena Sen Lim and her family's interests span fifty years across a wide sector of the Philippine economy, from agribusiness to the high-tech world of electronics and cars. Lim's entrepreneurial endeavours are always forward-looking, always with an aim to improve the sector of industry. Although diminutive, she is considered a giant in various industries, especially in car manufacturing, electronics, and prawn farming.

As with many entrepreneurs in the country, Lim began her business life from scratch. Born on 1 October 1930 to a shoemaker from Tacloban, Leyte, she and her six siblings were orphaned quite young. She was sent to school by a kind priest who later became Julio Cardinal Rosales, archbishop of Manila. Her mother supported the family by selling food to Americans during the war. Though her family lacked financial resources, they were rich in character, integrity, and had strong family values. The ability to see opportunities where others see none was ingrained in Lim from young. Her first experience as an entrepreneur happened by accident: A classmate dumped 100 comic books for her to dispose as garbage, but she and a sister began renting out the books instead. She made extra money by translating them from English to Waray — the local language of Leyte province. Over the years, Lim grabbed opportunities as they presented themselves. During her undergraduate years, she also taught history and English, and tutored children after school. Through sheer hard work and determination, she completed three degrees: bachelor degrees in education and law, and a master of arts degree in English.

"We were a nation of manufacturers, now turned into a nation of importers," laments Elena Sen Lim in a number of forums. Her remark was a bittersweet reminder of how once, her company had the exclusive right to sell and assemble Sony products in the Philippines. In its prime, The Solid Corporation, which Lim and her husband, Joseph, founded in 1965, employed as many as 7,000 workers. In the early 1960s, Japanese products were still considered inferior to American brands. However, with lower prices and an improved technology, Solid Corporation was able to capture the market gradually. Moreover, when Sony became the leader in video recorders (betamax units) production, Sony products became a byword in the country.

The Solid Group Inc. is a holding company with business interests in broadband cable and satellite services, marketing and distribution, electronics and after-sales service, information technology, and real estate development. Because of import liberalization and the lower manufacturing costs in other countries such as China, Indonesia, and Malaysia, Solid Corporation had to close down its factories one after another. While The Solid Group has ceased manufacturing in the country, it still retains a strategic stake in its partnership with Sony and now handles the Japanese company's after-sales service and distribution for its products. To date, Sony still has a substantial share of the consumer electronics market, pulling in clients with new products such as LCD and plasma televisions sets, DVD players.

True to her philosophy of providing affordable but high quality goods and services, Lim has ventured into the mobile phone industry. The Solid Group is the maker of the only Filipino mobile phone brand, My|Phone™ — the first dual active SIM mobile phone in the country, an accomplishment for Filipinos, by Filipinos. My|Phone™ is the first mobile phone provider with customized applications and content tagged as "Pinoy Phone" — software with a gamut of data such as recipes, jokes, and even prayers. With the success of My|Phone, the Solid Group has embarked on a partnership with the Ninoy and Cory Aquino Foundation to support the education needs of chosen young Filipino women. The CORY (Community of Responsible Youth) Scholarship Program reflects My|Phone's™ belief in the ideals espoused by former President Aquino and other great women leaders like her, such as Lim. This project spun off from the death of President Corazon C. Aquino in August 2009. David Lim, son of Elena and president of Solid Group, recognized the close friendship of his mother and the late president and requested My|Phone™ create twenty yellow units containing Cory's personal prayers, and Ninoy and Cory memorabilia such as photos, letters, poems, audiobiographies. These units were given to chosen members of the Aquino family. Requests from the Aquino clan poured in until David Lim decided to mass-produce and market the line for all Filipinos.

Elena Lim, however, became more known throughout the Philippines as the "Queen of Prawns". On trips to Japan, she and her husband were exposed to Japanese cuisine, particularly, tempura and sushi, which made Lim realize that there was an entire country that could be a potential target market. So, back home, she set up the AA Export and Import Corporation (AAEI) in 1973 to begin exporting prawns caught off the waters of the Visayas region in the south. In the first three years of operations, AAEI suffered from stiff competition from the United States, Australia, and other countries that had been supplying prawns to Japan for years. With extraordinary patience and determination, Lim introduced the black tiger variety of prawns as a special species for the Japanese market. Ninety per cent of the black tiger prawns AAEI exported came from private contract growers all over the country. Her move gave birth to a whole new industry, giving a thousand jobs to farmers who, also with her support, were helped by the processing plants she built on the three major islands of the country — Luzon, Visayas, Mindanao. With hindsight, she said, "We had to create the market, create the product and create the production process." Her book, Black Tiger Prawn: An AA-Solid Experience, was a tell-all, teach-all manual for the private growers from whom she sourced the prawns. She was convinced that the black tiger prawn industry gave life to medium and small-scale operations. These entrepreneurs had a strong sense of commitment and ownership, unlike the professionals hired by the giant corporations. By AAEI's fifteenth year, the Philippines was exporting 10,000 metric tons of black tiger prawns. Lim's excellent distribution system and dealer loyalty helped shield her from the vagaries of the market. Soon after her success with AAEI, other multinational companies followed suit and began exporting black tiger prawns. Within a few years, the popularity of the product and the success of Filipino growers and exporters spread across other ASEAN countries.

With the increase in competition, Lim set her sights on car production. From 1987 to 1990, the car industry in the Philippines was monopolized by three Japanese giants — Nissan, Toyota, and Mitsubishi, which formed a cartel. Lim doggedly challenged the Board of Investments to amend its car development programme to allow entry of other brands sourced from other countries as this would give Filipinos a wider choice in owning inexpensive cars and receive better service because of real competition. Lim thus set up Columbian Autocars after the programme was amended, and a year later, introduced the first people's car — Kia Pride. Columbian was the first of seven qualified participants in the people's car category of the Car Development Program to receive its BOI certificate of registration — a licence to begin manufacturing its product. To reduce the cost of the car, Columbian imported semi-knocked down units from Korea and finished assembly in the country. Two decades later, Columbian is still the exclusive distributor of Kia Motors of Korea. In its continuous pursuit of excellence, Columbian has consistently been receiving the Kia Motor's Elite Zenith Club Distinction since 2007, thereby establishing itself as Kia's foremost distributor in the Asia Pacific region.

For Lim, poverty reduction means boosting the economy of an area and providing decent employment for residents there. In 1985, when everyone else took money out of Bacolod due to the collapse of the sugar industry there, Lim put in a prawn processing plant. When Ormoc in Leyte was devastated by floods in 1993, Lim set up an industrial alcohol plant and soon became the biggest taxpayer in the city. When she was setting up a processing plant for Kia Motors, all her managers told her to station it in Laguna, an already well known industrial hot spot, but instead, she set it up in Clark Field — a land still desolate from the massive ash fall of the Mt. Pinatubo eruption of 1991. Her motive in each case was to give these no-man's lands a boost to their economic capital.

Lim believes she has succeeded in business because of her quest for excellence in everything she does. Despite her successes, she describes herself as "a teacher by inclination, a lawyer by circumstance, and an entrepreneur by serendipity".

Lim Fong Seng

(林晃升, Lin Huangsheng, 1925–2002)

Chinese education and cultural figure, leader of the Chinese community, Malaysia

Lim Fong Seng's family originally came from the county of Mei (梅县), Guangdong Province, but he was born in Titi, Negeri Sembilan on 15 April 1925. He was a well known leader of the Malaysia Chinese community who fought fervently for the status of Chinese education to be equal with the education of other languages. He was the president of the United Chinese School Committees' Association of Malaysia for seventeen years (1973–90). In the 70s and 80s, he was an exceptional leader, along with the president of the United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia at that time (1965-1994), Datuk Sim Mow Yu (沈慕羽), who fought in the front line in safeguarding Chinese education. He died on 13 March 2002 in Hong Kong.

Lim was educated at Naam Kheung (南强) Chinese Primary School and Confucian School (尊孔) in his early years. He was keen on literature during his secondary school years and his works had been published in the supplement sections of Sin Chew Jit Poh (星洲日报) and Nanyang Siang Pau (南洋商报) under the pseudonym of Ye Huo (野火). In 1941, he stopped schooling while he was in Senior Middle Two due to the Japanese invasion of Malaysia. After the Second World War, he assisted his father in the mining business and became one of the most successful mining tycoons. When his business was at its peak, he had to oversee twelve mining fields simultaneously and was therefore up to his eyeballs in work.

Despite Malaysia being a multiracial, multicultural country,the education and cultural policies formulated by the ruling government tended to be homogeneous and disregarded the realities of a multiracial society,. This has been the root of endless controversies on education and cultural issues in Malaysia. Lim Fong Seng was one of the Chinese community leaders who strove to solve this conflict so pluralistic education and cultural policies could flourish in the multiracial society.

From the time Lim joined the United Chinese School Committees' Association of Selangor and the United Chinese School Committees' Association of Malaysia in 1970, he tirelessly travelled near and far to fight for an equal education policy and to safeguard Chinese education and culture from being eroded or weakened. Because of this, he personally experienced many momentous incidents that involved the Chinese community and national culture. In 1973 after he was elected as president and took over the helm of the above two associations, he organized a United Examination for Chinese independent secondary schools (known as Unified Examination), launched standardized textbooks, and initiated campaigns to rejuvenate Chinese independent secondary schools. Not only that, he also began to apply for Chinese independent colleges to be set up and continued with the pursuit of establishing a Chinese independent university. At the same time, he never stopped pushing for the abolishment of Section 21(2) of the Education Act 1961, which authorized that "where at any time the Minister (of Education) is satisfied that a National-Type primary school may suitably be converted into a National primary school, he may by order direct that the school shall become a national primary school". He also led Chinese education organizations in protesting against Ministry of Education's appointment of teachers not proficient in Chinese as high-ranking officials in Chinese primary schools.

On 11 October 1987, he represented the United Chinese School Committees' Association of Malaysia in attending the assembly at the Tian Hou Temple of the Hainan Association of Federal Territory and Selangor, organized by fifteen Chinese associations and Chinese political parties to protest against the Ministry of Education's appointment of teachers not proficient in Chinese as high-ranking officials in Chinese primary schools. As a repercussion of this, he was arrested and taken into custody on 27 October 1987 under "Ops Lalang" by the Malaysian Government, and it was not until 3 June 1988 that he was released.

In the 1982 Malaysian parliamentary elections, Lim Fong Seng proposed a three-in-one political strategy, combining the forces of the ruling, Chinese-based political parties, the opposition parties, and the non-governmental organizations from the Chinese community, to fight for the rights and interests of the Chinese community. He created the slogan of "Enter the National Front, Correct the National Front" to encourage and support some leaders from the Chinese education sector to join the Malaysian People's Movement. In the 1990 general elections, he put forward the political idea of a dual alignment system and worked towards uniting the opposition parties to form an alliance to keep the ruling National Front in check, and also to prevent UMNO from dominating the entire political arena. To realize his political aspirations, he resolutely resigned from the position of president of the United Chinese School Committees' Association of Malaysia to join the Democratic Action Party, together with more than twenty Chinese education and civil rights activists, with the hope of consolidating the anti-National Front political force that was going from strength to strength. Later, he even took up the post of adviser to the Democratic Action Party. Overall, however, his contributions to Chinese education were more than his political achievements.

Lim Geok Chan

(Lim Yock Ching, 林玉静, Lin Yujing, 1936–2006)

Entrepreneur, educationist, community and business leader, Malaysia

Lim Geok Chan alias Lim Yock Ching was prominent both in business and education. He was particularly committed to the causes of Chinese associations and the welfare of education. Lim was from the Fu Jian Yong Chun clan, born in Klang in 1936, and passed away on 15 July 2006 at the age of seventy. His father, Lim Chao Yang (林朝阳), ran a small transport business. Lim was the eldest of eleven siblings in the family. He married Qiu Xiu Bo (邱秀波) and Lo Cai Lan (罗彩兰) and had five sons and three daughters. He completed his education at Xin Hua Secondary School and at, the age of twenty-five, ventured into business, assisting his father in managing the family's transportation business. He eventually ventured into many other businesses, including agriculture, manufacturing, palm oil processing, fast food, and many others.

He was known as the "Chicken King", one of the "Four Kings" in Malaysia in the 1980s. (The others being "Sugar King" — Robert Kuok, "Rubber King" — Lee Lai Seng, and "Steel King" — Michael Cheng.) The title "Chicken King", was bestowed on Lim when he took over the business rights of the Kentucky Fried Chicken (KFC) franchise in 1986. He then managed to venture successfully into the Chinese and Japanese markets, starting numerous joint ventures with locals in China to launch chicken rearing farms.

Lim was poor in his younger days and this spurred him to become industrious and eager to learn. He was also a positive thinker who never had arguments with anyone. According to him, his parents taught him to "take things easy and let them be". Due to his background, Lim firmly believed that he should contribute to the development of Chinese education. He said, "I have the responsibility to help the Chinese private schools, so that more Chinese children can enjoy better and modern education. With proper education they will be able to compete in the world when they start working or further their studies overseas."

Lim admired and respected Tan Kah Kee (陈嘉庚) and Tan Lark Sye (陈六使), the country's two famous Chinese education fighters. He said, "To protect the Chinese education is the responsibility of every Chinese. In order for a society, or a country to develop, human resource is the most important element. Countries like Taiwan, Korea, and Japan are developed because their education systems are successful. Chinese education must be available wholesomely, and then only can our society develop."

Lim actively involved himself in many local Chinese businesses and educational associations. He was president (1991–94) and life honorary president of The Federation of Chinese Assembly Halls in Malaysia (华总), president of The Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall (雪华堂), vice-president of The Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Malaysia (ACCCIM) (大马中华工商联合会), president of The Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Kuala Lumpur & Selangor (隆雪中华工商总会), chairman (1969–2005), and life honorary chairman of the board of directors of Klang Hin Hua Secondary School, director of Klang Hin Hua Primary School, chairman of the board of directors of Klang Chung Hua Independent

High School, vice-chairman of the board of directors of Klang Kwang Hua Independent High School, acting president of United Chinese School Committees Association of Malaysia (UCSCAM), Kampung Baru Pandamaran Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA) Branch president, Klang MCA division's treasurer, and youth president.

Lim's business interests included many companies in various sectors of business. He was the managing director and chief executive officer of many companies, including Lin Chao Yang Father and Son (林朝阳父子) Sdn. Bhd., Industrial Oxygen Bhd., Wembley (温利活性百泥制造) Bhd., Fusan Bhd., Khong Guan Holdings, and others.

Lim was not only a successful entrepreneur, but was also a Chinese education activist. Tan Sri William Cheng, another Malaysian corporate heavyweight, described him as a "straight forward [sic], generous, passionate man, and willing to go all out to take care of his friends". His business philosophy was "In business, I prefer peaceful negotiation, I don't like lose-lose situation[s]." This philosophy was one of the contributing factors of his success, as a businessman. A believer of the importance of expert opinions, he delegated decision authority to his staff at the appropriate times because he wanted the experts to decide. He strongly believed in good interrelationships and the spirit of give and take. It can be concluded that his management style was his secret weapon to success and earned him respect and admiration of many business partners, friends, and subordinates who supported and trusted him wholeheartedly.

He believed it was not enough for a person to spend time only on work and family, but that everyone should spare some time for enhancing his or her education. This is more valuable than anything else. "In this competitive and fast industrial era, [the] Chinese must enhance [their] education to nurture their working ability, so as to earn respect and reduce unemployment." According to him, "we need [a] clear conscience to develop education. When so many parents send their children to study at the Chinese independent schools, it means Chinese education is important. This is the greatest encouragement to me".

The Chinese Government through its embassy in Kuala Lumpur praised him highly, saying, "Tan Sri Lim all the while supported Malaysian Chinese education and [was] actively involved in Chinese community activities. He contributed greatly to the development and unity of [the] Malaysian Chinese community." Lim led groups to visit China many times and his contributions towards promoting Malaysia-China relations were tremendous. This led to the improvement and development of the excellent trade relationship with China which has proved priceless in the present day. Malaysian companies are well positioned to access the massive Chinese market mainly due to the groundwork laid by businessmen such as Lim Geok Chan.

Lim Geok Chan's excellent achievements and contributions to society were recognized and in 1971 he was awarded the honorific, KMN, with the title of "Dato". He was in 1992, given the PSM honorific with the title of "Tan Sri", by the Yang di-Pertuan Agong Malaysia. Both awards are highly respected and coveted honours glanted by Malaysian royalty figures who are constitutional heads of state.

Lim is an icon in the business world and also a pillar of the Chinese community. He represents the typical Chinese businessman who has achieved success through sheer hard work and dedication. In his successful business world he has never forgotten his roots and contributes his resources regularly to the enhancement of Chinese education.

Lim Geok Lin, Shirley

(林玉玲, Lin Yulin, 1944–)

Feminist, fiction writer, literary critic, poet, professor of English and women's studies, Malaysia

Shirley Lim Geok Lin is an acclaimed writer and a prominent figure in the literary scene of Southeast Asia and America. As a poet, novelist, and short story writer, Lim has produced an important body of work which conveys a wide array of themes, ranging from childhood and human relationships to diasporic and gender concerns. As an academic, she has contributed widely to the discipline of literary and cultural studies and has been actively engaged in teaching, research projects, and consultation work all over the world. Her poetry, short stories, and novels have entertained and edified generations of readers and have certainly earned a place in the canon of Malaysian literature in English and postcolonial literatures. In America, she is widely recognized both as a distinctive voice in Asian American literature, and an authority on feminist studies and ethnic, minority discourses. Lim continues to play a vital role in both literary and academic worlds as a personality who has become the embodiment of transnationality and cultural multiplicity, as well as the creativity that these engender.

Lim was born in 1944 in Malacca, the thirdborn and only daughter in a Straits Chinese family of father, mother and four male siblings. As the only girl, Lim was her father's favourite child, but was subsequently ostracized by her brothers. From early childhood, she felt the pangs of being female in a partriarchal society. Abandoned by her mother at age eight, Lim's childhood was a particularly challenging one where gender inequality, misery, and poverty left indelible marks on the young girl. Her father eventually remarried and the family expanded with the addition of four half-brothers and a half-sister. Lim was raised in Malacca and attended the Convent of the Holy Infant Jesus there; in all, her memories and experiences of family and of growing up are interlinked with her sense of place and history. All these and more are immortalized in poems such as "Bukit China", "Monsoon History", "Crossing the Peninsula", "Visiting Malacca", "Returning to the Missionary School", "Song of an Old Malayan", "Nonya" and "Father from Asia". As a child, Lim was always keen on literature and a life of the imagination and knew she wanted to be a poet when she was eleven years old. From 1964 to 1969, she studied at the University of Malaya on a federal scholarship and obtained her Bachelor of Arts degree here with first-class honours before making her move to America in 1969 where she attended Brandeis University on a Fulbright scholarship and a Wien international fellowship. By 1973, she had received her Master's degree and a PhD in English and American Literature. After a series of teaching positions in various American colleges, she was appointed professor of English and Women's Studies in 1993 at the University of California, Santa Barbara, a position she holds to this day.

Lim's literary career was launched with her first volume of poems, Crossing the Peninsula and Other Poems (1980), for which she won the Commonwealth Poetry Prize, the first Asian and woman to do so.The poems here established Lim as a writer who grapples with the hardships of relocation, exile, ambivalence, and loss. She was twenty-four when she left Malaysia for the United States where, as an immigrant and a coloured woman, she endured alienation and isolation and encountered prejudice and racism. Haunted by the May 13 race riots of Malaysia, she also knew that she could never return to a land in which racial politics made the vision of an equitable Malaysian homeland virtually impossible to realize. In her memoirs, Among the White Moon Faces: An Asian-American Memoir of Homelands, as published in Singapore with the sub-title, Memoirs of a Nyonya Feminist (1996), Lim recounts the trauma of departure and displacement: "In the airport lounge, gazing at the batik decorations intended for tourist consumption, I felt already the disconnection of the stranger. I would never see Malaysia again, except through the eyes of a traveler" (p. 213). "Crossing the Peninsula" also captures the memories of a homeland and a cultural milieu which have become integral to her identity as a nyonya, while gender concerns take centre stage in poems such as "Queens" and "Women's Dreams". In 1982, Another Country and Other Stories, a collection of Lim's short stories, was published and clearly demonstrates her skill in the genre. One of the stories in this volume, "Mr. Tang's Girls", won the second prize in the Asiaweek Short Story Competition of 1982. In this story, she explores the hypocrisy and oppressions of a male-dominated society and, through the radical and dubious character of Kim Li, gives vent to the anger and frustrations that afflict women in a traditional Chinese family. Throughout her writing life, Lim has pondered and struggled over what it means to be Asian American in poems such as "Dedicated to Confucius Plaza", "American Driving", and "Learning to love America". The ironic tone of some of these poems does not detract from the sincerity and candour that underscore Lim's contemplation of her Asian American identity. In the 80s and 90s, Lim's oeuvre grew steadily: No Man's Grove and Other Poems (1985), Modern Secrets: New and Selected Poems (1989), Monsoon History: Selected Poems (1994), Life's Mysteries: The Best of Shirley Lim (1995), Two Dreams: Short Stories (1997), and What the Fortune Teller Didn't Say (1998). In 2001, Lim published her first novel, Joss and Gold, and five years later, her second novel, Sister Swing (2006). In 2008, Princess Shawl, a tale for young readers, was published.

Lim's critical output of scholarly articles, papers, and books either as sole author, co-author, editor or co-editor, is formidable in its sheer range, import, and depth: The Forbidden Stitch: An Asian American Women's Anthology (1989), Approaches to Teaching Kingston's 'The Woman Warrior' (1991), Reading the Literatures of Asian America (1992), Nationalism and Literature: Literature in English from the Philippines and Singapore (1993), Writing Southeast/Asia in English: Against the Grain (1994), Tilting the Continent: An Anthology of Southeast Asian American Writing (2000), "The Ambivalent American: Asian American Literature on the Cusp" (1992), "Complications of Feminist and Ethnic Literary Theories in Asian American Literature" (2000) — the list goes on. Apart from sitting on the advisory board of various journals, Lim is also founding editor of Asian America: Journal of Culture and the Arts.

Lim won the American Book award twice: once for her co-edited work, The Forbidden Stitch: An Asian American Women's Anthology (1989), and again for her memoirs, Among the White Moon Faces (1996). Lim has also been given due recognition for her contribution to teaching and research, not only by her home university, but also by prestigious institutions of higher learning all over the world. In 1981, Lim won the SUNY (State U of New York) Chancellor's Award for Excellence in Teaching and, in 2002, was Best Graduate Faculty Advisor. Over the years, she has been visiting fellow, professor, writer-in-residence, invited author and faculty to universities in countries such as Singapore, Australia, Bahrain, and Hong Kong. From 1999 to 2002, she served as chair professor and head of department at the University of Hong Kong.

Lim continues to write whenever time permits and derives themes and material from both her Malaysian and American experiences. In her memoirs, she writes: "home is the place where our stories are told. . . . In California, I am beginning to write stories about America, as well as about Malaysia. Listening, and telling my own stories, I am moving home" (p. 348). In her defence of justice for women and society, as well as in her resistance to colonial and neocolonial ideologies, Lim displays an unwavering conviction and continues to write the stories of the oppressed and the outsider.

Lim is married to Charles Bazerman, and they have a son, Gershom Kean Bazerman.

Lim Goh Tong

(林梧桐, Lin Wutong, 1918–2007)
Prominent wealthy businessman, Malaysia

Lim Goh Tong, who was born in 1918 in Fujian, China, was one of the world's most prominent and successful entrepreneurs of Chinese origin. The fifth child in a family of seven children, and second son of a vegetable seed trader, he migrated to Malaysia in 1937 from China's Fujian province. In 1937, the year the Japanese launched their war of aggression on China, Lim Goh Tong bravely set off for Malaya with a suitcase and 175 dollars. In 1944, he married Lee Kim Hua, whose grandfather founded the Bangkok Bank. His life story is inspiring, seen as a classic "rags to riches" tale, where difficulties were turned into opportunities, with much calculated risks, foresight, and perseverance.

In Malaya he started out as a carpenter and eventually went into iron mining, becoming a middleman for heavy machinery trading and taking on government contracts for development projects. By the early 1950s, Lim had already built a thriving business as an engineering contractor and plantation owner. He established his own construction company called Kien Huat Sdn. Bhd., which became a successful Class A contractor, completing many major public pieces of infrastructures. After Malaysia's independence, he was awarded the contract to build the country's first dam — the RM12-million Ayer Itam Dam in Penang. His other major projects included the RM5.2-million Sultan Yahya Petra Bridge in Kota Bahru, the RM20-million Hydroelectric Power Project in the Cameron Highlands, and the RM54-million Kemubu Irrigation Scheme. In 1964, he was a subcontractor for part of the Cameron hydroelectric dam project in the Cameron Highlands and the idea of developing a cool mountain top resort retreat was then mooted.

Hence, Lim Goh Tong founded the Genting Group in 1965 for the development of a beautiful highlands resort, named Genting Highlands Resort, located on the mountain range between Genting Sempah and Mount Ulu Kali, 2000m above sea level and 58 km from Kuala Lumpur in Malaysia. His humility, determination, and proven track record as a contractor won the confidence of the authorities who approved his application to acquire and develop the 6,000 hectares of land for the project, with his savings of RM2.5 million as capital. On 8 August 1965, he began constructing the access road to the summit and completed it within three years ahead of its six-year target. On 31 March 1969, the foundation stone for the first hotel, then named Highlands Hotel (now renamed Theme Park Hotel) was laid by Malaysia's first prime minister, the late YTM Tunku Abdul Rahman Putra Al-Haj. This was completed in January 1971 and opened for business on 8 May 1971. Tunku Abdul Rahman granted Malaysia's first and only casino licence on 28 April 1969 to Genting. Till today, his publicly traded Genting holds the only casino licence in Malaysia.

The development of the resort has seen its expansion from time to time with the widening of a 10km-stretch from Kuala Lumpur, and a new road from Batang Kali for the northern states' access. To date, the Genting Highlands Resort has five hotels (Genting Hotel, Highlands Hotel, Resort Hotel, Theme Park Hotel, and First World Hotel), two apartment blocks (Ria and Kayangan Apartments) at the hilltop, and the Awana Genting Highlands Golf and Country Resort with a projected total number of 15,000 rooms on the resort site. The Awana chain was also extended to include the Awana Kijal Golf, Beach & Spa Resort in Terengganu, and the Awana Porto Malai in Langkawi. In 1997, the Genting Highlands Resort further built the Genting Skyway cable car system of 3.38 km from Gohtong Jaya to the hilltop — depicted as the "World's Fastest Mono Cable Car System", with a maximum speed of 21.6 km per hour and the longest cable car in Malaysia and Southeast Asia — at a total cost of RM128 million.

The company has, since its inception, expanded and diversified from its hotel and resort activities to plantations, properties, paper manufacturing, power generation, oil and gas exploration and production, electronic commerce, and information technology development. The Genting Group was generally acknowledged as the number one leading company in Malaysia for ten years up to in 2004, and for nine consecutive years (1994–2002) by The Asian Wall Street Journal (formerly Far Eastern Economic Review). It was rated number one in Malaysia and number two in Asia for "Overall Best Managed Company for the Decade" by Asiamoney. Lim was ranked 204th on the Forbes 2007 list of billionaires worldwide, with family assets valued at a net worth of US$4.3 billion. To Lim, once goals have been clearly defined, one can, with the greatest amount of determination and hard work, realize one's goals conclusively and this has been his philosophy. As shown, the company is well positioned to achieve greater growth and profitability.

The Genting Group is, to date, Malaysia's leading corporation and one of Asia's best-managed companies with over 40,000 employees globally, 11,000 acres of prime resort land, and more than 80,000 hectares of plantation land. It comprises five listed entities: Genting International PLC (50.4 per cent ownership — investment holding company, listed on the Singapore Stock Exchange), Resorts World Bhd. (49.2 per cent ownership — leisure and hospitality, gaming and entertainment business, listed on Bursa Malaysia), Asiatic Development Berhad (55 per cent ownership — plantation and property business, listed on Bursa Malaysia), and Star Cruises Limited (19.9 per cent ownership — cruises services, listed on the Hong Kong Stock Exchange). Star Cruises Limited is the world's third largest cruise operator and Asia-Pacific's leading cruise line working with internationally recognized brands such as Star Cruises, Norwegian Cruise Line, NCL America, Orient Lines, and Cruise Ferries. In the United States, Lim bankrolled the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe in Connecticut to create one of the world's largest casino complexes, the Foxwoods Resort Casino. Genting Group and its consortium partners won the bid to obtain the second casino licence and build an integrated resort named Resorts World at Sentosa in Singapore, which opened in 2010. Genting has expanded its hospitality interests internationally through casino development and management agreements in Australia, the Philippines, and the Bahamas, and with Canada's Pacific Lottery Corporation and the United Kingdom's London Clubs International. Other principal subsidiaries include E-Genting Holdings Sdn. Bhd.; Genting Highlands Tours and Promotion Sdn. Bhd.; Genting Hotel & Resorts Management Sdn Bhd; Genting (Labuan) Limited; Genting Management and Consultancy Services Sdn. Bhd.; and Genting Overseas Holdings Limited (Isle of Man).

For his contributions to the national economy and society, he was bestowed the title of "Tan Sri" by HM, the Yang di-Pertuan Agong on 6 June 1979 and given an honorary doctorate of Entrepreneurship from the University of Tunku Abdul Rahman in 2005. Prior to that, he won many accolades, such as the Malaysian Entrepreneurs Award 1985, Manager of the Year Award 1986, Business Achiever of the Year Award 1994, and the Best Employer Award 1996. Lim retired at the age of eighty-five, handing over the reins and responsibilities as chairman, president and chief executive of Genting Group to his second son, Kok Thay, on 31 December 2003. After retirement, he spent most of his time at a villa built in Gohtong Jaya, a township he developed in 1993 at the foothills of Genting Highlands. He wrote his autobiography, My Story, published in 2004, which depicted his prominent life story, and how he survived his malignant tumour and cardiovascular problems, amongst many interesting episodes in his life.

Through his Yayasan Lim, a family foundation established in 1978, he contributed much to the society. He also built the Chin Swee Temple to honour the deity whom he felt inspired him to build the access road to Genting. The late Tan Sri Lim Goh Tong had set aside RM9.5 million to be donated to various medical, educational, and charitable organizations before he passed away in October 2007. After his demise, the Genting Group's subsidiary Resorts World Bhd., pledged to launch two scholarship funds, each worth RM1 million, for the University Tunku Abdul Rahman and Kolej Tunku Abdul Rahman. Genting Bhd. and Asiatic Development Bhd. have also proposed the establishment of two special endowment funds of RM1 million each for the University of Malaya and University Putra Malaysia, and RM500,000 to the Malaysian Institute of Management for the support of its Genting Group Resource Centre. Another RM2 million was donated to Yayasan

Lim to contribute regularly to medical and educational institutions, old folks' homes, and other charitable organizations.

Lim Goh Tong is survived by his wife, Lee Kim Hua, six children (three sons and three daughters: Lim Tee Keong, Kok Thay, and Chee Wah, Lim Siew Lay, Siew Lian, and Siew Kim), and nineteen grandchildren.

Lim Hak Tai

(林学大, Lin Xueda, 1893–1963)

Artist, art educator, founder of Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts, Singapore

Lim Hak Tai was one of the most influential first-generation Singapore artists during the British colonial period, from the 1930s to the early 1960s. He was trained in both Chinese and Western art mediums in China and taught at the Xiamen Academy of Art before migrating to Singapore. As an art educator, his most significant contribution was the founding of the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts. Holding dual appointments as principal and lecturer, he was the key member responsible for the development of the academy during its first twenty-five years. For his pioneering effort as the prime mover for a "Nanyang style" of painting, he was honoured as "Father of Nanyang Art". In recognition of his contributions to society, he was the first artist to receive the Singapore Government Meritorious Award in 1962.

Lim was born on 18 May 1893 in Xiamen, Fujian Province in China. He grew up and received his education there. In 1916, he graduated from the Provincial Teachers' Training College in Fuzhou, majoring in art. He began his career as an art teacher in Siming Secondary School and the Xiamen Academy of Art. Lim later joined the Jimei Teachers' Training College when it was set up in 1924. With the outbreak of Sino-Japanese War on 7 July 1937, he came to Singapore and was soon hired to teach mathematics and art at the Chinese High School and Nan Chiau Girls' High School.

In March 1938, together with businessman Tan See Siang and a few alumni of the Jimei High School, he established the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts. The premises of the academy was a two-storey old bungalow located in Geylang opposite the Happy World Amusement Park. As art education was relatively uncommon in Singapore then, there were only fourteen students. Since the enrolment was so small, Lim managed the academy with the help of only three part-time lecturers, Kao Fei Tse, Chang Ming Tse, and Qiu Ying Kui, who taught on a voluntary basis. He was the principal of the academy and the lecturer of the water colour and oil painting classes. Two years later, the academy moved to a new site in Serangoon Road near the Whampoa River and it was there that its first batch of students graduated on 20 June 1940, just before the outbreak of the Pacific War. The improved facilities attracted many more students, fifty in total, and the academy's staff strength also grew to twelve. Unfortunately in 1941, all activities came to a standstill when the Japanese invaded Singapore. The same year he was chosen to be the president of the Singapore Art Association.

The academy was closed from 1942 to 1945 during the Japanese Occupation. Meanwhile Lim went into the anti-Japanese headquarters in the Jinjiang Clan Association and participated in the anti-Japanese campaign. At the end of WWII, he immediately rented a bungalow in St Thomas Walk and resumed classes. From then on, the academy, though still a self-financed private institution, began to gain more popularity and recognition among art enthusiasts and communities in Singapore and the region. Student enrolment continued to grow steadily. Interestingly, about 40 per cent of them were foreign and non-Chinese students from the region, or expatriates living in Singapore. When Lim passed away at the age of seventy on 14 February 1963, the academy had hit an enrolment of more than 200 students and had seen twenty-five batches of students graduate. Many of its alumni had become the next generation of artists, or art practitioners in Singapore and Malaya (now Malaysia). Some continued their pursuit of art abroad. Together, they brought fame and honour to the academy. Today, the academy has flourished into a leading art institution which is on par with some of the best in Asia and the world.

From its humble beginnings to what it is today, the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts has undoubtedly gone through a long and challenging journey. The success of the academy, especially during the early years, can be attributed to several important factors. Firstly, Lim was, unlike many of his peers, a well trained artist and art educator with extensive teaching experience before coming to Singapore. Hence, he was both an art practitioner and a pedagogue who possessed good content knowledge and pedagogic skills. Secondly, the achievements of the academy during the formative years owed much to the vision and belief of Lim. He clearly understood the unusual cultural and social background of Singapore, as well as its strategic geographical location in Southeast Asia, and wanted it to be an institution assimilating all tropical characteristics from the outset. Hence, he not only named the institution the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts (Nanyang literally means "southern sea" in Mandarin), but also formulated a set of objectives to realize this vision and belief. Thirdly, he has to be credited for his leadership and the ability to put together a team of highly motivated and dedicated lecturers as faculty, including Tchang Ju Chi, Yong Mun Sen, Chen Wen Hsi, Cheong Soo Pieng, Huang Pao Fang, See Hiang To, Chen Chong Swee, and Georgette Chen. Lastly, he was an effective and inspirational teacher who knew how to bring out the best in his students. Pursuing a career in art during the 1950s was not a lucrative profession, but there were those who where willing to devote their time and effort to it. Through sheer enthusiasm and dedication to art, and by working closely as one big, united family, both Lim and his students managed to overcome adversities such as poor facilities and finances, and prevailed in the end.

Lim, as an artist, was best known for his Chinese traditional painting, calligraphy and Western art, especially oil painting. His Chinese paintings, in general, had a strong affiliation to the traditional Chinese painting technique and philosophy in their pure form. Though he was well trained to paint in all genres, the bamboo and plum flowers remained his favorite subjects. Most of his calligraphies had a distinct element emulating ancient epigraphy, whether they are in free cursive style, or the Han "li shu". The brush strokes were robust and full of vigour yet maintained elements of ease, grace, and simplicity. The medium of his Western paintings was mostly oil and they were strongly influenced by the post-Impressionists. Because of that, he was fond of using bold and contrasting colours, with broad paint strokes, while the chosen themes had strong local flavours.

Even without all the accomplishments mentioned above, Lim would still easily rank among the greatest in Singapore art history. He was regarded as the "Father of the Nanyang style" of painting because he was its prime mover and always at the forefront of this distinctive local style in the visual arts. When setting the objectives for the academy, he envisioned it as an institute set out to integrate the cultures of the different races, bridge the arts of the East and the West, as well as create an art form typical of the tropical nation that is Singapore. Together with a group of pioneer artists who were based at the academy, he broke away from tradition and was responsible for setting the direction that Singapore art took to arrive at its present stage.

In recognition of his contributions to society, he became the first artist to receive the Singapore Government Meritorious Award in 1962.

Lim was married with one son, Lim Yew Kuan, who is a trained artist and was principal of the academy from 1963 to 1979.

Lim Kean Siew

(林建寿, Lin Jianshou, 1922–2007)

Political leader, Buddhist philosopher, Malaysia

Lim Kean Siew came from a very illustrious family in Penang and belonged at the same time to the generation of Malayan scholars who came of age in the 1940s, imbued with an ambition to gain self-governance for Malaya.

His grandfather was Phuah Hin Leong, a highly successful rice miller and landowner. Despite taking on the surname of Phuah after having worked for that family as a young man in China, he switched back to the surname of Lim when naming his children. Phuah's third son, Lim Cheng Ean, married Rosaline Hoalim, an English-speaking Chinese woman from British Guiana whom he met while they were both studying in Cambridge. Their son, Lim Kean Siew, would later credit his eminent career and that of his siblings to their mother's strength of character and her untraditional parenting.

Lim Cheng Ean was famous for being a skilful lawyer who would accept poverty-stricken characters as his clients. In 1933, when the British decided to establish the Straits Settlements Legislative Council, he became its first nominated member for Penang, just as Tan Cheng Lock was for Malacca. When Sir Cecil Clementi, the governor for the Straits Settlement, attempted to pass a bill forcing Chinese children living close to government schools to attend Malay-speaking institutions, Lim Cheng Ean staged a walkout that purportedly worked beyond expectations and saw the bill withdrawn.

Politically, his children were "inclined to the Left". For example, his son, Kean Chye, was a lawyer and founder-member of Singapore's first political party, the Malayan Democratic Union (MDU), established in December 1945. Another son, Kean Chong, was a pilot in the Battle of Britain who later served Tanzania as chief of the Department of Roads until his retirement. The eldest daughter, P.G. Lim, also a lawyer, was Malaysia's representative to the United Nations, and the ambassador to Yugoslavia and the EEC countries.

In his youth, Lim Kean Siew had hobbies that included palmistry, playing the piano, bridge, chess, woodworking, and photography. He also showed an interest in martial arts, learning skills that stood him in good stead in fights in school…and in later life. He related that after winning a certain fight against a much older boy when attending Penang Free School, he demonstratively shook the defeated boy's hand, and then mused: "I had gained respect and I had also learnt one lesson. When one fought, one had to win and there was no other consideration. The world had no time for losers."

His more intellectual pursuits included philosophy, literature, and poetry. He was educated at Singapore's Raffles College, where he happened to be when the first Japanese bombs were dropped. Britain's abandonment of Penang and Singapore ignited in Lim a profound disenchantment with the colonial system, as it did in many others throughout Malaya.

Lim achieved a double Tripos in English and law at Cambridge. After becoming a barrister-at-law at Gray's Inn, he practised for a while in the United Kingdom. He was admitted to the Malayan Bar on his return to the colony, and immediately went into politics, helping to found the Labour Party of Malaya (LPM) and serving as its secretary general. The party later formed the Malayan People's Socialist Front together with Partai Rakyat.

The Penang division of the LPM became the controlling party in the George Town City Council in 1958 when Lim and two others were elected. In 1959, the Front won five state seats and three parliamentary seats in Penang. Lim proved to be a formidable orator and became the Member of Parliament for Penang's Datuk Keramat constituency in 1959.

Following Operation Cold Store on 2 February 1963 — when 113 active left-wing leaders were arrested in Singapore — and other conflicts, the alienation between the Front and the establishment worsened. Despite hopes of taking the Penang state government in the 1964 elections, the Front suffered heavy losses, but Lim managed to retain his parliamentary seat.

Local elections in the country were suspended on 1 March 1965, and internal strife among Front members in the George Town City Council saw the party losing control over its core constituency by the end of that year. This ended Labour Party's control in that city for good. Partai Rakyat announced its withdrawal from the Front in December 1965.

In July 1966, in what was seen as a measure to suppress Labour Party prospects in Penang, the government decreed that all functions of the city council would be transferred to the chief minister of the state.

As radicalization increased within the party, Lim, as divisional chairman for Penang, declared that the LPM was a constitutional socialist party. However, the strategy of mass struggle won ground as street protests were launched, ideologically fuelled by opposition to American presence in the Vietnam War, and by Mao Zedong's Cultural Revolution in China.

A general strike organized by the LPM in Penang on 24 November 1967 against the devaluation of the currency brought government reprisals in the form of arrests without trial. Twenty-nine key members of the LPM, including Lim, who was then the party's national deputy chairman, were taken into custody under the Internal Security Act. Lim was released after twenty-eight days.

On 2 January 1969, Lim resigned as MP and state assemblyman in accordance with directives from the party to boycott the upcoming general elections. Racial riots broke out in May that year after the polls, and the LPM was proscribed by 1972. Lim joined the MCA in 1975 as presidential adviser. He became a member of the presidential council and central committee and served as Penang MCA liaison committee chairman from 1979 until he left the party in 1983.

His last political triumph was when he managed to win the state seat of Pengkalan Kota in Penang in a 1980 by-election.

Lim's keen interests in meditation and Buddhism were reflected in his decision on retirement from politics to be legal adviser to the Malaysian Buddhist Association Meditation Centre, and in his participation in other Buddhist organizations. In his later years, besides two autobiographical books published in 1997 and 1999, he also authored Inner Peace: A Source of Chinese Philosophic Meditative Practice (1994) and The Beauty of Chinese Yixing Teapots: And the Finer Arts of Tea Drinking (2001).

Lim died of a heart attack on 29 September 2007, leaving behind his wife, Pamela Ong, three sons, and a daughter.

Lim Kek Tjiang

(林克昌, Lin Kechang, 1928–)
Violinist, conductor, Indonesia

Liem Kek Tjiang is an influential violinist and conductor who made an imprint beyond Indonesia. He was considered a musician who contributed to the music scene in mainland China, Taiwan and Hong Kong. Due to the turmoil in his life and his artistic temperament, he encountered a lot of difficulties as a violinist but his talent is eventually recognized and appreciated.

Kek Tjiang was born into a peranakan family in Banjarmasin (Kalimantan) on 21 March 1928. His grandfather was a trader in textiles and his grandmother was a Dayak woman. His father was a petty trader. When Kek Tjiang was three years old, his family moved to Surabaya and then to Jakarta soon after. His father later opened a shop selling musical instruments. Kek Tjiang and his three brothers, Kek Beng, Kek Teng and Kek Han, all became musicians, but Kek Tjiang was the most well-known. When Kek Tjiang was a child, his father hired a local musician to teach him the violin. He learned fast, and at the age of 11 joined the music group of a Catholic church. During the Japanese occupation, he took violin lessons from Ivan Fedoroff, a Russian musician. Not long thereafter Kek Tjiang joined the Jakarta Radio Orchestra where he worked for two and half years. At the age of 16 he gave his first solo performance and later became leader of the first violinists in the Orchestra.

After the Japanese surrender, Kek Tjiang, at the age of 18, applied for a Dutch East Indies government scholarship. He was awarded a Malino scholarship to study at the Netherlands Conservatorium (Amsterdam). His younger brother, Lim Kek Beng, went with him to the Netherlands and later also received a Dutch scholarship. In 1950 Kek Tjiang graduated (maxima cum laude) while his brother had one more year to go. During that time, both Kek Tjiang and Kek Beng were holding Dutch passports, but their father made them take up Indonesian citizenship and give up their Dutch citizenship. Accordingly both brothers lost their Dutch scholarships. Kek Beng had to work as a cello player, and Kek Tjiang went on to Paris for advanced studies for five years.

Kek Tjiang sat for an examination to get into the Conservatoire National de la Musique de Paris. He was accepted and was able to learn to play the violin from well-known musicians such as Furmin Touche and his student Rene Benedette. Nevertheless, Kek Tjiang noted that he had learned the most from George Enescu, who gave him private tuition. He said Enescu was the greatest teacher he had ever come across. Kek Tjiang graduated from the Paris National Conservatorium after attending it for nine months. Between 1954 and 1955, he concentrated on taking part in international competitions in Italy and Belgium which unfortunately he did not win. Nevertheless, his talent was recognised by many judges. He even got an offer to study music in Moscow.

Both Kek Tjiang and Kek Beng were recipients of scholarships. Kek Tjiang won his scholarships from the French and Indonesian governments and had the obligation to serve Indonesia for three years. He felt it was his duty to return home and arrived in Jakarta in January 1956. He was assigned to be the director of the Indonesian Symphony Orchestra. However, the quality of the orchestra members was poor and there were insufficient players; salaries were low and musicians were not respected. There were also anti-Chinese feelings adversely affecting both Kek Tjiang and Kek Beng. Although the two brothers could not speak Chinese, people at the Chinese embassy were friendly towards them and often invited the brothers to perform at the embassy. Not long after he had returned to Indonesia, Kek Tjiang met Elsie Tjiok San Fang , an acquaintance of Kek Beng's. Elsie and Kek Tjiang fell in love and got married in 1958. Both were encouraged and persuaded by their Chinese friends "to serve the motherland", meaning China. When the two were leaving for China the Chinese embassy held a big farewell dinner for them.

In fact, Kek Tjiang's parents, who did not know anything about China and who were not even able to speak or read Chinese, agreed with the couples' "return" to mainland China, while Elsie's parents, who were born and brought up in China, strongly opposed their decision. This led to the break-up between the couple and Elsie's parents. In 1958, Elsie and Kek Tjiang took a ship to China and were met by Chinese officials in Guangdong. Upon arrival in Beijing by train both Kek Tjiang and Elsie were shocked when they saw the hostel they were assigned to live in. Elsie who was then pregnant in fact broke down. Worse still, they had surrendered their Indonesian passports to the Chinese authorities, making it impossible for them to leave China.

Kek Tjiang was assigned to work with and later became the head of the Central Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra in Beijing. He noted that the standard of the orchestra was low and those who studied music had no talent for it; they were chosen because of their proletarian background and Kek Tjiang had to train them from scratch. As he did not understand Chinese, it was an uphill battle for him. Worse still, he was regarded as "too strict" and "having ideological problems". He was therefore not liked by the leadership. In 1963 he was transferred to the Central Music Academy (Zhongyang Yinyue Xueyuan). Although the Cultural Revolution had not yet started, Chinese artists were already being sent to the countryside "to learn from the peasants". Kek Tjiang was forced to live in the countryside for a year. His liver infection recurred after a few months and he returned to the city. Unable to bear the political pressure, Kek Tjiang wrote over ten letters to Zhou Enlai expressing his desire to leave China but received no replies. Elsie was even asked by the leadership to divorce him because he was "ideologically backward" but she refused. Fortunately there was a superior who protected Kek Tjiang and transferred him to the ballet orchestra. In 1966 the Cultural Revolution eventually erupted. Life became more difficult and Kek Tjiang applied again for permission to leave China. Still, the opportunity came only when Elsie suffered from inflammation of the thyroid gland and her neck swelled so much that she was granted a permit to leave China.

Kek Tjiang and family left for Macao and later sneaked into Hong Kong. After landing in Hong Kong, he was offered asylum in the USA which he turned down as his father and two brothers were still on the mainland. He also refused to be interviewed. Not long after that Kek Tjiang became Resident Conductor of the Hong Kong Philharmonic Orchestra. In Hong Kong the orchestra was at that time completely oriented towards the West. Kek Tjiang introduced Chinese elements (including mainland Chinese compositions) into the repertoire of the orchestra; he was ahead of his time by 25 years! At the Hong Kong Arts Festival of 1972, Kek Tjiang insisted on conducting "The Long March" and directed the orchestra in playing "Liang Zhu" (Liang Shanbo and Zhu Yingtai). The audience was rapturous but the Hong Kong authorities were not happy as a few items were "Communist songs". In 1974, The Hong Kong Orchestra became a professional group and Kek Tjiang introduced more Chinese items including "The White-Haired Girl". The authorities were upset. In 1975 Kek Tjiang was asked to play for the Queen's Banquet but the queen was not present due to her other engagements. While his orchestra was playing the audience was eating and talking. Kek Tjiang felt insulted and ended the performance. For this he was eventually asked to leave by the management.

Kek Tjiang wanted to migrate to the USA but Elsie wanted to go to Australia for the sake of their sons' education. Kek Tjiang gave in. He applied to many places for jobs but failed to get any. He was later offered a position as violinist sitting in the last row of the violin section. He had hoped to be hired either as the conductor or the leading violinist. Unhappy with what he believed to be racial discrimination, he left Sydney and moved to Melbourne where Elsie was teaching ballet. Later when there was an opportunity to conduct an orchestra and make records, he travelled overseas. In 1984, he followed Elsie to Hong Kong, expecting to make a come back. But the Hong Kong Orchestra was still dominated by the old, long-time members and he was not accepted. Finally in 1991 when he followed his wife to Taiwan, Kek Tjiang was rediscovered by members of the music circle. He was offered a position in the Music Academy and he taught many musicians in Taiwan, creating some sort of a sensation. He was named "Karajan of the East" and "Beethoven of the Yellow Land". That was one of the high points in his music career. When he was 80 years old, his Taiwanese friends and fans organized a concert in which he performed as a conductor and a violinist. Kek Tjiang and Elsie are retired in Australia.

Lim Keng Lian

(林庆年, Lin Qingnian, 1893–1968)

Businessman, Chinese Nationalist, community leader, Singapore

Lim Keng Lian was born in Luoyan Township (罗岩乡) in Anxi County (安溪县), Fujian Province. He had a traditional Chinese education before moving on to study at the Foochow Provincial Industrial School and then at Peking University. After graduating around 1921, Lim spent the next four years with the North Chiang-Chew Peace Maintenance Corps (later reorganized into an Independent Regiment of the Kiangsi Army). A tea merchant, Lim moved to Singapore in 1927 to set up a branch of his family firm "Lim Kim Thye". He was a main organizer of the Singapore Chinese Tea Importers and Exporters Association (SCTIEA) in September 1928 and served in its first executive committee in 1929. He served in the Board of Directors of the Overseas-Chinese Banking Corporation from 1932 to 1934.

Lim saw the importance of using Mandarin as the medium of instruction in Chinese schools and the need for common examinations among these schools in Singapore. In 1929, he was elected Director of the Education Section of the Hokkien Huay Kuan in Singapore where he promoted the use of Mandarin as the medium of instruction. In 1930, he was elected Chairman of the Board of Examiners of the All-Chinese Elementary School Competitive Examinations. Lim became Vice-Chairman of the School Building Committee of Nanyang Girls' High School in 1930 and the Chairman in 1932. When the school re-opened in 1945, Lim was the Chairman of the Board of Directors and one of five trustees of the school. In 1936, he and three other men also opened a primary school named Xing Nan (醒南). Lim co-established Chung Cheng High School with other community leaders in 1939. He also served as Head of the Education Section of the Singapore Ann Kway Association (SAKA) in 1940.

In November 1931, Lim chaired the Third Meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Union of Malayan Hokkiens to organize help in the reconstruction of villages in Fujian. In 1934, he was elected into the Standing Committee of the Singapore Ann Kway Association (SAKA). He was also elected Vice-President of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce (SCCC) in 1933 and was its President from 1934 to 1936. Lim also worked as Chairman of the National Products Exhibition and Promotion Committee in 1936. After Japan invaded China in July 1937, Lim became involved in anti-Japanese activities. In February 1938, at a meeting organized by the Preparatory Committee of Singapore Chinese in Support of the International Peace Conference, he urged the representatives to continue to work together towards defeating the Japanese. Lim was appointed Chairman of the Public Relations Department of the Singapore China Relief Fund Committee (SCRFC) in December 1940.

From 1933 to 1935, and from 1939 to 1942, Lim sat on the Chinese Advisory Board in Singapore. In October 1936, Lim was elected by the Chinese in Malaya and Singapore to be a representative of the overseas Chinese at the National People's Congress in Nanjing. He was also appointed a central committee member of the People's Economic Reconstruction Movement Commission and a member of the National Salvation Bond Committee. He was a proponent of the New Life Movement (NLM) in Malaya. In February 1937, a short-lived 'Singapore Overseas Chinese NLM Promotion Committee' was formed with Lim as one of the office-bearers. He also headed the Preparatory Work for a Singapore Branch of the Chinese National Foreign Relations Association. When the Japanese invaded Malaya in December 1941, Lim helped in the defence of Singapore by recruiting a labour force to construct defence structures for the Allied soldiers. He fled the island for Chongqing on 12 February 1942 and he was later appointed a councillor to represent the overseas Chinese in Southeast Asia in the People's Political Council (PPC). He also joined the Kuomintang in either 1944 or 1945. In June 1945, he was elected a member of the Board of Overseas Affairs in the Sixth Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang. Lim successfully requested the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to ask the British Government to re-issue official documents to those who had lost their identification papers. Lim returned to Singapore after the war and was involved briefly with the activities of the Malayan branch of the KMT. One of Lim's early tasks in post-war Singapore was to represent the National Government at the public funeral of his friend, Lim Bo Seng, who was buried with full military honours as a war hero on 13 January 1946. Lim supported the economic reconstruction of China through his involvement as a director of the Fujian Economic Reconstruction Company Limited elected on 12 July 1947.

On 25 August 1947, Lim was appointed the Deputy Chairman of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Commission (OCAC). He pushed for education reforms and supported the election of overseas Chinese representatives to the National Assembly, successor of the PPC, in 1948. He was re-appointed on 8 July 1948. However, he returned to Singapore to attend to his family business as he felt that the OCAC could do very little work because of the ongoing Civil War. His service to the OCAC marked his last foray into Chinese politics. After his resignation, Lim delved briefly into Malayan politics. When a committee was set up to organize a Singapore Branch of the Malayan Chinese Association in July 1950, Lim was one of its members. By December 1951, Lim had been elected branch president and he remained active in the branch until his resignation in 1953. Lim, however, remained loyal to the ideals of the KMT after 1949. He led a trade mission of Singapore and Malayan merchants to Taiwan in July 1957 in a bid to explore ways to increase trade between Taiwan, Malaya and Singapore.

In his later years, Lim immersed himself wholeheartedly in education work and helping the underprivileged. On 2 February 1953, Lim was elected to the Nanyang University Preparatory Committee. Lim was also devoted to social work on behalf of the deaf and mute in Singapore. He served as the Director of the Singapore Sign Language School for the Deaf when it was opened in March 1954 — the only school in Malaya and Singapore providing Mandarin and English instructions by sign language. In 1955, he was elected one of two vice-presidents of the Singapore Association of the Deaf and Dumb. He also served on the Lim Bo Seng Memorial Committee.

Lim made four main contributions to the Chinese community in Singapore. He introduced the use of Mandarin among Chinese schools in Singapore. As an overseas Chinese, he promoted the import and sale of Chinese goods. He was also a key figure in looking after the welfare and status of the Chinese in post-war Singapore. Finally, he remained passionate about his work among the Chinese deaf-mute. He was also a prominent tea merchant and community leader. He held the chairmanship of the SCTIEA from 1955. In 1957, he became the first Honorary Chairman of the SAKA and officially opened its new premises in October 1960. He passed away in Singapore on 6 December 1968, after a short illness, aged 75.

Lim Keng Yaik

(林敬益, Lin Jingyi, 1939–)

Medical doctor, federal minister, political leader, university chancellor, Malaysia

Lim Keng Yaik has a reputation for being witty candid and straight talking. Many Malaysians remember him as the man who first served in the Malaysian Cabinet in 1972 as minister of special functions, in charge of new villages and emergency work. During his thirty-six years in public office, he served in the following posts: minister of special functions in charge of new villages and emergency works (1972–73), minister of primary industries (1986–2004), and minister of energy, water and communications (2004–08). He was a member of the Perak State Legislature and State Executive Councillor from 1978 to 1986. In the course of his political career, Lim took over as president of Parti Gerakan Rakyat Malaysia from Dr Lim Chong Eu in 1980. He stepped down from the presidency of Parti Gerakan in 2007 and was succeeded by Dr Koh Tsu Koon.

Despite Lim's colourful personality, outspoken behaviour in matters of politics, and fondness for gesticulation when he made speeches, he is an intensely private person. Although he had been in the public eye throughout his political career, he does not put on any airs. He was born on 8 April 1939 in Perak. His father had two wives and eight children by each wife. Lim was very close to the siblings born from his mother, who bore his father six sons and two daughters.

Lim graduated from the Queen's University of Belfast with a degree in medicine (MB.BCh) in 1964. Ironically, he is a heavy smoker. After graduating, he returned to Perak in Peninsula Malaysia to practise medicine and eventually set up a clinic in Chemor, Perak, where he gained popularity as a "silly" or madcap doctor owing to his penchant for putting sickly children at ease by playing the clown with them. His easy manners, affability, and the fact that he grew up locally contributed to his popularity as a doctor.

As Lim was a thoughtful and observant doctor with open manners and a willingness to hear what his patients had to say put, he was actively in touch with people at the grass roots level. This, coupled with the fact that he had grown up during the Japanese Occupation of the country and lived through the tumultuous years of the Emergency in the post-war period, later enabled Lim to take the vicissitudes of politics and life in his stride and in turn shaped him into a seasoned politician.

His character traits as a doctor and contact with the grass roots were undoubtedly what brought him to the notice of the Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA) leaders of the time. By 1968, he was a member of the MCA, steadily building up his grass roots support and rising quickly within the party. He was assigned to contest in a Perak state seat in Pekan Baru in May 1969 as an MCA candidate under the Perikatan (Alliance Party) ticket, but lost. Despite this setback, he continued to rise up the MCA ranks. In 1971 he became chairman of MCA Perak and became a senator for a six-year term. In 1972, he was appointed a federal minister with special functions in charge of new villages and emergency works. But he resigned from the post the following year as a direct act of protest against the MCA leadership for expelling the MCA reform movement leaders at the time. Consequently, Lim was himself expelled from the party in 1973 whereupon he joined Parti Gerakan. He was popular in Gerakan and soon became the leader of the Ulu Kinta Gerakan division, as well as the Perak Gerakan head in 1974. He continued to rise within the party and became Gerakan deputy president in 1976. As 1978 was a general election year in Malaysia, Lim resigned from his post as senator to contest in the election. It was a propitious decision for he narrowly won the Jalong state seat in Perak. He was appointed a member of the Perak state executive committee (1978–86). In 1986 he decided to switch to the Federal level, and he contested the Beruas parliamentary seat, which he won by a considerable margin. He won the seat again in 1990 by a narrow margin, and again in the 2004 general election.

After winning the Beruas seat in 1986, Lim joined the Cabinet as minister of primary industries and remained in this position until 2004 when he was appointed minister of energy, water and communications. Lim Keng Yaik had also been president of Parti Gerakan since 1980, but after twenty-seven years as leader of Gerakan, he stepped down on 8 April 2007 and Dr Koh Tsu Koon took over as acting president. Soon afterwards, Lim reiterated his intention to retire from active politics. Thus, after thirty-six years in Cabinet in various posts, he stepped down from his post as Malaysian minister of energy, water and communications shortly before the 2008 general election.

Although he is officially retired from politics, he is still remembered as a lively, jovial, and straight talking man. He is regarded as an astute political leader, deeply committed to contributing to the community, and remains very vocal on a wide range of political issues as well as matters pertaining to Parti Gerakan. Aside from politics, Dr Lim was the key figure and main driving force in the establishment of the second Open University in Malaysia. He put forward the proposal to set up a virtual university in 1999 during the Parti Gerakan National Delegates Conference, and a revised proposal was approved by the Ministry of Higher Education in 2005. Wawasan Open University was officially established and registered in August 2006. Dr Lim was the founding chairman of the University Council. In 2011, he was installed as the second Chancellor of Wawasan Open University.

Throughout Lim's long political career, he received many accolades, such as an honorary LLD from the Queen's University of Belfast and an honorary Doctor of Philosophy degree by the Information and Communications University, South Korea in 2004. Likewise, his contributions to Malaysian politics have been acknowledged and honoured through the Seri Setia Malaysia (SSM) which granted him the use of the title "Tun"; the Seri Paduka Cura Si Manja Kini (SPCM) and Dato' Paduka Cura Si Manja Kini (DPCM), both of which granted him the use of the title "Dato", the Seri Paduka Mahkota Perak (SPMP) award, which carries the title "Datuk Seri", the Darjah Gemilang Pangkuan Negeri of Penang (DGPN) award, which carries the title "Datuk Seri", and the SSAP (Sri Sultan Ahmad Shah) award from Pahang which also carries the title "Datuk Seri".

Lim Kim San

Businessman, politician, Singapore

In Singapore, the name, Lim Kim San, is synonymous with the rough-and-ready housing works in the country where flats were constructed quickly so as to relocate and reconstruct homes for the peoples of Singapore in the 1960s. In addition to being the first chairman of Housing and Development Board (HDB), Lim also held ministerial positions in various ministries such as finance, education, defence, and environment, and was chairman of the Council of Presidential Advisers. He also sat as chairman of the Port of Singapore Authority (PSA), Singapore Press Holdings (SPH), and Monetary Authority of Singapore (MAS).

Often dubbed a man of "dedication with concern for public service", Lim was an astute and level-headed man who often made what was then deemed the impossible, possible. His sharp mind and business acumen stemmed from his education in the school of hard knocks. While he did have an excellent education in Anglo-Chinese School and Raffles College, life proved to be the greatest teacher rather than anything he learnt in school. Although he was born into a wealthy family and became allied to another wealthy family on his marriage, he did not rest on his laurels. Or, life did not allow him to rest on his laurels. Born in 1916 in Singapore to well-to-do merchant Lim Choon Huat and his wife, Wee Geok Khuan, he grew up in the tumultuous time of the Great Depression and saw for himself the unmitigated dangers of dabbling in market without taking into account the vicissitudes of the market forces. He knew all too well how fortunes quickly changed hands and found himself in a position where his family was unable to pay for his dream of reading law in Britain. Undeterred, he embarked on studying economics at Raffles College where the skills he had learnt on his father's knee on trading commodities and conducting business stood him in good stead. Eventually he graduated with a diploma in arts (economics) in 1939. His marriage to Pang Gek Kim, daughter of a wealthy merchant banking family, shortly after graduation enabled him to assist in the management of his father-in-law's business. He was so successful in applying trading, business, and economic principles to his job that he soon rose to become the director of the United Chinese Bank (which later became United Overseas Bank), a family-owned local bank, and managing director of the Batu Pahat Bank. During the Second War World, Lim experienced first-hand the brutality of the Japanese occupiers when he was tortured on suspicion of being pro-communist and pro-British. That experience led him to take an active interest in the welfare of his fellow Singaporeans and he espoused the view that Singaporeans' fate should never be decided by anyone other than Singaporeans. Eager to make up for the lost time of the war, the young Lim strove to make money after the Japanese Occupation by taking over the operations of a sago business in Kallang that his father-in-law hitherto had an interest, and he conceptualized a way to mechanise sago pearl production.

It was also at this time, in the aftermath of the Second World War, that Lim came to feel the nascent stirrings of public service. Indeed, despite his busy schedule running his father-in-law's banks and the sago business, he found time to serve on a variety of education and government affiliated bodies. He wanted to give back to society what he had learnt from it and he did so by serving as chairman of the finance committee in the Council of the University of Malaya for Singapore (now the National University of Singapore) between 1955 and 1958, as well as president, University of Malaya Society, 1956–57. His desire and willingness to serve society and his firm belief in Singaporeans shaping their future for themselves brought him to attention of his former classmates at Raffles College, such as Goh Keng Swee, and the leaders of the newly formed People's Action Party (PAP), Toh Chin Chye and Lee Kuan Kew. Though he declined to enter politics with the PAP, citing business commitments, he drew on his overdraft to fund the PAP campaign. When the PAP won the election and formed the government, Lim graciously accepted the invitation to be part of the civil service through the Public Service Commission by chairing the Housing Development Board (HDB).

For four years, he served the HDB by setting policies, managing planners, architects, and contractors, and slashing red tape to jump-start the public housing programme. He continually did so for free until he became a cabinet minister in 1963. Under his leadership, the housing plan for Singaporeans was organized. Eschewing a detailed plan, Lim opted for a rough estimate of the housing requirement. In doing so, he defied his detractors, especially those from the Singapore Improvement Trust, who said he could not build 10,000 units a year. By the time the committee — formed to determine whether HDB had the capability and resources to build 10,000 units of housing — issued its report, HDB had already constructed over the expected limit. Within the first two years of the implementation of the housing scheme, 26,168 units were built. This was the same number of housing units built by the colonial Singapore Improvement Trust in thirty-two years. Furthermore, Lim had these new housing units ordered into neighbourhoods that doubled up as self-contained entities, with all amenities and shops built along with the houses. In turn, this lowered traffic congestion as residents did not commute to other areas, such as downtown or the central business district, for basic necessities. Also, Lim's guidance was instrumental in relocating the 16,000 residents who lost their homes in the 1961 Bukit Ho Swee fire and reconstructing homes for them. He was so successful in this endeavour that within four years of the fire, 8,000 flats were ready for the victims of the fire.

Lim's success on the housing project was not only due to his "rough-and-ready" manner of going ahead and building housing units to meet the needs of the people. His successes could in part be attributed to the trust and financial support he inspired in then Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew and then Minister of Finance Goh Keng Swee, as well as his ability to cut through red tape and bypass the rigid regulations that would have hindered solving the housing problems. For his efforts, Lim was awarded the Order of Temasek in 1962.

On reflection, it could be the said that the success of the housing project arose from the standardized architectural designs which account for the similar mould of all the blocks of flats constructed by the HDB. Its success could also be attributed to Lim's usage of private contractors rather than construction workers, thereby allowing HDB to supervise the contractors to ensure standards. Overall cost was kept low by using a large pool of contractors and different sources of building materials. These methods of building affordable government-funded housing continue to this day and can be said to be Lim's lasting legacy, given that providing housing still remains one of the government's priorities. Thus, Lim's career in the civil service and politics is a success story.

In light of his capabilities, his retirement from politics in 1980 was met with much sadness amongst the PAP leaders. However that did not end his contributions to society. He continued to take an active interest in shaping the society and the country in which he lived by serving as chairman of the Port of Singapore Authority (PSA) until 1994; as deputy managing director of the Monetary Authority of Singapore in 1981–82, as executive chairman of Singapore Press Holdings, chairman of the Council of Presidential Advisers, and first chancellor of the Singapore Management University. In those capacities, he continued to exercise his talent in business organization, team building, and people management, his business acumen, common sense, and instinct about people, as well as his genuine desire to serve the community. These were the very traits that set him apart from the ideologues of Singapore's old guard.

However, his zeal to serve was blighted by his ill health. After a long battle with illness, Lim Kim San finally passed away on 20 July 2006. Today, his legacy lives on as more than 80–90 per cent of Singaporeans live in HDB flats.

Lim Kit Siang

(林吉祥, Lin Jixiang, 1941–)
Politician, Malaysia

Lim Kit Siang, who was born on 20 February 1941 is a fiery and charismatic man best known for being the leader of the Democratic Action Party (DAP). His chequered political career is also very well known. Although he is currently acknowledged as the parliamentary opposition leader in the Malaysian lower house of Parliament (Dewan Rakyat), he is remembered for having being detained under the Malaysian Internal Security Act for eighteen months.

Before he entered politics proper, he studied law at the University of London, and had been the election agent for Lee Ah Meng, who was at the time, standing in a by-election in Batu Pahat. As Lim failed to submit the return of election expenses before the deadline set by the law governing elections in Malaysia on behalf of Lee, he was severely reprimanded by the judge. In 1966 he entered politics proper on achieving the position of national organizing secretary of the DAP, and he kept this position till 1969. His hard work, dedication, and charisma must have endeared him to the DAP leadership, for he was soon editing the DAP's paper, the Rocket. By 1969, his star proved to be in the ascendant when he was promoted to the position of secretary general. 1969 was a particularly turbulent period in Malaysian politics, and there was a genuine fear that the country would be rent asunder by dissenting forces within. For this reason, Lim was detained under the Internal Security Act for eighteen months.

Despite this incident, 1969 was a good year for him politically as it marked the time he made it on his own. He was successfully elected a Member of Parliament for the Kota Melaka seat in 1969. However, owing to his failure to carry out his duties as an election agent for Lee Ah Meng years ago, he was considered ineligible to run, and his election was initially declared to be void. Despite this minor setback, Tun Abdul Razak, prime minister of Malaysia at the time, opted to grant Lim time to request a pardon from the king (the Yang di-Pertuan Agong) instead of barring him from serving as a Member of Parliament. When Lim finally received the royal pardon, he was allowed to retain his seat.

That brush with the Internal Security Act and the hullabaloo resulting from his earlier failure to carry out his duties as another person's election agent marked the volatile nature of his political career. In 1979, ten years after his detention, Lim was convicted of five charges under the Official Secrets Act for exposing an inappropriate arms deal between the government and a Swiss company. These incidents did nothing to diminish Lim's political career or the people's trust in him. Indeed, he rose from strength to strength, winning the popular vote and representing the various constituencies in four Malaysian states, such as Bandar Melaka (1969–74), Kota Melaka (1975–78, and 1982–86), Petaling Jaya (1978–82), Tanjong (1986–99), Ipoh Timur (2004–the present). He was also state assemblyman in Melaka and Penang in the following areas: Kubu, Melaka (1974–82); Kampong Kolam, Penang (1986–90); and Padang Kota, Penang (1990–95). Even within his party, trust in him and his abilities were strong — so strong that he was elected party chairman in 1999.

However, sometime between 1999 and 2004, Lim lost his parliamentary seat in Tanjong due to Chinese disapproval of the DAP collaborating in a political pact with the Islamist Parti Islam Se-Malaysia (PAS). This ill-fated collaboration could be said to have led to the DAP's parliamentary caucus on the newly created position of chairman of the Central Policy and Strategic Planning Commission. He must have had a falling out of sorts with some of the top brass of the party by 2004, when the fallout from the ill-fated DAP-PAS alliance of 1999 was most keenly felt in the DAP's electoral losses because Lim refused reappointment as party chairman. Karpal Singh was later elected to replace him, and Lim was given an advisory role as the leader of a newly created body called the Policy and Strategic Planning Commission.

After winning a parliamentary seat during the 2004 general elections (in which the DAP performed very well), Lim has come to be Ipoh Timor's Member of Parliament as well as parliamentary opposition leader. In his role as opposition leader, he led a mass rally on 10 November 2007 (under the umbrella of BERSIH, a coalition comprising political parties and civil society groups) called the "BERSIH Peaceful People's Gathering" in Kuala Lumpur to demand for clean and fair elections. The gathering was highly successful and drew supporters from all over Malaysia. Facing the 2008 election, Lim cooperated with Parti Keadilan (Anwar's Party) and PAS, posing a direct challenge to the Barisan Nasional (BN), especially the MCA (Malaysian Chinese Association) and Gerakan. The political situation did not favour the ruling BN as many voters, especially the non-Malays, were disappointed with the BN. The 8 March 2008 election results were often considered a political tsunami as it denied the BN the two-third majority which it had enjoyed. The DAP performed astonishingly well by winning twenty-eight seats in Parliament, which was substantial gain compared with the twelve seats it had won in the 2004 election. Collectively, the DAP, along with PAS and Keadilan, met BN's 140 seats with an opposition front of eighty-two seats. Lim was pleasantly surprised with the outcome, especially since the party managed to sweep all the seats it contested in Penang, allowing it to form the Penang state government with Keadilan and PAS, with DAP's Lim Guan Eng (林冠英), secretary general of DAP, who happens to be Lim's son, as the state's chief minister. Lim himself was re-elected the Member of Parliament for Ipoh Timor, with a majority of 21,942 votes. Lim is married with four children.

Lim Kok Wing

(林国荣, Lin Guorong, 1945–)

Designer, educationist, entrepreneur, philanthropist, Malaysia

Lim Kok Wing is the founder and president of the Limkokwing University of Creative Technology in Cyberjaya, Malaysia. Since it began in 1992, Limkokwing University of Creative Technology is respected for its innovative approach to education. The University has changed the face of private education through its creative approach that fuses industry experience with academic learning. It was the first private Malaysian institution to receive the university college status, and the first university college upgraded to full university status.

Lim Kok Wing was born in 1945 in Kuala Lumpur. After his secondary education at Methodist Boys School and Cochrane Road Secondary School, the talented and ambitious Lim ventured into various professions that honed his skills, which included marketing, journalism, designing, advertising and cartoon drawing.

Being a highly talented man with a multitude of artistic skills, creative design was Lim's defining talent. Lim was 29 when he established his own advertising business, Wings Creative Consultants in 1975. It was a bold move because he was muscling into an industry controlled by expatriates and multinationals. Notwithstanding, in his advertising days Lim had won more than 100 national and international awards. He is still quite simply the best in the business.

Lim's involvement is education not only created a new chapter in his life but set trends in the sector. As he has done with the advertising business he made it his mission to provide education that would bring recognition and raise the value of the profession. Lim is driven by a concern for the next generation and his emphasis on creativity as a competitive edge is now receiving its due recognition after decade of championing its value to business and life. He changed mindsets helping people to grasp the elusive concept of creativity and thus enabling young people to convince their parents of building career in creative professions. In Lim, we have seen a rare combination of artist and entrepreneur. His multifaceted experience and development of creative technology come together with his entrepreneurship, and above all his innovative approach to inspire an education initiative of its time and apt for a globalized world.

Limkokwing University of Creative Technology provides pathways into careers in design, communications and architect through smart partnership with 160 universities and colleges in Europe, USA, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. The University's student population is a mini United Nations with students coming from over 80 countries. More recently Lim has introduced the concept of the global classroom where students could opt to study one semester or longer at any partner campus in the network. They will get to learn the global experience first hand, make friends and build the wide networking that will give them the competitive edge in their careers. Lim too sees this as a great opportunity to build cultural appreciation and understanding in the next generation which will benefit the world in the years to come.

Lim Kok Wing has expanded his learning centre to Bostwana. The President of Bostwana has invited Lim to address their Parliament in July 2007 on the subject of resource and talent-building for today's world. The first Limkokwing University Bostwana graduation ceremony was held on 19 January 2008. And then, being the first university to deliver Malaysian degrees in United Kingdom, the historic Limkokwing University London was officially launched by then the Prime Minister of Malaysia Dato Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi on 1 October 2007. The Times described Limkokwing University's arrival in London "a wake-up call for UK universities about the harsh realities of globalization". In fact, the map of Limkokwing University has expanded to Beijing, Jakarta, Phnom Penh, Bostwana, London and is supposed to expand to New York as well. Lim said that the New York campus which was expected to be opened by the middle of 2008 would have been a significant milestone for Malaysia. This would have elevated Malaysia as a global player in the education arena. But New York campus failed to materialize. Nevertheless, Limkokwing University succeeded in opening two more campuses in 2008, in Lesotho, Africa and Bali, Indonesia.

Besides being ideas driven and a serial innovator, Lim is a man with future visions. He could see things in advance and embark upon projects for the future. One good example is the set up of the massive Malaysia Design Innovative Centre (MDIC) to position Malaysia as a design and creative hub in Southeast Asia. The government-supported MDIC, said to be the only of its kind in the world, is to invite academic with industry and the government in an endeavour to promote design knowledge and skills, develop quality Malaysian brands, inspire the entrepreneurial spirit, develop innovative thinking among Malaysian and change the way Malaysian companies build their business.

Success to Lim is not attached to the profit margin. It is more about the progress of his nation. For more than 30 years he has devoted his skills to achieving national objectives. Essentially it is linked to people. He simplified complex policies into messages that people could relate to and bridge the information gap between government and people. Lim has conceived and implemented a multitude of national issues and nation-building campaigns for the Malaysian government that served to promote unity, change mindset and increase awareness.

When Kuala Lumpur hosted the 16th Commonwealth Games in 1996, Lim's company designed the Games' mascot and logo and composed promotional songs. He convinced the Malaysian government to be consistent in the imagery it adopts right across its various socio-economic sectors. So this awareness was built through the use of tiger stripes as the identity for the country. The sport jerseys with tiger stripes were designed for the national sports contingent taking part in the SEA Games and Commonwealth Games in 2005. Tiger-striped uniform is used for the trainees in National Service Programme introduced for school-leavers. Other successful campaigns include Vision 2020, the blueprint for Malaysia to attain developed nation status; Made In Malaysia For The world, promoting Malaysia international trade and industry; and Malaysia Boleh (Malaysia Can), a catchphrase turned into a song to inspire Malaysian to compete and excel.

The Limkokwing group also developed script, video, music and creative work for presentation at the World Congress on Information Technology (WCIT), Texas in 2006 to prepare for the WCIT that will be hosted by Malaysia in 2008.

Lim advised the Vietnamese government in the conduct of the 22nd SEA Games in December 2003, a role which expanded to include charting strategies to promote Vietnam to the world to boost its tourism.

When his help was solicited in the hosting of the World Halal Forum 2006, Lim strategized to position Malaysia as a global hub for the fast-rising halal business. Halal is an Islamic set of standards for quality preparation of food and other items. During the conference, the participants were rallied to arrive at a consensus for a universal certificate of the halal to be adopted world wide.

Lim's humble background made him the ideal giver. All through his life Lim has supported many charities and a multitude of causes that increased awareness about the homeless, spastics, blind, heart disease, HIV, drug addicts and cancer victims. For 25 years Lim served the Red Crescent as Vice Chairman and as International Advisor for Communications for the Red Cross. He established the Society for the Severely Mentally Handicapped, providing care for those denied treatment by other charities. He helped to form an association to provide aid to senior citizens. Lim's Foundation for Creative Excellence supports talented individuals, especially those who are physically challenged, to pursue qualifications in creative programs.

Lim's vision and pioneering efforts in education, his global initiatives and committed leadership have been recognized by a great number of organizations, both Malaysian and foreign. Lim has received numerous distinguished awards. Among others, he was awarded the Honorary Professorship in 2007 by Moscow Academy of the State and Municipal Management, Russia; Honorary Professorship in 2007 by Thames Valley University, UK; Honorary Certified Doctor of Business Administration 2006 by Oxford Association of Management, Oxford, UK; CEO of the Year Award 2006 by Malaysia Canada Business Council; Asia's Most Creative Thinker and Personality 2006 by The London Graduate School of Management, London, UK; World Entrepreneur of the Year Academy 2006 by Ernst and Young, Monte Carlo, Monaco; Advertising · Personality of the Year 2003 by Malaysian Advertisers Association; Highest Enrolment of Foreign Students Award 2003 by Malaysia Ministry of Education.

It could be said that Lim Kok Wing's name is synonymous with the communications industry that cover journalism, advertising, design, publishing, audio-visual production, fine arts, performing arts, political relations, international relations, business and community development.

Lim Lean Teng

(林连登, Lin Liandeng, 1870–1963)
Farmer, millionaire philanthropist, Malaysia

His was a typical case of a rags-to-riches story — the poor immigrant from China who landed in Penang in the late nineteenth century and worked his way up from a coolie and farmer to become one of the richest Chinese businessmen in Malaya. Lim Lean Teng was also a philanthropist to the cause of Chinese education in Malaya, setting up one of its premier independent schools, Han Chiang High School in Penang, and donating S$500,000 to erect the library building of the Nanyang University (Singapore) in the early 1950s, which is the location of the Chinese Heritage Centre today.

Lim was born in 1870 in Luyan Province of Huilai County in Guangdong in southern China. He was a Teochew, one of the dialect groups of the martime provinces of south China, who were mainly farmers and agriculturalists. He came from a poor farming family and had many siblings. When he was sixteen, his father died, and Lim had to discontinue his schooling to help support his large family. He soon learnt to acquire the skills of farming and supplemented the family's income from farming by petty trading.

Poverty was widespread in China in the late nineteenth century, making life tough for many young men such as Lim, who decided to seek their fortunes in the Nanyang (regions to the south of China). At the age of twenty-three, he left his native Guangdong for Penang, the first British colony and one founded by Captain Francis Light in 1786. The Chinese in Penang set up temples and clan associations to help new arrivals or sinkeh (new guests) from the mother country find work and settle down in the new environment. Lim braved the long sea voyage from southern China to Penang via Singapore. When he arrived in Georgetown, a kinsman put him up at the Teochew clan association that was founded in 1855 in Beach Street, to help him settle into his new environment. Lim found work as a lowly paid coolie in the port area of Georgetown. He probably did not like his work, but hung on to it out of necessity as he had to remit money to his relatives in southern China. He was always on the look out for better opportunities.

Soon he came to know about work available in the neighbouring state of Kedah, across the Penang Strait where land was abundant, relative to Penang. Farmers were able to plant rice, tapioca, sugar, rubber, and other crops, as well as rear livestock. With the help of a kinsman, Lim managed to find a job as a coolie in central Kedah around the Sungei Patani area. Like all immigrants who desired a better life for their families in China, Lim worked very hard and lived frugally. Within ten years, his efforts paid off and besides planting crops such as tapioca, he also became a poultry farmer in Lunas, South Kedah.

With his business relating to agriculture taking off, Lim decided to settle down in Malaya even though he continued to remit money to China, where he had at the age of seventeen, married a woman there called Chen. In 1904, at the age of thirty-four, Lim married a second time in Malaya, this time taking for his wife a Chinese woman called Guo. The following year, Lim had his break when agriculture in Kedah became commercialized. This meant he could sell the crops he planted and poultry he reared both for domestic consumption and also for export through the port of Georgetown.

He started planting tapioca on a large scale and registered a business called Thye Hong estate with a kinsman named Lim Jia Yoo, who became his partner. In 1907, Lim Lean Teng acquired 150 acres of land in Kedah to grow more tapioca for domestic consumption and export. As his business expanded, he acquired another 400 acres in Kedah to plant tapioca, and eventually seting up a tapioca mill called Thye Fong. By 1916, his business had diversified and flourished and he was making huge profits not only from his tapioca, rubber, and coconut plantations, but also from his rice mills and liquor distilleries. He also ventured into shipping and real estate, and by then, had become one of the top Chinese millionaires in Penang. Lim had a beautiful mansion called Woodville built in 1925, along the millionaires' row in Northam Road, Georgetown. It is still standing today.

Like many Chinese millionaires who became rich the hard way, Lim placed a premium on education, which he regarded as an avenue for upward mobility, especially in his native China where educated people were respected. Lim remembered how he had to stop schooling at the age of sixteen, so now that he was a millionaire, he would do everything possible to advance the cause of education. In the 1910s, there were only two Chinese schools in Penang where the British had allowed the Chinese to set up their own schools.

Lim helped to start a third school for the Teochews, his dialect group, on 10 Oct 1919. At the time, the Teochew association moved its premises from Beach Street to Chulia Street, beside a temple and a school was built there. Lim paid for the entire cost of the school, which was called Han Chiang High School, named after the river flowing through a Teochew village in Chaozhu in Guangdong Province.

He also built a clock tower in the town of Sungei Patani in Kedah in 1920 to commemorate the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of King George V and Queen Mary. This was perhaps the way of Chinese millionaires such as him to show their gratitude to the British administrators who had provided stability in Penang and the Malay states that had made it conducive for their businesses.

In 1935 Lim either renovated the old temple or built a new one in its place called the Han Chiang Teochew Temple in Chulia Street, Georgetown.

During the Japanese Occupation of Malaya from 1941–45, he was a member of Eposho, a reconciliation committee comprising prominent Chinese and Japanese officers/civilians in Penang whose job was to receive public complaints about military excesses to the Japanese authorities for remedial action. This was presumably to foster closer ties between the local people and the Japanese, but very few complaints, if ever, were received mainly because the local people continued to fear the Japanese. Lim was among the Chinese millionaires in Penang approached to donate to the $50-million fund demanded by the Japanese Government from the Malayan Chinese.

Perhaps Lim's greatest contribution to the Chinese in Malaya was to build new premises for the Han Chiang High School which he had set up earlier in 1919 in Chulia Street in Georgetown. The Japanese Occupation had made the school cease its operations for about three years. When the school reopened, it found that its Chulia Street premises were too small to cope with the steep increase in student enrolment. Lim then resolved the problem by donating a piece of land in Datuk Keramat Road in a more spacious part of Georgetown, with a total area of thirty-three acres, for a new and bigger school to be built.

It was completed in 1951 with numerous and spacious classrooms, a library, science laboratories, an assembly hall, and stadium, as well as other facilities prevailing then to make it the top Chinese school in northern Malaya, Thailand, Burma, and Sumatra. Today Han Chiang High School has an enrolment of more than 1,000 students, not only from Penang, but also from neighbouring countries. In 1958, a bronze statue of Lim was built in front of the school to honour its founder. The Han Chiang Primary School was also established in 1961.

Lim Lean Teng died at the ripe old age of ninety-one, but his legacy continues to live on especially through Han Chiang High School, which today has an extension called Han Chiang College to cater for tertiary education in Malaysia.

Lim Lian Geok

(林连玉, Lin Lianyu, 1901–85)

Writer, prominent educationist, fighter of Chinese education, Malaysia

Lim Lian Geok, who was born in 1901 in China, was one of the founders of The United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia. He became president of the Association in 1950, and led the association for eight years. During his term as president, he spoke up for the promotion of Malaysian Chinese Education and the legal rights and interests of Malaysian Chinese citizens. He advocated that Malaya be independent, and that races in the country be treated impartially. He also urged the non-Malays to be patriotic to the country, and the Malays to think of all races coexisting and living together peacefully and harmoniously in order to develop the country.

Lim has his early education with his grandfather and was taught to read books such as San Zi Jing (三字经), The Great Learning (大学), Golden Mean (中庸), The Analects (论语), Book of Master Meng (孟子), Book of Filial Piety (孝经), and Book of Poems (诗经). When his grandfather died, he learned with his father and studied classical Chinese books such as Zuo's Commentary (左传), and articles by the eight famous prose writers in the Tang and Song Dynasties. By studying these books, he acquired a good foundation in classical Chinese. He learned mathematics and geometry from his father, but due to the limited time he spent learning these, the new knowledge did not have much influence on him.

When he was sixteen years old, he was asked by his father to be an apprentice in a Chinese medicine shop in Xiamen. The family's hope was that he would learn to do business and rid them of the poverty endured by two generations. As an apprentice for three years, he seemed to be experienced enough to do business, but he did not venture into business and instead followed the path taken by his grandfather and father. He furthered his education at the Jimei Teacher Training College, studying there for five years and graduating as an excellent student with the reputation of "student of 90 marks".

He was employed by his school as a teacher after finishing his training programme and was paid $50 a month, which was the highest among his former coursemates who were also employed in the same school but on salaries that were much lower. In the second year of his teaching career, there was a campus upheaval. This incident was planned by soldiers from the Kuomintang (国民党). The founder of the school, Tan Kah Kee (陈嘉庚), was very annoyed and announced the closure of Jimei School (集美学校). Because of this, Lim was forced to terminate his teaching career and emigrate to Nanyang (countries south of China, especially in Southeast Asia).

Lim based himself in Singapore and met up with Tan Kah Kee again. He persuaded Chen to reopen Jimei School. He then moved to Teluk Intan in Malaysia to visit his relative and was given a recommendation to teach in Air Tawar, a small town in Perak. However, after a month, he left Air Tawar and went to Indonesia. There he met a former classmate who was the principal of a secondary school at the time. Lim then taught in that school for three years. After the three-year contract, Lim returned home, but when his classmate resigned as the principal, he was urged to take over the post.

Although Lim worked in a foreign country, he was concerned about current issues there, especially those pertaining to Chinese education, and wrote articles on these. Not long afterwards, his name, Lin Lianyu, was blacklisted by the authorities and placed under observation. Because of this situation, he left Indonesia and returned to Malaya.

In Malaya, he still engaged himself in teaching and taught in a few places, starting with Klang, and then Kajang. Not long after that, due to his mother's health problem and an economic recession in Malaya, he returned to his hometown and taught in Taiping Primary School for a year. Later, he taught in Da Tong Primary School. He was there for only a few months because he was then invited to join Confucius Secondary School in Kuala Lumpur by his good friend who was the principal there. He joined the school at the age of thirty-four, and that was his last station of his teaching career. In his autobiography, he wrote: "When I arrived at Confucius Secondary School, it was mid October, 1935; from then onward, I never left the school until August 1961 when I was driven out of the school by the Ministry of Education."

Lim came to Malaya in 1925. At first, he was just an ordinary teacher, but after the Second World War, due to the call of the times, he joined social reformation activities as an educationist. He acted as a leader and guided the Chinese in Malaya to fight for the development of Chinese education and the citizenship for the Chinese. Due to his wide range of knowledge and his serious attitude in promoting Chinese education, he was highly respected and trusted and was elected president of The Association of Chinese School Teachers, in Kuala Lumpur for ten years. In 1945, after the Second World War, he acted as chairman at the reopening of Confucius Secondary School. From 1954 onward, he chaired The United Chinese School Teachers' of Malaya for eight years. In 1952, he was leader of the Chinese Education Arena that opposed "The Malay Education Report" which suggested eliminating dialect schools (mostly Hokkien dialect school). In 1956, he led the objections to "The Razak Report" which put Chinese secondary schools out of the National Education Stream. Five years later, in 1961, Lim, then president of the United Union of Chinese School Teachers, opposed the Talib Education Report which proposed the National Education Policy and encouraged all Chinese secondary schools to accept it. As the leader of Chinese school teachers, he warned the Chinese community that: "Accepting the suggestion, Chinese education will come to a dead end. Chinese Schools are the fortress of Chinese culture, our allowance can be taken away, but the Independent Chinese Secondary Schools must carry on." In the same year, before the passing of the 1961 Education Ordinance, Lim was accused of intentionally misunderstanding the government's education policy, and promoting racial emotions. As a result, his teaching permit was suspended and he was forced to retire. In 1964, his citizenship was revoked. From this, one can see that if not for Lim, the independent secondary schools will not have attained its present stage of development.

Lim was also a writer. Using the pen name, Kang Ru Ye (康如也), he published articles in the Nanyang Siang Pau supplement. During his retirement , he succeeded in publishing books which included Reminiscence (回忆片录), Collection of Poems, and Collection of Prose. He continued caring about current issues until the last minute of his life. He finally died of illness on 18 December 1985.

On the day of his death, the United Chinese School Teachers' Association, Dong Jiao Zong (董教总), the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall (雪州中华大会堂), and other associations, set up a foundation called the LCC Cultural Development Centre Berhad (林连玉基金), to recognize his contributions to Chinese education, not only for the Chinese community, but also for the country. At the same time, because of his uncompromising and confrontational style with the authorities on the issue of Chinese education, he was seen as a spiritual model and was called "The Spirit of the Malaysian Chinese Race" (族魂).

Lim, Mary

(née Hii Yang Eng, 许嫣樱, Xu Yanying 1948–)

Educator, businesswoman, Brunei

Founding partner and chief executive officer of one of Brunei's biggest schools, Dr Mary Lim is a dedicated educator by profession, but is also an astute businesswoman whose presence in the business world in Brunei spans several decades. She is known for her strong business acumen and is seen as the driving force behind the success of the companies she founded. Lim's business ventures cover a wide area: from educational institutions, educational materials, trading, import and export, textiles and clothing, health products, to food and beverage outlets.

Born in 1948 in Sibu, Sarawak, Malaysia, Hii Yang Eng, the maiden name of Mary Lim has six brothers and three sisters. She went with her parents to Brunei when she was only five years old, and studied in Chung Ching Middle School, Seria. After graduating from secondary school in 1965, despite her strong desire for a university education, she gave up the idea as the family's financial situation did not allow her to do so. She was upset and disappointed, but quickly turned her sadness and disappointment to strength, and started making preparations for her future so that one day, she could have her own school to help children realize their university dreams.

Lim began to work as a teacher in Chung Lian School in Sungai Liang which only had a few dozen pupils. Four years later in 1970, she moved to her old school, Chung Ching Middle School, to teach Chinese and mathematics for six years. Her total ten years of teaching became her most valuable asset in pursuing her dream to build her future school. In 1985, she established her first school — Sunshine School — a kindergarten in the Brunei capital, with only thirty-four students to start with. Against all odds and with her own way of running a school, she quickly turned this number to 500 students within five years.

In these early years, competition in the same field and a lack of fund became her biggest challenges. In 1990, Lim sold the school due to unforeseen circumstances. The same year, she and her family moved to Australia. Apart from wanting a change in environment, more importantly, her decision to emigrate to Australia was to let her three children study under a more comprehensive education system. However, her stay in Australia lasted only two weeks. She flew back to Brunei in order to pursue her dream.

In 1992, with the support of local partners, Lim founded her second school, the Seri Mulia Sarjana School (SMS, formerly known as PDS School). Having had the experience of running her first school, she was more careful in managing school funds as she could not afford to fail a second time, because she was unsure if she could pick herself up again after another failure. Unlike local government schools, which are fully subsidized, and private Chinese schools whose funds come from both school fees and financial support from their board of directors and the local Chinese community, the SMS School, as a private school, had to depend solely on students' school fees to survive. With sheer determination and hard work, the school managed to have 1,000 students within five years. Lim repeated the feat in 2002 with the school having 2,000 students when it celebrated its tenth anniversary.

The SMS School and Seri Mulia Sarjana International School (formerly PDS International School) started out with just fourteen students. That number has since grown to more than 3,000 students — a rare feat for Brunei's private schools, with over 200 staff. It now operates in three campuses. Lim managed to make a traditionally non-profit institution into a thriving business venture with a value estimated at millions of dollars.

In 2001, she introduced the "Express Class" concept from overseas to Brunei. It basically means to shorten the previous standard five-year secondary course to only four years. This new concept is meant for children who are more academically gifted and capable therefore of finishing their secondary schooling quicker by a year, thereby helping their parents to save some costs at the same time. At the beginning, Lim faced a lot of challenges when presenting this new concept to the Ministry of Education in Brunei because it was a relatively new system. But finally she was able to convince the authorities, and her proposed new system got the green light. This pioneer project signifies her contribution to the country's education development history.

The major characteristics of her schools are the innovative teaching methods and diverse extra-curricular activities. Lim has the concept of using her own innovative ideas to run her own school ever since she started teaching more than forty years ago. In addition, she has always believed that extra-curricular activities enhance student's interest to learn, confidence, teamwork, and the ability to express themselves. Her three policies and guidelines for teaching are: love, care, and patience.

Apart from the field of education, Lim has also ventured into many different types of businesses in Brunei, Malaysia, and Australia. Her businesses involve the import and export of educational supplies, cosmetics, and health products (Wakim Enterprise in Brunei and Rising Star Educational Supplies in Australia), an apparel shop (Bajoo Fashion House in Brunei), housing development (Long Sheng in Brunei), a restaurant (Nyonya Restaurant in Brunei), educational institutions (Rising Star Children Development Centre in Brunei and Hillcrest Academy in Malaysia), a chain store (Yushahmin Enterprise — The Life Shop in Brunei) among others.

In recognition of her contribution to the nation, Lim was bestowed the medal of P.I.K.B (Pingat Indah Kerja Baik) by His Majesty the Sultan and Yang Di-Pertuan of Brunei Darussalam in 2002. In 2007, she was also awarded an honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy in Educational Management by the Inter American University (IAU) in recognition of her exemplary achievement in the field of education. As another milestone in her career, she won the 6th Asia Pacific International Entrepreneur Excellence Awards held in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, the same year. In fact, not only did she become one of the winners of the prestigious award out of more than a thousand applicants from all over the Asia-Pacific region, she was also the only female recipient that year. Her latest achievement came in October 2010 when she received the P.J.K (Pingat Jasa Kebaktian) or Meritorious Medal from His Majesty the Sultan and Yang Di-Pertuan of Brunei Darussalam.

Lim is married to Steven Lim Chi Lun. They have two daughters and a son, and all of them help in running her various businesses. Her eldest daughter, Sophia Lim Ming Pey, helps run the SMS School. Her second daughter, Rita Lim Ming Yee, is in charge of SMS International School. Her only son, Leonard Lim Kuan Horng, assists her in managing some of her other businesses. Her heartiest advice to her children is simply, "Choose your own path, and live your own dream".

Lim Nee Soon

(林义顺, Lin Yishun, 1879–1936)
Entrepreneur, community leader, political activist, Singapore

Lim Nee Soon had always been regarded as one of the pioneers and celebrities in Singapore's Chinese society during the early twentieth century, for his great contributions to the development of rural villages and rubber planting. He was not only a successful entrepreneur, but was also a key leader to many organizations and a philanthropist with a keen interest in social and community matters. As one of the respected community leaders and most influential businessmen during that time, Lim served on the Welfare Board (1917), the Singapore Rural Board (1913–25), and the Malayan Peninsula Opium Investigation Committee (1922), and was appointed Justice of the Peace (1918) by the British colonial government. At the same time, he was an ardent follower of Dr Sun Yat Sen, who initiated the 1911 Revolution that overthrew the Qing Dynasty, and was thus closely connected with the development of the contemporary history of China.

As a Straits-born Chinese Baba (a male Peranakan), Lim was sometimes referred to as Bah Soon. His father, Lim Peng Nguan, arrived in Singapore from Teng Hai, Chaozhou of the Guangdong province in China in 1860. Lim Peng Nguan set up a sundry shop in Beach Road and married the eldest daughter of a well established Peranakan merchant, Teo Lee. Born on 12 November 1879, Lim Nee Soon became an orphan at the age of eight when his father died in 1887, leaving him in the care of his maternal grandparents who provided him with a sound traditional Chinese education before sending him to attend modern English schools. As such, Lim was effectively bilingual and bicultural. Lim married Wi Pek Hay at the age of twenty-three. He had four sons, Chong Kuo, Chong Pang, Chong Min, and Chong Hsien (the youngest son was from his second wife), and six daughters.

After leaving school, Lim worked for a few companies, including rubber plantations, as their manager and consultant. He then set up his own business in 1911 as a merchant, contractor, and general commission agent, trading in rubber and pineapple produce. He was also engaged in banking. He was on the board of directors and subsequently served as vice-chairman and chairman of the Chinese Commercial Bank (1924) and the former Overseas Chinese Bank (1923) both of which he set up in 1919 (both banks later merged with Ho Hong Bank to form the Overseas-Chinese Banking Corporation). Lim was also a founder of the Overseas Assurance Corporation. Nevertheless, his major concern was rubber and pineapple planting. When he was in his mid-twenties, he began to buy land around the Seletar River and lease freehold land from the colonial government for cultivation. At the peak of his career, Lim owned a number of rubber estates in the areas of Jurong, Choa Chu Kang, Mandai, Sembawang, and Thomson, and around the Seletar River in Singapore. He also owned some plantations in Johor, Malaya. At the same time, he took a keen interest in the pineapple industry, and developed it to such an extent that he became known to many as the "Pineapple King".

The estates owned by Lim developed into extended settlements as Chinese migrants were hired to become labourers on the rubber plantations. Instead of leaving them unattended to, Lim welcomed settlers to his lands, as long as their conduct was good. He perceived that the settlers could provide his plantations with a steady source of manpower and also save him the cost of developing the pieces of land himself. In order to encourage people to live there, he provided free-interest loans to his workers to build their homes around the plantations. They then settled down forming villages, paying a token sum for the land they rented from Lim, who was well known as a caring landlord, providing much for the villagers. As a result, the population within his land expanded greatly. Among the villages developed from Lim's estates were Nee Soon Village, Hainan Village, Hup Choon Kek Village, Phua Village, Kum Mang Hng Village, Heng Leh Pah Village, Bah Soon Pah Village, Chye Kay Village, Mandai Tekong Village, and Sembawang Village. To supplement their livelihood, the villagers engaged in a mixture of activities such as horticulture, poultry, livestock breeding, and fishery production. Lim also encouraged the colonial government to allow settlers to work on pre-developed land. Due to his effort, large areas of pre-developed land near the Seletar Reservoir and along Sembawang Road were leased to settlers for farming. In the early twentieth century, those areas were deserted land. Lim set up his rubber and pineapple plantations and factories in these areas; and the population of settlers grow. In memory of his active involvement and significant contributions to the development of the villages formed thereafter, those areas were named Nee Soon district and several roads within the areas were also named after him and his family members, as well as his business concerns. In 1977, Yishun (the Chinese "Pinyin" version of the words Nee Soon) new town was developed for the resettlement of the villagers. To commemorate the estate's roots and remind people of Lim's contributions, the Town Council erected a statue of Lim Nee Soon in his honour at Yishun Town Park.

Lim's career started to deteriorate by the 1920s when the prices of rubber and pineapple fell continuously for a long period of time. His failure to diversify his investments was the main cause of his downfall, although the 1930's world depression also hit many of the other local entrepreneurs badly. However his failure in business did not adversely affect his reputation as a community leader. In the eyes of the villagers, Lim was an influential figure for he was closely connected to the colonial government and actively involved in public affairs. Other than serving on the boards of the various governmental committees mentioned above, Lim was elected twice in 1921 and 1925 respectively as president of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce. In 1928, he became the founding president of the Teochew Poit Ip Huay Kwan, the highest representative body of the Teochew community in Singapore. In the field of education, he was the co-founder and treasurer of the Chinese High School and a member of the Raffles College committee. He was extremely supportive of medical care schemes for underprivileged migrants, donating generously, serving on the committee of St Andrew's Medical Mission Hospital, and in 1919, being president of Thong Chi Yi Yuen (Thong Chi Chinese Hospital). Lim also donated 12.5sq miles of land in Sembawang for use as a Chinese cemetery.

Lim had always been recognized by the Chinese as a key member of Dr Sun Yet Sen's Revolutionary Alliance in Singapore — the Tung Meng Hui Singapore Chapter — formed on 6 April 1906 to coordinate and fund the revolutionary activities of the uprising against the highly corrupt and inefficient Qing dynasty in China. Lim was appointed an office bearer taking charge of social affairs. He was also tasked to assist in the formation of more branches in Penang and Kuala Lumpur. Together with Tan Chor Nam and his uncle, Teo Eng Hock (son of Teo Lee), Lim founded the Chong Shing Press in 1907 to create awareness of the revolution and garner support from overseas Chinese. They also started a quarry to accommodate hundreds of revolutionary fighters who retreated from China. From the overthrowing of the Qing Dynasty, to the campaign against Yuan Shikai's regime, to the Northern Expedition, Lim had always been supportive of the revolutionary cause and contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to support the revolution. His contribution was highly recognized by the Chinese Kuomintang authority, which presented him with several medals and awards and invited him to hold advisory positions in many of the Chinese government departments.

Lim died in Shanghai on 19 March 1936 at the age of fifty-seven. He was given an official funeral by the Chinese Government and buried near the Sun Yat Sen Mausoleum in Nanjing in recognition of his contribution to the revolution. His greatest contribution to Singapore though, was to develop swathes of deserted land into populated and established villages. He was certainly an architect of their growth and development.

Lim Phaik Gan

(P.G. Lim, 林碧颜, Lin Biyan, 1915–)

Lawyer, diplomat, patron of the arts, Malaysia

P.G. Lim was Malaysia's first Cambridge-trained woman lawyer and the first woman ambassador. In the 1950s and 60s, Lim was legal adviser to several workers unions. She also contributed significantly to Malaysia's art and cultural scene, serving in the colonial-era Arts Council and then as deputy chairman of the National Art Gallery, in charge of acquisitions. She retired in 2001, after serving for eighteen years as director of the Kuala Lumpur Regional Arbitration Centre.

Lim Phaik Gan is the eldest child of Lim Cheng Ean and Rosalind Hoalim. She was born in London in 1915. Her father, a Straits born Chinese from George Town, Penang, read law at Clare College Cambridge. Her mother, a Hakka Christian, came from Georgetown, British Guyana. Rosalind Hoalim read Medicine at Edinburgh University.

P.G. Lim, as she became known, grew up in Hardwick House, Northam Road, Penang. Her paternal grandfather, Phuah (Lim) Hin Leong, was a millionaire rice miller who bequeathed a large fortune to his children. Lim was close to her nyonya paternal grandmother, Ong Teng Neo. Ong, like her husband, was a philanthropist and carried on the family tradition after his death. She was also an important role model to the young P.G. Lim.

Both Lim's parents held progressive ideas, particularly regarding women's education. Like her other siblings, she was western educated and had private instructions in Chinese. She attended the Convent of the Holy Infant Jesus at Light Street until her Senior Cambridge examination year and went on to prepare for the London Matriculation Examinations there. At home, P.G. Lim, like her siblings, had piano lessons. All of them sat for the external examinations of the Trinity College of Music.

In 1935 Lim went up to Girton College, Cambridge, to take a degree in Law and History. There she blossomed socially and intellectually. Among her tutors was Professor Harry Holland of Trinity College. Lim was also president of the Cambridge Chinese Students Association and represented her college in a fencing competition against Oxford. Her Cambridge contemporaries include movie magnate Loke Wan Tho, Malaysian High Court judge H.S. Ong, and Wee Chong Jin, later to be chief justice of Singapore.

Lim returned to Malaya after graduation. Her attempt to take her Bar examinations was interrupted by the outbreak of World War II and the Japanese Occupation. She went to the United Kingdom in 1947 and read for her Bar Examinations at Lincoln's Inn. Whilst in London, she joined the Malayan Forum, a student organization which campaigned for independence. From 1951–53, she succeeded Goh Keng Swee as editor of Suara Merdeka, the forum's newsletter. Whilst in London, she met and became friendly with Tunku Abdul Rahman and Tun Abdul Razak, future leaders of Malaysia. She moved in the close circles of Britain's Labour Party, observing, first-hand, the transformation of Britain into a welfare state.

She was called to the Bar in 1948 and in 1953 began her legal career when she appeared in her first case with Dinglefoot, Q.C. in a Privy Council case involving Lee Ming, a Malayan woman sentenced to death for acts of terrorism. Following up on this controversial case, Lim campaigned for trial by jury to be introduced into the Malay States with the help of Tun Tan Cheng Lock and Tunku Abdul Rahman. This was finally achieved in 1957.

On her return to Malaya, she moved to Kuala Lumpur into a job with Braddel & Ramani, then one of the top legal firms in the country. She became legal adviser to several trade unions, among them the Plantation Workers Union, the Railwaymen's Union, and the Transport Workers Union, playing a significant role in obtaining fairer wages for plantation and railway workers. She was also instrumental in getting daily-wage railway workers recognized as government servants entitled to pensions.

Lim joined the Malayan Labour Party and took up many cases to fight for better working conditions. Her only foray into parliamentary elections was in 1964 when she stood under the Socialist Front ticket for the Selangor state seat of Sentul. She lost by a small margin in a three-cornered fight involving the Alliance and the Singapore-based PAP.

Lim continued contributing to the socialist cause through her legal work and in 1968, despite the odds, successfully obtained a pardon for thirteen youths sentenced to death for possession of firearms during the Indonesian Confrontation (1963–66). With the demise of the Labour Party after the 1969 elections, Lim retreated from active politics.

Having established a reputation for fairness and competence, Lim was invited to sit on a number of national level committees, the most significant being the National Consultative Council (NCC) set up after the May 13 1969 race riots. The NCC, together with the National Operations Council, drew up the New Economic Policy (NEP) and the Rukunegara. She was a member of the Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce for non-Muslims (1970) and the National Economic Consultative Committee (NECC), sat up in 1990, to review the NEP.

In 1971, Lim was appointed Malaysia's deputy permanent representative to the United Nations with the rank of ambassador. That was the year when the Nationalist Government of China was expelled from its seat in the United Nations and its place taken by the Peoples' Republic of China.

In 1973, she was concurrently accredited as ambassador to Yugoslavia and to Austria. In Vienna, Lim was also Malaysia's permanent representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and the United Nations Industrial and Development Organization (UNIDO). Her final posting was as ambassador to Belgium and the European Economic Community, now renamed the European Union.

Lim returned to Malaysia in 1980 and resumed her legal practice. In 1982, she was appointed director of the Kuala Lumpur Regional Arbitration Centre (KLRAC) for international arbitration. She served in that capacity until 2001. In that time, the KLRAC emerged as an important regional and international institution for arbitration. She was also a member of the Board of Directors of the Institute of Strategic Studies (ISIS) from 1986 to 2008.

P.G. Lim is a keen art collector and supported many Malaysian artists. She was in the pioneering Arts Council, set up in 1953, to encourage the development of Malaysian artistic and cultural expression. She was also a founder deputy chairman of the National Art Gallery (1963–71) and chairman of its purchasing committee. In recognition of her services to the nation, P.G. Lim was made a "Dato" by the sultan of Perak and the governor of Penang respectively. In 2011, the Yang Dipertuan Agong (the Malaysian King) conferred upon her the title "Tan Sri".

She has a son, Wilfred Wee Han Kim, a lawyer, and a daughter, the former newscaster Caryn Lim-Turnbull.

Lim Poh Imm, Catherine

(林宝音, Lin Baoyin, 1942–)

Educator, short-story writer, novelist, Singapore

Catherine Lim established her literary reputation with her first two short story collections — which were among the first Singaporean fictional works in English to achieve popular success — as a successful practitioner in the use of the local variety of English to express the flavour of Singapore life, and for the vein of trenchant social criticism that runs through her work. She also came to prominence in 1994 for two newspaper articles she wrote criticizing the governing style of the incumbent ruling party.

Lim was born in Kulim, Kedah, and educated in Penang, Malaysia. She married a Singaporean and moved to Singapore in her twenties and subsequently acquired citizenship. Before becoming a full-time writer in 1992, Lim was a school teacher, then the deputy director of the Curriculum Development Institute of Singapore, and a language specialist at the then SEAMEO (Southeast Asian Ministers of Education Organization) Regional English Language Centre (RELC) in Singapore. She obtained a Bachelor of Arts degree in English literature in 1963, and a Diploma in Education in 1964 from the University of Malaya. When at RELC she received a Ph.D in applied linguistics with a thesis on Singapore English from the National University of Singapore (NUS) in 1988.

While her first two short story collections, Little Ironies: Stories of Singapore (1978), and Or Else, the Lightning God and other Stories (1980) were highly popular, Lim's reputation was cemented when they were later placed on the local secondary school literature syllabus. In 1982, Lim published her first novel, The Serpent's Tooth, which explores familial relationships against a backdrop of Chinese animist beliefs and superstitions. This was followed by The Bondmaid (1995), The Teardrop Story Woman (1997), Following the Wrong God Home (2001), and The Song of Silver Frond (2003). A Leap of Love, a novella that Lim first published as an e-book in 2000, was subsequently made into a movie and released in 2008. In the interim, Lim also published several short story collections, non-fiction works, and Unhurried Thoughts at My Funeral (2005), which she has described as "part-autobiography, part-fiction and part-polemics". She received the S.E.A Write (Southeast Asian Writers) Award in 1999. In 2003, the French Government awarded her the prestigious Chevalier dans l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres.

Lim's best work is arguably found in her short fiction pieces, many of which explore the atomism and alienation created by a market society, as well as the dangers of hyperconsumerism. The stories are noted for employing a traditional "twist" or "clincher" ending to great rhetorical effect. In "Paper," for instance, a couple's greed causes them to speculate heavily on the stock market. They lose everything when the market crashes; the husband becomes delirious and is admitted to hospital where he pines away and dies. In an ironic twist of fate, the husband's dream house is finally realized in the magnificent paper house that is burnt at his funeral for his use in the afterlife. Another story, "Adeline Ng Ai Choo", describes the death by suicide of the eponymous fourteen-year-old student who kills herself after failing an English exam. It transpires that she was the victim of familial pressure put on her to do well in school. While the best of Lim's stories have something of the clarity and appeal of R. K. Narayan's short fiction, her work in this genre has also caused controversy. In 1990, one of Lim's stories, "Kenneth Jerome Rozario", in her collection, Or Else the Lightning God, used as a lower secondary literature text, drew flak from Singapore's Eurasian community: its portrayal of a shiftless, layabout Eurasian boy caused umbrage and Lim was accused of pandering to ethnic stereotype.

In the case of Lim's longer fiction works, the major concerns are female emancipation, gender oppression, and the psychosocial dynamics of relationships between men and women. The Bondmaid, arguably her best known novel, indicts the traditional Chinese practice of keeping servant girls who are effectively indentured for life. Another novel, Following the Wrong God Home, explores the taboo subject of interracial romance. The Song of Silver Frond examines a May–December romance and is set against a patriarchal household milieu.

As an early practitioner in the use of local variety English (her short story "Taxi Driver" being often quoted) to express the flavour of Singapore life, Lim went against prescriptivist notions of language use that were arguably a legacy of Singapore's historical status as part of the British empire. The progressive adoption of English in the city state — its development from a pidgin to a recognizable variety known as Singapore Colloquial English or "Singlish" — and its use as a bridge language between Singapore's ethnic communities, means that Lim's writing has sparked debates about the status of local-variety English and its place in the Singapore school curriculum. Sociolinguists and literature critics have found her work a fertile arena from which to address ongoing debates about the post-colonial retrieval of autochthonous culture, about the indigenization of English language use, and about issues of cultural encroachment and globalization.

Away from her literary work, Lim gained notoriety in 1994 when she wrote two commentaries that were published in The Sunday Times (Singapore). In the first she argued that while the incumbent party's authoritarian style of governance had brought economic success, ordinary Singaporeans had little affection for it and that there was an "affective divide" between the two. There was no official response to this and she wrote another, critical of then Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong's style and pay rises for government officials. The public rebuke she received from Goh gave her an instantaneous status as a political pundit. This so-called "Catherine Lim Affair" has been read as an episode establishing "the parameters of political debate" in Singapore, as drawing a line between what authorities considered to be legitimate and illegitimate civil society engagement. However, social commentators have also slighted the incident, with one political scientist, Terence Lee, calling it "gestural" politics or a kind of sideshow. Focus on it detracts attention from more substantial issues such as habeas corpus protection for citizens.

After a hiatus of around six years, Lim's new novel, Miss Seetoh Enters the World, appeared in late 2010. Her public pronouncements on this text suggest a marked departure from the approach taken in earlier books. While female emancipation continues to play an important part in this novel, the book has a greater level of political commentary compared with Lim's previous works. Among other things, it features an authoritarian politician engaged in a tussle with an Indian-Singaporean opponent.

Catherine Lim is divorced and has two children.

Lim, Roseller T.

(1915–76)

Senator, magistrate, Philippines

Roseller Tarrosa Lim (林) has the distinction of being the first Chinese Filipino to be elected a senator. He was a lawyer, master debater, educator, labour leader, prosecutor, fearless fiscalizer, legislator, constitutional convention delegate, magistrate, champion of the masses, and a statesman par excellence. In all the positions he held throughout his life, one principle remained true — people come first.

Lim's career in public life began as a Good Samaritan. One late afternoon, as he passed by the wharf on his way home, he came upon a big man cringing and groaning in pain. When asked, the man said he had just undergone an appendectomy two days ago, but his employer refused to give him any more sick leave. Since he was a cargador (stevedore) of sacks of rice and cement, his fresh wound burst open. Lim brought him to the hospital, then rolled up his sleeves and went straight back to the pier and called for the first labour strike in Zamboanga City, giving birth to Zamboanga's Trade Labor Union, which became the Mindanao Federation of Labor, still existing to date.

Lim did not end the strike until the workers' grievances such as sick leave, minimum wage, overtime pay and an eight-hour workday were met. At the time, no laws were in place to protect labourers from abusive employers. Lim became very popular as a labour leader and this led to his being drafted as the Nacionalista Party's standard bearer for Congress in the 1949 congressional elections. He was pitted against political giants, but Lim won by a landslide. He was thirty-four years old.

Lim was the first and only Zamboangueño to be elected to the House of Representatives for a total of six years. During this time, he authored and co-authored many bills, including House Bill 2524 dividing the Zamboanga Peninsula into Zamboanga del Norte and Zamboanga del Sur (north and south). Two congressional districts meant that Zamboanga would gain more representation and constituents would get more access to funds, as well as spur faster growth and development for the peninsula.

It did not matter to Lim that in doing this he diluted his own influence as the most powerful man in one province. He believed people always came first. As the first duly elected congressman of the newly created Province of Zamboanga del Sur, Lim provided the foundation for political, social, and economic development. Lim contributed to the construction of the highway linking Pagadian and Zamboanga City that cut down commuting time to a few hours instead of days through the perilous waters or the high sierras of the peninsula. The airport in Zamboanga City, which became an alternate international airport, was also his major project.

Other notable laws Lim authored were the Magna Carta of Labor, the Social Security Act, the Philippine Labor Code, the Woman and Child Labor Law, and countless other laws of local and national significance. The awards and distinctions accorded to him by his city, Zamboanga, and other entities attested to his outstanding performance for six years.

From congressman, he became a senator for eight years, the first native son of Zamboanga to be a member of the Upper Chamber and the first Chinese Filipino in a national elective post. It was a feat in itself as this was a time when the ethnic Chinese were discriminated against. Compared with his landslide victory for the Congressional seat, the campaign for the senatorial seat was a steep uphill battle. Given his short surname, Lim had to prove that he was a natural-born Filipino. His success paved the way for others with ethnic Chinese names to hold positions in politics and the government.

He became a member of practically all standing committees, as well as two of the most powerful committees — the Commission on Appointments and the Blue Ribbon Committee. For several years, he was chairman of the Senate Committee on Investigation (Blue Ribbon). As head of the Senate Committee on Labor and Immigration, he was instrumental for the election of the Philippines to the governing bodies of the International Labour Organization (ILO) in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1957, a record first for the country. For that he was cited as Outstanding Senator of the Philippines.

He was acknowledged as the Great Filibuster for delivering a speech for eighteen and a half hours in April 1963. For the entire time, he had to keep standing, leaning on the podium for support. Allowed to take only water to sustain himself, he was prohibited from even going to the men's room – And he did all that for one reason: to prevent Ferdinand Marcos from becoming senate president. He wanted the minority party to control the senate, to fiscalize the majority-party control of the lower House. Although Marcos won, Lim's filibustering efforts were long remembered.

He was elected assemblyman of the Constitutional Convention in 1971 and holds the distinction of being one of the forty-nine delegates, out of more than 250, who did not sign and ratify the so-called Marcos Constitution of 1972. In 1973, Lim was appointed appellate justice of the Court of Appeals, where he became the source of information on labour and criminal laws for his co-justices. He held the position until his death in 1976.

Lim was born 9 February 1915 in Recodo, Zamboanga City. He was the oldest of nine siblings, born to Don Antonio G. Lim of Recodo, Zamboanga City, and Mercedes Robinson-Tarrosa, of Mercedes, Lumbayao, Zamboanga City. His great-grandfather came from Fujian Province. With a brother, they entered the Philippines via Pangasinan and emigrated to Zamboanga City.

Lim graduated valedictorian of his high school class at Ateneo de Zamboanga, finished his bachelor of Laws in 1940 at Silliman University in Dumaguete City, and passed the Bar with 84.7 per cent grade the same year he graduated. Three of his brothers finished law and the other, Roberto, became an agriculturist and was vice-mayor of Zamboanga City from 1968–71. His youngest brother, Rudy, is councillor for the 1st district of Zamboanga City; another brother Atty. Rosegildo, became regional director of the National Bureau of Investigation. A sister, Amparo, became dean of the Spanish Department of the University of Negros Occidental, Recolletos, in Bacolod City.

Lim was married to Amy Mustafa Schuck of Jolo, Sulu, and had five children, namely, Rosamy, Mercibel, Victoria, Roseller, and Amy Rose.

Titles and honours conferred on Lim are: The Great Filibuster, Champion of the Masses, Father of the Social Security Law, Outstanding Congressman for all the six years he served as congressman of Zamboanga, Outstanding Senator for the entirety of his eight-year term, Father of Zamboanga del Sur, and Founding President of Mindanao-Sulu-Palawan Labor Organization. Lim was also among the Balikat ng Bayan (Public Service) Awardees of the Social Security System in October 2007 on the organization's fiftieth anniversary. He was given posthumous recognition as a remarkable and outstanding statesman by the Se Jo Tong Lim (Lim Family Association of the Philippines) at the launch of its commemorative stamps on 15 August 2008 in celebration of its centennial.

Today elected and appointed government officials can look to Lim's life of public service and try to reach the bar of excellence Lim set.

Lim, Samson

(林杉顺, Lin Shanshun, 1949–)
Business leader, Philippines

Samson Lim is known as the "Father of Franchising" in the Philippines for his initiatives in organizing and formalizing a franchising system that caters to the needs of Filipino entrepreneurs and Philippine businesses.

Samson "Samie" Lim was born on 31 January 1949 to Chinese parents, Benito Lim and Peng Giok Co Lim. He initially studied at St Stephen's High School but transferred to San Beda College when he reached Grade 4 because his parents wanted to comply with the spirit of the Naturalization Law. Lim finished high school as the valedictorian of San Beda and graduated cum laude in liberal arts from Ateneo de Manila University. As an acknowledgment of his varied contributions, Lim was named one of the Outstanding Bedans of the Century during the school's centennial celebration.

Lim traces his roots to Chinese craftsmen from Fujian province who came to the Philippines in the 1890s. Long before the World War II, Lim's family was already one of the country's biggest furniture manufacturers and exporters. After the war, his father founded Automatic Appliance Inc. Lim is now president of that highly successful establishment with branches nationwide and is helping the third generation to master the ins and outs of the appliance retail trade. He also founded Blims Fine Furniture, which is now looked up to as a lifestyle trendsetter.

Influenced by his Benedictine and Jesuit education, he developed, in his youth, the credo to do good for the most number of people. This ideal became the impetus for starting his many advocacies aimed at improving the quality of life and releasing the full potential of the Filipino.

One of his fondest advocacies was the Mother's Day Movement, which he started in 1980 to strengthen family values and ties, recognizing that the family is the backbone of society.

He is most known, however, for his advocacy of promoting franchising as a tool for economic and national development. Thanks to his pioneering efforts, Philippine franchising now accounts for about 5 per cent of the country's economy, totalling about 360 billion pesos, creating thousands of businesses, and a million jobs. With more than 1,000 franchise concepts generating 115,000 franchise businesses, the Philippines is second to none in the ASEAN region in terms of franchise concept development.

To help realize his dream of making the Philippines the franchise hub of Asia, he worked to raise the standard of Philippine franchising, and for this purpose, brought the Certified Franchise Executive programme here, making the Philippines the first country outside the United States to offer it. Today, the country has the most number of CFE graduates in Asia.

For his pioneering spirit, Lim earned the moniker, "Father of Philippine Franchising", which has given him a place in Philippine economic and business history. His success as a franchising entrepreneur and propagator has also brought him international recognition and made him a much sought-after speaker in both local and international franchise events. In fact, Lim had the privilege of representing Asia during a panel discussion at the World Franchise Council meeting in Paris in 2009.

Always desiring to serve, Lim accepted an invitation in 1999 to serve as an undersecretary of the Department of Trade & Industry and general manager of the National Development Company, the government's premier investment arm in 1999. Some of the projects he undertook included the creation of a national "farm to fork" supply chain for agricultural products.

For the manufacturing sector, he instituted initiatives to create more value for Philippine products by encouraging the shift from original equipment manufacturing to original design manufacturing, and eventually to original brand manufacturing. He was also a key player in raising the level of the Philippine information technology industry by encouraging venture capitalism, using Silicon Valley and Cyber Jaya as models. For the service sector, he promoted the master plan to revive Clark Airbase, which was devastated by the Mount Pinatubo eruption in 1991, as the Las Vegas of the East long before Macau and Singapore claimed such a distinction. But he is proudest of introducing the Institute of Corporate Governance, the mandate of which is to uphold good corporate governance among government owned and controlled corporations.

A highlight of Lim's career was when he became president in 2007 of Philippine Chamber of Commerce and Industry (PCCI), the largest business organization and the only officially recognized voice of Philippine business. During his presidency, he adopted the theme, "For Love of Country" and called for the unity of the private sector to set and achieve common goals that would help move the country forward. As with his every endeavour, Lim took his volunteer job seriously and pushed for excellence in every project the chamber spearheaded. Being a very output-oriented leader, he marked his term with numerous achievements, not only in terms of advocacy, but also projects that delivered impressive results. One such advocacy was for the country to achieve a 7 per cent gross domestic product (GDP) growth at the end of his term, an ambitious and almost impossible goal at the time, but one that was achieved by his tireless rallying of the private sector, "for love of country", to work with the government in achieving the said goal. Also crucial to the achievement of this goal was Lim's harnessing the full potential of the chamber's 100 chapters all over the country, which stood up to the challenge and did their part in pushing the country's economy to unprecedented heights.

Through his infectious passion and genuine desire to serve, Lim received overwhelming support from various organizations and prominent business personalities who were not previously involved in the chamber movement. And for the first time in the PCCI's history, Lim was able to gather the country's taipans and industry leaders to be the Chamber's Council of Advisers. Impressed by Lim's vision and dedication to bring the Philippine economy to greater heights, a member of the Council of Advisers, Andrew Tan, donated a 2,000-square metre property in McKinley Hill, Taguig, to become PCCI's permanent home — another first in its more than 100-year history.

Aside from franchising, Lim is also deeply involved in raising the level of the country's tourism sector, which he believes could be a catalyst for superb national economic growth. As PCCI chairman of the tourism sector, he spearheaded one of the most successful private sector-led tourism advocacy programmes known as Biztour5, under which he formulated a tourism business template that has been adopted all over Southeast Asia. Since then, Lim has become one of the country's most sought-after tourism speakers from the private sector, promoting tourism as an engine of economic growth.

His programme, BizTour5, which stands for "Business in Tourism", has successfully encouraged a significant number of local and foreign businessmen to invest in the Philippines. His Five As template (Arrival, Access, Accommodations, Attractions, Activities), referring to the five key components forming the tourism chain that also covers the areas where the private sector should invest in, is now being used not only at the national, but also at the community level, and is being taught in several tourism schools.

Encouraged by Lim's innovative ideas, investors have poured about US$8 billion to the tourism sector in the last five years. Recently, as an effort to sustain these gains, he launched the InvesTour programme, which is another advocacy initiative to increase tourism investments. He is also always at the forefront of tourism forums, dialogues, and consultation meetings, discussing important issues that can drastically affect the industry, such as the Tourism Act of 2009. To this day, he passionately pursues his tourism advocacy with clearly no vested interest, but just to help an industry he believes can turn things around for the Philippines.

Lim Seng Kok

(林成国, Lin Chengguo, 1930–2011)
Entrepreneur, business leader, Brunei

Dato Lim Seng Kok was a successful businessman who was also a leader in his field. He was very supportive of the government's initiatives, got involved in national events, and took up important appointments. Lim was a leader of the Chinese community in various respects, with or without specific titles. He was also a philanthropist who donated generously to local organizations.

Lim, a Chinese Hokkien businessman born in 1930 in China, migrated to Brunei with his parents when he was three, and the country became his home. His ancestors originated from Fujian Province, China. He was married to Liaw Kuan (廖娟), and had five children and fifteen grandchildren. Lim only had a few years of primary school education as he started skipping school after the Japanese troops entered Brunei during World War II. Despite not being highly educated, he never stopped pursuing his dream. After the war when he was too old to go back to school, he went to night school to upgrade himself. Besides his native Hokkien dialect, he was also fluent in the Malay language.

Lim was the owner of Chyuan Fa Mini Mart (泉发百货市场) and was also well known for his involvement in property development and the supermarket and coffee shop businesses. In his youth, he tried managing many types of businesses switching from one to another promptly in the changing market environment. In 1962 he took over the managing rights of the first Bata shoes, the Malaysia Frontline Daily News, and Malay textbooks. Lim was always in the forefront in business management. He was the first to hire foreign employees in 1978 when he brought in Indian workers to Brunei to manage his Qing Zhen (清真, Muslim) food business.

Besides being an influential businessman in Brunei, Lim also participated and assisted in organizing many government events. For the sultan of Brunei's sixtieth birthday in 2006, he was appointed co-treasurer of His Majesty's Birthday Committee, co-chairman of Masyarakat Tiong Hua Dan Bunga Api (Tiong Hua Association and Fireworks), co-chairman of Pengutipan Iklan Sempena Sambutan Perayaan Hari Keputeraan (Advertisement Collection for His Majesty's Birthday Celebrations), co-chairman of Cucul Kumpulan Sempena Hari-Hari Perayaan Sambutan Ulang Tahun Hari Keputeraan (Lighting Advertisement group for His Majesty's Birthday Celebrations), treasurer of Tajaan Sempena hari Keputeraan (Sponsorship for His Majesty's Birthday Celebrations), co-chairman of Pesta Kikik Sempena Sambutan Hari Keputeraan (Kite Festival for his Majesty's Birthday Celebrations) and co-chairman of Tajaan Konsert Emas Diraja Sempena Hari Keputeraan (the Gold Royal Sponsorship Concert for His Majesty's Birthday). In addition, for the royal wedding, he was co-chairman of Persembahan Bunga Api (Fireworks Show), vice-chairman of Pengutipan Iklan Dan Sembah Tahniah (Collection for Advertisement and Greetings), co-treasurer of Kerja Tajaan (Work Sponsorship), Malam Jambangan Kasih Mempelai Di Raja and Malam Persembahan Khas Kebudayaan Sempena Istiadat Perkahwinan Di Raja (The Royal Bridegroom "Jambangan Kasih" Night and Special Cultural Performance for the Royal Wedding Ceremony for the Crown Prince).

Lim was also subsequently appointed committee member of The Celebrations of National Day, Pembinaan Tugu Peringatan Sambutan Jubli Perak (the Monument Construction for the Silver Jubilee Commemoration), Pemasaran SEA Games Ke-20 (the 20th SEA Games Marketing), Pelancaran Bendera Kecil Kenderaan Sempena Hari Kebangsaan (launch of the small car's flag for National Day), Tajaan Musabaqah Tilawah Al Quran Belia Tenggara and Majlis Ramah Dan Kesyukuran (Asian Youth Musabaqah Tilawah Al-Quran and Friendly Visit and Thanksgiving Ceremony). He was appointed co-treasurer of Tajaan Sambutan Ulang Tahun

Hari Kebangsaan (National Day Sponsored) and Penyelanggaran Malam Gemilang 55 (The 55th Gala Night Organization); treasurer of Perlawanan Bola Sepak "Trophy Hassanal Bolkiah" ("Hassanal bolkiah Trophy" football match) and Tajaan Korport Tempatan during Persidangan APEC 2000 (Local Corporate Sponsorship during APEC 2000); and co-chairman of Persembahan Bunga Api (Fireworks show).

Lim also held several civil appointments. The sultan of Brunei Darussalam appointed him registrar of Chinese Marriage for the District of Brunei Muara and Temburong for the fourth time for a period of three years, starting 1 January 2010. In 2007 the Ministry of Brunei Internal Affairs appointed him as Inspector of Brunei's prison for women. It was the first time he was appointed to such a position which enable the Brunei Prison inspection committee to carry out its tasks successfully and effectively.

All these active involvements and services to the government earned Lim five prestigious titles bestowed on him by the country's sultan. He was the first to be awarded the Pingat Jubilee Perak (Silver Jubilee Medal in 1992), followed by the Pingat Pengistiharan Kemerdekaan (Independence Proclamation Medal) in 1997, the Bintang PSB (PSB Title) in 1997, Bintang SMB (SMB Title) in 2002 and the Bintang SNB (SNB Title) in 2006.

Lim was also respected in the Chinese community. He served as guarantor, director, and adviser of many Chinese associations. Already in his early years, he was asked to manage the affairs of Chinese families and their heirlooms, a role which he took up till 2011. He was also one of the founders of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce. He helped the one and only government-approved Chinese temple in Brunei, the Brunei Chinese Temple (腾云殿), in its expansion and oversaw the various application procedures required by the government. In 2007 he was elected the sixteenth chairman of the board of directors of the temple. Lim was also one of the guarantors of Chung Hwa Middle School Bandar Seri Begawan (B.S.B) and the Chinese Chamber of Commerce B.S.B.

Lim never forgot his roots in China even though he left the country at a very young age. In 1998, at the call of his Fujian hometown, Lim and a few others began work in establishing the Hokkien Association in Brunei. In 2003 he was elected the third chairman of the Hokkien Association, Brunei, and on 31 December 2010 was bestowed the title, permanent honorary chairman.

Lim was also a philanthropist and donated generously to several charitable organizations such as Tabung Anak-Anak Yatim Daerah Brunei Dan Muara (Fund for Orphans), Tabung Bantuan Mangsa Bencana Tsunami (Aid Fund for Tsunami Victims), Tabung Bantuan Mangsa Banjir Daerah Temburong (Aid Fund for Temburong District Flood Victims), Tabung Amal Jabatan Daerah (Charity Sponsorship for the District office), Tajaan Cedera Kenangan 60 (Sponsorship for the 60th Event of Memories for the Injured) and Tajaan Jubli Perak 25 (Sponsorship for the 25th Silver Jubilee event).

Lim left behind five children — two sons and three daughters. One of his sons, Lim Han Khim (林汉钦), operates a wholesale business; the other, Lim Han Chiong (林汉璋), runs a wide range of businesses which include dealing in new and second-hand cars, insurance, corporate management services, an aquarium and pet shop, and property management. He was also involved in the community through his roles such as chairman of Hokkien Association of Brunei Darussalam, and also vice-chairman and treasurer of Jawatankuasa Persembahan Masyarakat Tiong Hua (Committee of Public Offerings Tiong Hua).

Lim Siew Ming, Arthur

(林少明, Lin Shaoming, 1934–)
Ophthalmologist, artist, philanthropist, Singapore

Arthur Lim Siew Ming was born in Hong Kong on 24 April 1934, the third son of lawyer Richard Lim Chuan Hoe (better known as R.C.H. Lim) and Dora Wong Kit King. He has two older brothers, and a younger sister and brother. Born to wealthy parents, Lim had a privileged upbringing. He was educated at St Andrew's School where he proved to be a prodigious student, topping his class year after year. He completed his secondary education at fifteen and had to wait several years, till he was old enough, to enrol in university. Lim was active outside the classroom. He was an excellent tennis player, captaining the school team and emerging the YMCA national junior champion in 1950. He also played football, rugby, volleyball, and was president of the school's photographic society.

At university, he was active in sports, and was so good at tennis that his coach proposed sending him to Australia for further training so he become a tennis professional. Quite naturally, his lawyer father was not keen on this and took him around to show him how impoverished sports professionals tended to be. This general objection also saw Lim giving up the idea of becoming a professional artist. A gifted artist, he drew, painted, and sketched incessantly since his school days, but did not pursue his passion seriously after he went to medical school. It was only much later in life that he returned to drawing and painting, and collecting artworks.

In 1951 he went to the University of Malaya in Singapore and graduated with an MBBS in 1956 at the age of twenty-two. Just shortly after graduation, on 7 July 1956, Lim married Chan Poh Geok in a glittering society wedding at St Andrew's Cathedral, followed by a reception at the Raffles Hotel. He joined the Singapore General Hospital (SGH) just over a week later to do his housemanship, and his new bride, a second-year science student, returned to her studies at the University of Malaya. After completing his housemanship in 1957, Lim joined the University of Malaya as an assistant lecturer in the Department of Anatomy. He decided to specialize in surgery and subsequently won a two-year government scholarship to go to London to read for the fellowship of the Royal College of Surgeons (FRCS) examinations which he passed in 1962. He is the first Singaporean to obtain the FRCS.

During his undergraduate days, Lim became deeply interested in politics. His father was a member of the Labour Front and deputy speaker of the Legislative Assembly, and just after his graduation, Lim joined the Labour Front as secretary of its Tanglin branch. Controversy broke out when it was suggested that he had breached civil service rules by being involved in politics while he was a houseman at SGH. Lim argued that as he did not enjoy the pension scheme and other privileges and merely received an honorarium, he was not technically a Division 1 officer and thus did not run afoul of the law. The issue became moot as he did not continue in government service but joined the University of Malaya after completing his housemanship. In 1958 he became assistant to the secretary general of the Labour Front. During this time, he learnt that Education Minister Chew Swee Kee had received a "political donation" of S$700,000 from the American Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and that Chief Minister Lim Yew Hock had simply laughed the matter off. Lim decided to leak this information to Lee Kuan Yew, who was then in the opposition. Lee exposed this in the Legislative Assembly, called for a commission of inquiry, and brought down the Labour Front. Lim's father was very upset with him for doing this and did not talk to him for three weeks.

After returning from his stint in London, Arthur Lim rejoined the government service, practising at SGH. He was elected president of the Singapore Government Medical and Dental Officers' Association and served in this capacity till he resigned from government service in 1965 to establish Eye Clinic Singapura (ECS) at Liat Towers. Originally a solo practice, he was later joined by Dr Khoo Chong Yew and Dr Ang Beng Chong. The three partners of ECS have been largely responsible for the rise in the standard of eye care in Singapore. They helped establish the Singapore National Eye Centre (SNEC), the Singapore Eye Research Institute, and the Departments of Ophthalmology at the National University Hospital and the National University of Singapore. In 1967, Lim was elected president of the Singapore Medical Association.

He is a pioneer in the field of ophthalmology, having established one of its earlier private practices. During the 1960s and 1970s, when there was no formalized training for ophthalmologists in Singapore, he personally took students under his wing and taught them at his clinic. Indeed, it was not till 1986 that the Department of Ophthalmology was established at the National University Hospital and the National University of Singapore. When the Singapore National Eye Centre was set up in 1989, Lim became its founding medical director, and was responsible for making it one of the leading eye centres in the world.

He is a prodigious scholar and practitioner and has also authored thirty books and more than 350 scientific papers in medical journals. His The Colour Atlas of Ophthalmology has gone through several editions and translations into eight languages, and has placed Asian ophthalmology on the world map. He serves on the editorial boards of thirteen international journals, and has received nineteen awards from all over the world for his work in promoting ophthalmology. When the Department of Opthalmology was established in 1986, he was appointed clinical professor and head of department. Lim stepped down as head of SNEC in 1998, but remained emeritus senior consultant. Outside Singapore, he has been made honorary professor of the Tianjin Medical University; honorary visiting professor, Beijing Medical University; honorary professor, People's Liberation Army Hospital; and honorary director, International Intra-ocular Implant Training Centre, Tianjin, which was established with $700,000 raised by Lim. It has trained thousands of eye surgeons and restored normal vision to tens of thousands of cataract patients.

A strong believer in alumni giving and education, Lim has been a tireless fund-raiser for his alma mater. As chairman of the National University's Endowment Fund, he raised more than S$80 million for the fund and this has gone into establishing prominent professorships in science, engineering, economics, law, and medicine. In recognition of his exceptional achievements in advancing the interests and raising the standing of his alma mater, NUS presented Lim with the inaugural NUS Distinguished Alumni Service Award in 2005.

In addition to being an outstanding artist (having held several solo exhibitions), Lim is one of the world's great art collectors. Art International magazine has listed him as one of the 200 great art collectors in the world. Besides collecting art for enjoyment, Lim regularly donates parts of his collection to raise funds for charity. He has three children and five grandchildren.

Lim Siew Wai, William

(林少伟, Lin Shaowei, 1932–)

Architect, urbanist, theorist, writer, Singapore

William Lim Siew Wai is a Singapore citizen, was born in Hong Kong on 19 July 1932. He married Lena Lim U Wen in December 1962, five years after their first meeting. They have one daughter, Chiwen (born 1965), and a son, Weiwen (born 1967).

After graduating from the Architectural Association (AA) School in London, the United Kingdom in 1955, he worked for the London County Council for a year in 1956. He then went to the United States and continued his graduate studies at the Department of City and Regional Planning, Harvard University, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, as a Fulbright fellow from 1956 to 1957.

After 1957 he worked exclusively in Singapore and Malaysia as partner in a number of practices. In 1960, with a few former U.K. classmates, he formed the Malayan Architects Co-Partnership (MAC) with Lim Chong Keat and Chen Voon Fee. During this period of great political and social changes, these young architects experimented with modernism, adapting it to local conditions and using it in their pursuit of a national architectural identity. He was the principal architect at Malayan Architects Co-Partnership from 1960 to 1967. MAC won the design competition of the National Trades Union Congress (NTUC) Conference Hall in 1961. This iconic building — symbol of nationalist and socialist ideas of the time — was completed in 1965.

William Lim's professional work includes architecture, urban planning, and development economics. He is a modernist architect, focused on residential, commercial, and public building projects within an urban or historical framework, with a particular interest in the improvement of the urban environment. In his early career as a professional architect, he also developed his passion as a critical thinker. He was involved in the publication of the cultural journal, Monsoon (1961–62) and later, Tumasek (1963–64). In 1965, with other young architects and planners, Lim initiated a discussion group called the Singapore Planning and Urban Research (SPUR). The group later expanded to include other professionals from the private sector and academics from various disciplines. They were not always in agreement with the government's views and approaches towards urban development. They discussed, examined, and publicized many issues relating to architecture, planning, and the urban environment, and organized many seminars. SPUR issued two publications: SPUR 65-67, and SPUR 68-71.

After MAC was disbanded in 1967, Lim, in partnership with Tay Kheng Soon and Koh Seow Chuan, established a new firm called Design Partnership (DP). From 1967 to 1981, this company prospered and produced many noteworthy modernist designs in Singapore, such as the Singapore Telephone Board Exchange (1969) and several large-scale shopping complexes in Singapore and Kuala Lumpur. The first one was the People's Park Complex (1972). This multilevel centre, with innovative atrium spaces and a mix of large and small shops, became a model for many subsequent commercial developments in the city. Other important projects in Singapore included the Golden Mile Complex (1974) and the Tanglin Shopping Centre (first built in 1971 and later rebuilt in 1980), which were also exploring similar themes. His other buildings include St Andrew's Junior College (1978), Ken Thai House (1979), Chapel of the Resurrection (1980). Yeo Hiap Seng Factory (1981), and Merlin Hotel (1981). He also built some low-cost housing projects in Malaysia. Lim left the company in 1981 and DP was later renamed as DP Architects.

During the mid-1970s, after more than a decade of practising modernism, Lim came to the conclusion that modern architecture was critically "sick", suffering from the fatal disease of "dehumanization" and was increasingly alienating. It was neither understood nor appreciated by the people it claimed to serve.

He then set up an independent practice, William Lim Associates, in 1981, working with a group of younger architects. His work continued to evolve in a lively dialogue with current architectural theories, stimulated by his emphasis on group working methods to generate creativity. This company produced some important design works in Singapore and Malaysia from 1981 to 2002, such as: the Bu Ye Tian Singapore River proposal (1982), Unit 8 (1983) in Singapore, and three houses in Emerald Hill Singapore (1982–84). In this period he began to work on conservation and revitalization related projects, such as the change from a wet market into the Central Market shopping, eating, and entertainment centre in Kuala Lumpur (1986, with Chen Voon Fee), and a conversion project from a cinema into the Church of Our Saviour in Singapore (1987). His experimentation in conservation and adaptive reuse continued with Central Square Kuala Lumpur (1990) and the Telok Ayer Market in Singapore (1992). He redefined the role of a community centre in Singapore by some of his public building designs, such as the Tampines North Community Centre (which was later renamed as Pasir Ris South Community Club [1989]) and the Marine Parade Community Club [2000]. Some of his houses, such as the Reuter's House in Singapore (1990), explore themes of South-east Asian tradition and identity. Several other later buildings reveal his experimentation with the postmodernist idiom and his breaking the rule of Modernism, such as the LaSalle-SIA College of the Arts Singapore (1995), The Gallery Hotel in Singapore (2001, with Tangguanbee Architects), the Postmodern 3 house project in Jalan Haji Alias Singapore (2002), and the Postmodern 5-house design proposal (2002). He represented Singapore in the Venice Biennale 2000 with the exhibition titled, "Mohamed Sultan: A Postmodern Phenomenon of Urbanism in Singapore", through a voluntary multimedium collaborative effort.

In 1980 William Lim founded of a small collaborative group called Asian Planning & Architectural Consultants (APAC) with professionals from the region, to examine and develop the direction of architecture and urbanism in the Asian region. Other members include Fumihiko Maki and Koichi Nagashima from Japan, Dr Tao Ho from Hong Kong, Sumet Jumsai from Thailand, and Charles Correa from India. In 1987 he founded the Singapore Heritage Society, a civic group that promotes historical preservation in Singapore, and became its first president for the next ten years until 1997. In 1992 he founded AA Asia, a dialogue forum on design in Asia for graduates and lecturers of the Architectural Association School (his former alma mater). He is also the co-founder and chairman of the Asian Urban Lab (2003).

Willam Lim was conferred a Doctor of Architecture Honoris Causa degree by the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology (RMIT) University in Australia in 2002, and made honorary professor by LaSalle-SIA College of the Fine Arts (Singapore) in 2005. Currently he holds the position of adjunct professor of RMIT University Australia; guest professor of Tianjin University, China; and is a board member of LaSalle-SIA College of the Fine Arts Singapore. He continues writing and giving lectures on a wide range of subjects relating to architecture, urbanism, and culture in Asia, as well as on current issues relating to the postmodern, glocality, and social justice.

A prolific writer, Lim has been continuously publishing his provocative thoughts from 1961 until now. These are some of his important publication works: Equity and Urban Environment in the Third World — with Special Reference to ASEAN Countries and Singapore (1975); Questioning Development in Southeast Asia (1977); Architecture in Private Practice (1977); Community Clubs 1986–99 (1999); An Alternative Urban Strategy (1980); PROCESS Architecture No. 20: Contemporary Asian Architecture (1980); MIMAR 1: Architecture in Development (1981); Cities for People: Reflections of a Southeast Asian Architect (1990); AA Asia Monographs (1995–2000); Contemporary Vernacular: Evoking Traditions in Asian Architecture (1997); Asian New Urbanism (1998); World Architecture: A Critical Mosaic 1900–2000; Volume 10: Southeast Asia and Oceania (1999); Mohamed Sultan: A Postmodern Phenomenon of Urbanism in Singapore (2000); Alternatives in Transition: the Postmodern, Glocality, and Social Justice (2001); Postmodern Singapore (2002); No Limits: Articulating William Lim (2002); Alternative (Post)modernity: An Asian Perspective (2003); *Have You Been Shanghaied? He is the editor of Asian Design Culture (2009) and co-editor of Non West Modernist Past (2011).

Lim Swee Tin

(林天英, Lin Tianying, 1952–)
Award winning poet, Malaysia

Lim Swee Tin is an outstanding and prominent ethnic Chinese poet in the Malaysian Malay literary arena. His father, Lim Swee Poh, migrated from south China and married his mother of Thai origin whose family had settled in Bachok, Kelantan, for generations.

Lim Swee Tin was born in 1952 in Bachok, Kelantan. At an early age Lim attended Tawang National School, a Malay primary school in Bachok, his hometown. When his family moved to Machang, also in Kelantan, Lim continued his education at Machang National School. He later entered secondary school and passed his Malaysian Certificate of Education at Hamzah Secondary School, Machang, Kelantan in 1969, obtaining first grade in the public examination. Lim was then offered a place at Sultan Abdul Halim Secondary School, a prestigious school in Jitra, Kedah. Unfortunately, financial constraints robbed him of his opportunity. He therefore applied to be transferred to a school near to home, the Sultan Ismail Petra Secondary School, Kota Bharu, Kelantan. Once again, due to similar problems, Lim had no choice but to leave the school, a few months later.

In 1972, he took up a course at the Federal Teachers Training College, Penang, majoring in Malay language and modern mathematics. After teaching for fifteen years, he pursued his studies for a bachelor's degree at the Universiti Pertanian Malaysia (currently Universiti Putra Malaysia), majoring in teaching Malay language as a first language, as well as Malay literature. He received his Master of Arts degree in the same university in 1999. By 2004, he obtained a Ph.D. degree in Malay studies. Currently he holds the position of associate professor in the Department of Malay Studies, Faculty of Modern Languages and Communication, Universiti Putra Malaysia.

He began writing in early 1972 and focused on poetry, short stories, and literary essays. Among the writers and books that influenced were Gelombang, a collection by the celebrated Malaysian poet, Usman Awang, and Nyanyi Sunyi, poems penned by Indonesian Amir Hamzah. Studying these collections gave Lim the confidence to produce his own pieces. According to him, reading Indonesian books improved his command of the Malay language vastly. In 1976, the panel for the annual Literary Prize stated that Lim Swee Tin had shown great potential to be a successful non-Malay writer, writing in the Malay language, and would be an important figure in the development of the country's national literature. Furthermore, the panel acknowledged that Lim not only had a good command of the Malay language, but that he had also successfully lifted his language to the language of poetry. Lim's literary works have been published in numerous newspapers and magazines, including Berita Minggu, Jurnal Perisa, Malay Literature, Utusan Zaman, Mingguan Malaysia, Dewan Sastera, Dewan Masyarakat, and Dewan Budaya. His poems have been translated into English, Chinese, and Thai.

To date, Lim has won no fewer than twenty literary prizes, including the ESSO-GAPENA III and IV for the short story category in 1982 and 1985, with the pieces

"Tapah" (Tapah Fish) and "Gok" (Little Hut). In 1983, he won the Puisiputra 2 Award, with his collection of poems under the title Akrab (Intimate), published in 1985. His poetry shows evidence of the influence of Usman Awang's romantic style. His early poems described the people and life in his native hometown in Kelantan. With words of melancholy, he traced his deep feelings of nostalgia and anxiety aroused by the passage of time. Poems such as Dahlia (Dahlia Flower), Tapak-Tapak dan Wagon (Footprints and the Wagon), Perempuan yang Tidur (Woman Asleep), and Seruling dan Orang Tua Itu (Flute and the Old Man) deal with this theme. According to the scholar and poet, Muhammad Haji Salleh, such sensitivities are rarely encountered in Malay poetry.

Lim also won literature prizes organized by Utusan-Public Bank several times in 1986, 1989, 1990, 1992, 1994, 1999 — and the Malaysia literature prize in 1982–83 with the poem entitled Sejarah (History), and in 1988–89 with the poem, Sewaktu Melintasi Kundasang (When Crossing Kundasang). He won third prize in a short story competition by Maybank-DBP with the work Cahaya Lain Di Wajah (Other Light in the Appearance) and fourth prize with the short story, Setelah Kabus Dinihari (After Fog Before Dawn) in 1990. He also won second prize in the short story and poetry writing competition on the occasion of Kuala Lumpur's 100th year with the poem Kuala Lumpur: Kota Sarang Labah-Labah (Kuala Lumpur: City of the Spider's Net). He also won a prize for his poetry in 1989 from ESSO-GAPENA, as well as the Bosnia-Gapena Poetry Writing Prize from Berita Harian, and Utusan Melayu in 1994, and the 2000 Malaysian Formula in the category of short story, with his work, "Dr". Other prizes included the 1982/1983, 1984/1985, and 1988/1989 Malaysia Literary Awards and the 2000/2003 Malaysia Premiere Literary Award. His anthologies of poetry include Eva (1981), Akrab (Intimate, 1985), Menyusur Musim (Gone with the Season, 1991), A Child and Other Poems (1993), Sebuah Fragmen Cinta (A Fragment of Love, 1998, 2000), Nota Waktu (Time Notes, 2000, co-authored with Zurinah Hassan), Nyanyian Sepi (Songs of Loneliness, translated by Chong Fah Hing, 2000), Citra Kurnia (Gifted Favour, 2003), Cakerawala Kemerdekaan (The Sky of Independence, 2008) etc. He has also penned almost 100 anthologies and seven novels for teenagers. His books on language and literature are in the double digits. From 1994–97, Lim was on the board of the weekly newspaper, Watan, as the literary and cultural editor. Lim's success as a writer also allowed him to attend an international symposium, "The Search for a New World Culture for the 21st Century: Asian Literary Perspective", in Washington D.C., the United States. He also represented Malaysia at the "Four Leading Poets from South East Asia", poetry reading at the Royal Festival Hall in London. His many years of efforts that began with his maiden poetic works in 1973 were rewarded when Institute of Language and Literature Malaysia (DBP) nominated him to represent Malaysia at the Southeast Asian Write Award in Thailand in 2002.

Lim Teck Hoo

(林德浦, Lin Depu, 1910–99)
Entrepreneur, community leader, Brunei

Pehin Dato Paduka Temenggong Lim Teck Hoo was a successful entrepreneur and banker. He was also a philanthropist especially towards education. His contributions to society were recognized by the community and nation, winning him many titles and awards from the government.

Lim was born in 1910 in Jinmen (金门), Taiwan. His grandfather, Lim Zhen Zao, was a businessman renowned for his shipping business in Xiamen. He owned eighteen vessels, which, at the time, a very prosperous man. However, Lim's father, Lim Zhao Ying (林昭应), was involved in the farming business instead, and his wealth considered average at that time.

At the age of nine, Lim's father passed away, and his mother became the sole breadwinner in the family. She earned a living by making and selling clothes and shoes from morning till night. Being a considerate child, Lim assisted his mother by selling his mother's products during the day. At night he would do his own revision for his studies. In 1932 he migrated to Brunei, where he met his fellow countryman, Goh Siong Kee (吴祥记), owner of Chop Leong Soon (隆顺), who employed him as his shop assistant for $12 a month. Lim worked for four years in Chop Leong Soon to save enough money for his own business. He was a young and very talented man in many ways. While working, he studied the commercial situation of the country and slowly mastered the art of business operations.

In 1934 he went back to his hometown, Jinmen for his marriage. Afterwards, he returned to Brunei with his wife and established a company called Chop Bee Seng (美成) with his friends. In 1942, during the Japanese Occupation, Lim donated funds to support anti-Japanese organizations. He was arrested by the Japanese and kept in custody at the Japanese base camp for interrogation. Fortunately for him, he escaped death. He was assisted by a Japanese businessman, Xiong Qi Ying, who saw something in him and later got him released by the Japanese army.

After the war, Lim became the sole proprietor of Chop Bee Seng. Although he did not receive any formal education, his business flourished exponentially and expanded internationally. In 1962 he established a company in Singapore called You Li Hong (友利行) and acted as agent for a renowned line of canned food and drink products known as Yeo's, which gained popularity in Brunei.

In 1970 Lim established a share trading limited company in Taiwan through which he imported cement, steel, raw materials, food products, miscellaneous goods, and artworks from Taiwan. Additionally, he established Bee Seng Shipping Limited Company (美成船务贸易公司) in Hong Kong through which he purchased ready-made wholesale clothes for export to overseas markets.

Lim was also one of the founders of the World Overseas Chinese Banking Corporation in Taiwan. He was elected chairman of the Overseas Chinese Trust Group, which is a subsidiary of the bank.

Lim was a prominent and reputable figure in Brunei's Chinese community, greatly respected in his lifetime and even now for his significant contribution to maintaining peace in the community. He had been a voluntary arbitrator since 1958 for the Chinese community and had helped solve many issues through settlements out of court for example. A devoted Taoist-Buddhist , he was involved in the establishment of Brunei's largest Chinese temple, the Tokong Cina Temple, in the heart of Brunei's capital, which survived the World War in 1940s, and is still standing firm and erected, maintaining its former glory. In addition, Lim was also involved in the establishment of the first Chinese school in Brunei, the Chung Hwa Middle School (CHMS), Bandar Seri Begawan (BSB), of which was chairman for forty-three years. During his tenure as chairman of CHMS, the school expanded vastly and became the largest Chinese school in Brunei. Before he joined the school, the school only offered education up to the primary level. It was only after his involvement that the school expanded to accommodate secondary facilities. During his tenure, he ensured that students were all provided with first-class education and facilities necessary for their development. And it was for this purpose that many new facilities were built. He led many of these projects, donating vast sums of money that facilitated the projects that have resulted in the CHMS we see today.

He was a well known philanthropist, who was very involved in charity and community projects, mainly in the following schools: Chung Hwa Middle School (BSB), Chung Ching Middle School (Seria), Chung Hua Middle School (Kuala Belait), Pai Yuek School (Temburong), Chung Hwa School (Tutong), Chung Hwa School (Labi), Chung Lian School (Sungai Liang), and Chung Hwa School (Kiudang). In 1996, he established Lim Teck Hoo Holdings, which has made annual donations worth $80,000 to Chinese schools to facilitate their developments.

Lim not only earned recognition in the Chinese community, but also in Brunei society as a whole. In August 1958, he was bestowed the "Yang DiMuliakan Pehin Kapitan Cina Kornia Diraja" title by the former sultan of Brunei, the late Omar Ali Saifuddien Sa'adul Khairi Waddien. In May 1996, he was promoted and bestowed the title "Yang DiMuliakan Pehin Datu Temanggong" by the current sultan, Haji Hassanal Bolkiah Mu'izzaddin Waddaulah. Lim had been actively involved in the country's national events, one example of which was his being a member of the sultan's birthday celebrations committee for forty years. For his contributions in the sultanate, he was bestowed various state honours by the sultan, for example on 23 September 1961, he was awarded the Omar Ali Saifuddien Medal. In 1968, he received the Sultan Hassanal Bolkiah Medal and on 15 July 1982, which was the sultan's birthday, he was given the Darjah Seri Paduka Mahkota Brunei Yang Amat Mulia (The Most Honourable Order of Seri Paduka Mahkota Brunei) 3rd Class SMB. Seven years later, in 1989, he received the Darjah Seri Paduka Mahkota Brunei Yang Amat Mulia (The Most Honourable Order of Seri Paduka Mahkota Brunei) 2nd Class DPMB, and on 23 May 1998, he was bestowed the Pingat Jasa Kebaktian (Meritorious Service Medal).

Lim passed away in 1999.

Lim Tong Hai

(林东海, Lin Donghai, 1969–)
Footballer, Singapore

A top footballer over the years, defender Lim Tong Hai, who was born on 14 May 1969 in Singapore, excelled in a sport in which the Chinese in Singapore did not dominate. He was popular both on and off the field. As a player, he not only shone in terms of skills, but was well liked by coaches, teammates, and fans for his exemplary conduct. Off the field, this good-looking athlete made his mark, with media coverage in both sports and lifestyle publications. His involvement in community projects and youth outreach initiatives also enabled him to make an impact beyond sports.

Lim was born on 14 May 1969 in Singapore. His father was born in Malacca and used to work as a taxi driver. Educated at Jalan Eunos School (1976–80), Temasek Primary (1981), and Tanjong Katong Technical Secondary (1982–85), Lim, who is married with two children, showed glimpses of his athletic talent as a student. But it was in the Singapore Polytechnic that he came into prominence. For example, in the late 1980s, he won a tertiary scholarship from the Jurong Town Football Club and was presented with an ESSO Sports-Scholar Award for doing well in both sports and studies. The polytechnic also recognized him with several sports awards, including the title of "Sportsman of the Year" 1990. Such recognition may not yield much in terms of tangible benefits, but was particularly encouraging as Singapore at the time did not place much emphasis on sports.

Highlights of his young career at this point included successful stints at clubs such as Tyrwhitt Soccerites Football Club and Jurong Town Football Club. In the early 1990s, he played for the Singapore Armed Forces Sports Association, serving as its captain in 1992 — an early sign of his potential for leadership. A highlight came that year when he was named runner-up for the Young Player of the Year award. The following year marked a breakthrough for him. He was part of the team from the Geylang International Football Club which became league champion. By then he had made an impact beyond club football and was a key member of the national team. For example, in 1989, he tasted SEA Games success when Singapore clinched a silver medal in Kuala Lumpur. That was also the year he took part in the World Cup qualifiers in Korea. Another SEA Games medal, a bronze, came in Manila in 1991.

These assignments, as well as his involvement in the M-League between 1988 and 1992, soon turned him into a household name, given the popularity of football in the region. Further success at the SEA Games — a popular multisports competition among Southeast Asian countries held every two years — meant more recognition. In the 1993 SEA Games, he was part of the Singapore team that won a bronze medal on home soil. There were also low moments though, such as when he "scored" for an opposing side by mistake and incurred the anger of fans. But he showed grace under pressure, and resilience and determination to prove his critics wrong. There was a bronze medal again for him and his team mates in the 1995 SEA Games in Chiangmai.

Other notable assignments in the fruitful 90s included the Asian Cup and the Merlion Cup in Singapore (1992), World Cup qualifiers in Qatar (1993), the Tiger Cup in Singapore (1996), World Cup qualifiers in Lebanon (1997), and the Dunhill Cup in Vietnam (1999). One significant moment for him was when he captained the national team for the 1998 Tiger Cup qualifiers in Singapore. Playing at the national level meant higher visibility for this personable athlete who was a favourite among the media and fans. In a small but telling sign of his impact beyond sports, he was on the cover of 8 Days in the 1990s, arguably Singapore's most influential entertainment magazine.

Lim, whose favourite club is Liverpool, grew up as a sportsman at a time when Singapore was a place where sports did not receive much support. Parents, schools and society in general emphasized academic qualifications and career advancement in the traditional sense. Making a living as an athlete was not considered an ideal choice, especially for athletes with a good educational background. It was in this context that Lim, who graduated from the Singapore Polytechnic with a diploma in mechanical engineering in 1989, made the difficult decision to be a professional footballer. The road less travelled was certainly filled with obstacles, but his passion for football kept him going.

Notably, he made his mark in several clubs, a reflection of the fact that he was "in demand" in the sports market. In 1993, he was part of the Geylang International Football Club which became league champion. Between 1996 and 2001, he enjoyed success with the Tanjong Pagar United Football Club where he rose to become team captain and assistant coach. The club did well in several major tournaments such as the Pools Cup and the President's Cup. Lim joined the Geylang United Football Club again in 2002 and became its captain in 2003. Highlights for the club included its runner-up finish in the league in both years. With success at both the club and national levels came more awards. For example, he was named winner in The Straits Times/Tiger Beer Mr Personality award in 2000. That year, he was also a nominee for the "Footballer of the Month" award.

Significantly, Lim's football career was marked by not only success on the field, but also by various kinds of public appearances. Over the years, he was featured in advertisements in The Straits Times, Lianhe Zaobao, Xin Min Daily News, and The New Paper. He also appeared on television, including Channel 8 and Channel News Asia, for various programmes. Among such appearances, highlights included a promotional advertisement on The World Cup for M1-Motorola in 1998, and TV12's feature on football entitled, "It's a Beautiful Game" in 2000. Reflecting his reach, he also appeared in entertainment shows and was involved in product endorsements for names such as Mizuno, Nike, PUMA, Intra Motors, and Diadora.

Lim, who names Bryan Robson as his favourite player, entered another chapter of his love affair with football when he hung up his boots as a player to move into coaching. He joined the Geylang United Football Club in 2004 to focus on youth development. Among other things, he played a key role in the identification of young talents. After a stint with the club as assistant coach for the S-League, he became head coach in 2007. Later that same year, he was made the club's head of football division and assistant general manager. Then in 2009, he was promoted to the position of general manager at Geylang United, a title he still holds today. Reflecting his popularity even after his playing days, he was featured in a McDonald's TV commercial and chosen as a spokesman for Adidas.

Overall Lim has set the trend for other athletes with his smooth transition from playing to coaching and then management. An active supporter of initiatives which involve sportsmen and other personalities in fund-raising activities for charity, he has shown that athletes can make a difference way beyond the sporting arena long after their playing days are over.

Lim, Vicente Podico

(1888–1945)
Army general, Philippines

Vicente P. Lim (林) was the first U.S. West Point-trained Filipino soldier and head of the 41st Infantry Battalion of USAFFE (United States Army Forces in the Far East), as well as a charter member of the Boy Scouts of the Philippines.

Vicente P. Lim was only ten years old when the First Republic was founded in Malolos, Bulacan. When he was fourteen years of age, Lim was said to have organized a group of children his age to serve as couriers for the forces of General Miguel Malvar who was then operating in Calamba, Laguna. This was a sort of baptism-of-fire for the young Lim into guerrilla tactics, which were successful in the Philippine Revolution against the Spaniards, but proved to be unsuccessful in the fight against the Americans.

From his hometown, Lim transferred to Tanauan, Batangas, where he completed his primary grades and earned a ten-dollar gold coin for excellence in mathematics. He then went to the Philippine Normal School, a pre-college institution which ran a programme for teacher training and preparatory courses for those intending to enrol in law, medicine, nursing, or agriculture. When he finished taking education courses, he taught at a school in Sta Cruz, Laguna. After a year, he returned to the Philippine Normal School to take up further studies. With his impressive academic performance and physical stamina, he caught the attention of his supervisory teachers, who encouraged him to try it out at the United States Military Academy at West Point. He heeded their advice, took the entrance test, and emerged in second place among the takers — a very impressive feat for the first ever Filipino graduate of the academy.

At the West Point Academy, Lim was tagged and known as the "Cannibal" because of his darker complexion, imperfect diction, and also because the Americans at West Point were not familiar with the Philippines. However, he excelled in mathematics, science, and the Spanish language and did fairly well in military engineering courses, as well as improved his English proficiency. Moreover, because of his skill in fencing, he qualified to join the Broadsword Squad, and was later chosen to represent the academy in competitions. Among the 133 cadets who entered West Point in 1910, only 107 graduated. Lim ranked 77th in the batch. When he graduated on 12 June 1914, he was promoted to second lieutenant of the Philippine Scouts and went to Europe on the advice of Philippine President Manuel L. Quezon.

He returned to the Philippines via the Trans Siberian Railway when World War I broke out. On his return, he joined the Philippine Scouts and then the Philippine Army. He took serious interest in scouting because he truly believed in character building, and had the conviction that practical training develops responsible citizenship and, without such training for the youth it would be useless to carry out the policy of the government. Lim once said: "If you and I do not stand firm in defending the principles which we preach, how can we expect our junior officers to be loyal to us in our endeavor to faithfully fulfill our oaths of office."

Lim often clashed with General Douglas MacArthur, who was in command of the Philippine Scouts Brigade. The first time was in 1922 when he rejected MacArthur's reassignment of him from Fort McKinley to Corregidor for the simple reason that MacArthur wanted free living quarters for incoming American officers. In the end, MacArthur had to give in to Lim and let him stay at the Fort.

Lim held views contrary to MacArthur regarding officers' corps training. While MacArthur wanted to concentrate on training reserve forces, Lim insisted that an unprepared officers' corps would be subject to abuse and corruption. A distorted utang na loob (debt of gratitude) crept into the corps. Memberships and promotions were done on friendships or sense of gratitude for deeds done. Lim wrote in his letters to his sons: "… the minute you put in favourites, relatives, and compadres [friends or colleagues], then this army will bring down the government…No matter how crooked and weak the President," Lim said," … as long as the army is strong, honest, and free from politics, the nation will stand".

Lim endured the holocaust of the Bataan Death March, which involved the forced transfer of 75,000 American and Filipino prisoners-of-war from the Bataan peninsula to prison camps almost 100 kilometres away. The march was characterized by physical abuse and murder, and, with no rest and little food, about 15,000 perished in the trek, and around 25,000 more would die in the prison camps in the next four months.

Lim was held prisoner at Capas, Tarlac. He then lived with Clemente Hidalgo on Calle Dominga and carried out underground resistance against the Japanese. On 6 June 1942 he was admitted to the Philippine General Hospital for treatment of injuries and confined himself at the Cancer Institute of the hospital. Although he recovered quickly and kept fit, he hid this fact as a tactic and so as not to alarm the Japanese who knew of his hospital confinement. He received food from friends who came all the way from Pangasinan, approximately 230 kilometres from the hospital. From where he was warded, he led the guerilla resistance forces of the island of Luzon and conducted secret guerrilla activities.

He left Manila for Batangas in an attempt to escape and follow orders from General MacArthur to join him in Australia. However, the batel (small boat) carrying him from Maricaban waters to Verde Islands was intercepted by a Japanese patrol boat. He was held prisoner at Fort Santiago and then transferred to Bilibid prison where he was heavily tortured. Like many of those who perished in 1945, his remains were never found. General Lim is listed in the Tablets of the Missing at the Manila National Cemetery and was awarded, posthumously, the Legion of Merit and the Purple Heart.

Manila Mayor Alfredo Lim also put up a monument in Vicente Lim's name along Roxas Boulevard, near P. Ocampo Street and close to Century Park Hotel, where Lim's birthday is celebrated.

Among the palpable legacies left by Vicente Lim to his family and Filipinos is the house he built in Vito Cruz Street, now known as Pablo Ocampo Street, in Manila. He was an army major when he and wife Pilar — who had been living with her mother in Magdalena Street in Trozo, Manila, previously — made it their family home with their four sons in 1931. This house remains standing to this day, having survived World War II.

Before the war, Lim's house was filled with activity. He conducted meetings to build an army for the Philippines while his wife was active with the Red Cross, the Philippine Girl Scouts, and the National Federation of Women's Clubs. The house has since been a venue for historical family events, including birthdays, weddings, loved ones falling ill, and deaths and a witness to the growth of the Lim clan to about a hundred.

Lim was born in Calamba, Laguna, the same birthplace of Philippine national hero Jose P. Rizal, on 24 February 1888. He married Pilar Hidalgo, one of the founders of the Girl Scouts of the Philippines and Centro Escolar University's third president, who steered the university during the reconstruction and normalization of school operations after World War II.

Vicente Lim was the third child of Jose Ayala Lim-Yaoco's four children. His mother, Antonia Podico, was a Chinese mestiza while his father was a full-blooded Chinese whose hair was still in a queue when he immigrated to the Philippines. His siblings — Joaquin, Olympia, Basilia — like most Chinese-Filipinos who migrated to the Philippines, identified themselves as Filipinos rather than Chinese. His family became friends with the family of Jose Rizal, the country's national hero.

Lim's parents ventured into agriculture as their primary means of livelihood, like most migrants from China did. They leased a land owned by the Dominican order, such as a rice lands in Barrios Lecheria and Real, and sugarland in Barrio Baranda, all in the province of Laguna. Due to continuous unfriendly relationships between tenants and landlords on the issue of increasing rental rates, they were soon evicted from their lands, just like that of the Rizal's family. As a result, they had to find other means to survive. Subsequently, Lim's father then opened and managed a retail store which was later continued by his wife, Antonia, when he died in 1897, a year after the Philippine Revolution.

Perhaps Vicente Lim's greatest legacy is his family and its succeeding generation, with some members of being prominent in the field of business, journalism, education, and public service.

General Vicente Lim's ideals on democracy rings true to this day. In a letter dated July 16, 1940, he wrote: "The principal defect of our national defense is not the training or lack of finances, but the great and dangerous defect of democracy which has been implanted into the minds of the Filipino people. We have a nationally wrong conception of democracy. Our democracy in the Philippines is unilateral. It is only for benefit, for freedom, for rights, and only for the comfort and happiness of each individual member of the nation. That is the common belief, and I venture to say 99.9 per cent of our people believe in that kind of democracy. They do not know their obligations, their duties, and the sacrifices that they should give to the state which is the relative counterpart of the amount of personal democracy he should indulge. The two should balance. We do not have yet in the minds of our people the thought that in order to enjoy the spirit of democracy they should give their lives and property to the state…"

Lim Yew Hock

(林有福, Lin Youfu, 1914–84)
Politician, Singapore

The late Lim Yew Hock is alternatively remembered as the man who led the all-party delegation that won internal self-government for Singapore, and the man whom the People's Action Party (PAP) dubbed a "colonial stooge" for alienating the Chinese-educated populace in the 1950s. While his so-called alienation of the Chinese-educated population was part of his suppression of the communist movement, which at the time, drew its support from the Chinese-educated members of society, it must be acknowledged that Lim's method of quelling the communist-instigated trade union and student union unrests in the 1950s helped allay British fears for Singapore and contributed greatly towards overcoming British reluctance to grant the island state self-governance. By all accounts, Lim was in reality a diffident man, who had power and authority thrust upon him when the Labour Front coalition government of 1955–56, led by David Marshall, crumbled on failing to secure self-governance for Singapore.

Lim, who was born on 15 October 1914 in Singapore, was a former student of Raffles Institution under a four-year scholarship and graduated with a school certificate in 1931. However, his father's sudden death meant that he could not carry out his plan to read law in England. Instead he found employment as a clerk, and through much self-study, he eventually became a confidential stenographer with Cold Storage until 1947 after which he came to be involved in public affairs. These experiences taught Lim that one's plans could be thwarted by unforeseen circumstances and that it would behove him to have contingency plans. He learnt that he had to "make do" and put aside his personal ambitions, and do what needed to be done to clear up the problem at hand. This trait of his shone through when he took over the Labour Front coalition in 1956.

His experience in working as a stenographer and his dedication to his work made him an ideal candidate for the post of secretary general of the Singapore Clerical and Administrative Workers' Union (SCAWU), and he assumed the post in 1946. He was so successful in his tenure as secretary general that he soon rose to become SCAWU's president in 1950. By 1948, he had come to the notice of the Legislative Council and was appointed to represent trade unions as an unofficial member of the Legislative Council. In assuming that position, he came to the forefront of the labour movement in Singapore, and went on to become a founding member of the Singapore Trade Union Congress in 1951, as well as a founding member of the Labour Front in 1954, and president of the Singapore Labour Party. Lim's links with the labour movement in Singapore secured him the post of finister for labour and welfare under the elected government of David Marshall in 1955. However, he was thrust into the political spotlight when David Marshall, Singapore's first chief minister, failed to gain full independence from British rule. Marshall's failure was in part due to his inability to quell trade unions' and student unions' strikes, and the shadow of the communist threat hovering over them. Although Lim claimed that he did not want the job when it was apparent that Marshall would resign from his position as chief minister, Lim demonstrated that he had learnt from his predecessor's mistakes and tried his best to sort out the resultant societal mess of trade unions' and student unions' strikes.

To his credit, Lim did try to present as favourable a picture of Singapore as possible to the British to increase the country's chances of self-rule. He did so by coming down on anti-colonial activists and communists, banishing two Chung Cheng High School teachers, and dissolving the Chinese Middle School Students' Union. He even went as far as to adopt forceful measures for dealing with the October 1956 Chinese Middle School riots. In so doing, he was able to garner the support of the British governor and the commissioner of police to end the riots through the deployment of tear gas and helicopters. He also moved to detain many key pro-communist union leaders in the PAP under the Public Security Act. The British looked on his strong stance against the unrests with approbation and were so impressed with the local government's handling of internal security that Lim's all-party delegation to the Merdeka talks of 1956–58 successfully won Singapore a new constitution granting it internal self-rule.

On gaining self-rule for Singapore, Lim continued to purge Singapore society of communist elements and anti-colonial activists (many of whom came from the Chinese-speaking population). However, this alienated the Chinese-speaking electorate. Undeterred, he dissolved the Labour Front and formed the Singapore People's Alliance (SPA). Additionally, he also became unpopular when Christmas Island switched from being administered by Singapore to having an Australia administration in 1957. The loss of support from the sizeable Chinese-speaking population there and the loss of Christmas Island itself culminated in his eventual political defeat to the PAP.

Despite these setbacks, Lim managed to retain his seat in the Legislative Assembly by winning the Cairnhill constituency, instead of running in the Havelock constituency. This proved to be a tactical win for him when he beat the incumbent David Marshall. As the years went by, his loss of political credibility became more apparent. Where his SPA won only four seats in the 1959 elections against the PAP's forty-three, by 1963, his party failed to win any seat. Thus, Lim left politics and Singapore for Malaysia where he was appointed Malaysia's high commissioner to Australia in 1964, a post he served even after the separation of Singapore from Malaysia when he became a Malaysian citizen and worked for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs until his retirement in August 1968. Whilst serving the Malaysian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Canberra in Australia, he mysteriously disappeared nine days in 1966, creating something of a public stir. The reasons for this nine-day disappearance were never uncovered.

In later years, he left Malacca and converted to Islam with the name Haji Omar Lim Yew Hock. He died in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, on 30 November 1984 and was buried in Mecca. While he later became a Malaysian citizen, his legacy in Singapore lives on. Indeed, the ruling PAP has adopted one of his tactics in dealing with political opposition it deems "disruptive". Lim Yew Hock's strong-arm tactics of imprisoning suspected communists and disruptive elements of society under the Public Security Act continues to exist to this day in Singapore as the Internal Security Act. Like its predecessor, the Internal Security Act allows the government to detain the "undesirable" and "disruptive" political elements of society indefinitely without trial. In fact, a few political personalities antithetical to the PAP were imprisoned in the 1970s and 1980s under the Internal Security Act for so-called pro-Marxist or pro-communist leanings. Thus, Lim Yew Hock may be said to have shaped one defining aspect of Singapore's national security mindset.

(戴秀容, Dai Xiurong, 1906–2001)
Champion of Women's Rights, educator, Philippines

White Castle whisky, Napoleon V.S.O.P. brandy, and Ginebra Kelly, have become household names for the local liquor scene. These are among the thirty different products of Destileria Limtuaco, the oldest distillery in the Philippines, established in 1852. James Limpe was not the founder of Destileria Limtuaco, but the one who introduced modern management to it and developed the company. Today, the fifth generation of Limpes, headed by Olivia Limpe-Aw, granddaughter of James Limpe, is steering the company to face the challenges of the twenty-first century. Appreciating its heritage, the company's current management has maintained the wisdom gained from the past generations while utilizing modern advantages and gaining a contemporary edge in the industry. It has reengineered its company into a streamlined organization, computerized most of its operational systems, and utilizes modern marketing and production techniques. However, it has remained true to the integrity and quality of Limtuaco's products.

Founder Lim Tua Co (林火炭) was born in 1817 to a merchant family in Xiamen, China, who sailed to the Philippines in 1850 at the age of thirty-six. He was a Mandarin who had passed the Jinshi imperial examination in 1843. With the secret formula for a medicinal wine that has been with his family for five generations, Lim set up a distillery in Binondo and began manufacturing Vino de Chino, a bittersweet medicinal brew derived from a variety of Chinese herbs. This wine was known to build up stamina like today's energy drinks and became immensely popular with the Filipino public. The blend was given the brand name, Si Hok Tong (赐福堂), and because of its popularity, the word sioktong became part of the Filipino vocabulary referring to any local medicinal brew.

Lim Tua Co became an acknowledged leader of the Chinese-Filipino business community. He converted to Christianity, was baptized, took on a Christian name, and became known as Don Bonifacio Limtuaco. His son, Carlos, was groomed to take over his business and, rare for Chinese-Filipino families at that time, Carlos finished his bachelor of arts degree from Ateneo de Manila University. Carlos, however, died in 1889, two years after his father's death. Both died while visiting China.

A nephew, Lim Chay Seng (林再生), took over the helm of the company in 1926. Lim Chay Seng pumped additional capital into the distillery and production changed from the home-brewed sioktong to other western-type liquors. In 1937, Lim Chay Seng's son, James Limpe, a graduate from the University of Washington in Seattle, introduced modern management practices into the business. During World War II, James Limpe shut down the operations to cut off Japanese soldiers' access to liquor. He was one of the prisoners-of-war in the infamous Fort Santiago Japanese concentration camps and had been sentenced to be imprisoned for twenty years but was granted an amnesty on the occasion of the Japanese emperor's birthday.

After the war, Limpe quickly rebuilt the company and resumed the business in 1945. He also taught at Philippine Chinese High School and served as the English supervisor at the Anglo Chinese School, the oldest Chinese school in the Philippines, established in 1899. He and his wife, Teh Siu Yong had seven children, three of whom are in Manila. Limpe passed away on 27 June 1982 at the age of eighty-two.

It is a tribute to the competence and versatility of James Limpe that, while he concentrated his time and resources on education, he never neglected his pursuits in commerce and industry. He was chairman of the board of Destileria Limtuaco & Co., Inc., Traders Insurance and Surety Company, Sampaguita Garments Company, Traders Commercial & Credit, Inc, Traders Travel Corporation, and Traders Air Cargo. He was also the vice-chairman of Equitable Banking Corporation, director of Lacson College, and Director of the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association, Inc.

In 1958, his eldest son, Julius (林俊瑶), a business management graduate from the University of Indiana, took over the business and introduced new formulas and ageing processes that have become part of company's closely guarded secrets. The master blender propelled the distillery to its present prominent position in the liquor industry.

Today Destileria Limtuaco's more than thirty different products include local blends and foreign brands manufactured locally under licence. The ISO-certified company now has three bottling, processing, and ageing plants which produce the largest stock of ageing spirits in oak barrels in the Philippines. In 1991 the company also set up a subsidiary for the manufacture and sale of Rainforest Mineral Water, a brand of water that has also become a leader in the bottled water industry.

The saying that behind a successful man is always a supportive woman is quite true for James Limpe. He would not have been able to recover swiftly from the ravages of war if not for his wife, Teh Siu Yong Limpe (戴秀容). With Limpe, the head of the family, imprisoned, it was largely through her abilities, perseverance, and indefatigable efforts that the family not only survived the rigours of wartime, but even extended help to others, especially their workers. Teh lived a well fulfilled life and was well loved and remembered in the Tsinoy community for being a pioneer in promoting the rights and welfare of Chinese women and children.

Teh was born on 17 May 1906 in Nan'an, Fujian, China. She had a cosmopolitan upbringing, having graduated from the famous Jimei University in Xiamen, China, and pursued further studies at the Nanjing Normal School ran by Protestant missionaries. Early in her youth, she became exposed to women's rights, especially equal rights to an education.

In 1924 she came to the Philippines with her uncle, Teh Kim Hua (戴金华). Under the liberal policies of the Americans, her passion for education and women's rights flourished. She taught at The First Girl's School and, at the young age of twenty-six, with the financial support of local Chinese businessmen, helped establish the Pasay Chung Hua High School in 1932. When the family relocated to Caloocan City in 1938, she established York Lin Chinese School at the age of thirty-two. These two schools continue to provide bilingual education today.

With the wife of Dee Ching Chuan, she joined Chinese-Filipino war refugee relief operations, charitable activities, and various undertakings for women welfare through Auxiliary Relief Organization-Philippine Chapter (forerunner of present Filipino-Chinese Women's Association) during Sino-Japanese War in China and until the end of the Japanese invasion in the Philippines.

After the war, with her initiative as chairperson, she helped establish the Manila Women's Vocational School in 1947, where women are taught skills such as cooking, sewing, food preservation, and household management.

In 1952 she formally organized the Filipino-Chinese Women's Association to focus on women's welfare. The group organized socio-civic projects and relief operations such as the one for the victims of a big fire that razed the entire Benavidez and Gandara Streets in Binondo, Manila in 1964 and also another after an earthquake toppled the Ruby Tower in 1968. The women's group is now headed by daughter, Betty Limpe Ngo.

In 1972 Teh founded the Filipino-Chinese Home for Aged Women. A two-storey dormitory was constructed on a 5,000-square metre lot in Malinta, Valenzuela, Bulacan, through generous donations from community leaders.

Teh has been a recipient of countless awards for her charitable and meritorious work, including the Serviam Cross Award, the highest award to lay people given by the Archdiocese of Manila through then Archbishop Jaime Cardinal Sin. Due to her exemplary leadership, courage, and commitment, she served as president of the Filipino-Chinese Women's Association until she passed away on 6 May 2001 at the age of ninety-five.

Lin Dieyi

(林蝶衣, 1907–2004)

Pioneer Chinese writer, Thailand

Lin Dieyi was one of the pioneers of Thai-Chinese literature and a member of one of the most famous and earliest Chinese literary societies in Thailand, the "Wandering Society" (彷徨学社). He published many works as a member of the society and his new-style poems are the most well known of his works. He also published the first poetry collection in the history of Chinese literature in Thailand in 1933. In 1998, the Association of Chinese Writers in Thailand organized a seminar to commemorate his achievements in literature and the seventieth anniversary of the beginning of his career as a writer.

Lin was born in 1907 in Phra Nakhon Si Ayutthaya Province of Thailand. He completed his primary education at Juemin School (觉民学校) in the same province and then went to China for his secondary education. On graduation, he returned to Thailand, where he worked as a schoolteacher and news editor. He taught in a Chinese school in Chonburi Province and was principal of Xingmin School (醒民学校) in Phitsanulok Province. He was one of the editors of the Zhong Guo Bao (《中国报》) when the newspaper was newly founded in 1938. He was also the editor of the Zhong Yuan Bao (《中原报》) before the Second World War broke out. When Zhong Yuan Bao was taken over by Japanese military forces, he left the paper and escaped to Laos.

After the war, Lin continued his career in education and the media. He was the first editor of the Da Tong Zhou Kan (《大同周刊》) and one of the founding editors of the Yi Bao (《译报》). In the 1950s, he worked for various Chinese newspapers, such as, the Sin Sian Yit Pao and Shi Jie Ri Bao (《世界日报》), and also taught Thai and Chinese in several schools. Later he quit newspaper work and began writing subtitles for movies.

Lin started writing poems in the early 1920s. He wrote these and other literary works during his free time and submitted them to newspapers, hoping they would be published. Through this process, he got to know Fang Xiuchang (方休畅), a pioneer of Thai-Chinese literature and the founder of the Wandering Society. During the late 1920s and 1930s, literary societies were very popular among the educated Chinese in Thailand. Of some forty societies set up during this period, the Wandering Society was one of the biggest and earliest. Fang Xiuchang invited Lin to join the Wandering Society. He subsequently wrote and published many works, including prose, novels, and poems in local newspapers through the society's recommendation. In 1933, he published his first poetry collection, Collection of Dream Pieces (《破梦集》), which was also the first of its kind in the history of Chinese literature in Thailand. After the success of his first publication, Lin published two more collections: a poetry collection, Collection on the Bridge (《桥上集》), and a novella collection, Flowers of the Hyacinth Bean, which was also the first of its kind. Together with his fellow members of the Wandering Society, he created the first golden age of Thai-Chinese literature, it was said.

His new-style poems were deeply influenced by the early new-style poems of China, and the "modernist-style writing" that is characterized by the use of metaphors and ambiguity in meaning. As a result, his poems were lyrical, focusing on expressing the poet's personal feelings and yet at the same time concerned with the social problems of their time. More often than not, a tone of sadness overshadowed the poems of Lin Dieyi. Even when it came to describing nature, he often painted the scenery with a tint of sorrow. His friend, Fang Xiuchang, explained that this was because he led a life of wandering in his early years and was deprived of the familial love which one of his age would normally enjoy.

Lin stopped writing in the 1960s, but that did not prevent his being appointed in the mid-1980s adviser to the New-style Poem Writing Group established within the Committee of Cultural Relics in the Teochew Association of Thailand. Through his involvement with this group, he was inspired to compose poems again and published many of his new works in various literary journals. His new works retained many of the characteristics of his previous works. They were still lyrical and deep in meaning. He had intended to publish another collection of poems, but was too busy with the publication of the Thai-Chinese Dictionary (《泰华词典》) and had to put this plan on hold. The collection was ultimately never published.

On 19 April 1998, the Association of Chinese Writers in Thailand organized a "Seminar to Commemorate Lin Dieyi's 70-year Life as a Writer" (林蝶衣创作生涯七十年研讨会). The objectives of holding this seminar were to celebrate Lin Dieyi's achievements in literary writing and to inspire other Thai-Chinese to write new-style poems. More than seventy scholars and writers attended this seminar. During this event, Lin shared his experience in poem writing with the participants, some of whom presented their analyses of Lin's poems. The association also reprinted his early poetry collections, Collection of Dream Pieces and Collection on the Bridge, in conjunction with this event.

Before his death in 2004, Lin embarked on the compilation and publication of various dictionaries, including the Dictionary of Chinese Idioms (《成语词典》), Thai-Chinese Dictionary, and Dictionary of Chinese Grammar (《华语语法词典》). He also translated the comic version of Journey to the West into Thai and published it through Bangkok Nanmei (泰京南美出版社).

Linsakoun, Tei

(林振潮, Lin Zhenchao, 1930–)
Community leader, Laos

Tei Linsakoun was born in 1930 in Chaozhou. His family members are well known community leaders in the Chinese community in Laos. Linsakoun's maternal grandfather, father, and Linsakoun's himself had consecutively held the chairmanship of the Association Chinoise Vientiane (Vientiane Chinese Association 万象中华理事会) in different periods of time.

Linsakoun's maternal grandfather, Chen Shunlin, married a Laotian after he had settled down in Laos. Together with Qiu Rongkun and Qiu Guangxing, Chen Shunlin was one of the founders of the Vientiane Chinese Association in 1920. At the time, the association was called the Chinese Overseas Association (华侨公所). At its inaugural general meeting, Chen was elected the first chairman of the association and served for eight terms between 1921 and 1941. Initially the chairman served a two-year term, but after the second term, when it was thought to be too short, the term of office was changed to four years. However, after serving as chairman for three terms between 1921 and 1929, Chen felt that a three-year term would be the most appropriate. Hence from 1930, the elected chairmanship became a three-year office. Besides Chen Shunlin, some of the other active overseas Chinese leaders of the association were Chen Liufang, Jiang Shen, Chen Shenqun, and Chen Qingshou. Although initially dedicated to community work involving looking after the welfare of the overseas Chinese, the association gradually extended its help to the needy, regardless of their race and ethnicity.

Tei Linsakoun's father, Lin Xinfa, was born in 1901 in Chaozhou, Guangdong Province. He migrated to Laos during his teenage years and passed away in 1999 in Laos at the age of ninety-eight. It was said that early immigrants in Laos needed to seek advice and help from Chen Shunlin in applying for jobs before they were able to live independently. Lin Xinfa was an employee at Chen Shunlin's kerosene factory, Flying Horse. It was after twenty years of hard work that Lin Xinfa successfully established his grocery store, sawmill, and rice mill business in Vientiane in the mid-1930s. His business expanded quickly and he became one of the richest men in Laos during that time. Before Lin Xinfa migrated to Laos, he was married in China and Lin Zhenchao was his only son with his Chinese wife. In Laos he married again, this time to a Chinese-Laotian, Chen Shunlin's eldest daughter. They had seven sons and four daughters. Lin Xinfa was elected chairman of the Association Chinoise Vientiane, a position which he held between 1945 and 1947. He believed education should take priority in nation building and in 1947, he was selected to serve a five-year term as chairman of Ecole Chinoise Lieu-Tou (寮都公学), a Chinese school established by the overseas Chinese in 1937. He spent most of his free time trying to make improvements to the school curriculum.

Linsakoun is a first-generation Chinese-Laotian in Vientiane. Back in his hometown, Chaozhou, he graduated from senior high school at Puning Diyizhongxue, a school that was established in 1920. In 1948, when he was eighteen years old, his father's businesses were doing very well, and he was asked to join his father in Laos to help out in the short-handed positions. In the late 1950s, his father passed his sawmill business to him. Under Linsakoun's management, the sawmill business expanded and flourished and was no longer catering only to the local market, but also started exporting timber to Thailand. A few years later, he set up his own companies as a distributor of motor spare parts and accessories for Mitsubishi Motors Company and Bosch Company. He also opened a rice mill factory and a mechanics workshop in Vientiane.

In late 1975, when the legitimization of the new Lao regime failed to bring about national reconciliation, more than 10 per cent of the Lao population sought asylum abroad. All of Linsakoun's siblings who were born in Laos migrated to various parts of the world. Largely due to government planning in the same period, Linsakoun closed down almost all of his businesses, except for the sawmill factory and a car mechanic workshop. In 2007, the location of his sawmill factory fell within the area newly zoned for urban development in Vientiane. In addition, the Lao Government was becoming more concerned with nature conservation and began imposing stricter rules on deforestation activities. Instead of relocating his sawmill factory to the outskirts of Vientiane to continue its operations, he chose to wind it up. Currently he is still running his mechanics workshop.

Between 1974 and 1975, the Chinese Overseas Association was closed amidst political instability as the Royal Lao Army prepared to leave the country. In late 1975, the association was reopened as the Association Chinoise Vientiane and has retained this name since. The same year, Chen Sixin was elected chairman, a position which he held between 1975 and 1988. Encouraged by Chen Sixin, Linsakoun joined the association. In 1994, its heavy responsibilities fell on Linsakoun's shoulders when he was elected the fourteenth chairman of the association, a position which he held until 2004. He is currently chairman emeritus of the association.

Linsakoun was married to Huang Kim Lan, a Chinese Thai, in 1956 and the couple has four sons and one daughter. Currently, only the youngest son is living in Laos. Huang passed away in 2000.

Liu Kang

(刘抗, 1911–2004)
Artist, art educator, Singapore

Liu Kang was one of the pioneers of art in Singapore. He was a renowned oil painter and art educator. He was highly respected for his work with two main art societies in Singapore, the Society of Chinese Artists and the Singapore Art Society. Together with Cheong Soo Pieng, Chen Wen Hsi, and Chen Chong Swee, he was regarded as a member of a group of pioneer local artists, and a key player who established a distinct local Nanyang style in the visual arts. He not only produced a wide range of artworks using different mediums, but also, through his various positions in art schools, influenced and guided the next generation of leading artists and painters in Singapore.

Liu Kang was born on 1 April 1911, in Yongchun County, Fujian Province in China, the year the Qing Dynasty fell to the revolution led by Sun Yat-sen in the country. At the age of six, he came to Muar in Malaya (now Malaysia) where his father worked as a rubber merchant. He spent his early years in Muar and received primary school education at Chung Hwa High School. Probably due to a mispronunciation by the principal at the school, his name was changed from Liu Kai to Liu Kang. In 1926, after his primary school education, he briefly continued his secondary school education in The Chinese High School in Singapore, and later at Tsinan University Middle School in Shanghai, China. His keen interest in art prompted him to attend art classes at the Shanghai College of Fine Arts (later renamed Xinhua Arts Academy) during the school holidays and he eventually enrolled as a student in Chinese painting and Western art. It was there that he met his classmate and good friend, Chen Jen Hao, a Chinese calligrapher, painter, and educator, and came to know Chen's sister, Chen Jen Ping.

As part of Shanghai was under the concession rule of foreign powers, it was strongly influenced by Western arts during the 1920s. When Liu Kang graduated in 1928, his interest in Western art continued to grow. He decided to pursue his art studies first at the Académie de Grande Chaumière, and later at the L'École Nationale Superieure des Beaux-Arts in Paris from 1929 to 1933. During his stay in Paris, he was drawn to the works of Degas, Cézanne, Matisse, Gauguin, Van Gogh, and Picasso. This exposure has had a great impact in many of his works and is evident in his vibrant use of colours.

On returning to China, he joined the Shanghai College of Fine Arts as faculty member of the Western art department and taught there for five years. In May 1937, Liu Kang wedded Chen Jen Ping in Shanghai almost a decade after their first meeting at ages sixteen and fourteen respectively. Three months after their marriage, the outbreak of Sino-Japanese war forced him and his family back to Muar. For about five years, due to the lack of oil paints and art materials in Muar, he had to use chalk and pastels as the alternate drawing medium and produced many of his pastel portraits.

In 1942 Liu Kang came to Singapore and started teaching art in several schools, including Chong Hwa High, Nan Chiao Teachers' Training College, Chung Cheng High, Nanyang Girls' High School, and The Chinese High School. This marked the starting point of his active involvement in painting and teaching in the community of artists here. He was, for many years, chairman of the Society of Chinese Artists (1946–58), founding member and president of the Singapore Art Society (1968–79), chairman of the National Day Art Exhibition Selection Committee, and chairman of the Visual Arts Advisory Committee.

Being well schooled in both Western and Chinese art forms, Liu Kang was keen on integrating the best of both genres into his artwork. In addition, he became convinced that art must stem from the artist's surroundings, and so began painting the multiracial and multicultural scenes found in Singapore and the region after he made Singapore his home. In the years between 1946 and 1952, Liu Kang went on a study-cum-painting trip to Bali, together with Chen Chong Swee, Chen Wen Hsi, and Cheong Soo Pieng and this period saw Liu Kang incorporating the beliefs, ideas, and inspirations of the time which gave Singapore and Southeast Asian art a unique flavour and which is distinctly known as the Nanyang style today. Some of his well known exotic Balinese scenes and people paintings from this period include Artist and Model (1954), Batik Workers (1954), and Balinese Girl in Red Sarong (undated).

Apart from contributing to the creation of the Nanyang style, Liu Kang's influence on the local art scene was seen in his work with the two main art societies in Singapore, the Society of Chinese Artists of Singapore and the Singapore Art Society. During his tenure as chairman of the Society of Chinese Artists of Singapore in 1949, he founded the Singapore Art Society with Dr C. A. Gibsonhill, director of museum; Richard Walker, Ministry of Education art specialist, and members of the British Council. Unlike many artists of his generation, however, he only taught in the schools listed above, and not at the Nanyang Academy of Fine Art which was, and still is, the leading art school in Singapore. Nevertheless, he mentored and guided many prolific Singapore artists of the next generation through his own artistic output.

Liu Kang was a diligent painter and exhibited his paintings in numerous exhibitions throughout his career, despite a failed cataract transplant in 1986 which threatened his eyesight. The notable exhibitions include his first solo exhibition at the Victoria Memorial Hall in 1957, the Retrospective exhibition at the National Museum in 1981, The World of Liu Kang in 1993, the Liu Kang at 87 Exhibition at the Singapore Art Museum in 1997, and the Liu Kang at 88 Exhibition at the Singapore Soka Association in 1998. His most significant exhibition was that held in China in November 2000. In addition, Liu Kang's works have been exhibited in many other countries, including France, Hong Kong, Macau, Taiwan, and the United States. On 31 May 2003, Liu Kang donated his life's works to the Singapore Art Museum.

There is one aspect of Liu Kang's contributions which is often being overlooked due to his immense artistic output and his important role in various art organizations, and that is his work as a writer. His writings, spanning from the 1930s to the late 1990s, cover subjects as diverse as short biographies of artists and exhibition reviews to many other related art forms, such as concert and literary reviews. Together, they documented a significant part of Singapore's art history. Some of his writings were collected and published in The Selected Essays of Liu Kang by Educational Publications Bureau in 1981.

In recognition of his enduring legacy as an artist and teacher who has contributed greatly to Singapore art for more than sixty years, from 1935 to 1997, Liu Kang was awarded the Public Service Star in 1970 and the Meritorious Service Medal in 1996 by the Singapore Government, and the ASEAN Creative Award in 1993 by the Brunei Government.

Liu Kang and wife Chen Jen Ping had five children. He died in Singapore in 2004.

Liu Thai Ker

(刘太格, Liu Taige, 1938–)
Architect, urban planner, Singapore

Liu Thai Ker was born in Muar, Johor in Malaysia on 23 February 1938, the eldest son of renowned painter Liu Kang (1911–2004). Soon after the end of the World War II he moved to Singapore and attended San San Primary School from 1946 to 1949, then Chung Cheng High School from 1950 to 1954. He worked briefly in Kuan Chiew Primary School as a substitute teacher in 1955. As a high school student he excelled in drawing and calligraphy, and had a strong ambition to be an artist like his father. He exhibited his artistic works during 1950s and 1960s, but instead continuing as an artist, later he decided to pursue an architecture career.

Liu attended the Sydney Technical College, Sydney, Australia from 1956 to 1957, and enrolled in the Architecture programme at the School of Architecture, University of New South Wales, Sydney, in 1957. During his studies, he worked as an apprentice in Clement Glancey Architects, Sydney (1958–59), and later as junior architect in Loder and Dunphy Architects, Sydney (1960–63). He obtained his Bachelor of Architecture degree with first class honours, and the University of New South Wales Medal, in 1962. From 1963 to 1965 he pursued his Master degree at the Architecture Graduate School, University of Yale in the United States. He graduated as master in City Planning with the Parsonís Memorial Medal from Yale University in 1965. Soon after this, he worked as architect-planner in I.M. Pei & Partners in New York, in the United States. This twelve-year time span from 1957 to 1969 was the formation period for Liu to be an architect and urban planner.

In 1969, he returned to Singapore and joined the HDB (Housing Development Board) as the head of the Design and Research Section, and held this position for five years until 1974. Liu kept rising in his career with the HDB: he was promoted to chief architect in 1975, deputy chief executive officer in 1976, and chief executive officer in 1979 until 1989. He introduced a new planning concept for Singapore, with public housing changing from large-scale estates with local facilities, to virtually self-sufficient new towns for 200,000 to 300,000 people. He also introduced the usage of wide-span pre-stressed concrete beams in public housing design. Despite his busy duties and responsibilities, he still managed to attend the Stanford INSEAD Advanced Management Program in Fontainbleau, Paris, in July 1980. Liu was awarded a National Day Award — a Public Administration Medal (Gold) for his outstanding contribution to Singapore in 1976. Even after he relinquished his position as CEO of the HDB in 1989, he is still involved as an HDB board member up to now.

Liu was appointed as the CEO and chief planner of the Urban Redevelopment Authority (URA) on 1 May 1989 and held this position till 30 September 1992. His main contributions were in revising Singapore's Concept Plan and implementing its conservation programmes. The Concept Plan, widely regarded as both visionary and pragmatic, is to contribute towards the future development of Singapore into a First World city. In 1985 he received his second National Day Award — a Meritorious Service Medal from the Singapore Government. From 1987 to 1989 he served as specialist adviser to the Ministry of National Development on Strategic Planning of Town Planning and Urban Design, Singapore.

After his career in public service, Liu was appointed honorary adviser to CESMA International Pte. Ltd. from 1989 to 1992. CESMA, run as a private company, is a full subsidiary of the Housing & Development Board Singapore offering expertise in feasibility studies, urban design, landscaping, and pre-cast construction technology to international clients. During this period, Liu received two prestigious prizes in recognition of his contributions during his tenures in the HDB and URA: the Sir Robert Matthew Prize for the improvement of the quality of human settlement, awarded by the International Union of Architects to Singapore HDB in 1990, and the United Nations Habitat Scroll of Honor to the URA for undertaking a sustained urban redevelopment programme through innovative approaches and land policies and the involvement of the private sector, in 1991.

Liu became director of RSP Architects Planners and Engineers, Pte. Ltd., Singapore, on 1 October 1992. RSP is a multidisciplinary architecture, urban design, urban planning, civil and structural engineering, electrical and mechanical engineering, and interior design consultant with 450 employees, dealing with projects in Singapore and overseas. He leads the company's design exploration from the functional to the aesthetical, and encourages the exploration of new structural systems.

Liu has held several advisory appointments as planning adviser in China: Beijing (since 1987), Fuzhou (since 1988), Ningbo (since 1993), Yantai (since 1993), Longkou (since 1993), Xiamen (1993), Wuxi (since 1993), Peng Lai (since 1994), Tianjin (since 1994), Jinan (since 1994), Shandong province (since 1995), and I-Lan county, Taiwan (since 1995). In 1994 he was given an honorary Citizen of Fuzhou Award by the Fujian provincial government, China, for his contribution as planning adviser.

In 1993 he was bestowed the 2nd ASEAN Achievement Award for Outstanding Contribution to Architecture. Since then, he has also been serving as a board member of the Singapore National Heritage Board.

In the academic field, Liu was invited as Regent's lecturer to the University of California, Los Angeles, Graduate School of Architecture and Urban Planning, in March 1993. He was conferred the Doctor of Science Honoris Causa by his alma mater, the University of New South Wales, Australia, in 1995. He is also chairman of the Advisory Committee of the Department of Architecture, National University of Singapore (since 1981), and the adviser professor to Tongji University, Shanghai, People's Republic of China (since 1987). Currently he is an Adjunct Professor at Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, National University of Singapore.

Liu was appointed the chairman of Singapore National Arts Council (NAC) in 1996, after serving as council member since 1991. As NAC chairman, he was also developing a "concept plan" for the arts, particularly to promote local arts and encourage film-making in Singapore. His vision was to make Singapore a distinctive global city for the arts. Under his strategic leadership, the Council successfully implemented the recommendations of the 2000 Renaissance City Report. New initiatives included funding schemes for semi-professional and professional arts companies and emerging talents, expanding outreach and arts education programmes, enhancing international cultural relations, increasing international collaborations and co-productions involving Singapore and overseas talent, and the development of major events such as the Singapore Writers' Festival, the Singapore Art Show, and the Singapore Biennale, and the Singapore Arts Festival, established as a leading festival of its kind in Asia. As chairman of the 2002 Censorship Review Committee, he was responsible for easing Singapore's censorship guidelines to give Singaporeans greater choice and space, yet preserve the core values of society. His other appointments and advisory roles with the Singapore Tyler Print Institute, The Esplanade and the National Heritage Board also advanced the development of the arts. He served as NAC chairman until 30 June 2005.

Liu also has a long service record with the Singapore Institute of Architects in various posts: as chairman of the Institute Journal (1970–72), as council member (1970–79), as chairman of International Relations Committee (1974–76), and as vice-president (1976–79, 1986–87). With the Singapore Institute of Planners, he served as council member (1972–74), and as a member of the Practice Committee (1974–76). He is also a member of many professional associations in the following capacities: FSIA — fellow, Singapore Institute of Architects, FSIP — fellow, Singapore Institute of Planners, RIBA — corporate member, Royal Institute of British Architects, FRAIA — fellow, Royal Australian Institute of Architects, IREM — member, Institute of Real Estate Management, the United States, and CPM — certified property manager, the United States.

The following are his strategic positions in different organizations: chairman of Arts Facilities Advisory Team, National Arts Council (1993–96); chairman of SAFTI Design Steering Committee (1987–96); chairman of Architectural Review Panel, Mass Rapid Transit Corporation (1983–92); board member of Board of Architects (1976–79); deputy chairman of Electoral Boundaries Delineation Committee (1979–92); member of the board of governors of Singapore Armed Forces Reservists' Association (1980–85); member of National Wages Council (1981–82); board member of Central Provident Fund Board (1981–93); trustee member of the Board of Trustees of NTUC Fairprice Co-operative Ltd. (1983–89); director of S. H. Lim Architects Pte. Ltd. (1993–96); director of Asia Quest Associates Pte. Ltd. (1993–96); director of Raffles City Pte. Ltd. (1979–93), authority member of Bus Services Licensing Authority — Ministry of Communications (1976–84); director of International Development & Consultancy Corporation Pte. Ltd. (1979–81); director of Housing Management Services Co.

Pte. Ltd. (1979–83); director, Raffles Holdings Pte. Ltd. (1979–85); executive director of Urban Management Co ('87) Pte. Ltd. (1979–89); executive director of Urban Development & Management Co. Pte. Ltd. (1979–89); director of Construction Technology Pte. Ltd. (1980–81); deputy chairman of E. M. Services Pte. Ltd. (1988–89); deputy chairman of Cleantech Services Pte. Ltd. (1989); director of Friends of Hanoi Architectural Heritage International Foundation Vietnam (1993–); director of China-Singapore International Pte. Ltd. (1993–); director of Singapore Offshore Petroleum Services Pte. Ltd. (1994–); director of RSP Holdings Ltd. (1994–); director of RSP Aviation Pte. Ltd. (1995–); member of the board of governors and honorary secretary of the Chinese Heritage Centre Singapore (1995–2011); and director of Squire Mech Pte. Ltd. (1996–).

On the personal side, Liu married his first wife, Marta Mikes, a Hungarian, in 1976. She is an Australian resident and a trained soprano. From this first marriage he has three children: Kristof, Janos, and Eszter. He remarried in 1984 and his wife is Gretchen Liu, a journalist turned architectural writer. They have two children: Daniel and Kristin.

Liu Yin Soon

(刘英舜, Liu Yingshun, 1913–72)
Educationalist, Singapore

Liu Yin Soon was best known as the first principal of Ngee Ann College, which was a private institution set up by the Singapore Teochew organization, Ngee Ann Kongsi. During her tenure (1962–70), the college was transformed from the image of an "alternative Nantah" or Nanyang University, which offered degree courses in language, commerce and technology to a public institution — the Ngee Ann Technical College (NATC, 1968) that focused on technical education in line with the needs of a newly born Singapore after 1965. The college campus was also moved from Tank Road to Clementi Road in 1968. She was a member in the first Ngee Ann College Council formed as a result of the Ngee Ann College Act passed by the Singapore parliament in 1967. Though her career at Ngee Ann was not plain sailing — it was marred by student involvement in mass boycott of classes and clashes with the authorities, her devotion to Ngee Ann was indisputable and many regarded her as the "mother of Ngee Ann". She was also regarded by many as the "Teochew lady scholar".

Liu's ancestral hometown was in Shantou, Chaozhou in the Guangdong province in China. Her grandfather was one of the early migrants to Singapore and was a businessman. Liu's father was born in Singapore and had ten children. Liu was number five — with three elder brothers, one elder sister, one younger sister and four younger brothers. Her father, who was a businessman, was well known for his literary interests. He wanted his children to be well educated so he sent them to institutes of higher learning after their graduation from university. Hence most of his children, including Liu, obtained higher degrees. After graduating from the state-run Shantou Girls' Secondary School in Chaozhou at age fourteen, Liu proceeded to Shanghai for further studies. She graduated from the Zhirenyong Girls' School (High School Section) (智仁勇女校高中) at age seventeen and obtained her Bachelor of Arts in Education from the National Jinan University (国立暨南大学) at twenty-one. She began her career in education administration by working as head of academic affairs and acting principal for the privately run Peiming Girls' Secondary School (培明女子中学) in Shanghai. After that, she moved on to become the principal of the Zhonghua Girls' Secondary School (中华女子中学) in Jakarta, Indonesia, for three years.

When Japan invaded China in 1937 and the war capital of China was relocated to Chongqing in Sichuan province, Liu responded to the call to defend China against the aggressors by taking up a teaching job in the state-run Teachers' Training College for Women in Chongqing. While teaching in the Department of Education, she was also the principal for the experimental secondary school under the college. After the war ended in 1945, she enrolled in the University of Columbia in New York in the United States, and obtained a Master's degree in School Administration and subsequently her doctorate degree. She was researching in educational psychology for some years when Dr Lin Yutang, the first principal of the Nanyang University, invited her to join its Department of Education as professor and head in 1955. However, the departure of Dr Lin derailed the preparation work of the university and she taught and headed the Department of Education in the Singapore Teachers' Training College at its invitation. In 1956 when Nanyang University finally opened its doors to the public, Liu was persuaded to take up the original post; she was also involved in preparing its pre-university classes.

In 1961, Ngee Ann Kongsi decided to set up a tertiary institution in Singapore that focused on training in commerce and technology. Liu was appointed the chairperson for the Preparatory Committee. She resigned from her post in Nanyang University and was fully involved in the setting up of Ngee Ann College, which involved meeting up with officials from the Ministry of Education. She was appointed principal of the college by Ngee Ann Kongsi in 1962. As she recalled later, she accepted the post willingly as a member of the Teochew community in Singapore, and because of her passion in education. She highlighted three strategic directions in academic training that the college was to follow: firstly, equal emphasis to be given to instruction in English and Chinese; secondly, equal emphasis on development of theoretical and skill training; lastly equal emphasis on development of ideology and morality. These were more than strategic directions; they were also part of the personal philosophies of Liu and this was apparent in her speeches delivered on various occasions of her time at the Ngee Ann (for example, in college anniversary celebrations). Liu's devotion to education did not go unnoticed to those around her; they had often jokingly remarked that "education" was the only thing Liu knew in her life! Liu remembered that she often had to work up to twelve hours a day and yet was not satisfied with the way she managed her work. She felt apologetic towards staff members in the college who wished to speak to her at length about academic matters, but were not given the desired duration of time as she was simply too busy and had to attend to crucial matters in double-quick time.

In April 1970, Liu resigned as principal of Ngee Ann Technical College, citing reasons that the college's foundation had been established and that it was time for someone else to steer it ahead. As she recalled, some had criticized her for being "cruel" to abandon her "baby", but she insisted that her departure was for the good of Ngee Ann. Subsequently she went on education inspection tours to Europe and the United States for a year; and returned as professor in the Singapore Teachers' Training College — devoted to the training of new teachers. Liu died of illness in August 1972.

Some of Liu's written works include, "My Time in Ngee Ann" (我与义安), "A Collection of Essays on Education" (教育言论集) and "Ten Lectures in Psychology" (心理学十讲).

Loh Boon Siew

(骆文秀, Luo Wenxiu, 1916–95)

Entrepreneur, community leader, philanthropist, Malaysia

Loh Boon Siew was a self-made business tycoon whose name was synonymous with Honda automotive vehicles in Malaysia. He was a major force in shaping the direction of the country's car and motorcycle industry and had a multifarious business empire ranging from motor vehicle assembly and distribution to property development, hotel, finance, plantation, and manufacturing.

Loh was born in Chiah Cheok (赤石 Chi Shi) Village in Fujian Province, China, in 1916 and went to Penang in Malaya as a penniless migrant when he was thirteen years old. Having little formal education, he started out as an apprentice motor mechanic with a salary of $3 a month. Later he washed buses to supplement his meagre income. When he was eighteen, Loh, with his own savings, opened a small repair shop in Rope Walk, George Town. Around 1934, he bought over eleven second-hand buses and had them reconditioned for sale. Later he acquired a larger fleet of thirty-nine buses with which he started the Penang Yellow Bus Company. This transport services business proved profitable for Loh, but all his businesses were confiscated during the Japanese Occupation.

After the war, Loh restarted his bus company and set up a bicycle shop which later expanded into trading bicycles, motorbikes, and car spare parts. At the same time, he also secured the franchise to distribute the British-made Aerial motorcycle in north Malaya. In the early 1950s, Loh extended his business interests to housing and property. He became one of the earliest and biggest developers in Penang. It was in the late 1950s that the association with Honda in Japan became a turning point for Loh's business.

In 1957, he went on holiday in Japan and encountered his first Honda motorbike. This led to Loh meeting and developing a close relationship with Soichiro Honda, the founder of Honda Motor Company. A year later, his family company, Boon Siew Sdn. Bhd., secured the franchise to be the sole distributor of Honda motorcycles in Malaya. As demand grew, Loh set up the Kah Motor Assembly Plant in Butterworth to assemble Honda motorcycles. By the 1970s, Honda accounted for 70 per cent of the market in Malaysia. Later Loh also acquired the franchise for Honda cars. In 1967, Oriental Assemblers Sdn Bhd was set up to assemble Honda cars for the local market. The Honda car became popular and was at one time the undisputed number one car in Malaysia.

In view of the sheer volume of his business and the need to separate some of his holdings, Loh had his company, Oriental Holdings Bhd., which was incorporated in 1963, publicly listed in 1964. Oriental Holdings became an investment arm that not only controlled major stakes of his motor assembly and distribution businesses but also diversified Loh's investments to the manufacture of automotive parts for domestic consumption as well as export, the manufacture of building materials, the supply of ready-mixed concrete, the cultivation of rubber and oil palm plantations, the manufacture of plastic parts for motor vehicles, as well as the production of household appliances, and hotel operations.

Having engaged in such diversified business interests, Oriental Holdings became a conglomerate that owned eighteen subsidiaries and associate companies in Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, Australia, and New Zealand. Despite its diversified interests, Honda motor assembly and distribution stayed the main revenue generator for the Oriental group.

Apart from his role in Oriental Holdings, Loh was also actively involved in the banking and newspaper businesses. In 1965, he and a group of Penang-based Chinese tycoons established Southern Bank, which later became Malaysia's eleventh largest bank in terms of assets. For newspapers, Loh became a major shareholder of Kwong Wah Yit Poh in the 1960s and The Star in the early 1970s.

He played an active role in sustaining the operations of Kwong Wah Yit Poh when the newspaper was in financial difficulties in 1969. By recruiting a capable manager, Oon Choo Khye, and financing the modernization of printing processes, Loh successfully transformed Kwong Wah into the leading Chinese newspaper in the northern region by 1982. When The Star was in financial difficulties, Loh, who was most probably approached by Tunku Abdul Rahman, went to the rescue by buying more than 50 per cent shares of Star Publications. He became a director from May 1974 to July 1975 and later sold his entire stake to Tun Mustapha Harun, the chief minister of Sabah from 1967 to 1975.

With his business success and wealth, Loh was able to establish political and social leadership in the Chinese community of Penang. He joined the state branch of the Malaysian Chinese Association and rose to become vice-chairman in 1962. In 1976, he assumed the position of treasurer of the party.

In addition, Loh was heavily involved with the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, the most important business organization in Penang, and became a committee member of the Penang Chinese Chamber in 1955. He remained so for thirteen years. Furthermore, Loh held seats on the boards of many social associations, guilds, and schools, such as the Penang State Scout Council, Spastic Children's Association of Penang, Malaya Leprosy Relief Association, Penang Home Associations, Penang Hui An Association, Loh Si Tong Chong Seah, Chung Ling High School, Bin Hua High School, and Chung Hua Confucian High School.

He was highly noted for his generosity towards charity and various philanthropic activities and kindly contributed both land and money to his state, schools, hospitals, and associations. In 1961, he donated a 2½-acre piece of land to the Malayan Youth Hostels Association to build a hostel. In response to the call for a National Defence Fund, Loh contributed a sum of 30,000 Malaysian ringgit in 1965. In order to expand the Lam Wah Ee hospital into a full-fledged modern hospital, Loh initiated a dollar-for-dollar fund-raising drive in 1977. In the end, he donated 10 million Malaysian ringgit to match public donations for building the hospital. Realizing the need to set up a branch of Chung Ling High School in Butterworth, Loh contributed 500,000 Malaysian ringgit to the school-building fund in 1983.

Loh passed away on 16 February 1995 at the age of seventy-nine. He left behind one son and four daughters. His two wives — Oh Guat Sim and Ong Lay Wah — predeceased him. His business empire was taken over by his children. It remains a strong enterprise with steady profits today.

Loke Wan Tho

(陆运涛, Lu Yuntao, 1915–64)

Cinema magnate, film producer, ornithologist, photographer, Malaysia

In his time, Loke Wan Tho was one of the wealthiest men in the region. He will be remembered for founding and developing the cinema chain, Cathay Organisation, and contributing to the Asian film industry. Loke was also a man of learning, comfortable with English literature, and respected as an ornithologist and photographer by peers in the respective fields. On 20 June 1964 Loke died in a plane crash at the prime of his life.

Loke was the ninth son of Loke Yew and born on 14 June 1915 in Kuala Lumpur. He studied at the Victoria Institution in Kuala Lumpur, Chillon College in Montreux, Switzerland, and at King's College, Cambridge, where he graduated with honours in English literature and history in 1936. His studies at the London School of Economics were interrupted by the outbreak of World War II. In school and university, Loke showed broad interests, excelling in sports and serving in the boys' scout movement.

His long jump record for the Swiss county of Vaud in 1932 stood for nearly thirty years and he won college badminton titles while studying in United Kingdom.

Badly wounded when his ship was hit by a World War II Japanese bomb while he was escaping from Singapore, Loke evacuated first to Indonesia and then to India. While in India, an article he wrote attracted the attention of an army officer who happened to be Loke's ex-teacher. The officer introduced Loke to Salim Ali, a leading Indian naturalist-explorer, who stirred in Loke a passion for birds and nature. Salim took Loke on a four-month expedition to Kutch, and a lasting friendship developed.

Loke combined his newfound ornithologist interest with his long-time enthusiasm for photography. He spent weeks away from his hectic business schedule for photographic expeditions to Sarawak, Cambodia, Sikkim, Kashmir, and Finland. On one occasion, Loke was away in New Guinea for two months. He was more than an amateur photographer — and in 1958 published part of his collection in a volume entitled, A Company of Birds. His photographs also appeared in the works of others, including Malcolm MacDonald's Angkor.

Loke inherited considerable wealth, and sat on boards of companies which his father, Loke Yew, owned or held shares. These included Sime Darby, Straits Steamship Company Ltd., Wearne Brothers, Kwong Yik Bank, Great Eastern Life Assurance, and H.A.O'Connors. He was on the boards of other corporations and was chairman of Malayan Airways Ltd., the Singapore Telephone Board, and Malayan Banking.

Loke also set up new ventures. His mother, Loke Cheng Kim, and a relative, Khoo Teik Ee, helped him start Associated Theatres Ltd. in July 1935 and this spearheaded his subsequent presence in the film industry. Loke came to own rubber, oil palm, and coconut estates, as well as properties, restaurants and hotels, some of which were overseas.

Few Chinese businessmen of his time had the Western learning he did. His Cambridge background of literature and history sharpened his appreciation of culture and the arts. Parts of his Introduction to his book, A Company of Birds, read almost like poetry. These were also reflected in films produced by his Cathay Organisation. Films such as Hang Tuah and Hang Jebat were drawn from the Malay Annals, a historical classic of the Malays, while others were inspired by the Bangsawan tradition.

Loke was socially comfortable in colonial and post-colonial society. He was close to Sir Malcolm Macdonald, the British commissioner general of Southeast Asia who, like Loke, was a keen photographer and birdwatcher. They collaborated to produce Angkor, a lavishly illustrated book, in 1958. Loke developed a friendship with Tunku Abdul Rahman, sharing with him a common love for films. The Tunku drew him into positions in government-linked companies. Loke was also a frequent guest of other heads of government, including Prince Norodom Sihanouk of Cambodia.

Loke will be remembered most for his contribution to the film industry. Associated Theatres Ltd, renamed Cathay Organisation, operated a chain of cinemas which, at its peak, numbered about eighty, throughout Singapore, Malaya, and Borneo. In the pre-TV era, the cinema was the main entertainment form. The seventeen-storey Cathay Organisation building was the tallest in Southeast Asia when it was opened in October 1939 and for many years was a recognized icon to millions of cinema goers. He partnered J. Arthur Rank Organisation to screen UK-produced movies locally and went on to sign agreements with other film production companies in the United States.

In 1953, Loke started Cathay Keris Studios, which was purpose-built in Singapore to produce Malay films. He was ably assisted by well known film director, Ho Ah Loke, and together they produced dozens of Malay films which became classics. Some of these were immensely popular, especially those drawn from horror folk-lore such as Pontianak (Vampire Woman) and Orang Minyak (Oily Man).

In 1955 Loke entered the Hong Kong film industry. Cathay Organisation had earlier been distributing Chinese films produced by Yung Hwa Motion Pictures. When Yung Hwa ran into financial problems, Loke took it over and renamed it Cathay Organisation (HK). With this Loke competed with Shaw Brothers in the Chinese film world. Over the next decade, under Loke, Cathay Organisation (HK) produced nearly 250 films that were widely distributed in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Southeast Asia. His films regularly won major prizes at the Asian Film Festival.

Loke modernized his film studies with the latest in sound and film equipment, recruited Shanghai film-makers who had fled China, travelled to India to learn about the latest in film-making, and invited U.S. movie makers to train his staff. Under him, storylines were adapted to changing tastes and camera techniques improved. Stars such as Lin Dai, Ge Lan, Yeh Fung, and You Min of Chinese films, and Maria Menado of the Malay cinema, became famous through Cathay Organisation films.

Loke was the first chairman of the Singapore National Library Board, chairman of the Malayan Nature Society, and a member of the board of trustees of the National Art Gallery. In 1963, he was made one of two prochancellors of the University of Malaya.

In a region regarded as the backwater of an empire, Loke has been likened to a Renaissance Man. He overcame physical frailty and ill health to become an accomplished sportsman. He loved Shakespeare and literature, and carried with him on business travels or bird-watching expeditions his favourite anthologies of poetry. While recovering from temporary blindness as a result of injuries from a Japanese bomb, he recalled in elegant prose, "During the anxious voyage to India it was the sonnets of Shakespeare which gave me an inner clarity of vision almost totally lacking in my clouded physical sight." Yet Loke was conscious of his Chinese cultural roots. He wrote, "I follow in the footsteps of those great artists of China who make the countryside and the birds a vehicle for their self-expression".

Because of an interest first stirred by a renowned ornithologist, Loke himself became one. Amidst his rush of business activities, Loke devoted weeks of patient wait just to photograph a bird in its natural habitat. From 1945 onwards, he contributed to the Bombay Natural History Society. His library not only held a substantial holding of books on ornithology, but tapes of Malayan birds' singing.

And long before others did, Loke appreciated nature and was concerned about the environment. In 1962 he was in the Malayan delegation to attend the Conference of the International Union for the Conservation of Nature. He also attended the first World Conference on National Parks.

He loved cars, but also collected books and various art forms and antiques. He had one of the finest collections of Chinese ceramics.

Loke was generous in supporting state and private charities, and sponsored deserving individuals, whether they were students or chess players.

He was a member of the British Ornithologists' Union, the International Council for Bird Preservation, the British Wildfowl Trust, and an associate of the Royal Photographic Society and the Photographic Society of America. He was active in the Malayan Nature Society, the Rotary Club, and the Singapore Island Country Club.

Loke and his wife, Mavis, were killed in a plane crash in Taiwan in June 1964. They were attending the 11th Asia Film Festival in Taipei and had decided to visit Taichung. At his funeral, many dignitaries, including the prime minister of Malaysia came to pay their last respects. Loke was buried in the family grave at Hawthorne Estate in Setapak .

Loke received awards from several countries, including Cambodia and Japan. On 13 April 1961 he received the award of Panglima Mangku Negara from the king of Malaysia.

Loke's first marriage was to Kay White. Following their divorce, he married Christina Lee Hui Wong, a Miss Malaya winner, in March 1950. The marriage did not last. In September 1963 he married Mavis Chew. Loke did not have any children from the three marriages.

Loke Yew

(陆佑, Lu You, 1846–1917)

Tin and rubber magnate, philanthropist, Malaysia

Loke Yew was born on 9 October 1846 in the village of Dong Jiang in San Wei district, Zhaoqing prefecture in Guangdong, China. A very successful entrepreneur and a highly respected philanthropist in colonial Malaya, Loke played a major role in the growth of Kuala Lumpur and the development of health and education, not only in Malaya, but also in Singapore and Hong Kong. In his time, he was one of the wealthiest men in the region.

Loke's business career practically spanned the entire range of early Chinese economic enterprise in Malaysia, encapsulating the business history of the Chinese from the early pioneering days through to the transition years. Loke started in small retail trade, but ventured into tin mining and revenue farms, then opened rubber and coconut estates, and eventually invested in the financial services. In the event, he was part of a modernizing group of Chinese businessmen who used profits from tin and revenue farming (a form of revenue collection in Malaya that was phased out by the British in early twentieth century) to enter into properties and modern business sectors. He subsequently invested in Western-owned companies.

Loke Yew is believed to be the only son of a Wong family and he spent his childhood in the San Wei district. In 1858, at the age of thirteen, he sailed to Singapore where he dropped his surname Wong and used Loke instead, believing that this would help bring a change of fortune in his life. In Singapore he worked as an assistant in Kwong Man, a sundry shop in Market Street and later, with his small savings, opened Tong Hing Loong in New Market Street.

Eleven years later, he left Singapore for Kuala Lumpur where he opened a small shop. Shortly afterwards he went to Larut in upper Perak, attracted by the booming tin mining district. He did not have much success in his initial mining efforts. His Kamunting mines were destroyed during disturbances in the Perak Civil War, involving fighting between Chinese secret societies. He reopened his Kamunting tin mines after the Perak fighting with proceeds from a contract to supply provisions to British troops deployed in 1875 against Malay chiefs. Some Malay chiefs had opposed British intervention following the Pangkor Treaty agreement. However, a tin slump almost bankrupted him.

It was revenue farm operations which provided a critical turning point in Loke's business fortune. He seemed to have been favoured by British officials, and Hugh Low, who became Resident of Perak in 1877, granted him revenue farm leases on easy terms. To the British at the time, businessmen such as Loke were needed to operate farms for revenue collection, as well as to develop the economy. Frank Swettenham, resident general of the Federated Malay States, considered Loke "the most enterprising Chinese I know". Alongside his revenue farms, Loke rebuilt his tin mines and ventured into other businesses. In Selangor, rich tin deposits were found in mines he owned.

Loke's success was also built upon his ability to create a network of business partners. This network, built on trust, cut across dialect lines and nationalities. At a time when the Chinese were still divided along lines of dialect and district origin, Loke forged partnerships or syndicates with Kheks (Hakkas), Hokkiens, and Cantonese to run revenue farms in various parts of Malaya. He worked with Cantonese leaders such as Chiew Yoke of Kuala Lumpur, and Eu Tong Sen of Perak, and Kheks such as Foo Choo Choon, Yap Ah Shak, and Yap Kwan Seng in operating chandu, gambling, spirit, and pawnbroking farms in Klang, Kuala Lumpur, Ulu Bernam, Sungei Ujong, and Pahang. His network extended to Hong Kong where he was invited to be part of a revenue farm syndicate which he later came to control. While Loke Chow Kit and Loke Chow Thye, two of his closest business partners and assistants were Cantonese, he drew Choo Kia Peng, a Teochew, into his business and who later married his sister. The Loke brothers and Choo were English-educated and therefore invaluable to Loke Yew who increasingly had to deal with British officials and Western businessmen.

Loke's network included Indians such as Thamboosamy Pillay, and Europeans such as J.M. Robson. Robson, founder of the influential newspaper, the Malay Mail, was Loke's attorney. He also managed Loke's extensive properties and real estate that were being acquired. A.W. Birch and W.E.L. Brook were two Europeans known to have managed Loke's plantations. Then there was John Russell of Malayan Collieries, who acknowledged that his start in business owed much to Loke for loans and subscription of shares. The Russell family went on to establish the highly successful Boh Tea estate.

As his wealth grew, Loke acquired huge tracts of land, real estate, and properties, including choice parcels in a growing Kuala Lumpur. When rubber was introduced, Loke opened up rubber estates in Selangor and Perak, and expanded into coconut planting and milling.

Loke was an entrepreneur innovative in his enterprises and bold in his attempts at trying out different types of businesses. In 1886, when he returned to Kuala Lumpur, he, together with Chiew Yoke and Yap Ah Shak, the Kapitan China of Kuala Lumpur, operated the Kuala Lumpur-Klang railways. But the line turned out to be unprofitable and they returned the railways to the Selangor government. Then in 1894 he formed, with Thamboosamy Pillay, the Rawang Electric Company which supplied electric power to Loke's tin mines in Rawang. With Loke Chow Thye, he set up the Serendah Hydraulic Company in which western technology was introduced to mining operations. At the same time, he undertook the major construction of roads such as the stretch between Kuala Lumpur and Sungei Besi to reach his tin mines. The Kuala Lumpur-Bentong road was built across the difficult Genting Pass. To overcome currency shortage, he issued, for a brief period in the 1890s, promissory notes through his company, Tong Hing Loong, that were used as money by employees in his tin mines.

As Loke grew in wealth he invested in banking and trading houses. In 1912 he, together with a number of rich Cantonese, founded the Kwong Yik Bank in Kuala Lumpur. An earlier Kwong Yik Bank, started by the Singapore Cantonese and in which Loke Yew probably held shares, had collapsed earlier that year. The Kuala Lumpur Kwong Yik Bank remained a successful institution right into the post-independence period and was taken over during a bank consolidation exercise in the 1990s. Loke also invested shrewdly in emerging companies, including those that were Western-owned. The list of companies he was involved in, either as partner or through equity participation, was a long one and included the Selangor Oil Mills, Batu Caves Cement Works, Malayan Collieries, Raub Gold Mine, Pahang Motor Car Services, Straits Trading Company, Straits Steamship Company, Messrs Alexander, Hall and Company of Aberdeen, Federal Engineers, and Burmah Rice Mill.

With social standing brought about by wealth, Loke gained a public role. In 1892, Loke succeeded his close friend, Chiew Yoke, as the Cantonese representative in the Selangor state council. He was also appointed to the Kuala Lumpur Sanitary Board and the Public Gardens Committee, and was founding chairman of the Selangor Chinese Chamber of Commerce in 1904.

Loke was accepted within the European social circle. Keen on horse racing, Loke was a member of the Selangor Turf Club. He became the first Chinese to enter horses in the club's races.

Above all, Loke was a noted philanthropist. He contributed to the setting up of what later became Malaya's premier school, the Victoria Institution, and the Technical College in Kuala Lumpur. He also gave generously to the Hong Kong University, the Tan Tock Seng Hospital, the Decrepit and Cripple Home in Kuala Lumpur, and the King Edward VII Medical College in Singapore. The Hong Kong University conferred Loke an honorary Doctor of Law degree for his financial support and his other philanthropic work.

Appreciative of the patronage he received from early colonial administrators, and with the approach of World War I, Loke bought substantial British war bonds and the Federated Malay States war loan, bonds and also made contributions to Perak and Selangor volunteer forces. By contrast, it was reported that he refused to give to Sun Yat Sen's revolutionary cause.

Among the awards Loke received was the Companion of the Order of St Michael and St George (CMG) from the British Government.

Loke Yew, who died on 24 February 1917, had married four times. His wives were Leung Suet, Leung Jun, Lim Shuk Kwei, and Lim Cheng Kim. His sons from the marriages were Wan Piu, Wan Chok, Wan Chiew, Hon Chow, Wan Wye, Wan Yat, and (Loke) Wan Tho. His daughters were Yuen Hing, Juliann Yuen Ying, Yuen Theng, and Yuen Peng.

Looi Lai Meng

(雷丽明, Lei Liming, 1950–)

Pathologist, medical educationist, Malaysia

Looi was born in 1950 in Bentong, Pahang, and received her primary and lower secondary education there. She proceeded to the Bukit Bintang Girls' Secondary School and the Victoria Institution, Kuala Lumpur, for her upper secondary and pre-university education, after which she won a Malaysian federal scholarship to undertake medical studies at the University of Singapore. There she distinguished herself by winning the Albert Lim Liat Juay Medal in pathology and social medicine, and the King Edward VII Hall awards for distinguished service, literary works, art forms, and poetry. On graduating in 1975 with an M.B., B.S., she returned to Malaysia to serve in the Ministry of Health.

Looi is a histopathologist by training. Her career in pathology began in 1977 when she registered for the Master of Pathology course at the University of Malaya (UM), majoring in histopathology. In 1979, she joined the UM as lecturer in pathology with the concurrent appointment as clinical specialist in pathology at the University Hospital, Kuala Lumpur. She passed the Membership examinations (Histopathology) of the Royal College of Pathologists (United Kingdom) in 1981 and successfully defended her doctorate thesis (MD, University of Malaya) in 1986. She was promoted to associate professor in 1984 and served as head of department from 1984 to 1999, when she assumed the position of deputy dean (Postgraduate Programmes) of the Medical Faculty. Her promotion to professor (chair) of pathology in August 1986 at the age of thirty-six years distinguished her as one of the youngest appointees to a university chair. She was promoted to senior professor in 1999.

As a teacher, Professor Looi has been elected "Best Lecturer" seven times by medical and dental students. She has successfully supervised ten doctorate (MD/PhD) and seventeen Master theses and more than a hundred Clinical Masters candidates. She also has more than 350 publications and has delivered more than 600 papers at scientific meetings, seminars, and workshops, appearing in more than 250 of these as guest speaker. In addition, Looi has conducted several workshops to assist young researchers in the art of scientific writing. She was instrumental in introducing immunohistochemical and microwave-stimulated antigen retrieval techniques into Malaysian histopathology laboratories through technical workshops and training attachments in her department.

Looi's most outstanding scientific works are in the fields of amyloidosis, tactoidal proteins, renal pathophysiology, and cancer progression. Her doctorate (MD) research on amyloidosis, documenting several novel forms of the disease unique to Malaysians, was the first major work to demonstrate conclusively differences from patterns encountered in Western populations, which had until then dominated scientific literature. Unique findings included isolated atrial amyloidosis and intratumour amyloidosis in nasopharyngeal carcinoma. Professor Looi was the first to recognize the occurrence of immunotactoid glomerulonephritis (an unusual renal disease) in Malaysia, having earlier mooted a link between amyloid and tactoidal proteins.

Over the years, Professor Looi has built a commendable reputation in renal and heart transplantation pathology, providing diagnostic services to medical centres throughout Malaysia. She is a member of the multinational team of nephrologists and renal pathologists who formulated the Revised Classification of Lupus Nephritis, published in 2004 and mooted to replace the existing WHO Classification.

Her research on cancer prognostic and predictive factors influenced the development of more logistically sound and cost effective laboratory assessment of cancer patients in Malaysia. She chaired the first Malaysian National consensus on the histopathological reporting of breast cancer in 1994. Her research on cancer progression includes the interaction of tumour cells with basement membrane and intercellular matrix proteins, homing mechanisms to lymph nodes, and cancer cell immortalization. Her team's studies using computerized image analysis and neutron activation analysis of mineral deposits in breast cancer, a unique study using cross-disciplinary technologies, have made an impact in the international arena. She headed a multicentre cancer research programme funded by the Malaysian Ministry of Science, Technology, and Innovation, which also served to train many young scientists. The stature of her research is reflected by her many publications in peer-reviewed international journals, her many guest lectures to national and international audiences, and her appointment onto the international editorial advisory boards of several prestigious international journals.

The promotion of a scientific and research culture, and ethical practice in medicine and science, are issues to which Looi has devoted much energy. She is the past-chairman of the UM Medical Centre Research Committee; chairman of the UM Medical Ethics Committee; past chairman of the Technical Review Committee for IRPA Research Projects (Medical Sector), UM; past president of the Malaysian Society of Pathologists (three terms); editor of the Malaysian Journal of Pathology; and council member of the Academy of Medicine of Malaysia. She served for more than ten years on the Malaysian Medical Council, was a member of the National Committee on Managed Care Organizations, and chairman of its ethical subcommittee. She has been devoted to improving public understanding of the ethical aspects of biotechnology, particularly with respect to human cloning. She is a member of the National committees for legislation of medical laboratories and human cloning, and chairman of the Working Committees of the College of Pathologists, Malaysia, for the development of guidelines on retention of tissues and laboratory practices.

In 2003–06, Looi successfully worked with the Department of Standards, Malaysia, to establish a national accreditation scheme for medical testing laboratories for Malaysia, based on ISO 15189, a development that has made a major impact on the quality of medical testing in the country. She is chairman of the Technical Working Group for formulation of specific criteria and chairman of the Medical Expert Panel in Histopathology for the Specific Technical Requirements for the Malaysian Standards. The National Scheme was launched in December 2004 placing Malaysia among the earliest countries to adopt ISO 15189. She was also a major resource for the Pathology Bill which was passed by the Malaysian Parliament in July 2007.

For her outstanding achievements and distinguished contribution to science, for the development of the nation, Professor Looi was appointed foundation fellow of the Academy of Sciences Malaysia (ASM) in March 1995, and senior fellow, bearing the title of "Academician", in 2005, being the only woman to be so honoured on both occasions. She was elected to the Council of ASM for three consecutive terms (1998–2007), and was past chairman of its Dr Ranjeet Bhagwan Singh Medical Research Fund. She was instrumental in the formation of the College of Pathologists Malaysia in 1999, serving as its president for four terms. Looi is the first woman to win the highly prestigious National Science Award (1999), and the first Malaysian to win the ASEAN Outstanding Scientist and Technologist Award (2001). She is the recipient of the distinguished Rotary Research Foundation Gold Medal 2003. In 2010, she was honoured "Professor Ulung" (Distinguished professor), this being highly prestigious National award for academic excellence. She was conferred the Johan Setia Mahkota in 2000 and the Panglima Jasa Negara bearing the title "Datuk" in 2011 by the king of Malaysia for her contributions to education and medical science.

Recognition for Looi and her contributions come from international bodies as well. She is a fellow of the Royal College of Pathologists of the United Kingdom, fellow of the Royal College of Pathologists of Australasia (RCPA), member of the International Academy of Cytology; member of the International Academy of Pathology; fellow of the Royal Society of Medicine, the United Kingdom; fellow of the Royal Microscopical Society, the United Kingdom; member of the Association of Clinical Pathologists, the United Kingdom; member of the New York Academy of Science; member of the Arthur-Purdy Stuart Society of Surgical Pathologists, North America, and member of the Renal Pathology Society (International). She was made an honorary fellow of the College of Pathologists of South Africa in 2005. The same year, the Academy of Medicine Singapore honoured her with a fellowship. She is an examiner (in Histopathology) for both the Royal Colleges of Pathologists of the United Kingdom and Australasia and served as regional (Malaysian) councillor to the RCPA for eight years till November 2007. She has given teaching seminars and guest lectures in India, Sudan, Australia, the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States. She was visiting professor of Pathology to the Harvard Medical School, the United States (1991), and to the University of Tasmania, Australia (1997). As president of the 24th World Congress of Pathology and Laboratory Medicine 2007, she brought the highly prestigious Congress for the first time to Southeast Asia and Malaysia. She was elected director-at-large of the World Association of Societies of Pathology and Laboratory Medicine for the 2007–2011 term and President Elect for 2011–2013, being the first Malaysian to serve in these capacities.

In recognition of her contributions to the pathology profession and community at large, the Royal College of Pathologists of Australasia awarded her the Distinguished Fellow Award 2010. She is the first Malaysian to receive this honour.

In September 2010, she was elected Co-Chair of the Inter Academy Medical panel, a global network of 69 National Academies of Sciences and Medicine, dedicated to global health and evidence based advice to governments on health care, being the first Malaysian to hold this position.

Looi is a keen photographer and spends her spare time with her husband fishing, enjoying music, and reading.

Loot Ting Yee

(陆庭谕, Lu Tingyu, 1930–)
Chinese education activist, Malaysia

Along with Lim Lian Geok and Sim Mow Yu, Loot Ting Yee is one of the more well known figures in the history of Chinese education after the 1950s. After the 1970s, his image as a brash and charismatic icon with a passion for justice was gradually established with the mass education movement at the time. Since the 1990s he has frequented local universities and colleges giving speeches to young students with significant impact.

Loot Ting Yee's family was originally from Boli Dapo Village (波里大坡村) in the Rong County (容县) of Guangxi Province in China. He was born in 1930 in Gerisek in Muar, Johor. In 1947 he graduated from PeiYing Primary School, Gerisek, and later completed junior middle class in ZhongHua Secondary School, Muar, in 1950. In 1952 he graduated from the Senior Normal Teacher Training Class of the Kuala Lumpur Government Chinese School. From then he devoted himself to education for thirty-seven years until 1990. He taught at San Yuk Primary School, Pudu, Kuala Lumpur, from 1953 to 1964; Naam Kheung Primary School from 1965 to 1982; and finally Confucian Private Secondary School, Kuala Lumpur, from 1983 to 1990.

Over the years, Loot has held many key positions in Chinese educational organizations, specifically as vice-president of Jiao Zong (1965–2006), vice-president (1965–89) and president (1990–91) of the Kuala Lumpur Chinese School Teachers' Association, President of the Federation of Malaya Chinese Senior Normal Graduate Teachers' Union (1962–72), president of the Selangor Senior Normal Students' Association for many years, and also as a member of Dong Jiao Zong's Chinese Independent School Working Committee, director of the Merdeka University Sdn. Bhd., and chairman of the LLG Cultural Development Centre (1996–2008).

Loot Ting Yee's childhood and school days were spent in the period when Japan invaded China and started the Pacific War. At the time, the Chinese from the mainland and overseas were organizing anti-invasion measures to counter the Japanese. It is believed that his patriotic stand developed during this period of his childhood.

He always spoke out against extreme statements and propaganda from politicians and Malay chauvinists who had hidden agendas or were looking for political advantage by trying to negate the contributions of non-Malays in building the nation, thus undermining national unity and provoking interracial tension.

His passion for history made him familiar with China's historical figures and culture, which led to his love for and persistence in upholding and defending the right for Chinese people to be given education in their mother language, as well as the protection of Chinese culture and ethnic rights.

His fearless character allowed him to speak up against the evils of his time. His style was influenced by Lim Lian Geok whose philosophy was: "Reasoning based on fact; to be optimistic but not pessimistic; to be positive but not negative."

First, there were his frequent open statements and written polemics. For any event or propaganda that was unfair to the Chinese community and Chinese educational rights, or could harm national unity and racial harmony, he would write open statements to speak out and criticize these actions. His powerful statements were often targeted at political tycoons and government high officials. These included the "Father of Malaysian Independence", Tunku Abdul Rahman, every term's prime minister, and MCA tycoons. Issues included the early language education movement, the case of the Merdeka University, the Cabinet Educational Report, Society Act Amendments, the 3M system, language to be used for cheques, signboards issues, etc. Written polemics were also one of his tools to voice the truth as he saw it, especially when confronting claims that slandered Chinese language education.

Second, he used sits-ins, hunger strikes, and shave-to-protests. In 1984, on the issue of using the Malay language in primary school assemblies, he drew national attention by doing a sit-in alone in front of the Agricultural Bank building, where the State Education Department is located. This resulted in the recall of that order by the director of education. The same year after the Bukit Cina (Malacca) events, he announced that he would be on a hunger strike at Qingyun Temple every day from 7am to 7pm, to protest strongly against the unreasonable and rude actions on Bukit Cina by the Malacca state government.

In 1987, when an issue regarding senior posts in Chinese primary schools broke out, Loot Ting Yee had his head shaved publicly in the Malacca Hang Tuah Assembly Hall to protest against the government for sending teachers who do not know the Chinese language to take up high positions in Chinese primary schools. On 27 April 1988, he organized a one-day sit-in strike that would take place every 28th day of the month — until the Chinese primary schools' senior posts issue was resolved and four Chinese community leaders detained under the Internal Security Act were released.

Loot Ting Yee's firm character and tough style often offended many politicians. On 31 December 1979, he received an order from the Selangor State Education Bureau for him to be posted away from Kuala Lumpur's Nam Qiang Chinese Primary School to Jerteh, Terengganu. As a result of this, he filed a lawsuit with the government which lasted for three years and which he ultimately lost. His pension was cancelled and he was forced to leave Chinese primary school and teach at Confucian Chinese Private Secondary School.

Although Loot Ting Yee's tough style had gained him popularity among the local community and impassioned their inner voices, he had a personal limitation in the Chinese education movement. Firstly, unlike Lim Lian Geok and Sim Mou Yu, who organized mass movements and public opinions that formed various waves of reforms, Loot Ting Yee often fought on his own, which was also his greatest contribution since he facilitated first line leaders. Secondly he was a mirror that reflected all the true tactics and faces of evil. Though he knew he cannot defeat them thoroughly, he gave his opponents a hard time so they could not eat or sleep comfortably.

In 1986 he was diagnosed with severe diabetes but continued to fight for Chinese language education and act selflessly for the rights of the Chinese community. He eventually followed his doctor's advice to rest and return back to full health. On 29 November 1990, he fell and injured his backbone while taking a bus, which led to problems in walking and subsequent bed rest. In 1990 his teaching term at the Confucian Chinese Private Secondary School ended and he retired according to the regulations. In 1994 he campaigned for the post of president of Jiao Zong, but was not successful.

Entering twenty-first century, the first line of defence for Chinese language education was broken when "Vision" schools, opened, following the government's decision to use English as the medium of instruction for science and mathematics subjects in schools of all language mediums. This made the situation more critical for the champions of Chinese language education. On 31 December 2002, without giving any prior notice, Loot Ting Yee announced to the media that he was resigning as the vice-president of Jiao Zong and from the Committee of Kuala Lumpur Chinese School Teachers' Association, due to the government's actions. Loot Ting Yee sighed emotionally that after struggling for the right of Chinese education for so many years, he could not only succeed but also became the "terminator" of Chinese education; hence, his resignation. However he reversed his stand after much persuasion from his colleagues. Eventually he resigned as the vice-president of Jiao Zong and chairman of Lim Lian Geok Foundation in 2006 and 2008 respectively.

Lopue, Benjamin

(卢谋国, Lu Mouguo, 1926–89)

Entrepreneur, community leader, Philippines

Benjamin Lopue established himself as one of the leading businessmen of Bacolod in the Philippines, never diverting his capital outside the province — living, ageing, and dying in Bacolod was a singular goal. Recognizing his singular contribution to the socio-economic growth and development of the City of Bacolod and the Province of Negros Occidental, the University of St La Salle (USLS) awarded him a doctorate of laws, honoris causa on 28 January 1995. This was for a man who was willing to take the risk of pounding it out through the rise and fall of the financial fortunes of Bacolod. Lopue did not overlook philanthropy and contributed mainly to education and religious activities. One of his sons, Leonito (卢美龙), carried on his legacy in all aspects, with achievements no less significant than his father's.

Born on 13 May 1926, Lopue left Fujian, China, for the Philippines in 1936. Unlike many Chinese at the time, he proceeded directly to Bacolod with only a brief stop at the Manila harbour to change boats. He first worked at his brother's small sari-sari store as a store hand.

When World War II broke out, Lopue enlisted in the United States Armed Forces of the Far East (USAFFE) and was assigned to its intelligence section and thus never saw active combat. By this time Lopue was known in Bacolod as a salesman of sundry goods. He used his reputation to set up a small store at the central market of Bacolod as a front for his "intelligence" activities. While he went around the city selling kalamay, asin, kag ginamos (sugar, salt, and shrimp paste), he also carried messages from resistance leaders such as Alfredo Montelibano Sr, hidden inside his basket of goods, and secretly dropped them off in town. He disclosed that when the Japanese would stop and question him about his meandering in the upland, he would give the standard reply of a trader "doing his rounds". After the war, Lopue ventured into trading — selling sugar from Bacolod to Leyte, Cebu and Manila at nearly twice the price. He would then buy army rations in Leyte and resell them back in Bacolod. Painstakingly, he made enough capital to start an even bigger enterprise.

With an initial P15,000 as capital, he set up Lopue's Bazaar selling glassware in 1945. Five years later, Lopue received his Filipino citizenship, a milestone in his life that made him decide to "live, age, and die" in Bacolod. When the shop was just getting its feet wet, Lopue and his wife did everything themselves, manning the store during daytime, and staying up until midnight to clean the shelves and arrange stocks. Over the years, it gained a reputation for affordable but high quality goods. In 1949, it became Lopue's Department Store. During those early days of merchandise trading, Bacolod was still in the economic doldrums. It was such a small market that businessmen from the capital of Manila would not even know where it was. When asked about his location, Lopue would have to say he was in Iloilo-Bacolod. Iloilo is the more popular neighbouring province. Silay, now just a small town on Negros Island, was more well known than Bacolod then as ships used to dock there.

Like most Chinese in the Philippines, Lopue believed in hard work. This coupled with resourcefulness and a willingness to venture into new paths, paved the way for the unprecedented take-off of his merchandise store during the sugar boom from 1960 through to 1970. Business was so good that his customers included famous personalities such as the late statesman Jose Yulo and the widow of President Sergio Osmeña, who even flew from Cebu to buy her favourite toiletries at his Lopue's Department Store. By that time, the original three-man staff of the store had grown to more than a hundred. One of Lopue's proudest achievements in his business ventures is that there had only been one labour strike in the whole history of Lopue's Department Store. He had developed a sound and caring management style where employees are provided with benefits beyond those required by law, including a housing scheme set in Camingawan and Airport Subdivision.

In the early 1970s, against the advice of many, Lopue established the Mandalangan branch of his department store. Mandalangan Town at that time was all rice fields and marshland. Lopue's friends objected to it, but Lopue's daring move not only expanded his business, but also began decongesting Bacolod. Other entrepreneurs followed his lead, and this Bacolod's "suburbia" grew. When Lopue entered the area, there were only eight jeepney rides (public transport) plying the route, now there are hundreds. With his trademark of forging ahead despite the gloomy state of the economy, Lopue found himself in the top 500 corporations of the country in the 1980s, commanding a character loan of up to P10 million. Today, there are eleven Lopue's Department Stores scattered around the province of Negros.

Besides his department stores, Lopue ventured into agriculture as well, a "calling" he could not resist as his ancestors were farmers in China. He was not happy with the prevailing bangus (milkfish) production system then, which only yielded a harvest once a year, so he went to Taipei (台北) for three days to study how their methods allowed them a biannual harvest. This resulted in the first fishpond in Negros to yield more fish in a year than all the other neighbouring ponds. Lopue found the province of Negros invigorating and thus went into sugar and rice farming in the 1960s. He personally worked the soil to "reorient" his farmers and move them away from their customary rice cultivation practices. Seeing him with his hands dirty, the farmers began to use his methods and allowed his fields to yield more cavans per hectare (50 kg per cavan) than usual. Instead of the traditional once-a-year rice production, his farm also went into the no-dead-season cycle.

Under his active management, his business expanded to secure an 800-personnel support, and close to 7,000 persons, inclusive of his workers and their families in the stores, farms, and fishponds. With this large number of people dependent on his business, he could very well have had the wherewithal to run for public office. But he avowed distaste for this and discouraged his sons from going into politics. "It is enough that I play my part as a good businessman," he said. True to his belief, the Lopue Group is one of the top 100 taxpayers in Bacolod City.

With his success in his business endeavours, Lopue involved himself in many philanthropic activities. In memory of his late wife, Soledad Dacles, he set up a scholarship for poor but deserving students for their education at the St John's Institute, also known as "Hua Ming College" (华明学院), a Chinese-Filipino school set up with his support, where he was a board member. His lasting contribution to the Tsinoy community in Bacolod, however, is his endowment fund that established the "Chinese Studies Program" at the USLS. Children of four of his employees are chosen each year to pursue college at the university, and at the Lopue Department Store, his yearly raffle prizes for promotion included one full-year scholarship to USLS.

With ideals passed on from his family, and the tenets of the Christian faith imbibed during his conversion, Lopue became well known in Bacolod as upright and honest. In 1953–54, he organized the Chinese Catholic Association to encourage Chinese Catholics to be more involved in church activities. He was also responsible for the construction of the Queen of Peace Church — which took only three months to build — in compliance with the wishes of the land donor, and he became a recipient of the Pontifical Award of St Sylvester.

Lopue passed away on 14 August 1989. His second son, Leonito, continues his father's advocacy for Bacolod. In business, he is now president of Lopue's San Sebastian, Lopue's Value Store Hinigaran, Lopue's Value Store Sagay, Lopue's Value Store 888, and president of DLRS Travel Agency. Acknowledged for his leadership in the business sector, he was elected president of the Bacolod Chapter of the Philippine Retailers Association and governor for Western Visayas. He is currently also vice-president of the Northern Negros Filipino-Chinese Chamber of Commerce.

In philanthropy and religious activities, Leonito Loupe is a member of the board of directors of the USLS, La Salle Victorias, Filipino-Chinese Amateur Athletic Federation (Bacolod Chapter), Bahay Pag-Asa, and Museo Sang Bata sa Negros (Negros Children's Museum), helping youth offenders, and providing an interactive museum for children. He is also president of USLS Handumanan

Science Foundation. He continues his father's desire to help his own employees — from one scholar a year, he now sponsors four children of Lopue employees to schools. He has played his part in bridging the ethnic Chinese and Filipinos of Bacolod and Negros as well, thrice heading the BacoLaodiat Festival, a fun way of joining Bacolod with laodiat (热闹) to celebrate Chinese New Year with mainstream Filipinos.

Leonito Loupe was awarded the Banwahanon Award in 2009, and considers it one of his most important achievements. This award is given to a Bacolod resident by the city of Bacolod and is the highest form of recognition given to a Bacolodnon. Today he has been appointed by the mayor to head the Banwahanon Committee. Like his father, he has a doctorate of laws, honoris causa, from the USLS which presented him with this on his father's birthday on 13 May, in 2005.

Low Thia Khiang

(刘程强, Liu Chengqiang, 1956–)

Teacher, politician, opposition figure, Singapore

Low Thia Khiang was best known for being one of the two opposition members in the PAP dominated parliament of Singapore since the 1990s. Unlike the other opposition member, Chiam See Tong, Low is from the Workers' Party, a political party with a long history and a party that has had many ups-and-downs since its inception. It seems that the Workers' Party has been garnering attention ever since Low managed to hold on to his Hougang constituency for another term. This could be attributed to Low's affable demeanour and his manner of portraying himself as an ordinary man.

Although his personal history may appear prosaic, his education and work experience as a teacher have proved invaluable in shaping his political and social awareness. A Teochew who was born in 1956 in Singapore, he obtained a Bachelor of Arts degree from the Nanyang University, majoring in Chinese language and literature, and government and public administration; as well as a diploma in education from the National Institute of Education in Singapore. He was well placed to observe the socio-political landscape. After teaching in a school for a while, he went into business. But his nascent interest in political affairs grew and he joined the Worker's Party in 1982 to promote democracy in Singapore. He rose through the ranks of the party and was soon appointed its organizing secretary, working next to the then leader of the party, J. B. Jeyaretnam. His opportunity to prove his mettle and voice the need for an alternative voice in Singapore politics came when he acted as Jeyaretnam's election agent for the Anson Constituency in 1984. His refreshing take on politics led to his representation of the Workers' Party in a television debate with the PAP government, where he engaged the late Singapore ex-president, Ong Teng Cheong, and current Singapore Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong on the issue of the elected presidency in 1988. In the general election of the same year, Low collaborated with Gopalan Nair and Lim Lye Soon in the Tiong Bahru Group Representative Constituency (GRC). They did exceptionally well for their first foray into politics, obtaining 43.3 per cent of the votes. Eventually, in 1991, Low came into his own in politics when he became secretary-general for the Workers' Party after Jeyaretnam withdrew from politics, following a slew of lawsuits from the PAP leaders and was declared a bankrupt. Despite the exodus of some Jeyaretnam loyalists from the party, Low managed to demonstrate that he had the party thoroughly in hand when he won the Hougang constituency and was elected into Parliament in 1991. It is a parliamentary seat that he has consistently won throughout the various general elections so much so that in the 2006 election, Low secured 62.74 per cent of the votes in Hougang, which was 7.76 per cent more than the votes he had garnered in the 2001 election against his PAP opponent, Eric Low.

As evinced by his electoral success, Low's method of helming the leadership of the Workers' Party had brought the party out of the doldrums. From 1991, he consistently carried out strategies to build Singaporeans' confidence in the Workers' Party against PAP claims that opposition parties were irrationally opposing the government for the sake of opposing. As a visionary opposition leader, Low has genuine trust in Singaporean people and believes in giving society a Workers' Party that was composed of people from all walks of life and a party that had active and open debates. Under his leadership, the Workers' Party has been revitalized. To ensure equality within the party, Low has instituted a system whereby cadre members elect the core leadership and decide the direction and manner of political engagement of the party. This has not only imbued every member of the party with a sense of belonging in the party, but all its members have been encouraged to conduct internal debates, discussions, and, for those possessing the requisite skills, assume leadership roles. Teamwork is particularly emphasized within the party so as to prevent schisms within it.

Indeed, Low's management skills, people skills, trust in others, and affability led to his being selected by then Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong in 1992 to participate as a member of the Cost Review Committee. After a year of intensive study, he decided to produce his own independent report as he had a different perspective from other members of the committee. But he did so without offending the key players in the government, thereby demonstrating his tact with his fellow politicians. Low Thia Khiang's electoral success may thus be attributed to his respectful treatment of others.

In the 2011 general elections, Low left Hougang to lead his five-member team to contest in the Aljunied GRC. His team defeated the PAP team led by George Yeo and won 54.72 per cent of the votes. This is the first GRC ever won by an opposition party in the general elections since the introduction of the GRC system in 1988. Yaw Shin Leong, groomed by Low, contested in the Hougang single-member constituency and defeated the PAP candidate, winning 64.8 per cent of the votes.

Lu Do

(吕裕, Lü Yu, 1860–1933)
Industrialist, entrepreneur, Philippines

The Philippines has been known as the "Coconut Capital of the World". At its peak, the country cornered 40 per cent of the world's coconut production. In 1980, it held 85 per cent of the world's coconut exports. The coconut industry and the production of coconut oil are among the most important agricultural outputs of the country. Almost synonymous with the Philippine coconut oil industry is the Lu Do and Lu Ym Corporation of Cebu in the Visayas region of the Philippines (菲律宾宿务恒裕油厂公司), popularly known in Southeast Asia as the "coconut king." It is run by the Lu Family, which has dominated the coconut oil industry for three generations.

The pioneering spirit behind the company was the family patriarch, Lu Do (吕裕), who founded the Heng Lu Company (恒裕公司) at the end of nineteenth century. He was later helped by his only son, Lu Ym (吕音, 1886–1935). Due to economic difficulties and poverty, Lu Do left his hometown in China (厦门禾山吕昔) in 1889 to come to the Philippines and chose Cebu to be his base of livelihood.

He started with a small backyard factory that produced soap and candles. Discovering the abundance and unending cheap supply of coconuts in the country, Lu Do started to use coconut oil as the base for his products. Seeing the unlimited opportunities provided by coconut oil, which was then an essential household item in the country, he gradually took advantage of the increasing demand for coconut oil and started to focus on the coconut oil production business, which shows he was quite far-sighted.

He started out using simple hand-pressed machinery in his factory to produce coconut oil, but when Lu Ym came of age in 1907 and was ready to help, father and son worked hard day and night, lived frugally in order to save their profits, and accumulated enough capital to import an Anderson extractor in 1931. From manual production, the company now produced coconut oil mechanically, which vastly increased the volume of production to an average ten tons of coconut oil daily.

In 1933 they bought four more machines and increased production to fifty tons a day. But just as they were enjoying rapid growth in production, the patriarch Lu Do passed away. Two years later, Lu Ym, who had worked very hard at the cost of his own health, became ill and passed on also. Lu Ym had three sons who, at a young age, had already started helping their father who had expanded the business further.

The eldest, Cayetano, (Lü Xihong 吕希宏, 7 August 1914–14 April 1983), was just twenty-one at the time, the second, Paterno (Lü Xizong 吕希宗, 12 November 1916–), nineteen, and the youngest, Cipriano (Lü Xifu 吕希福, 26 September 1919–15 June 1981), sixteen. The three took over the helm and started the third-generation involvement in coconut oil production.

In 1937 the three brothers moved the factory to a bigger place to expand production further. They bought new machinery, including a steam-pressed machine for oil extraction in order to modernize production further. They hired a professional engineer from the United States to manage the factory and expanded into new ventures such as production of vegetable oil, cooking oil, margarine, and other products, and marketed them in the Visayas and Mindanao. In 1938, they started to tap the overseas market — the United States and Europe, in particular. The eldest brother, Cayetano, took charge of marketing and started living both in the United States and Cebu, frequently travelling back and forth.

In 1940 the three brothers decided to form a new company and the Heng Lu Company became the Lu Do and Lu Ym Company, but retained the Chinese name, Heng Lu. Before the war, their coconut oil production factory was the biggest not just in Cebu or in the Philippines but the world in fact. From fifty tons a day, production increased to 500 to 600 tons daily. Unfortunately, during the Japanese Occupation, the entire factory was bombed and completely destroyed. The hard work of Lu Do and Lu Ym went up in flames and the production and export business came to a complete stop. Following the example of their forebears, in order to survive and support the family, young Cayetano and his two brothers started from scratch, using manual labor to extract coconut oil, often doing the hard labour themselves.

In 1945, soon after liberation, the three brothers worked hard to revive the factory. They reconstructed it and bought new machinery. Banking on their expertise and experience, they were able to resume production in two years. In 1948, the rehabilitated company became a full-fledged corporation and changed its name to Lu Do and Lu Ym Corporation. Cayetano was chairman and president, Paterno was treasurer, and Cipriano was executive vice-president for operations.

Of the three brothers, it was Cayetano who became well known as a leading industrialist. He took charge of tapping the overseas market and travelled to the United States, while Cipriano travelled to Europe, not just to solicit business, but also to observe modern methods of production and management. Paterno was given the task of forming the real estate business called LuDo & LuYm Development Corporation.

The company's growth was phenomenal. In the early 1960s, long after the war, Lu Do and Lu Ym Corporation moved to Tupas Street, San Nicolas, where the present oil factory is located. There, a 1,752-metre long pier, which could accommodate a 10,000-ton capacity freighter, was also completed to facilitate the shipping of the oil to overseas markets. They expanded their operations not just in Cebu, but also to the whole of the Philippines, and got into the California coconut oil market in the United States as well. At its peak, the company produced 600 tons of coconut oil daily. The 1970s saw the completion of the company's office building in Plaridel Street. At fifteen storeys high, it was the tallest building in the city at the time and a Cebu landmark boasting of its only revolving restaurant.

In the 1950s, coconut oil production in the Philippines increased tremendously and thus competition likewise increased rapidly. The Lu brothers, like their grandfather and father, were far-sighted enough to look into other fields of businesses. Based on market research on essential products, they decided to diversify the mother company. Soon they were involved in the manufacturing and production of cornstarch and corn feeds, cooking oil and vegetable oil, caramel colouring, a cassava plantation, real estate, and the hotel business. This group of companies under Lu Do and Lu Ym Corporation was among the early integrated big scale businesses put under one flag. In 1979 the corporation ranked among the top twenty in the whole Philippines.

In 1981 and 1983, Cipriano and Cayetano passed away one after the other respectively, leaving Paterno as the only one in the third generation at the helm. However they had already trained the fourth generation to take over the greatly expanded and diversified businesses of the company, which included not just the coconut products, but also real estate, and other ventures. Up to the 1990s, Lu Do and Lu Ym Corporation remained the top producer of copra and coconut oil, as well as cornstarch and cooking oil, 80 per cent of which are exported to the United States, Western Europe, Japan, Korea, and China.

The three Lu brothers are renowned in Cebu not just for their outstanding accomplishments as entrepreneurs and industrialists, but also for their contribution to the Chinese-Filipino community and Philippine society. They established a memorial fund in Lu Do's memory to support education and scholarships and other public services. The family contributed to the building of Cebu's Sacred Heart School for Boys and Sacred Heart School for Girls. For the province of Cebu, the corporation also built the Ludo Integrated Elementary School for rural poor students. At the old Cebu Chinese Cemetery was congested and run-down, the family gave generously to rehabilitate and rebuild the cemetery. Hence, it was renamed the Lu Do Memorial Park in memory of the Lu patriarch.

Perhaps, the most remarkable contribution of Lu Do and Lu Ym Corporation in Cebuano memory was made in 1963, at the commemoration of the 400th year of the establishment of Christianity in the Philippines. Since the first Catholic Church was established in Cebu, Pope Paul and other church dignitaries from Rome attended the ceremony during the quadricentennial celebration. For this purpose, the LuDo and Lu Ym Corporation built a big hall at the reclamation area that would accommodate the tens of thousands of guests. In memory of the generosity and the celebration, Pope Paul's flag was placed on top of the tall Lu Do and Lu Ym building for the glory of the Catholic Church. In 1977, Paterno was honoured with the title of Papal Knight of St Sylvester, in recognition of his many contributions to the Catholic Church.

Lu Lay Sreng

(吕来盛, Lü Laisheng, 1940–)
Politician, Cambodia

Lu Lay Sreng is one of seven deputy prime ministers in the Hun Sen-led Cambodian cabinet; he is also minister for rural development.

Lu is the son of a Chinese migrant from Teochew, Guangdong Province, China. His father was Ear Peng Taing; his mother, Kuy Hoy. Lu was born on 3 October 1940 (another source states 1938) in Srang Village, Kampong Spue, Cambodia. He was sent to a Chinese school for three months at his birthplace, but was sent back to his parents for being too naughty. His parents then sent him to a Cambodian school where he received six years of education (1949–55). He then went to a technical high school in Phnom Penh. According to one report, he was already involved in anti-French activities at the age of fourteen. Still, he finished his high school education with good results. In 1962 Lu received an American scholarship to study in the United States. In the 1950s and 1960s, there was an exchange programme between the United States and Cambodia and students were sent to California State University Long Beach (CSULB) so it was not surprising that Lu also went to that university. He received a BA degree in industrial arts in 1966 (the official biography says that he also received a BSc degree in mathematics in 1967, but by 1966 he was already back in Cambodia).

Lu was active during his student days — he was elected president of the Cambodian Students Association in the United States. He urged Cambodian students in the United States to return home to help develop their native land. Upon graduation, he returned to Cambodia in 1966 and served as general manager at the National Sugar Factory (Societe Nationale de Sucre) in Kampong Tram Province. When he took over the sugar factory, it was on the brink of bankruptcy, but Lu was able to save the factory with a new strategy. During that period, Cuba and Taiwan were known for exporting sugar at low prices. Lu bought cheap Cuban red sugar through Vietnam, and resold the sugar for a profit. He then used the profit to plant sugar cane in Cambodia. This strategy saved the factory and its 3,000 employees. He served as the general manager until 1970 when he was assigned to two new positions: expert-director of the National Productivity Centre (1970–72) and expert-adviser to the Ministry of Information in charge of rebuilding the Broadcasting Network.

In 1972 Lu was elected to the National Assembly and served as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee up to 1975. When the Khmer Rouge "liberated" Cambodia, he fled to the United States where he went into business and started his own restaurant and grocery store. He then obtained permanent resident status in the United States (one source says he even obtained American citizenship). In 1978, when the Vietnamese invaded Cambodia and defeated the Pol Pot regime, Lu sold his restaurant and grocery store and returned to Cambodia, leaving his three children in the United States. It was reported that he had joined a military group to fight the Vietnamese army in opposition to the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia.

In 1981 Prince Sihanouk established a political party called Funcinpec, which is the acronym of the French title for "National United Front for an Independent, Neutral, Peaceful, and Cooperative Cambodia". Between 1983 and 1993, Lu was the general director of Funcinpec Psychological Warfare. In 1993–95 he was appointed undersecretary of state, Ministry of Commerce. He was then promoted and served as secretary of state, Ministry of Commerce, 1995–97. He participated in the general elections in 1998 and was elected to the National Assembly. Between 1998 and 2004 he was senior minister and minister of information.

In 2003 he participated in the elections again and was re-elected. In the coalition government formed by the Cambodian People's Party (CPP, led by Hun Sen) and Funcinpec, Lu was appointed deputy prime minister and minister of rural development. This is worth noting as the Chinese in Cambodia had for a long time been deemed suspect and suppressed, and were unable to participate in politics. But there are now many Cambodians of Chinese descent who have emerged onto the political scene; Lu Lay Sreng is one of them. He has been elected deputy chairman of the Funcinpec, which has been on the decline, with some of its members having joined the CPP. There was a suggestion that the CPP and Funcinpec should merge, but Lu was said to have disagreed.

In 2007 Lu returned to Long Beach to meet his old friends and the Cambodian community in the United States. He appealed to the Cambodian community there to assist in the development of Cambodia. He also announced that he had a water sanitation project for the rural population in Cambodia.

Lu has visited China many times. He is in favour of better relations between Cambodia and China. However, when asked about his attitude towards China by a journalist from the People Daily, his reply was that as a Cambodian of Chinese descent, he has chosen to stay in Cambodia because Cambodia is his country and native land. China is his ancestral land.

Lu has three grown up children: Lu Davy, Lu Ravy, and Lu Reththy. Lu is proficient in many languages: Cambodian, English, and Chinese dialect Teochew. In the official biography though, he is said to be fluent in French and Chinese also. Lu has many hobbies, including boxing, basketball, football, and farming.

Lum, Olivia

(林爱莲, Lin Ailian, orphaned)

Entrepreneur, business leader, Singapore

Olivia Lum is known as the "Water Queen" for her founding and presiding role in Hyflux Ltd., the biggest water treatment firm in Southeast Asia. Lum came up with the name "Hyflux" from industry jargon which refers to the "flux" of the membrane, the higher the flux, the more effective its filtering capability.

Lum was left behind by her biological parents as a baby at a hospital in Perak in Malaysia. She is unable to find the true identity of her biological family to this day. Lum was then taken in by a sixty-three-year old widow who gambled and was simply known as "the grandmother". The little girl then cohabited with four other adopted kids in a hut made of palm tree materials with a tin covering which was inundated with water during downpours. They used to lay out bricks on the ground to move around in order to avoid the rainwater. There was no potable water facility in the hut located in Perak's rural villages in Kampar, a tin-mining area in disuse. Entrepreneurial from an early age, trading her toys away when she was four years old to a group of friends that lived nearby. She also sold handmade popsicles, mangos, buns with kaya spread and jeans to have a living.

Her initial educational experience proved challenging as elementary school instructors forbade her to do participate in exercises due to her thin and frail build. Lum overcame this by placing rocks in bags and used them as ankle and leg weights for exercising to augment her physique (a few hours per day), regardless of weather conditions. After a few months of physical exercising, Lum won a 100m dash in school and received sports shoes as a reward, an unforgettable moment for her.

For her secondary and tertiary education (Tiong Bahru Secondary School, Hwa Chong Junior College, and the National University of Singapore respectively), Lum went to Singapore. She scored all As in her exams and financed her studies with part-time jobs (offering teaching services and selling things) while completing her chemistry degree in the Science faculty. When she graduated from university, it was the 1986 recession.

Despite the recession, she found a job and started her career as a lab chemist with the GlaxoSmithKline Singapore branch, which paid her an annual salary of $40,000. It was during this phase of her life that she saw the possibility of generating profits from water filtration. After working for three and a half years, Lum disposed of her car and residence at the age of twenty-nine to come up with US$12,000 (S$20,000) to establish Hyflux in 1989.

At that point in time Hyflux was a modest two-person (later three persons) outfit distributing water-filtration equipment mainly in Singapore, Indonesia, and Malaysia, and competing against twenty other bigger-scale firms. Lum drove a motorcycle from Jurong to Batu Pahat and peddled her filters and softeners directly from factory to factory, injecting her profits back into the business. She hit her first million dollars five years after founding the company.

She then took a calculated risk by banking on intricately-designed membrane technology to filter and process waste water instead of conventional chemical solutions at that point of time. Although membrane technology had existed for some time, Lum laboured on improving innovative usage of these filters. With time, Hyflux began to clinch starter contracts, including a water filtration facility for Singapore's Bird Park. Under Lum's determined leadership and her great foresight, bigger-scale projects started flowing in. Lum also began to clinch overseas projects, including those in China, whose government started to realize the value of recycling water alongside with economic growth.

Lum enjoyed definite advantages as a Chinese-speaking head of a smaller outfit which gave her an edge over larger companies in Japan and the West that are often tied down by administrative procedures — in other words, not nimble enough. Lum was able to give rapid response backup services to her clients by flying directly from Singapore to China to resolve any problems within a day. The fact that she was a lady and a welder attracted the attention of the Chinese.

In this way, Hyflux has moved further than managing, integrating and installing filtration systems to research and development (R&D), design and construction works, and consumer products development and has since built up a track record in designing, construction, provision, running and maintenance of water treatment and liquid separation plants, utilizing hi-tech membranes for a variety of production, local authority and state customers.

Lum's hard work has paid off as evidenced by the quick expansion of the business. From a gradual take-off, in 2001, Hyflux went on to be publicly listed in less than ten years after its founding. It made its debut on the SESDAQ in January 2001 and was the inaugural water treatment company to be on the SESDAQ in January 2001 before proceeding to be listed on the Singapore Exchange's mainboard in April 2003.

Since its listing, Hyflux has clinched large-scale contracts, including constructing and running Singapore's first US$200-million desalination plant and three other water-treatment plants. As for Chinese ventures, Hyflux has expanded to projects in twenty Chinese cities, including Beijing and Shanghai.

Venturing even further away, Hyflux in 2004, signed a US$400-million deal to provide water treatment plants for Dubai's landmark facilities like the Palm and the World, which are the biggest artificially reclaimed islands on earth. Hyflux solicited funds in excess of US$300 million to construct Singapore's largest desalination facility slated to become fully operational in 2013. This is part of the country's vision to be self-reliant on water resources. Future expansion include targeted entry into India, where her first offices were set up in Chennai with five employees. Africa and other parts of Southeast Asia are the next targets. As of 2011, Hyflux currently has a presence in 16 countries and worth S$1.8 billion.

Having built up its clientele, Hyflux is avoiding overdependence on retailing membranes developed by other companies by expending almost 8 per cent of its revenues on R&D to develop its own membranes indigenously. Lum is developing strategies to help alleviate the need for heavy capital and asset spending required of large, water infrastructural deals.

Hyflux has also become a comprehensive water treatment problem solver, coming up with systems that offers the full gamut of fundamental design and engineering support to turnkey projects, a one-stop solution way ahead of those of its rivals. As one of Asia's foremost water and fluid treatment companies, it has a niche in the construction and use of membrane and other technologies for liquid/solid separation.

Other services it offers include process design and optimization, engineering procurement and construction management, pilot testing, fabrication, installation, commissioning, operation and maintenance. It also deals with new innovative technologies such as "dragon-fly", which can trap potable water from the humidity present in the air. These technologies may be needed to help Hyflux cope with bigger and more intense competition from France's Suez, Siemens' USFilter, and GE.

Lum's role in the company has also expanded. Besides leading Hyflux's expansion underpinned by her manpower strength of 600, she also oversees policy, strategic, and corporate matters, and leads the R&D department, her core interest. For her achievement, Lum was the first female to receive the coveted Ernst & Young's World Entrepreneur of the Year prize 2011 (11th year of the award) at the age of 50. Lum is also active in the National University of Singapore as part of its Board of Trustees.

Lum is unmarried and her main companions are two dogs: an Alaskan malamute named Mood, and a Samoyed called Snowy.

Lương Chí Cường

(梁志强, Liang Zhiqiang, 1975–)
Singer, Vietnam

Lương Chí Cường is known for being the first-prize winner of the prestigious singing contest, Tiếng Hát Truyền Hình, in 1996. This competition is an important broadcasting event for music lovers and is jointly organized by the Ho Chi Minh City Television Broadcasting Station (Đài Truyền hình Thành phố Hồ Chí Minh) and Cat Tien Sa Company (Công ty Cát Tiên Sa), a firm specializing in advertising and broadcasting services. A year later he again clinched the first prize in the national singing contest, Morning Star Rendezvous (Sao Mai điểm hẹn). He has earned a name for himself in the traditional Chinese and Vietnamese musical genres including folksongs (dân ca), historical songs (sử ca), revolutionary songs (dòng nhạc cách mạng), and popular songs translated from Chinese into Vietnamese (nhạc Hoa lời Việt). His passion and talent have injected new vigour into these genres in Vietnam.

Cường was born on 9 January 1975 in Ho Chi Minh City. His grandparents left China for Vietnam some time during the Japanese invasion of China. When he was a little boy, he followed his mother almost every night to the theatre to watch Chinese traditional opera performed in Vietnamese (cải lương hồ quảng). The costumes in such operas are colourful and elaborate, and the melodies can be reused with lyrics changed to suit the context of the play. Cường dreamed of the day when he could wear those traditional costumes and perform on stage. Even though he did not come from a family of artistes, his early childhood exposure to the musical and lively theatrical form planted the seed for a future career in him. Music has become a big part of his life; it "has been infused in my blood ('ngấm vào máu')," he once said. He sang along with the Vietnamese singers whom he saw on television even before he could read Vietnamese when he was young. When he was learning Mandarin in Chinese-language schools such as Thái Phiên and Mạch Kiếm Hùng, he won many prizes in Mandarin song contests organized by these schools.

Despite his passion for singing, he initially did not receive moral support from his parents who held the traditional Chinese perception of singers as outcasts (xướng ca vô loại). They urged him to pursue practical jobs such as lathe operator, mechanic, or shoemaker, which he did for a while only because his attempts to enter the singing profession had failed several times and the hard knocks he received seemed to indicate an alternative career path for him. He had approached several concert and show managers for an audition, but was always ignored. Despite the obstacles, he persevered in pursuing his dream and applied to participate in the singing contest organized by the Ho Chi Minh City Television Broadcasting Station for the first time in 1992. He was then seventeen, a teenager full of passion and confidence although he could not pronounce Vietnamese properly then, he recalled. After the contest, one of the judges, Mỹ An, evaluated his vocal quality and potential favourably, but recommended that he undertook further training in vocal production and Vietnamese pronunciation. She helped him to overcome his weaknesses during practices, while he continued to participate in singing contests in 1994 and 1995, but did not win any prize. Nonetheless he persisted, by regarding these contests as testing ground where he could strive for better results.

In 1996 when he was twenty-one, he joined the army and received support from the army to continue participating in such contests. For three months before the contest in 1996, he received extensive training from three other teachers, Măng Thị Hội, Anh Tuyết, and Trần Hiếu. He felt that he improved enormously afterwards and was grateful to these teachers. His passion and persistence during the years of training finally bore fruit in 1996 when he clinched the top prize at the most prestigious television singing contest of Ho Chi Minh City, Tiếng Hát Truyền Hình, with his entry song, "Người mẹ Miền Nam Tay Không Đánh Giặc" (Mothers of Southern Vietnam Fight Unarmed), a revolutionary piece composed by Thuận Yến. In 1997 he emerged the best singer at the competition, "Morning Star Rendezvous", and was also the silver medalist in the national army professional singing contest. These prizes became the launch pad for his singing career. He then decided to join the Seventh Military Zone Art Troupe (Đoàn Nghệ thuật Quân Khu 7) in which other talents, such as Thanh Thúy, the first-prize winner of the 1997 Ho Chi Minh City television singing contest, and popular singer, Tú Anh, first prize winner of the 2001 Ho Chi Minh City television singing contest, were also members. From then onwards, his parents no longer opposed his wish to pursue a singing career as they thought that the military, with its discipline, was a good environment for him.

As a full-time soldier and a serious performer, he always held performances scheduled by the Seventh Military Zone Art Troupe as priorities. Cường has frequently been invited to perform in his spare time at popular musical events, such as events organized by the Chinese community especially during the lunar new year, and charity events. As a tenor and lover of traditional musical genres, he excels in Chinese and Vietnamese songs that are majestic, vigorous, and energetic, as well as powerful. He was first known for singing the Vietnamese version of many Chinese songs such as, "Yêu là như thế" (from the television series "九岁县大爷"), "Người đến từ Triều Châu" ("我来自潮州"; sung to the tune of the Taiwanese song, "爱拼才会赢"), "Dương Quý Phi" ("Yang Guifei" [杨贵妃], Emperor Tang Xuanzong's consort), "Giã từ Mộng Mơ" (男儿当自强), "Không Là Hư Vô" (包青天), "Bông Hoa Cho Tình Bạn" (三国演义), and "Đường Thiên Lý" (西游记). Being a fan of Beijing opera himself, he would entertain his audience by imitating the popular opera characters of Đường Tăng (唐僧), Bao Công (包青天), or Ngũ A Ca (五阿哥 – 还珠格格), thus transforming the stage ambience. He was successful in performing Vietnamese revolutionary songs such as "Non nước miền Nam" ("Mountains and Rivers in the South" by Trường Phong) and "Đất nước" ("Our Nation" by Phạm Minh Tuấn). His repertoire had expanded into the Vietnamese epic genre and he was widely praised for his performance of pieces such as "Dòng máu Lạc hồng" (Lạc Dynasty), "Dân nước Nam" (The Việt People), "Sự tích Bánh chưng Bánh dày" (The Origin of the Symbolic Vietnamese Rice Cakes), and "Hào khí Thăng Long" (The Glorious Capital), to name a few examples. During the lunar new year, Tết, he is always busy obliging those who invite him to sing new year songs such as "Mừng Xuân mới" (Ushering in the New Year), "Chúc Xuân" (Celebrating Spring), "Thần tài đến" (The God of Fortune Arrives), and "Chào Xuân mới" (Greeting the New Year). He sings some of the songs celebrating the new year in both the Chinese and Vietnamese languages such as, "Phát Tài" (Becoming Prosperous), and "Khúc Hát Mừng Xuân" (Sing to Celebrate Spring). While singing, he often dances with a dance troupe on stage, displaying movements spectacularly choreographed to match the themes of the songs. He loves dancing and practises industriously with the dance troupes because he wants each of his dance movement to convey the meaning of the songs. He has always tried to revitalize existing genres to make them more appealing to the younger generation while keeping their styles.

Besides singing, Cường is also attracted to acting. He has ventured into the film industry, appearing in three movies. For his first movie in 1998, Đất khách, he was disappointed with his own performance. His two recent movies are Chàng Sửu Làm Du Lịch (The Rural Boy Joins Tourism Business) and Mưa Bong Bong (The Rain of Bubbles), set in rural villages in the southern region of Vietnam. Rural life in the former production is depicted as peaceful and desirable, while in the latter, it is used to critique the old-fashioned, conservative views of some villagers. Cường, who has an innocent boyish face, suited the rustic roles in these movies.

Happiness for Cường is doing what he loves to do — which is singing to serve his audience. Success for him is being accepted and encouraged by his audience. He dreams of the opportunity to study vocal training and dancing in China, and also hopes to be enrolled in a music institute in Vietnam. Ultimately he hopes to conduct classes to train the younger generation of vocalists in Vietnam.

Private interview with Lương Chí Cường, 20 December 2010, in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam.

Lương Thiếu Hàng

(梁少航, Liang Shaohang, 1911–76)
Artist, Vietnam

Lương Thiếu Hàng is a teacher of artists, having left a legacy in traditional water colour painting and been the master of several outstanding artists of Vietnam. He was at one point an apprentice of Triệu Thiếu Ngang (赵少昂, 1905–96), an eminent leader of the Lĩnh Nam (Lingnan) School of arts. According to Tây Đề Niên Giám (西堤年鉴), until 1949, Hàng had held a total of more than ten personal art exhibitions. Wild animals and everyday scenes in urban life or the villages were his favourite subjects. His portrayal of the hard life of the Vietnamese refugees in particular attracted so much public attention that the intellectuals of his time called him "the people's artist".

Hàng was originally from Cao Yếu (高要) district in what is presently known as Triệu Khánh City (肇庆市) in Guangdong province of China. He was born in a peasant family. His father passed away when he was very young, and he lived a life of poverty and hardship with his mother and his elder sister. In his teenage years, he learned how to draw after school hours with a famous artist in Guangdong called Lý Thọ Am (李寿庵). He later entered the Guangzhou School of Southeastern Arts (Trường Mỹ thuật Đông Nam ở Quảng Châu 广州东南美术学院) and graduated from there. After graduation, he wanted to understand more about the different schools of western art, and thus went to Hong Kong to continue his studies at the Wanguo Academy of Arts (Học viện Mỹ thuật Vạn Quốc 香港万国美术学院). It was in this period that he learned how to achieve a harmony between western and eastern schools of art. After graduation from Wanguo Academy, he participated in a few exhibitions in Hong Kong and Guangdong.

The turning point in his arts career came when he became an apprentice to Triệu Thiếu Ngang, who was a native of Phan Ngu district in Guangdong province and one of the famous artists who had graduated from The Arts Academy that was established by Cao Kỳ Phong (高奇峰). Ngang later became the leader of the Lĩnh Nam School and it was he who brought the school to a peak in its history. In 1935, Hàng applied to study at the Lĩnh Nam Nghệ Uyển (岭南艺苑) School of Arts in Hong Kong that was opened by Ngang. These were the words of Hàng about that period, 30 years later: "When I found out about the Lĩnh Nam School, it had just started its renaissance and was developing very strongly. The strokes were miraculous, the style was refined and illusory, the layout was steady…. I fell in love with the School."

The Lĩnh Nam School began to take shape at the end of the 19th century in Guangdong province, beginning with the work of the two brothers Cư Sào (居巢, 1811–65) and Cư Liêm (居廉, 1828–1904). This school of artists came to define itself through three famous artists at the school's peak. These three artists were known as the "Three Stars of Lingnan" (岭南三杰) comprising Cao Kiếm Phụ (高剑父, 1879–1951), Cao Kỳ Phong (高奇峰, 1889–1933), and Trần Thụ Nhân (陈树人, 1884–1948). Recognised as founders of the school, all three artists studied in Japan for many years and they were strongly influenced by the methods, calligraphy, and reform ideas of Japanese artists. The essence of the Lĩnh Nam School is the sense of courtesy and refinement that is achieved through a lack of lines in framing an idea or an object in combination with the mixing of the paint and water on the canvass or paper, rather than mixing them before applying them to the canvass or paper as practised in traditional water colour painting methods. The innovativeness of this school lies in its flexibility in the work's layout and in the speed, power of the method of colour change. Thus, a classic work of the Lĩnh Nam School is impressionistic; its colours are strong but yet refined; its layout is often lively and often surprises but this brings a freshness to the traditional Chinese water colour methods. After he began to study the Lĩnh Nam School's methods, Hàng became a follower of the School completely and held several personal exhibitions of his Lĩnh Nam works.

When the Sino-Japanese War started, Hàng went to Vietnam and was often around the southwestern provinces of Vietnam on the border with Cambodia. He then settled down in Chợ Lớn (or Đề Ngạn 堤岸), and a number of Chinese schools of the overseas Chinese requested for his services in teaching art.

Around 1960, Hàng established an arts school called Đông Phương Nghệ Uyển (东方艺苑) to officially train disciples in the Lĩnh Nam School. In almost thirty years of training and honing his skills, he reached a degree of maturity and earned a significant reputation for his techniques. In 1963, the monthly magazine called Trung Ngoại Hoạ Báo (中外画报) of Hong Kong introduced a painting of Hàng entitled Nhất vi độ giang (一苇渡江) as well as his biography. Nhất vi độ giang contains a professional biography of Hàng. In the Chinese language part of this Chinese-French bilingual edition, it was mentioned that Hàng went to the USA to learn more about Western art, instead of mentioning that he studied in Wanguo Academy of Arts, Hong Kong. Other sources do not mention that Hàng had gone to the USA to study. Perhaps the Trung Ngoại Hoạ Báo made a mistake on this detail.

In the spring of 1966, Hàng and 25 disciples of his organized an exhibition and the best of the exhibits were collected in print into a publication called Nam Tú Hoạ Tập (南秀画集). This publication was evidence of the impressive training that Hàng had given to the next generation who belonged to the Saigon branch of the Lĩnh Nam School. Another exhibition followed in the spring of 1967, and a second publication followed, which was called Nam Tú Hoạ Tập – đệ nhị tập (南秀画集：第二集). In the preface to this publication written by Hoàng Hoa Sấu (黄花瘦), an overseas Chinese writer in Saigon at that time wrote: "This collection marked the progress of the best students of the Lĩnh Nam School in Vietnam. Shouldering the difficulties of teaching, Mr Lương Thiếu Hàng contributed to the success of his students."

In 1970, at a large-scale exhibition of calligraphy and painting that raised money for a seed fund for the Sùng Chính Hospital (越南崇正医院), a hospital built by the Hakka community in Saigon. Hàng participated with 20 disciplines of his participated in this cause. The exhibition saw in total the participation of 30 artists and calligraphers from Hong Kong, 64 from Taiwan, and 113 from among overseas Chinese in Vietnam. The exhibited paintings were collected in a publication entitled Việt Nam Sùng Chính Y Viện Thư Hoạ Nghĩa Triển Đặc Tập (越南崇正医院书画义展特辑), published by Hoa Nghệ Kha Thức Ấn vụ Cục (华艺柯式印务局), Chợ Lớn in 1970.

After Hàng passed away, the Lĩnh Nam School continued to exist and produced prominent artists of Chinese descent. In Chợ Lớn today, six out of ten such artists can be said to belong to the School and had learned their art from Đông Phương Nghệ Uyển. They count famous names like Triệu Vĩ Hùng (赵伟雄), Lý Tùng Niên (李松年), Mạc Ái Hoàn (莫爱环), Lư Sùng Đạo (卢崇道), Trương Hán Minh (张汉明), and Lý Trung Lương (李中良). In 1989 Hàng's disciple, Lý Tùng Niên, established Nam Tú Nghệ Uyển (南秀艺苑) in Chợ Lớn which teaches traditional water colour painting, but mainly follows the styles of Lĩnh Nam School.

Lưu Quang Xe

(刘光星, Liu Guangxing, 1926–)
Revolutionary, community leader, Vietnam

Lưu Quang Xe is a well-known revolutionary veteran who is right into his eighties now. His alertness, sprightliness, agility, and sharp wit belie his age, however. He is a man who tries to inject humour into the regimental discipline of work in the army and still finds time to impress his experience in, and knowledge of platoons to young military recruits of Rach Gia (Rạch Giá) who only know the battlefield in their imagination. He is known for pushing such social projects as the construction of infrastructure in remote areas in the Mekong delta and for the disabled. Besides imparting military knowledge, he delivers the message of friendship as a member of the Central Committee of the Sino-Vietnamese Friendship Association and, concurrently, chairman of the provincial chapter of the association in Kien Giang (Kiên Giang). He is the most senior honorary adviser of the Teochew clan who assembles at Baidi Temple (Chùa Bắc Đế).

Xe was born in 1926 in Rach Gia, which borders the coast along the Gulf of Thailand, 250 kilometers from Ho Chi Minh City. His father arrived in this capital of Kien Giang province in the south-western region of Vietnam from Huang Gang town (黄岗镇), Chaozhou, Guangdong province (China). Xe's mother was a Vietnamese woman born in Rach Gia.

Xe attended primary school at Zhonghua Xuexiao operated by the Chaozhou clan of Rach Gia. After his primary education, his awareness of a revolution led him to participate in the Patriotic Youth Organization of Rach Gia city. At the young age of nineteen in 1945, he joined the army of the Communists and found himself in the midst of a battlefield even before he turned twenty. Then, a series of insurrections broke out in the northern part of Vietnam, culminating in the military victory of the Viet Minh forces against the armies of France, Japan, and Emperor Bảo Đại (sovereign of the Republic of Vietnam) in what is known as the August Revolution of 1945 (Cách mạng tháng Tám).

Until 1952, Xe had fought the French near Halong Bay in northern Vietnam. Kindled by the intense flame of revolution which swept across northern Vietnam, he felt a sense of urgency to train his recruits to fight for national independence and this propelled him to pursue his studies in infantry in 1953. He went to Hanoi and was selected by the Central Committee of the Communist Party and the military police to pursue further training at the Guangxi Military Academy in Guilin. A year later, when peace dawned after the withdrawal of the French from his country, he tied the matrimonial knot with his wife, Nguyễn Thị Tuyết, in Hanoi. In 1956 he returned to the southern part of Vietnam where he was in charge of military sports activities, but continued to commute between Hanoi, Rach Gia, and Saigon until 1963. This was because crossfire persisted despite the provisional north-south demarcation at the 17th parallel in 1954, and Xe had to return to the northern region once more. His mission was to strengthen the People's Army of Vietnam (PAVN) to unite the partitioned country. In those days it was almost impossible to envisage a clear route to travel from the south to the north of the country. Yet Xe braved the dangers of explosives, landmines, incurable tropical infections and sickness, the pursuit, torture, and possible ambush of aggressors and enemies, as well as imminent danger of death from starvation. After a year of journeying through thick forests, he reached the military base in the north. His undying spirit won the praise and trust of the military and the Communist Party. In 1964 he doubled as a senior intelligence agent at the Vietnam-Cambodia border.

Determined soldiers from the northern region later succeeded in infiltrating across and immediately below the Demilitarized Zone before penetrating further south to seize the capital in April 1975. Swiftly after the fall of Saigon, the Vietnam-Cambodian conflict followed. From 1976 to 1981, Xe worked in Cambodia.

In his forty years as a colonel (đại tá 大校), Xe had fought against the Japanese, the French, and the Americans. Today, instead of spinning tales of hardship in life, he only considers himself fortunate for having survived war after war. The image of barefoot hordes who wore make-do uniforms from gunny sacks during the days when the Vietnamese were fighting against the French remains stark in his memory. What he will also never forget is the march through Trường Sơn — the labyrinth network of primitive footpaths, truck routes, and river transportation systems that formed the manpower and logistical system of the PAVN and the National Front for the Liberation of South Vietnam (NLF), the Việt Cộng, during the Vietnam War (1955–75). There were times during the march when twenty days would passed without any food sighted except for the edible plants dotting the soldiers' jungle path.

From the unification of Vietnam in 1975 until 1985, Xe mentored younger recruits at the Provincial Military Command (Bộ Chỉ huy Quân sự tỉnh Kiên Giang) in Rach Gia city, where he has been residing. After 1983, he assumed the managing director post of the state-owned water supply company (Công ty Cấp thoát nước Kiên Giang) in Rach Gia city and remained in this role until 1995. He is currently vice-chairman of the Association for Retired Military Officers of Kien Giang while wearing another hat as chairman of the Kien Giang chapter of the Sino-Vietnamese Friendship Association. In September 2009 he organized a cultural event to commemorate the 60th Anniversary of the Founding of the People's Republic of China, attended by Hoa (ethnic Chinese of Vietnam) community leaders from Sóc Trăng, Phú Quốc, Trà Vinh, Vĩnh Châu, and other places on the Mekong delta. As chairman of the Friendship Association, he had the opportunity to host Zhang Zilin (张梓琳), Miss World of 2007 from China, as well as Miss World of 2008, Ksenia Sukhinova of Russia, in both Rach Gia and Phú Quốc in 2008. That year, Vietnam was the venue of the Miss Universe beauty contest.

His energy after retirement has also been partially channelled into realizing community projects for the poor and the disabled. Donations from the U.S. Embassy in Vietnam and the Hoa business people in Ho Chi Minh city, for example, went into the construction of a five-kilometre road in Vĩnh Thuận of U Minh Thượng district, and also supported the poor villagers of Gỏ Quao district, a former revolutionary base.

Xe has been a member of the Vietnam Communist Party for more than sixty years. He has developed a passion for any key role he was given in war or peace, and his magnanimity and affableness are qualities that have won him respect and friends. Impressive records of military accolades and medallions are also what he has accumulated along the way — testimonies of discipline, fearlessness, and wisdom driven by his fierce belief of a unified and independent Vietnam.

Lý Lan

(李兰, Li Lan, 1957–)

Writer, translator, Vietnam

Lý Lan is a well known writer who, in addition to writing novels, short stories, and poems for adults and children, has translated the Harry Potter books into Vietnamese.

Lan was born on 16 July 1957 in her mother's village of Bình Nhâm, Thuận An district, in the province of Bình Dương, about thirteen kilometres north of Ho Chi Minh City. Her father was a Chinese immigrant from the city of Shantou (汕头市) in eastern Guangdong province, China.

Lan spent her early childhood in Bình Nhâm where she was influenced by her village teacher, Đức. Her father moved the family from the village after the death of her mother when Lan was seven and a half years old. They moved to Cholon (Chợ Lớn), the "Chinatown" of Ho Chi Minh City. At first, the young girl attended a private Chinese school, Trung Chánh (中正学校), but after several months switched to a Vietnamese public school, Chợ Quán Primary School. She later went to Gia Long High School for girls. From both, she received an excellent education and was trained "to play [a] worthy crucial role in the reconstruction and development of the country and family in the post-war age".

In 1976, after the unification of Vietnam, Lan was admitted to the Đại học Sư phạm Thành phố Hồ Chí Minh (Teacher's College, University of Ho Chi Minh City) and obtained her bachelor's degree in English in 1980. Despite the fact that a teacher's monthly salary then was the equivalent of only US$10, in 1980, she followed in the footsteps of her teacher, Đức, and became a teacher at a high school in the village of Cần Giuộc in Long An province (Mekong Delta). In 1984 she moved back to Ho Chi Minh City to teach first at Hùng Vương High School, and then in 1991, at Lê Hồng Phong High School. From 1994 to 1997, she was a lecturer at the Van Lang University in Ho Chi Minh City. Throughout her teaching career, Lan was also writing and publishing short stories and articles.

Her first published short story was "Chàng Nghệ Sĩ (Young Male Artist)," which was published in the newspaper, Tuổi Trẻ (Youth), in 1978 and won an award. She went on to write and publish stories in the best literary journals, as well the most popular newspapers and women's and children's magazines, including Tuổi Trẻ, Văn Nghệ Giải Phóng (Arts and Letters Liberation), and Khăn Quàng Đỏ (Red Scarf). Her first collection of short stories, Cỏ Hát (Singing Grass), appeared in 1983, and has been followed by more than twenty collections of short stories, poems, and essays, as well as two novels. Lan has won numerous awards for her writings, including "best short story" for "Cỏ Hát", "best book of poetry" for Là Mình (Being Oneself), "best novel" for Tiểu Thuyết Đàn Bà (A Woman's Novel), and "best book for children" for Ngôi Nhà Trong Cỏ (A Home in Grass). Her essay, "Cổng Trường Mở Ra (The School Gates Open)", has also been published in a seventh grade, national language arts textbook in Vietnam.

Lan's stories generally focus on social issues and life in contemporary Vietnam. Her characters — usually, though not always, women — often do not fit into the mainstream, homogeneous Vietnamese society. These characters, often considered outsiders, include overseas Vietnamese, Vietnamese of mixed races, or immigrants such as Lan's father. In the short story, "Con ma" (The Ghost), the narrator is haunted by the spectre of a young soldier who died in the American War (known in the west as the Vietnam War). Set in period of the first Gulf War (2 August 1990 – 28 February 1991), the story highlights the disconnect between the current generation of Vietnamese — who view the Gulf War as something that cannot touch them and treat it almost as entertainment — and the generation who fought in the American War. Unlike her brother and other men of her generation, who callously try to kill the ghost, the narrator welcomes the ghost's presence as part of herself, on the understanding that "[i]f war just means fighting, I know nothing about it, though I was born and grew up during the war. Yet, if war means women's sorrow, misfortune, helplessness... these were absorbed directly into my bloodstream from the time I was in my mother's womb".

The recurring theme of alienation within one's own society is apparent in Lan's collection, Đất Khách (Strangers' Land). One of the stories in this collection, "Chị Ấy Lấy Chồng Chưa (Sister Hạnh)", broaches the sensitive issue of bụi đời (street children) and, in particular, Mỹ lai (children born to Vietnamese mothers and American GI fathers). "Sister Hạnh" weaves the story of Mội, a half-black Amerasian street child from the Evening Market Alley, in Vietnam, with that of Hạnh, a local girl who befriends Mội and his companion, Bèo, another bụi đời. The expectations of the two street boys, as well as of all the Evening Market Alley residents, for a lavish wedding feast are raised when Hạnh is courted by a respectable Vietnamese man. However, the relationship falls apart due to Hạnh's friendship with the two street boys. Mội later moves to the United States under the Amerasian Homecoming Act. Returning to the Evening Market Alley many years later as Jack Miller, he is regarded by all as a rich American (foreigner), and is forced to play this role so as not to disappoint his friends. Even though it bankrupts him, the dinner at a five-star restaurant he treats them to is the culmination of all the dreams and hopes of the people of Evening Market Alley which should have been fulfilled by Hạnh's wedding banquet.

Another theme in Lan's work is the fate of Vietnamese women caught between traditional Vietnamese mores and contemporary society. In her story, "Tại Nạn (Accident)", the protagonist Cảm, a single woman in her thirties, is date raped by her neighbour, Thanh, and finds herself pregnant. After informing Thanh of her situation, Cảm is compelled by tradition and Thanh's fear of public condemnation to accept his proposal of marriage. Even though Cảm must marry a man she knows she cannot love or respect, Lan leaves several clues that Cảm's position is not as helpless as it seems. Cảm does not follow the accepted conventions of language when she speaks to Thanh during their last encounter in the story. Instead of using the customary pronoun, "em" (meaning "younger sister"), to refer to herself when speaking to Thanh, Cảm uses the more general pronoun, "tôi" (meaning "I"). This choice can be interpreted as a deliberate declaration of independence, a refusal to submit to Thanh's will. Thus, even though she agrees to marry Thanh, she seems to maintain her independence, which is further demonstrated by her insistence on paying her own share of the wedding costs. Cảm is the epitome of a modern Vietnamese woman: bound in part by Confucian tradition and cultural standards, but nonetheless able to subvert these restrictions and exercise her autonomy on her own terms.

In 1997, Lan travelled outside Vietnam for the first time, going to the United States to participate in the International Writing Program at the University of Iowa. After three months in residence in Iowa, she travelled extensively in the United States for another three months. This trip, she notes, had an important impact on the way she viewed the world.

Returning to Vietnam in early 1998, she faced minor political and financial problems and gave up teaching. In the following two years, she took on several jobs, including one as a contract journalist for the Báo Người Lao Động (Worker Newspaper) in Ho Chi Minh City, all the while continuing to write her own books of fiction. In 2000, she started the project for which she is perhaps best known in Vietnam: translating all seven Harry Potter novels into Vietnamese. The Vietnamese editions were published by Nhà Xuất Bản Trẻ (Youth Publishing House) between 2000 and 2007. Lan has been noted for her speedy (usually three to four months per book), yet generally accurate and idiomatic translations of J.K. Rowling's novels, which include many inventive terms and concepts.

In 2001, Lan returned to the United States on a Fulbright grant to pursue her graduate studies, and obtained a master's degree in English at the Wake Forest University in 2003. She was adjunct professor at the Center for East Asian Studies at Western Washington University, and is currently working on a new novel. Her latest novel, Ở Ngưỡng Cửa Cuộc Đời (At the Threshold of the Life), was published in 2010. She divides her time between Vietnam and the United States, where she lives with her husband, history professor Mart Stewart.

Lý Ngọc Minh

(李玉明, Li Yuming, 1953–)
Business leader, Vietnam

Lý Ngọc Minh's ingenuity in ceramic and pottery is reflected in his nicknames, such as "The King of Ceramics and Pottery" and "Edison of Vietnam". His success lies in his ability to realize the dialogue between modernity and tradition by combining modern technology with traditional cultural and aesthetic values in his masterpieces. He is an authority on ceramic and pottery, having received a certificate of intellectual property from the World Intellectual Property Organization in 1984–85. He has also received the Medal for Excellent Labour (Third Class) in 1999 from the Vietnamese Government and the Medal of Hero in Labour from the State President of Vietnam in 2006.

Minh was born on 25 November 1949 in Tân Phước Khánh, Tân Uyên district, in Bình Dương province, which lies in the south-eastern part of Vietnam, north of Ho Chi Minh City. His family has been in the ceramics trade for three generations. His paternal grandfather, migrated to Vietnam in the late nineteenth century, bringing with him the know-how of ceramic production from his home village in An Khê county (An Xi 安溪县) of Fujian Province, southern China. His son, Lý Kim, who is the father of Lý Ngọc Minh, inherited his skills and techniques, and had further dedicated his time to understanding the nature of enamel, which is the basic material in pottery making.

Lý Kim died without leaving behind any significant wealth when Minh was only seven years old. However Lý Kim's inquisitiveness, coupled with his interest in innovation, in addition to his dexterity, was passed on to the next generation. Minh's mother was Huỳnh Kim Liên whose ancestral heritage was also Fujianese. She was outgoing and was a model of trustworthiness, patience, and resoluteness to her children. Minh is the eldest child and has four other siblings, one of whom is a sister. Typical of Chinese families, he, being the eldest son, had to learn the family trade and shoulder the responsibilities of the head of the family after his father passed away.

As a child, Minh studied in a village school for ethnic Chinese (Hoa) in Tân Phước Khánh. He had to stop schooling when he reached primary five and instead pursued self-study.

On one occasion when he was twelve years old, his foster father brought him to an exhibition of ceramics and pottery in Lái Thiêu ward in the rural town of Thuận An in Bình Dương province where he saw the products of his father's friend, whom he addressed as "Uncle Siêu". These products bore the trademark Tân Hòa Phát and particularly impressed him. From then on, he dreamt of making a breakthrough in ceramics production. However, as time passed, Tân Hòa Phát, Minh's ideal ceramics enterprise, started to decline due to lack of innovation and lackluster management, and it eventually collapsed. Its experience taught Minh important lessons about the ceramics business and production.

In 1968, Minh established a laboratory of rudimentary facilities in an abandoned factory on fallow land to experiment on enamel and colours. Without any support from others, he persevered for three years. He was merely sixteen years old then, but had already decided against following in the footsteps of his predecessors. Instead he was hoping to discover a revolutionary way of creating ceramic wares in his simple laboratory. A breakthrough requires an understanding of the basics, and advancing beyond tradition requires innovations based on that understanding — at least, this was his idea of approaching his goal. However, very little reference materials were available in his country then to assist him in his study. He had to seek help from his friends who would procure such materials from overseas and translate them for him.

In 1970, together with a friend called Dương Văn Long, he established a ceramics and pottery company called Minh Long, located in Tân Phước Khánh. His partner and him were the only two workers. In 1972, when Minh was twenty-two years old, he saw a made-in-Taiwan vase which cost US$200, way beyond the price of 3.75 grammes of gold then. This shocking price difference drove him to work harder in his trade.

In 1973, he married Lý Ngọc Dung, a Hoa of Hakka origins. Dung was, in fact, the foster child of Minh's family, and had also learnt the ceramics trade in her husband's family. The couple has four children — three boys and one girl — who are engaged in the operations of the family business.

At the onset of the socialist economic reform, which began soon after the unification of the country in 1975–76, Minh turned to growing cabbage and cauliflower. While working in the fields during the state subsidy period from 1975–76 to 1985, the thought of reviving his family business frequently recurred. Finally, when he was able to return to his business in 1978, he worked diligently to make innovations in ceramics production. About a decade later, in 1990, he began to export to France.

Between 1994 and 1995, he focused on pottery and artistic, clay-based products. Artistic creation was paramount in what he was doing. When political leaders from the central level visited Bình Dương province at the time, they were surprised that the provincial leaders were using Japanese rather than local ceramics. When Minh learned of this, he challenged himself to refine the products of Minh Long so that he would one day be able to export to Japan instead. In 1995 when he started to produce fine crockery, he took an interest in unique shapes which took him to Europe, including France, Italy, and Germany, China, Japan, and Korea to study ceramic production and techniques. Simultaneously he was searching for inspiration. However, it is not an exaggeration to say that his ultimate inspiration comes from Vietnamese culture.

The hybridity of Chinese and Vietnamese cultures that has influenced Minh is manifested in the architecture, interior decoration, and designs of his products, displayed in the showroom of Minh Long Company in Bình Dương province. For his quality control tenet, he demands the attributes of culture, skill, individuality, and spirit in his creations, with an absence of differentiation in border, time, gender, and age. His overall desire is succinctly encapsulated in one of his company's slogans — "the everlasting quintessence".

Minh has resisted being labelled "an entrepreneur who has made it". He prefers to pursue his never-ending aesthetic dream of creations with the spirit of adventure and romance. "Business" is to him only a game to fulfil his dreams.

Ly Sing Ko

(李星可, Li Xingke, 1914–96)

Journalist, writer, Singapore

Ly Singko was a well known journalist and writer in Singapore. He began his career in Southeast Asia in 1938 and later settled in Singapore to become a prominent columnist of a local Chinese newspaper from the late 1950s to the early 1970s. He was a prolific writer who wrote in Chinese and English and published no fewer than twenty-seven books.

Ly was born and raised in Peking (Beijng), China. Both his parents were Roman Catholics and he was also a Catholic himself. His father was a master and trader in mechanical clocks and watches. Because of the family business, Ly Sing Ko was arranged by his father to receive a French education from young, in the hope that he could later go to Switzerland to learn more about this special skill in clocks and watches. After attaining a complete French education in China, from elementary to tertiary level, Ly did go to Europe for further studies. But instead of learning about clocks, he was on a scholarship to study philosophy at the Universite Catholique de Louvain and subsequently, the Paris Universitas.

The Sino-Japanese War that broke out in July 1937 disrupted his studies in Europe, as he returned to China the following year to participate in the resistance movement. He first served as a translator in the Chinese Air Force by assisting the French voluntary forces in China. Subsequently, he was sent to work in Vietnam, Myanmar, and India, as a staff member of the Central News Agency (中央社) of China. At the same time, Ly also worked for the French news agency based in Chongqing (重庆), the Chinese capital during the war.

He returned to China when the war was about to end, and joined Guo Moruo (郭沫若), Mao Dun (茅盾), Lao She (老舍), and Cao Yu (曹禺) to form the Society for Chinese and Foreign Writers (中外文艺联络社) in Chongqing. Later, for a rather brief period, he worked variously as a bank auditor and for the railway department of the transport ministry. But Ly did not remain in China for long as he was again posted to Vietnam by the Central News Agency to work as a special correspondent in Saigon. In 1949, after the communists took over the Chinese mainland, Ly was instructed by the Chinese cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church, the archbishop of Nanking, Cardinal Paul Yu Pin (于斌), to move to Singapore. His mission was to assist the Ih Shih Pao (益世报), then a major newspaper in China supported by the Catholic Church, in setting up a branch in this important British colony in Southeast Asia.

Although the Singapore branch of Ih Shih Pao began its circulation in June 1952, it only lasted for two months and had to be closed down due to financial difficulties. Ly, who was its chief editor at the time, had resigned from the paper before it wound up. However, he did not leave Singapore after that and had chosen to join the second largest local Chinese newspaper, Sin Chew Jit Poh (星州日报) in late 1959. Ly was to work for this newspaper for eleven years, and through it became a prominent columnist, especially within the Chinese-speaking community in Singapore and Malaysia. While working at Sin Chew, Ly was also helping the Agence France Presse to run a news office in Singapore. Besides being a journalist, Ly also taught at the Teachers' Training College on a part-time basis for ten years, coaching students on the proper pronunciation of Mandarin. Ly was also active in the literary circle, particularly in drama and Peking opera. Besides producing more than ten titles of play scripts, he also wrote and published a number of book manuscripts relating to the introduction and appreciation of Chinese dramas.

Nevertheless, Ly made a name for himself mainly through his articulate commentaries on local politics and world affairs. His main duty at Sin Chew Jit Poh was to pen the editorials. He wrote on a wide range of topics, from international relations, current affairs, government policy, to arts and culture. His writings were known to be consistently offering sharp observations, critical analyses, constructive suggestions, and bold criticism on state and society. As a result, his columns were able to attract a wide readership. Through his pen and by virtue of his position, Ly had in his hands the power to shape public opinions. But it would be fair to say that the strength of his editorials came essentially from their ability to address and reflect the deepest concerns of the local residents, particularly that of the members of the Chinese-speaking community. Perhaps, more importantly, he was writing at a time when the community was most eager to have its voice heard.

The Chinese-speaking community in Singapore and Malaysia had, for quite some time, perceived that under the British administration, they, as a social group, were receiving less favourable treatments, especially in regard to the issues of language and education. Therefore, when Singapore was on its way towards independence and building a sovereign state, the community had been anxiously anticipating for a change of the status quo. They yearned for equal treatment in all aspects of social and political life in the new nation that was to be built. Ly's editorials were read by many because they seemed to be directed deliberately towards expressing this sentiment actively. In fact, Ly himself had repeatedly mentioned that his editorials were meant "to speak for the Chinese community, to serve the Chinese community" (替华人社会讲话，为华人社会服务). Although this might actually had been an image that Sin Chew Jit Poh purported to project for itself, nevertheless one would agree that Ly Singko was most able to put the motto of the press into practice skilfully, and moreover, in an extremely forceful and vigorous manner. As such, his editorials became not only a platform through which the voices of the Chinese-speaking community could be heard, but perhaps also a means by which the community could exert pressure on the state to promote or defend its interests.

Ly resigned from Sin Chew Jit Poh rather unexpectedly when he was at the prime of his career with the press, and chose to join the Nanyang Siang Pau (南洋商报) on 1 February 1971 as a senior editorial writer. But his career at this largest local Chinese press was to be abruptly halted by an event known as "Black Operations" in the history of journalism in Singapore. In the early hours of 2 May 1971, Ly was arrested together with three other top executives of Nanyang Siang Pau: Lee Mau Seng (general manager), Shamsuddin Tung Tao Chang (editor-in-chief), and Kerk Loong Sing (public relations officer), by the Internal Security Department. The four were accused of being involved in a "campaign" launched by Nanyang Siang Pau for "glamourising the communist system and also working up communal emotions over Chinese language and culture" — an accusation to which they admitted during interrogation. According to a government statement, Ly Singko, described by then Minister of Culture Jek Yeun Thong as a "militantly chauvinistic writer", played an important role in this incident. He was said to have been "bought" over from Sin Chew Jit Poh by the chairman and managing director of Nanyang Siang Pau, Lee Eu Seng. According to press reports, the latter, who was later identified by the authority as the mastermind of the "campaign" and detained on 28 January 1973, offered Ly $4,000 a month to work at Nanyang Siang Pau, an amount "almost double" his salary at Sin Chew Jit Poh. His motive was to "induce" Ly to write editorials of a "highly offensive and provocative nature" against the government, particularly in falsely accusing the government of "killing Chinese language, education and culture". When Ly sensed the danger and wanted to leave the press, Lee increased his pay to $6,000. Lee was said to have even paid Ly Sing Ko and Tung Tao Chang their full salaries and bonuses during the entire twenty months while they were in detention.

Ly was detained under the Internal Security Act from 22 May 1971 to 26 January 1973. He neither returned to journalism, nor took up any permanent job in Singapore after his release. However, he was invited by the International House of Japan and the French Government to visit the two countries. He actually visited France twice and resided in Paris for nearly six years.To honour his contributions, the French Government awarded Ly Singko the Knight in the National Order of Merit badge on 15 December 1976. He spent most of his time living with his children in Australia after he retired. On 17 February 1996, Ly suffered from a heart attack and passed away in Sydney.

Lý Văn Hùng

(李文雄, Li Wenxiong, 1910–76)
Writer, educator, Vietnam

Lý Văn Hùng's life was dedicated to bridging cultures through writing and education. In particular, he greatly contributed to the transformation of Chấn Trung Primary School (振中小学) into Chấn Trung Secondary School (振中中学). The transformation allowed students to specialize in Vietnamese literature. He was the "bridge" that linked the two languages of Vietnamese and Mandarin in the Saigon-Cholon area in the southern region of Vietnam. His achievements in researching and authoring publications that have salient value gave him the status of a notable scholar in both ethnic Chinese and Vietnamese communities.

Lý Văn Hùng was born in Hạc Sơn (鶴山) district of Guangdong province, China. He grew up, however, in Sa Đéc, a town in Đồng Tháp province in the Mekong Delta of the southern region of Vietnam. Hùng had aliases such as Long Trai (龙斋), Thiên Nhai Khách (天涯客), Lĩnh Biểu Thư Sinh (岭表书生), and Nam Sử Thị (南史氏). He was a pupil of Lao Mạnh Tài (劳孟材), a renowned Confucianist scholar. In 1935 Hùng left Sa Đéc and arrived in Chợ Lớn, where he made a living from writing and translating for Chinese-language newspapers.

After years of study of the English textbooks compiled in Hong Kong and Guangzhou that facilitated the learning of English for the Chinese, Hùng used the same editing methods to compile books for ethnic Chinese to learn Vietnamese. By writing and translating between Vietnamese and Chinese languages for many newspapers in Saigon and Chợ Lớn, Hùng had numerous opportunities to understand many aspects of community life. In 1949, with two colleagues, Tào Tín Phu (曹信夫), and Thôi Tiêu Nhiên (崔潇然), he published the Chợ Lớn Yearbook (Tây Đề Niên Giám 西堤年鉴), an important publication by the company, Công ty Đề Ngạn Vạn Quốc (堤岸万国公司), in Chợ Lớn. The yearbook outlined the history, geography, and politics of the Saigon-Cholon region, and focused on the economic, social, and cultural conditions of the overseas Chinese. It became a guidebook and significant source of information for historians. Around this time, Hùng also taught the Vietnamese language to overseas Chinese students in Chấn Trung Primary School. This school was established in 1937 by Trương Thiết Dân (张铁民), who was also the school's first principal. Around 1952, Hùng succeeded as principal of the school and transformed it into a secondary school offering Vietnamese literature as a subject.

In 1950 Hùng and Thôi Tiêu Nhiên, a friend from his hometown, Sa Đéc, published the Model Vietnamese-Chinese Dictionary (Mô Phạm Việt-Hoa Từ Điển 模范越华辞典), a publication of practical value that has been reprinted more than ten times in the last twenty-five years since its debut in 1952, and which was made possible by Tân Hoa Thư Cục (新华书局).

In his foreword for the 1954 edition, Hùng wrote, "Publishing this dictionary not only responds to the aspirations of readers at large, but also arises out of our own needs. We were born or raised in the land of the Vietnamese; under such circumstances, I naturally think that we should use the Vietnamese language". While he was principal at Chấn Trung Secondary School, Hùng edited a series of textbooks on writing and a history of Vietnamese literature for overseas Chinese. In his foreword to the Compendium of Vietnamese Language (Việt Nam Văn Pháp Đại Toàn 越南文法大全), he wrote, "For a long time, some Chinese especially young ladies, have expressed a hope to have available a book that taught them how to learn Vietnamese. They have been looking for a source in Vietnamese that will make learning easy and fast. They have a desire to find out the meaning and sound of every word, and to spell them and to make sentences correctly."

In 1954, Hùng published The Tale of Kieu: Annotations and Commentaries (Kim Vân Kiều Bình Giảng 金云翘评讲). This project involved translating the classical Vietnamese epic poem — which was originally written in Song Thất Lục Bát ("Six-Eight" poetry 六八 and in "Seven-Syllabic" Chinese poetry 七言), with annotations and commentaries — into Mandarin language. Hùng further translated selected Nôm poems of famous Vietnamese literary figures such as, Nguyễn Trãi, Bà Huyện Thanh Quan, Hồ Xuân Hương, Tản Đà, and Thế Lữ, into Mandarin. Nôm refers to a form of Vietnamese writing adapted from the Chinese script, but which existed alongside formal classical Chinese as the preferred medium for social protest from the fifteenth to the eighteenth century. In translating the poems which originated from different historic periods, Hùng carefully annotated his work and made thorough introductions of eminent authors. These poems were collected in The Best Selected Vietnamese Writings (Việt Nam Văn Chương Trích Diễm 越南文章摘艳), published in 1961 by Công ty Gia Hoa Án Loát (Chợ Lớn). Besides these works, he also wrote Selected Vietnamese-Chinese Translations (Việt Hoa Phiên Dịch Văn Tuyển 越华翻译文选) and Vietnam Notes (Việt Nam Tạp Ký 越南杂记). These two publications gave his students and the ethnic Chinese readers an understanding and appreciation of the general literary history, culture, and language of the country they were living in.

The erudition, seriousness, and diligence of Hùng is further reflected in his publication, Vietnamese Literature (Việt Nam Văn Hiến 越南文献, a comprehensive study of Vietnam [History] Civilization) available in two volumes, published in Chinese by Thiên Nam Hán Viện (天南汉院), Chợ Lớn, in 1971. This publication systematically presents the history of Vietnamese literature in twenty-seven chapters, with more than 55,000 words. It focuses on the history of the Vietnamese language, of dynasties, geography, ethnic groups, as well as short biographies of famous personalities, introductions to significant documents, and citations and quotes from famous works. The period covered in the publication is from the beginning of Vietnamese history to the start of the twentieth century. It remains an important source for studies on Vietnam owing to its collection of historical and contemporary historical sources.

By 1971, Hùng had edited almost forty books or titles, and these books mainly concerned linguistics, literature, and history, and were written in Chinese. He also had authored more than one hundred poems that were published in various books. He was admitted as an honorary member to the International Confucian Studies Association based in Geneva in 1958. In Vietnam, other than being the principal of Chấn Trung Secondary School, he also taught Chinese writing at universities and colleges, including at the Hue Nghiem Buddhist College (Huệ Nghiêm Phật Học Viện 慧严佛学院) where he first taught Mandarin in 1964; the University of Literary Studies in Cần Thơ, where he was professor of sinology in 1970; and at the College of Humanities and Social Science in Saigon, where he was professor of sinology in 1972. He was once invited by the Government of the Republic of Vietnam to be the adviser of Chinese Studies of the Ministry of Culture, and member of the Commission on Script Regimes of the Ministry of Culture, both in 1972. The same year, he was awarded the second-class Star of Order in culture by the Ministry of Culture of the Republic of Vietnam.

Lyman, Susanta

(Lie Siong Tay, 李尚大, Li Shangda, 1920–2008)

Businessman, community leader, philanthropist, Indonesia

Lie Siong Tay was a wealthy businessman and community leader but he was well known among the totok rather than the peranakan community. In the past not much was written about him; more information became available only after he passed away in 2008, most of which in relation to his early life and his contributions to his home village and town in southern China rather than his activities in Indonesia.

Lie was born in Hutou (湖头), Anxi, Fujian, China in 1920, into a landlord family.

When he was nine years old, his father died and he was raised by his mother who valued the importance of education. He first went to Cishan (慈山) Primary School in his own village and continued his studies at various high schools including Chip Bee High School. While he was still a student, a teacher in his school was beaten up by a local police inspector. Lie and the other students went to take a revenge for the teacher and caused a stir at the police station damaging the premises in the process. As a result, he was expelled from the school. Nevertheless, he completed his schooling and also managed to get into Jinan University and graduated. When he was still at the university, he married his sweetheart, Wu Can Ying (吴灿英), a girl student who was still in high school with whom he stayed married for the rest of his life.

In 1999 when he was in Singapore he gave an interview in Mandarin to China Central TV (Zhongguo Dianshitai) which was eventually made into a DVD entitled "Lie Siong Tay Forever" (永远的李尚大). He spoke at length about his early life in China and his colourful student life. One of his close school mates, Huang Yongyu (黄永玉), who would become a leading painter in Mainland China, also featured in the interview telling stories about Lie. Being a better off student Lie came across as a "big brother" who was very generous to his friends. During vacation times, Lie would invite twenty to thirty students to stay in his place for free.

At the age of 27 (1947) Lie became the school principal of Lanxi Middle School at his birthplace, Anxi. He later set up an import company (Taiping Jinkouhang) in Xiamen with a friend, and went to Hong Kong in 1948. Little is known with regard to what he was doing there except that he led a difficult life. There are two conflicting versions of the time of his migration to Indonesia; one says that it was in 1949 but most articles mention that he went to Indonesia in 1952. According to Huang Yongyu, Lie's wife and the three children (two boys and one daughter) stayed in China to look after Lie's mother. In 1956 his wife and the youngest son, Longyu (龙羽), went to Hong Kong. Two years later they succeeded in entering Indonesia to join him, but the elder son Chuanyu (川羽) and daughter Xuelei (雪蕾) only joined him in 1973 after Lie's mother passed away.

Reportedly Lie Siong Tay selected Indonesia where his father had a lot of friends. He first worked for an import-export company and in 1959 established his own company. One source says that the company was called Ho Seng (和声) which was his father's name, while another says it was SDR (Satya, Djaya Raya or Loyal, Successful and Great). Perhaps SDR (which is also an Indonesian acronym for saudara or brother) is the name which was eventually registered. The SDR Group dealt with trading and the timber business as he discovered that Indonesia was rich in forests and the world needed timber. His company was given concessions by the Indonesian government in Sumatra and Kalimantan to export timber. SDR developed rapidly and expanded into other sectors. The group was later renamed the Lyman Group, using Lie's Indonesian surname. Lie Siong Tay had become an Indonesian citizen and changed his name to Susanta Lyman during the New Order era. His group had also diversified its business into six lines, namely, timber, agriculture, building material, property, distributor and telecommunication. The company has since become a multinational company and its offices have spread to Singapore, Hong Kong and the West.

There is not much information about Lie Song Tay's activities during the Soeharto era. It was reported that in 1996 he helped 300,000 Indonesian Chinese to gain Indonesian citizenship. This information has not been verified. Nevertheless, more of his activities in mainland China were reported in the newspapers and the Internet. As a first generation Chinese Indonesian who was born and received university education in China, it is quite natural that he would still be concerned with his original homeland. It was reported that in 1985 when Indonesia began to develop direct trade links with the PRC, Lie Siong Tay returned to China for the first time. He donated money to put up new buildings for Cishan School (慈山学校), the primary school that he went to, and Cishan Agricultural Middle School. Later he and his younger brother jointly established the Cishan Financial School. In 1993, he worked hard to assist in the establishment of Jimei Daxue (Chip Bee University) following in the footsteps of Tan Kah Kee. It was reported that he waited till very late at night to meet the provincial government leader for the endorsement of the setting up of the university. He also made generous contributions to Xiamen Daxue (University of Amoy) and Liming Daxue (黎明大学) in Quanzhou. Unlike many overseas Chinese contributors who named the buildings that they donated after themselves, Lie Siong Tay named many of the buildings that he donated after his own teachers as his way of paying back, especially his primary and high school teachers. It is also reported that when the University of California in Berkeley asked him to contribute to the funds required for a new chemistry building, he agreed with the proviso that the new building be named after Tan Kah Kee. Lie succeeded in raising 10 million US dollars for the Tan Kah Kee Building at Berkeley.

Lie Siong Tay died in Singapore in his sleep on 2 November 2008. His remains were flown back to Jakarta. On 15 November a memorial service was held in Jakarta. It was reported that almost 10,000 friends and guests attended the service including General Silalahi (representing Presdent SBY), Tang Jianhua from Anxi (representing the Chinese government), Gu Jiande, President of Jimei University, and Chinese Indonesian MP Murdaya Poo and his wife, Siti Hartati Murdaya. Memorial services for him were also held in Anxi, Xiamen University and Jimei University on 16 November.

Lie Siong Tay was buried in Jakarta as a Christian. He left a wife, two sons and one daughter.

M

Ma Mon Luk

(马文禄, Ma Wenlu, 1896–1961)
Chef, entrepreneur, philanthropist, Philippines

Ma Mon Luk was a Chinese chef who was able to perfect his recipe of mami (肉面), siopao (烧包), and siomai (烧卖) to suit the Filipino palate. From the 1800s to the early 1900s, noodle dishes were considered a poor man's fare, sold in panciterias for the factory worker, ambulant vendor, stevedore, and every other lowly Juan. Ma was credited with popularizing mami and bringing it to the attention of every Filipino of every age. His persistence led to the growth of his chain of Ma Mon Luk Restaurant. The products that he had developed and promoted have left an indelible imprint on Filipino cuisine.

Ma was born in 1896 in Shayong village, of Liangdu town in the Zhongshan municipality of Guangdong province. He was very intelligent even as a child, always topping his class, and was considered by his townmates to be a child genius/prodigy. His paternal grandfather, Ma Wei Shan (马威善), was renowned for being a complete man — a noted calligrapher and a martial arts expert — and a community leader. Because of his leadership and civic-mindedness, he was chosen to be the village leader of the eighteen villages that make up Liangdu in Zhongshan. His maternal grandfather was Zhang Gongding, who was a renowned healer, known far and wide as a Hua Tuo incarnate. This proves that Ma Mon Luk was descended from illustrious forebears.

Ma's family was poor so he finished only junior high school, but managed to do self-study and improve himself. He immersed himself in the study of Chinese classics and imbibed Chinese traditions and good virtues while growing up.

Ma became a schoolteacher in Canton, but did not earn enough to give himself a decent life. It was therefore not surprising that the parents of his love, Ng Shih, disapproved of him. They did not want their daughter to live with a man who could not provide properly for her. Undaunted by the hardships of life in Canton and the risks of migrating to a foreign country, Ma Mon Luk was determined to prove Ng Shih's parents wrong and win Ng Shih's hand in marriage. Thus in 1918, he left for the Philippines to seek a fortune.

Alone in a strange land, he had to start from scratch to build his business with his bare hands. Whenever he felt overtired, he would recite his mantra: "there is nothing difficult in this world, the only obstacle is the lack of determination. One who can withstand the greatest of difficulties can rise above other men" and "A young man who fail[s] to work hard will suffer during old age."

He knew little about succeeding in this foreign country, but brought along his knowledge of Chinese culinary arts and expertise on noodles. At a time when Filipinos were wary of "instant" food and noodles, Ma used his skills and persistence to make them change their minds and their taste about his noodles, Ma Mi. He would position his stall, made up of two heavy steel containers and a wooden bamboo pole, at the foot of the bridge of Puente Espana to wait for business. When customers were few, he would peddle along the streets of Manila, such as Gandara (one of Manila's shoe-stores lane), Ongpin, and Santa Cruz; Quiapo, Sta. Ana, and Recoletos en la Intramuros. Back then, his product was called by the conventions of its preparation: gupit, a Filipino word meaning "to cut", as the noodles and chicken strips were cut to portions for cooking.

Eventually Ma expanded his offering of products to include siomai and siopao. This added to his popularity among students of nearby schools such as Ateneo and Letran. As his clientele grew, so did the demand for his delicious food and so he opened a small, two-table stall in Salazar Street, in Chinatown, which was the first authentic Ma Mon Luk restaurant.

Ma felt that it was necessary to introduce Filipinos to his products and thus began a very ingenious way of "marketing" them: from time to time, he would knock on random doors in Manila to give away samples of his siomai and siopao. He became quite well known for his calling cards — entitling the bearer to a prescribed number of siopao and mami. He gave away free samples to flood and fire vicitms, senators, congressmen, policemen, reporters, doctors, lawyers, nurses, teachers, and even prisoners at the national prison. Ma also went around to offices and hospitals with his siopao, which was still considered a funny product back then.

He thought that if the public liked the sample enough, they could then go to his restaurant where they could also enjoy a hot bowl of mami. As the response to his free samples was overwhelmingly positive, he raised the bar and began promoting his products to more influential and powerful people. He gave away pieces of paper bearing his name and signature to journalists. This worked as a gift certificate, entitling the bearer to a free hot bowl of mami, as well as some siopao and siomai.

Ma and President Sergio Osmeña became staunch friends after the president received one of his givaways. Ma gave siopao to President Elpidio Quirino, President Jose P. Laurel, Senate President Eulogio Amang Rodriguez, Andres Bonifacio's sister, boxer Flash Elorde, and actress Carmen Rosales. There was even a fond anecdote that Former education secretary Alejandro R. Roces proposed to his wife, Irene, over a bowl of mami! It was during this prosperous time that Ma often socialized with politicians and celebrities, garbed in his signature felt hat. His business grew and saw Ma Mon Luk restaurant branches established in Azcarraga. There was one later on in Quezon Boulevard, near the then-popular Life Theater.

Never one to rest on his laurels, Ma continued his personal marketing strategy — appearing at fiestas, giving away free siopao and speeches, performing tricks and inviting everyone to his mami house to eat. His noodle house became so well known that people dubbed him the "Mami King". In its heyday, the branch in Quiapo served a thousand bowls of mami and a thousand siopao a day.

When politicians and government officials visit his restaurant to try his fare, Ma always used the opportunity to bring to their attention the plight of his fellow poor Chinese. Philanthropy came to him easily. During the Japanese invasion of China, he supported the cause by giving not just financial help, but also buying weapons for the Chinese army. With his success, compassion to others, and leadership qualities, he was naturally elected to many responsible positions in the Chinese community — and was for example, chairman of the board of the Chinese General Hospital, of Chinese schools, and of the Cantonese Association; he founded the Zhongshan

Hometown Association and served as its treasurer. In his hometown, he raised funds to build the Zhongshan Library, founded the Hong Kong Zhongshan Businessmen's Association, built four kindergarten schools in four villages in Zhongshan, and sent cash and medicines to help his townmates.

Ma was eventually able to fetch his beloved Ng Shih from China to the Philippines, and to build their family along with his career. In a matter of years, Ma significantly changed the taste of Filipinos towards his brand of Chinese cuisine. He introduced to the Filipino palate traditional Chinese dimsum such as mami, siopao, and siomai, which today are fully accepted as Filipino comfort food and are ubiquitous at all celebratory feasts. As Ma's enterprise flourished and his family became involved in running his restaurants. Today, Ma Mon Luk Restaurants are run by his sons and grandchildren, continuing the legacy left behind by Ma, who succumbed to throat cancer on 1 September 1961. As the undisputed Mami King, a crown was placed on top of his mausoleum.

Mallare, Florencio Tan

(陈华岳, Chen Huayue, 1932–)

Journalist, publisher, lawyer, Philippines

Florencio Tan Mallare, born on 7 November 1932 in Macalelong, Quezon Province, the Philippines, is a self-made man, who was a poor boy from one of the poorest provinces in the Philippines. Starting as a paperboy, he worked his way through high school and law studies, to rise from the ranks and become one of the most respected journalists, publishers, lawyers and businessmen in the Philippines.

Most know him now as the principled and exacting, publisher and president of the World News, the leading Chinese language newspaper in the Philippines today. Veteran journalists, both Filipinos and Chinese alike, also know the young Mallare as a writer and reporter for the pioneering and courageous Yuyitung brothers-owned Chinese Commercial News (CCN), from 1954–1962, during the paper's most trying decades.

Mallare is more than a media man and barrister. In a career spanning more than half a century, from the Japanese Occupation of the Philippines during World War II, to the anti-communist witch hunts of the late 1950s to early 1970s, to the toppling of the twenty-year Marcos dictatorship, Mallare has not only witnessed and chronicled some of the most significant events of his time, but has consistently chosen to be part of social movements and institutions that may not have been very popular at the time, and has contributed to the promotion of free speech, democratic rights, and civil liberties, even at the risk of his own freedom and life.In fact, his whole life mirrored the life of the Chinese in the Philippines.

Becoming a reporter, let alone a publisher, was never part of Mallares' dreams as a child. The job was forced on him, when, at twelve years of age, his father died in a car accident, leaving his mother and five siblings to fend for themselves. "I sold newspapers on the street for fifteen centavos a day. My elder brother peddled goods. This helped me pay my way through high school."

During the last years of the Japanese Occupation, a thirteen-year old Mallare joined the propaganda youth arm of the Wha Chi, the left-leaning Chinese guerrilla group that fought side by side with Filipinos against the Japanese. "I was too small to fight, so I was put in the propaganda team. I delivered propaganda materials along with newspapers to shops in Chinatown. It was very dangerous work, the Japanese would arrest, torture and kill anyone they caught doing this, but I was young and also quite taken by the ideals of the leftists at the time — equality for all men, better working conditions for poor workers and farmers. I looked to China as an example of that ideal."

After the war, while at college, journalism became his priority. Despite completing four years of a pre-medicine course, he switched to law instead because the long laboratory hours required of medical students at Far Eastern University got in the way of his working as a reporter for the Chinese Commercial News (CCN).

When he finally got his law degree and passed the Philippine Bar, Mallare defended freedom of speech and the rights of his colleagues at CCN to practise that freedom. It was not a popular thing to do at the time and meant risking his hard earned licence to practise law, and even his own freedom.

As a young lawyer, Mallare took part in the defence of brothers Quintin and Rizal Yuyitung, as well as the entire editorial staff of CCN, when the paper became a victim of the anti-communist witch hunts of the 1960s and 1970s, "I was the only lawyer in the defense team who could speak, read and write Chinese, so the law firm of Dean Albino Sycip asked me to help. When the brothers were deported to Taiwan, I was sent there too. Unfortunately, they were jailed anyway. We were persecuted for publishing more objective stories about the People's Republic of China (PRC), at a time when the Kuomintang (KMT) and the American influence was very strong in the Philippines. It was a reign of terror waged by the KMT and Philippine Government against the Chinese and Chinese-Filipinos who advocated for better relations with the PRC. We were in the minority, most of the Chinese community at the time were pro-KMT or neutral."

Mallare himself became a victim of the anti-communist witch hunt when the Philippine Government and KMT agents decided to punish him for taking part in the defence of CCN and the Yuyitung brothers. "For over ten years (from 1962 to 1974) they went after me…The Kuomintang, President (Diosdado) Macapagal, the ISAFP (Intelligence Service, Armed Forces of the Philippines) led by then Col. Manuel Yan (Manuel Yan would be promoted to general and then to ambassador under President [Ferdinand] Marcos), and later President Marcos. They wanted me to stop representing CCN. When I refused, they tried to have my Filipino citizenship revoked and have me deported. I was disbarred for six years and prevented from practising law while I defended my Filipino citizenship."

While his experience in the Yuyitung case was unsuccessful, Mallare's defence at his own citizenship case was positive. In 1974, after twelve years of litigation and harassment, the Philippine Supreme Court ruled in favour of Mallare, declaring him a Filipino citizen by right of birth, and returning to him his licence to practise law. His case is in fact considered one of the Philippines' landmark citizenship cases, and is to this day, used as a reference on questions of citizenship for Filipinos of Chinese ancestry. "Ironically, the local Chinese community did little to defend CCN or me", Mallare recalls. It was the Filipino media groups, lawyers and liberal politicians who came to our aid." These included renowned Filipinos such as Senators Jovito Salonga, Claro Recto, Lorenzo Tanada, as well as the National Press Club and other well known Filipino mediamen. (Mallare's defence was brilliant and simple. That his father, Esteban Dy Mallare, was born out of wedlock to a Filipina mother and a Chinese father. And because his parents were not married, Esteban, both by birth and choice, "inherited" the citizenship of his Filipina mother. Thus, Florencio, being the son of Esteban Mallare, a Filipino, is also a Filipino).

Years later, in 1981, Mallare's experience as a reporter and lawyer for CCN helped him establish his own newspaper, the World News, "My goal was simple, publish news on the Philippines and China, as well as other issues in the Chinese language that gave a perspective different from the Kuomintang influenced Chinese newspapers in the country or even mainstream media."

Mallare also felt that it was a good time to start a newspaper again as diplomatic relations between the Philippines and China had been in place since 1975. "I chose to publish a Chinese language paper, because businesswise, I had a ready audience among the Chinese-Filipinos who were hungry for alternative news on China, and the influx of new immigrants from China would like to read the news in Chinese. I figured, even when I am no longer here to run the paper, it will continue to thrive because of its readers."

Over and above managing his newspaper and other business corporations, Mallare has also found time to help other Chinese-Filipino organizations champion better ties between Filipino and ethnic Chinese communities, as well as ties between the Philippines and China. While eschewing an offer to help run the Philippine Star, one of the Philippines biggest English-language dailies in 1987 (published by another Chinese-Filipino media family led by the late Betty Go-Belmonte), Mallare convinced the World News board to help support several projects, including the publication of its English news digest, Tulay (桥), free of charge.

Indeed his foresight and perseverance have earned him recognition from both Filipinos and Chinese alike. In 1999, in recognition of his legal and business acumen, he was named one of ten members of the Preparatory Commission on Constitutional Reforms (PCCR), tasked to make recommendations on amendments of the Philippine constitution. Mallare received a Lifetime Achievement Award for Media at the 2004 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran.

In September 2011, after thirty years in journalism, Mallare won international recognition when the World Chinese Media Cooperation Union of the People's Republic of China awarded the World News with two Distinguished Media Practitioners Award for the papers' contributions to cultural and economic relations between China, the Philippines and the rest of the world, beating 200 other overseas Chinese publications. An obviously proud Mallare says, "We represented an unknown, small Chinese newspaper, and yet we won versus more mainstream Chinese language newspapers around the world."

When asked how he sees his role as a Chinese-Filipino, Mallare says, "I see my role as a Filipino who can help our country forge better ties with China. The shift in world centers, world powers is inevitable, China is the next big power, and so it would be to the advantage of the Philippines to make as many connections with China as possible."

Mang Lee

(Soemsi Woranayin, 梦莉, Mengli, 1938–)
Thai-Chinese writer, businesswoman, Thailand

Mang Lee or Mengli is one of the most prominent Chinese writers in Thailand. She enjoys fame for her prose not only in Thailand, but also outside of Thailand. Another prominent Thai Chinese writer, Sima Gong, called her style of writing "Mengli Style" (梦莉体) because it is so unique that it cannot be categorized into any of the existing categories. Aside from her literary success, Mang Lee is also known for her success in business, as well as her support for Chinese literary activities in Thailand.

Mang Lee's real name is Soemsi Woranayin in Thai, or Xu Aizhen (徐爱珍) in Chinese. "Mengli" is her final and most famous pseudonym. Other pseudonyms include, "Menglibin" (梦莉彬), "Lili"(莉莉), and "Zhangli" (张莉). Mang Lee was born in 1938, the eldest daughter of a family living in Bangkok Chinatown. Her father was an anti-Japanese activist who worked for a Chinese newspaper. When she was three, her father was arrested for his anti-Japanese activities and banished from the kingdom. Hence, she left Thailand for China with her family and lived in her grandparents' house in Chenghai, Guangdong.

Mang Lee's grandfather was a recognized scholar of the Qing Dynasty, and her grandmother was an accomplished artist of Chinese drawings. Under the influence of her grandparents, she was introduced to Chinese calligraphy, Chinese art, and Chinese classical texts and poetry. As a young girl, she led a life of hardship. Her father continued his anti-Japanese activities in Guangdong and perished before the end of the Pacific War. After her grandparents died, her family was forced to move out of their house. They eventually settled in a mountainous area. In order to ease the financial stress on her mother, Mang Lee worked in a rice mill for a short period of time. She was also sent away as a child-bride and an adopted daughter to reduce her family's financial burden. On both occasions, she managed to escape and return home. The hardships she experienced in childhood, together with her failed relationships and life experiences, eventually became the main themes of her prose.

With the help of her mother's sister, Mang Lee returned to Thailand with her mother and younger siblings in the 1950s. She continued her secondary education in a Chinese school in Thailand and learnt Thai during the course of her secondary education. After graduation, she found a job working for a newspaper. Years later, she married a man whom she met on a blind date, Yi Liangshun (蚁良顺), a member of a wealthy Chinese family in Thailand.

During the 1970s, Mang Lee's husband left his family business and tried to make his own mark in the business world. He enlisted her help as his business expanded. Mang Lee's success in business was best demonstrated in her distribution company, which specialized in the distribution of China-made gearboxes in Thailand. Despite the difficulties of establishing trade with a factory based in China and selling Chinese products in Thailand in the 1970s, she managed to gain a major share of the market in Thailand. Her company was awarded the Best-selling Gearbox in Thailand Award in 1988.

Despite her busy schedule, Mang Lee was always actively writing and participating in literary activities. She began to publish her works in the literary columns of newspapers in the 1980s. Initially she employed many pseudonyms and therefore did not gain much attention for her works. However, in the mid-1980s, with the encouragement of Bai Ling (白翎), she came to use only one pseudonym, Mang Lee, for all her published works. From then, her prose gained fame rarely enjoyed by Thai-Chinese writers.

Her prose is characterized by vividly expressed emotions and a style of writing that is unique to her. She wrote on many different themes, but all are a true reflection of her feelings about her experiences. This enables her readers to relate to the emotions conveyed in her prose. As most of her earlier writings are a reflection of her earlier life, which was full of hardship, much of her early prose was dominated by grief, and she was once criticized for this. However, her later prose was more diverse in theme. Another feature of Mang Lee's prose is the style of writing. Sima Gong called it "Mang Lee style" because he could not find a better term. Her prose is a mix between novel and poem. The narrative includes fully developed characters such as those of a novel. Yet the writing is lyrical and displays the poet's sense of aesthetics. Moreover, Mang Lee's prose is rhythmic because of the structure of the sentences, though the words do not rhyme as in a poem.

Mang Lee's prose is famous both within and outside Thailand. Her pieces are published in newspapers in China, Hong Kong, and various Southeast Asian countries. She has also won various literary awards in China. For example, in 1991 she won the "Chinese Prose Award" (中华精短散文奖), organized by Prose (散文) magazine, published by Tianjin Baihua Publisher (天津百花出版社); in 1992 she won the "Excellent Literature of Traveler Xuxia Award" (徐霞客特等文学奖), organized by the Association of Writers in China. In 1989 the collection, Because You are Mang Lee (《因为你是梦莉》), a collection of essays analysing and commenting on her prose, was published. The essays were written by authors both within and outside Thailand. After the publication of this collection, more books commenting on her and her prose were published in Beijing.

Mang Lee was also active in literary activities. She was invited to be the referee for many Chinese literary competitions in Thailand, participated in many seminars on Chinese writers from Southeast Asia and around the world, and also took part in delegations to China. She joined the Association of Chinese writers in Thailand in 1987. She is currently the chairperson of the association after being its vice-chairperson for more than twenty years. Mang Lee is also noted for her generosity towards literary activities. She has donated funds to support the publication of Thai-Chinese literature, and sponsored many literary activities in Thailand, such as seminars and the hosting of literary delegations from other countries. She has also helped many Thai-Chinese writers financially when they travelled to China on cultural exchanges or for conferences.

Some of her publications include, The Sorrows of the Misty Lake (《烟湖更添一段愁》, 1989), Building a Small Tower under the Moonlight (《在月光下砌座小塔》, 1992), and The Young Dean in My Home (《我家的小院长》, 2000).

Marga T.

(former name: Tjoa Liang Tjoe, 蔡良珠, Cai Liangzhu, 1943–)
Novelist, Indonesia

Marga T. is one of the most well known and productive female novelists in Indonesia; were many of her novels made into films. As a popular writer, she has also formed her own fan club, the MT Fan Club. Most of her novels have been published by a leading publisher, Gramedia, which also publishes the largest Indonesian daily newspaper in Jakarta, Kompas.

She was born on 27 January 1943 in Jakarta. By her own admission, Marga T. has been interested in reading and writing since her school days. She received her primary and secondary education in Catholic schools; first in Santa Josef (finishing in 1955), and later in Santa Ursula (finishing in 1961). Like many Peranakan Chinese during the pre-Soeharto era, Marga T. also went to the Universitas Res Publica (URECA), a Baperki-sponsored university which admitted many Chinese Indonesians, as good Indonesian state universities were difficult to get into. Marga studied medicine at URECA, but before she graduated, a Communist-inspired coup, allegedly took place on 30 September 1965. Baperki was perceived to be close to the Communist Party of Indonesia and was thus "implicated". URECA was burned down by the "mob" and the name of the university was changed to Universitas Trisakti (USAKTI). The university building was only rebuilt in 1969; from late 1965 to 1968, therefore, Marga T. did not go to any lectures. She only resumed her studies in 1969 and graduated from the medical school of USAKTI in 1974.

Marga T. noted in her writings that the burning down of URECA was a "blessing in disguise" as she began to concentrate on reading and writing. Although she had published her first short story in a local newspaper in 1964 (when she was twenty-one years old), she became a serious writer only after 1965. From 1965 to 1969, she published at least fifty short stories. Even after she resumed her medical studies she continued to write. In July 1971 she began to publish her first serialized novel, Karmila I, in Kompas, and, encouraged by its popularity, she wrote a sequel (Karmila II) in April 1971. The novel was published as a book in 1973 and the following year she published another novel, Badai Pasti Berlalu. These two novels established her as a popular Indonesian novelist. Karmila was reprinted twenty times. Both novels were made into movies and since then, she has become a popular novel queen of sorts. Coincidentally, there is another woman novelist, Mira W., who has a rather similar background; both women are medical doctors by training, and are equally well known.

Although Marga T. was a qualified physician, she failed to get a posting in Indonesia as a doctor. There is a regulation in Indonesia that a young doctor must be posted to an area assigned by the Ministry of Health before he/she could practise. Marga T. did not explain in her brief biography why she was unable to get a posting. She was given some comforting words by Pak Muharyo, editor of Femina, who said to her, "Indonesia does not need doctors, Indonesia needs writers!" Indeed, had she practised as a doctor and given up writing, she might not have become as successful as she is today.

Marga T. has to date written more than one hundred short stories and fifty novels. Her novels deal with urban dwellers rather than rural folk, and with young adults, rather than old people. Most of her works are about love and life. Although a writer with an ethnic Chinese background, most of her novels do not reflect Chinese ethnicity. A possible exception is Gema Sebuah Hati (1975), which tells the story of Peranakan Chinese students at URECA/USAKTI before and after the abortive coup in 1965. Its sequel, Setangkai Elderweiss (1978), tells the story of Peranakan Chinese students in Europe. With the exception of these two novels, her characters are modern educated Indonesians who live in cities, and could be of any ethnic background.

While Marga T. may be well known for her popular novels, she is nonetheless interested in socio-political events. In her latest novel, Sekuntum Nozomi, which consists of five volumes, Volume 3 deals with the anti-Chinese riots which took place towards the end of Soeharto's rule, and describes how one of the protagonists witnessed not only the violence, but also the anti-Chinese campaign engineered by some elements in Indonesian society. This was the first Indonesian novel to deal with the May 1998 event. From the perspective of a woman writer, Marga T. recounted the experiences of some Indonesians, especially urban Indonesian women, during the turbulent period. As such she was also describing Indonesian society before the fall of the Soeharto regime, capturing the atmosphere of those days.

Like many Chinese Indonesians before the rise of Soeharto, Marga T. also had a Chinese name — Tjoa Liang Tjoe — with Tjoa being her Chinese surname. After Soeharto introduced the name changing rule, Marga T. also changed her name. At the time when she was writing short stories and novels, she used her pen name, Marga T. It has been suggested that "T" stands for her former Chinese surname, Tjoa, but she has, pointing out that Marga T., when abbreviated, would become MT, and when MT is pronounced in English, it sounds like "empty". This is confession to the almighty god — that "in front of HIM, she is nothing".

As stated earlier, Marga T. was unable to get a posting as a doctor in Indonesia. She therefore moved to Germany, presumably with her husband. However, her Indonesian qualification was not recognized by WHO, and she had to study medicine again at the Wolfgang von Goethe Universitat in Frankfurt. In 1979 she passed the examinations required by the ECFMG (Educational Council for Foreign Medical Graduates) to allow her to practise as a physician in the United States. She worked for a while in Texas, but decided to return home to be a "village doctor" in Indonesia. According to her, at the Dallas airport before the plane took off, an officer could not believe that she wanted to return to Indonesia and said to her, "What? You want to go back? Is this country not good enough for you?"

Marga T. is a prolific writer. It was difficult to study her writings in the past as they were not compiled systematically. It is only in recent years that she has made a list of her published works. There are two sources which provide interesting information about the author herself: one in the appendix of Setangkai Nozomi, vol. 4, and the other in the appendix of the same novel, vol. 5. She has so far published 120 short stories and fifty-four novels; eight of her novels have been made into films.

Masagung

(Tjio Wie Tay, 蒋维泰, Jiang Weitai, 1927–90)
Publisher, businessman, Indonesia

Masagung, whose original name was Tjio Wie Tay, was a leading Indonesian publisher in the last century. He was close to the Soekarno family and published many books on Indonesia, including memoirs of important Indonesian political leaders; he maintained good relationships with the political elite.

Tjio was born in Jakarta on 8 September 1927 into a Peranakan family. He was the fourth son of Tjio Koan An, an electrical engineer who worked in a gas electronic company. Tjio Koan An died when Tjio Wie Tay was four years old. Not much is known about the boy's mother except that she was the one who bore the burden of the whole family after her husband's demise. Life was difficult, but she worked hard to send her children, including Tjio Wei Tay, to Dutch schools. Tjio first received a Dutch education in Jakarta, but was later sent to live with his uncle in Bogor where he went to a local HCS (Dutch school for Chinese). He studied up to Primary 5 and then returned to Jakarta in 1940.

In order to make a living, Tjio soon started a cigarette retail business selling cigarettes stick by stick on bicycle in Glodok, the Chinatown in Jakarta. He then moved to Senen, an area where he would later set up his well known bookshops and publishing house. Initially he sold cigarettes, stationery, and food and got to know Lie Thay San, another small businessman in the area, who was senior to Tjio. In the process of selling cigarettes they also came to know The Kie Hoat, who used to work for a cigarette company. In 1948 the three of them formed a firm called Firma Thay San Kongsie, using the name of one of the partners. It is worth noting that Thay San means "Great Mountain", which is the name of a well known mountain in China. Its Indonesian name, Gunung Agung, which also means "Great Mountain", happens to be the name of a mountain in Bali.

Apart from selling cigarettes in bulk, Firma Thay San Kongsie also sold books and stationery. In 1951 the firm purchased a larger place at No. 13 Kwitang, near Senen. However, after working together for seven years, Tjio and Lie fell out with each other in 1953, leaving The Kie Hoat alone to run the business. Tjio, however, remained a partner in the business which was later renamed P.T. Gunung Agung and specialized in selling books and stationery. It also went into book publishing later.

Tjio was able to make friends easily, including with indigenous Indonesians, many of whom were to become shareholders of P.T. Gunung Agung. Tjio was an admirer of President Soekarno and came to know the president in 1954 when he visited the Gunung Agung stand during the Jakarta Book Fair. Apparently the president had paid notice to Gunung Agung's publications on Indonesia and the books that it imported. When he ordered a set of encyclopedia for his own use, Tjio managed to get it within a short period of time and delivered it personally to the presidential palace. Their friendship was to last thereafter.

When Soekarno launched the "Liberating West Irian Campaign" in 1962, Tjio went to the international book fair in Tokyo and from there flew to West Irian to support the Indonesian Government campaign by distributing free textbooks and stationery to the local population. In West Irian Tjio stayed in a house together with other volunteers and some Indonesian officials. As there was only one telephone in the house, whenever there was a phone call for someone, the name of the person was called. Since then, people got to know that Tjio was the president-director of P.T. Gunung Agung and addressed him as "Mas Gunung Agung", which came to be shortened to "Mas Agung". Mas means "elder brother" in Javanese. On 26 August 1963 he officially changed his name to Masagung, long before the passing of the name-changing regulation in the Soeharto era.

However, according H.A. Notosoetardjo, chairman of the Federation of Publishers Association (IKAP), who was Masagung's enemy-turned-close friend, Soekarno was the one who suggested the name "Masagung" in the early 1960s when Tjio was thinking of changing his name. It was also Sukarno who made Notosoetardjo discard his hostile attitude towards Masagung. Apparently in the 1960s Masagung became an ardent supporter of President Soekarno, publishing various books on Soekarno and his writings, as well as the Soekarno's collection of paintings. Even after Soekarno was removed from power in 1966, Masagung established the Yayasan Idayu, a foundation named after Soekarno's mother, despite strong opposition from his partners in P.T. Gunung Agung. The Idayu Foundation was established to collect all sorts of publications, books, and photographs in relation to Indonesia since 1945 especially those on both Soekarno and Moh. Hatta, the first president and vice-president of the Republic of Indonesia. It has also published books of past Indonesian nationalist leaders. After the removal of Sukarno, Masagung continued to get in touch with Soekarno, risking his life and showing true friendship. However he was also close to Moh. Hatta who became chairman of the Idayu Foundation after Soekarno stepped down.

P.T. Gunung Agung in the 1960s had 100 shareholders, including former vice-president Hatta, former mayor of Jakarta city, Sudiro, well known literary figure HB Jassin, well known lawyer Sumanang, and leading journalist Adinegoro. Its initial paid-up capital was 50,000,000 rupiah of P.T. Gunung Agung, but twenty-five years later, the paid-up capital of the company had increased to 500,000,000 rupiah. When P.T. Gunung Agung was at its peak, there was no other bookstore that was as popular. Apart from selling books it also published many books on Indonesia by Indonesian authors, including the semi-official biographies of President Soekarno (1965), President Soeharto (1970), Foreign Minister Adam Malik (1979), former Vice-President Mohammad Hatta (1979), former Vice-President Sultan Hamengku Buwono IX (1979), and State-Oil chief, General Ibnu Sutowo (1979).

Tjio not only changed his name, but also changed his religion. Initially he was a follower of Hindu Dharma, but from September 1976 he became a Muslim. His conversion to Islam was welcomed by many Muslim Indonesians, but his wife (Cheng Hian alias Ida Aju Agung) and three children did not follow him. After conversion, he became active in promoting Islam and publishing Islamic books. In the 1980s, Tjio's book business was declining and P.T. Gunung Agung began to diversify its business. Tjio then held the following positions: president of P.T. Gunung Agung (publishing, general trading), P.T. Sari Agung (bookselling, printing), P.T. Ayuman Gunung Agung (money exchange business), and P.T. Inti Idayu Press (printing); chairman of P.T. Windusurya and P.T. Inter Delta (Kodak products distribution); director of PT Jakarta Mandarin Agung (hotels); chairman of the board of directors of Yayasan Idayu (foundation); and director of Jack Chia MPH Ltd.

When Masagung's first wife passed away in 1986, he relinquished all his positions in P.T. Gunung Agung and passed them on to his sons. He himself established an Islamic bookstore. In July 1986, at the age of sixty, he married Lestari, a thirty-eight-year-old indigenous Indonesian woman from Yogyakarta.

Masagung died in September 1990 after celebrating his sixty-third birthday. He had never celebrated his birthday previously, but on 8 September 1990 he did so because his youngest son, Ketut Abdurrahman Masagung, converted to Islam that night at the age of twenty.

Maung Maung Than

(许文亭, Xu Wenting, 1938–)

Businessman, community leader, philanthropist, Myanmar

The Chinese community in Yangon held U Maung Maung Than in high regard for the many acts of charity that he has done. As a Chinese community leader, he was instrumental in the funding of relief works in the various areas of Myanmar where disasters struck. It was also reported that he did not segregate the overseas Chinese from the local indigenous Burmese people, but extended mercy to all in deed.

U Maung Maung Than has served several important positions in the Myanmar Chinese community. In 1983 he was vice-chairman of the preparation committee that established the Jinjiang Congregation (晋江公会). In 1985 he was chairman of the Yangon Xu Clan Association, which is also known as Gao Yang Tang (仰光许氏高阳堂). From 1987–1992, he was vice-chairman of the initial management team of Jinjiang Congregation. Since 1988, he has been the vice-chairman of the Myanmar Overseas Chinese Chamber of Commerce (缅甸华商商会). And from 1996 to the present, he has been guiding the Myanmar Overseas Chinese Charity Association (缅华慈善会) as its chairman. U Maung Maung Than was also vice-chairman of the 17th management committee of the Fujian Tongxiang Hui Zonghui, the parent organization of all the Hokkien (Fujian) hometown associations in Myanmar (缅甸福建同乡会总会) in 1999. He simultaneously plays an advisory role at a few organizations, such as the Myanmar Overseas Chinese Library and the Yangon Huaqiao Huzhu Hui (仰光华侨互助会), also known as Yangon Overseas Chinese Mutual Aid Association.

The Myanmar Overseas Chinese Charity Association (缅华慈善会) was originally known as the Burma Overseas Chinese Relief Works Organization (缅甸华侨救灾总会). It was formed for the purpose of supporting China in relief work during the anti-Japanese war in 1937. It was renamed in 1982 to its current name to indicate the change of its orientation. Under the leadership of Maung Than, the association has been taking an active part in relief work among overseas Chinese as well as local indigenous, fire and flood disaster victims. In 1987, for instance, the association moved 2,000 bags of rice and 500 bags of salt by train to the fire disaster area in Lashio, the Sino-Myanmar border town in northern Shan State. In 1989 the association also played an active part in fire disaster areas in Myeik (a town at the southern tip of Myanmar) and Muse (Sino-Myanmar border area), as well as the storm-hit area in Rakhine (western Myanmar). The largest relief work the association did was during the Cyclone Nargis Disaster in early May 2008.

Deadly tropical cyclone Nargis, which occurred over the Bay of Bengal, severely hit five divisions and states, Yangon, Bago, Ayeyawddy, Kayin, and Mon, covering south-western coastal towns and the biggest city of Yangon. A total of 28,485 people lost their lives and 33,416 people went missing in the cyclone storm. As access to the cyclone Nargis-hit areas from outside was only available through the Myanmar Government, three major local Chinese associations — the Overseas Chinese Chamber of Commerce, the Overseas Chinese Charity Association and the Fujian Native Association — successfully joined hands to donate a total sum of 50 million kyats (US$45,000) in cash through the Myanmar authorities to storm victims.

U Maung Maung Than has also shown his concern for the welfare of his native homeland in China. In 1981, when he visited China, he contributed financially towards education in his ancestral native village. In 1985 he funded the construction of a building for Wai Zeng Zhuang Primary School, located in the neighbouring village of his ancestral birthplace in China. In addition, he has also donated funds to the Association for the Aged and to his ancestral hometown, Qian-pu village (前埔村), for its road construction. In the summer of 1996 and 1998, when some provinces in China were hit by severe floods, he raised a substantial amount of relief fund in the Myanmar Chinese community and donated this to the disaster areas.

U Maung Maung Than is a pro-Beijing Chinese community leader in Myanmar. In 2002, at the tea gathering organized by the Chinese Embassy in Yangon, he expressed his support for the Chinese Government to move against the Falun Gong, a religious-political sect that is against the Beijing authorities. In October 2005 he led Yangon's Chinese community in celebrating the success of China's second manned space mission with the "Shenzhou-6" spacecraft, at the Myanmar Chinese Chamber of Commerce. In March 2007, together with other representatives of the Chinese community in Myanmar, he gathered in Yangon to condemn new secessionist remarks made by ex-Taiwan's leader, Chen Shui Bian. They firmly opposed Chen's plot to seek "Taiwan independence" and will continue to safeguard the interest of the Chinese people and China's territorial integrity.

Xu Wenting, as U Maung Maung Than is called in Chinese, was born in a village named Dedaye in the Irrawaddy Delta, Lower Myanmar, on 15 October 1938. His parents came from Qian-pu village in the An-hai township of Jin-jiang County in Fujian Province of China (福建晋江安海镇前埔村). In 1970 U Maung Maung Than ventured into business on his own, setting up an export trade called, "Win Win Fish Air-bladder", a business which brought him prosperity. Later in 1990, when the Myanmar Government opened its door for international trade, he expanded his business and established Tiger Shark Fin Co. Ltd., which prospered even further and gave him standing in society.

He is married to Chen Xiuying (陈秀英), a local-born Chinese lady. She received her education at a Chinese school in Rangoon called Huaqiao Zhongxue, which was nationalized in 1964. Chen assists her husband in his business and community charity work and acts on her husband's behalf when he is away for business. They have three sons who tend to the family business. Chen is also a leader among Chinese women and is currently the adviser to Myanmar Overseas Chinese Women Association (缅甸华侨妇女协会), founded on 2 June 1948, with 1,500 members, as of 1990, as well as vice-chairman of the alumni of Huaqiao Zhongxue. In 1996, U Maung Maung Than and Chen were officially invited to attend the 47th anniversary of China's National Day celebration in Beijing by the Chinese Government.

Murdaya, Siti Hartati

(Chow Li Ing, 邹丽英, Zou Liying, 1946–)
Leader of Buddhist organization, businesswoman, Indonesia

Siti Hartati Murdaya, wife of Murdaya Widyawimarta Poo (Poo Tjie Guan 傅志宽), was listed as number 16 among the richest Indonesians on the Forbes 2006 list with a net worth of US$430 million. She is also the leader of new Walubi (Perwakilan Umat Buddha Indonesia or the Indonesian Representatives of the Buddhist Community).

Hartati was born on 29 August 1946 in Jakarta into a Buddhist family. She had been exposed to Buddhism since childhood and was serious in pursuing Buddhist teachings. She had even gone to Sri Lanka to study Buddhism in order to become a Buddhist nun but was stopped by her father who was a journalist turned timber merchant. She then helped her father in the business and acquired her business experience.

Hartati was also interested in self-improvement. After graduating from high school, she entered the Faculty of Economics at Ureca which later became Universitas Trisakti from where she graduated in 1969 with a Sarjana degree in business administration. In 1984 she participated in the executive programme for graduates at Stanford University (USA) and in the following year, took the management course on small business at the National University of Singapore (NUS).

In 1971 she married Poo Tjie Guan. The couple jointly established PT Kencana Sakti Indonesia dealing in electric appliances as well as providing services for lifts in multi-story buildings. According to Tempo, almost all the lifts in Jakarta were installed by PT Kencana Sakti Indonesia. According to Forbes, "[the] husband-and-wife team made its first fortune as supplier and contractor for the [Indonesian] state-owned electricity company. [The two] founded the Central Cipta Murdaya [CCM] Group, also known as Berca Group, in 1990." The Group has more than 50 companies, and was not affected by the monetary crisis during the 1990s as it had no foreign debts problem. The CCM is now engaged in a wide range of businesses: electronics, timber, palm oil, shoes, and property. The companies in the CCM group include League (sports), Hotel Majapahit, Hardsystem (events and exhibition services provider), Harfit (furniture and marble), PT Hardaya Inti Plantationand (agribusiness and palm oil) and Grand City (shopping complex). Hartati is the leader of CCM Group.

According to a Jakarta business journal, SWA, in the early 2000s the CCM was involved in two major business events: In 2002 CCM purchased PT Metropolitan Kentjana (MK), and in 2004 CCM took part in the PT Jakarta International Trade Fair (JITF). Hartati is the president director of JITF which has organized the Jakarta International Expo since 2004. The Jakarta International Expo was awarded the honour of being "The Best Exhibition Hall" by Venue Magazine on the occasion of its "2nd Indonesia MICE AWARD 2009".

Apart from running the business, Hartati was active in socio-religious activities especially in the Buddhist community. During the Soeharto era, the Indonesian Buddhists were divided into at least two groups, one supported by the government and the other was not. The Indonesian Buddhist Council (Perwalian Umat Buddha Indonesia, abbreviated as Walubi) was dominated by the pro-government Buddhists. The general chairman of Walubi was Bhante Girirakkhito Mahathera (1986–91; 1992–97), the spiritual teacher of Hartati. With Hartati's support, Walubi had succeeded in organizing the Waisak celebration since 1993. In 1994, there was a crisis within the central leadership of Walubi and two Buddhist organizations were expelled. On Waisak day, 1995, President Soeharto urged without success the Buddhist community to be united. Both groups celebrated Waisak in 1996 and Soeharto chose to attend the one organized by the Walubi group.

After Soeharto was forced to step down, there was an open split. On 6 November 1998 there was an extraordinary congress of Walubi and the two groups confronted each other. As there was no compromise, Walubi was declared dissolved. On 14 November the opposition groups, consisting of three Buddhist Monks associations, came together and formed another organization known as KASI (Konperensi Agung Sangha Indonesia, The Supreme Conference of Indonesian Sangha). On 30 November, the old leadership of Walubi led by Hartati established a new organization called Perwakilan Umat Buddha Indonesia (Indonesian Buddhist Representative Council), which was abbreviated as Walubi (identical with the old name). Hartati was elected as general chairperson. The new minister of religious affairs wanted to recognize both but the ministry was still controlled by the old group and supported the new Walubi.

In the 1999 MPR (People's Consultative Council), there was one seat for the Buddhist community, both groups competed for the seat but the government supported the new Walubi led by Hartati who was appointed as the member of MPR (1994–99). There was a demonstration against Hartati but the government did not abandon its support for her. The Buddhist community remains divided until today. Apart from being the general chairperson of new Walubi, Hartati also serves as the general chairperson of Yayasan Kepedulian Sosial (Social Care Foundation), a charity organization.

A mother of four children, Tempo reported that she gave her children religious education. She herself goes to Buddhist temple regularly and frequently invites monks to come to her house. When asked about her hopes for her children, she said: "I would like my children to be businessmen, so that they can follow their parents' career."

Hartati's husband, Murdaya Widyawimarta Poo, was born in Blitar (East Java) in 1941 and graduated from the Faculty of Economics, the University of Indonesia (1966). In 2004 he was elected member of parliament representing the PDI-Perjuangan. He also serves as a member of the advisory board of Kadin (Indonesian Chamber of Commerce and Industry) and a member of the honorary council of new Walubi.

Myint Shwe

(吴继垣, Wu Jiyuan, 1947–)

Entrepreneur, community leader, Myanmar

U Myint Shwe is a man who successfully juggles many roles: he is chairman of the Myanmar Kyint Kyang Association (Jinjiang Association, 晋江公会), chairman and CEO of Golden Fountain Enterprise Ltd, chairman of Golden King General Construction Co Ltd and Golden King General Electric & Engineering Group, chairman of World Mark Industry Co Ltd, as well as chairman of the Myanmar Ice Industry Factory Association. Outside the business arena, he assumes the chairperson role of the Yan Ling Association (吴氏延陵宗亲总会) which is affiliated to the Wu Clan Association in Yangon.

U Myint Shwe is a well respected and enterprising Chinese of Fujian ancestry who has made his fortune in ice production in a country where the tropical climate has created an unceasing demand for ice consumption. He currently owns six large ice-making factories in Yangon.

He is second among four siblings, and was born in Maung Khine Street (recently renamed Bo Yoe Street), near Kheng Hock Keng Chinese Temple in Yangon Chinatown. His father, U San Pe (Wu Shan Bei, 吴善备), and mother, Huang Xiuliang (黄秀琅), migrated to Burma from Quanzhou in Fujian Province, in search of a new life.

In 1964 U Myint Shwee graduated from Nanyang Zhong Xue, a Chinese secondary school (which was nationalized in 1964 and currently stands as the No. 2 State High School, Bahan) in Yangon, at the age of seventeen and entered the business world, first by assisting in his father's business. Within a couple of years he found his niche in the ice-making business, initially by learning from books and overseas counterparts, and then discovering and adapting this business to suit Myanmar's condition. By 1969, he was primarily in ice manufacturing and installing fresh beer production lines in Strand Road in Ahlone township. Within a decade he had made a name for himself in the business community and was nominated chairman of the Ice-making Association of Myanmar.

In early 1980, when Myanmar launched its open door and market-oriented policy, he was already firmly established in business. He then acquired a piece of property in Yangon where he constructed an eight-storey building to centralize management control of his various business enterprises. Following his visit to Jinjiang city in the Quanzhou (泉州) district of China, he returned to Yangon and set up a network of manufacturing facilities for the production of porcelain and construction materials. This network, spanning Yangon and Jinjiang (Fujian, China), supports a joint venture that started porcelain production in Jinjiang meant to fulfil the demand for porcelain use in the Myanmar construction market. At the same time the joint venture also facilitated the development of a materials distribution network in Jinjiang that promotes construction trade and development between China and Myanmar.

In 1987 he established the Gold King General Construction Company Limited which has been successful in various public housing projects. Three projects for the construction of high-rise apartments for individual ownership, in particular, were completed in 1995. Recent years saw the completion of more commercial buildings, notably the three office buildings for the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Transport, and the Ministry of Energy. These tree office buildings are located in the new capital of Myanmar (since 2006) in Naypyidaw, the Pyinmana Special Development Region. The second phase for this series of construction project involves completing staff residential buildings and high-class bungalows.

It was on 6 August 1992 that Myint Shwe established Golden Fountain Enterprise Limited to consolidate the ice-making factories that he had set up since 1969. The factories have a production capacity of 100 to 300 tons of ice per day. Golden Fountain also supplies farm machineries, water booster pumps, wheel loaders, dump trucks, and back hoes based on customers' specifications. His other company, World Mark Industry Company Limited, was established on 19 March 2001 to sift and store bean pulses at the Shwe Pyi Thar industrial Zone in Yangon. His two sons, Wu Hai Teng (吴海腾) and Wu Can Hui (吴灿辉) assist him in business.

Being a traditional Chinese, U Myint Shwe turns to philanthropy to give back what he has earned to society. He has donated funds to both Burmese and Chinese communities in Myanmar. These charitable acts raised his reputation a few notches higher. Among other contributions, in 1980, when Kang Ji Temple and Xia-yang Wu Clan House in his native town in Fujian required renovation, he was among the donors. Later in 1998, he led the Chinese community in pledging disaster relief funds when various provinces along the Yangtze River in China were flooded.

From 27 August to 6 September 2000, at the invitation of the Overseas Chinese Affairs of China's Prime Minister's Office, he led a group of Chinese businessmen from Myanmar to visit Beijing, Xinjiang, Chongqing, and Kunming to promote business/trade relations between Myanmar and China.

Recently the important role of the Myanmar Chinese Chamber of Commerce in promoting international trade and cooperation between Myanmar and China has been recognized by the Myanmar Government. U Myint Shwe, who is vice-chairman of Myanmar Chinese Chamber of Commerce, has been assigned to receive international trade delegations. For instance, in September 2010, he received the commercial delegation from Henan Province, and in November 2010 he received the high-level delegation from the Department of Commerce of Yunnan Province. The Yunnan delegation visit to Myanmar was particularly important as it was to set up the representative office of the Department of Commerce of Yunnan Province in Yangon, and to sign many trade and commercial cooperation agreements. U Myint Shwe was also present at the signing ceremony of the cooperation agreement on the reconstruction of Myintkyi-Pangsaung Road (ancient Sino-Burma overland mule-caravan trade route) between the Yuzana Construction Group (Myanmar) and Yunnan Construction Engineering Construction on 11 November 2010. This is an important project as it would reopen the once ancient caravan route for access into western China from Myanmar.

N

Na Teng Choon, James

(蓝廷骏, Lan Tingjun; pen name: 云鹤, Yun He, 1942–2012)

Writer, leader of literary movement, Philippines

James Na Teng Choon was the leader of the literary movement that caught the attention of mainstream Filipino literary organizations which started appreciating works in Chinese, albeit through translations. These translated works produced by ethnic Chinese in the Philippines is now accepted by Filipinos as part of Philippine literature, regardless of the language used — Chinese, English, Filipino, or the local Philippine dialects. Na was the most prolific writer of these works having produced an impressive collection of poetry recognized internationally.

Na came from a family of literary artists. His paternal grandfather, Na Tim (蓝琛), was a close associate of the pioneer newspaper publisher, Yu Yi Tung (于以同), father of the renowned journalist-activists known as the Yuyitung Brothers. Na's maternal grandfather, Xu Rong Zhi (许荣智), was likewise a newspaperman in Fujian, who once served as general manager of Xiamen's daily newspaper, Jiangsheng Daily (江声日报). Na's father, Na Tian Min (蓝天民), born in 1917, emigrated to the Philippines from Xiamen in 1936. He was renowned as a pioneer who promoted literary activities in the Philippines. He and Wang Wenting (王文廷) negotiated to have a weekly supplement in Kong Li Po (公理报) to publish the works of young writers. Both of them also had their own columns on philosophy and literature to encourage new thinking among the youths, thus planting the seeds of literary writing and appreciation in them.

When Na Tian Min worked at the Chinese Commercial News, he started a literary supplement named New Horizon (新潮) and established the NewVoice Society to encourage many young talents to pursue their interests and hone their skills in the world of literary arts. It was thus one of the important literary organizations in the 1930s. Na continued his efforts in this field until his retirement in the 1990s. He was a true pioneer in filling the dearth of literary works and a cultural bridge in the Chinese-Filipino community.

James Na Teng Choon was born on 28 April 1942 into this literary environment where his love and interest in the literary arts would be nurtured. From the age of twelve, when his poem, "Purple Sounds" (紫色的琴声) was first published, there was no turning back. In fifty years, he produced a prolific body of works.

Following in his forebears' footsteps, he founded the first modern poetry study group in the late 1950s to early 60s. In 1982, he founded the Society of Contemporary Arts and Literature (SCAL, 新潮文艺社), and persevered in advocating the idea that works depicting the thoughts, sentiments, and experiences of ethnic Chinese should be considered part of the body of ethnic Chinese literary works, in whatever language it was written — Chinese, English, Filipino, or the local Philippine dialects. From 1961 to 1962, he was editor of the poetry supplement, "诗潮" in the Huaqiao Weekly magazine (华侨周刊). From 1982 he edited the literary supplement of the World News (世界日报). Na also served as director of the largest organization of Filipino writers in the country, the Union of Filipino Writers (UMPIL), in 1987. Among his notable published collections of poetry are Melancholic Score (1959), Springtime in Autumn (1960), The Rainbow Snatcher (1961), The Blue Dust (1963), Wild Plant (1985), In the Light of Poetry and Photography (1989), 100 Poems (2002 and 2003), Poems by James T.C. Na: A Collection of Originals & Translations in 9 Languages (2003). His books of poetry have been translated into several languages besides English.

Because he was born in the Philippines, he experienced the ambivalence of being an ethnic Chinese in an adopted land. He believed that the journey from being a huaqiao (华侨 Overseas Chinese) to a huaren (华人, ethnic Chinese) was one fraught with difficulties and heartaches. However, as soon as a huaqiao gave up his Chinese citizenship to become a huaren, he became a cultural minority in his adopted country and must thus assert his new identity and seek to be an integral part of the nation. These thoughts are reflected in many of his works.

"The Wild Plant" (野生植物, translated into English by Teresita Ang-See) is the most notable among Na's poems:

With leaves
But without stem
With stem
But without roots
With roots
But without soil
It is a wild plant
Called Overseas Chinese

It is the one most quoted and cited because it expressed the sentiments of a "transplanted" people fully. It has been translated into English, Spanish, Portuguese, and Filipino, and was selected to be included in many poetry anthologies because of the cultural philosophy it embodied — the search for identity and belonging of an immigrant generation transplanted from its native soil to a new homeland.

Na obtained a degree in architecture from the Far Eastern University in Manila, the Philippines. He was vice president of Add-Mayer Development Corp., the Philippines, involved in architecture and the construction business. His passion for both poetry and photography had garnered him countless awards and recognition such as the Federation of International Art Photography Award (1982), World Academy of Arts and Culture, honorary degree of doctor of literature from the World Academy of Arts and Culture (2006), Certificate of Merit on Poetry for World Brotherhood and Peace from the United Poets Laureate International, the United States (2007), and fellowship of the World Literature Academy in the United Kingdom (1993).

He was a member or officer of various prestigious literary organizations in China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan, and held editorial positions in international publications such as The Epoch Poetry Journal, Taiwan (1965), the Overseas Chinese Literature (Serial), Lujiang Publishing House, Xiamen, China (1987), Directory of Overseas Chinese Literature, Jinan University (暨南大学), Guangzhou, China (1987), Anthology of Chinese Poetry in Singapore, Thailand, Philippines, Wen-Lian Press, Beijing, China (1988), Four-Seas Literary Magazine, Wen-Lian Press, Beijing, China (1988), South East Asian Chinese Literature (Philippines), Lujiang Publishing House, Xiamen, China (1999).

Na represented Chinese-Filipino writers at many international conferences. In 1989, he was co-convener of the Conference on Social Change and Southeast Asian Chinese Literature, held with the Chinese Studies Program of De La Salle University, Philippines. In 2006, he was one of the conveners of the PEN Club of Southeast Asia Chinese Poetry Writers, and shouldered the responsibility of being editor-in-chief of the Southeast Asian Chinese Poetry Journal, and convened the international conferences of Southeast Asian Chinese Poets, held successively in Fuzhou, Guangdong, Ho Chi Minh City, Guiyang, among other places.

It was Na's leadership in the literary movement that gradually caught the attention of mainstream Philippine literary organizations which then started appreciating works in Chinese, albeit through translations. Through the nomination of fellow writer and UMPIL director, Joaquin Sy, Na received in 2008 the Gawad Balagtas, the most prestigious literary award given by UMPIL. The citation highlighted the recognition of Na's work by Filipino mainstream society: "For his admirable achievement in Chinese poetry that reflects the Chinese-Filipino experience in the Philippines, as well as the unbreakable ties of overseas Chinese to their roots and memory. His eight books of poetry translated into several languages apart from English showed his extraordinary devotion to his craft while finding commonality in the deep but universal experience of humanity, nature, and beauty. In his capacity as literary editor to various local and foreign Chinese literary publications, [and through] his extensive membership in literary organizations, and in his fellowships and visiting lectures in the Mainland and in international literary academies, he has both distinguished himself and ably represented the Philippines and the Filipino-Chinese community."

Na Tian Min and Na Teng Choon together edited the three literary supplements in local Chinese-language dailies, collectively called the "three tides" (三潮) — haichao (海潮), chaosheng (潮声) and xinchao (新潮) — which published the works not just of local writers, but also those from China and elsewhere. These three eminent journals have become not just good reference materials on the development of literary works among local Chinese writers, but are also bridges of mutual enrichment between China and the Chinese overseas.

James Na's wife, Liu Mei Ying (刘美英), using pen name Qiu Di (秋笛), is herself a renowned essayist-writer and has been teaching in a Chinese school. She is one of the founders of the New Horizon Literary Organization, and is quite active in literary organizations and literary activities in the Chinese-Filipino community. Many of her essays have won distinction and are recognized to be representative of the views and experiences of Chinese-Filipino women.

James Na died of kidney failure on 9 August 2012.

Personal interview with James Na Teng Choon on 15 December 2010.

Neo Chee Keong, Jack

(梁智强, Liang Zhiqiang, 1960–)

Film director, actor, comedian, Singapore

Having made a number of top-grossing films, Jack Neo Chee Keong now sees his name to dominating Singapore's commercial film industry. Neo's initial fame came from his groundbreaking comic sketches on television before he embarked on a film-making career that encompasses directing, scriptwriting and acting. Some of Neo's films have become national talking points on topical issues, such as the high-pressure education system and the marginalization of the Chinese-educated in a society dominated by the English language.

Jack Neo Chee Keong, popularly known as Jack Neo, was born on 24 January 1960. The eldest in a family of four children, Neo grew up in humble circumstances in a village — Kampung Chai Chee — and had to help with household chores that included the rearing of pigs. He attended Yu Neng Primary School, Anglican High School before graduating from Tanjong Katong Technical School with "O" level (10th grade schooling) qualifications. Although he did not shine in his studies, he discovered in school a talent and liking for performing. At fifteen, he signed up for training classes offered by the then Radio and Television Singapore that paved the way for a freelance career acting or hosting shows on air. The early show business experience came in useful when the Music and Drama Company of the Singapore Armed Forces talent spotted him. By then the twenty-one year old Neo had joined the army as a professional soldier. He spent the next seven years in the army as a drama director. Writing scripts and training performers for the regular army road shows honed his entertainment skills. In his free time, Neo performed skits at private functions and on television.

Beginning in 1990, Neo was on his way to attaining celebrity status as one half of Singapore's top comic duo, the other being comedian Moses Lim. With Lim, he hosted a greatly successful weekly television variety show, Comedy Tonight. For this show, Neo created his two iconic characters: a bumbling old woman known as Liang Po Po, and a suburban middle-aged housewife, Liang Simei, both of whom became larger than life for their acute depiction of the many foibles of the Singapore character. That Neo had to cross-dress for these female roles added to their piquancy and also pointed to his daring as a performer. Neo's comedy was not just laughter-inducing jokes. Believing that comedy can play a role in important social discourses, he served up some biting satires that won him his fan base.

Watching Eric Khoo's Mee Pok Man (see entry on Eric Khoo) in 1995 set Neo thinking about the possibility of making Singapore films. His entry point into films was as an actor, first in a television drama, and then as a major character in Khoo's 1997 feature, 12 Storeys. The celebrity television comedian impressed with his realistic portrayal of a buck-tooth hawker living in a typical Singapore public housing estate. In 1998, he proved he could direct by winning the Best Director award for his short film, Replacement Killers, at the Singapore Short Film Award of the Singapore International Film Festival.

The year 1998 was a watershed in Neo's nascent film career. Money No Enough (Neo wrote and acted) took in $5.8 million at the box office, making it the highest grossing Singapore film and the third highest grossing film in Singapore after international blockbusters, Titanic and Lost World. The theme of the average guy grappling with money woes served up with Neo's vintage comic flair and adroit feel for heartland issues, spawned a spate of comedy films by others. The extraordinary public reception to Money No Enough was a seminal event in Singapore's film industry. It and a few more of Neo's blockbusters to come proved to movie distributors here that homegrown movies can have good box office and a future.

In 1999, Neo directed his first full-length feature, That One No Enough. But it was his second directorial outing, I Not Stupid, in 2002 that brought him a measure of critical recognition alongside the film's box office success. The film offers an engaging look at the pressures children have to negotiate when they are at the bottom of Singapore's competitive education system. While critics baulk at considering it an artistic triumph, the film struck a chord with a great many people and, unlike his previous films which were too local to travel beyond Singapore and Malaysia, I Not Stupid was released in Hongkong, Taiwan and China. At the Golden Bauhinia Awards 2003 in Hongkong, the film was voted one of the 10 Best Chinese Films.

Following I Not Stupid, Neo upped the artistic ante by reworking Majid Majidi's classic Iranian film, Children of Heaven, into Homerun. This 2003 film has turned out to be Neo's most critically acclaimed work, picking up a string of awards at international festivals. Homerun avoids the slapstick and comedy-skit pacing of Neo's previous works. An ample production budget gave the finished work a high standard of technical polish, such as the attention paid to details of the story's Singapore in a 1965 setting. The plot is about a brother and sister so poor, they had to share a pair of shoes, a storyline somewhat similar to Majidi's original. However Neo again used his characters as allegories of topical national issues; in this instance, two gangs of children satirizing Singapore-Malaysia relations. For some, that comic touch came across as a more populist device than apposite humour, and resulted in a film that mixes arthouse direction with commercial objectives, not always to the best effect.

The "arthouse versus commercial" debate dogs Neo's accomplishments. Early in his film career, Neo foresaw his position in this dilemma when he said, "He (Eric Khoo) is very art. I am very commercial". If watching Khoo's Mee Pok Man had set him thinking about film-making, he also confessed to being perplexed by Khoo's arthouse cinematic style, finding the pace too long and slow. In the six years since Homerun, Neo's output of at least one film a year comprised entirely of his signature crowd-pleasing comedies, most of which timed for release to catch the Chinese New Year festive crowd. Neo makes no apology for making commercial films. He said in a 2009 media interview: "I know what my audience wants and I will not sacrifice this to make movies for critics." Despite critics dismissing his films as formulaic crowd pleasers, with little merit as cinematic art, Neo has his supporters who reject this elitist perspective. They contend that popular appeal should not make a film less valid as art.

Like his comedy, Neo's films deliver satiric jibes at both both state and society in Singapore. However the nature and extent of the critique is never powerful or hostile enough to risk the wrath of political authorities; neither would that be Neo's intention. Nevertheless embedded in each of Neo's films is also a potentially delicate narrative that taps into a long-standing cultural divide in Singapore's Chinese population. Neo's characters are more comfortable speaking Mandarin or a Chinese dialect than English, a reality not uncommon among heartlanders. He helps them to give vent to their sense of being eclipsed in a Westernized society where English dominates its key institutions. This has led an academic researcher (see Kenneth Paul Tan below) to describe Neo as an "organic intellectual" who "articulates his criticism of society and government in the name of the Chinese-speaking community that appears to be systematically disadvantaged by the dominance of the English language, Westernization in general and the inflow of foreigners that a globalized economy necessitates".

Despite his penchant to poke fun at authority, the popular director does not build his image on being fringe or radical. Except for a whiff of scandal in early 2010 involving an extramarital affair, Neo's public image seems no different from that of the average citizen leading a regular life. Two Singapore prime ministers have commended his films at four National Day Rallies and Neo takes pride in that. In 2004, he received a Public Service Medal. The following year, he became the first film-maker to be awarded the Cultural Medallion, Singapore's highest recognition for artistic achievements. Neo's success story, in particular, the poor-boy-makes-good career trajectory, burnishes an image of Singapore as a place of opportunity for the talented and hardworking. Neo is proud that he has come so far, not through any formal training, but through the trial and error of practice. The growth of Neo's career is also marked by an indefatigable capacity to try his hand at anything and this has given him an impressive reputation of versatility.

He had published comics, composed songs, recorded video cassettes, written newspaper columns, done musicals and serious drama on stage and hosted radio programmes.

Neo is married and has a daughter and three sons. Alongside his film-making, he helms J. Team Productions, one of Singapore's pioneer production houses that he founded in 1995.

Neo Chwee Kok

(梁水国, Liang Shuiguo, 1931–87)
World-class swimmer, Singapore

Neo Chwee Kok was an inspirational swimmer who entered the world of competitive swimming in 1949. Barely two years later, he thrust himself into the spotlight when the Asian Games were introduced. His performance in New Delhi, in 1951 winning four gold medals, is often represented as the pinnacle of his achievements and certainly served as reference points for all who followed. However, later in 1953, when he was able to challenge future Australian Olympic gold medalists, he achieved a world ranking of third place, his highest ever. This was the true period of his peak performances. His story is a mixture of humble stardom, misfortune, and probably unfulfilled promise.

Neo Chwee Kok was born on 31 May 1931 in Singapore, but raised on Pulau Samboe, an Indonesian island seven miles from Singapore. He was the fifth child in a family of eight. He only began school in 1947 after the war. His family background provided few opportunities for success and yet in a Straits Times survey conducted in 1999, he was voted number 3 in the list of Singapore's fifty Greatest Athletes.

He came to prominence at the age of eighteen, a late age for a swimmer, but his impact was almost immediate. His representative swimming began with the Katong Boys Club and then the Chinese Swimming Club in 1949, under the tutelage of Koay Teck Choo and "Jubilee" Kee Soon Bee. At just 1.65m tall and weighing under 60 kg, he seemed unlikely to make an international impact, but he made up for these apparent limitations by demonstrating explosive power and determination. Neo's first big competition was in 1950 at the Chinese Swimming Club gala. He recorded reasonable times in the 100-metre and 400-metre freestyle events, coming in at 64 seconds and 5:33.0 minutes respectively. From then on his progress was meteoric. He took the Singapore Amateur Swimming Association titles in the 200-metre and 400-metre freestyle events, and later set Malayan records in all the freestyle events. Although developing his own style, he was, predictably, compared with other Asian champions. In 1950 he earned a nickname that remained throughout his career. The Japanese record breaker, Hironoshin Furuhashi, had been dubbed the "Flying Fish", so Neo was given the same title. He was also known as the "Boy Marvel".

By January 1951 he had arrived at the first stepping stone to international success when he qualified to represent Singapore. The first Asian Games, which were staged in New Delhi, provided him with a perfect arena to display his exceptional talent. He won four gold medals: three in the longer freestyle events, and one in the relay with Lionel Chee, Wiebe Wolters, and Barry Mitchell. Neo was later inducted into the Singapore Sports Council Hall of Fame on the basis of these medal-winning performances. The only question mark that existed over the results in New Delhi was that the Japanese did not enter a swimming team and so there was no opportunity for Neo to test himself against the likes of Furuhashi, the "Flying Fish" of Fujiyama.

There was controversy when the team returned to Singapore due to issues of amateur status. P.F. de Souza, a representative of the Singapore Olympic and Sports Council (SOSC) was to present a gold watch to Neo to commemorate his achievements. Hasty last minute remonstrations led to a postponement. Later explanation focused on the need to ensure the preservation of Neo's amateur status. It was not clear whether receiving a watch would represent "professional" gain and therefore rule him out of the "amateur" Olympics.

Neo focused on his own challenges. He gave swimming demonstrations and trained hard, using blocks of wood to provide resistance and to strengthen his arm pull. During the year prior to the Helsinki Olympics in 1952, he had reduced his timings by 8–12 per cent (in the 100-metre event from 64.0 to 58.8 seconds, and in the 400-metre, from 5:33.0 to 4:51.0 minutes). He was one of Singapore's best ever bets to win an Olympic medal. His 58.8 seconds timing was close to the 1948 Olympic Record of 58.7 seconds. There were still barriers to his success though. Ideally for him to acclimatize to the conditions in Helsinki would have required weeks, but only days were going to be available. He was used to swimming in salt water in Singapore, whereas the open-air pool at the Olympics would be fresh water. A simpler problem to solve concerned which of the events he should enter.

In Helsinki Neo learned much about international competition and realized that there was no substitute for good physical and mental preparation. The water and air temperatures provided a severe shock to his system. He also quickly learned of the competitive atmosphere that existed, when he experienced trouble with a Russian coach who claimed that his swimmer had exclusive rights to one of the lanes. Neo rightly felt that all lanes were open to all swimmers.

His ability and potential were quickly noticed by many of the western coaches. However his lack of experience and aspects of technique brought disappointment. On 26 July 1952, there were a record sixty-one swimmers in the competition. In Heat 2 of the 100-metre freestyle event, Neo could only manage third place with 1:00.6 seconds. His ultimate ranking was 27th. To his credit he made no excuses. In Heat 2 of the 400-metre freestyle event, he came in third again, with a time of 4:57.5 minutes, which was 24.2 seconds behind Japan's Hironoshin Furuhashi and the Russian Viktor Drobinsky. A time of 4:55.1 minutes (four seconds slower than his best in Singapore) would have qualified him for the semi-finals. Neo himself attributed his lack of success to three factors: his nervousness, the cruel weather, and his inability to dive and turn as well as his international rivals. Had he swum his best 100-metre time from Singapore he would have won the bronze medal. At the end of the year he was voted third in a Sportsman of the Year contest, behind Ong Poh Lim (badminton) and Chay Weng Yew (weightlifting).

The Olympic experience was a motivating one and Neo received support in his quest to improve. A strong association grew up with swimming in Australia. In August 1953, a future Olympic gold medallist, Jon Henricks, visited Singapore. In a challenge race at the Chinese Swimming Club, Neo returned a national record time of 57.4 seconds, behind Henricks' 56.9 seconds. It was his inability to master the tumble turn that proved to be the real difference between the two sprinters.

A new opportunity was revealed. In January 1954, having bettered his record to 57.2 seconds, Neo, accompanied by Kee Soon Bee, was invited to compete in Australia. The six-week tour provided him with the top-class opposition that was required to sustain his progress and prepare him for the Asian Games later in the year. In Melbourne Neo defeated John Devitt, who would be the Olympic silver medalist in Melbourne in 1956. After competing in eleven events across the country, he returned home and after achieving a new personal best of 56.9 in the 100-metre, thus equalling Clark Scholes' winning time at the Helsinki Olympics.

In what was to be the ultimate test for Neo, the 1954 Asian Games brought him back into competition with the Japanese swimmers. He claimed a bronze medal in the 100-metre freestyle event, with a time of 58.6 seconds, behind Suzuki (58.2) and Tanagawa (58.4) of Japan. Again the vital factor was the limitation imposed by his turn.

As there were no Empire Games in 1954 for Singapore because of financial constraints, the only target remaining for Neo was another tilt at the Olympic Games. But there was to be no renewed challenge. He did not participate in the Melbourne Games, which was a great relief to the Japanese swimmers, who considered him a threat to their dominance of the Asian pool. He had taken a job as a superintendent at the Yan Kit Pool, knowing that his amateur status would then dissolve. The practical exigencies of the time obliged him to seek employment. He turned to coaching and placed great emphasis on giving his students a solid foundation. After spending many years helping to groom new generations of swimming champions, he received a six-month scholarship to learn more about coaching at the Australian Institute of Sport in 1983. Neo continued to be an inspirational coach until he passed away on 23 January 1987.

In May 2011 he was posthumously awarded a medallion to commemorate his appearance at the Helsinki Olympic Games. As one of Singapore's 167 acknowledged Olympians since 1936, he had been assigned the number 11 in the chronology by the association known as Olympians Singapore.

Newn Ah Foott, George

(尹亚佛, Yin Yafo, 1894–1990)

Businessman, national leader, philanthropist, Brunei

George Newn Ah Foott was a successful businessman venturing widely in different areas, and was also a leader of the nation, being appointed to organise a civilian government after the Japanese occupation, and held several appointments in the Brunei Government. He was also very involved in supporting education, even recognized by the Catholic Church for his contributions, particularly to the Saint George's School.

Newn was born in 1894 in Waichow (惠州), Guangdong Province of China. Due to poor family circumstances in his hometown, at the mere age of 8, before arriving at Brunei, his mother sent him to Biliton Island, situated between Borneo Island and Sumatra of Indonesia, to visit his uncle who worked at the island's tin mines. Although he was young, he was a considerate and helpful boy. While at the tin mines, he worked hard and was keen to assist his uncle. At such an age, he understood that success was the product of hard work and perseverance. Newn later stepped foot at Sarawak and was educated in Kuching. He also got married in Sarawak shortly before leaving for Brunei.

In 1916, at the age of 22, Newn arrived at Brunei during the reign of Sultan Haji Omar Ali Saifuddien Saadul Khairi Waddien. He worked for the Island Trading Company Limited, which had a cutch-making factory. 'Cutch' is the grounded bark of mangrove trees, which after being soaked and boiled and then dried, becomes a form of dye that can be used as base colouring for cloth fabrics and fishing nets. Newn was talented in business and had a strong drive to succeed. He was not a person who was keen to work under a superior and was determined to be a leader. Therefore, while working for the company, Newn established a small business selling stationery and carbonated drink such as "尹 Orange". He was an intelligent man who finds every opportunity to expand his business. His eldest son, Francis Newn, said there were hardly any cars in Brunei at the that time, and so George Newn came up with a brilliant idea to establish a bicycle-hiring business, which was first of its kind in Brunei Darussalam. At that time, he had about half a dozen bicycles that were hired out for between 5 and 10 cents per hour, which was quite lucrative in those days.

In 1943, during the Japanese occupation, commodities such as sugar were scarce and the occupying forces ordered Newn and an English engineer W. Dougherty to process palm sugar from the abundant palm trees found throughout Brunei. The Palm sugar was rationed and made available to the public. When liberation arrived in 1945, he was asked to organise a civilian government. He was also asked to organize the production of "bakau" or mangrove firewoods to be exported to Hong Kong. Newn was a devoted businessman who further continued in the expansion of his business and had grown to deal vastly in board engines, cars and agricultural chemicals later in his career.

Apart from his business, Newn was a national leader as well. He was a Member of State Legislative Council, Brunei Darussalam, and was also a member of the Brunei Public Service Commission and that of the Municipal Board's Committee. Although Newn had neither university qualification nor high school qualification, he was able to write and speak English fluently, on par with those university graduates he worked with.

Although his educational level was limited, Newn ensured that all his children were well-educated in Kuching as during that time, Brunei Darussalam's education system was very limited. Newn had strong belief that education could cater for a better future of various communities in Bandar Seri Begawan, the capital of Brunei Darussalam. Seeing the shortage of schools and educational opportunities for the people in Brunei, Newn founded the Saint George's School, Bandar Seri Begawan. Before the land was donated by Newn, the Catholic school was first started by a resident priest named Fr Piet de Wit in a rented house owned by Mr Kay in Jalan Padang, which also housed a chapel and the living quarters of the priest. The first building for the school was constructed in 1941, at Kumbang Pasang, on the land donated by Newn. After the war in 1945, the Saint George's School at Bandar Seri Begawan was re-established and managed by Newn, with his daughters as teachers. After World War II, the school was named after him in his honor. During that era, the School was far different from what we see today. It was then a simple thatch building with attap roof; now, it is made of concrete and well-furnished with air-conditioned classrooms. Furthermore, Saint George's School has now expanded to provide high school education up to the GCE "O" levels. The School can be considered as one of Brunei's prestigious schools now where most parents would want their children to attend. For his services rendered to the Catholic Church, and more particularly to the Saint George's School, in 1972, Newn was conferred the Papal Decoration "Per Ecclesiet Pontifice 22".

Newn finally retired in 1979 at the age of 85, leaving his business to his children. He passed away at the ripe old age of 96, in 1990. His 132 children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren and their families are scattered all over the world, including Singapore, America, England and Australia.

Ng Eng Teng

(黄荣庭, Huang Rongting, 1934–2001)
Sculpture artist, Singapore

Ng Eng Teng is an internationally renowned sculptor who remains highly regarded for his landmark contributions to Singapore's sculpture art scene. His large-scale figurative sculptures with introspective and whimsical interpretations of humanist themes can be seen in many public locations in Singapore, adding vibrancy and texture to Singapore's streetscape. If one were to drop by Orchard Road, Bras Basah Road, Changi Airport, among other areas, one would see some of his best known works, such as the Mother and Child bronze sculpture, and The Explorer.

Born in 1934, Ng enjoyed making figures using plasticine during his primary school years. After completing his Senior Cambridge in 1955, he had his first foray into formal art education in the form of painting and sculpture classes at the British Council. A year later, he joined the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts, but discontinued his studies a few months later due to illness. He then spent some time in Kuala Trengganu, Malaysia, recuperating under the care of his uncle, Dr Ng Yew Seng. In 1958, Ng worked as a trainee artist for Shaw Brothers and then Fortune Advertising. In 1958, he had the opportunity to study under Liu Kang, who was already well known in local art circles at the time.

In 1959, Ng re-enrolled at the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts to hone his skills and attended classes taught by Chen Chong Swee, Georgette Chen, Chen Wen Hsi, and Cheong Soo Pieng. Going beyond the boundaries of the art curriculum, he experimented with art in various media. His interest in sculpture went a step further after he met British sculptress Jean Bullock, who exposed him to sculpture art and the use of ciment fondu. At that point in time, ciment fondu was a relatively new sculpting medium.

Ng's budding talent and potential as a artist was not lost on Georgette Chen. During frequent visits to her place, the pair chatted about art aesthetics and Ng's eye was often drawn to the ceramic pieces on display there. Noting his keen interest and talent in working with clay, Chen encouraged Ng to further his studies in sculpture arts and work with renowned sculptors to realize his potential. She mentioned two places he should touch base with — the Potteries in Stoke-on-Trent in England, and St Ives, where the studio of ceramic artist Bernard Leach was located.

In 1961, Ng won the Gold Medal in the Tagore Centenary Open Painting Competition. After completing his studies at the academy in 1962, he took up Chen's advice and went to study at The Potteries in Stoke-on-Trent in England. He undertook research on pottery design at the North Staffordshire College of Technology/Stoke-on-Trent College of Art between 1962 and 1963. In 1964, he studied at the Farnham School of Art in Surrey, deepening his knowledge of ceramics and sculpture. On graduating from Farnham, he worked with the Carrigaline Pottery in County Cork, designing tiles, hollowware, and tableware.

The commercial industry began to take notice of Ng's talent when his commercial designs were exhibited at the Arts and Crafts Centre of Britain and at selected spring fairs. His designer products garnered a positive response in the local market and he received good publicity in the Irish press. In 1966, he received a diploma from the Society of Industrial Artists and Designers (MSIAD, now known as the Chartered Society of Designers).

In the late 1960s, Ng returned to Singapore to pursue his passion for artistic sculpting. With his father's support, he set up a workshop and began his ceramic practice, teaching pottery making. He designed a series of works for sale using slip casting and press moulding, but this venture met with little success. He then decided to look for a job and with the help of fellow artist Vincent Hoisington, he joined the International Planned Parenthood Federation in 1968, where he worked as a visual aids officer for a year.

However, sculpting was never far from Ng's mind and he spent whatever time he could on sculpting individual pieces. On 4 September 1970, he staged his first solo exhibition at the lecture hall of the National Library. The five-day exhibition was officially opened by minister of state for labour, Sia Kah Hui, and jointly sponsored by the Singapore Art Society, Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts, and the Society of Chinese Artists. Ng's works were met with critical acclaim during the exhibition and, from then on, sculpting became his full-time passion and career.

As the years progressed, he became known throughout Asia and Australia for his sculpting talent. Ng has exhibited his pieces at numerous art events in Singapore, Japan, Australia, Taiwan, and Korea. His commissioned works can be found at the Garden Hotel, Pulau Ayer Chawan, Plaza Singapura, Orchard Road, Fort Canning Park, Changi International Airport, and the Singapore Art Museum. One of Ng's most notable international achievements was a three-metre sculpture piece for the 1988 Seoul Olympics. A replica of an earlier piece entitled, "Portrait", Ng completed it in under a month to meet the tight time frame imposed by his client, the Paris Arts Centre.

In 1981, his contributions to the local art community and remarkable achievements were recognized by the Singapore Government, which awarded him the Cultural Medallion. He went on to receive numerous other awards, including the ASEAN Cultural Award for Visual Arts (Sculpture) in 1990, the Pingat Apad Award in 1991, an honorary doctorate from the National University of Singapore in 1988, and the Public Service Star at the National Day Awards in 1999.

On 16 February 2001, Ng was honoured with the Montblanc de la Culture Arts Patronage Award at a dinner ceremony held at the Singapore Art Museum. He was presented with a commemorative Montblanc pen and a cheque for €15,000 (S$23,800) to be given to an arts project of his choice. This award was given to Ng in acknowledgement of his generous donation of a total of 1,000 of his paintings, drawings, sculptures, machettes, and ceramics to the National University of Singapore in 1997 and 1998. Ng had decided to part with these items so they might be put to good use in an education institution for the education of aspiring artists.

Ng's health took a turn for the worse in 1995 when he was diagnosed with kidney problems. However, few knew of his condition until 1998, after he had a heart bypass operation. His health deteriorated over the next two years and he passed away from pneumonia on 4 November 2001 at Studio 106, a kampung house at 106 Joo Chiat Place, located directly opposite his residence at unit 127.

Ng Keng Siang

(黄庆祥, Huang Qingxiang, 1908–67)
Architect, Singapore

Ng Keng Siang was the most prominent of Singapore's first generation of locally born, university educated architects. He ran an extremely successful practice, and had a career spanning pre- and post-war periods. Ng secured major residential, commercial, and civic commissions from the local business community, which saw in him an alternative to expatriate architects. By competently executing these high-profile projects, he deepened the credibility of local architects vis-à-vis Europeans, in the eyes of the public, clients, authorities, and a younger generation of architects. His most famous works were Asia Insurance Building, then Southeast Asia's tallest structure, and the Nanyang University, the first overseas Chinese university. In recognition of his stature, Ng was elected founding president of the Society of Malayan Architects. In 1958, he launched a new career as hotelier of the Biltmore Hotel, before passing away less than a decade later from liver cancer.

Born in 1908 in Singapore, Ng was the second son of Ng Siak Khuan, the Teochew proprietor of Poh Kong Chye jewellers. After attending the elite Anglo-Chinese School, where he nurtured a penchant for drawing, he chose to work as an architectural apprentice with S. Y. Wong & Co., rather than joining the family business. With the support of his father, and savings from his own work at Chinatown night markets, he studied at the Bartlett School of Architecture in London, which provided an education steeped in the classical tradition. Ng excelled at Bartlett, where he won the Alfred Bossom and Arthur Davis medals in 1935. After graduating, he also pursued post-graduate studies at Columbia University in New York. On his return to Singapore in 1938, he joined the premier architectural firm, Swan & Maclaren, alongside other newly returned Singaporeans such as Robert Kan and Koh Cheng Yam. Ng registered with the Board of Architects in Singapore in 1939 and went on to become the first Singapore member of the Royal Institute of British Architects. Soon after registering, Ng launched his own firm. In just a few years he had the biggest one-man local firm in town.

Ng was ambitious and had a strong entrepreneurial streak. Rather than remaining within the confines of an established European practice, he leveraged his academic and professional credentials to strike out boldly on his own, cultivate his own clientele, and actively pursue projects. His commercial success derived in part from his sociable personality. Architectural historian Seow Eu Jin, a personal acquaintance, described him as "tolerant in most matters (with) an amiable toothy smile", More strategically, he "entertained lavishly, maintained wide social and professional contacts… by the early 1950s he could count amongst his clients the high and mighty of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce" (Chow).

Ng's designs were eclectic. His pre-war projects were mainly individual houses for affluent members of the Chinese community, as well as shophouses and speculative housing for property developers. Many of these bore vernacular English elements, and could be described as fairly traditional. In this period, he steadily built up his credibility with the business community and was rewarded with higher profile jobs after World War II. His Ngee Ann Building in Orchard Road was among the first-high rise private apartment blocks in Malaya. The project was noteworthy for promoting the idea that flats could be desirable homes for the middle and even upper-middle classes. Indeed, some of Singapore's most prominent architects, such as Lim Chong Keat and William Lim, lived and worked there. In contrast to the stylistically modernist Ngee Ann Building, other projects, such as Framroz Aerated Water Factory or the Anglo-Chinese School clock tower, contained aesthetic flourishes that harked back to the pre-war art deco trend. Even more at variance were Ng's civic projects for the Chinese community, including the Teochew Association, and the Nanyang University, which were essentially modern buildings, capped with Chinese roofs and related ornaments. These projects pointed to Ng's pragmatic and non-dogmatic approach to design.

Ng's stylistic diversity led some to consider that, notwithstanding his successful career, "he never attained the ranks of the 'mainstream modernists'. He was an architect in transition, caught somewhere between the modified Classicism of the earlier part of the 20th century and the Modern Movement" (Edwards and Keys). In the post-war period, when younger architects were pushing for more modern and progressive design, Ng's reticence towards modern architecture seemed conservative. Nonetheless Ng's firm was a prolific practice that was responsible for the design of many important public buildings. When he passed away, The Straits Times hailed him for producing some of the most imposing landmarks of Singapore.

Ng spent much of his time meeting and negotiating with clients, lawyers, and building authorities, thus leaving much of the firm's design work to his draughtsmen. This may help to explain his firm's diversity in architectural expression. It also signals another important aspect of his career — as a local architect who often contested the colonial building authorities over regulatory matters. Indeed, Ng was most proud of the Asia Insurance Building, in large part because of the regulatory battles he fought and won against the colonial authorities. This included securing permission for the building to rise above the Cathay Building, which was hitherto the island's highest structure. Alfred Wong, a leading architect from a younger generation, later eulogized Ng as the "first Singapore architect to prove his mettle… one of the few bold architects who dared to stand up against authority".

Towards the end of his professional career, Ng began to assume a more prominent role in wider professional matters. In 1958, a group of local architects set up the Society of Malayan Architects (SMA), following their unsuccessful bid to take over the European-dominated Institute of Architects of Malaya. As the doyen of the local architectural fraternity, Ng was elected the first president of this body, a precursor of today's Singapore Institute of Architects. During his term of office, Ng called on the Singapore Government to establish a university-level architecture school. SMA also called for the formal recognition of the Board of Architects. SMA was subsequently recognized as the sole body representing the profession in Singapore, and Ng was nominated a member of the board. Around the time of his retirement from practice, Ng was appointed a juror for the high-profile Singapore Conference Hall design competition, which is considered one of the most important modern architectural projects in Singapore.

In his personal life, Ng was a man of his times and class. He raised two sons and a daughter with his wife Sheila at the house he designed in Pasir Panjang. Beyond his urbane lifestyle, Ng enjoyed rural pleasures, such as visits to the seaside with his family. He was also a gun club member and used to hunt flying foxes in Malaysia. In cultural matters, he had a foot in both the east and the west. On the one hand, he was an avowed Anglophile, famous for always being immaculately turned out in his bow tie, blazer, and fedora hat. But he could also be very traditional, for example, in matters of filial piety. He made sure to honour his stepmother appropriately, and, likewise, expected suitable deference from his children.

Ng's prolific career endowed his country with some of its best known landmarks. The Nanyang University Administrative Building is now a national monument of Singapore, while the Asia Insurance Building was the first local skyscraper to be gazetted for conservation. Other works of national importance include the Singapore Badminton Hall and the Lim Bo Seng Memorial. Beyond these icons, Ng's key contribution to Singapore's architecture was to demonstrate to the public, government, peers, and a younger generation, that emerging local-born architects could be as qualified and capable as established expatriates. In this, he laid the foundation for the next stage in Singapore's architectural history.

Ng Teng Fong

(黄廷芳, Huang Tingfang, 1928–2010)
Real estate tycoon, Singapore

Ng Teng Fong was a China-born real estate tycoon, founder of Far East Organization, and Singapore's richest man at the time of his death.

Ng Teng Fong was born in Putian (莆田), in China's Fujian Province in 1928. He was the eldest of 11 children. In 1934, the Ng family moved to Singapore and his father set up a soya sauce factory and grocery store in Weld Road.

With little formal education, Ng worked at his parents' factory and as a bicycle repairman for a while. As the eldest son, he was expected to carry on the family business, but Ng had other ideas. In the 1950s, he ventured into business for himself, opening a provision store. Unfortunately, his business was a failure. Undeterred, Ng decided to enter the property market. In 1960 he established Far East Organization, the company that would be his flagship in years to come. Even though it was a fledgling outfit, Ng selected a grandiose-sounding name as he was inspired by two other highly successful business empires of that time, Shaw Organisation and Cathay Organisation.

In 1962, Ng managed to scrape together enough money — reputedly with the help of billionaire Eliya Thamby — to develop a medium-sized housing estate in Jalan Pacheli (between Li Hwan and Tai Hwan Gardens). Each of the 72 single-storey terrace houses sold for $20,000. Two years later, Ng ventured into a smaller housing project — 35 terrace and semi-detached houses at Jalan Tua Kong in the Siglap area, and in 1969, he developed Watten Estate at Bukit Timah. By this time he had made a small fortune and he also built himself a large house in Watten Estate which he named 'Ng's Mansion'.

By the 1980s, as chairman of Far East Organization, Ng had become the largest private landowner and developer in Singapore. Through Lucky Realty, the nucleus of Far East Organization, he owned and developed one-fifth of all private property development in Singapore. His presence was so strong in Orchard Road that he was nicknamed 'The King of Orchard Road'. His first Orchard Road venture was Forum Singapura Hotel, which was built in 1963 for $5.5 million. Ng went on to develop Hilton Hotel, Lucky Plaza (1978), Far East Plaza (1983), Far East Shopping Centre (1974), Orchard Shopping Centre, Claymore Plaza (1984) and Orchard Plaza.

Ng's other nickname was 'Lucky', earned on account of the role luck played in his early days as a developer. One of his companies was Lucky Realty, and he named the streets at the Bedok estate he developed Lucky Heights and Lucky View, not to mention Lucky Plaza in Orchard Road. His stable of horses was also named Lucky Stables.

A quiet, reclusive man, Ng made headline news in 1980 when he priced the apartments in Lucky Plaza at more than $500 per square foot, literally doubling the prices of apartments overnight. The following year, he was in the news again when the shop units in his Far East Plaza were sold within two hours of release, setting a new market record for Singapore property. Ng was not only an aggressive builder but an innovative one as well. His complexes featured at number of firsts. For example, his Far East Shopping Centre was the first mall to feature an atrium and external escalators while Lucky Plaza was the first with external bubble-lifts.

Ng made his first foray into the Hong Kong property market in 1970, establishing a number of companies that would become part of his Sino Group. In the mid-1970s, he bought a piece of reclaimed land in Tsim Sha Tsui East, anticipating that this wasteland would soon become a thriving retail and commercial district. Ng's instincts proved right and in the early 1980s, when the Hong Kong property market crashed, he moved more aggressively to acquire more land. In many ways, Ng's successes in Singapore helped fund his Hong Kong ventures. By 1994, it was estimated that Ng and his family owned about HK$60 billion worth of property in Hong Kong, twice the value of the properties in Ng's listed Sino Land. Among Ng's well-known developments in Hong Kong are the Conrad Hong Kong and Royal Pacific hotels, Central Plaza in Wanchai and The Centrium in Central.

Ng's rise in the business world has not always been smooth sailing. In the early 1970s, he and his brother Ng Boon Siang were charged with misrepresentation over share dealings in connection with Forum Singapura Hotel, of which they were directors. Ng was made to pay two fines and contribute an undisclosed sum to charity. He was also forced to buy out minority shareholders at more than twice the market value of their shares. During this time, a local bank withdrew credit facilities to Ng and he nearly went bankrupt. However, he was able to arrange new lines of credit with the Moscow Narodny Bank and continue building his company.

In the 1990s, Ng gradually relinquished control over day-to-day operations of his companies to his two eldest sons: Robert Ng Chee Siong and Philip Ng Chee Tat. Robert was placed in charge of the Sino Group in Hong Kong and Philip in charge of the Far East Organization in Singapore. Even so, he continued to keep a close eye on business and flew into Hong Kong weekly to confer with his son Robert. In 1995, Ng was once again in the news with his takeover battle with Malaysian tycoon Quek Leng Chan for control over Yeo Hiap Seng, a well-known beverage manufacturer and bottler which also possessed a large land bank. Ng won.

A frugal man who worked 18-hour days, Ng was nevertheless prepared to splurge on his two hobbies — horses and luxury cars. In January 1993, he donated $1 million to help establish the Yeoh Ghim Seng Professorship in Surgery at the National University of Singapore. In May 2011, Ng's family donated S$125 million towards the building of what was to be the Jurong General Hospital. The Government decided to rename the hospital the Ng Teng Fong Hospital in his memory. This caused a huge public furore as the donation constituted only a tenth of the hospital's construction cost.

Although a prominent figure in business circles, Ng guarded his privacy jealously. He shunned personal interviews and was very seldom photographed. He died on 2 February 2010 after suffering a cerebral haemorrhage following a fall at home. His funeral was attended by the most important business leaders and politicians on the island, and as a mark of his accomplishments, his cortege passed by Far East Plaza and Lucky Plaza. At the time of his death, Forbes magazine estimated that he was worth S$11.3 billion, making him the wealthiest person in Singapore. He was survived by his wife Tan Kim Choo and seven children. An eighth child — their eldest — had been given away at birth as the Ngs were then too poor to support themselves.

Ngan Ching Wen

(颜清文, Yan Qingwen, 1932–2011)

Community leader, social activist, entrepreneur, philanthropist, Malaysia

Ngan was significant in the Chinese Malaysian movement for democracy and human rights in the 1990s, and was a strong advocate of vernacular education, an entrepreneurial industrialist, and a philanthropist. His childhood encounters in the Anti Japanese War with Japanese atrocities, teenage resistance of injustice in vernacular education, and experience of being discriminated against in his early twenties had moulded his character which upheld justice; he later became a philanthropist.

Ngan Ching Wen's town of dialect origin is Gutian in northern Fujian, China. He was one of the central figures in the human rights movement supported by the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall in the late 1990s. He was also one of the Chung Ling student activists in 1955, protesting against the school being converted to a "conforming school". He pursued his university education at the Nanyang University in Singapore and after graduation, studied law at the National University of Singapore.

He was chairman of the 5th World Foochow Organization in 1998, chairman of the Gutian Association in Sitiawan from 1973, chairman of the Sitiawan Nan Hwa Secondary School's board of governors from 1973, chairman of the Chinese Resource Centre for four years, president of the KL and Selangor Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry for four years (after serving as deputy president for four years), deputy president of the Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, Malaysia for four years (before that, he was secretary general for ten years), president of the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall from 1991 to 1994, president of Malaysia-China Chamber of Commerce for eight years, committee member of the Malaysia National Economic Consultative Committee for four years, and adviser to China's economic development committee.

Ngan Ching Wen was born in 1932 in Air Tawar, Perak, the second child of Ngan Piew Kong (颜标坤) and Yu Sok Moi (余雪梅). In 1910, Ngan Piew Kong took his passage via sea to Malaya and later lived with his family in a rubber plantation in Air Tawar, which was then a newly opened settlement. There was no water and electricity supply and the only access to town was a mud path. The means of transport then was the bicycle and bullock cart. Ngan's father worked for the British who owned the rubber plantation. His duties included land clearing, rubber planting, and weeding using the axe and hoe. Ngan's mother was a full-time housewife. Ngan had two brothers and three sisters.

Ngan's primary school education at Min Te Primary School (民德小学) in Air Tawar was interrupted by the Japanese invasion of Malaya during the Second World War. When school resumed in 1946, he repeated standard four at the age of fourteen. After completing standard six, he joined Nan Hwa Secondary School (南华中学) at Sitiawan and studied for two years before entering Chung Ling Secondary School (钟灵中学) in Penang, the school which many young ethnic Chinese throughout Southeast Asia aspired to enter at that time.

During the Japanese Occupation, the Ngan family lived by the jungle, planting rice and vegetables, as well as rearing poultry for self-subsistence. Some of his father's friends were members of the Malayan People's Anti-Japanese Army (MPAJA) who used the jungle as their hideout. As such the Ngan family's house became the meeting and resting place of the MPAJA. Little Ngan was then a great admirer of the MPAJA members who dared fight the armed Japanese troops. The boy inevitably had to help his father in cultivating rice and vegetables which later led him into the oil palm industry in 1968. Ngan's childhood experience during the Japanese Occupation led him to develop courage in resisting injustice.

After the Japanese were defeated in 1945, the British returned to Malaya. Not long after that, the MPAJA, which was in close alliance with the British during the Japanese Occupation, fell out with the latter. A state of emergency was declared in 1948. Ngan's father was detained in 1949 due to his support of the MPAJA. He was released a year later. Ngan's teenage experience also contributed to his strong character in resisting injustice.

While at Chung Ling Secondary School, Ngan, much older than his classmates, was a hostel resident. In 1955, during Ngan's third school term in senior three, was involved in the student boycott of classes in protest against the education policy. The boycott was led by hostel residents who were able to meet and plan frequently. The education policy was aimed at converting the Chinese secondary schools' medium of instruction from Chinese to English. Ethnic Chinese educationists as well as the local ethnic Chinese community also protested against the policy. The Chung Ling protest eventually spread to Chinese secondary schools throughout Malaya. Ngan's experience in Chung Ling was a microcosm of the history of Malaya and Chinese education in Malaya under British colonial rule. As the people of Malaya were fighting for freedom from British colonial rule, the Malayan Communist Party was one of the major forces fighting against the British. Chinese schools then were perceived by many as a hotbed of communism for the youths.

For his part in the Chung Ling student boycott of classes, Ngan was detained for more than ten days and then expelled from school and banished from Penang. He was unable to finish his final term in Senior Three and was not awarded the graduation certificate. The Chung Ling experience inculcated in Ngan a spirit of democracy, a deep love for the mother-tongue education, the will to uphold justice and the daring to oppose suppression.

While studying at Chung Ling in Senior Three, Ngan had sat for the High School Examination in the middle of the year 1955. He was awarded the High School Examination Certificate and taught at Min Te primary school for less than a year. In 1957, he enrolled in an English-medium school and sat for the Cambridge Examination. In 1958 he studied at the Nanyang University in Singapore majoring in economics and graduated in 1960. An international company then employed him as an accountant at a salary of $150 a month. The going rate for University of Malaya graduates were $500 for the same job. Both Ngan and his father were greatly annoyed at the discrimination. In 1962, he left the job to study law at the University of Malaya (later renamed the University of Singapore and then the National University of Singapore). He graduated in 1966 and was called to the Bar in December the same year. Together with a Nanyang University friend, he set up legal firms at Ipoh and Sitiawan in 1967.

In 1968, Ngan ventured into the oil palm plantation business. He started by forming a joint partnership with about thirty friends and bought a piece of one-thousand-acre land for oil palm planting in Teluk Intan. At the initial stage, Ngan worked at the plantation during weekends. In 1973, he terminated his legal practice to go full force into the corporate sector and property construction. Since 1992, he has been investing in China, initially in the manufacture of cellophane tapes, property development, and infrastructure construction in cities such as Shanghai, Shenyang, Chengdu, Guiyang, and Kunming. He later invested in land development in the western region of China.

While serving in the Chinese Resource Centre (Malaysia) as governor, he proposed the setting up of an endowment fund of RM100,000 for the operation of the centre. The establishment of the centre was reflective of ethnic Chinese Malaysian entrepreneurs' concern for academic and scholarship development in the ethnic Chinese community in a nation where the government inclined towards promoting Malay scholarship. While he was president of the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall (SCAH), he encouraged young professionals to work together in promoting human rights and resistance to injustice in society. It was during this period that SCAH worked jointly with other NGOs regardless of ethnicity.

Ngan's support for Chinese education can be seen from his strong financial support for Nan Hwa Secondary School in Sitiawan, his concern with its ability to attract students and the advancement of its students in pursuing higher education overseas and succeeding in the job market. He was also one of the motivators who initiated the Revival Movement of Chinese independent secondary schools in 1972.

While serving at the Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry at the state and the national levels, he supported the government's efforts in promoting joint ventures between Malay and Chinese entrepreneurs.

Being an entrepreneur, developer, and industrialist, Ngan was adept at capturing the China market after the Malayan Communist Party and the Malaysian Government signed a peace pact on 2 December 1989, ending all travel restrictions to China. The Government of China appointed him adviser to China's Economic Development Committee in acknowledgement of his capabilities.

Ngan was a philanthropist who contributed generously to charity. In recognition of his contribution and service to society and nation in his many capacities, the King of Malaysia conferred on him the titles of "JSM" and "Tan Sri".

Ngan worked closely with his associate, Tan Sri Lim Guan Teik, in social activities and investments. One of Ngan's significant investments in China was the RMB50-million road connecting Gutian, his town of dialect origin, to Shuikou (水口) in 1995–96 which the locals have dubbed the "lifeline". His biggest donation projects include the building of the RMB960,000 tar road connecting Jixiang (吉巷) with Kunshan (昆山), the construction of the Biaokunlou (标昆楼) building at the Kunshan (昆山) Primary School, the Xuemeilou (雪梅楼) building at the Wushan (梧山) Primary School (both in remembrance of his parents) and the cement road connecting Kunshan to Kunbian (昆边). The total sum he donated amounted to more than RMB2 million.

Besides being an industrialist and philanthropist, Ngan was reputedly a social activist. In 1998, he led NGOs in submitting a memorandum to the Indonesian Embassy in protest of discrimination against ethnic Chinese women, condemning it as an act of serious violation of human rights. In 1999, the year of Malaysian general elections, he led and strongly supported the movement called Suqiu (诉求) appealing to the then caretaker government under the leadership of Dr Mahathir to eliminate injustice in the country. As an entrepreneur he knew that getting involved in such activities would expose himself to political persecution, but he was nonetheless ready to face the consequences. In 2000, Ngan openly seconded the protest against the closing of Damansara Primary School (白沙罗华小) and in 2002, he strongly supported the movement against monopolizing of the Chinese media in Malaysia.

Ngan's other significant contributions included initiating the Revival Movement of Chinese independent secondary schools, and redeveloping the Sitiawan Nan Hwa Secondary School. It was Ngan who signed the letter inviting the Perak Chinese School Committees' Association to discuss and take steps to revive the shrinking student enrolment in Chinese independent secondary schools throughout Malaysia in the 1970s. Later the Revival Movement was formed and led by Foo Wan Thot (胡万铎), an entrepreneur in Ipoh. When Ngan became chairman of the Nan Hwa Secondary School's board of governors, there were only three students enrolled. Under his leadership, the school was rebuilt and reformed with a view to gaining the ethnic Chinese community's confidence in sending their children to study in an independent school. Today Nan Hwa Secondary School is one of the most outstanding independent schools in Malaysia.

Ngan died of pneumonia on 1 March 2011.

Ngeow Sze Chan

(饶师泉, Rao Shiquan, 1915–2002)
Chinese physician, philanthropist, Malaysia

Ngeow Sze Chan was born in Chayang, Guangdong, China, the second child of the Ngeow family in Yangtao Village. His given name was Chucan (初灿). His father ran a small business together with other brothers, and his mother was a housewife.

Ngeow Sze Chuan started his early childhood education in a private institution taught by retired scholars. During his primary school education in Chayang, he proved himself to be a hardworking student and was always ranked first in the class. Ngeow's father's family business was successful throughout his studies in primary and junior secondary education. However, as things went downhill when Ngeow Sze Chan turned 16, the family business went bankrupt. He made a decision to work as an apprentice in Shantou to support his family. Being a young apprentice, he was exposed to the practice of traditional Chinese medicine. This experience enabled him to develop a special interest in traditional Chinese medicine. A major decision was made. He attended the Chinese Medicine Specialist School in Guangzhou with the support of his family in 1933.

In 1937, Ngeow graduated from the Research Institute of New China Medical School at the age of 22. The following year, Ngeow left Chayang, to look for better opportunity in Malaya with the hope to practise Chinese medicine. As he migrated to Kuala Lumpur, the capital city of Malaya (later Malaysia), he worked hard towards becoming the most prominent Chinese physician of this era, i.e. from mid to the late twentieth century.

In 1945, he established the Selangor Chinese Medical Society with a few other physicians. Soon after that, he spearheaded a number of activities leading to the establishment of The Central Malaysian Chinese Medical Association, now known as the Malaysian Chinese Medical Association (est. 1948). From 1948 to 1970, Ngeow was contributor and chief editor of the "Medicine Weekly" column for the China Press, a local newspaper. It allowed him to share his medical experience and research findings with the public. Ngeow had contributed to the weekly column for consecutive 1,124 weeks in 12 years. His perseverance in contributing articles despite his busy schedule of consultations and treatment of patients, was evidence of his self-discipline and hard work.

In 1949, the Malaysian Chinese Medical Association raised the standard consultation fee from a mere 40 cent to $2 for each patient. This was a measure to enable physicians to be financially sustainable in order to provide free consultations and medicine for patients of underprivileged groups.

In November 1951, 36-year-old Ngeow established Wan Onn Loong Medical Hall Co. in Jalan Tun Tan Siew Sin right in the middle of Kuala Lumpur. This was the base for his wholesale and retail medicine business, as well as his traditional Chinese medicine clinic, providing consultation and treating an average of 100 patients a day.

Ngeow initiated the Chinese Medical Free Clinic in Kuala Lumpur in 1954 to provide free consultation and medicine to the poor and needy. During the first few years, there were a total of twenty Chinese physicians who volunteered to provide free consultation services on a daily basis. This community service was generally welcomed by people of all ethnic background. Many people, particularly those from the lower socio-economic group, were touched by this charity work and joined in to raise funds for the project. The Chinese physician's good deeds and services for the local community are still close to the hearts of those who benefited from their charitable acts. Ngeow was president of the Chinese Medical Free Clinic for more than forty years.

The Traditional Chinese Medical Institute of Malaysia (est. 1955) was another project initiated by Ngeow to safeguard the reputation, rights, and professionalism of Chinese physicians. Being a trusted brand name for traditional Chinese medicine, Ngeow had treated patients from all walks of life. His more prestigious patients ranged from top government officials to foreign ambassadors. Even the second prime minister of Malaysia, Tun Abdul Razak, consulted his opinion as a Chinese physician.

Besides contributing to the well-being of Malaysians, Ngeow was also highly respected for his philanthropic donations to improve the infrastructure of his hometown. As a nostalgic migrant, Ngeow was particularly concerned about the development of Yang Tao, in his native hometown of Yang Tao in the Guangdong Province, which he visited several times. He initiated and accomplished a project to build Yang Tao Primary School and the Golden Anniversary Bridge.

Since 1979, he served for many years as voluntary Director of the Chinese Medicine in Tung Shin Hospital. He was granted the position of Honorary Professor by Guangzhou Medical School in the early 1990s. In 1996, Ngeow was awarded the AMN title by the Yang Di-Pertuan Agong of Malaysia for his contribution to the country and the community. Due to his impact on the practice of Traditional Chinese Medicine (TCM) in Malaysia, he was widely known in the region as the founder of modern traditional medicine.

His demise in 2002 was greatly missed by Chinese physicians of all generations and those who greatly benefited from his philanthropic acts in Malaya (later Malaysia) as well as in Yangtao village in China.

Ngiam Tong Dow

(严崇涛, Yan Chongtao, 1937–)
Civil servant, Singapore

Although he retired from civil service in 1999, Ngiam Tong Dow has, in his long and distinguished career, served Singapore in a number of capacities — as permanent secretary to various government ministries, and as chairman of various companies. He has also served variously as chairman of the Singapore Telephone Board, the Economic Development Board (EDB), the Telecommunication Authority of Singapore, and the Housing Development Board (HDB) Corporation. He is best remembered for his contributions to the administrative service and his articulation of alternative, sometimes critical, views of the civil service.

Ngiam was born in 1937 in Singapore. On completing his formal education at St Andrew's School, the University of Malaya in Singapore (where he obtained a first-class honours in economics), and Harvard University (where he obtained a master's in Public Administration), he joined the administrative service in 1959. Once in the administrative service, he quickly rose to become permanent secretary of the Ministry of Communication. From then on, his career progressed steadily as he rose through the ranks and served as permanent secretary of the Ministry of Finance (1972–79 and 1987–99); permanent secretary of the Ministry of Trade and Industry (1987–89), and in the Prime Minister's Office. Additionally, he was also chairman of the Singapore Telephone Board, Telecommunication Authority of Singapore, Sentosa Development Corporation, Singapore Technologies Holdings, Development Bank of Singapore, and the Housing Development Board.

While in his current position as chairman of HDB Corporation Private Ltd, a wholly owned subsidiary of the HDB, Ngiam has come out and voiced views critical of the civil service. Indeed, given his many years' experience in the civil service, he has likely witnessed the bureaucratization of the administrative service. He has openly criticized the PAP's method of retaining power by placing government scholars in the civil service as a short-term view that will lead the party to atrophy. Ngiam goes as far as to say that the only long-term method of ensuring the PAP's survival is to allow serious political challenges to emerge from the alternative elite in society. According to him, the prevailing view that Singapore is the PAP ought to be altered to one where the people and the PAP realize that Singapore is larger than the PAP. He warns that the party may have started to buy into its own propaganda, so much so that the Singapore elite in the civil service value intellectualization for its own sake, thereby losing a sense of the pragmatic concerns of the larger world. He predicts that if the Singapore civil service carries on in this manner, it will not be a very effective service. To pre-empt this, he suggests that half the number of President and Overseas Merit scholars should go to the private sector, and the rest be committed to the civil service. All these scholars would in turn be able to serve their bond to Singapore — the country of their birth and the country that gave them these opportunities, and not the government.

Ngiam demonstrated his awareness of the current situation for government scholars when he spoke of the bond breaking issue. While he is aware that those on government scholarships would have to pay a financial penalty and be condemned as quitters to break their bonds, he defends these so-called recalcitrant scholars by saying that it takes a certain temperament and mindset to be a civil servant. Since not everyone has the right temperament to be a bureaucrat, those who are not suited for that life should not go into it. To highlight the different mindsets needed, Ngiam cited the differences from his own line work as a permanent secretary and as chairman of HDB Corp:

> However upright a person is, the mandarin will in time begin to live a gilded life in a gilded cage. As a Permanent Secretary, I never had to worry whether I could pay my staff their wages. It was all provided for in the Budget. As chairman of DBS Bank, I worried about wages only 20 per cent of the time. I now face my greatest business challenge as chairman of HDB Corp, a new start-up spun off from HDB. I spend 90 per cent of my time worrying whether I have enough to pay my staff at the end of the month. It's a mental switch.

Since no official statement has been issued vis-a-vis his vocal criticism of the civil service and the mode in which it is run by the PAP, it may be assumed that his words carry some weight. Indeed, his contributions to Singapore were acknowledged when he was admitted to the Distinguished Service Order in 1999, and awarded the Meritorious Service Medal.

Nevertheless, Ngiam continues to be active after his retirement. He serves as an adjunct professor at the Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, as well as adjunct professor at the Nanyang Technological University, teaching development economics. He continues to make speeches and write articles. In 2006, he authored a book entitled, A Mandarin and the Making of the Public Policy, which recorded his reflections on the subject. The book was well received as it provides rare insights on Singapore's public policy. In 2009 he published an article criticizing the liberal migration policy of the Singapore Government and favouring a more conservative one. In 2010, he yet again published a collection of his speeches and articles as a book entitled, Dynamics of the Singapore Success. George Yeo, then foreign minister of Singapore, recommended the book as "a valuable source of insight into the Singapore Story".

Ngô Dủ Hiệp

(吴猷合, Wu Youhe, 1954–)
Community leader, Vietnam

Ngô Dủ Hiệp (吴猷合) is leader of the Hoa community of Phu Quoc Island (富国岛), Vietnam. (Hoa is the official appellation for Vietnamese of Chinese ethnicity in Vietnam.) He is consultant to the management committee of the Hainan Association in Ho Chi Minh City, consultant to the management committee of the Hainan Association in Rach Gia city, president of the Phu Quoc Chapter of Sino-Vietnam

Friendship Association of Kien Giang province, and president of the Mutual Aid Organization of the Chinese. In addition, he has been vice-principal of the Chinese language centre on the island, currently known as Fuguo Xuexiao (Fuguo School 富国学校), since assuming leadership position in 1999. He is also a member of The Vietnam Fatherland Front (Mặt trận Tở quốc Việt Nam) of Phu Quoc.

Hiệp is a second-generation Hainanese born in 1954 in Phu Quoc. His father, Ngô Hồng Tường (吴鸿祥), arrived in Phu Quoc at the age of seventeen from Wanning County (Hainan) to work in a rubber plantation owned by a Hainanese who originated from Wenchang (Hainan). In the dawn of the founding of the Republic of Vietnam (1955), his father switched to selling daily provisions, naming his small venture, Tân Vinh Phát (新荣发). Hiệp followed in his father's footsteps and assisted in his business.

During the political turmoil of the mid-1970s to early 1980s, about 180 to 200 Hoa, mostly Hainanese, left the island for Australia and America. Like other small businessmen in Phu Quoc who were classified as petit bourgeois, Hiệp closed down the family's shop and voluntarily moved to the remote countryside. He turned to pepper fields to earn his living, but hardship brought by the price fluctuations of the pepper trade motivated him to seek other means of improving his income. After Sino-Viet relations improved and when the economic reforms allowed freer participation in private commerce, Hiệp revived his late father's enterprise, Tân Vinh Phát. A better chance arrived in 2005 when he gained new knowledge about doing business using credit from financial institutions such as private banks. He met Đặng Văn Thành (邓文城), founder of Sacombank (Saigon Commercial Bank), the largest private bank in Vietnam (see Đăng Văn Thành). Thành is a Hainanese and honorary chairman of the Hainan Native-Place Association in Ho Chi Minh City whose major functions Hiệp attends. The banker has reportedly expressed confidence in the conservative business style of Hoa businessmen, and readily approved Hiệp's credit application. With the credit, Hiệp expanded Tân Vinh Phát (新荣发) which now spans across the sea to Rach Gia. He gives his sons a free hand in the management of the new shop as well as the original shop in Phu Quoc. Four of his five sons assist him in his enterprise while he plays the role of a mentor. His youngest son, however, is one of the twenty-four graduates selected from a thousand in his tertiary cohort to join the military as an officer.

Business aside, Hiệp is consultant to the management committees of the Hainan Association in Ho Chi Minh City, and Rach Gia town, and president of the two other associations mentioned earlier. He currently spends most of his time serving his community.

According to Hiệp, his membership in The Vietnam Fatherland Front was the result of an invitation by the local government after the two former leaders had passed away, rather than his own initiative. The Vietnam Fatherland Front is an organization which consists of representatives from political organizations, social-political, and social organizations, as well as outstanding individuals representing various social classes and strata, ethnic groups, religions and overseas Vietnamese. Membership of the group does not require affiliation to the Vietnam Communist Party. Hiệp is not a member of the Vietnam Communist Party.

The Vietnam Fatherland Front of Phu Quoc has more than twenty members, among whom is an ethnic Khmer representative and Hiệp. The membership offers a seat to a leader from each religion recognized by the state. Each representative serves a five-year term, but each term may be extended for the individual. As member of The Vietnam Fatherland Front of Phu Quoc, Hiệp's responsibilities are to ensure that policies are accepted and understood and that communal coherence is forged.

In 1998, when the official initiative came for the Hoa in Phu Quoc to organize a mutual aid association, the Hoa swiftly formed an administrative committee for its congregation (lishihui 理事会). The school was partially returned to the Hoa the same year, two years after the Hoa community proposed to re-manage it. The community appealed to the authority for the school to be returned in its entirety, citing the reason that no other suitable place was available to hold the functions of their Mutual Aid Association. As no other venues were deemed appropriate to house the Mutual Aid meetings, the appeal was granted in 2000 and a Mutual Aid Association was thus founded.

The association's aim is to provide community socio-economic welfare and promote camaraderie to ensure social stability and harmony among the Hoa. So far, the association in Phu Quoc consists of 1,200 members who are Hainanese, with the remaining three per cent are Cantonese and Teochew. The annual fee of 20,000 dong that each member of the association contributes is used to create a fund which serves as a forms of social insurance. The fund is used whenever medical expenses and other form of financial assistance for its members and the community are needed. Mutual aid associations, which render community self-help based on communally raised funds rather than on state subsidies, have been officially welcomed as a proactive solution to economic hardship. Since then — after official recognition in 1996 which confirms that the Hoa are a vigilant, tenacious, and self-reliant group, many mutual aid associations were revived in Hoa communities across central and southern Vietnam. Raising funds and ensuring the success of socio-political projects such as aid relief and donations in crisis and disasters are the responsibilities of community leaders as well as those of the mutual aid associations.

Hiệp received his primary education at Kongzi Xuexiao (孔子学校), a Chinese-medium school in Phu Quoc. Being relatively well educated and very fluent in the Chinese language, he wants to preserve the Chinese-language education and his ethnic culture in Phu Quoc. Hiệp began his first two years of secondary education at Ming De Xuexiao (明德学校) in Rach Gia, which was affiliated to the Chaozhou huiguan (native-place association), but he completed his remaining secondary education at Zhongni Xuexiao (仲尼学校), managed by the Guangdong and Hainan bang (dialect-based congregation) in Rach Gia. Today, Hiệp still speaks his ethnic language, Hainanese, code-mixing it with Vietnamese at home. He has toured his ancestral hometown in Wanning (万宁), Hainan Island, and maintains ties with his six relatives there; his eldest son has also travelled with him in Hainan.

At home, Hiệp puts in effort to preserve Hainanese by using it as much as he can, even though he code-switches between Hainanese and Vietnamese when conversing with his wife. He is successful in ensuring that all his five sons understand and speak Hainanese. Although he himself is also highly proficient in speaking and writing Mandarin, only his eldest and second sons have learnt Mandarin through private tuition.

Hiệp sees the fulfilment of his community plans as "a duty to his ancestors" to continue their cultural heritage on the island of Phu Quoc. His plan to construct a modern multistoreyed building that houses both the new Hainan native-place association (which has not hitherto existed in Phu Quoc) and the mutual aid association under one roof is currently in progress and it has been his biggest challenge to ensure its completion. If his wish comes true, he will consider establishing a bilingual school offering Vietnamese as the first language, and Mandarin as the second, so that students of any ethnic background who is interested in acquiring Mandarin will not have to look for a school elsewhere to learn the language.

Ngô Quốc Tuấn

(吴国俊, Wu Guojun, 1951–)
Community and business leader, Vietnam

Ngô Quốc Tuấn is chairman of Asia Joint Stock Trading-Industrial Company (Công ty Cổ phần Thương mại-Công nghiệp Á Châu) in Can Tho City (Cần Thơ 芹苴). He also serves as honorary adviser at the Guangzhao Native-Place Association of Can Tho despite being a Teochew by ancestral origins. He actively promotes Sino-Vietnamese relations through The Vietnam-Can Tho City Union of Friendship Organizations and the Can Tho Chapter of the Vietnamese-Chinese Friendship Association, as vice-president and president respectively.

Tuấn is a member of the Vietnam Communist Party, chairman of the Thirteenth-Term Committee for the Association for the Sponsorship of Chinese Language Education in Can Tho (Hội Bảo trợ Hoa Văn Thành phố Cần Thơ), and honorary chairman of the Shantou City-China Association for International Exchange and Foreign Affairs. He led the Teochew delegation from Vietnam at the 15th Teochew International Convention held in Dongguan, Guangdong Province of China. The Teochew International Convention is a thirty-year old institution which started in 1981 and gathers entrepreneurs of Chaozhou and ethnic Chinese of Chaozhou (Teochew) ancestry all over the world to interact during the convention in order to promote friendly relations and participate in China's economic development.

From 1985–94, Tuấn was a management staff at the Economics Bureau of Can Tho city. His bureau developed a joint stock company in 1994 named Asia Joint Stock Trading-Industrial Company, which is the official sole agent for Coca Cola, Tiger and Heineken beers, and Honda motorcycles in the city. Tuấn became its chief executive officer, owning the majority of the company's stock. He stepped down last year when he turned sixty, the official age for retirement for men, but continues to retain his interest and responsibilities both in business and in other social activities. For more than two decades, he has also been member of the Vietnam Fatherland Front (Mặt trận Tổ quốc Việt Nam).

Among the plethora of official accolades he has received, his most recent is an award for his exemplary performance in the development of ethnic minorities (2009) by contributing to the peace and friendship among various ethnic minorities, and for his part in encouraging education in the Chinese community. He has other pursuits, such as being the highest honorary adviser of the Ngô (Chinese: 吴 Wu) lineage clan of the whole of Vietnam (越南吴氏宗祠). The group occasionally meets other Ngô clans of the world via international meetings.

One of Tuấn's most fulfilling activities was working towards the establishment of Shantou (China) and Can Tho as sister cities. The idea was proposed in 1993, but was materialized only in 2005. Another meaningful project he has organized for the Association for the Sponsorship of Chinese Language Education was the recent construction and expansion of a Chinese-language school which resulted in the establishment of the first new bilingual Chinese school in Can Tho City called Viet-Hoa Private School. The cost for the first phase of the construction was US$320,000, generously donated by 180 groups and individuals. Tuấn himself donated about US$50,000 and was among the major donors.

Entrepreneurship is not new to Tuấn, who has learnt the rope of managing resources from his father who used to operate a coal mine in Cà Mau. He was born in 1951 in a large household with twelve children in Sóc Trăng, a city neighbouring Can Tho. Although his father was from Chaozhou, the young Tuấn was sent to study in Minh Viễn School (鸣远学校), a school established in Saigon by the Cantonese Catholics. On graduating from this school, he worked for a Japanese ceramic company called Công ty Đầu Sứ Thiên Niên from 1969 to 1973. He returned to Cà Mau for fear of being conscripted into the military of the Republic of Vietnam in 1973. Cà Mau at the time was a resistance area of the Communists. Shaped by his circumstances, Tuấn joined the resistance from 1973 to 1975. Such resistance, which spread across the entire country, finally led to military victory and the unification of Vietnam.

In the peaceful period that followed after 1975–76, he landed a job in the civil service. It was a long-lasting job which offered him the ideal experience and exposure in international trade and commerce. The organization he joined was the Trading Bureau (Sở Thương Mại) of Can Tho. Tuấn rose through the ranks and eventually managed Asia Joint Stock Trading-Industrial Company. He currently juggles several significant social roles: he is chairman of the Association for Sponsorship of Chinese Language Education in Can Tho City and simultaneously serves as honorary adviser to several ethnic Chinese organizations, such as the Guangzhao native-place association/shrine (see entry on Trần Đông Sanh), Fujian native-place association (a small informal group), and the Ngô lineage clan. As chairman of the Association for Sponsorship of Chinese Language Education, he has been involved in the calculations, planning, and execution of the construction of the new Chinese bilingual school. The school was completed at the end of 2010 and began classes in 2011.

Despite having channeled substantial time and finance into Chinese-language education and the preservation of ethnic Chinese cultural institutions and their activities in Can Tho, Tuấn has not imposed the studying of Mandarin or any Chinese dialects on his five children. He and his wife, Âu Chi Lan (欧芝兰, 1950–), are fluent in both Teochew and Vietnamese, while their children are fluent in English and Vietnamese. His eldest daughter, Mai Yến, resides in San Francisco, while three other daughters are in Melbourne, and his youngest son, who is studying in high school, is also in Melbourne. His youngest son was born in 1993, the same year the Tiger beer brewery was inaugurated in Tân Thới Hiệp, one of the seven administrative divisions in District 12 of Ho Chi Minh City. It was at a meeting with Lee Kuan Yew, the leader of Singapore, where Tiger beer was first brewed, that Tuấn had the inspiration to name his son, Quang Diệu, "Guangyao" in Vietnamese.

Tuấn hopes to continue living and growing his business in Vietnam, tenaciously clinging on to the words of his father who regarded Vietnam as "the land of Buddha — where natural water flows and resources are abundant". Such territorial sentiment is also captured in the terse poem recited by the folks of Can Tho when waxing lyrical about their city: "White rice, pure water of Can Tho; those who come never want to leave."

Tuấn reveals that he has found the driving force of life in the lyrics of the theme song played at Teochew international conventions. The indefatigable spirit of early Chaozhou emigrants who braved rough seas and uncertainties to build their success in new lands has greatly moved him.

Ngô Thanh Hoa

(吴清华, Wu Qinghua, 1930–)
Community leader, Vietnam

Ngô Thanh Hoa plays an important part in preserving Chinese-language education and culture in Vietnam. He has been chief of the Hainan Native-Place Association (琼府会馆) in Ho Chi Minh City for twenty-five years and under his leadership, the association has achieved financial independence. In the recent five years, Hoa has also assumed greater social and educational responsibility, acting as vice-chairman of The Association for the Sponsorship of Chinese Language Education, while simultaneously holding the chairman post of the Chinese Language Literary and Arts Society, a post he has also had for five years. Besides his involvement in education and the arts, he is widely known for his previous professional engagement in the financial sector of Vietnam as the former vice-director of the earliest bank in Vietnam set up with ethnic Chinese capital, called the Viet-Hoa Bank. Although the bank sank in the mire of debt after a bank panic in 1999, Hoa has been working to clear the bank's debts since 2007 and continues to dream of reviving the bank one day.

Hoa was born in Wenchang, Hainan Island, in 1930. At the age of three, he migrated with his grandparents and parents to Nha Trang in Central Vietnam. His family later moved to Ho Chi Minh City, but his paternal grandfather's home in Nha Trang is still preserved.

Hoa is passionate about preserving language education and culture. He has assisted in the establishment of Chinese-language schools in various Hainanese communities in the southern and western regions of Vietnam namely, Văn Trung School in Hà Tiên, Trung Đức School in Hồn Trong, and Phú Quốc School on Phu Quoc Island. He also hopes to employ a Hainanese tutor from Hainan Island one day to teach the younger Hainanese in Ho Chi Minh City the Hainanese language. Besides language education, he has served as chairman of the Chinese Language Literary and Arts Society (Ban Bảo trợ Văn học Nghệ thuật Người Hoa), located in District 5 of Ho Chi Minh City, since 2009 and will serve it until 2014. He is also vice-chairman of The Association for the Sponsorship of Chinese Language Education, an organization that plans, designs, and implements Chinese-language courses in Ho Chi Minh City.

In his youth, Hoa was idealistic, hot-blooded, and courageous and had longed to participate in a revolution. The Vietnamese revolution appeared to be a lifetime's opportunity for him. He became involved in the control of finances as a member of the finance committee of the Central Bureau (Ban Kinh Tài, Trung Ương Cục). When the American-Vietnam War ended, he joined the External Trade Office until 1986, the year private enterprises were allowed to be established in the country. He founded his own credit enterprise, Hợp Tác Xã Tín Dụng Tân Thành (Tan Thanh Credit Co-operative), in June 1986 and was chief of the cooperative until 1990, when he ventured further to establish the first bank to be founded by the Hoa (ethnic Chinese of Vietnam) called Viet-Hoa Bank, with a partner, Trần Tuấn Tài (陈俊才), a Hoa of Chaozhou origins. Hoa became vice-director of the bank and Tài its overall managing director. The Viet-Hoa Bank was a merger of four ethnic Chinese-managed cooperatives which withstood the time when more than eighty other credit cooperatives collapsed. It was inaugurated on 15 August 1992 with a registered capital of US$2 million from ethnic Chinese investors, and grew to become a private bank of credible standing with the support of both Vietnamese and Chinese clients. The bank played an instrumental role in organizing the idle capital of the Chinese community and held stakes in Ho Chi Minh City's three-storey retail and wholesale market complex, An Dong Plaza, and the Cholon Commercial Centre, both situated in District 5 where the so-called "Chinatown" of Ho Chi Minh City is located.

At the end of 1994, it reportedly had a registered capital of US$10 million, a deposit of US$40 million, and a revenue turnover of US$1 billion. Seventy-two per cent of its shares were owned by about thirty shareholders, while state-owned enterprises held the remaining 28-per cent or so. Real estate investments, which were then enjoying rapid growth, formed an overwhelmingly large sector into which the bank's deposits were channelled into. In 1999 one of the most feared events that could happen to a bank became a reality: A run on the bank forced it to close its doors, and Hoa, the deputy director then, and Tài, the managing director, got into trouble with the law.

In 2007 after the legal trouble was cleared, Hoa was allowed to resume work to repay the debts of Viet-Hoa Bank. A plan is now in the pipeline to reopen the bank with six Hoa business partners. It is Hoa's dream to materialize this while he is still zealous about banking. Besides his job, he has also spent a substantial part of his time doing advisory work at the Hainan Native-Place Association — an activity that has been giving him much sense of fulfilment for the past twenty-five years. Today, he is proud to say that the association does not require donations from worshippers who come to pray at its ancestral shrine or from members for its maintenance. Hoa has helped the association to achieve financial independence by building a nineteen-acre warehouse facility on part of the spacious cemetery ground that the association owns. The warehouse rents out warehousing space to commercial companies. Like other native-place associations in the country, the association organizes charity projects such as supporting school-going children through scholarships, and aiding old and poor Hainanese residents through a monthly payout welfare scheme.

The youthful looking octagenarian believes in living happily as an ordinary person with a balanced business and social life. With his wife, Dương Vĩ Trân, currently seventy-two years old, they have nurtured two sons, a daughter and four grandchildren. Hoa's wife, a Cantonese with ancestral origins in Dongguan (Guangdong Province, China), was a former nurse. Their two sons now live in Hong Kong and the United States respectively, while their daughter lives in Ho Chi Minh City. His children all received their education at the Chinese school, Sanmin Xuexiao (三民学校), which was established and located in the Hainan Native-Place Association.

Ngor, Haing S.

(吴汉润, Wu Hanrun, 1940–96)
Actor, writer, Cambodia

Haing S. Ngor became well known after co-starring in an American movie entitled, The Killing Fields, in 1984. He won the best supporting actor prize at both the Golden Globe and the Oscars awards in 1985. Before the movie, no one had heard of him as an actor.

Haing Ngor was born on 22 March 1940 (although Le Hong Phan says it was 1947) in Samrong Yong, Cambodia. He had an ethnic Chinese father who was a petty trader and a Cambodian mother. Ngor came from a big family — he had four brothers and three sisters. One of his younger brothers, Chan Sarun (whose original name was Ngor Hong Srun), is currently minister for agriculture in the Hun Sen government. Ngor went to a Chinese school in his village, attended high school at a French school in Phnom Penh, and eventually received a medical school education, also in the capital of Cambodia. Upon graduation he opened a private clinic and worked at the same time as a medical officer in the government army. In 1975 the Khmer Rouge "liberated" Phnom Penh and began implementing its revolutionary policy which was anti-intellectuals. Ngor had to hide and work as a manual worker in order to survive. He and his wife, My-Huoy, soon joined the mass exodus from Phnom Penh, but were imprisoned and sent to a concentration camp where he was tortured and forced to work as a labourer. In 1978 his wife died in the camp. According to one source, she died from the lack of medical care. Another source says she died in childbirth. As a doctor Ngor could not help her as the Khmer Rouge would have killed him if his identity was known. He witnessed the genocide of the Pol Pot regime, but he had a strong will to live. In 1978, Vietnam invaded Cambodia and the Khmer Rouge regime collapsed. Haing Ngor and his niece, Ngor Ngim (alias Sophia) escaped to Thailand. They lived in a refugee camp where Ngor worked as a doctor until he moved to the United States in 1980 as a refugee.

Ngor's medical training was not recognized in the United States so he did odd jobs initially and went to school to learn English. He then worked for the Chinatown Service Center, helping refugees from Indochina. In 1982 the director of the movie, The Killing Fields, was looking for a Cambodian who could play the role of Dith Pran, a Cambodian who worked as "guide and interpreter" for New York Times Magazine journalist Sydney Schanberg in the movie. Haing Ngor passed the screen test and was chosen. Although he had never acted in a movie, he played the part very well because it resonated with his life experience. In the movie Dith Pran helped Sydney Schanberg to escape from persecution, but was left behind and imprisoned; he only managed to escape after the fall of the Khmer Rouge in December 1978. Ngor's vivid portrayal of Dith Pran touched many viewers and he became famous overnight. He won three awards for the role in The Killing Fields. Because of the movie people all over the world began to learn about the situation in Pol Pot's Cambodia. After the release of the movie, Ngor told a reporter from the New York Times: "If I die now, OK! This film will go on for a hundred years."

Ngor's experiences captivated many who wanted to know more about Cambodia. With the help of co-author Roger Warner, Ngor wrote a book entitled, A Cambodian Odyssey, published in 1987, describing his life in Cambodia before and during the Khmer Rouge period up to the time he received the Oscar award. The book was reissued in 2003 under a new title, Survival in the Killing Fields, about eight years after Ngor met his untimely death in 1996. In the reissued edition, Warner wrote an epilogue about Ngor's life after he won the Oscar and about his tragic death.

After his Oscar win, Ngor received quite a few movie offers. During his short life, he acted in at least ten movies, including Eastern Condors (东方雄鹰, 1986), a Hong Kong-made movie, The Iron Triangle (1989), and Heaven and Earth (1993). Most of the roles he played were minor ones as he was no longer able to surpass his role in The Killing Fields.

According to an article published in Baidu Baike, soon after he received his Oscar award, Ngor returned to the Thai-Cambodia border where he built a hospital for refugees. Another source revealed that Ngor was constantly working on behalf of Indochina refugees with a view to rebuilding Cambodia. In 1990 he and Jack Ong (a fellow actor whom he met while filming Iron Triangle) set up The Dr Haing S. Ngor Foundation in California, dedicated to the care of orphans and the development of infrastructure in Cambodia. Ngor was also concerned about his native land and the local Chinese community in Cambodia. He used his land in Phnom Penh for the establishment of a Chinese school (Minsheng School). After his death, his relatives in Cambodia donated the land to the school.

Ngor died a sudden death in rather mysterious circumstances. On 25 February 1996 he was gunned down as he stepped out of his car behind his apartment on the edge of Chinatown in Los Angeles. There has been much speculation about his death. One theory is that he was killed by Pol Pot or someone in the Khmer Rouge for playing the role in The Killing Fields, Ngor being a well known critic of the Pol Pot regime. However the police were unable to come up with any convincing evidence. Another theory is linked to a gang-related robbery. After conducting their investigations, the police arrested three members of an Asian gang called "Oriental Lazy Boyz": Tak Sun Tan, Jason Chan, and Indra Lim who had murdered Ngor for money to buy cocaine. One of the trio reportedly shot him when Ngor refused to give up the gold locket because it held the photo of his dead wife. His friends were sceptical: they believed Ngor had a survival instinct and would give up anything, including the locket to save his life. The case was closed and the murderers are now in jail serving their terms. Ngor was buried at Rose Hill Memorial Park in Los Angeles County. His grave stone bears the words:

Haing S. Ngor, Beloved Brother and Uncle,
March 22, 1940–February 25, 1996."

The words reveal that Ngor had a Chinese name that the gravestone was built by his brother(s) and niece, and that he was born in 1940 rather than 1947.

He was a Buddhist who held U.S. citizenship. His biographical entry can be found in Distinguished Asian Americans. Ngor never remarried after his wife passed away.

Nianlamei

(年腊梅; 许静华, Xu Jinghua, 1934–)
Writer, Thailand

Nianlamei, better known as Xu Jinghua, was "the most distinguished female writer in Thai-Chinese literary circles in the past 20 years. The beautiful prose that she wrote was sentimental and pleasant, simple and elegant, vivid and lively. It was very difficult in Thai-Chinese literary circles to find another female writer that could be as talented and brilliant as Xu Jinghua". This is how she is introduced by Phonlachet Kitaworanat (Fang Siruo, 方思若), the first president of Thailand's Chinese Literature Writers Association (泰华作家协会). Although the path of her life has sometimes twisted and turned, Xu has never given up her faith in writing. In fact, writing literature made her continue to persist in life, and relieved her depression and pain.

Xu Jinghua was born on 26 June 1934 in Bangkok. She has had several pen names, such as Li Hong (李虹), Xu Xinyi (许心怡), Li Xun (李洵), and Nianlamei (年腊梅) which, also happens to be her Thai name. Her parents were from Chenghai (澄海), Guangdong Province, China. Xu's father was a farmer, and died when she was only seven years old. Her mother was a famous Chinese opera actress in Bangkok, who quit her job in the troupe after her marriage and ran a small business to raise her seven children, including Xu Jinghua. However, it was very difficult for Xu's mother to finance all her children's education. Thus, Xu needed to sell fruit at school in order to pay for her education and, despite this, she still had to leave school at the age of fourteen, and become a weaver in a mill. She had to work hard since young to help support the whole family, and her health deteriorated because of the lack of nutrition and rest. Her childhood, as one senior newspaperman pointed out, was more miserable than one could imagine.

Despite poverty, Xu was strongly determined to become a writer. To do so, she did her best to self-teach from comic books and opera songs that her mother used to sing. Xu gradually accumulated vocabulary and knowledge in the Chinese language and, finally, was able to read classical Chinese literature such as The West Chamber (《西厢记》), The Romance of the Three Kingdoms (《三国演义》), and The Dream of the Red Chamber (《红楼梦》). Furthermore, she also began to engage with literature, as her work was first published in the youth section of a Chinese newspaper.

After the publication of her first work, Xu stepped into the literary circles and did her best to keep reading and writing. Her fortitude and patience were rewarded when she received attention from publishers of Chinese newspapers and, hence, joined the newspaper circle. Xu was working with several Chinese newspapers, such as Shijie Ribao (《世界日报》), Xinzhongyuan (《新中原》), and Zhonghua Ribao (《中华日报》). While taking up a variety of tasks, from cutting newspaper clippings to news editing, Xu was also keeping up with her writings, in the form of poetry, essays, short stories, and novels. Her works included collections of short stories entitled Huajie (《花街》, Flower Street) and Zai Yingzhua Huajiaxia (《在鹰爪花架下》, Under the Stand of Eagle Claw Flowers), a collections of essays entitled Changchunteng (《常春藤》, Ivy), and novels such as Meinanhe Liange (《湄南河恋歌》, A Love Song of Chao Phraya River), and Fengyu Yaohuali (《风雨耀华力》, Yaowarat in Rainstorm), which she co-authored.

Her works were distinguished as they depict the life of ordinary people in a realistic and down-to-earth manner. Huajie is highly regarded by literary critics, both local and overseas. This collection depicts the life of Chinese from the lower class in Thai society, and discloses their tragic fates and depressive mentality. In writing these stories, Xu envisaged the realistic approach of literature writing, portraying the life of people through their own true feelings, as seen in the short story that bears the same title, "Huajie", a representative work in the collection. The story describes the little known real life of women working as prostitutes. Although they live in a harsh environment at the bottom rung of society, these women still maintain faith in the goodness of human nature. Another short story in this collection, "Tuilese de yanglou" (《褪了色的洋楼》, Fading Mansions), was also written from the perspective of people at the bottom stratum of society, and reveals the truth of these poor people living in darkness. They live in a Western-style mansion that most people dream of, but this mansion is fading every day. It is so crowded that its residents have to queue in order to use the toilet. Furthermore, this mansion is filled with loud and harsh noises everywhere, and, worse, the air is dirty and hardly breathable.

Xu was good at writing about poor people in the bottom echelon of society, who are suppressed and have no voice. She noted that writing this kind of novel was most difficult, but, despite the difficulty, she kept writing. She used to ask herself why she had to do this, but soon found the answer: "For pleasure, for life; to glorify light, to conquer darkness; to praise good people, to castigate bad people." She further explained: "Sometimes I wonder if, as I'm a person without power, would my criticism make bad guys become good guys? But no matter what, I must keep writing. As long as I breathe, I must keep writing."

Nio Joe Lan

(Arif, Junus Nur, 梁友兰, Liang Youlan, 1904–72)
Writer, editor, Indonesia

Nio Joe Lan was a prolific feature writer and editor of several magazines. His writings in magazines and periodicals were usually about the culture and religious practices of the Chinese in the Netherlands Indies. He has also written books on Chinese history and Chinese civilization, and retold some Chinese classics such as Hua Mu Lan and Feng Shen in Malay and Dutch.

Although Nio Joe Lan's father came from Meixian in China and was thus of Hakka origin, Nio's name was written according to the Fujian pronunciation. Born in 1904 in Batavia, he was sent to a Dutch Chinese school called the Koningin Wilhelmina School (KWS), a technical school, where he was trained as an airplane technician. However, after his graduation, his father died and his mother was cheated by a Dutch manager of a factory. His family thus became impoverished. To help his mother, Nio accepted a job as journalist at the monthly, Penghibur. At the same time he worked for Keng Po daily, where he was the chief editor from 1928 to 1934. From 1934 he worked for Sin Po daily until it was closed down by the Japanese regime in 1942. By then, he had also contributed articles in Dutch and English languages for Dutch magazines, such as De Indische Gids and Koloniale Studien. Most of his articles were about the customs, celebrations, language, literature, and religions of the Chinese society in the Netherlands Indies.

In 1939 he was given the honour to write the history of the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan for a commemorative volume for the organizations 40th anniversary. In 1942, Sin Po was closed down by the Japanese authorities and Nio was taken captive until World War II ended in 1945. His unusually detailed account of his experiences in the prison, and later in the concentration camp, was published in a book entitled, Dalem Tawanan Djepang (In Japanese Captivity). In the book, he described the moment the Japanese came to take him at his home until the time he was heading home by train.

He wrote about the Bukit Duri prison where he was initially locked up together with some prominent members of the Chinese community, such as Major Khouw Kim An and Dr Kwa Tjoan Sioe. They were put in cramped cells and everyone received the same bad treatment and poor food. A few days later, the population in the cell increased when the Dutch were picked up and imprisoned as well. Nio noticed that the Dutch were served better food, but his protests against such discrimination were not heard by the Japanese.

After eighteen months, the 500 Chinese prisoners of Bukit Duri prison were moved to Serang, Banten, far away from their families in Batavia and the medical services which they had up to then enjoyed. A few months later, they were transfered again to the former Cimahi military camp where 9,000 Dutch, British, American, and Australian prisoners-of-war were already settled. He wrote about his joy at being settled in a house with a garden instead of in cramped cells. The Dutch ran the place which had inhabitants numbering up to that of a small town. There were several administrative departments, one of which took care of the deceased. However, the food supply was poor and the people had to try to make more money by manufacturing certain goods such as bakiak or wooden sandals. Those who had the opportunity to work in the fields brought back frogs, snails, and leeches which were welcomed as additional protein sources. There were attempts to prepare themselves or others for the future, thus tuition for young people were given so that schooling could start immediately when war was over. Others were trying to make good use of their time by studying. A good library and good teachers were available because most Dutch intellectuals were imprisoned at the camp and willingly gave tuition to others. Nio gave lectures and tuition on Chinese history and culture; however, he noticed that some youngsters were not interested in studying and would rather concentrate on doing business to make extra money.

All members of the camp received 10 cents daily, with one cent deducted for administrative costs. Ethnic Chinese members were allowed an additional 10 guilders per month from their family, and the Chung Hwa Chung Hui, a social organization in Bandung, donated an additional 10 guilders for each member. Twice a week, the opportunity was given to make music under a certain Mr Goldberg, a famous violinist from the Netherlands who had gone to the Indies to give a concert, but could not return because of the war. Besides classical western music, there was also the opportunity to make Chinese music for which instruments had been improvized. Keroncong music was very popular and the band was just as popular under the Japanese.

In May 1945, following the liberation in Europe, food supplies improved; the prisoners received more rice and meat, but their stomachs could not tolerate much meat after having been deprived of it for more than three years. It was only on 22 August 1945 that they received an official announcement that the war was over and that prisoners could go home.

In 1946 the publication of Sin Po was resumed and Nio returned to his job as one of the editors, but in 1948, he was appointed chief editor of a new magazine, Pantjawarna, a post he held until 1956. After his retirement, Nio enrolled at the IKIP (Teacher's Training College) to study history. After his graduation, he taught the history of China at the college. He also wrote books about Chinese history and culture, and Japanese history and literature. One of the last books he wrote was Sastra Indonesia Tionghoa about the literature of the Chinese in Indonesia. The literature was written in colloquial language and Nio observed that it might disappear when Bahasa Indonesia became the official language. Nio's publication attracted the attention of French sinologist, Claudine Salmon, who initiated an extensive research on the literature of Chinese Indonesians. The research resulted in a catalogue of literary publications in the language which has consequently become a reference for numerous researchers in the field.

Nio continued writing in Bahasa Indonesia. After 1965, he stopped writing about the Chinese, but switched his attention to the Dutch during the VOC and colonial period.

A characteristic of Nio's works is the absence of politics. Although he worked for the Sin Po, a major political media, he concentrated only on cultural issues in his works, which makes them valuable until today. He died in 1972 in Jakarta.

Nubla, Ralph

(高祖儒, Gao Zuru, 1908–2001)
Civic leader, philanthropist, Philippines

Ralph Nubla was a civic leader and an outstanding pillar of the Chinese community. He was one of the former presidents of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, who was accorded the monicker, the "Grand Old Man of the Federation". Nubla distinguished himself by accepting the cudgels of the leadership of the federation in a period of crisis: the turbulent years leading to, and during, the declaration of martial rule by former President Ferdinand E. Marcos. He was a pioneer in leading the influential group to reach out to mainstream society and actively participate in nation building efforts as citizens of the country.

Nubla was a third-generation Chinese in the Philippines, born on 23 October 1908. His father, Gao Ran (高染), was born in 1857, in Shishi in Fujian, China. In 1872, at the age of fifteen, Gao Ran migrated to the Philippines to join his father, Gao Hui (高辉), who had migrated there earlier. Gao Ran was intelligent and well educated. He started as a clerk on arrival in the Philippines, and eight years later, started his own business with a small cigarette factory in Salazar Street in Binondo, Manila, which eventually expanded into cigar and cigarette manufacturing and real estate. These became Nubla's flagship businesses, and having become an industry leader, he was appointed president of the Philippine Cigar and Cigarettes Manufacturing Association from 1960 to the 1970s. Nubla's businesses were varied and included the Philippine Bank of Communications (PBCom), of which he was chairman and later chairman emeritus. PBCom came under full Filipino ownership in 1974, when a group of industrialists led by Nubla bought the majority of the bank's outstanding shares. His own son, Ralph Nubla Jr., now serves as chairman.

Apart from succeeding his father in business, Nubla was influenced by Gao in civic leadership as well. Gao had three wives, twelve sons, and six daughters, and Nubla was the ninth among the sons. He was fluent in both Spanish and Tagalog, and was a champion of his Chinese compatriots, often arguing on their behalf when they found themselves facing the court, and especially in keeping the poor Chinese workers from abuse. He was thus elected head of the Workers Association when it was formed in 1899, and to which he contributed for six years, using it as a vantage point to promote the interests of Chinese immigrants. In 1911, he rendered financial support to Sun Yat Sen's (孙中山) Xin Hai revolution (辛亥革命), and was duly recognized.

Nubla was distinguished in his leadership as president of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry from 1966 to 1970. He was called upon again to lead the group in 1980, during a period of political instability, restiveness, and uncertainties, brought about by mass protests against the martial rule regime of Marcos. Before and after his tenure as president of the federation, Nubla had already served the federation in various capacities — as head of various committees and, later, as honorary president and chairman emeritus. He distinguished himself in 1972, when martial law was declared, by meeting with then President Marcos and his key officers to ensure that the community would be protected and a stable business climate would be established. He was a strong pillar behind the federation presidents who served after him during martial law, namely Antonio Roxas Chua, Yao Shiong Shio, and Leonardo

Ty. When all five Chinese-language dailies ceased publication during this period, Nubla negotiated for the resumption of at least one of them. He succeeded in working out the merger between the Great China Press (大中华日报) and Kong Li Po (公理报) to become the United Daily News (联合日报) in 1973, the first Chinese-language daily to resume publication during martial law, and which is still in print today. Nubla served as chairman of the newspaper's board.

He also pioneered the expansion of the role of the federation from that of a parochial business group to a more socially relevant organization. He exerted efforts to establish better rapport with Filipino leaders from all walks of life, and led the federation to participate more actively in events and activities of mainstream society. He exhorted its constituents to do so, saying: "It is not enough that one assumes Filipino citizenship by merely swearing to an oath of allegiance; that oath must pass the test of integrity and loyalty to the country." Among his tasks as chamber leader was to bring the ethnic Chinese community into meaningful participation in nation building, and this meant making sure that the group takes the lead in abiding by the law and not taking short cuts. However, Nubla was not popular among civil society groups and leaders of protest movements because of his unswerving support to Marcos, but he was, in fact, left with no choice because the community was especially vulnerable to political pressures. He exhorted the community to place themselves safely within the ambit of the political situation, no matter how difficult it was.

Faced with the large-scale inequity between the more well off Chinese-Filipino community and the impoverished sector of the mainstream society, Nubla involved the federation in more socio-civic activities. The federation was called upon to lead in various welfare projects and social development activities, with the barrio schoolbuilding programme being a flagship project. Through "Operation Barrio School", access to education was brought to inaccessible rural areas in particular. On top of its assistance to education, free-medical missions, and charity clinics, relief for victims of calamities were among the federation's projects to ameliorate the condition of the less fortunate in society.

It was during his time with the organization that it began to play an active role as a dynamic partner of the government, which involved among other things, various promotion activities to entice foreign investors to tie up with Filipino businessmen for the development of the country's growing economy. Nubla led the federation officers in a Southeast Asia Investment Exploration, during which they visited seven countries and ten cities to solicit foreign investments. As a compassionate and benevolent patriarch, Nubla was able to fulfil this role as a civic leader despite the demands of his own growing business conglomerate.

As a philanthropist-tycoon, Nubla was conferred the President Merit Medal by the president of the Republic of the Philippines in 1968. The award was in recognition of his humanitarian services rendered in the rescue and amelioration of the plight of the victims of the Ruby Tower disaster, a multistorey residential building that collapsed completely in a 7.2 magnitude earthquake on 2 August 1968. On 13 April 1984, he was conferred the Noble Knighthood of St Sylvester by His Holiness Pope John Paul II for "helping the Church for so many years in a variety of ways, without fanfare or publicity, without pomp and circumstances". In 1983, he was named by the City of Manila as one of its Outstanding Citizens, and on 25 September 1985, he was recognized as the Knight Grand Officer of Rizal by the Order of the Knights of Rizal.

Nubla died on 4 March 2001. His wife, Felicidad Chan Nubla (Chan Le Sieng, 曾丽省 Zeng Lisheng), was a nursing school graduate who served as a lieutenant in the United States Armed Forces in the Far East (USAFFE). She served in Camp Spencer, the same one in which Marcos served as deputy camp commander. She and Nubla nurtured that friendship, and it was this close relationship which served Nubla in good stead and helped him pave the way for the peaceful existence of the Chinese community despite the challenges of Marcos' martial rule.

Nyau Tze Lim

(饶梓琳, Rao Zilin, 1901–64)

Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Nyau Tze Lim was one of the Chinese leaders the older generation of Chinese in the 1950s in Kuala Belait District, Brunei, would be familiar with. He settled down in Kuala Belait in 1929, after moving from Miri, Sarawak. In the 35 years that he spent in Brunei, until his death in 1964, his contributions to the Chinese education, community and social welfare were much noted and recognised by the various social sectors.

Nyau was born in 1901 in Dapu County (大埔), Guangdong province, China. He was educated in his hometown when young, and when he was older, he studied Classical Literature under a notable village teacher, Zhi Long (芝龙). Due to Nyau's intelligence and diligence, he excelled in Sinology, writing and calligraphy. During his adolescence, China was in a political turmoil and its citizens were having a hard time getting by, which induced him to seek livelihood abroad, having decided to sail southwards. He left his hometown at age nineteen for Singapore, to learn the ropes of doing business. After having saved a sum of money, he went back home three years later to get married. His wife, Yu Ya Cui (余亚催), was no doubt a good wife. She was an earnest and disciplined, hardworking and thrifty in managing the household. When Nyau was 23, he and his wife set sail to the south again, stopping over at Singapore before going to Miri, to work in a trading company. In 1929, they decided to settle down in Kuala Belait, and set up a company, Heng Yi (恒益), dealing in general merchandise. Later, Ren An (仁安), a shop selling eastern and western medicines, was established. Their business expanded to the capital of Brunei, with the establishment of a medical hall, Yong An (永安), in 1962.

Nyau was one of the pioneers in Chinese education in Brunei as well. In 1931, two years after having arrived in Kuala Belait, he was one of the seven to have established a Chinese school, Chung Hua Middle School, and was one of the drivers for the expansion of the school, and a new extension was completed in November 1933. When Japan surrendered in August 1945, the Chinese in Brunei from all walks of life were involved in the school restoration. Reorganizing the Board of Directors was the top priority then, and Nyau was unanimously nominated as the Chairman of the Board. This was the most difficult period in the development of Chung Hua Middle School, and Nyau was instrumental in helping to raise fund for the restoration. He was at the helm of the Board of Directors until 1954. And was re-elected again in 1960-61, at that time, the size of Chung Hua School had increased to around 1,000 students, becoming the largest Chinese school in Kuala Belait then.

Nyau was officially recognized as a community leader when he was elected the Chairman of the Organizing Committee to form the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in 1951, in both Kuala Belait and Seria. Nyau was very active in the project, involving himself in all aspects, from looking for the right location, design of its architecture, drafting of the constitution, to the application for registration. The Chamber was effectively established under his stewardship and leadership, and was inaugurated on 28 April 1957. Nyau was elected as the Chairman in the second term, in 1958. He was again elected for the same position in 1964 for a 1-year term. Besides vigorously pushing for education and commerce, Nyau also initiated the organization of the Hakka Association in 1960, and held important positions in the Association. In recognition of his contributions over the past decades, the Brunei Government appointed him as a legislative member of the Kuala Belait District in 1964.

In the eyes of his children, Nyau was one who valued education and knowledge, and placed public welfare before personal ones. In the words of his fourth son, Zong Guang (总光): "Father always told me and my siblings that his wealth was only enough for basic sustenance and the education of his children. He emphasized that education and knowledge are the real, inexhaustible wealth that we should try to attain." Zong Guang added: "Father was charitable and public-spirited, he was an enthusiastic sponsor for public welfare, charity and educational causes, even to the extent of putting public welfare before his own, and as a result, he had in a way neglected his own business, causing it to stay stagnated for over 30 years."

Nyau Tze Lim and his wife have five sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Huo Guang (活光) and second son, Kan Guang (堪光) inherited their father's business. Huo Guang takes care of the business and at the same time practices Chinese medicine, mainly acupuncture at Yong An (永安) medical hall in the capital, Bandar Seri Begawan; and Kan Guang is in charge of the business of Ren An (仁安) medical hall in Kuala Belait. He is also vigorously involved in community and welfare activities, holding long-term management positions in the chamber of commerce in Kuala Belait, Chung Hua school in Kuala Belait, and clan associations of Dabu (大埔) and Hakka (客属). Nyau's fourth son, Zong Guang (总光) is equally well-versed in martial arts and Chinese medicine, being active by nature, he has been participating and playing a leading role in the fundraising activities for Chinese schools in Kuala Belait and Bandar Seri Begawan. He graduated from National Zhengzhi University (政治大学), Taiwan, majoring in Chinese studies, having excels in prose and poem writing. The youngest son Dian Guang (电光) has migrated to Australia and is presently operating and heading a private school in Sydney. Their eldest and second daughters have settled down in Canada and Australia respectively.

Nyoo Cheong Seng

(杨众生, Yang Zhongsheng, pen name: Monsieur d'AMOUR, 1902–62)

Writer, editor, playwright, play director, Indonesia

Nyoo Cheong Seng was a prolific writer who had about 200 novels published, some of which have been adapted into plays or movies. He has been credited with renewing the acting method technique for play directing in the 1920s.

Nyoo attended a Dutch Chinese School and learned English at a Berlitz Language institute. Born in 1902 in Bangkalan, Madura, he started his career as early as 1919 with a story that he wrote with a friend. Since then, he had written more than 200 novels and hundreds of short stories and poems. His first works were published in Sin Po daily and the monthly magazine, Hoa Po. In 1923 he was appointed editor of Interocean, a monthly magazine for politics and economics, but under his editorship, many literary pieces were translated, such as poems by Shakespeare, Lord Byron, and Tennyson. These poems were published together with Lie Kim Hok's poems in a special issue of Interocean dedicated to poetry. Nyoo's activities, however, were not limited only to writing; during his spare time, he joined Soen Thian Gie Hie, a theatre group, as an amateur, but later became more involved as its director. He wrote his first script, Lady Yen Mei, criticizing rich but stingy people.

In 1926 he left Interocean and joined the Miss Riboet's Orion, a theatre group in Batavia. Together with TD Tio Jr, he improved the standard of the group by radically changing the acting technique and directing method. The troupe travelled to all the cities of Java and Sumatra and also performed in the Malay Peninsula and in Singapore. In 1932 they left Orion and joined the Moonlight Crystal Follies in Singapore.

Back in 1927, he had married a French-Chinese girl named Tan Kiem Nio. She was born in Sungai Liput, Aceh and had learned dancing to become a dancer in the chorus line, but later learned acting from Nyoo. In 1933, she appeared for the first time using her stage name, Fifi Young. With her stunning beauty and her acting talent, she soon became very popular, especially in Kuala Lumpur, Malaya. Nyoo created special roles for her to bring out the best in her, and each time, she surprised him with her ability. She also proved to be gifted in Indonesian dances as well as Western dances as she performed them with the same grace.

In 1933 Nyoo and his wife returned to Batavia and were introduced to a group called Dardanella which was owned by a famous dancer, Dewi Dja. With this group they travelled to several countries in Asia, such as China, Burma, and India, but just before the troupe was to go to Europe, Nyoo and Fifi Young returned to Batavia because of some pressing family matters.

Together with Henry L. Duarte, an American from Guam, they established Fifi Young's Pagoda troupe, which was hailed as a very good group, and enjoyed by the intellectuals of the time. However, their capital was limited and consequently, their repertoire only focused on the works of Nyoo. Popular plays at the time were Timoeriana, which was about Timor L'este; Ida Ayu, the story of a girl from Bali; and Bentan Telani, composed of a dialogue consisting of verses. These plays were later adapted into novels.

In 1940 Fifi Young was given a role for her first movie, Kris Mataram, by Fred Young; Nyoo wrote the script for this movie, which was a success because she was already a theatre actress, well known for her perfect acting.

During the Japanese Occupation, they joined a group called Bintang Soerabaja; in 1945, Nyoo started a new group called Sandiwara Pantjawarna, and became involved with one of the young actresses. Young demanded a divorce. They had five children together, two of whom had died very young. The oldest daughter, Sally, was actually a talented actress in her own right; however, next to her mother, who was always considered the prima donna, Sally could never gain popularity with the public. She married in 1948, and settled in Surakarta afterwards.

After his divorce Nyoo went to Makassar where he became a popular figure in the Chinese community. He met Ho Eng Djie, a popular keroncong singer, and wrote a biography about this unusual man. Many other stories he wrote later were the result of his friendship with the Chinese community in Makasar.

He later went to Malang and felt very much at home with a group of intellectuals, who had formed a group called Tsing Fung Hsieh. His close friends were Ong Kian Bie, a photographer and owner of Studio Malang, and Tan Liep Poen, a painter, who had often made stage decorations for his plays and had designed covers for his novels in the monthly, Tjerita Romans. His most important meeting, however, was with Huang Lin, a young female teacher whom he met while they were acting together in the play, Malang Mignon. They married and he spent his last years quietly until his death in 1962. Nyoo had contracted a liver disease and needed extra care in his diet and lifestyle; nevertheless, he was still busy writing every evening and produced mainly short stories in diverse magazines. Together with his wife, he opened a floral shop and Nyoo would write a special poem for every order.

His views on society were very much reflected in his novels and these views changed as time went by. First, he was very much against the liberation of women in the 1920s and 30s. It was a time when women wanted to be free and pursue education. They also wanted to wear short dresses with short sleeves, and moreover, have their hair cut short. Nyoo was of the opinion that women should continue to wear their traditional dress, which was the sarong and kebaya, and that their hair should be dressed in a bun. He also warned women to be careful of immoral men, who would take advantage of women who wanted to be modern, but were not aware of the dangers of modernization. He believed that only women who were brought up with traditional values would be strong enough to ward off the dangers. Immoral men were those who used money to show their power. They were dishonest in business and used tactics to disturb the business of others, such as using blackmailing or sending false reports about them. They behave immorally towards women by seducing young girls and mature women alike. They would try to lure the young girls into sex, but after taking their virginity, would abandon them for another girl. They would also seduce mature women, preferably those married to the rich or influential, so they could boast about their feats. To give examples to his readers, Nyoo wrote three stories entitled, Tengkorak (Skeleton), Algojo (The Executioner), and Kiamat (Doomsday).

A new trend that made Nyoo even more anxious was when married women tried to free themselves of their husbands in the 1940s. A new entertainment – ballroom dancing — became popular at the time. The dance itself was already considered a big threat as partners would embrace each other while dancing. Dancing also provided the girls with the chance to work in dancing halls, where the work was comparable to prostitution. He saw even more danger when girls became victims of Japanese soldiers during World War II, and then of the allied military forces after the war. In the Fifties, he therefore created the "new" woman — one who could stand up to men with their intelligence and wit.

The genre of his novels varied. Although his pen names, Monsieur Amor or Monsieur d'Amour, suggest that he mostly wrote love stories, this was not entirely true. He wrote biographical novels as well as adventure stories, an example of which was Gagaklodra, serialized in the monthly, Liberty. Gagaklodra is a figure often compared with Robin Hood. He is anti-government and consequently, always being chased by them. This series was very popular; in 1956, he published a collection of Gagaklodra stories with the title, 22 tahun Gagaklodra (22 Years of Gagaklodra).

Oei Tiong Ham

(黃仲涵, Huang Zhonghan, 1866–1924)
Wealthy opium revenue farmer, modern entrepreneur, community leader, Indonesia

Oei Tiong Ham was the wealthiest man of his era in the Netherlands Indies, and was honorary major of the Chinese in Semarang. He made a fortune as an opium revenue farmer before the colonial government nationalized the sale of opium. A modernizer, he expanded his father's sugar trading business, Kian Gwan, into the Oei Tiong Ham Concern, an international conglomerate which traded and warehoused a variety of products. By the time of his death the company had diversified into shipping, banking, and the media.

Oei Tiong Ham was born in Semarang on 19 November 1866, the eldest son of Oei Tjie Sien (1835–1900) and Tjan Bien Nio (1839–96). His father, who had migrated there from Fujian province in 1858, was a very successful businessman and the founder of the famous trading company, Kian Gwan.

At the age of eight, Oei Tiong Ham commenced a traditional Hokkien schooling in Semarang. He later took lessons in the Malay language and the Romanized script. Notwithstanding his inability to speak Dutch, he had a number of good European friends with whom he communicated in Malay or through an interpreter. His immigrant father's success in sugar trading must have been considerable because Oei Tiong Ham himself was appointed Chinese lieutenant of Semarang in 1886 at the age of twenty. Soon promoted to the rank of captain, he resigned the position in 1902 because of the demands of his rapidly expanding business. He was later appointed an honorary major.

He may have benefited from his father's business success, but he soon broke from his father's narrowly Chinese lifestyle. His modern orientation was already evident in November 1889 when he successfully submitted a request to the governor general to be permitted to wear European clothes. It was not until 1905 that the Chinese were free to dress in any way they liked without asking for government permission, and he was the first Chinese in Semarang to be seen in a European suit. He was also one of the first to cut off his queue (although this only happened after his father's death) and was one of the first Chinese to obtain permission to live in the European quarter of Semarang rather than in the Chinese quarter, to which the Chinese were still confined by law.

Despite these Western influences in his lifestyle and the increasingly international focus of his business empire, he remained a key member of the Chinese community throughout his life. He contributed generously to the Chinese language THHK (Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan or Chinese Association) schools throughout Central Java, and backed the founding in 1916 of the Semarang secondary school, Hoa Ing Tiong Hak (the Chinese-English school designed to enable students to obtain entry into the University of Hong Kong). He also gave generous support to the renovation of the Tay Kak Sie, the major temple of the Chinese community in Semarang.

Successfully bidding for the opium revenue farms in Semarang, Surakarta, Yogyakarta, and Surabaya in the early 1890s, at a time when many former revenue farmers were in financial trouble, he was the last and greatest of the opium revenue farmers in Java. It made him a fortune, as the last licence he held earned him a profit of 18 million guilders before the colonial government replaced revenue farms with a state-run opium monopoly in 1904.

Meanwhile he had turned his business acumen to his father's Kian Gwan kongsi (company), which he incorporated into NV Handel Maatschappij Kian Gwan in 1893. Taking over the business from his father in 1890, Oei Tiong Ham established branches throughout Java and diversified into other export crops such as rubber, kapok, coffee, tapioca flour, pepper, corn, groundnuts, castor-oil seeds, and citronella oil. In 1906 he set up a bank called N.V. Bank Vereeniging Oei Tiong Ham and managed it personally for some time. It operated in Semarang and Surabaya, initially providing trading credit and secured loans, but gradually extending its business to cover all aspects of commercial banking and securities, with a property development and real estate subsidiary. Another subsidiary, N.V. Algemeene Maatschappij tot Exploitatie der Oei Tiong Ham Suikerfabrieken, was his vehicle for the ownership of sugar mills. When sugar prices were in decline before the First World War, he made speculative investments in sugar mills which paid off with huge profits when sugar prices rose after the outbreak of war. He set up offices in strategic locations outside the Netherlands Indies, first by establishing the subsidiary, Kian Gwan Western Agency Ltd, in London in 1910, and then a branch office in Singapore in 1914. When the Tan Kim Tian Steamship Co went into liquidation in 1911, Oei Tiong Ham bought five ships and in 1912 formed a company called Heap Eng Moh Steamship Co.

His business interests also spread to the media to such an extent that, at the time of his death, half of his wealth was in newspapers in Java, in particular, in De Locomotief in Semarang and Java Bode; and Nieuws van den Dag in Batavia. As a businessman, he was quite unlike his father and other typical Chinese businessmen of his time. He did not run his companies as a traditional family business, but used European corporate structures and employed trustworthy and competent Europeans and Chinese from outside the family. In choosing key staff, he did not simply rely on formal qualifications, however. According to his daughter, Koo Hui Lan, he was a profligate gambler in his youth and later backed his hunches as a businessman. It is said that he promoted Tan Tek Peng, a bookkeeper without university qualifications, to head Kian Gwan because he was a "daring gambler".

After paying war profit taxes amounting to 35 million guilders in 1921, Oei Tiong Ham was asked to pay income tax for the same period. Understandably he regarded this as double taxation, and refused to pay it. According to his biographer, Liem Tjwan Ling, it was for this reason that he left Semarang and moved to Singapore. However, according to his youngest son, Oei Tjong Tjay, who was born a few weeks after his father's death, Oei Tiong Ham moved to Singapore so that he could write his will under British law. He had eight wives and twenty-six children (thirteen sons and thirteen daughters) and wanted to disinherit the daughters and choose which sons were to succeed him on the basis of their ability. This was not permitted under Dutch law. After his death the will was contested by the seventeen disinherited children who claimed that he had only moved to Singapore temporarily and was still domiciled in Java. The dispute was ultimately settled in 1939 on terms that gave them each a significant share of the estate. At his death, his wealth was estimated at 200 million guilders. The newspaper, Soerabaiasch Handelsblad, in Surabaya called him the richest man between Shanghai and Australia.

He died in Singapore of a sudden heart attack on 2 June 1924. On 6 July 1924 his remains were laid to rest together with those of his parents in Penggiling, Semarang. In accordance with his own wish, the burial ceremony was quiet and without extravagance. Fifty years later, his son, Oei Tjong Ie, arranged for their bones to be excavated and cremated. The ashes were then taken to Singapore where they were cared for and venerated.

Oei Tjoe Tat

(黄自达, Huang Zida, 1922–96)
Lawyer, community leader, political leader, Indonesia

Oei Tjoe Tat was a third-generation Peranakan born in Solo, Java on 26 April 1922 to Oei Ing Wie, a shop owner, and Ong Tin Nio, a housewife. Neither his father nor his mother received much education. Oei's father spoke some Hokkien, but the home language was Low Javanese (ngoko). Although the family members had lost command of the Chinese language, they continued to keep Chinese traditions, such as the celebration of Chinese festivals.

Educated at a Dutch Chinese school (HCS), Oei began to learn and speak Dutch, but did not speak it outside the classroom. His interactions were mainly with ordinary Javanese and Peranakan Chinese. After finishing primary school he was sent to Semarang to attend a HBS, a Dutch secondary school. Due to his good results he continued his education at RHS (Jakarta), a law school and graduated in May 1948. The same year he joined a Jakarta law firm where many of his colleagues were indigenous Indonesians. Nevertheless, it would appear that he was more at home with the Peranakan Chinese community.

Between 1948 and 1950 he was secretary of Sin Ming Hui (Jakarta), a Chinese social organization, and eventually became its president between 1950 and 1954. In 1948 he was also involved in establishing the Persatuan Tionghoa (PI), a Peranakan Chinese political association which changed its name to Partai Demokrat Tionghoa Indonesia (PDTI) in 1950 and served as one of its commissioners. He became deputy chairman in 1951–54. In the 1950s he was also an executive member of the Indonesian Red Cross (1955–57), the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (THHK, Jakarta), and the Union Makes Strong (UMS), a soccer association in Jakarta.

It was in the 1950s that Oei began to acquire a sense of national-political awareness. He advocated the dissolution of the PDTI and the establishment of a new inclusive organization for the Chinese in Indonesia. In 1954 various Chinese organizations, regardless of their political ideologies, came together and formed a new mass organization which came to be known as Baperki. The same year, Oei was elected vice-president of the Baperki central board. Siauw Giok Tjhan, a left-wing Peranakan Chinese, was elected president of Baperki. Soon afterwards, a few Peranakan Chinese intellectuals who held different political views left the organization. Oei, who was influenced by the ideology of democratic socialism, stayed on. Another prominent member, Yap Thiam Hien, also continued to be active in Baperki. As time passed, Baperki moved closer to Soekarno who became the "protector" of the organization. Yap eventually became non-active as he disagreed with Siauw's policy.

Daniel Lev argues that many Baperki leaders believed that the hope of Chinese Indonesians did not lie in the Partai Komunis Indonesia (PKI) or other political parties, but in Soekarno as Soekarno was not a racialist. As such Siauw and Oei saw the rise of Soekarno as a solution to the so-called Chinese problem in Indonesia. Oei himself admired Soekarno and served on the executive committee of Partindo which was established in 1958 with the endorsement of Soekarno, who felt that the Partai Nasional Indonesia had lost the "nationalist spirit".

Oei believed that by joining Partindo, an indigenous dominated political party, he would be able to contribute more to the Chinese community and Indonesian people. His admiration for Soekarno drew him closer to the president and he referred to Soekarno as his teacher in politics and followed the latter's political teachings and advice. He was proud to call himself "President Sukarno's assistant".

Ong Hok Ham, a leading Indonesian historian of Chinese descent, noted that Oei was "a-political", but was "honest, brave and correct in his behaviour", an attribute appreciated by President Soekarno. In December 1964 Oei was appointed by President Soekarno as minister without portfolio, attached to the Cabinet Presidium; and from September 1964–65 he was minister of state. Oei's association with Soekarno, Partindo, and Baperki led to his detention after the 1965 coup by the new authorities who were critical of Soekarno and his teachings.

Oei was not immediately detained. It was only after Soeharto gained political power from Soekarno in March 1966 that he began to lose his freedom. He was initially put under house arrest, and then a few weeks later, made a prisoner, together with leaders of the "Old Order". Oei was detained for almost ten years before he was put on trial on 9 February 1976 when he was defended by Yap Thiam Hien and other indigenous Indonesian lawyers. Oei held on to his political belief and loyalty to Soekarno. The judge eventually sentenced him to thirteen years of imprisonment, minus the time of his detention. Oei did not appeal against the sentence as he did not think it would change anything. He also refused to ask for a pardon from Soeharto as he felt that he had done nothing wrong. His wife, Kwee Loan Nio, asked for his remission with the support of Adam Malik, then foreign minister, and other respectable individuals. Oei's trail gained international attention and he was eventually released on 30 December 1977 after being kept in jail for almost twelve years.

After his release, Oei reopened his law firm, but had to close it down in 1985 after suffering from a heart attack which resulted in his partial paralysis. He continued to keep in touch with his loyal friends and helped the families of detainees who were in difficulties. From 1992 he underwent a series of operations. In 1995 he published his memoirs entitled, Memoar Oei Tjoe Tat: Pembantu Presiden Soekarno (The memoirs of Oei Tjoe Tat: President Soekarno's assistant). The senior editor of the memoirs was a famous Indonesian novelist, Pramoedya Ananta Toer. The book was soon banned, by the Soeharto government. Oei died of cancer in 1996.

Oei Tjoe Tat had married Kwee Loan Nio in 1945. He is survived by three daughters and one son.

Oey, Abdul Karim

(Abdul Karim Oey Tjeng Hien, 黃清兴, Huang Qingxing, 1905–88)
Chinese Muslim leader of Muhammadiyah, Indonesia

Abdul Karim Oey (hereafter called, "Oey") was a well known Chinese Muslim who was active both before and after World War II. He was a Muhammadiyah leader in Bengkulu and Jakarta and he founded the Persatuan Islam Tionghoa Indonesia [Indonesian Union of Chinese Muslims] (PITI). A controversial figure within his ethnic group which is non-Muslim, he was part of the dakwah movement within the Chinese community.

Oey was a second-generation Chinese born in 1905 in Padang, Sumatra. His father and mother came from Fujian Province in Southern China and had migrated to Indonesia in the mid-nineteenth century. At the age of one, Oey was given to the care of foster parents. When his adoptive father died, he was returned to his natural parents. Oey's father was a successful merchant and sent Oey to HCS, a Dutch school for Chinese children. Perhaps because of his Dutch education, Oey converted to Adventist Christianity, but he did not practise it. He did not continue his studies after graduating from HCS, but moved instead from Padang to Bintuhan and went into business there. Soon he came to be known as a superior trader and was able to afford a Chevrolet sedan. His work often took him to Jakarta.

The young Oey was searching for something in religion. He became a Buddhist and Confucian before being converted to Christianity, but Oey said that Adventist Christianity did not bring him inner peace. He felt that "the light of God began to illuminate my [his] soul" and he began to study Islam. Oey reportedly converted to Islam in 1931 when he was twenty-six. After conversion, Oey continued to study under Fikir Daud. However, after becoming a Muslim (or becoming Malay, as the Sumatrans and Peninsular Malays would say), Oey found that his relationship with his family became distant, but his relationship with native Indonesians became closer, especially with the Sumatrans in his birth place.

Oey became a Muslim in Bintuhan where he founded a branch of the Muhammadiyah organization. He had two ideas then — to set up a branch of the Indonesian United Islamic Party (PSII), or of Muhammadiyah. Finally, following the wish of the majority of the community, he established a Muhammadiyah branch and was selected to head it. Oey travelled around West Sumatra and Bengkulu, where he met local figures such as Hasan Din, the father of Fatmawati and future father-in-law of Soekarno. In 1937, Soekarno was exiled to Bengkulu and remained active there. Soekarno once convened a meeting of the Muhammadiyah to select a new consul as the old one was seriously ill and the organization needed a successor. Finally Hasan Din suggested that Oey of Bintuhan be the head. Soekarno agreed. A telegraph was sent to Oey asking him to sell his possessions in Bintuhan and move to Bengkulu. Oey became closely associated with Soekarno in Bengkulu. Finally, Soekarno asked Oey to propose to Hasan Din's daughter, Fatmawati on his behalf.

During the Japanese Occupation, Oey was told to disband his organization. Oey said that the Japanese did not force him to do so and he refused. When Japan surrendered and the Masyumi Party was founded, Oey became the party chief in Bengkulu. When the Dutch initiated military action in 1948, Oey and some other Maysumi figures became guerrillas. Oey still lived in Bengkulu after Indonesia's independence and served as a Muhammadiyah consul. In 1952, he moved to Jakarta and became a member of Majelis Tanwir Muhammadiyah (a Muhammadiyah board), established from 1952 to 1973. Oey was chosen to sit on the Masyumi Party Council from 1957 to 1960. He was also a member of parliament, representing the Masyumi Party during the same years. When Masyumi debated with the PKI (Indonesian Communist Party) in parliament, Oey was assigned to argue against Nungtjik A. R., a former friend from Padang. According to Oey, Nungtjik attacked Masyumi and the Muslims in his speeches, thus Oey responded by attacking the PKI. The vehemence of Oey's speech startled Nungtjik. After the debate, Nungtjik embraced Oey and told him that they had been set up against each other, but Oey did not reply.

Oey was a member of parliament for four years. In 1960, Soekarno let him step down honourably from his post with a full pension. This was related to the dissolution of the Masyumi Party which was thought to have been involved in the 1958 rebellion in which regional commanders tried unsuccessfully to set up the Revolutionary Government of the Republic of Indonesia (PRRI).

After Masyumi disbanded, Oey founded the Organization of Chinese Muslims of Indonesia (PITI) and was selected its chairman. During the New Order period, he introduced new blood into the PITI leadership while he continued to be the chairman. Lt. General Surdirman was put in charge, and seven native Indonesians, including Hamka, the leader of Majelis Ulama Indonesia, one of the biggest Muslim organizations in Indonesia, were selected as advisers. The first vice-chairman together with Muhammadiyah and Nahdlatul Ulama and the secretary general of PITI, H. Yunan Helmy Nasution and Major Achmad Johansjah respectively, were also native Indonesians. Although PITI was a Chinese Muslim organization, its administration and membership were actually ethnically mixed. Under Oey's leadership, PITI developed and branches were established.

PITI, under Oey, sought permission in 1972 to print the Qur'an and religious magazines in the Chinese language. The request was turned down by the Department of Religious Affairs because the government wanted to expedite the assimilation of the Chinese. That same year, the central committee of PITI was ordered to disband the organization by the attorney general. The term "Chinese" was found to be too exclusive. Ten days after PITI was dissolved, on 12 December 1972, a new organization, Pembina Iman Tauhid Islam (Organization for the Promotion of Religious Beliefs), was formed. It was involved in sermonizing and education, and its administrative structure was little changed. Oey remained chairman until 1973 (Tempo, however, reported that he was chairman until 1975); thereafter, he served as honorary chairman.

Oey was also known as an entrepreneur. When he moved to Jakarta, he became involved in several companies. In 1952, he and Hasan Din first established PT Mega to import cloves and other commodities. "Mega" was short for "Megawati", the name of Soekarno's daughter. According to Oey, the company had received Soekarno's blessing. Oey served as director of the company until 1981. He also served as director of Bank Central Asia (BCA), the bank of Liem Sioe Liong, from 1955 to 1973, and was simultaneously the first commissioner of the bank. In addition, Oey was director of his factory producing Asli 777 T-shirts from 1962–80. From 1964 to 1973, he was head of the Muhammadiyah Economic Council. He combined his economic activities with religious ones. From 1972 to 1979, he served as director of PT Sumber Bengawan Mas.

Oey did not make the pilgrimage to Mecca until 1969, when he went with a group from HUSAMI (Organization of Muslim Businessmen), headed by Sjafruddin Prawiranegara. Two years later, he was chosen by President Soeharto to head the operations committee of the Istiqlal Mosque until 1974. In 1977, Oey became an ordinary member, and later, an advisory committee member (1980) of Bakom PKB central (Committee on the Understanding of National Unity) where he was active in assimilation activities. In 1980, Oey travelled with his wife, two daughters, and a son, all Muslims, to Mecca to complete his umroh (staying in Minna three nights during the hajj). His two daughters married indigenous Indonesians. One of them became the daughter-in-law of a PITI leader, Yunan Helmy Nasution. General A.H. Nasution and K.H. Dahlan and Moh. Hatta were the witnesses at the marriage ceremony, while Hamka gave the wedding sermon. Oey's son, Ali Karim or, Oey Tek Li, married a Chinese woman who later converted to Islam.

Oey died in Jakarta on 13 October 1988 at the age of eighty-three. He was an important Muslim figure in Indonesia. As Hamka noted, "He was a Muslim and a son of Indonesia… who was fostered, nurtured and became a true Indonesian nationalist."

Oey-Gardiner, Mayling

(黃美玲, Huang Meiling, 1941–)
Demographer, executive director of Insan Hitawasana Sejahtera, professor, Indonesia

The significance of the work and career of Mayling Oey-Gardiner, usually called Mayling, is shown in the fact that she has a number of "firsts". When there was an increase in population activities, including studies and scholarships in the 1970s, she was a recipient of the Ford-Rockefeller population research grant. She was the first Indonesian to receive this grant as an individual applicant. The research became the basis of her dissertation and led her into becoming the first Indonesian to earn a Ph.D. in demography in 1982. In 2001, she was the first woman to be appointed professor at the Faculty of Economics of the University of Indonesia (UI) in its fifty years of existence. In 2004 she was elected chair of the Academic Senate and secretary to the Board of Professors of the Faculty of Economics of UI in 2004–2007 (private e-mail, 9 September 2008).

Mayling has an outstanding teaching record at the UI, which started in 1971 with sociology, and later with the addition of population studies. She also taught research methodology at both undergraduate and graduate levels for more than two decades. Although retired since 2006, she has continued teaching at the Faculty of Economics of UI on an intermittent basis.

She founded Insan Hitawasana Sejahtera (IHS) with a number of colleagues in 1991, of which she is the executive director until today. IHS is an Indonesian company specializing in the provision of social science research covering a wide range of social, economic, and demographic issues, and consulting services. In addition to management responsibilities, she is also senior researcher, often serving as team leader of research projects undertaken by the company. One recent product of this company is MAPFRAME, a widely used software database prepared for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Nanggru Aceh Darussalam (NAD), which was hit by the tsunami of 26 December 2004. This is a product that continues to be developed. Undoubtedly, Mayling is the pillar of the company and her research output in consultancies, both national and international, is impressive. She has a total of 117 titles to her name. In recent years, her research interests have increasingly targeted policy aspects of equity, with a focus on poverty and gender issues, and on issues related to general access to social services, as well as on delivery of social services through participatory approaches in the context of building environments of greater governance. Her work has included both primary (survey-based) data collection and analysis. She has done work not only in Indonesia, but also in Cambodia, Malaysia, Mongolia, the Philippines, Thailand, Timor Leste, and Vanuatu.

Mayling's deep concern with good quality research and capacity building in this area has led to her becoming a member of the committee to select outstanding research proposals for government funding under the auspices of the Minister of Research and Technology. She is currently a member of the Dewan Research Nasional (DRN) for the period 2005–08, and in 2008 she was invited to be a member of the Commission on Social Sciences of the Indonesian Academy of Sciences.

Mayling is highly active in civil society organizations (CSO): She was one of two international, non-Ford Foundation board members of the International Fellowship Program of the Ford Foundation; a member of the board of the Indonesian Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS); a founding member as well as a board member of Transparency International-Indonesia. Her concern with women's issues led to her acceptance as board member of the Koalisi Perempuan (Women's Coalition). With four other colleagues, she founded the Lotus Foundation in 1997.

Born in Sukabumi (West Java), a small town about 120 km south of Jakarta, on 25 February, 1941, she is the fourth child and third daughter of Oei Jang Hwat and Ong Pik Hwa. This was the time of the Japanese Occupation of the Netherlands Indies. Her mother, a journalist who ran a woman's magazine called Fu Len (Furen in Mandarin, meaning "women"), had a sharp pen and would be called an "activist" today. She was a target of the Japanese occupiers and consequently the family had to move around in Java until after Indonesia's independence. They finally settled down in Jakarta. No doubt, Ong's activities and ideas left their mark on the mind of her third daughter. Her concern for women's issues and the importance of education which she wrote about in her magazine were also passed on to girl.

As Peranakan Chinese, both Mayling's parents were Dutch educated, and she herself went to the Dutch Santa Theresia elementary school and then the Santa Ursula Indonesian secondary school, from which she graduated in 1959. This was the time when ethnic Chinese experienced discrimination in getting into state universities. Mayling, therefore, decided to postpone continuing her studies and got a job instead at the affiliation office of the Faculty of Economics of UI — a Ford Foundation project to send Indonesian students to the United States to study economics. At the end of the project she herself was offered a scholarship to study there.

Thus began her educational experience in the United States and it happened during the very difficult years in Indonesia before and following the 1965 upheaval. She was accepted at St Xavier's College in Chicago where she completed her BA in sociology in 1968, then went on to the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, Virginia. She returned home in 1970 with an MA in sociology and a thesis on population growth patterns. She joined the Population Section of Leknas-LIPI (the National Economic and Social Research Institute of the Indonesian Institute of Sciences), and the Demographic Institute of the Faculty of Economics of the UI. Shortly afterwards she had the opportunity to study at the Harvard School of Public Health, where in 1974, she completed a postgraduate degree (MS) in Population Sciences and also started a proposal for an original study on transmigration. Again she was fortunate as she completed the proposal in time to receive a population research grant from the Ford-Rockefeller programme.

She is married to Peter Gardiner, an American demographer. Their romance began when they were both studying demography at the Australian National University in Canberra, Australia. After they had completed their Ph.D, they decided to tie the knot in Jakarta in 1982. They have a son, Conrad Trisna Gardiner, in 1985 when Mayling was forty-four years old. She was very happy and proud to tell people that it was a natural birth. The young man is now completing his undergraduate studies in media and communications at the Swinburn University of Technology in Melbourne, Australia.

Mayling's life is a successful combination of marriage, family, and career. In her husband, Peter, she has also found a colleague, with whom she works in the IHS research company they set up in 1991, seventeen years ago. In her own words, "… our skills seem to complement each other. Peter is strong in conceptualizing and designing studies or writing proposals, while my forte lies in implementation and thus, management".

Oey Kim Tiang

(黄金长, Huang Jinchang, 1903–95)
Translator, writer, Indonesia

Oey Kim Tiang had limited formal education but managed to be the greatest translator of Chinese novels, particularly wuxia novels, into Bahasa Indonesia. His career spanned over 60 years (1924–88), during which he produced translations of more than 120 titles, including such Chinese classics as Romance of the Three Kingdoms (三国演义), The Journey to the West (西游记) and Outlaws of the Marsh (水浒传). His works promoted the birth of the cerita silat (wuxia) genre in Indonesia and connected readers to the wealth of Chinese literary traditions.

Oey Kim Tiang was born on 9 February 1903 in a Sino-Indonesian family which had lived in Tangerang for more than five generations as labourers and petty traders. Their ancestry was not known anymore, as was common for the Chinese then. His father, Oey Kee Hok, worked as a coconut plantation supervisor and moved from one plantation to another. He once took his wife to Telukpucung, Bekasi, located in the east of Jakarta (West Java) where his wife gave birth to twin sons, Kim Tiang and Kim Siang. The younger twin died when he was three years old. His wife also probably died around then as both were buried in the same place. When Oey Kee Hok was inspecting coconut plantations, the young Kim Tiang would be left to a neighbour's care as there was no school to go to. This experience probably tempered Oey into a self-motivated, independent individual later.

Only much later was Oey enrolled at the new school of Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (abbrev. THHK; Chinese Association) in Tangerang. While the school of THHK in Batavia (Jakarta) used Mandarin (普通话) as its teaching medium, the Tangerang school chose the most common local dialect — the Fujianese dialect of Zhangzhou (漳州), where most Chinese in Java had originated. At school, Oey befriended a young teacher, Ong Kim Tiat (王金铁), a graduate from a school in Nanjing for overseas Chinese, Kay Lam Hak Tong (暨南学堂). The two became sworn brothers.

When Oey graduated from junior high school, Ong, already then a reputed reporter for Sin Po and Siang Po, urged Oey to work rather than continuing his education as Oey was already twenty. Oey was introduced to the editors of the Keng Po press by his maternal uncle and immediately obtained a position in the young press. Oey accepted the job to translate the famous historical novel, Tong Tjioe Liat Kok (东周列国). In this first work, Oey used the pseudonym, K.T. Jr., in honour of his friend (K.T. stands for Kim Tiat). The work proved very successful and translating became Oey's main job. Oey translated other short wuxia novels; among them, the greatest recognition was received for Tjit Hiap Ngo Gie (七侠五义 Qixia Wuyi), and its sequel, Siauw Ngo Gie (小五义 Xiao Wuyi), in 1927–28. In the 1930s, Oey married Lie Soe Nio, and his children, Lan Ing, Hin Gie, Lan Hiang and Hin Lim, were born in quick succession.

In 1936–38, he contributed to no less than four dailies, two magazines, and a monthly, using several pseudonyms: For Keng Po, he used the pseudonym, Huang (the Mandarin pronunciation for Oey); and for Sin Po, Boe Beng Tjoe, which means 'the man with no name'. In Semarang, Goh King Tjoh, the Japanese sound of his name was used with Djim Nay Boe, meaning 'a side job'. The acronym OKT was extensively used after 1950 as well as H., KT., C.C Huang, and even X. Besides pseudonyms, Oey's publications for Magic Carpet in early 1950s were anonymous.

During the Japanese Occupation, publishing houses closed down. Harder times came after the independence of Indonesia when Oey and his family found their home ransacked one day and had to evacuate. Oey's library and archive were destroyed and Oey rebuilt his work from scratch. Keng Po, and its sister publication, Star Weekly, resumed publishing in January 1946, but Oey preferred to work from home. It was in this period which saw Oey's best works being produced: See Yoe (Journey to the West 西游记), published in 1952 under the Magic Carpet label; Soei Ho Toan (Outlaws of the Marsh 水浒传) appeared in Sin Po (1950); and Sie Djin Kwie (薛仁贵传奇) for Star Weekly was published as a graphic novel with the directions of Auwyong Peng Koen and the illustration of Siauw Tik Kwie.

Oey rose to prominence and Keng Po began to publish his works in 1956. Wang Dulu's (王度卢, 1909–77) Crane-Iron Pentalogy (鹤铁系列), after Oey's translation, turned out a big success. Oey published 19 wuxia titles using pseudonym, OKT, with Keng Po in the two years before its liquidation. By then, the readership of wuxia novels was not confined to the Chinese, but had spread to any literate.

The works of Jin Yong (金庸) and Liang Yusheng (梁羽生) received instant popularity. Jin Yong's 14 books were translated in 1958–72 by Oey and his young relative and friend, Oey An Siok, under the name, Boe Beng Tjoe — the only time Oey had allowed his pseudonym to be used by another person.

In 1961, a ban on wuxia novels in news media was issued by the military commander of Jakarta, thus wuxia stories appeared in books. Until 1966, more than fifty titles were published, among which Oey had a fair share. In 1966, the military banned all publications and required the publisher to submit a copy of the proposed book before a long wait for publication approval. This practice virtually stopped the business. However, public demand for reading materials prevailed. In 1968, the publisher Marga Djaja began to publish Oey's new series. A boom followed and more than 11 titles appeared within four years. In 1972, Marga Djaja collapsed, leaving Si Kasim Tjilik (鹿鼎记) and Lentjana Tudjuh Naga (七龙令) unfinished.

From then on, Oey withdrew from business despite unfinished translations. He became aware that his readers preferred reading the standard Indonesian language which he lacked proficiency in. Oey tried to look for an editor for his manuscripts, but was unsuccessful. Pustaka Jaya, a publishing company headed by Ajip Rosidi, an admirer of Oey's works, managed to edit and republish Dua Musuh Turunan (萍踪侠影录) in three incomplete volumes in 1996. The only successful one was San Pek Eng Tay (梁山伯与祝英台), edited by Achmad Setiawan Abadi, published by Yayasan Obor Indonesia in 1990. Actually, Oey completed the text in 1985.

In his later years, Oey did not translate many new titles. His last efforts were spent translating Boe Tjek Thian (武则天), the story of Empress Wu, but he has to stop in 1988 due to deteriorating health. Nevertheless, he continued to read Chinese classics and new books. On 8 March 1995 he died in Tangerang.

Translation was time-consuming; it was only after Oey was satisfied with a story would translation begin. If Oey found an original publication unsatisfactory, he would write his evaluations, sometimes very extensively, on the book covers. In translating, he referred to a note he made of the characters, places, events, and their martial art styles to maintain consistency. One of Oey's extraordinary results was his translation of classical poems found in the works of Jin Yong and Liang Yusheng, which were mostly ignored by translators due to linguistic difficulties and thus, dismissed as unimportant. Oey would, however, painstakingly translate the poems and prolong publication time; therefore, separately typed pages of translated poems were mostly found glued to the bound texts.

Oey preferred to be called a 'narrator' rather than a 'translator'. He explained that he was simply retelling stories that delighted him to the public with his limited capacities. Oey demonstrated excellent mastery of the Melayu Rendah dialect; no less than Ajip Rosidi, a prominent Indonesian writer and poet, even lavished praise upon Oey's translation skills. Quality aside, Oey's long career and quantity of translations are unparalleled; so are his attitude and his deep dedication and commitment. Oey helped to promote the popularity of modern Chinese novels among the younger Sino-Indonesian generation who do not learn the Chinese language. Through his works, Oey also spread traditional values like the family, friendship, solidarity, truth and justice — values fundamental to our humanity but which are threatened by fast-paced urbanization.

Oey Tong Pin

(黄东平, Huang Dongping, 1923–)
Prolific writer in Chinese, Indonesia

Oey Tong Pin, better known as Huang Dongping, is arguably the most prolific Indonesian Chinese writer in Chinese in the last century. He was first known as a poet and later a novelist. In fact, he is also an essayist and playwright.

Oey was born in Kota Baru, Kalimantan, on 31 April 1923, into a Hokkien totok family. He studied in a local Chinese primary school, but when he was ten years old, his father, a "bookkeeper", took the whole family to Jin Men (Fujian) where Tong Ping studied up to the first year of secondary school. When the Sino-Japanese War erupted, the young Tong Ping and his two siblings went to Hong Kong with their mother and lived there for more than two years while his father returned to Indonesia. The boy studied at a school called Yu Cai Shu Yuan (育才书院). By his own account, it was during his stay in Hong Kong that he was able to read a lot of books and newspapers to enhance his knowledge of Chinese. While in Hong Kong he also learned drawing, especially sketches and caricatures, which made him an illustrator as well.

After the death of his mother, he and his siblings were brought back by his father to colonial Indonesia and from then on he began to work to support himself. He did not return to Kalimantan, but went to Pekalongan (Central Java), where he worked for a tea company as a bookkeeper. Later when the tea company went bankrupt he went to join his uncle in Samarinda, Kalimantan, where he again worked as a bookkeeper for Chinese shops. Over there he began to write and send his writings to Chinese newspapers and magazines. His first essay was published in a student magazine.

After the Japanese Occupation of Indonesia, he returned to Java, first to Surabaya, and later to Jakarta, with his family. He was still working as a bookkeeper, not for one shop, but often for a couple at a time. He used his free time to continue writing. In 1956, he wrote a long poem entitled, "You, Indonesia!", extolling the heroic history of Indonesia and the contributions of the overseas Chinese. It was accepted for publication as the lead poem by a magazine in Guangdong Province in China called Literary Works Monthly (作品月刊). This long poem brought him fame and attention as a poet among the Chinese-speaking community in Indonesia; he had written it from the perspective of a huaqiao, an overseas Chinese. Poems of this genre were very popular during that period and most of his poems were political in the sense that they were written as commentaries on political events, and carried particular messages. Besides that, they eulogized about the greatness of the motherland (China) and the contributions of the Chinese overseas. He had by then inherited the literary tradition of socialist-realism. From 1956 to 1965, he wrote and published 161 poems in Mainland China and Hong Kong, especially in the well known literary magazines of the People's Republic of China, including the People's Daily (人民日报), People's Literature (人民文学), Poetry Magazine (诗刊), Literary Monthly (文艺月报), Literary Works Monthly (作品月刊), etc. He had intended to publish the poems in book form, but gave up this plan due to the changes in the political situations in Indonesia and China: General Soeharto had come to power after crushing the PKI (Pantai Komunis Indonesia) and Soekarno, and introduced an anti-communist regime, while the Cultural Revolution had broken out in China. However, Oey later photocopied his handwritten manuscripts and made them into a two-volume book for limited circulation among his friends. The photo-copied book was called Qiao Feng (侨风) or "The Wind of Chinese Overseas".

During the New Order era in Indonesia, the three pillars of Chinese culture were eradicated: Chinese schools, Chinese newspapers/periodicals, and Chinese social and political organizations. Worse, the public use of the Chinese language was also banned. In such circumstances, Oey changed his strategy. He stopped writing poems as these would have been considered behind the times and it would be difficult to get them published. Instead he concentrated on writing short essays, short stories, and novels.

As a matter of fact, prior to the New Order, Oey had started writing short essays and commentaries. During the New Order period, he published his works no longer in the newspapers and magazines of China, but in those of Hong Kong, Singapore, Malaysia, and even the United States. His post-Soekarno writings were numerous, but the most successful were his three novels or trilogy. The umbrella title of the three is Qiao Ge (侨歌) or "The Song of Overseas Chinese", but each volume has its own title. The first volume was completed at the end of the 1960s after he had done his research for the novel. It was published only in 1973 in Hong Kong after a couple of failed attempts. This first novel, entitled, Qi Zhou Yang Wai (七洲洋外) (Beyond China), deals with the history of the Indonesian Chinese communities during the Dutch colonial period, especially the beginning of the 1920s. It tells the various stories of Chinese migrants, such as "progressive teachers", students, farmers, and small traders. Through his protagonists, Oey attempted to portray the lives of overseas Chinese in colonial Indonesia. In fact, the stories were provided by his own father; these were combined with the author's own life experiences and observations. The second novel, entitled, Chi Dao Xian Shang (赤道线上) (On the Equator), was published six years later (1979) also in Hong Kong. By his own account, he had a lot of difficulty writing the second novel before it could see the light of day. It also deals with colonial Indonesia beginning in the 1930s, and portrays the overseas Chinese in Indonesia and their struggle for survival in colonial society, their interactions with the local communities, their responses to events in China and their struggle against Dutch colonialism. The last volume entitled, Lie Ri Di Xia (烈日底下) (Under the Heat of the Sun), which concluds his stories of the Indonesian Chinese in the Dutch colonial period, was published twenty years after the first novel. This trilogy is considered by many as a masterpiece by Oey; his readers call it the encyclopedia of the Chinese community under Dutch colonial rule as it provides detailed descriptions of various types of Chinese migrants, their living conditions, and life experiences. The first two novels have also been serialized in Chinese newspapers in California (the United States), and received warm responses from the readers.

Apart from the trilogy, Oey also wrote one screenplay entitled, Lao Hua Gong (老华工) (The Old Chinese Labourer), published in Hong Kong in 1974, and depicting the story of Chinese coolies in the Dutch East Indies; and a play Hong Xi (红溪) (Red River), which deals with the 1740 Chinese rebellion in Batavia, and the massacre of the Chinese which turned the river red. It was first serialized in a Chinese daily in the United States in 1984 and was eventually published in 1990 in Hong Kong. In addition, he also published his collection of essays in two volumes: Duan Gao Yi Ji (短稿一集) (Collection of Short Essays One) and Duan Gao Er Ji (短稿二集) (Collection of Short Essays Two), both in Singapore. After the fall of Soeharto, the Indonesian Chinese clan association of Jinmen (金门) decided to publish the entire works of Oey, entitled, Huang Dong Ping Wen Ji (黄东平文集) in ten volumes. The last volume was published in 2003 in Jakarta. Oey has since received recognition also from the Singapore Chinese literary community. In 1981 he was invited to participate in the international literature seminar in Singapore. The seminar invited only five leading Chinese authors, namely Bai Xianyong from the United States, Liu Yi Cha from Hong Kong, Ya Xian from Taipei, Fang Bei Fang from Malaysia, and Oey. It was considered a great honour. In 1996, he received the Ya Xi An Wen Xue Jiang award (亚细安文学奖, ASEAN Literary Award) from the Singapore Society of Literary Studies.

Oey eventually became a citizen of Indonesia. However in most of his works which were written prior to his becoming an Indonesian citizen, he tended to write from the perspective of an overseas Chinese, not an Indonesian.

Ojong, Petrus Kanisius

(Auwjong Peng Koen, 欧阳炳昆, Ouyang Bingkun, 1920–80)

Journalist, publisher, socio-political activist, Indonesia

P.K. Ojong was a newspaperman, publisher, and public intellectual. He and Jakob Oetama published the largest influential Indonesian-language daily, Kompas, and was the proprietor of Gramedia, a major printing and publishing company which later developed to become the Kompas-Gramedia Group.

P.K. Ojong, or more correctly, Auwjong Peng Koen, was born in Bukit Tinggi on 25 June 1920. His father, Auwjong Pouw, was a Chinese migrant from Jinmen, southern China, who came to Indonesia before World War II and became a tobacco merchant in Payakumbuh, West Sumatra. After the death of his first wife, Auwjong Pouw married a second wife who gave birth to Peng Koen. Auwjong Pouw was then about fifty years old. It is interesting to note that Auwjong Pouw sent his son to a Dutch School for the Chinese (HCS) rather than a Chinese-medium school in Payakumbuh. The young Peng Koen was also educated at MULO (Dutch secondary school) in Padang (1934–37) and was exposed to Catholicism since many of his teachers were Catholic priests and nuns. It was therefore not surprising that he became a Catholic at a young age.

After his graduation from MULO, Ojong wanted to continue his education in a law school, but his father had died when he was still in secondary school and his mother had difficulties in paying for his further education. As a result he went to Java to attend the Dutch Normal School for the Chinese (HCK), which provided almost free education. He graduated in 1940, became a teacher, and later a school principal in Jakarta for four years (1940–44). In August 1945 the Japanese surrendered and newspapers were allowed to resume publication. Ojong, who was then in his mid-twenties came to know the two Peranakan newspapermen, Khoe Woen Sioe (丘文秀, 1906–66) and Injoo Beng Goat (杨明月, 1904–62), both from Keng Po, one of the largest Peranakan Chinese newspapers in Jakarta before and after World War II. He then joined Keng Po and worked on its editorial board, and was also staff member of the Star Weekly, the weekly magazine of Keng Po, from 1946–51.

During this time, Ojong continued to be interested in a law education and enrolled himself at the Faculty of Law, University of Indonesia (FHUI), where he obtained a Mr (Meester in de Rechten) degree in 1951.

Ojong later took over the management of the newspaper from Khoe Woen Sioe, who was influenced by Fabian Socialism. He had discovered that Khoe had his own philosophy and was concerned with the welfare of his staff. Because of this, Khoe was able to gain the loyalty of his staff. On his part, Ojong had gained the confidence of Khoe and from 1951 to 1960, served as chief editor of Star Weekly. It was under his leadership that the Star Weekly became the leading weekly read by both Peranakan Chinese and indigenous Indonesian intellectuals. Ojong was able to get both indigenous and Chinese Indonesian writers to write for the weekly, which became a forum for Indonesian intellectual debates.

In the debate on "assimilation" in Star Weekly in 1960, Ong was in favour of assimilation for Chinese Indonesians and opposed to the Baperki integration policy supported by Siauw Giok Tjhan. The assimilation group, known as the "Ten Figures" (Tokoh 10), consisted of many Chinese Catholics and anti-Communist individuals, including Ojong. The division between the assimilation and integration groups, interestingly, coincided with right-wing and left-wing political ideologies respectively.

Indonesian politics after 1957 began to move to the left under the leadership of President Soekarno and Keng Po and Star Weekly were considered to be against the state revolutionary ideology. In August 1957 Keng Po was banned by the authorities, but Star Weekly survived for another four years before it was banned in October1961 for being "anti-revolution". It was only after the banning of Star Weekly that Ojong had time to publish three books*: Perang Pasifik 1941–45* (The Pacific War 1941–45, Jakarta, 1962), Perkara-Perkara Kriminil Jang Termasjur (Well Known Criminal Cases, Jakarta, 1962), and Perang Dunia II (World War II, Jakarta, 1963).

After the Star Weekly was banned, Ojong established P.T. Sakawidya, a printing and publishing firm of which he was director between 1961 and 1964. In 1963 he participated in the publication of Intisari, a popular monthly magazine, and eventually became its chief editor. Intisari was different from Star Weekly in that it made a special effort not to publish political commentaries even though many leading writers and intellectuals wrote for the magazine. From the business point of view, Intisari was a success. This does not mean that Ojong was not interested in politics. On the contrary, in 1964 he joined the Partai Katolik (Catholic Party) and served on its Central Board until 1968.

In 1964 the government issued a new ruling that all newspapers were required to be affiliated with political parties. The Catholic Party wanted Ojong to be its leader as he had journalistic experience and was successful in running the Intisari. Ojong hesitated for a while, but eventually agreed. He insisted that a foundation should be established for the purpose of its publications. He invited Jakob Oetama, a Javanese who was also a member of the Indonesian Catholic Scholars Association (Ikatan Sarjana Katolik Indonesia) and who was at one time a journalist working for a Catholic magazine, to join him. After putting in much preparation, the daily, Kompas, was eventually published on 28 June 1965. Three months later there was the so-called 30 September Movement (G-30-S), which brought about the fall of the PKI and Soekarno, and the triumph of the army. All left-wing newspapers were banned on 2 October 1965, but Kompas, as an anti-Communist paper, was allowed to continue. It developed gradually into a major and respectable daily newspaper read by the educated sector of the public, regardless of their ethnic backgrounds and religious affiliations.

Ojong served as general manager of Kompas until 1980. He not only brought about the successes of Kompas and Intisari, but also established branches of Gramedia Bookshop in major cities of Indonesia. In short, he and Jakob Oetama succeeded in making Kompas-Gramedia the largest newspaper and a leading printer/publisher in Indonesia. The Kompas-Gramedia group later diversified its business and went into other sectors as well.

From 1967 to 1969, Ojong served as treasurer II of the Newspaper Publishers' Federation. From 1967 to 1980 he was treasurer of Yayasan Indonesia, a foundation which published Horison, an influential literary magazine. From 1971 to 1980 he was a member of the Legal Aid Institute, Lembaga Bantuan Hukum. And from 1970 to 1980, he served as chairman of the Tarumanegara Foundation, which founded the University of Tarumanegara in Jakarta.

Ojong died the evening of 31 May 1980, probably from a heart attack. He had married Catherine Oei Kian Kiat in 1949 and had six children with her.

Ong Beng Seng

(王明成, Wang Mingcheng, 1946–)
Businessman, entrepreneur, property tycoon, Singapore

Businessman, hotelier, property tycoon, lifestyle entrepreneur, are just some of the labels used to describe Ong Beng Seng, one of Singapore's most reclusive and media-shy businessmen.

Though born in Perak, Malaysia, in 1946, Ong had spent most of his life in Singapore as his family moved here in 1950, when he was four years old. He was educated at Anglo-Chinese School (ACS) where he gained the reputation of being a champion sprinter and long jumper. After ACS, Ong made his way to the United Kingdom for further studies before returning to Singapore to take up a job with Motor & General Underwriters Investments Holdings. By the early 1970s, he had reputedly earned his first fortune selling shipping insurance. He had also married Christina Fu, the daughter of Peter Fu Yun Siak, a well established oil trader and founder/chairman of Kuo International, a large oil trading company.

In 1975, Ong took the first step that marked a change in his career by joining Kuo International as its managing director, where he gained the reputation for being a shrewd trader with an eye for business opportunities. In 1980, Ong and his father-in-law made the decision to diversify Kuo International into hotels, with the setting up of Hotel Properties Ltd (HPL), which made its first acquisition in the form of the Hilton Hotel in Singapore in 1982, and then went public with a listing on the Singapore Stock Exchange the same year. He consolidated HPL's position as a player within the hotel industry in Singapore throughout the 1980s through a series of investments, including purchasing a 50 per cent stake in Singapore's Four Seasons Hotel in 1984, bringing on board his longtime business ally, Prince Al Waleed of Saudi Arabia. With the depressed property market in the early 1990s, Ong took the opportunity to enter the global property market and acquired not just the fashionable Halkin and Metropolitan hotels in London, but also the Chevron Hotel on the Gold Coast of Australia, in addition to investing in the Canary Wharf development in London.

In addition, Ong also diversified into many different businesses, including stockbroking, lifestyle and leisure, charter tours and aircraft leasing, automobiles (Komoco Motors which distributes Hyundai cars and Ferrari cars through its subsidiary Ital Auto), film-making, entertainment (bringing the late Michael Jackson and Simon and Garfunkel to Singapore), and property development. Ever on the lookout for new ventures and industries, he has also teamed up with the Singapore Government in Bioveda Capital, a US$30-million life sciences venture capital fund through HPL and his private investment vehicle, Reef Investments. Among Ong's more notable investments were his purchases of the master franchises in Asia for Planet Hollywood and the Hard Rock Café chains. From there, he moved on to launch the Hard Rock Hotel chain, beginning with the opening of two new Hard Rock hotels in Pattaya and Bali. Through his wife's private company, Club 21, which holds the franchise and rights to designer brands such as DKNY, Mui Mui, Guess, Bulgari, Calvin Klein, and Giorgio Armani, the Ongs further diversified their interests into high fashion and other lifestyle ventures, earning for Christina Ong the title of "Queen of Bond Street".

Despite his reclusive nature and renowned reluctance to give interviews for which he was nicknamed the "invisible Ong" by the press corps, Ong had to step into the full spotlight of public scrutiny in 1996 when HPL became embroiled in the matter of giving discounts to then Senior Minister Lee Kuan Yew and then Deputy Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong for their purchases of condominium units in Nassim Jade and Scotts 28, two prestigious developments undertaken by HPL. Explaining the decision to give discounts on the properties as a normal commercial transaction that was above board, Ong was at pains to emphasize that the discounts were offered voluntarily by HPL as routine pre-sale launch offers and not requested by the two political leaders.

He was again thrust into the limelight in the late 1990s as the Asian economic crisis hit. Beginning in 1997, Ong and his wife began a rapid shedding of their assets, including HPL's stakes in Donna Karen Japan, Manhattan's Hotel Pennsylvania, Four Seasons Hotel in London, Italian fashion house Bulgari, the Virgin Entertainment Group, and stockbroking firm Vickers, which he sold to Singapore Technologies. These divestments sparked off market talk of financial woes linked to the crisis, further fuelled by the sale of his private jet, and rumours spread about his ill health. Reports of worse-than-expected financial results and the bashing of HPL's share prices on the stock exchange did nothing to help. Seeking to dispel the rumours that were affecting HPL's share price, Ong was again compelled to meet the press to clarify his divestments of non-core assets, which he described as part of his strategy of defending his home base and ensuring HPL stayed cash-rich to the tune of $300 million, ready for economic recovery. His strategy paid off as property prices began to bottom out in Asia and Ong embarked on a shopping spree, buying up properties, companies, and more franchises, including Concorde Hotels & Resorts, Elegant Hotel Holding, the Fitzpatrick Hotel in New York, and shop retail units in various shopping centres in Singapore. He also converted new properties in Thailand into Hard Rock hotels, and teamed up with Club Med to develop a second resort in the Maldives, moves hailed by media as his comeback from the financial crisis. By 2011, HPL's total portfolio consisted of nineteen hotels in eight countries, luxurious residential projects in Singapore, the Hard Rock Café franchises in Asia, and operations of Häagen-Dazs distribution in Singapore and Malaysia among other business ventures which are said to have a total market value of US$1.8 billion.

Ong began the first decade of the twenty-first century with a leading role in one of the most talked-about corporate sagas in Singapore when he led a consortium headed by his company, 98 Holdings, with partners Temasek Holdings, Standard Chartered Private Equity and GEM Oriental & General, in a head-on clash with renowned Indonesian-Chinese businessman, Oei Hong Leong, for control of NatSteel in 2002. It was a close battle that eventually cost the consortium some $770 million for 50.31 per cent of the shares, and one that further evoked fears that Ong may have overextended himself and rendered his position within HPL vulnerable to a takeover bid by shareholder Quek Leng Chan. It is a bid that has yet to materialize.

Ong may, in the end, become better recognized as the man who brought the Formula One (F1) race to Singapore. As early as 1989, he made a proposal to build an F1 racing track which was turned down. When the Singapore Government, through the Singapore Tourism Board, began to explore the possibilities of bringing F1 to Singapore as part of an overall strategy to boost tourism, Ong became the best person to clinch the deal with F1 president and CEO, Bernie Ecclestone, his longtime friend of eighteen years, through his privately owned company, Singapore GP. Negotiations took place over the space of one year and, in September 2008, the F1 debuted in Singapore as a night race, another first for F1.

Ong and his wife have a daughter and a son.

Ong Boon Pang

(王文邦, Wang Wenbang, 1882–1940)
Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Pehin Kapitan Ong Boon Pang was a successful businessman, who made significant contributions to the Chinese community, in the education sector, and the city development of Brunei.

He started from scratch and later became well-to-do. After establishing his career, he summoned his friends to establish the first Chinese school in Brunei. Charitable by nature, he often helped his fellow countrymen to go back to their homeland to visit their parents. He rallied the Chinese in Brunei, who were few in number at that time, to join forces and form the Overseas Chinese Mutual Help Association. He was its president and one who offered his selfless assistance to the local Chinese in practical matters pertaining to their daily lives.

Ong was born in 1882 in the West Residence of Lieyu village, Jinmen (金门) county in the province of Fujian, China. He left Fujian at the age of eighteen and sailed south to Singapore, and then Brunei the following year to seek a livelihood. Brunei then was still undeveloped and sparsely populated, with a total national population of fewer than 20,000 and the Chinese population numbered only a few hundred. There was only one street in the capital city then, with scarce thatch-roofed shops. The majority ethnic group, the Malays, lived in "water villages", which were formed by wooden houses on stilts by the rivers. Pehin Kapitan Ong started his small business from scratch — plying wooden boat along the river in his wooden boat selling merchandise for many years, until he became a familiar face to every household and villager — a Chinese merchant who sold groceries.

After years of striving with tenacity, he finally set up a business, Chop Teck Guan (德源), which dealt in local products. Following that he went into the wholesale and retail businesses, such as distributing imported cigarettes and selling petrol, etc. During the 1930s, the only street in the capital city was always flooded because it was near the river. When the Brunei Government launched the project to fill up the land, Pehin Kapitan Ong was one of the contractors engaged. As a result of this project, he managed to amass a considerable fortune.

As his businesses flourished, Pehin Kapitan Ong opened five shops in all, including Teck Leong Pawnshop, which still exists today. After having been ensconced in firm financial footing, he set up Boon Pang Cinema in 1939, bringing healthy and quality entertainment to the general public. It was destroyed during the Japanese Occupation, rebuilt in 1953, and subsequently demolished in 1960.

There was no Chinese school in Brunei in the early twentieth century. In order to offer Chinese education to Chinese descendants, Pehin Kapitan Ong called on over thirty of his friends to initiate the establishment of a Chinese school, Yu Cai (育才) School (the predecessor of Brunei Chung Hwa Middle School in Bandar Seri Begawan). At the beginning, there was no school building and the cohort of more than twenty students had their classes conducted in makeshift classrooms in a rented shophouse. As the number of students increased, Pehin Kapitan Ong initiated a fund-raising effort in 1937 for the building of a new school. He promised to match each dollar raised by other businesses and this led to more donations pouring in. As a result, a two-storey building named, Chung Hwa School was completed a year later. From then on, the school had permanent premises in Jalan Bendahara.

Pehin Kapitan Ong was the chairman or chief manager of the school from 1918 until 1940 when he passed away after having served the school for a total of twenty-two years. In those days, students came from impoverished homes and were unable to pay their school fees. The charitable Pehin Kapitan, who was passionate about education, would sponsor them with his own money. To put the students' mind at ease and allow them to concentrate on their studies, he would even give away free school uniforms during festive seasons.

The Brunei Government recognized Pehin Kapitan Ong's contribution to the development of the city, and his sponsorship of, and donations to education, and assistance to the poor. The Sultan of Brunei thus conferred on him the title of Chinese Pehin Kapitan (Overseas Chinese leader) and appointed him a member of the State Council of Brunei. He was the first Chinese in Brunei to have received such an honour.

However, as a result of a frugal lifestyle and overexerting himself over a long period of time, Pehin Kapitan Ong was unfortunately stricken with kidney disease. As his children were still young, he drew a will on his death bed entrusting four close relatives to manage his assets until his sons were grown up and able to take over. They were his second wife, Tay Giok Lian, first son-in-law, Pehin Dato Temenggong Lim Cheng Choo (林清注), second son-in-law, Yap Chong Teck , and brother-in-law, Lim Soo Jin. Pehin Kapitan Ong passed away at the age of fifty-eight on 14 January 1940.

His second son, Dato Ong Kim Kee (王金纪), took over his father's businesses. Under the influence of his father, the younger Ong also became a successful businessman, who was charitable and zealously involved in social and public welfare, culture and education, the Brunei Chinese community, and Chinese education.

Ong, Charlson Lim

(1960–)
Writer, Philippines

Born on 6 July 1960, Charlson Ong (王) is a multi-awarded writer who has garnered numerous grants and awards for his fiction, including the Carlos Palanca Memorial Awards for Literature, National Book Award, the Centennial Literary Prize, and the Dr Jose Rizal Award for Excellence in Literature. He has also won prizes from the Philippine Free Press, Graphic, and Asiaweek. He is the recipient of the 2007 Gawad Pambansang Alagad ni Balagtas (Lifetime Achivement Award) from the Unyon ng mga Manunulat sa Pilipinas or Writers Union of the Philippines, which is the biggest organization of writers in the country. The award is given to living Filipino writers who have done outstanding works in any Philippine language, and have contributed to the development and promotion of Philippine literature. Ong was conferred the award for "his eminently distinctive novels and stories edged with satire and mordant humor, piquant in their examination of the Filipino and Chinese cultures merging in the Philippine ethos".

Ong's foray as a "professional" writer started in 1986 when he joined the China Post, an English language daily for expatriate readership that is based in Taipei, Taiwan, where he worked for eight months writing editorials and translating front-page foreign news into English. That same year, he wrote a short story, "Another Country", which won an Asiaweek prize.

In October 1987, Ong left for his first trip to China as an interpreter of the Philippine delegation for the launch of the movie, Lahi sa Lahi, Hari sa Hari (a story about the visit of the sultan of Sulu to China in 1417), a joint China-Philippine production. At the time, his father had just had a second heart attack after a first three years previously. His father was hospitalized and recovered just in time for Ong to feel "secure" about his father's condition and be able to leave for China. After he left, he learned only a week later that his father had had a relapse and was sent to the intenstive cardiac care unit, half conscious. His father died in the hospital at exactly the same time Ong's plane landed in Manila. Ong wrote about this experience in an essay, "China is in the heart".

He has been writing increasingly more since and has been a regular winner of the Free Press Literary Awards, which are given to the Best Short Story, Poem, and Essay published in the Philippine Free Press. Among his winning entries were "Fixing a flat" that clinched first prize in Fiction in 1992, "Conversion" that also took the first prize in Fiction in 1993, and "A Season of Ten Thousand Noses", which received an honorable mention in Fiction in 1994.

After his first Palanca award in 1985, he proceeded to bag more Palanca awards in 1987, 1989, 1990, and 1992. The Carlos Palanca Memorial Awards for Literature is the country's most prestigious and longest running literary contest.

Ong admires authors who write books that inspire. Among them is Vikram Seth, who wrote A Suitable Boy, ably depicting inter- and intrafamily issues and concerns amidst the Hindu-Muslim conflict. His other favourite authors include Saul Bellow, Philip Roth, Bernard Malamud, and Maxine Hong Kingston. Like these writers whose works strongly reflect their cultural heritage and who write with a deep sense of affiliation and sensitivity about their subjects (that is, Jewish Americans/Asian Americans), Ong shows the same characteristics when he writes about Chinese-Filipino themes in his stories and novels. "I write about the experience because it is what I know best and intimately." He knows the Tsinoy experience because it is his experience.

His first novel, An Embarrassment of Riches, was something he wanted to do for the Philippine Centennial Year in 1998. He started writing it around 1993 to 1994 and when a contest was announced it became an added incentive to finish the novel. Ong says it is a consciously political work and was his personal reflection on the Philippine past and future and place in Southeast Asia. It won the 1998 Philippine Centennial Celebration Literary award for novel in English.

The second novel, Banyaga: A Song of War, started out as a screenplay in 2000. Since it was not sold, Ong "novelized" it, prompted by his joining the International Writer's Programme in Iowa in 2002. Ong calls Banyaga his most important work to date. It is based on the family history Ong grew up with and presents the history of the nation in the last 100 years from the point of view of the Chinese-Filipino community. The book won the Juan C. Laya Award for Best Book of Fiction in a Foreign Language at the National Book Awards in September 2007.

From the time he started writing in the early 1980s, Ong has ably managed to lend the distinct Tsinoy voice and sentiment in all his plays, essays, and short stories. In presenting his readers with his "realistic" fiction, he invites them to look, examine, and "feel" the context and milieu of the Chinese-Filipino community from an insider's perspective. He is recognized by peers and the academe alike.

Not content with churning out short stories and novels on his own, he also teaches literature and creative writing at the Department of English and Comparative Literature at the University of the Philippines (UP) in Diliman, and is a fellow of the UP Institute of Creative Writing (ICW). As a teacher, he encourages all his students to write, write, and write.

Ong has joined several writers' workshops here and abroad. He was a fellow of the Japan Foundation from 1994 to 1995, during which time he spent a year at the Sophia University. Similarly, he spent four months in the United States as a fellow at the Iowa International Writers' Program in 2002. In addition to this, Ong has served as co-editor of the Likhaan Book of Poetry and Fiction 1998 and 2000.

Aside from his two novels, he has also published three collections of short fiction — Men of the East and Other Stories (1990 and 1999), Woman of Am-Kaw and Other Stories (1993), and Conversion and Other Fictions (1996).

Ong's latest novel, Blue Angel, White Shadow (2010), is a murder-mystery set in Binondo, Manila's Chinatown. Jayson Vega, a popular book reviewer and blogger reveals that while the ethnicity of Ong's characters does not take center stage in the novel's plot, one can still "easily notice the problematic and complicated matters that inextricably tie and plague Filipino and Chinese societies. The corrupt government and police officials and the shady, illegal dealings of a dog fighting syndicate and men living in a dog-eat-dog world are merely glossed over to give way for characters in search for answers, for readers beguiled by the sweep of a compelling story."

These literary opuses are quite a far cry from his university major. Ong had graduated from the University of the Philippines in 1981 with a bachelor of arts degree in psychology. He first tried his hand in the corporate world, joining State Financing — the biggest non-bank financing house at the time — as a money market broker and stayed for about five months before giving it up. It was not his interest. Ong then turned to his interest as a film buff and joined the alternative cinema section of the Cultural Center of the Philippines. This later became the Experimental Cinema of the Philippines. He was with the group from 1983 to 1986 doing film programming.

From there, he rekindled his passion for writing. As a child in primary school, Ong had enjoyed reading comic books and doing theme writing in class. He often received positive comments from his teachers for his writing and was reading the Manila Times and Free Press literary publications at an early age. He remembers the first novel he read was William Golding's Lord of the Flies. By high school, Ong already knew he wanted to be a writer, and would write "realistic" fiction.

In 1983, Ong tried his hand as a "professional" writer and produced Isang Dakilang Trahedyang Pilipino (A Great Filipino Tragedy), a three-act play that won him third prize at the Cultural Center of the Philippines' Playwriting Contest. It was not a bad start for one considered a beginner.

He next wrote Men of the East, a short story that won him his first Palanca award in 1985. From there, the rest, as they say, is history.

To make his work as realistic as possible, Ong takes inspiration from everything around him. He is the youngest of three boys born to Conrado and Nenita Ong, both Chinese-Filipinos born in Manila. His father was in the hardware business and a kerosene and petroleum trader. His mother, a piano major and teacher, helped run the business. The Ong siblings were raised in the quiet suburb of San Juan and went to Xavier School. They made frequent trips to Chinatown on weekends to visit relatives. These visits proved to be a rich treasure trove of insights, nuances, sentiments, sensibilities, and characterization of Chinese-

Filipinos, used by Ong as a backdrop and as raw materials for his prize-winning fiction.

Ong Chiow Huen

(王超群, Wang Chaoqun, 1942–)
Educationist, community leader, Malaysia

Since 1994, Ong Chiow Huen has been a name closely associated with the United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia (Jiaozong 教总 or 马来西亚华校教师会总会). Jiaozong works closely with its affiliate, the United Chinese School Committees Association of Malaysia (Dongzong 董总 or 马来西亚华校董事联合会总会) to fight for the continuity of Chinese education and a six-year primary school education for the ethnic Chinese community in Malaysia. Jiaozong (formed in 1951) and Dongzong (set up in 1954) then organized the Dong Jiao Zong (董教总) Independent Chinese School Working Committee in 1974 and Chinese Primary School Working Committee in 1994 to oversee the workings and development of Chinese-medium schools.

Ong was born in 1942 in Malacca and has five siblings. His China-born father was educated at the Teachers' Training Institute in China and worked as a teacher in Malaya. Unlike his predecessors in Jiaozong, Ong has been described as a leader in Chinese education, with strong political convictions. According to Ong, he has since his early adulthood, under the influence of his father, demonstrated a strong interest and concern for education and politics. Because of this, he was recruited at the early age of twenty-seven by the board of directors of Zhong Ping Chinese Primary School (中平华小) in Linggi, Seremban, to be school headmaster. This came about when he applied for the post after reading the recruitment advertisement in a newspaper. However, due to his outspoken disposition, he was transferred out of the school in 1970 by the government following a directive issued by the director of the State Education Department. This turned out to be a "blessing in disguise" for Ong. Instead of being demoted, Ong was sent by the director (who happened to be a friend of his) to a bigger school, viz. the Zhenhua Chinese Primary School (振华华小) in Seremban. In his thirty-four years of education service after graduating from the Raja Melewar Teachers' Training Institution in 1963, he worked for only six years as a primary schoolteacher. For the remaining twenty-eight years he held the post of principal in four primary schools, with Chong Hwa Primary Chinese School (中华小学) in Seremban being the last one to which he rendered nineteen years of service as principal, prior to his retirement.

During Ong's service at Jiaozong, there were a number of notable issues which called into question the impartiality of the association and its close affiliation with Dongzong. Ong was implicated in one of the issues as follows:

A fifteen-year controversy has been carried by Chinese papers about "the heavy school bag issue" (see Tan 2006) which involves pupils in general needing to carry two bags (of 5–8 kilograms each) to Chinese primary schools because of the excessive homework given by their teachers. This jeopardized Chinese primary school pupils' balanced educational development. In addition, the run of computer classes and the organization of school trips during the holidays by some Chinese primary schools allegedly led to the collection of excessive fees. Ong has been criticized for remaining silent over the "issues" involving corrupt principals, that is, implying that he sided with principals in their "corrupt" behaviour. However a renowned Chinese educationist, Li Ya'ao (李亚遨), has commented that Ong's stance could be regarded as wise. According to Li, the alleged corrupt behaviour of the Chinese primary school principals had its origins grounded in the bigger political and economic policies of corporatism and privatization introduced by Dr Mahathir in the 1980s. Thus, the emergence of parents and committees of ex-chairmen from numerous schools' Parents Teachers Associations, campaigning in the name of democracy for transparency and quality education in Malaysian Chinese Schools may reflect an era of confusion of thoughts and direction for Chinese education development in Malaysia.

Jiaozong, which had been a close affiliate to Dongzong for the past fifty years (that is, since its inception in 1954), seemed to witness a lack of trust in their relationship in 2006–07. Ong openly expressed his dismay at an announcement made by Dongzong's chairman on the four-point consensus attained in the draft of the mechanism developed for the administrative governance of, and supervisory operation to be implemented, in primary schools. It was an effort undertaken collectively to resolve the alleged issues mentioned above. According to Ong, such a consensus had been worked out closely by the three organizations, namely Dongzong, Jiaozong, and the Union of the school principals, and thus the above announcement made by Dongzong was seen to be most disrespectful.

However, during an interview with this writer, Ong expressed the view that any misunderstanding and conflict that arose during the earlier period would have a positive impact on Chinese school education development in Malaysia. According to him, it was obvious that there would be gradual improvement in the governance of Malaysian Chinese primary school education, which will move from a man-ruled system to one that is governed by rules and regulations.

During the interview, Ong reiterated the importance and power of politics in securing and safeguarding the continuity of a six-year primary school education in Malaysia. He pointed out that as a result of the absence of the three related organizations to oppose government political decisions, both primary and secondary English-medium schools were phased out in Malaysia in the 1970s and 1980s. He also pointed out that similar happening occur were witnessed in countries such as Indonesia, Thailand, and Myanmar, where Chinese education could survive merely as language teaching institutions instead of a wholesome education system run in the ethnic tongue of the Malaysian Chinese community. The continuity of education by Malaysian Chinese schools is thus necessary to safeguard and impart Chinese values and culture to the younger generation.

Ong has expressed no reservations and regret over his dedication to Chinese education development in Malaysia. He is currently holding a number of important positions such as, chairman of Jiaozhong, chairman of Dongjiaozong's Working Committee for National Chinese Primary School Education (董教总全国发展华小工委会主席), vice-chairman of Dongjiaozong's wing for National Chinese Independent School Education (董教总全国华文独中工委会署理主席); and vice-chairman of Centre of Education of Dongjiaozong (董教总教育中心副主席). His contributions to education and society have been acknowledged, as reflected by the various titles conferred on him, especially those by the Yang Di-Pertuan Agong, and the ruler of the state of Negeri Sembilan in Malaysia. These titles are: PJK (Pingat Jasa Kebaktian), PMC (Pingat Masyarakat Cemerlang), PPN (Pingat Pangkuan Negara), and AMN (Ahli Mangku Negara).

However, with globalization and the increasing tendency for Malaysian Chinese parents, especially those in the cities, to pursue an affluent, professional life, he exhorts Malaysian Chinese primary schoolteachers to take up lifelong learning, in particular, to upgrade their academic credentials and professionalism in teaching. He points out that Jiaozong has also drafted plans to emphasize respect for Chinese schoolteachers. This seems to reflect the spirit of the Malaysian contemporary educational policies outlined in the Master Plan for Education Development (Pelan Induk Pembangunan Pendidikan [PIPP]), namely, to enhance teachers' professional status in society.

Ong Chuan Seng

(王泉笙, Wang Quansheng, 1886–1956)
Educator, supporter of Tongmenghui and KMT, Philippines

A loyal follower of Dr Sun Yat Sen, an enthusiastic fighter of the anti-Japanese campaign, and most importantly, a revolutionary educator of the Chinese-Filipino society of his time — this was how Ong was remembered by people whose lives he had touched. He had gone back to China to support the anti-Japanese movement at the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese war, but returned to the Philippines eventually to resume his lifetime project of educating the children of the Chinese immigrants in the Philippines. He was the founder of the prominent Chiang Kai Shek High School.

A native of Hui'an, Fujian Province, China, Ong was born on 15 September 1886. He had his primary education at Xiamen's Gulangyu Xunyuan Academy and proceeded to the Fuzhou Legal and Political Institute upon graduation. Ong was enthusiastically involved in revolutionary activities, joining the Tongmenghui (同盟会, The Alliance Association) of China in 1905. When Yuan Shikai (袁世凯) attempted to revive dynastic rule, Ong coordinated with his compatriots in Fujian and advocated the anti-Yuan campaign. Later, he was sent by Sun Yat Sen (孙中山) to the Philippines to propagate the revolutionary cause and, at the same time, help in the educational endeavour of the Chinese nationalist government.

In 1921, Ong founded the Po Ti School in Benavidez Street in Manila. A reading club was also established, which served as the branch office of the Kuomintang (国民党, KMT) party as well. He was an active member of the KMT, serving in the executive committee of the Luzon Branch of the party, as well as the national party organization in the Philippines, and helping to solicit donations for revolutionary activities. In 1935, he was a delegate to the 5th National Congress of the KMT and was elected a member of its central committee. He was likewise elected later as a member of the executive committee and the highest committee of National Defense.

On 6 June 1939, Ong founded the Chiang Kai Shek High School (now Chiang Kai Shek College, CKSC, 菲律宾中正学院) with the late chairman of the board of trustees, Yu Khe Thai, and other prominent Chinese-community leaders. Founding a new school at that time was fraught with difficulties considering the fact that most of the Chinese in the country at the time were not financially well off. Likewise, discrimination and prejudices against the Chinese abounded and the majority of the Chinese then were low in social and political status. However Ong was able to set up the school by going around houses and shops of the Chinese, soliciting donations, and his determination eventually paid off. His loyalty to the KMT was clearly manifested in his decision to name the new school after then president of the Republic of China — with the permission of Chiang.

While managing the school, he was also twice a delegate of the Nanyang Fund-raising Committee (南洋筹赈总会) in Singapore in 1941, tasked to raise funds to support war efforts against Japan. When the Pacific War was brought to the Philippines the same year, the school was heavily damaged. Fourteen of its teachers and students were martyred for participating in underground activities against the Japanese. Ong then returned to China and engaged himself in the anti-imperialist campaign. In 1942 in Chongqing, he was elected to the legislative council and assigned to Fujian to oversee provincial affairs. He went around to more than forty counties to help the families of overseas Chinese live more stable lives in the midst of political chaos and uncertainties. In 1945, when World War II ended, he was appointed the controller of Fujian and Taiwan. He declined the appointment as he wanted to return to the Philippines to contribute to the education of the country.

Ong returned to the Philippines in November 1945 and was reappointed the Principal of the Chiang Kai Shek High School by the board of trustees, with Pao Shih Tien as deputy principal to assist him. The school reopened in December 1945. Ong, with the support of the Chinese community, worked hard to rehabilitate the school and acquired a new site for it in Tondo, Manila. Its student population was close to 1,000 when the school moved to its new site in August 1948. In the meantime, his ties to China and the KMT remained strong. In 1952, he was elected member of the board of the Kuomintang in Taiwan. Despite these continuing ties with the KMT, Ong believed that serving the Chinese community in the Philippines, especially in the field of education, was paramount. He strongly believed the children of overseas Chinese needed guidance to realize their potentials in their adopted country, and that education was fundamental.

Despite the difficult situation then, especially the very poor socio-economic condition of the Chinese community and the widespread discrimination suffered by many,

Ong persisted. He had high expectations of his students, and being a man of discipline, he expected his students to abide by the rules and regulations. He often compared a disciplined life to obeying traffic signs. According to him, when drivers observe road courtesy and maintain proper road behaviour, there would be fewer problems in life. This was a lesson his students would never forget. He wanted them to develop the moral values of propriety, righteousness, honesty, and a sense of shame. Ong walked his talk. He reflected all the values he advocated, and these were imbibed by the people whose lives he touched. Even when he was seriously ill, his heart was still with the school he founded. Through a teacher, he narrated his last will and testament to the CKSC students: "Grab the opportunity now, for time passes and will never return. Whenever your country calls on you, whenever your people call on you, stand up, take the lead and respond to the call of time." He wanted them to develop life skills to be of service to the country and to make sacrifices for the national interest.

Besides the school, Ong was actively involved in different social projects as well, such as helping the poor Chinese, many of whom were still struggling to recover from the ravages of war. He was held in high regard by the Chinese community, and as a result, people generously responded to his requests for funding for education-related concerns. He was also seen as "the mediator" of disputes in the Chinese community and people came to him to get fair and sound opinions and impartial judgment.

Ong passed away on 16 March 1956. He had served as principal of Chiang Kai Shek High School for seventeen years without pay. According to him, his children were all grown-up and could sufficiently cover his simple daily expenses. He served the school out of his interest and love for education; though thrifty, he was generous in helping students who had financial difficulties often providing them with monetary assistance to finish their education.

Today CKSC is headed by his daughter-in-law, Bee Ching Uy-Ong. The board of trustees chose Uy-Ong to be president not because she is "family", but because she has thirty years of experience in education, both as a teacher and an administrator. She is a renowned educator and was given the Dr Jose Rizal Awards for Excellence in Education in 2003.

Ong Hok Ham

(also spelt Onghokham, 王福涵, Wang Fuhan, 1933–2007)

Historian, public intellectual, Indonesia

Well known for his hedonist lifestyle and numerous press articles, Ong Hok Ham was referred to as a model for Indonesian Chinese. He wrote confidently about Indonesian themes, with an Indonesian voice. He was a public intellectual from the late 1950s, when he wrote on assimilation/integration in Star Weekly, but political and social pressures made life difficult. In 1966 he had a nervous breakdown and was jailed for six months. Study at Yale University restored his confidence and established his reputation as an expert on nineteenth-century Javanese and colonial history. He returned to Indonesia in 1975 for a twenty-six year career as teacher, historian, bon vivant, host, storyteller, and writer in Kompas, Tempo, and Prisma.

Ong was born on 1 May 1933 into a minor branch of the great Peranakan Chinese families of Surabaya, the Han, The, Tjoa, and Tan, all interrelated. The first Han arrived in Central Java around 1700, and then spread from Lasem to East Java, playing a major role in the economic development of that area. From the 1870s there was massive wealth from sugar; these were the sugar barons. The kapitan, letnan, and mayor of Surabaya, Malang, and Pasuruan came from these families.

The most renowned was Han Hoo Tong, a legendary businessman. Ong's mother was Han's granddaughter from a Tan-Han marriage. The Ong lines were more recent. Ong's paternal grandfather had perhaps been a school teacher in Sumenep, with descendants rising socially through thrift, hard work, and education. In the twentieth century what united them was a thorough adoption of Dutch ways. They spoke Dutch at home, used Dutch names (Lies, Piet, Jan, Klaas, Freddy, Olga; Ong was Hans), and made good use of Dutch schools. These families were key elements of the Indies Rijksburgerij. They were part of a Dutch-Peranakan hybrid class, now vanished.

Ong/Hans went to a Dutch school in the final years of Dutch colonialism. His family's leisured and comfortable life was thrown into disarray by the shock of the Japanese Occupation in 1942. The Dutch people, system, education, and language, which had meant so much to them, were thrust to the far periphery. March 1942 was a period of rampok (looting, pillage) targeted primarily at Chinese businesses. The Ong family, however, survived the Japanese Occupation relatively unscathed, although Ong had the shock of seeing a Japanese officer slap his father's face in the street.

Far more shocking was the end of the Japanese Occupation and the proclamation of the Indonesian Republic. For the second time, Ong's family seemed swept along by events for which they had little sympathy, and over which they had no control. The family fled the great battle of Surabaya in November 1945, but returned later when Surabaya became a Dutch town once again for the remainder of the revolution. Hans/Ong went back to his Dutch education after a brief sojourn in the Chinese school system under the Japanese.

By 1950 the Ong family found themselves living in the Indonesian Republic, and having to make decisions about their future. Almost all of Ong's school friends were headed for Holland or America or elsewhere abroad. Ong was inspired by a history teacher, Brother Rosario, who set alight Ong's historical imagination, but also inspired him in "civics" classes, where he urged his students to become good citizens of whatever country they found themselves in. Around 1952 Ong's family resolved to make their future in Indonesia — "after all this is where we were born" — and Ong decided to become an ideal Indonesian citizen. Still, Indonesian was the worst of several languages he knew, and his family sent him to Bandung in 1953–55, to Indonesianize himself at a school there.

In 1955 Ong started studying law at the University of Indonesia in Jakarta, with some thoughts of becoming an Indonesian diplomat. But law bored him and he only persevered in this for about eighteen months. Instead he found work as a research assistant with "Bill" Skinner, a Cornell scholar undertaking a large project on the Chinese in Indonesia. Who better to help Skinner than this serious young Peranakan from a great Surabaya family, with a great interest in history, and the skills for archival research in Dutch? This led in turn to Ong writing on the Chinese in Indonesia for P.K.

Oyong (Auwjang Peng Koen) at Star Weekly in 1958. Like Oyong and his group, Ong became convinced of the need for Indonesian Chinese to "assimilate", rather than, as Baperki urged, to "integrate". He was involved in a polemic with Baperki in 1959–60, and was a signatory to the Assimilation Declaration in 1960, and the Assimilation Charter in 1961.

But unlike other "assimilationists", Ong did not replace his Chinese name with an Indonesian one. Having visited the Philippines in January–July 1959, he took the Philippine route, combining the three words of his name into the single word, Onghokham. He couldn't be bothered to do more — he hated bureaucratic procedures. And, he also thought, "what's in a name?" He had various names. He was Hans to his family, Hok Ham to some friends, and Ong to others. Names were not important to him, compared with the great defining aspects such as: what one talked about, what viewpoint one took in speaking, and the people one mixed with. His great criticism of the Chinese was their isolation from the mainstream. A name change would not fix that by itself. More was needed.

In 1960 Ong returned to the University of Indonesia, to the History Department, his real love. His attention was now turning away from the Chinese in Indonesia to another of his roots — Java. With his American scholar friends, he fell in love with Javanese culture, priyayi and abangan, and frequently visited Javanese towns, cities, courts, and villages. He sought to belong to no fixed group in Jakarta, and tried to mix across a wide social and political spectrum. He was close to Soedjatmoko and his PSI-minded discussion group on the one hand, but was very close on the other to the radical Young Turk nationalists of the GMNI. But his personal stress deepened as Indonesian politics became more ominous, combined with the heavy emotional toll of dealing with his increasingly urgent homosexuality.

The horrors of late 1965, particularly the mass killings in East Java, brought Ong's mental stress to a peak. The Indonesia he had wanted to be a part of seemed to be devouring itself; it seemed to him that there was a vast attack on the abangan culture he loved. From January 1966 he was unstable and erratic, and had a nervous breakdown. He was swept up in thousands of arrests in March, and remained in jail until late September, sitting vacantly, staring into space. His release was secured by his good friend and mentor, historian Nugroho Notosusanto. He left for America in September 1968 after finishing his degree with a monumental thesis on the fall of Dutch colonialism in 1942.

Ong's seven years at Yale University were deeply liberating and empowering. His own problems dwindled in the face of the social ferment in America — black power, women's liberation, gay lib, flower power, counter culture — and everywhere — the issue of Vietnam. He became more relaxed and confident in his sexuality. He learned to cook. Archival research in Holland gave him access to the lifestyles of Europe. By 1975 Ong had completed his dissertation on Madiun in the nineteenth century, and decided confidently to return "home" to Indonesia to embark on a career and a life.

The period from 1976–83 was one of re-establishing himself in Indonesia. He wrote prolifically in the three media that would become his hallmark: the daily Kompas, the weekly Tempo, and the academic Prisma. Two dates stand out. During a fellowship to Singapore in 1979 he became too bored to convert his dissertation into a major book, and spent his time eating and drinking. Building his famous Bali-style and simple deconstructed-pavilions-house in 1983 confirmed that his lifestyle would take priority over a standard academic career. By 1983 (at the age of fifty) he was a Jakarta figure, writing and also written about. He was now happy as an Indonesian in Indonesia, with a self-proclaimed hedonistic lifestyle of dining, hosting, drinking, socializing, and emotional companionship. He was a favourite amongst journalists, foreign correspondents, embassy staff and visiting scholars from many countries. He was famous on campus — a "killer" lecturer, respected and feared. He was also an encyclopaedia of information about Indonesia's past and present, with an extraordinary range of contacts and interests. He mixed easily across all social levels. What you saw was what you got.

His intellectual interests were broad. He wrote on Indonesian history, kings and peasants, traditional Javanese concepts, colonialism, economic history, the role of the Indonesian Chinese, cooking, painting, and sexuality. Some people found him annoying, more found him a source of fascinating ideas. From one perspective he frittered away his intellectual capital on parties, too many interests, and writing for the press rather than major academic works. For the younger critical historians of the twenty-first century, this appears in a much more positive light: a rich tapestry of ideas, a welcome step out of the ivory tower, and into communicating with a broad audience.

After a major stroke in 2001, Ong was confined to a wheelchair until his death on 30 August 2007. This was a sorry spectacle of a lion in a cage. But the period also saw a renewed interest in his works, and the publication of collections of his articles.

(黄家定, Huang Jiading, 1956–)
Political leader, Malaysia

Ong Ka Ting is the seventh elected president of the Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA) and former minister in the Malaysian Government. Following major electoral setbacks suffered by the MCA in the 12th Malaysian general elections in 2008, Ong declined to be included in the new cabinet and did not defend his party president's post held later in the year.

Ong was born on 15 November 1956 in Kota Tampan New Village in Lenggong, Perak, and studied at the Kota Tampan National Type Chinese Primary School and the Dato' Ahmad National Secondary School. He then did his Higher School Certificate at Tunku Abdul Rahman College and attained his bachelor of science (honours) diploma of education degree at the University of Malaya. On graduation, he taught at the Catholic High School in Petaling Jaya which he served between 1981 and 1984.

In 1979, while still at the university, Ong joined the MCA at the encouragement of Tan Koon Swan, a senior leader of the party. He started his party career as a speaker at motivational camps. On 21 October 1990 Ong won the Pontian parliamentary seat in Johor and retained the constituency in the next two general elections. In the March 2004 elections he won the Tanjong Pia seat which was carved out of the former Pontian constituency, and in March 2008, he won the Kulai seat.

In January 1986 he was appointed press secretary to the minister of transport, Datuk Seri Ling Liong Sik. Ong was subsequently promoted to political secretary to Ling. In 1990 he was appointed parliamentary secretary in the Health Ministry and was later moved to the Home Affairs Ministry as parliamentary secretary where he served until May 1995, when he was appointed deputy home affairs minister. In December 1999 he became minister of housing and local government.

Back in 1993 Ong had been returned unopposed as Johor MCA Youth chief, and in July 1996 he had won a national vice-president's post in the party. In May 2003 he was elected MCA president by the party's central committee to succeed Ling Liong Sik who retired. He retained his post as president in August 2005 by defeating Datuk Chua Jui Meng.

When Ong took over as MCA president it marked a shift in generation. Ong belonged not only to a post-war generation, but was one born after the party was founded in 1949. Equally significant, he went through an education that was national in character, with both Chinese and Malay as mediums of instruction. This background enabled him, to identify with the Chinese-educated and traditional associations within the community, to a greater extent than his predecessors who were mostly English-educated.

Ong believes that his childhood background of growing up in poverty in Kota Tampan New Village enabled him to understand the problems and aspirations of the Chinese community. It is a theme he frequently comes back to, such as during his election campaign and in a book of speeches entitled, Ong Ka Ting: The Man and His Idea.

Ong wanted the party to give more attention to education opportunities and to poverty reduction in both New Villages and urban settings. Concerned at the high dropout rate and keen that education should be a continuing process for all age groups, Ong introduced Lifelong Learning as part of the party programme. His portfolio as minister of housing and local government gave him the opportunity and resources to address problems of New Villages.

Ong, as a party member and leader, experienced two major crises in the MCA. The first was the 1983–85 fight between the factions of Tan Koon Swan (see later entry) and Neo Yee Pan while the second was the 2001–03 Ling Liong Sik-Lim Ah Lek power struggle. The first crisis led to the sacking of Tan Koon Swan and several other leaders. Tan's group returned to the party after a peace deal was brokered by Tun Ghafar Baba, the deputy president of UMNO, and Tan won the party president's position in 1986, but was soon afterwards charged by the Singapore authorities over the Pan El issue and replaced by Ling Liong Sik. Ong, who served as press secretary, became closely aligned to Ling. When Ling was challenged later by what was called Team B, led by Lim Ah Lek and Chan Kong Choy, Ong was part of Ling's Team A. When an agreement to end the factional fight was reached in 2003 that led to Ling's retirement, Ong was appointed party president and Chan Kong Choy, deputy president, with the understanding that Chan should eventually take over.

Soon after becoming president, Ong introduced an amendment to the party's constitution limiting office holders to not more than three terms. To him this would reduce debilitating party fights by opening up party positions. Indeed, Ong had declared that he would serve one last term should he win the October 2008 party elections.

Ong led MCA into the elections at a time when the party faced several major problems. A number of its senior leaders were accused of corrupt practices, particularly over Port Klang Free Zone's land acquisition, and of moral indiscretion, and two top party leaders resigned. Furthermore, the party was seen as weak in responding to a number of concerns of the Chinese community, including the incidents during UMNO general assemblies in 2006 and 2007 when UMNO youth leaders displayed an unsheathed kris that was regarded as provocative to non-Malays.

Ong came under strong criticisms for the poor performance of the MCA in the 2008 elections. The party won only fifteen parliament seats compared with thirty-one in the 2004 elections. Critics accused Ong of weak leadership and poor selection of candidates. He also alienated supporters of Ling, who made up the former Team A of which Ong himself was a member. Increasingly he was seen as moving towards the former Team B with which Chan Kong Choy was identified. Ong had also become close to Chan.

Ong accepted responsibility for MCA's poor performance and declined to be included in the new cabinet. He did not stand in the 2008 party elections, but instead, backed the successful candidature of Ong Tee Keat. His brother, Ong Ka Chuan, however, failed to win the deputy president's position.

When new party elections took place following a motion of no confidence in Ong Tee Keat, Ong Ka Ting came out of retirement and contested unsuccessfully for the president's position.

Ong is married to Datin Seri Wendy Chong Siew Mei, and they have a daughter, Li En, and a son, Xing Yang.

Ong Keng Sen

(王景生, Wang Jingsheng, 1964–)
Theatre director, Singapore

Ong Keng Sen is one of Singapore's most important theatre directors and certainly its most globally renowned one. As the artistic director of TheatreWorks International, Ong is recognised primarily for his intercultural style of theatre where different traditional Asian genres and disciplines are harnessed for a contemporary framing of original or classical works. Ong's works have been staged in Asia, Europe and the US, and he is perhaps best known for his groundbreaking Asian-translated trilogy of Shakespeare-inspired works Lear, Desdemona and Search: Hamlet.

Over the years Ong has garnered a string of awards such as the Young Artist Award (1993), the Singapore Youth Award (2000), and the nation's highest cultural honour, the Cultural Medallion Award (2003). Most recently, Ong was awarded the Fukuoka Arts and Culture Prize (2010), the first theatre director and only the third Singaporean (after Tang Da Wu and Dick Lee) to win the award. He is also Adjunct Associate Professor of Theatre Studies at the National University of Singapore (NUS).

Ong graduated from the Faculty of Law, NUS, in 1989. A year before, he joined TheatreWorks, which was founded in 1985, while still at university. Upon graduation he began fulltime work with the theatre company and has been associated with it since. Ong obtained an M.A. in Performance Studies from the Tisch School of the Arts, New York University, in 1994.

A second generation Chinese whose parents immigrated from Xiamen, China, Ong is the youngest of six children born to a businessman father and a housewife mother. His elder brother, Ong Keng Yong, was ASEAN Secretary-General from 2003 to 2007. Ong's interest in interculturalism may be traced back to his childhood. He communicated with parents in broken Henghua dialect, and was taught by his mother to enjoy Chinese opera at an early age, a genre that would echo in his early work (Ong remembers acting out Cantonese soap operas with his siblings). Nevertheless, he was also given a firm Anglophile education. Studying at the Methodist based Anglo Chinese School (ACS), he soon became an active member of the ACS Literary, Drama and Debating Society. Passing through this society were some of Singapore's theatre luminaries, including actor-brothers Lim Kay Tong and Lim Kay Siu, directors Ivan Heng and Glen Goei, and actors Lim Yu Beng and Adrian Pang.

It was this straddling of two different cultural worlds that made him feel both "inside and outside" a culture. He had felt that his parents were from a world that he could never totally be at ease with or understand. Ong recalls, "I was always code switching, like I lived in two different worlds. I went to Methodist schools where we read the New Testament and where a great literature teacher introduced me to the classics. Each day I would go back to our home, with its ancestral altar, and revert to a domestic language, a Chinese dialect I think of as my baby language."

His interest in theatre started young. Ong performed in a school operetta at nine years of age and was involved in a couple of plays a year by the time he was 15. His first stab at serious directing came in 1985 when, at university, he directed Lillian Hellman's The Children's Hour. After passing the bar exam, Ong practised law for all of 10 days, if only just to complete his apprenticeship obligation. The law firm Lee & Lee offered him a job which he turned down for a career in theatre.

Ong embarked on theatre at a crucial point in Singapore's artistic trajectory. By the mid-1980s an English-educated middle class had formed, from which several young pioneering directors such as Alvin Tan, William Teo, and Ong himself, trained in western classics but keenly sensitive to national socio-cultural impulses, emerged to express local stories in distinct registers. According to Ong, "Many theatre companies had as their mission statement the promotion of Singaporean expression through our own plays. TheatreWorks, The Necessary Stage and The Third Stage are some examples. This concern was infectious and spread to the audience as well. The fervour in the theatre coincided with a nationalistic fervour in the late 'eighties.' "

Sharing the mentorship of local theatre doyen Kuo Pao Kun, these artistic directors took different routes. Helming TheatreWorks, Ong desired to take the theatre company away from conventional realism — "still trapped in John Osborne's kitchen sink", as he put it — and move towards a more performance-based and allegorical theatre. "This meant going back to popular entertainment, looking at how we identified with what was on TV, with the black-and-white Cantonese movies that were coming from Hong Kong when we were growing up. It meant going back to melodrama, a genre that resembles a kind of magical realism — a genre where magical things happen". Elsewhere he noted that he was interested in the "process of bastardising Theatre — with a capital T — and impregnating it with popular vaudeville, with melodrama, with storytelling, with Chinese opera".

Ong's constant search for new artistic interpretations and vocabularies led to his establishment of The Flying Circus Project (FCP) in 1994. It was a series of artistic workshops to which different artists from Asia were invited for collaborative work. According to him, "Since the 90s I began to look at myself actively as an Asian, and not just a Singaporean. However it is also exactly because I am Singaporean that I embrace multiple cultures, coexisting and engaging. The hybrid Asian character of Singapore permeates completely into me — speaking English as first language and being ethnically Chinese. I am the product of a new country with a lack of history and the schizophrenia of being at the crossroads of many different influences." The first FCP resulted in the staging of Lear in Tokyo, Osaka and Fukuoka by participants from Japan, Thailand, China, Indonesia. The second FCP in 1998 concluded in the staging of Desdemona by artists from India, Myanmar and Korea while the third FCP in 2000 saw the staging of The Continuum: Beyond the Killing Fields with artists from Cambodia, Japan and Singapore a year later. With these highly stylised and visually layered works he began to develop an oeuvre that became known as 'New Asia' theatre, and soon won critical recognition from the international theatre community.

However, it is also because of such works that Ong became a highly polarising figure who, on the one hand attracted high praise for his visionary ability to synthesise distinctive strands of Asian theatrical traditions, while on the other, drawing criticism for producing esoteric, even inaccessible, art that alienated the public. Such criticisms, nevertheless, are blinkered given that Ong has always complemented his more experimental theatre with mainstream work. He has directed highly popular theatre such as kitsch-driven musicals like Fried Rice Paradise and Beauty World (1991 and 1992 respectively), both in collaboration with songwriter Dick Lee. Ong was also behind the commercially successful Private Parts (1992) and Mixed Signals (1997), both by Michael Chiang; and the iconic Lady of Soul and Her Ultimate 'S' Machine (1992) by Tan Tarn How. Ong's more serious local works often bore the hallmarks of his mentor Kuo Pao Kun. Lao Jiu, staged in 1993 in collaboration with Kuo, was about an aspiring puppeteer, and Descendants of the Eunuch Admiral (written by Kuo) in 1993 was an allegorical piece about Admiral Zhenghe.

Ong is also credited with pioneering a form of theatre called docu-performance which blends theatre with historical documentation and confrontation between the politics of the present and the past. Such works include 1995's Broken Birds, which explored Japanese prostitution in Singapore at the turn of the century, and Workhorse Afloat in 1997, which focused on the Singaporean middle class's reliance on Indian construction workers.

Throughout his artistic career, Ong has been mindful of the way in which local artists are perceived in Singapore. He is critical of the stereotypical ways in which the Singapore artist is seen as either the embodiment of deviance such as homosexuality or as someone who has naively opted out of materialism and capitalism. His relationship with state institutions has not always been smooth either. Along with lingering criticisms for being too artistically esoteric, he has also been accused of being too globally-oriented in his artistic direction instead of accentuating Singaporean identities. He took the opportunity to respond to such accusations in his acceptance speech for the Fukuoka Prize in 2010 where he remarked, "This recognition comes at a time of great irony as my work was recently penalized with a budget cut from the National Arts Council for being too international."

Ong Kim Kee

(王金纪, Wang Jinji, 1931–98)
Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Dato Paduka Ong Kim Kee is a fine example of those in Brunei who inherited their father's businesses and carried these to new heights. He inherited the businesses since the 1950s, painstakingly managed and developed them into a conglomerate known as Teck Guan Co. (德源), with over ten subsidiaries dealing in properties, hotels, and commercial trades. It is one of the top commercial corporations in Brunei.

Ong hailed from the West Residence of Lieyu village, Jinmen (金门) county in the province of Fujian, China. He was born on 24 June 1931 in Brunei, the second son of Brunei community leader Pehin Kapitan Ong Boon Pang (王文邦). He lost his mother at the age of two and his father at the age of nine. For his elementary school education, he went to the Chung Hwa School in the capital of Brunei. This school was built with funds raised by his father and others in the late 30s. After World War II, he went to Singapore to continue his middle school education at the Chinese High School (华侨中学). The man who accompanied him to register at the school at the time was Wee Cho Yaw (黄祖耀), the current chairman of the United Overseas Bank in Singapore. Ong was awarded his junior middle school certificate in 1948, and stayed in the school to continue his senior middle studies. But in 1951, he was forced to terminate his senior middle three education and return to Brunei to take over his father's business.

At the time, Ong's father already had a firm footing in the business, but as Ong was still young and inexperienced, he received the guidance of his brother-in-law, who was married to his eldest sister, Pehin Dato Lim Cheng Choo (林清注), when he took over the helm of Chop Teck Guan, established by his father in 1910. They were in the import and export business, cigarette distributorship, petrol retail, shop rental, and managing the Bong Pang Cinema. With the company's sound foundation plus Ong's innate intelligence, excellent ability, and insights, the various businesses of Chop Teck Guan flourished rapidly. Teck Guan Building was constructed in the eighties when Ong's children returned home after completing their studies abroad. It became the administrative center of Teck Guan Corporation and Dato Ong's office was at the top level, where he worked daily. It now stands proudly in Jalan Sultan, in the capital city, Bandar Seri Begawan.

Besides operating businesses, Ong devoted his efforts to promoting culture and education, as well as Chinese community work. His selfless contribution to two private schools in Brunei — St Andrews School and Chung Hwa Middle School — was manifested in his holding the role of chairman of the board in the two schools for many years and in generous donations to the schools.

To service the Chinese community, he offered his time and monetary contributions to The Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Bandar Seri Begawan. He held long-term important positions on its board and helped propel Chinese merchants onto the international platform, as well as improve commerce between Brunei and other countries. He was conferred the title of "Dato Paduka" by the Sultan of Brunei in 1974, in recognition of his contributions towards society and the country.

During the early 1990s, as president of the Chamber of Commerce, he conceived the idea of raising funds for a new building and spearheaded donations by contributing a huge sum of money to the fund; the response to the fund-raising effort was tremendous and the new building was completed in 1992 under his stewardship.

Since the 1950s, Ong had been involved in education, especially towards the development of St Andrew's School and Chung Hwa Middle School. He held the position of chairman of the board of St Andrew's School for over thirty years, working untiringly for the good of the school. At the beginning of the 1980s, he donated $150,000 to the construction of Chung Hwa Middle School's administrative block and staff dormitory. One of its teachers hostels was named "Dato Ong Kim Kee" to commemorate his generous contribution.

At the beginning of the 1990s, he organized a large fund-raising dinner with other members of the council to raise funds for the building of the Chamber of Commerce, Bandar Seri Begawan. He took the lead and made an impromptu donation of $500,000 which set off a domino effect — that night, the total amount donated was $1,530,000, which broke the record of any fund-raising efforts made by the Chinese community in a single event. And the Ong's wish for the Chamber of Commerce to have its own building was fulfilled in 1992. He continued as president for two more years, and from 1995 until his death in 1998, he held the position of honorary president cum adviser.

Besides providing his service to Chinese private schools and the community, Ong also participated enthusiastically in the nation's celebration activities. As an accomplished businessman with outstanding leadership, he was invited to be chairman of the Committee of Chinese Community for the sultan's birthday celebrations in 1996 and 1997, and was responsible for the planning and arrangements of the celebratory activities.

Ong was also a devout Christian. Besides contributing to culture, education, and the community, he also offered his help to members of different social strata, including the impoverished and the sick. He maintained a low profile and his philanthropic acts were never propagated.

Ill health was perhaps the only thing Ong regretted about his life. Kidney failure had confined him to the dialysis machine from the 1970s and though he had a successful kidney transplant in Australia in the 80s, he again succumbed to illness in 1997 and passed away in February 1998.

He is survived by his wife, Doris Kong Siuk Yin, three sons and one daughter.

Ong, Lawrence Dy

(王名愉, Wang Mingyu, 1956–2001)
Social activist, community leader, Philippines

Lawrence Dy Ong embodies volunteerism. He had lived his life not for himself, but for the people he served. He has since become the benchmark of what a volunteer ought to be. Throughout his life as a volunteer, he organized over a hundred peer support groups, counselled more than a thousand young Indochinese (including Vietnamese, Cambodian & Laotian) refugees, empowered indigenous peoples, and pushed the volunteerism movement in the country forward.

Born on 17 October 1956 the third of seven siblings, Lawrence Dy Ong defied the Chinese tradition of following in the footsteps of his parents. Business is the common line of profession or work for Tsinoys (Chinese-Filipinos), but Ong chose social development work right after finishing university.

He called himself a "Tsinoy subversive" meaning an agent for change, which he embodied in his whole life by serving others. The metaphor, "a human bridge" is used to describe him because he advocated the integration of the Chinese into mainstream Philippine society and was a very vocal anti-poverty crusader. He proved that volunteerism and the undying desire to help others can make an enormous difference in the lives of many people.

Volunteerism had become, not just a special interest for Ong, but a career. In his writings, he revealed, "perhaps it was time to stop serving the rich who keep getting richer and instead, start serving the poor and the weak that they may not get poorer and weaker".

His father did not approve of Ong's volunteer work because it could hamper his health, endanger his safety, and according to Ong, "be kidnapped to which he [the elder Ong] had no money to pay for ransom". (Editor's note: Kidnapping incidents, where victims were almost always Chinese Filipinos, became common beginning of the 1990s, and reached its height at the end of the 1990s.)

Ong sacrificed a lot when he chose the path to leave the comforts of his own home and be separated from his family so as to help the underprivileged, and be active in social outreach projects. His closest sibling, Jocelyn, noted that, "we are humbled that in our bloodline, we have a 'man for others' who unselfishly placed other people's need before his own". Lawrence Ong believed and proved in his life that giving enriches the self.

In an unfinished autobiography, he wrote about social consciousness and his own awareness of being poor. "I did not understand the meaning of poverty then. I only knew how to complain for not being like my richer classmates. I was ashamed to be a poor boy who dared not invite his classmates who lived in mansions to come and visit the rundown house which my family had called home."

After university, Ong became a volunteer for the Jesuit Volunteers of the Philippines (JVP), joining its second batch. In May 1981, he was assigned to do social work in Sapak Farms in Compostela, Cebu. Sapak is a rehabilitation centre for juvenile delinquents.

His JVP experience opened for him other opportunities he never realized he could possibly do. As he testified, "JVP widened my horizon and pushed me out to the world."

Over the next few years, he became known for being thorough in planning outreach projects for the poor and youth, including finishing tedious bureaucratic paper work. He developed activities, materials, and curriculum for the ABC (adventure-based counselling) programme of the Preparation for American Secondary Schools of the International Catholic Migration Commission at the Philippine Refugee Processing Center in Morong, Bataan, from August 1989–March 1993. He also served as a counsellor and mentor for refugees seeking asylum in the Philippines.

Ong joined Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran in 1995 and found a venue that fully supported his ideals and advocacies. Despite it being a struggle to help the poor live a better life and to awaken the social awareness of Tsinoys in the Philippines, Ong never complained. The more people began to share in his vision and work, the more he got motivated and inspired to fulfil his plan of action.

One of Ong's dreams is for Tsinoys to be involved in social development work. He believed that there are Tsinoys who want to run for public office or get involved in social development projects, but are hindered due to lack of resources. Ong likens social development work to "building the bridge right in the areas where these are needed most by many people. Integration will not just be lip service. We'll not only be providing material resources, we'll also be sending manpower".

He believed that the integration of the Chinese into mainstream Philippine society is not just for one person, but for all members of the Chinese-Filipino community. "It is for both the young and the old. But it is the young who should take the initiative and assume the greater responsibility." He said that the younger generation must assist the older ones "face, accept and adapt to changing Philippine and global realities. They should build bridges and be bridges not only between and among cultures, but also between and among generations".

Ong stressed that integration is involvement. Before one gets involved in something, immersion must take place. Immersion is a means of exposing the self to the realities of life that can nurture one's self and from which one learns how to take care and show concern for others. "Immersion without moving toward involvement is meaningless and that awareness without advancing toward action is useless," said Ong.

These ideals were carried out in his work as vice-president for development of Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran. He motivated volunteers by example. The word, volunteerism, took on a new depth in meaning. Where people used to volunteer only when they had free time, Ong took volunteerism to a higher level. To him, volunteering is a commitment much like that which one gives to a job. Serving is not done because one has nothing else to do. The poor and marginalized need help, and they need it on a constant basis.

As well, Ong brought to the fore the form of "help" that should be extended to the poor. Non-profit organizations know that it is best to equip the marginalized with skills and knowledge so they can help themselves. Instead of donating food to the Aeta community in Bataan, Ong sourced donations for a water buffalo for the community to use on their farms. Such are the types of projects that Ong initiated and which the Kaisa continues to emulate.

Ong's ultimate goal, which his family and Kaisa undertook on his death, was to aid social development workers such as himself. Throughout his years of work in urban and rural poor communities, he found that social workers themselves were in much need of help themselves. Their own families sometimes do not have enough money to eat three times a day. Their homes are sometimes as decrepit as those they try to help.

The Lawrence Trust Fund for Volunteer Workers was set up using Ong's life savings, as well as donations from his schoolmates from Xavier School. Each year, a hard-working volunteer worker is given a cash reward to be used at the volunteer's discretion. In Ong's vision, he wanted social development workers to have personal money in their pockets so they can continue to serve their communities freely. But, true to the spirit of volunteerism that Ong espoused, all the awardees have thus far put their reward money into their community service.

Sam Walter, a close friend and co-worker in their ABC Program which later became Adventure-Based Counseling, Inc., their group's corporate name, always called Ong "the great leader". True to Ong's humble nature, he disliked being called such and maintained the lowest profile possible, despite holding leadership positions in various non-profit organizations and projects.

In his short but fruitful life, Ong had contributed a great deal to the Chinese-Filipino communities and serving the poor. He defied many misconceptions, traditions, and stereotypes, choosing to serve others more than attending to his own needs because he had always envisioned that social change could happen. He was the kind of Tsinoy who only had the best interests of his people and made sincere efforts on their behalf without expecting any reward or recognition — truly a genuine man for others.

He could have done so much more had he lived longer. A prototype of a book on Lawrence Ong, Bridge-Builder in Our Midst (2001), containing articles and essays written by him and others who wrote about him, was shown to Ong three days before he died. Humble as he was, his only words were, "I do not deserve this." Ong passed away on 13 July 2001 of liver cancer. He was forty-four.

Ong, Omar Yoke Lin

(翁毓麟, Weng Yulin, 1917–2010)
Political leader, diplomat, Malaysia

Ong Yoke Lin was born on 23 July 1917, and attended the Pudu Girls' English School, and later the Victoria Institution (VI) in Kuala Lumpur. His contemporaries in school were Dato Yahya bin Dato Abdul Razak, Yacob Latiff, and Singapore's Lee Siew Choh.

Ong passed the London University Matriculation in 1935 and trained as a chartered accountant. He had intended to read law, but his studies were disrupted by World War Two. After the war he started a business which became Syarikat Ong Yoke Lin Berhad, the main distributor of Carrier air-conditioners. Over the years, his business grew and he entered into other ventures. One of these, OYL Industries Sdn. Bhd., was subsequently listed on the Kuala Lumpur Stock Exchange. In later years he held positions in many corporations, some of which he had significant shares in. He was chairman of the board of directors of Maju Jaya Industries Sdn. Bhd., Syarikat Ong Yoke Lin Sdn. Bhd., Kemuncak Sdn. Bhd., OYL Industries Sdn. Bhd., Raza Sdn. Bhd., and Malayan Flour Mill Bhd. He was also chairman of the board of directors of Asian International Merchant Bankers Bhd.

Ong was one of the founding members of the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) in 1949. In 1955 he became chairman of Selangor MCA when, with the backing of Tan Siew Sin, he defeated the incumbent, Lee Hau Shik. He retained the position in party elections in 1957. Ong and Tan belonged to the MCA faction which was trusted by Tunku Abdul Rahman, the leader then of UMNO. In the 1959 MCA-UMNO dispute, Tunku knew that he could rely on the Ong-Tan faction against Lim Chong Eu, who was then MCA president. When Lim was forced to leave the MCA, the Ong-Tan faction dominated the party and Ong became a vice-president of the MCA.

Ong played an important part in the forging of the UMNO-MCA alliance to contest the first Kuala Lumpur municipal elections in early 1952. This was when he brought Dato Yahya bin Dato Razak, a former classmate in Victoria Institution and then chairman of UMNO Selangor, to meet Lee Hau Shik, chairman of Selangor MCA. In the meeting Lee and Dato Yahya agreed to field a single slate of candidates against those of the Independence of Malaya Party (IMP). The IMP under Dato Onn Jaafar had been favoured to win the elections. In the end the alliance candidates won nine of the twelve seats contested. This victory encouraged the alliance to form a national-based and more formalized Alliance Party which today is the Barisan Nasional. Later, Ong was made a member of the Alliance National Executive Committee, a position he held from 1952 until 1962.

In the historic 1952 Kuala Lumpur municipal elections Ong stood in the Petaling ward which he won and retained in 1954. He became the majority leader in the Kuala Lumpur municipal council and in 1954 was nominated to the Selangor state legislative council and the federal legislative council. In the first federal elections in August 1955 Ong contested successfully in the Kuala Lumpur Barat constituency. He was fielded as a candidate again in the 1959 federal elections and won the Ulu Selangor constituency.

In 1955, following Alliance's sweep of the federal elections and the forming of the first pre-independence cabinet, Ong was appointed minister for post and telecommunications. In a reshuffle the following year he was made minister for transport. Ong became minister of labour and social welfare in the first cabinet after independence and in 1959 was made minister of health and welfare.

Then in June 1962, Ong left to become ambassador to the United States and concurrent permanent representative to the United Nations. It was a critical period for Ong to be in the United Nations as Malaysia was embroiled in the Konfrontasi conflict with Indonesia, and the Sabah dispute with the Philippines.

While in the United States, he was appointed Malaysia's first high commissioner to Canada in 1966 and the following year, became Malaysia's first ambassador to Brazil concurrently. In the ten years he was away on ambassadorial duties, Ong enjoyed the status of minister without portfolio.

He ended his diplomatic career in November 1972 and in February the following year, was appointed to the Malaysian Senate where he was elected president. He held the position until December 1980.

Ong played a major role in the independence movement of Malaya and in the formation of Malaysia. He took part in 1955 in drawing up the Alliance Manifesto for the first federal elections and in the drafting of the Alliance submission to the Reid Constitutional Commission. In April 1957, he was a member of the Alliance Party's delegation to London to finalize constitutional and other arrangements for the transfer of power from London to Kuala Lumpur.

When the proposal for forming Malaysia was made in 1961, Ong led a Malayan delegation to a meeting in Kuching of the Solidarity Consultative Committee, which included representatives from Sabah and Sarawak, to discuss transitional details. In September 1963 he was one of the signatories of the agreement establishing Malaysia.

As a senior member of the Malaysian Government, Ong led or was part of many delegations to overseas conferences and held elected posts in international organizations. As minister of labour and social welfare he led the Malayan delegation to the 4th Asian Regional Conference of the International Labour Organization (ILO) in New Delhi in November 1957 and in June the following year headed the Malayan delegation to the 42nd session of the International Labour Conference in Geneva. In May 1960 he led a delegation to the World Health Assembly in Geneva and in 1961 was elected vice-chairman of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Ong was active in various social and public organizations. During the Malayan Emergency (1948–60), he was chief officer of the Kuala Lumpur Home Guards. Later, between 1959 and 1962, he was chairman of the Malaysian Red Crescent Society, as well as the St John's Ambulance Brigade. In 1991 he became president of the Malaysian Heart Foundation. He was also active in the Malaysian Muslim Welfare Organisation (Perkim) of which he was vice-president.

Ong passed away at the age of ninety-three on 1 July 2010 and was buried at the Heroes' Tomb (Makam Pahlawan) in the National Mosque in Kuala Lumpur.

In his lifetime, Ong received many awards from the Malaysian and overseas governments. He was conferred the Pingat Mangku Negara in 1959, which carries the title "Tan Sri", and in 1979 received the nation's highest award, the Seri Setia Mahkota, which comes with the title "Tun".

Ong converted to Islam in 1961. He was married to Toh Puan Datuk Hajjah Dr Aishah Ong and they have two sons: Abdul Rahim Ong and Ariffin Omar Ong.

Ong Pang Boon

(王邦文, Wang Bangwen, 1929–)

Politician, member of parliament, cabinet minister, Singapore

Ong Pang Boon was a member of parliament for the Telok Ayer constituency from 1959 to 1984 and a cabinet minister of home affairs (1959–63), education (1963–70), labour (1970–81), environment (1981–84), and communications (1983–84). Beginning his political career as the organizing secretary of the People's Action Party (PAP) in 1956, he rose to become the party's assistant secretary general in 1963 and held that post until 1981 when he relinquished it and became the first vice-chairman. He left the cabinet in 1984, retired from politics in 1988, and served as a director in the Hong Leong business group from 1985 to 2005. His political career is best symbolized by his role as a bridge between the Chinese-speaking community and the predominantly English-educated PAP leadership, as well as in embedding the bilingual policy of learning Mandarin in the school curriculum as a compulsory examination subject.

Ong's grandfather and father had migrated from China to British Malaya and he was born in Kuala Lumpur on 28 March 1929. He began his education in Chinese-medium schools, attending the Ming Chung Public School (1935–38) and the Confucian Middle School (1939–41). He switched language stream after the Japanese Occupation to study at the Methodist Boys' School (1947–49) in Kuala Lumpur and later joined the University of Malaya in Singapore (1950–54), graduating with a Bachelor of Arts honours degree in geography. It was this bilingual background which facilitated his later role as a PAP political vanguard who could connect with the Chinese-speaking community.

His political awakening was triggered by the brutalities of the Japanese Occupation, but blossomed during the post-war Malayan Union controversy when he attended political rallies and read politicized news reports. At the University of Malaya, he kept company with a number of prominent student activists and became the treasurer of the University Socialist Club. During the Fajar trials, he was active in raising funds for the accused students, and was a witness for the defence, in the course of which he was introduced to lawyer Lee Kuan Yew. Eventually he was persuaded by some members of the club to join the PAP in 1955.

During the 1955 general elections, he took the plunge by becoming Lee's election agent in the Tanjong Pagar constituency. In 1956, he resigned from his job at the Federal and Colonial Building Society, took a hefty pay cut, and was appointed the full-time organizing secretary of the PAP to manage the activities of party branches. He was elected as a councillor and appointed deputy mayor of the city council from December 1957 to April 1959. He entered the legislative assembly as a member for Telok Ayer constituency through the 1959 general elections, a parliamentary seat which he defended until 1988.

After the PAP's electoral victory and Singapore's attainment of self-government in 1959, Ong became the minister of home affairs and immediately spearheaded a PAP campaign against "yellow culture", withdrawing permits for some publications and striptease shows, and cracking down on prostitution, gambling dens, jukeboxes, and secret societies. After the PAP leftists had split from the party and fought against the merger to form Malaysia, Ong emerged at the forefront of denouncing his former comrades as treacherous communists who were out to wreck national security. He ordered the disbandment of public meetings held by trade unions to discuss the merger bill. His home affairs portfolio also made him one of the three Singapore representatives in the Internal Security Council based in Kuala Lumpur, the other two being Lee Kuan Yew and Goh Keng Swee. It was under the auspices of this council that Operation Cold Store was launched in February 1963 to detain without trial many key Barisan Sosialis leaders, thus emasculating the political opposition and changing permanently the political landscape of Singapore. Years later, Ong confessed that it was an unpleasant task to sign detention orders against people he knew, but he claimed collective responsibility.

In the cabinet reshuffle after the September 1963 general elections, Ong became the minister of education, a post he held until 1970. At the time, one of the government's priorities was to reorganize Nanyang University. About half a year after the government had struck a six-point agreement through the Nantah Liaison Committee, Ong invited Wang Gungwu to head a curriculum review committee in January 1965, and spelt out in a speech at the sixth Nantah convocation in March 1965 that its degrees would only be recognized after the university had completed ridding the campus of anti-national, communist elements, and revamping the curriculum and teaching standards. However, this round of university reform was aborted amidst the political storm unleashed by the publication of the Wang Gungwu Report in September 1965.

Apart from Nantah, he played a key role in forging the PAP's controversial second language policy by laying down the requirement in 1965 that all students take a second language, and making second language a compulsory examination subject from 1968. On his eventual departure from cabinet, Lee Kuan Yew praised him for having carried out the politically difficult task of putting in place PAP's policy on bilingualism, premised on English as the first language and a mother tongue as the second. As the education minister, Ong also repeatedly emphasized the importance of technical education and the need to change people's attitude towards blue-collar jobs.

Ong was appointed minister of labour in 1971, and later made minister of the environment in 1981. During these years when the threat of leftism in Singapore had receded and the global hippie movement and anti-Vietnam War protests had peaked, he became a cultural gatekeeper, expressing concern about decadent Westernization while supporting Asian values. Insistence on the teaching of Mandarin as a second language in English schools was to him an important measure in providing a Chinese cultural shield against the perceived Western drug-taking culture. In launching the annual Speak Mandarin Campaign in 1983, he made a passionate appeal to improve the standard of Chinese and remove all obstacles and discrimination against its learning. He contended that the essence of the PAP's bilingual policy was to enable Singaporeans to preserve their cultural roots through knowledge of their mother tongue. He spoke as a veteran political leader who had lived through turbulent times and was infused with the traditional cultural attributes of selflessness, dedication and discipline, and thus in a position to dictate and pass on lessons he had learned to the younger generation.

Ironically, given Lee Kuan Yew's obsession with the rejuvenation of party leadership, Ong had come under threat of being rendered obsolete and replaced by the young. Lee launched his crusade of party renewal barely five years after the birth of the republic. In 1970 he dispatched Ong for a year of sabbatical leave so that he could try out some new leaders. At the 1971 National Day Rally, Lee signalled that Ong would only be a transitory bridge in leadership and would not get to succeed him. In 1980, Lee made his passing-the-baton speech at the PAP's 25th anniversary rally, laying out his second line of leadership. Ong was asked to leave the cabinet in 1984 and he ended his backbencher life in 1988. By then, the entire first-generation PAP leaders with ministerial experience had stepped down, with the exception of Lee who stayed on first as the prime minister, and later as senior minister, and subsequently minister mentor.

The phasing out of Ong had been unmistakable. When he returned from his sabbatical leave in 1971, he was put in charge of the less important labour portfolio. In 1981, he was pushed further away into the ministry of environment. As he later hinted, the centre of gravity for labour affairs even in the 1970s was less with the ministry of labour and more with Devan Nair, who was then in charge of the National Trades Union Congress. It was Lee and Nair who executed a separate exercise in labour union leadership renewal, with Ong hardly in the picture. When the closure of Nanyang University took place in 1980, Ong was said to have harboured objections, but he was apparently neither formally consulted nor involved. Lee would later single out his own separate pool of Nantah graduate members of parliament for giving him the political support, without mentioning Ong.

Confronted by such marginalization, Ong openly voiced his unhappiness and criticized the policies of the incoming second-generation PAP cabinet leaders. He fired his first salvo in October 1980 at a 25th anniversary dinner of the PAP's Bukit Panjang branch, during which the most promising of PAP's second-generation leaders, Goh Chok Tong and Tony Tan, were present. He condemned Singapore society as a parvenu society in which the unsuccessful were forgotten and neglected, and political old guards on retirement regarded as losers, with their contributions buried and forgotten. In August 1984, he registered displeasure against the arbitrary appointment of political successors because he believed they would fail in the absence of grass roots support. He also warned that successive generations of monarchs in China had promoted aspects of Confucianism that were advantageous to their feudal rule and he praised the democratic one-man-one-vote system of the West as being the best suited for multiracial Singapore. He urged Singaporeans to articulate their opinions courageously and point out mistakes in the government so that those in power would serve the people and the nation and not abuse the power entrusted to them. Therefore, towards the end of his political life, he appeared to have come full circle by embracing the discourse of Western liberal democracy as a bulwark against traditional Confucian authoritarianism.

Lee Kuan Yew acknowledged Ong's displeasure in his December 1984 public letter of appreciation by taking note of the latter's misgivings over the method and speed of leadership self-renewal, and the impact this was having on the morale of the PAP old guard. In 1990, two years after his complete departure from the political arena, Ong was awarded the Order of Nila Utama (First Class), the third most important national honour, in recognition of all his contributions.

Ong Pang Boon is married to Chan Choy Siong and they have one son and two daughters.

Ong Poh Lim

(王保林, Wang Baolin, 1923–2003)
Badminton champion, Singapore and Malaysia

Ong Poh Lim, a badminton giant who played in Singapore immediately after the Second World War, was a sparkling talent who helped to embellish a golden age of sport. Together with Wong Peng Soon, a multiple All England champion, Ong was in the forefront of Malaya's dominance of the Thomas Cup. He featured strongly in three successful campaigns in 1949, 1952, and 1955. Ong was the only Malayan player to win all his matches at these tournaments, playing singles in 1949, and both singles and doubles in the later tournaments. Best known as a formidable doubles player, he was also capable of beating anyone at singles, and was credited as well with inventing and perfecting the backhand flick serve known as the "crocodile serve", a tactic now routinely used in doubles contests.

Born in Sarawak in 1923, Ong had visited Singapore looking for the opportunity to improve his attacking game in 1940. He was the singles and doubles champion of Sarawak at the age of sixteen and brimming with confidence. The following year, when Wong Peng Soon successfully defended his Malaya national title, Ong won the Leong Sim Nam Plate trophy for first round losers. He was on his way to success.

Eight months after the war, he returned to Singapore and, in 1947, the twenty-four year old Ong was selected to represent Singapore in the Malayan Championships in both singles and doubles matches. He was seen as a player who had shown remarkable improvement and was a candidate for representation in the new international competition to be inaugurated in England in 1949 — the Thomas Cup.

Ong played for Fraser and Neave, the strongest commercial house team in 1947 and also represented, first, the Marigold Badminton party, and then later the Bournemouth Badminton party. By October 1947 he was a leading contender for the Singapore Open title — Wong Peng Soon's most serious rival. Although he was unable to overcome his more experienced opponent, he found himself ranked number two nationally. In February 1948 Ong played the finest game of his blossoming career when he defeated Wong in the Marrieds vs Singles competition at the Clerical Union Hall in Rangoon Road.

A persistent knee injury hampered his progress, but he found himself in the squad that would make sporting history at the beginning of the following year. In May a team was sent to the China National Games in Shanghai and swept the board taking all the singles games. Trial matches for the Thomas Cup between the north and south of Malaya revealed that Ong's speed around the court had not diminished.

Once in the United Kingdom, Ong did not play in the first rounds of the Thomas Cup. He was sent to Balmoral in Belfast, where he won his first badminton title when he beat Selangor's Lim Kee Fong in the All-Ireland Open men's singles. When Wong Peng Soon was injured prior to the Thomas Cup final against Denmark in Preston, Ong was brought in as third singles, winning his game comfortably against Poul Holm, and helping to secure a famous victory. Back in Singapore, the news immediately prompted the Legislative Council to initiate plans to construct a purpose built badminton hall, one required for the defence of the Cup in 1952.

Ong did not make many headlines with his singles play in 1949 and 1950, a period when Wong Peng Soon was the dominant force, but he did establish himself as an exceptional doubles player. He won his first colony title partnering L.M. Pennefather in 1949 in a mixed doubles match. Later in the year he established a most famous badminton doubles partnership with Ismail bin Marjan. Together they were Malaya and Singapore champions. In 1951, after struggling to raise enough money to pay for their passage, they made their entry into the All-England Championships — the premier badminton event dating back to 1899. The doubles pair was able to follow Wong Peng Soon to England, where they quickly impressed critics by winning a lead-up tournament in Surrey. In the All-England Championships themselves, Ong and Marjan emerged runners-up behind the Choong brothers, Eddy and David. The singles title narrowly eluded Ong, who could not overcome Wong Peng Soon in the final — going down 15-18, 18-14, 15-7.

Together with Marjan, he won the French title in April and also gained revenge against Wong by taking the singles. After returning home a crisis developed over claims that the three players (and also Cheong Hock Leng) had contravened regulations governing their amateur status. The group refused to provide financial statements and challenged Lim Chuan Geok, the president of the SBA, calling his style of leadership dictatorial. They were suspended "indefinitely", but two days later the ban was lifted after intervention by Malcolm Macdonald, the governor general of Malaya.

Some observers considered the Ong and Marjan team to be invincible. At one time they swept the Singapore Open titles for four consecutive years. Their partnership helped Malaya retain the Thomas Cup in 1952, but not at the new hall which was too slippery. As the defending champion, Malaya had been seeded straight into the final to play the winners of the inter-zone semi-finals and final. India defeated Denmark and then lost to the United States which became Malaya's challengers at the Happy World stadium. It was Ong and Marjan who gave Malaya a secure 3-1 lead on the first evening, dropping only 9 points to Mitchell and Loveday, the American pair. It fell to Ong himself to deliver the killer blow by defeating Williams and thus earning the decisive fifth point the following day. The final match score was 7-2.

In 1952 Ong was voted Sportsman of the Year, securing more than half the votes cast by readers of the Singapore Free Press. He was a regular representative for Singapore in the Interstate Foong Seong Cup and won numerous national and international titles. He held the Singapore Open singles title four times (1952–55), taking the title in 1953 in a match against Omar Ibrahim that lasted only 15 minutes. Ong held the doubles title seven times (1950–56). He made history by sweeping the singles, doubles, and mixed doubles titles over three consecutive years, from 1952 to 1954.

He was a winning doubles finalist at the All-England Championships partnering Ooi Teik Hock of Penang in 1954, and this success heralded a series of invitations to play exhibitions around the world. In the second defence of the Thomas Cup staged at the Singapore Badminton Hall in Guillemard Road in 1955, Ong played doubles with Ooi. He scored the championship point for Malaya when he defeated Ole Jensen in the singles. An ankle injury in June 1955 temporarily halted his run of successes, but he still played in the All-England championships in 1956. Ong retired from top-level badminton after 1958, keeping mostly to the veterans' circuit and exhibition games. However, he played such an impressive doubles game with George Yap in the 1960 Malayan Open that he was selected to be part of the Thomas Cup squad for the following year. He was thirty-eight years old at the time.

Although still competitively active, Ong turned his attention to coaching. In November 1962 he was offered a lucrative coaching role in the Philippines. After Singapore's independence in 1965, Minister of Education Ong Pang Boon appealed for former champions to dedicate time to coaching the new generation. He obliged by combining local duties with international stints around the world. Ong was inducted into the Singapore Sports Council (SSC) Sports Museum Hall of Fame in 1986. In 1997 he received a Meritorious Service Award from the International Badminton Federation for his significant contributions to the sport. He was inducted into the World Badminton Hall of Fame in 1998, and the Olympic Council of Malaysia's Hall of Fame in 2004. Ong Poh Lin passed away in April 2003.

Ong Soon Hock

(王顺福, Wang Shunfu, 1934–)
Scientist, Malaysia

Ong Soon Hock was born on 18 September 1934 in Malacca. He has been associated with research in the chemistry of free radicals, which culminated in the publication of an academic book entitled, The Chemistry of Free Radicals. Free radicals are now known to implicate human health and diseases including the ageing process. He was also known both locally and internationally for his work on palm oil, particularly for his efforts in countering the anti-palm oil campaign conducted in the United States of America. This effort resulted in the American Soybean Association calling for a truce in 1989. Besides his contributions to the advancement of the chemistry of free radicals and applications of scientific research for the Malaysian palm oil industry, he has also been instrumental in creating awareness of intellectual property and in the promotion of inventiveness among Malaysians at all levels.

Dr Ong comes from a humble background and was an orphan at an early age. He grew up with his paternal grandmother in a small rubber plantation in Malacca. Later he was admitted to St Francis' Institution, a boarding school in Malacca, and completed his pre-university education at St John's Institution, Kuala Lumpur. He benefited much from his education in these schools and went to the University of Malaya (UM) in 1954, from which he graduated with first class honours in chemistry. He won the memorial gold medal in chemistry in 1958 on the recommendation of Lord Todd, the Nobel Laureate in Chemistry, University of Cambridge, who was the external examiner. Then he pursued his post-graduate research at the University of London's King's College under the supervision of Professor D.H. Hey FRS, a pioneer in free radical chemistry, and Dr J.I.G. Cadogan, now known as Sir John Cadogan. He continued his postgraduate training at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) as a Fulbright-Hays fellow. A few years later, he spent a year at the Dyson Perrins Laboratory, University of Oxford, as a visiting professor working in collaboration with Professor W.A. Waters FRS, another pioneer in free radical chemistry.

At an early age, Dr Ong was fascinated with how things work in nature. In fact, in his first essay on ambition, he had wanted to be a scientific farmer. It is this fascination with science that led him to study chemistry, physics, and mathematics, although this was not a popular combination, due to the heavy load in practical work. His urge to understand chemical reactions resulted in him spending a few years of free radical research under the guidance of Professor Rayson Huang. He was a member of the professor's research team and co-authored with Professor Huang and Dr S.H. Goh the book entitled, The Chemistry of Free Radicals.

After publication of this volume, he decided to focus on the chemistry and technology of palm oil, in view of its relevance to Malaysia. His venture into this new area proved highly fruitful. His research was rewarded with fourteen patents, including the technology of producing palm biodiesel and tocotrienols, a new potent anti-oxidant. The development of palm biodiesel research, initiated in 1981, has created international interest in renewable energy and produced the desired economic effect of supporting the price of crude palm oil.

For his academic research and contributions to the Malaysian palm oil industry, he has been bestowed several honours including being made fellow at the Third World Academy of Sciences (TWAS) and a member of the distinguished science alumni of the National University of Singapore receiving the Federation of Asian Chemical Society (FACS) award, the First ASEAN Achievement Award for research and development, and being invited to the Kaufmann Memorial Lecture in 1988 in recognition of his contributions to Lipid Chemistry. Locally he also received several honours, including being made senior fellow at the Academy of Sciences Malaysia (ASM), emeritus professor University Sains Malaysia (USM), and winning the MSA Golden Jubilee Award in Oil Palm Research 2005. The Government of Malaysia also recognized his contributions by bestowing on him the title of Tan Sri Datuk, and giving him the first National Science Award. He sits on several boards and committees, especially those for higher education and those related to the science and technology of palm oil.

He has also been active in scientific non-government organizations. He founded the Malaysian Invention and Design society (MINDS), The Malaysian Oil Scientists' and Technologists' Association (MOSTA), and the Malaysian Senior Scientists' Association (MSSA). Furthermore, he has nurtured the Confederation of Scientific and Technological Associations in Malaysia (COSTAM) and initiated a number of scientific activities, the main ones being:

- The Malaysian Science and Technology Congress (MSTC) where research scientists and technologists are encouraged to present their results annually.
- The International, Invention, Innovation, and Technology Exhibition (ITEX), an annual event for inventors.
- The Journal of Science and Technology in the Tropics (JOSTT) which focuses on research related to problems of the Tropics.

For his contribution to the above activities, he was recognized as follows:

- Winning the TWNSO Prize on Public Understanding of Science 1990, an award given for his role in promoting public interest in innovations and inventions.
- Presented with the Honorary Medal and Certificate from the Cosmonautics Federation of Russia.
- Receiving the IFIA Grand Gold Medal & Certificate for his Altruistic Promotion of Inventors from the president of the International Federation of Inventors' Associations.
- Getting the Senior Citizens Golden Years' Award 2007.

He is married to Lily Leong Lai Han and they have two sons and two daughters. Their eldest son is Reader in Nephrology at the University of Sheffield, United Kingdom, and his youngest daughter is with the Victoria Hospital at the Queens University of Belfast, as head of medical bacteriology. His two other children are in the corporate world.

Ong Teck Mong, Timothy

Dato Paduka Timothy Ong Teck Mong is a third-generation member of a leading Brunei Chinese family from Fujian province whose origins in Brunei date from the beginning of the last century. Ong is the eldest son of Dato Paduka Ong Kim Kee (1931–98) and the grandson of Pehin Kapitan Ong Boon Pang (1882–1940), both Brunei business and community leaders in their time. His maternal grandfather, Dato Paduka Kong En Choi, was considered the most senior ethnic Chinese civil servant in colonial Brunei.

Dato Ong was born in November 1953 in what was then Brunei Town (Bandar Seri Begawan today) and received his primary and most of his secondary education at an English-medium missionary school, St Andrew's. In stark contrast to Ong's father and grandfather's rootedness in Chinese education, Ong and his siblings were all English educated. This was attributable to the influence of his English-speaking mother, Doris Kong Suik Yin, in the formative years of his life.

At St Andrew's School, Ong was the top student every year right through to his final year. In 1970, when he was sixteen years old, his parents sent him to one of Australia's most prestigious schools, Geelong Grammar School, to complete his education. In his final year, he was awarded School Colours for academic achievement, and the ANZ Bank Prize for being the top student in economics.

From Geelong Grammar School Ong went to the Australian National University (ANU) where he began studying law and economics and then switched to political science, graduating with a B.A. (Hons) in 1976. At the ANU, he spent most of his time on student politics and was a student activist. In his second year at university, he was elected a co-national director of the Overseas Student Service, a body representing all foreign students studying in Australia.

In 1977 Ong returned to Brunei to help his father manage Chop Teck Guan, the family-owned conglomerate. His father was in poor health at the time. His first business initiative was to build the Sheraton Hotel, Brunei's first international hotel. After the successful completion of the hotel in 1981, he took a year off to study in the United Kingdom at the London School of Economics and Political Science (LSE), where he obtained a Master of Science degree with distinction in International Relations in 1982.

Ong has often described himself as a "reluctant entrepreneur" whose first love was politics. In fact, his initial entry into business was mainly motivated by filial loyalty. In a speech to a business conference in 1995 he acknowledged that, "Throughout the world but especially in the Confucian cultures, family loyalty and its associated values constitute a significant recruiting agent for the entrepreneurial class."

Despite his initial reluctance, Ong eventually took to business and is today regarded as one of Brunei's leading businessmen. He has built a number of leading businesses outside of the family business, including National Insurance — Brunei's largest general insurance company. He is also a board member of a number of leading local and regional bodies, including Baiduri Bank, Prudential Asia's Advisory Board, and the Asian Institute of Management.

In 2000 Ong bought an ailing regional business publication — Asia Inc magazine — that had been started by the Thai Chinese media magnate, Sondhi Limthongkul, with the aim of turning it around and making it a leading Asian publication. He was, however, unsuccessful in his efforts and publication of the magazine ceased in 2008. Nevertheless, the magazine's conferencing arm, Asia Inc Forum, has become a regional leader in convening and organizing high-level business meetings. Of business failure, Ong frequently says, "Failure can be a great teacher. Success does not lie in never failing but in rising every time you fall."

In the mid-1990s, Ong became a leading figure in the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum (APEC). He was appointed by the Brunei Government to represent Brunei in the APEC Eminent Persons Group (1994–96) which developed the APEC vision of Open Regionalism. He was also chairman of the APEC Business Advisory Board when Brunei hosted the APEC Summit in 2000 and has frequently been invited to speak at various international conferences and forums, including the World Economic Forum, the APEC CEO Summit, and the Pacific Economic Cooperation Council.

Since 2000, he has been invited to advise the annual APEC CEO Summit which brings together government and business leaders from across the Asia Pacific. In recognition of Ong's contribution to regionalism, the Government of Chile bestowed him Chile's highest civilian award, The Grand Cross of the Order of Bernado O'Higgins.

In 2005, Ong was appointed by the Sultan of Brunei to act as chairman of the Brunei Economic Development Board (BEDB), reporting to Prince Mohamed Bolkiah, the Sultan's brother and Minister of Foreign Affairs and Trade. This appointment was a rare honour for a Brunei citizen of Chinese descent.

Under Ong's leadership, the BEDB undertook a number of trail-blazing initiatives, including developing Brunei's first petrochemical industry, pioneering large-scale social housing for Brunei citizens, and creating Brunei's first technology incubator. His appointment as BEDB chairman ended in 2010, following a reorganization in government which saw the BEDB being transferred to the Prime Minister's Office.

Ong was conferred the title of Dato Paduka by the Sultan of Brunei in 2006 in recognition of his public service. As a Brunei Chinese who has achieved considerable success, he is thankful for the opportunities that Brunei has presented him and is committed to an open, successful, and inclusive Brunei.

Like his forebears, Ong has pursued a business career while seeking to contribute to society. Also, reflecting the transformations within the Asia Pacific and the growing interconnectedness of the region, he has made his mark regionally, beyond the shores of Brunei. Ong is a Christian and has two sons and a daughter.

Ong Teng Cheong

(王鼎昌, Wang Dingchang, 1936–2005)
Architect, civil servant, politician, Singapore

Ong Teng Cheong, who was born in 1936 in Singapore, is most well known for being Singapore's first directly elected president. Although the presidency in Singapore was then largely a ceremonial position, Ong exerted his own personal touch during his tenure as nominal head of state, and had, at times, spoken out against the prime minister. Under the amended Constitution of Singapore of January 1991, he had power to veto appointments in the civil service and the use of government reserves, veto the government's budget and appointments to public office, examine the administration's enforcement of the Internal Security Act and religious harmony laws, and look into investigations of corruption. He sometimes went beyond the powers stipulated for his office as laid out in the amended Constitution. The first instance of this occurred in 1993 when he had a dispute with the government over access of information regarding Singapore's financial reserves.

In that incident, Ong displayed a great deal of courage in calling for government transparency and accountability in the way in which it spent Singapore's financial reserves. He was, in fact, instrumental to prompting this type of public accountability in the publication of the White Paper on the Determination and Safeguarding of the Protection of the Reserves of the Government. While the government of the time may have felt that Ong was unreasonable for demanding access to Singapore's financial reserves information, the incident and the resultant White Paper demonstrates his firm dedication to his duties as president. In fact, this "clash" between Ong and the government proved the observers of the presidential election wrong when they had earlier speculated that Ong, as former chairman of the People's Action Party (PAP), secretary-general of the National Trades Union Congress, and PAP Member of Parliament, would continue to remain a PAP loyalist and stay in line with the government's plans. The fracas over access of information regarding Singapore's financial reserves demonstrated that he was his own man who wanted to do his best by the citizens, rather than a man staunchly loyal to the ways of the ruling party. Despite numerous government attempts to delay the financial reports, Ong finally received them and the White Paper was published. His adamant stand in calling for an audit of all the properties that the government owns and information about the reserves clearly shows that he felt the expenditure of these reserves ought to benefit the people, and that there ought to be some form of transparency as to the government spending of these reserves.

An inkling of this aspect of his character may be gleaned from an incident that occurred in January 1986 when he was still secretary general of the National Trades Union Congress (NTUC). Instead of quelling a strike in the shipping industry and informing the cabinet or the government as leaders of the ruling party felt he should have done, Ong sanctioned the strike. It was the first strike in over ten years and the government was taken aback when it occurred. Despite the corporate and cabinet backlash against his decision, Ong firmly stuck by his decision, claiming that the cabinet or the government would have stopped him from going ahead with the strike.The shipping strike in 1986 clearly marks Ong as a man who is determined to put his commitment to public interest over his loyalty to the ruling party.

Despite his coming to points with the government, it was his penchant for serving the public that brought him to the attention of the Lee Kuan Yew government. As a resident of Seletar Hills in the 1960s, he took a keen interest in grassroots activities and constantly involved himself with bettering the lives of the people, using his training in architecture for the residents' benefits. This soon led to his appointment as chairman of the Residents' Association. This appointment and his personable nature towards ordinary citizens brought him to the notice of then Member of Parliament for Jalan Kayu, Hwang Soo Jin. In turn, Hwang introduced Ong to then Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, who wasted no time in fielding Ong as a PAP candidate in the 1972 general election in the Kim Keat constituency, which he won and held until the 1991 elections. Despite the requests of several senior government officials that he take up full ministerial duties on top of his responsibilities as a Member of Parliament, Ong declined because his young brother was dying of cancer. After his brother's death, however, he was appointed senior minister of state for communications in 1975, acting minister for culture in 1977, minister for communications in 1978, and minister for labour in 1981. In 1983, Ong was appointed minister without portfolio, after taking over as secretary-general of the National Trade Union Congress. In January 1985 and November 1990, he was appointed deputy prime minister, in which post he remained until August 1993, when he contested in the elected presidency. In his positions as minister from 1977–93, Ong served as chairman of three crucial review committees, namely, the Moral Education Committee (1979), Advisory Council on Art and Culture (1989), and the Chinese Language Review Committee (1992). Under the auspices of his patronage and guidance, these committees were instrumental to the formation of the National Arts Council, the construction of the Esplanade, and the revised syllabus for the teaching of Chinese language in schools. Indeed, as chairman of these committees, Ong garnered much support and respect from the Chinese-speaking community, as well as the artistic community.

Ong's sympathy with the Chinese-speaking community was, in fact, central to the government's revision of its policies towards Chinese-educated citizens. He stated that Chinese-educated Singaporeans, whom he dubbed the "silent majority", felt neglected by the government's emphasis on the English language, and as such, voted against the PAP. Taking seriously any votes against it, the PAP government soon refocused its efforts on wooing this "silent majority" of Chinese-educated Singaporeans. However, Ong's concern for the betterment of the lives of ordinary Singaporeans extended beyond that of the Chinese community. Indeed, he was most concerned with improving the transportation system as well. This concern was manifested during his tenure in parliament when he persevered in arguing for the creation of a Mass Rapid Transport (MRT) system similar to the London Underground. Despite opposition from his Cabinet colleagues owing to the large capital that would have to be pumped into the construction of this project, Ong, as minister for communications, constantly advocated the benefits of the MRT system as a new dimension in urban mobility.

In August 1993, he stepped down from his seat as a Member of Parliament and contested in the country's first popularly elected presidency. This, however, did not put an end to his public spiritedness and his genuine concern for Singaporeans. On winning the presidential election against Chua Kim Yeoh, he stated explicitly that his previous long association with the PAP would not prevent him from acting independently as his first loyalty was to the people of Singapore. He was true to his word for he was opposed to the PAP government's interpretation of the powers of the president. While the PAP government saw it as a major constitutional and political change in Singapore's history, where the president would work alongside the government, he believed he should act independently from the government. This disagreement led Ong to refer the matter to a High Court tribunal chaired by the chief justice. However, he accepted the final decision which ruled in favour of the government and stated that he would not contest a second term in office. His intimation that his tenure as president was marked by problems from the government drew swift censure from the PAP leaders. His response that his powers made him accountable only to the people who had voted him into the presidency once again demonstrated his loyalty to ordinary Singaporeans. In response to Ong's tenure and his constant call for the financial accountability of the government to him as president and thence the people, the government limited his powers by decreeing that a presidential veto can be overridden with a two-third majority in Parliament.

After retiring from politics, Ong continued to devote himself to the less fortunate in society by promoting the arts and culture. When he passed away on 8 February 2002 after a battle with lymphoma, his contributions to the people were acknowledged by a wide outpouring of grief. His legacy, however, lives on in the MRT system that is constantly used by many Singaporeans daily, as well as the vibrant arts scene that currently marks Singapore.

Ong Tjoe Kim

(王梓琴, Wang Ziqin, 1911–2009)
Businessman, founder of the Metro group of department stores, Singapore and Indonesia

Ong Tjoe Kim was born in 1911 in the Fujian province in China. Like many born in China in the beginning of the twentieth century, Ong Tjoe Kim sought to make his fortune in Southeast Asia (then known as the Far East). Consequently, he left the land of his birth in his teens so as to join his father in the Dutch East Indies (present day Indonesia). On his arrival in Batavia (present day Jakarta), he found employment with a textile wholesaler. He remained in this job for two years, after which he joined a retail company. A Channel News Asia account of his early years states that prior to his arrival in Singapore, Ong worked as an odd job labourer in Surabaya in Indonesia for 25 rupiah a day. An account by the National Library Board of Singapore states that Ong joined Aurora Department Store after leaving his job at the textile wholesaler in Batavia and that Ong became the company's director at Aurora after 25 years. A Channel News Asia report of Ong's achievements following his death claimed that he spent 25 years working in Toko Dezon before he was made manager of seven branches of the store in Indonesia.

While it is unclear whether Ong spent 25 years working for Toko Dezon or Aurora Department Store in Indonesia, one thing is certain — Ong's hard work and perseverance enabled him to rise quickly through the ranks of the retail business. It is also certain that he spent these 25 years learning the ropes of the retail trade and saving enough money to set up a shop of his own.

Ong finally ventured out on his own in 1952 when he was sure he had accumulated sufficient funds. In 1953, he opened his first store in Surabaya as a joint partnership. This store was named 'Metro'. The unusual name of the store stemmed from Ong's love for films produced by Hollywood's Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM) studios. The first Metro store was so successful that a second Indonesian one was opened in 1955. However, the mid 1950s was a particularly turbulent time for Indonesia, and Ong's plans to further expand Metro were curtailed. The reason for this lay in the anti-Chinese, pro-nationalist (that is, pro-indigenous Indonesian) sentiments running high in the country. Unable to conduct proper business dealings and negotiations in the volatile Indonesian socio-political climate, the joint partnership that Ong held with his business associate was dissolved. As a result, Ong moved his business to Singapore where he opened his first Metro store at 72 High Street in 1957.

Although the first store was a simple two-storey shophouse at the current site of the Treasury Building, Ong considered High Street an excellent location. His rationale was that High Street was a more 'up market' site than Chinatown. The clientele Metro attracted gave credence to his opinion. Metro's customers of the late 1950s and early 1960s were mainly affluent housewives from Indonesia and Singapore. Indeed, many of Metro's early patrons were Ong's Indonesian friends, most of whom bought items in bulk. This contrasted with the clientele of Robinsons and Tangs who were mostly expatriates and locals respectively.

Business was brisk for Metro and the store was expanded to the shophouse next door in 1961. At this time, Metro's logo was written as 美罗 (pronounced Mei Luo) in Chinese calligraphy by Ong's brother. It was meant to be a double pun reflecting both the store's name as well as the wares it sold. On the one hand, 'Mei Luo' sounded like a Chinese transliteration of 'Metro'. On the other, the Chinese name also indicated the many lifestyle items available at the store, for it alluded to the phrase 美丽的绫罗绸缎 or 'beautiful textiles/clothes'.

Ong was a very innovative businessman. He was the first in Singapore to utilise the pulling power of celebrities and stars to his Metro stores. Indeed, he was the first in Singapore to invite stars of the day to open his new stores, organise store promotions (such as sales), have shop-floor staff dress in uniforms, and have customers served with drinks. This method of impressing the notion that 'the customer is king' proved very popular, and many people flocked to his stores.

By 1965, Metro was firmly established as a popular retailer and became one of the first to set up a department store in the fashionable shopping district at Orchard Road. Originally at Liat Towers and named Metrotex, it soon moved to Holiday Inn Shopping Complex at Scotts Road in 1973 and was subsequently renamed Metro Orchard. In 1973, Metro was listed on the Singapore Stock Exchange. Already well known for its uniformed sales staff, the store's logo evolved around this time to include a frame in red around the Chinese calligraphy characters so as to mimic the words on an ancient Chinese seal. This eventually led to the distinctive logo designed by Landor Associates in 1982 featuring the red frame around a calligraphic capital letter M.

When Metro was at its peak, it had five stores in shopping centres in Orchard Road. In 1979, Ong cofounded a luxury watch retailer known as The Hour Glass, which carried brands like Rolex and Piaget. However, The Hour Glass was eventually sold in 1987. Through Metro, Ong brought local and regional designers to the notice of Singaporeans with in-house labels like Marissa and Ananas. Throughout much of the late 1970s and 1980s, Ong expanded the business and more Metro department stores sprang up in Singapore and Indonesia. Outlets were opened in suburban areas of Singapore, but these eventually closed in the late 1980s. However, Metro has once more set up shop in the suburban areas in the late 1990s and in 2002. At present count, there are three Metro department stores in Singapore.

The company has also expanded to retail and commercial holdings in China and Malaysia. Through Metrobilt, an early subsidiary of Metro Holdings, Ong was able to distribute building and construction materials. He also attempted to branch out into the hospitality industry by building a grand hotel in Cairns in Australia and launching Sun Cruises in the 1990s. However, the Asian financial crisis of 2000 led to the folding of Sun Cruises. Metro Holdings has also diversified to become a key property investor in China. Since Ong Tjoe Kim's death on 11 August 2009, Metro Holdings has been helmed by his son Ong Jopie.

Ongpin, Roman

(王翼彬, Wang Yibin, 1847–1912)
Businessman, community leader, Philippines

The name, Ongpin, conjures up images of the bustling main road in the middle of Chinatown. It is named after a person of historical significance, Roman Ongpin, the patriarch of the Ongpin family. The family has been in the Philippines for seven generations. Though proud of their Chinese origins, they nevertheless consider themselves totally Filipino.

Simón Ongpin (王毅彬, Ong Yak Pin) emigrated from Fujian to Manila in the 1830s or 1840s. He was a candlemaker. He took the name, Simón, on conversion to the Catholic faith, which many Chinese immigrants did to avoid persecution by the Spanish authorities. Simón Ongpin married a Chinese mestiza, Sinforosa Uymaico Tambensiang. Go Bon Juan's 2007 article mentions that a marker in the Cementerio de Chinos (Chinese cemetery) states that Ong Yak Pin, a capitan de Chino, is one of the patron-founders of that cemetery. The marker says that because of Ong Yak Pin's patronage, his daughter, Raymunda, and her husband, Doroteo Ricafort, and their own descendants would be granted burial in the Cementerio de Chinos.

Simón Ongpin and Tambensiang had five known children, two of whom died in infancy, and another two either died young, or had no children. Only Roman Ongpin, who was born in 1847 had children. Therefore, all the Ongpins we know of are descendants of Roman Ongpin, who was the first nationally prominent member of the family, and the one who shortened Ong Yak Pin to Ongpin and adopted it as the family name.

Ongpin diversified out of the candle business and became a merchant. He sold dry goods, or "hardware", which, in the late nineteenth century meant anything from soap to clothes to carriage supplies, construction materials — everything in fact that wasn't perishable.

When he was twenty-two, Ongpin married Pascuala Domingo. They had sixteen children, nine of whom lived to adulthood. Four of these were girls, and five, boys. According to his daughter, Celedonia, Ongpin was extremely strict as a parent, and refused to allow suitors to visit his daughters. As a result, none of the girls ever married except her, and only because she eloped at the age of thirty, fourteen years after her father died.

In 1883, at the age of thirty-five, Ongpin established what we would today call a department store, which he named El 82. The name commemorated the landmark year 1882, in which a cholera epidemic swept across the Philippines, decimating its population. Rather than to commemorate the disaster, family oral tradition stated that he chose the name to symbolize the rebirth of the nation from the disaster. Cleverly, 82 was also the establishment's telephone number. El 82 delivered goods and supplies to customers by horse-drawn cart, cash on delivery.

The business prospered, and Ongpin became a rich man and prominent citizen. He became a civic leader in various associations of Binondo, then the city's central business district, and pioneered the use of fixed prices and European-style double entry accounting, the forerunner of today's balance sheets. Previously, the only sort of financial information was end-of-day cash accounting. Proper balance sheets and fixed prices helped to stabilize commerce and create a more rational market more familiar in European capitals.

One of the retail lines that El 82 carried exclusively was art supplies such as paint, canvas, brushes, easels, and framing materials. This was probably influenced by the fact that Ongpin's wife, Pascuala Domingo, was a descendant of the first eminent Filipino painter, Damian Domingo, himself a Chinese mestizo. Because El 82 was the only place in Manila which sold these supplies, many of the artists of the time became his friends. As a result, Ongpin was drawn into the circle of their friends, the ilustrados (enlightened ones). These were young Filipinos who came from the middle class, had studied abroad, and acquired the liberal and romantic ideals of the west. The ilustrados would become the inspiration, though not the core, of the Filipino reform and revolutionary movement.

Jose Rizal's novels, Noli Me Tangere (1887) and El Filibusterismo (1891), exposed the abuses of the clergy, leading to the founding in 1892, of the katipunan, a secret society that would become a revolutionary movement. It is not certain whether Roman Ongpin was a member of the katipunan, but he certainly was among its supporters and financiers. Ongpin was arrested twice, once during the Spanish period, when one of El 82's delivery carts was found to be carrying rifles hidden in stacks of lumber, and bullets concealed in cans of paint. He was arrested again and jailed for seven months during the American Occupation, when he was caught sending supplies to Aguinaldo, accompanied by a note which he had signed in his own name. Because of this, according to his daughter, Celedonia, Ongpin detested Americans, admonishing his children never to buy any American goods and refusing to carry them in his store.

What is certain is that Ongpin was an ardent patriot who insisted that his children spoke Tagalog (Spanish was their first language, and they no longer spoke Hokkien), always wore barong tagalog, and flew the Filipino flag from the windows of El 82 every 12 June, even when the Americans had declared this a subversive act.

On 17 September 1915, Calle Sacrista was renamed Ongpin Street. Roman Ongpin's memory is further perpetuated in history by his monument built at Plaza de Binondo.

It is often said that the first generation starts the fortune, the second builds it, and the third dissipates it. And so it came to pass with the Ongpins. Of Ongpin's sons, only one, Constancio, was at all business minded. Although the youngest son, he came to run the family business, El 82, which at some point had moved to Calle San Jacinto (now Tomas Pinpin). He apparently did this pretty well until the store was destroyed in a fire in the 1930s.

Another of Ongpin's sons, Alfonso, became obsessed with art. An avid collector, he cultivated the relationships with the prominent artists of the time which his father had begun. Many of them gave him paintings in payment for art supplies, or just out of friendship. He ran Manila's arguably first art gallery, which he called, simply, Arte.

In his later years, Alfonso Ongpin became the foremost authenticator and historian of the classical age of Filipino art, and is considered the father of Filipino art history. He developed his own methods for cleaning and restoring paintings which had deteriorated due to their exposure to tropical conditions. It became known as "el proceso Ongpin" (the Ongpin process).

Alfonso Ongpin was the beginning of the ongoing Ongpin involvement with art.

His granddaughter, Cynthia Ongpin Valdes, has published books on Chinese ceramics, Philippine pottery, and jade, while his granddaughter, Deanna Ongpin Recto, taught humanities at the University of the Philippines and then served for many years in the Philippine mission to the UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization). She was also artistic director and vice-president of the Cultural Center of the Philippines.

A great-granddaughter, Mia Ongpin Herbosa has become a painter of note, with successful solo exhibitions such as a show at the Alliance Francaise de Manille, the centrepiece of which was her portrait of Alfonso T. Ongpin. Mia Ongpin Herbosa's mother, Elaine Ongpin Herbosa has herself become a painter. Stephen Ongpin has been an art historian and dealer in London since the 1980s, specializing in Renaissance Italian and Flemish masters. Lisa Ongpin Periquet majored in art history and has been researching Alfonso T. Ongpin since the 1980s and is close to publishing a book. Simon Ongpin was a well known producer in the Filipino film industry in the 1980s and 1990s, although he has since moved to the United States.

Alfonso Ongpin's generation grew up wealthy and died as ordinary people, leaving their children nothing that could be called a family fortune. But in some ways, that was a good lesson. His children's generation had to start from scratch. His son, Luis, started out as an accountant and ended up owning his own stock brokerage firm.

The family name came into prominence again when Luis Ongpin's son, Roberto Ongpin, known in business as "RVO", agreed to join the government of President Ferdinand E. Marcos as trade and industry minister in 1979. He had a spectacular career in the private sector, becoming managing partner at SyCip, Gorres, and Velayo at age thirty-three, and helping to build the regional dominance of that firm. Quite a few businessmen were surprised that he agreed to give up his private-sector success, but in exchange for doing this, he shrewdly convinced President Marcos to grant him and other economic managers unprecedented powers.

Roberto Ongpin's brother, Jaime Ongpin, who was chief executive officer of Benguet Corp., one of the five largest Filipino companies, awkwardly became one of the pioneers of the growing business and middle-class opposition to Marcos in 1981. Jaime Ongpin was the first businessman to speak out against Marcos when the government announced plans to bail out the failing private corporations of the president's cronies using public funds. As the Filipino business elite began to turn against Marcos, especially after the assassination of Benigno Aquino in 1983, they formed a political movement which they called Manindigan! (Stand!), and elected Jaime Ongpin as a leader and bridge to the political opposition.

Despite philosophical and political differences, Jaime and Roberto Ongpin recognized these in a professional manner. They stayed in contact with each other privately throughout this whole period of political turmoil, and, in fact, served as important conduits of information between the Marcos and anti-Marcos camps.

In 1986, when Marcos fled the Philippines and Corazon C. Aquino became president, she insisted that Jaime Ongpin take on the post of finance minister. He declined several times, but she told him, "you made me do this [run for president], so you must support me now".

During the early period of the Aquino regime, Jaime and Roberto Ongpin would meet almost nightly to discuss the country's finances. Roberto Ongpin was instrumental in helping the Philippines recover its financial footing after the fall of Marcos.

Jaime Ongpin served in the Aquino cabinet from February 1986 until August 1987, when an attempted coup d'etat and cabinet infighting made Aquino reorganize her cabinet and accept his resignation. On 7 December 1987, Jaime Ongpin was found dead in an apparent suicide. His family found a note, never disclosed to the public, about his deep disappointment with how events had turned out after the fall of Marcos.

Some of the more prominent younger Ongpins include Jaime's son, Raphael Alphonso Ongpin, an actor, television news reporter, host, and news presenter. Eric Ongpin Recto joined the government as finance undersecretary. A sixth-generation Ongpin, Damian Domingo Ongpin Mapa, was appointed one of the first commissioners of the new commission on Information and Communications Technology.

Onn Siew Siong

(温瑞祥, Wen Ruixiang, 1938–)

Entrepreneur, community leader, Brunei

Pehin Dato Paduka Onn Siew Siong is an entrepreneur, as well as a leader in the business and educational fields in Brunei. He has served the government closely, and contributed extensively to charity as well. Onn even quit the construction business in 1997 to focus on serving the country and people, while remaining a director of many companies.

He began his education at Chung Hua School, Tutong, Brunei Darussalam, an elementary school (汶莱都东中华学校), and graduated from here five years later. Instead of furthering his education, he decided to halt his studies, and assist his father through the financial crisis they were facing, devoting himself to the management of his father's shop for more than twenty years.

In 1972 Onn joined the Belait Chinese Chamber of Commerce (CCC) as a public relations secretary. Due to his relentless efforts and the high regard of his fellow members, he was elected chairman of the chamber in 1987 and has retained this role until the present day. "The Chinese Chamber of Commerce is geared towards increasing the country's economy," said Onn in his office, after he retained his position as president of the chamber. According to him, through the CCC, relations between the Chinese community and the government will be strengthened and it will always support and cooperate actively in festivities held in the country.

Besides business involvements, Onn has been very enthusiastic in contributing to society since 1962. He has involved himself actively in national events, one example of which is his being a member of the sultan birthday's celebration committee for many years. His contributions to society are recognized by both the sultan and members of the public, and have won him titles and awards from the sultan over the years. In 1987 Onn was even appointed counsellor of the Seria Council by the sultan. He still serves in that position until today. In 1996 he was bestowed the title of Pehin for his relentless efforts and service to society. From 1982 to 2004, he received six awards from the sultan. His other appointments in associations include being vice-president of the Chinese Charitable Association, Tutong and chairman of the Amateur Basketball Association, Tutong.

Like his father, Onn is also an educator and servitor to society. In 1983 he became chairman of Chung Hua School (中华学校), Tutong, and remained as such for twenty-five years until he declined the role in 2008. He has been chairman twenty-two times consecutively by then, far surpassing his father's record. In 1963, at the age of twenty-five, Onn was even appointed a member of the Examination Information Committee in Seria, in charge of handling examination affairs for nine years.

Being a prominent figure in the local Chinese community, Onn was appointed Chinese marriage registrar for Tutong and Kuala Belait Districts by the sultan to assist the government in handling customs of Chinese marriages. He took on this role for more than fifteen years.

Although without a high education qualification, Onn was able to connect with Brunei's community, and not just with its Chinese members, but also its local Malay ones. He is fluent in Malay and also has great knowledge of the Bruneian Malay culture, which have gain him a lot of support from the Malay community. Onn is also well respected by the elderly as he frequently visits old folks home. He has said that the older generation should not be neglected or forgotten because, without them, the younger generation would not have existed. He has further reiterated that one should not forget what the elderly have done and should always appreciate them. The least one could do is to give them a sense of happiness while they are still here, he believes. Each lunar new year, he contributes generously to old folks home.

For his loyal service to the country, Onn has been awarded the SMB, PSB, PJK, etc. He is currently a member of the Belait District Government, chairman of the Belait Chinese Chamber of Commerce, chairman of the Chung Hua School, Tutong and Belait, as well as Tutong district's Chinese registrar of marriage, and a Brunei Chinese Land Inheritance witness, etc.

Pehin Onn has six children: four boys and two girls. All his children are highly educated and have a career of their own. Onn Chee Seng and Onn Chee Lee are both businessmen running their own businesses. Daughter Onn Pui Li is working as a bank officer. His other two sons, Onn Hung Ghee and Onn Hung Zheng, are both barristers who graduated from England. His other daughter, Onn Fei Wen, is a specialist doctor working for the Brunei Government.

Ophat Hanvanich

(Lim Eow, 林耀, Lin Yao, 1917–)
Artist, Thailand

Ophat Hanvanich is the most renowned Chinese painter in Thailand. His art is recognized in many parts of the world, including Thailand, China, Southeast Asia, and even Europe. He has devoted his life to Chinese painting, spending a large part of his time drawing and teaching Chinese art to both Chinese and non-Chinese in Thailand. Many of his students have become masters in Chinese art themselves.

Ophat, also known as Lim Eow in Chinese, was born in Ban Pong District, Ratburi Province, on 2 November 1917. His real name in Chinese is Lin Rongyao (林荣耀). His ancestry can be traced to Jiexi County, Guangdong Province. He was interested in Chinese painting as a child and started learning Chinese calligraphy and painting at the age of seven. When he turned eleven, he enrolled at Peiing School in Bangkok. During his years at this school, he started receiving proper education in Chinese painting under Liu Changchao (刘昌潮).

Ophat's father sent him to Jieyang City in China to continue his studies when he was fourteen years old. There he studied Chinese painting with Ye Buqiong (叶步琼). After he entered secondary school in 1934, he was apprenticed to Sun Peigu (孙裴谷), a famous painter in the region, for three years. When he returned to Thailand in 1937, he gave up the chance to take over his family business so as to devote his time fully to Chinese calligraphy and painting.

Ophat's first exhibition was held in 1975 in Bangkok. He then went on to hold exhibitions in Penang, Ipoh, and Singapore the same year. Since then, he has held numerous exhibitions in many parts of the world, including the United States, Norway, Japan, Korea, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand, China, and Hong Kong. In 1992 he held an exhibition in the Chinese Art Gallery in Beijing, which is the national art museum and gallery of China. Many of his exhibitions in Thailand were also graced by Princess Sirindhorn, who was the guest-of-honour for the opening ceremony of several of his exhibitions.

Ophat's paintings have received recognition internationally and have won many awards in international competitions. He participated in the International Painting Competition in Belgium, and an art exhibition organized by the Académie Européenne des Arts of Belgium, in 1988 and 1990 respectively. On both occasions, he won gold medals. He also participated in the International Chinese Calligraphy and Painting Exhibition held in Beijing in 1998 and won the silver medal in the overseas category with a Chinese painting titled, "The Unity of the Country and the Integrity of the Territory" (国家要统一领土要完整).

Ophat's teachers, Liu Changchao and Sun Peigu, were renowned for their paintings of flowers and birds that focused on portraying the essence of the subjects, but not the details. Ophat paints not only flower and birds, but also scenery and portraits. It is evident that he was greatly influenced by his teachers, as he was noted to be especially adept in painting peacocks. However, he constantly surpassed what was taught by his teachers. In the long process of accepting and digesting the theory of traditional Chinese painting, he took advantage of his location in Thailand and studied Western realist painting and was influenced by Zhao Shao'ang (赵少昂), a famous painter of the Lingnan school of painting. As a result, his works are an integration of Western and Chinese art styles, demonstrating his international perspective on art and open-minded attitude. Portraits account for a large proportion of his work. He has utilized both Western and Chinese drawing and colouring techniques, making his portraits vivid and full of details. With the support and encouragement of his friends, he has published collections of his art works since 1975. To date, he had published nine volumes of his art work.

Another major contribution of Ophat is his role as Chinese art instructor and promoter in Thailand. In order to introduce Chinese painting to more people in Thailand, he has taught Chinese painting classes. His students are mainly adults who come from various countries, such as Japan, South Korea, Britain, the United States, Thailand, China, Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Finland, and others. Because of the multinational character of his classes, some have even nicknamed them the "United Nations of Art". His students would have held exhibitions of their artworks occasionally. Besides conducting classes, Ophat was also invited by a broadcast station to demonstrate Chinese calligraphy writing on air in 1979.

Though he is now bound to a wheelchair, Ophat has not retired and held another exhibition, "Eternal Painting — Lin Yao's Painting Exhibition at his 90's" (丹青不老—林耀九十作品展). This was opened on 10 October 2007 at the Guan Shan Yue Gallery (关山月美术馆) in Shenzhen City. About 100 pieces of his work were exhibited, reflecting the close communication between China and foreign countries, as well as the intimate relations, between people. The centrepiece of this exhibition was a Chinese painting, "Wealthy Scene of Pine in the Wind and Shadow of Crane" (松涛鹤影富贵图), indicating the eternity and prosperity of China. He had spent a total of four months painting this artwork.

Ophat's fame in art is indubitable judging from the posts he has held in various art associations. He was nominated as chairman of the Thai Chinese Art Association (华泰艺术学会) in 1988 and became permanent honorary chairman of the association the same year. He was presented with the highest degree in art by Suan Dusit Rajabhat University in 1999. The following year, he was invited by the Ministry of Culture of China, Ministry of Education of Thailand, Chinese Embassy in Thailand, and Thai Art Association, to be director of the Chinese Painting Exhibition Committee for the "Chinese Culture Year" event. Currently, he is a member of the Académie Européenne des Arts of Belgium, honorary consultant of Shi Tao Art Society of Guangxi, China (中国广西石涛艺术学会), consultant to the Public International Calligraphy and Painting Association of Japan (日本公募团体国际书画协会), member of the Hong Kong Chinese Art Club (香港中国美术会), and permanent honorary chairman of the Thai Chinese Art Association.

Ouw Tjoei Lan

(Mrs Lie Tjian Tjoen, 李前俊夫人; 区翠兰, Ou Cuilan, 1889–1965)

Social worker, community leader, Indonesia

Ouw Tjoei Lan, the maiden name of the wife of Lie Tjian Tjoen, was a well known social worker who founded the Ati Soetji orphanage. She worked hard to save young girls from being forced to become prostitutes.

Ouw Tjoei Lan was born in 1889, the third daughter of Ouw Seng Hoe, a Chinese Kapitan in Majalengka near Cirebon, West Java. The senior Ouw was a rich landowner and sugar magnate who had his own sugar factory located on his estate. He hired a Dutch governess for his children so that they could master the Dutch language. When the young Tjoei Lan reached the age of twelve, she did not have to go into confinement as was the tradition in those days; instead, she was sent to Bogor to live with a Dutch family so that she could be familiar with the customs and culture of the Dutch. She returned to her family when she was fifteen years old to prepare herself to become a good Peranakan housewife and daughter-in-law when she married in the future.

Her father was a well known philanthropist who had food prepared daily for the poor and disabled of the town. All his children were assigned different tasks to help him to serve the poor: Her eldest sister was in charge of the white cloth to shroud the deceased Muslim, and caskets for the deceased Chinese. Her second brother was asked to distribute clothing to the poor for the celebration of the Idul Fitri. Ouw Tjoei Lan herself was in charge of the food for the poor; food for the blind had to be thoroughly supervised and fish had to be made safe for eating by removing the bones. Once, when her father saw that there was a bone on a piece of fish that she had overlooked, he was furious and caned her. Ouw Tjoei Lan not only remembered this incident well, but it served as an important lesson for her future work with less fortunate children and women.

A marriage had been arranged for her to become the wife of Lie Tjian Tjoen, son of Lie Tjoe Hong, a Chinese major from Batavia. The wedding took place in 1906, when she was seventeen years old. After that, she became known as Mrs. Lie Tjian Tjoen. She moved to Batavia and lived in an environment entirely different from life on the spacious sugar plantation. The house in the heart of Batavia was crowded and she gave birth to three children in the first five years. She related her situation to Van Walsum, her former tutor in Bogor, who came up with the idea that she should join the Ati Soetji organization, formed by Hindeloopen Labberton, Dr Zigman, and Soetan Toemenggoeng. This organization was formed to help girls from economically troubled homes who had taken "the wrong path".

After her husband was appointed Chinese kapitan, they moved into their own house in Kramat, but there, she was confronted with a new problem. One day, she found a foundling on the front porch of her house. She took care of it, but soon more babies were abandoned at her home. A well known nurse, Sister Gunning, from the Central Hospital, would sometimes ask her to take care of some children left by their parents in the hospital. The Lie house soon became too small for her own family plus the orphans, so she had to find a solution.

In 1914, a new governor general, Van Limburgh Stirum, was appointed. His former appointment was in China where he and his wife saw poverty and the effort that some people had put in to help children by setting up orphanages. With the help and encouragement of Mrs van Limburgh Stirum, Ouw Tjoei Lan decided to set up an orphanage in Batavia. Her friends and relatives helped her to raise a start-up capital of 700 guilders, which she used to rent a house in 1914. Built for the Chinese community, although the official name of the orphanage was Ati Soetji (pure heart), it became known as Po Liang Kiok (Bao Liang Ju, 保良局), meaning "shelter for the preservation of the good". Po Liang Kiok was an institution established long ago and could be found in Hong Kong, the Malay Peninsula, and the Netherlands Indies.

While the orphanage kept growing, she was confronted with a new problem. The economic situation in China had worsened after World War I and economic recession loomed in the 1920s. Girls continued to be smuggled into the Netherlands Indies under the pretext of finding them jobs as domestic helpers or teachers, but were in fact sold into prostitution. Ouw was immediately involved in the effort to save these girls by putting them in the orphanage. From the saved ones, she heard how they were mistreated and where they were hidden. She offered her help to join the police raids, immediately winning praise from the public and mass media for her deeds; however, her life was often threatened by the pimps.

In February 1937, an international conference on women trafficking was held in Bandung by the League of Nations. Ouw was a member of the delegation of the Netherlands Indies, representing Po Liang Kiok. In her address, she suggested training the girls to become members of the police force, to involve them in the fight against the slave trade of women. She also appealed to the countries involved to prohibit or prevent the trading of girls. However, after the conference, the numbers of girls brought into the Indies increased because war broke out in July 1937 in China. Ouw had to open a special house in 1939 to accommodate the girls. This brought further problems; pimps threatened her even more and tried to access the house to persuade the girls to run away. The Chinese Malay press was in favour of her work, but the Chinese community leaders preferred not to get involved. It was later found that Immigration officers had taken bribes from prominent business people to allow the entry of the girls into the country. Only one person, H.H. Kan, a member of the Volksraad (People's Council), had once brought it up at a meeting of the Council.

In spite of these problems, she remained much involved in the Ati Soetji orphanage. From the moment the children entered the orphanage, they received good health care and were well fed. Regular health and dental check-ups were provided. In 1929, the orphanage was moved into a building in the Kebon Sirih area, which was spacious enough for it to have its elementary school which was also open to the public. After graduation, the orphans were usually sent to a vocational school; only the very bright ones had the opportunity to continue their education in a secondary school; tertiary education was not available then. When the girls had reached a suitable age for marriage, a suitable husband would be found for them and a wedding would be arranged with Ouw as the mother of the bride. She was also a committee member of the Fu Nü Hui, an organization for women, and the Tiong Hwa Li Hak Hau (Zhonghua Nü Xuexiao), a girls' school. Her exemplary work had attracted the attention of the colonial government and in 1937, both she and her husband were awarded the Ridder tot de Orde van Oranje Nassau (Knight of the Order of Oranje Nassau).

During the Japanese Occupation, she had to close down the house for girls, but most of them could either work in the Ati Soetji orphanage, or found jobs in households or hospitals. Ati Soetji received subsidies in the form of rice and other necessities.

After the Japanese Occupation, her work with Ati Soetji continued as before. In 1964, Ati Soetji celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its founding. Ouw Tjoei Lan passed away the following year.

P

Paik Wan

(伯圆, Bo Yuan, 1914–2009)
Religious master, artist, Malaysia

Paik Wan was an eminent Malaysian Buddhist monk and an artist in Chinese painting and calligraphy. He was born in Fu'an County (福安县), Fujian Province, in 1914. In 1947, he was dispatched from Gushan (鼓山) to take up the post of supervisor of Kek Lok Si, Penang; he resided in Malaya till he died. Other than preaching the dharma and performing religious duties in Singapore and Malaysia, Paik Wan also aspired to perfecting his skills in Chinese painting and calligraphy, as well as meditation. Because of his outstanding contributions as an artist, he stood out from other monks. Compared with other artists, his was unique in blending the elements and attainment of Buddhist meditation in his artistic works. In 1994, Paik Wan organized his first solo calligraphy and art exhibition, which raised RM500,000 in donation for the welfare society led by the wife of the former prime minister, Tun Dr Mahathir. Apart from this, the National Art Gallery in Malaysia had also especially organized an exhibition entitled "Xinqing Anxiang: Bo Yuan Shangren de Chanyi Shijie" (心清安祥：伯圆上人的禅艺世界)" (The Peace and Lucidity of the Heart: Venerable Master Bo Yuan's World of Zen Art) for him. This was the first solo Chinese calligraphy and wash painting art exhibition organized by the National Art Gallery for a Chinese monk.

Paik Wan's original name is Li Defu (李德福) and he was born into a Buddhist family. His father had passed away thirty-three days before he was born, and when he was six, his mother remarried. Paik Wan went to a private school and started to learn the art of calligraphy at the age of eleven. He lived in a village near the sea and because he saw fish being killed every day, he became a vegetarian after he started going to school. The thought of becoming a monk came to him when he was nineteen; he had always felt blessed that he was born a human and that life was impermanent as evidenced by the early demise of his father. Later he took the tonsure and became a monk at Shifeng Guanghua Temple (狮峰广化寺) in Fu'an County under Master Jing Sheng (静绳法师); he was given the religious name Shengguang (圣光), and was also called Paik Wan (Bo Yuan). "Bo" was the common name given to all the disciples of the same master while "Yuan" means "completeness, wholeness". Master Jingsheng was an erudite monk who regularly exchanged views with scholars regarding Chinese calligraphy and painting. This had a profound influence on Paik Wan and sparked his passion in Chinese calligraphy and painting.

At the age of twenty-two, Paik Wan was ordained under Master Xu Yun (虚云法师) at Gushan Yongquan Temple (鼓山涌泉寺) in Fuzhou. Subsequently he moved to a meditation hall and studied at the Shigu Buddhist Institute (石鼓佛学院). Soon afterwards, he became the receptionist monk at the Gushan Yongquan Temple. Paik Wan had followed Master Xu Yun for two years before the master went to Nanhua Temple (南化寺) in Guangdong Province. He once said that every time Master Xu Yun passed by him, he would have felt a sense of remorse thinking that he did not practise Buddhism well and was thus ashamed to face the master. He was most impressed by Master Xu Yun's awe-inspiring charisma and said only Master Xu Yun truly deserved the description in the sutra, "walk like a wind, sit like a bell, stand like a pine, sleep like a bow". To him, Master Xu Yun was the initiator of modern Humanistic Buddhism. Master Xu Yun was the initiator of modern Humanistic Buddhism. He protected the Buddhist monasteries, united the Buddhists and fought for their rights and benefits during the period of Republic on China. He was also a Zen Buddhist master of no equal in his time. Unusual encounters such as this made Paik Wan into one of the few important learned monks in Malaya during the early days. Most importantly, Xu Yun was well-known for his Zen practice and his experiences in meditation. Besides emphasising the application of Buddhist teachings to daily life, Paik Wan also encouraged devotees to blend Zen with the art of calligraphy and painting. He may be said to have demonstrated the Zen influence in certain artistic styles and features.

At the same time, there were two contributory factors behind Paik Wan's blossoming into an outstanding artist in Chinese painting and calligraphy. Firstly, he was exposed to a lot of stone carved calligraphy in the area near Fuzhou's Gushan Yongquan Temple. He mentioned in his book Songtaosheng li hua qianchen (松涛声里话前尘) (Reminiscing the Past amidst the Soughing of the Wind in the Pines) that when he was staying in Gushan before 1947 the whole mountain was full of green pines and bizarre looking rocks. He was nurtured by the wonderful works of famed artists who had inscribed beautiful compositions of calligraphic art, phrases, and meanings on the stone slabs in past dynasties. He had not only seen, but also noted down all the writings. More importantly, he was acquainted with a Shandong man called Jia Mengyu (贾梦鱼) at Yongquan Temple despite their vast difference in age. A student of Liang Qichao (梁启超), Jia was a knowledgeable scholar as well as an excellent artist. Under the guidance of Jia, Paik Wan made tremendous progress in his calligraphy. As for his paintings, Paik Wan inherited the artistic skills of Miao Zixuan (缪子轩), who was a good friend of Master Xu Yun. Dr Gu Zhengmei (古正美), a Buddhist scholar, wrote in the preface to Xinqing Anxiang: Bo Yuan Shangren de Chanyi Shijie art compilation, "To himself personally, Venerable Master's creative works in calligraphy and painting could be perceived as the milestones of his progress in meditation practice. But in China's history of calligraphy and painting, it is something most precious: firstly because Venerable Master could very well be the last zen monk in China who is able to create zen calligraphy and painting using the heart of great freedom; secondly, artistic creations of such a high calibre as reflected in Venerable Master's works are not commonly found in every generation." Paik Wan's art has reached a stage where all elements are unified, integrated, and harmonized, forming a unique style of its own.

As a learned Mahayana monk who migrated to Malaysia in the early years when Chinese society there consisted mostly of labour immigrants, Paik Wan played an important role and contributed tremendously to the local Buddhist community. In 1961, Paik Wan was invited to give dharma talks in Kuala Lumpur. The following year, he built Hubin Jingshe (湖滨精舍) in Petaling Jaya to spread the dharma. He also acted as mentor and adviser to many Buddhist associations. Among other roles, he was the seventh vice-president of the Malaysian Buddhist Association and continued to serve as its adviser after his term was over. It is also worth mentioning that he was invited by Radio Televisyen Malaysia to host the talk programme, Nanyang Buddhism, from 1969 to 1976. The talk was most relevant to daily life and covered topics such as "ignorance and wisdom", "undesirable outcomes of greed", "what is a peaceful human world", etc. We can generally conclude that Paik Wan's Buddhist ideology is focused on promoting dharma in daily life and Humanistic Buddhism. This is reflected in his series of articles published in Nanyang Buddhism (南洋佛教) entitled "Songtaosheng li hua qianchen" and "Wutaishan shang yi xingzhe" (五台山上一行者) (A monk on Wutaishan), as well as couplets he has written in temples in Singapore and Malaysia. So far, there is no publication of Paik Wan's collected works that represents his thoughts. Another article by him was "Shuishi shenshang de bahen" (睡狮身上的疤痕) (Scars of the sleeping lion), but it has also not been published. One prominent publication is the calligraphy and art compilation, Xinqing Anxiang: Bo Yuan Shangren de Chanyi Shijie.

Paik Wan has contributed much to the cultural and educational circles in Malaysia. Not only does he propagate the dharma, but he also promotes Chinese culture. Since 1980, Paik Wan has continuously been a judge and adviser for calligraphy and art competitions, thereby raising the general interest in these fields locally. In 1991 and 1992 respectively, his works in calligraphy were selected to be inscribed and erected in the shenmo beilin (神墨碑林) and shisheng beilin (诗圣碑林) (both are forests of stelae commemorating great calligraphers and poet-sages since ancient times) in China. The current venerable seniors in Malaysian cultural and educational circles such as Sim Mow Yu (沈慕羽), Ren Yunong (任雨农), Chen Leishi (陈蕾士), and the late Lim Lian Geok (林连玉) were acquaintances of his.

Owing to his valuable contributions to calligraphy and art, and his role as one of the few learned Buddhist monks who came to Malaya in the early years, Paik Wan's interactions with the cultural and educational circles, as well as his personal life experiences, are indeed worth noting.

Palanca, Ellen Huang

(黄淑秀, Huang Shuxiu, 1944–)
Academic, Philippines

In her forty years in the academe, Ellen Palanca has taught countless students who have all gone on to make their marks in their respective fields. Palanca has been involved in government policy research, the results of which have a bearing on government economic policies.

Born on 21 July 1944, Ellen Huang Palanca may well have been born to teach. Having spent nearly four decades in the academe, she does not foresee retirement yet. Soft spoken, mild mannered, and always poised, Huang, with her lithe frame and agile mind, is still as active, excited, and energetic as ever. "I enjoy both teaching and learning. Learning new things and ideas is what I like doing, and since teaching propagates learning, I have involved myself in teaching. I would have felt stagnant in any other job," she says.

Her home environment also goaded her into teaching. Being the second of seven siblings, she experienced the satisfaction of teaching very early on. "I helped my younger siblings with their school work. I found out that I could explain well and I felt good when they understood what I taught them. There was satisfaction in being able to help someone understand something he found confusing." Furthermore, Palanca's disciplined household is a merry mix of intellectuals and musicians.

Her father, George Huang, hailed from Xiamen, in Fujian, China. In his youth (pre-war time), he was a writer for a couple of Chinese newspapers in Manila, and taught in a Chinese high school in Cebu. He went into business, but continued to love reading. His being a bookworm meant that there were always a lot of books to read in the house.

Her mother, Yu Chun Kheng, was born in the Philippines; her parents also hailed from Xiamen. She loves to play the piano and taught many of her children how to play it when they were small.

Elder sister, Sofia, now a retired computer analyst, was a maths major and one of the pioneer computer science students in the country. Another sister, Rita, has taught at the Ateneo de Manila University and is now the vice-president for the New York-based United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia. Another sister, Lydia, also based in New York, is in the real estate business. Her brother, Winfred, is an electronics engineer and plays the violin very well. Another brother, Alfred, is an industrialist and businessman. Youngest sister Molly Vivian is a concert pianist based in New York. Palanca is married to businessman Albert Palanca.

Teaching was evidently the career choice of Palanca, and she prepared for it well. During her grade school and high school years spent at Grace Christian High School, she was consistently top of the class, "My favorite subject was always Math. I like the analysis that goes with doing Math," she says.

She also remembers and admires her high school math and geometry teacher who had such enthusiasm to teach. At the University of the Philippines (U.P.) where she chose to major in economics, Palanca was a member of the Phi Kappa Phi Honors Society. She then took her master's degree in economics at Ateneo before obtaining her doctorate at U.P. While taking her master's, she was invited by the Ateneo Department of Economics to teach. "And I have been teaching since then."

"In teaching, you give a lot of your time and get only a small pay in return. But if you can overlook the monetary returns, the fulfillment you get out of teaching and being involved in education is invaluable." Palanca advises fellow educators that "teaching is a responsibility. It is not enough to teach, you have to constantly keep updated and do research in your field for more insight and be less bookish. You owe that to yourself and your students".

Palanca teaches higher economics and Chinese studies courses, and also research courses for thesis writers. Belonging to both the Economics Department and the Chinese Studies Program, Palanca developed early in the 1990s a course on modern Chinese economy, combining Chinese studies with economics. "I am glad to have the opportunity to make people aware of and understand China and Asia. Filipinos, including Chinese Filipinos, do not know their neighboring countries. They are more familiar with Western countries, particularly the United States. With the emergence of China as a formidable economic power, understanding China and its role in Asia is very important," she adds. She spent time in China in the 1980s as a visiting economics professor at the Shanghai University of Finance and Economics, and the Xiamen University in China.

Her solid economics background has trained her well to be competent in analysis and research. This she also drills in her students. "Economics is a subject that requires analytical thinking. It also requires a good math background," she says. "We want the students to be able to apply what they learn in making sound economic policies in the future," she adds. Some of her students are now in government, one of the popular ones being former President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo, who attended Palanca's classes when she was taking up her master's degree in economics at Ateneo.

Palanca has contributed to the institution building of the university she is in. She was chair of the Economics Department for six years and now does much administrative work related to Chinese Studies for her university.

She has been director of the Chinese Studies Program for over a decade and recently also undertook the directorship of the newly established Confucius Institute at the Ateneo de Manila University. Under her guidance, a new undergraduate programme, the bachelor of arts in Chinese Studies, was drawn up and offered at the university starting the school year 2008–09. This four year undergraduate course with three tracks — business, humanities, or social science — is the first and only such programme in the country. Students have the option to cross-enrol in the Jesuit-run Beijing Center or the Sun Yat Sen University in Guangzhou for one school year.

Palanca has also been involved in government policy research and other external commitments. She has done research for the Philippine Institute for Development Studies. Under the National Economic Development Authority, the institute does extensive research, the results of which have a bearing on the current economic policies of the government. She was also part of a joint ASEAN-China research team organized in 2001 to study ASEAN-China relations and foster closer economic ties with China in preparation for the ASEAN-China Free Trade Agreement negotiations. Palanca represented the Philippines in the team which comprised of one representative from each ASEAN country and six representatives from China. On top of all these responsibilities, she was for nine years president (and is still on the board) of the Philippine Association for Chinese Studies, a non-political, non-profit association of professionals and scholars affiliated with universities, media, and business, who are interested in issues concerning China and the Chinese.

Since 1974, she has authored and published significant papers which were included in economics books, journals, and encyclopaedia, and presented to audiences in ASEAN, Europe, the United States, China, Japan, and Korea. She has also served as consultant, resource person, and moderator for various seminars, symposia, and research projects on ASEAN, China, trade, education, and related issues.

As an educator and member of the academe, she is a firm advocate of quality education. To date, the paper she considers closest to her heart is her dissertation on Inheritance, Wealth, Income, Education and Occupation: Transfer of Status Across Family Generations, which she submitted to the School of Economics, University of the Philippines, in 1981. The dissertation affirms the role of education and educational achievement as something of an 'equalizer' between rich and poor families of varying socio-economic status. Education allows poor families the opportunity to elevate their socio-economic status and uplift the quality of their lives.

To balance her busy load of teaching, doing consultancy, research work, and other commitments, Palanca looks forward to spending time with her family. "We like to do things together. We take walks, shop, and watch movies together. And with our son, when he was still living here, we always cook together during weekends." Her son, Clinton, currently doing postgraduate studies at the University of Oxford, is an accomplished writer and book publisher. Mother and son spearheaded the production of the coffee table book, Chinese Filipinos, published in 2003 by the Jesuit Communications Foundation, Inc. "The book," as described by Edgar Wickberg in the book's foreword, is "about Philippine versions of Chineseness…, or the Chineseness of the Chinese Filipinos."

Pan Shou

(潘受; Pan Kuo-chu, 潘国渠, Pan Guoqu, 1911–99)
Calligrapher, poet, educator, Singapore

Pan Shou, whose other name is Pan Kuo-chu (潘国渠), also known as Xu Zhi (虚之), Xu Zhou (虚舟), was Singapore's pre-eminent Chinese classical poet and calligrapher. He had also been a newspaper editor, an educator, and a bank manager. He was also founding secretary general of the Nanyang University, the first Chinese university outside China. Through an extensive repertoire of poetry and calligraphic works, he made significant contributions to Singapore's cultural and literary landscape. His calligraphic works can be found in the collections of heads of state, foreign dignitaries, museums in Singapore and China, and private collectors.

Pan was born on 26 January to a Qing dynasty scholar in the turbulent year of 1911 in Nan An, Fujian Province in China when Sun Yat Sen overthrew the Manchu dynasty. When he was seventeen, he won first prize for his entry in a national essay competition held in conjunction with a Campaign For Anti-Drug Use Movement. The selection committee consisted of prominent members such as Cai Yuan Pei, former president of the Peking University, and well known scholar Wu Lien-Teh, a Penang-born medical scientist.

Despite discontinuing his education at eighteen and not having a university degree, he was a tutor at the Westminster school in Quanzhou, indicating his early interest in education. When he arrived in Singapore in 1929 at the age of nineteen, he had already received rigorous training in both the Chinese classics and the brush.

Pan landed a job as the feature editor of the Lat Pau (Le Bao) in 1930. Published from 1837 to 1932, it was Singapore's first Chinese-language daily. Barely a year into his job, however, an opening for a principal at Chung Cheng Primary School caught his eye. Urged by Chinese teacher-friends in Indonesia who sought to teach in Singapore, he went for the interview and caught the attention of a member of the board of governors, Lee Kong Chian. He was a mere twenty-year-old when he became the principal of Chung Cheng School.

His career in education brought him back to China for a teaching stint in Shanghai in 1931, where again, he witnessed the tensions between the Nationalists and Communists. However, his father's illness brought him to his hometown in Fujian. On his father's death, Pan returned to Singapore to teach at Chinese High School soon after student protests led to its reorganization under Lee Kong Chian's chairmanship.

In 1934, he became principal of Tao Nan Primary School, nurturing it into a premier institution. During this time he met Tan Kah Kee, the founder of Tao Nan and Chinese High Schools. In 1940, he began a two-year principalship in Zhong Hua Secondary School, in Muar, Malaysia, before the outbreak of World War II.

The war years saw Pan flee with his family, travelling first to Bombay, then to China. He returned after the war, and set up a business in trading paper and publishing. He also worked closely with Tan Kah Kee, Lee Kong Chian, and Tan Lark Sye to rebuild the local Chinese community, particularly through the Hokkien Huay Kuan, and drafted many speeches and articles for them.

As early as 1953, rubber tycoon and community leader Tan Lark Sye came up with plans for a Chinese university that took the form of the Nanyang University (alias Nantah). The discussions involving Tan Lark Sye, Lee Kong Chian, and other prominent Chinese businessmen invariably drew in Pan. He was credited with designing the three-ringed logo, which was originally drawn by his daughter, Xiao Fen. The three rings represent the three races — Malays, Chinese, and Indians, with the star in the centre reflecting the university's role in serving the three groups.

When Nantah's first vice-chancellor, Lin Yutang, resigned suddenly because of differences with Tan Lark Sye, Pan was asked to become secretary general and take on the mantle as de facto vice-chancellor. This he did in May 1955 and remained in the post until he retired in January 1960. In less than a year, Pan laid the foundations for the university, recruiting academics and organizing funding activities, in time for its opening on 15 March 1956. Unfortunately, the Nanyang University Commission, set up jointly by the Singapore Government and Nanyang University to review the academic standard of Nanyang Univeristy which was chaired by Stanley Lewis Prescott, criticized Pan Shou's lack of academic qualifications and the overall standard of Nantah. As a result of the Commission's report, the degree of Nantah was not recognized by the Government of Singapore.

Pan also paid a price personally. His citizenship was retracted in 1958 and he resigned from Nantah in January 1960. In 1980s, he applied for his citizenship with the name Pan Kuo-chu which he had used for a few decades, but gave this up finally when he was not successful. Eventually, with the help of his friends and high-level officials, he used the name Pan Shou in a fresh application and was conferred citizenship in April 1983.

After leaving Nantah, he devoted himself to calligraphy and poetry. This hobby which ultimately became his passion gained him worldwide recognition. He had practised calligraphy since he was eight, beginning with kaishu which was the regular script used by great Tang calligraphers. It was only in his last twenty-five years that he began to focus on the xingshu script. Influenced by He Shaoji, a noted Qing dynasty scholar and calligrapher Qi Gong, Pan's skills are especially valued because he composed his own poetry, which were masterful in their own right.

There are a total of four collections of poetic works of Pan Shou, including Poems from Overseas (1970), Pan Shou Nanyuan Poetry Collection (1980), and An Anthology of Poems (1997). Also some 1,177 of his poems have been published in an anthology called A Collection of Pan Shou's Poems (2004).

Pan Shou's prolific output of calligraphic works is evident everywhere in Singapore. His calligraphic pieces are in public and private collections here and abroad. The name of the Ministry of Information, Communication and the Arts (MICA) in Chinese was done by him, and used when the ministry moved to its revamped premises at the old Hill Street Police Station in late 1999. The Chinese characters for the Chinese Heritage Centre and Nanyang Technological University, on the masthead of Chinese daily Lianhe Zaobao, were also the works of Pan Shou. His unique, personal style evolved from his mastery of the ancient scripts, making him the most celebrated calligrapher in Singapore.

His calligraphic works have been published in a three-volume collection titled, Calligraphy by Pan Shou (1982). The National Museum of Singapore also held two exhibitions of Pan Shou's works — "Pan Shou Guxi Shuji" (1984) and "Pan Shou 80" (1991).

A Collection of Chinese Calligraphy by Pan Shou was published in 2000. Pan had also been the honorary adviser to the Chinese Calligraphy Society of Singapore since 1977.

Pan was awarded gold medal at the Salon Artists Francais in 1985 and The Singapore Cultural Medallion for excellence in calligraphy in 1987. His other awards include the French decoration, "Officier des Art et des Lettres" from the French Government (1991), The Meritorious Service Medal, PGJ, Republic of Singapore (1994), and the ASEAN Cultural Medal at ASEAN's 30th anniversary in Jakarta, in recognition of his untiring and outstanding service in promoting art and culture in this region (1997). The National Arts Council and the National Heritage Board jointly organized the "Pan Shou Exhibition" to commemorate his winning the award of Meritorious Service Medal at the National Museum Art Gallery from 19 May to 18 July 1995.

Pan Shou received an honorary Doctor of Letters degree from the Nanyang Technological University on 26 August 1998, and at this ceremony, he called for the university to be renamed Nanyang University.

He married his first wife, Chen Er Fen, in 1933 when she was twenty, despite objections from his parents, who had an arranged marriage prepared for him. They had been childhood sweethearts when he was studying at Pei Yuan High School and she at the sister school, Pei Ying High School, in their hometown in Quanzhou. She died at age twenty-four of cancer in 1937, a few months after arriving in Singapore. She bore him two children — Soo Yeng and Xiao Fen. Pan Shou's second wife, Chen Boon Hwee, is the elder sister of Chen Er Fen. Pan married her at his first wife's request prior to her death to ensure the children would continue to be cared for. Boon Hwee was a Chinese teacher in Singapore when he married her.

The National Parks Board of Singapore has also named an orchid hybrid after Pan, who died of pneumonia in February 1999 at the age of eighty-eight.

Pangestu, Mari

(Mari Cecelia Pang Hui Lan, 冯慧兰, Feng Huilan, 1956–)
Economist, Minister of Trade, Indonesia

Mari Elka Pangestu, Minister of Trade in the Cabinet of President Susilo Bambang Yudoyono (SBY) of the Republic of Indonesia, from 2004 until now. Mari Elka Pangestu, usually called Mari, has a number of firsts. At the University of California, Davis, she was the first Indonesian woman and the first ethnic Chinese woman from Indonesia to earn a Ph.D. in Economics (in 1986). On return to Indonesia she was the first ethnic Chinese woman to have a Ph.D. in economics. Today, she is the first ethnic Chinese woman to be appointed a cabinet minister (Minister of Trade, 2004–) and in a strategic position at that. In fact, in all previous cabinets there has never been a woman in that kind of key position.

Together with Sri Mulyani Indrawati, Minister of Finance (who was also Acting Coordinating Minister of Economic Affairs), and Miranda S. Gultom, Deputy Governor of the Central Bank of Indonesia in SBY first cabinet, she formed a formidable trio of highly educated, relatively young (between 40's and 60's) women, who have shown to be confident, firm and fearless in their decision making and actions. All three have a Ph.D. from abroad and Miranda is also a Professor of Economics at the University of Indonesia.

Since she became a cabinet minister, due to the drastic measures the government has taken discontinuing fuel subsidy, plunging the country into a spiralling price hike of basic (rice, cooking oil, sugar) and other commodities, she is often shown on TV inspecting prices in traditional markets. She is also active in promoting locally based industry, including local fashion, and local ethnic food. Hence, she has become a familiar face on TV, but at the same time she is also exposed to criticism on a number of policies her office has taken.

Prior to becoming a cabinet minister, Mari was a member of the Governing Board of the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), and a lecturer at the University of Indonesia (UI). Her fields of specialization are international trade and finance with a regional focus on China, ASEAN and the Asia Pacific. Due to her knowledge and her writings on these topics, she is on the international lecture and seminar circuit. Besides teaching International Economics at the UI, she was also an Adjunct Professor at the Australian-Japan Research Centre of the Australian National University, Canberra, Australia.

She was an active participant in international and regional forums, including the World Economic Forum, and Global Leaders for Tomorrow (1999–2003). As Chair of the G33, she was a very prominent figure at the World Trade Organization (WTO) negotiation forums. She was the Program Coordinator in the Trade Forum of the Pacific Economic Cooperation Council (PECC), a private networking organization comprising of 23 member economies in the Asia Pacific region. From 2002–04, she was the co-coordinator of the Task Force on Poverty and Development for the United Nations Millennium Development Goals Project established by the UN Secretary General. At various times, she has been a consultant to the World Bank, the United Nations, Asian Development Bank. She was also commissioner in a number of national companies.

Aside from activities in her profession, Mari has been active in cultural organizations, such as Sejati, Nature Conservancy.

Born on 23 October 1956 in Jakarta, Mari is the third and youngest child of 3 siblings. Her father was the well-known Yusuf Elka Pangestu (Y. Pang Lay Kim 冯来金), who was a professor of economics (business administration) at the UI, Airlangga University in Surabaya, Nanyang University (Singapore), and the University of Singapore. He was also a banker in the private sector. Her mother, Evi Elka Pangestu (Antonia Evi Njo Ging Hwa) was an assistant pharmacist (Asisten Apoteker). Her father's father, Pang Lie Lie was a Hokchia (from Fujian), who was a barber by profession (in Bandung). His wife, Tan Pie Pie, was the daughter of a guard (centeng) of a rice mill in Dauan in Karawang, West Java.

Mari's oldest brother Y.A. Pang Tik Yang (Tikki Elka), has a Ph.D. in microbiology from the Australian National University in Canberra, was a professor at the University of Malaya, and presently works as Director of Research Administration at the World Health Organization in Geneva, Switzerland. Her second brother, F.X. Pang Tik Ping (Pingki Elka) has studied to be a town planner at the University of Sydney and works as a real estate developer.

Regarding her education, Mari was a globe-trotter from the time she was a toddler. Her pre-school was in Berkeley, California, where her father was studying at the time, followed by the Catholic Tarakanita primary school in Jakarta until 4th grade, then the Hughes primary school in Canberra, Australia, continuing high school at St Margaret Anglican School in Singapore, and Telopea Park High in Canberra, Australia, studied for her B. Ec and M.Ec still in Canberra at the ANU, and finally earned her Ph.D. in International Trade at UC, Davis. She also had the privilege to be an Eisenhower scholar. Hence, over the years, Mari has lived in Jakarta, Berkeley, Jakarta, Canberra, Singapore, Davis, Kuala Lumpur, Jakarta, Houston, Shanghai, probably in that order, before finally returning to Jakarta again in 2004.

Mari is married to Adi Harsono (Hong Pei Cai), who has a degree in nuclear physics and works at oil and gas related industry. He has been stationed in Africa, Australia, the Middle East, Malaysia, Indonesia, USA, China, and is taking an active role in the Indonesian Chamber of Commerce.

They have two sons, Raymond Bima Harsono, age 17, and Alexander Arya Harsono, age 14. Raymond is now studying at Geelong Grammar School in Melbourne and Arya is at the Jakarta International School.

With the reshuffle of the Cabinet of SBY in October 2011, Mari Pangestu was relieved of her post as Minister of Trade and given the newly created post of Minister of Tourism and Creative Economy. She was installed on 19 October 2011.

Pangestu, Prajogo

(Phang Djun Phen, 彭云鹏, Peng Yunpeng, 1944–)

Businessman, Indonesia

Prajogo made his fortune as a timber baron in the 1970s and 1980s, during the heydays of timber export from Indonesia under Suharto's developmentalist state. He then diversified into pulp and paper production and petrochemicals, and in 1996, became one of the top 10 billionaires in Indonesia with assets worth US$2.2 billion. While Prajogo's businesses suffered when the Asian financial crisis hit Indonesia, he has since bounced back with a dominant position in the petrochemical industry and forays into the energy sector. In 2010, Forbes placed Prajogo Pangestu as the 40th richest person in Indonesia, with total assets estimated at US$455 million.

Prajogo Pangestu was born on 13 May 1944 in Sungai Betung, a village in what is now the district of Bengkayang in the province of West Kalimantan, Indonesia. Of Hakka origins, his grandfather hailed from Lufeng in the province of Guangdong, China, and Prajogo was the second generation to be born in Indonesia. As the son of a rubber-tapper and part-time tailor, family finances did not allow him to receive formal education till he was nine, when he entered the Chinese Elementary School in the town of Bengkayang and graduated in three years. Thereafter, with support from a cousin and through working part-time, Prajogo completed his secondary education at the Nan Hua Middle School in Singkawang in 1960. Through these schools, Prajogo received a modern Chinese education in his formative years.

After graduation, Prajogo operated a small retail business before moving to Jakarta in 1965 to work with his cousin in the gold business. Subsequently, he struck out on his own and dabbled in inter-island trade, buying rice, kerosene and other commodities and shipping them back to his home province. In March 1970, Prajogo joined Burhan Uray's (Huang Shuang'an 黄双安) Djajanti Group, a significant player in the timber industry, which was then burgeoning under Suharto's developmentalist state policies. In the Djajanti Group, Prajogo held important portfolios in finance and sales, and was subsequently appointed by Burhan as general manager of PT Nusantara Plywood in Surabaya in 1976. By the time Prajogo left the Djajanti Group in 1977, he had mastered the workings of the timber industry, which he launched into with the purchase of CV Pacific Lumber Company, renaming it the PT Barito Pacific Timber Company.

Having established his own flagship timber company, Prajogo took up a forest concession in Muaratewe, Central Kalimantan, before expanding towards the Maluku islands. There, Prajogo gained massive forest concessions starting with the island of Mangole. When the Indonesian government decided in 1980 to reduce and eventually prohibit the export of unprocessed timber by 1985, Prajogo expanded into the downstream industry of plywood production, setting up plywood factories on Mangole, Taliabu and Seram. In addition, his extensive concessions began to extend towards Ternate and Halmahera in Maluku, as well as the provinces of Central Kalimantan and East Kalimantan. By the late 1980s, the Barito Pacific Group, which had 29 companies in its fold, had become the largest forest concessionaire and largest plywood exporter in Indonesia.

Having become eminently successful in the timber industry, Prajogo diversified into other lucrative projects. In 1990, he entered the pulp and paper industry by first taking up a plantation forest concession in Lampung, South Sumatra, to develop soft-wood plantations. This supplied pulp for his paper mill, the PT Tanjung Enim Lestari Pulp and Paper, of which former President Suharto's eldest daughter, Siti Hardijanti Rukmana, was a partner. In May of the same year, he founded Bank Andromeda together with Henry Pribadi (Lin Yunhao) of the Napan Group and Bambang Trihatmodjo (second son of Suharto) of PT Bimantara. In December, Prajogo ventured into the petrochemical industry with Henry Pribadi, setting up a petrochemical plant, the PT Chandra Asri, in West Java, in which Bambang Trihatmodjo also had a stake. The company produces ethylene, polyethylene and propylene, raw materials for the production of plastics. In 1991, Prajogo started another petrochemical venture, the PT Tri Polyta, to engage in the production and sale of polypropylene resins.

Prajogo also extended his investments into the hospitality industry, collaborating with the Kuok brothers of Malaysia to build the Rasa Sentosa hotel on Sentosa island, Singapore's premium tourist spot. Together with Liem Soei Liong's Salim Group, he developed Bintan island in the Riau Archipelago into a tourist destination. By 1991, the Barito Pacific Group had expanded into a conglomerate with 120 subsidiaries, and in 1996, Prajogo Pangestu had become one of the top 10 billionaires in Indonesia with assets worth US$2.2 billion.

However, when the Asian financial crisis of 1997–98 hit Indonesia, Prajogo's companies, with high exposure to foreign debt, were among the worst affected. Bank Andromeda was liquidated in 1997, and Prajogo's companies underwent massive debt restructuring. But the timber baron bounced back in 2007, acquiring a majority stake in PT Chandra Asri and then PT Tri Polyta (in 2008), thus consolidating his holdings in the petrochemical industry. In 2010, the Business Competition Supervisory Commission approved the merger of these two entities into a new US$1.5 billion petrochemical company named Chandra Asri Petrochemical. With the additional acquisition of a stake in Star Energy, which owns the Wayang Windu geothermal power plant, Barito Pacific is set to transform its core business from forestry products to petrochemicals and energy. More recently, through the PT Transpacific Railway Infrastructure, Prajogo has also moved into the rail transport sector in South Sumatra. By the end of 2010, Forbes listed Prajogo Pangestu as the 40th richest person in Indonesia with assets worth US$455 million.

Apart from his reputation in business, Prajogo Pangestu has also been recognized for his philanthropy in both Indonesia and China. In China, he established the Peng Rui-an Education and Welfare Foundation (named after his father) in 1994 to help overseas Chinese returnees from the Greater Singkawang Region (which includes Singkawang and the districts of Bengkayang and Sambas) and their children by providing scholarships to help with the expenses of studying in China. With the liberalization of Chinese-language education in the post-Suharto era, Prajogo also contributed to the revival of Chinese-language instruction through sponsoring students to study at the Xin Ya College in Jakarta and universities in China. Besides giving generously to educational causes, he also made contributions to help victims of large-scale natural disasters, such as the China floods of 1998, the SARS epidemic of 2003, and the tsunami that hit Aceh in late 2004.

Less well known is Prajogo's links with hometown associations related to his home province of West Kalimantan. These function somewhat like the clan associations among Chinese overseas communities, except that they are based on places of origin within Indonesia rather than China. As the most successful Chinese businessman to have originated from West Kalimantan, Prajogo is accorded prominent honorary positions in the Bengkayang Hometown Association and the Greater Singkawang Region Hometown Association, to which he has made substantial contributions.

Pao Shih Tien

(鮑事天, Bao Shitian, 1909–2002)
Educator, Philippines

Pao Shih Tien spent sixty years of his life as an educator–principal, mentor, teacher, and disciplinarian at the Chiang Kai Shek College (中正学院). In recognition of his lifetime achievement in the field of education, he was given the Lifetime Achievement Award in the 2001 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence, organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran.

Pao obtained his doctorate in education from the University of Santo Tomas (UST) in 1955. He was conferred honorary doctorate degrees in educational management by the China Academy in June 1976, and the De La Salle University in January 2000.

Born in Jingshan, in Hubei, China on 12 March 1909, Pao came to the Philippines in 1931. While studying at the UST, he worked as a journalist with the New China Herald and later the Sun Yat Sen Times from 1931–41. On graduating from UST in 1935, he returned to China in the hope of serving his country, but the 7 July 1937 Marco Polo Bridge incident occurred, signalling the start of the Sino-Japanese war. He joined the resistance movement and due to grave danger, was forced to return to the Philippines in 1939, where he started his career as an educator and devoted the rest of his life to being a pillar of the Chiang Kai Shek College.

Pao helped the Chiang Kai Shek High School's founder, the late Wong Chun Seng, to establish the school in 1939, and was Wong's assistant principal and able right hand, as well as acting principal in his absence. He would later serve the school in various other capacities, from 1945 to 1965. Most importantly, he took charge of the reconstruction and re-establishment of the school, badly damaged during the Japanese occupation of the Philippines and by the American bombing of Manila during liberation in particular.

After obtaining his doctorate degree in education in March 1955, he immediately opened the Huaqiao Normal School in June as a professional unit at the Chiang Kai Shek High School to train school teachers. Pao served as the first dean of the school. In 1959, he became principal of the high school. He then worked hard to elevate the high school into becoming the Chiang Kai Shek College in 1965 and was its president from 1965 to 1979, and chairman and chairman emeritus from 1983 until his death in 2002 at the age of ninety-five.

As president of Chiang Kai Shek College, Pao instituted a lot of innovations not just to hone the physical and mental discipline of the students, but also to instil in them moral discipline. He led many students in participating in healthy academic and non-academic competitions with other schools, and established harmonious and active relations with the school's alumni, especially when they had to be tapped for the construction of the new high school building. He expanded the Normal and the Business Schools and raised their standards of excellence. In 1965, he integrated the kindergarten and elementary and high schools with the Normal and Business Schools for them to be recognized as a full fledged Chiang Kai Shek College.

Pao also served in various capacities in different academic and professional organizations, such as the Philippine-China Cultural Association, the Philippine National Historical Society, the Boy Scouts of China in the Philippines, the General Association of Chinese Schools in the Philippines, the Committee on Educational and Cultural Affairs in the Philippine-China Friendship Association, and the Jose Rizal-Sun Yat Sen Society. His expertise was recognized by the Ministry of Education in Taiwan, which invited him to serve as adviser from 1979 to 1990.

He published The Constitutional Development in the Republic of China in 1952 and An Appraisal: The Constitution of the Republic of China with Recommendations and Proposed Amendments in 1955 to introduce the constitutional foundations of the Chinese Republic built on the framework of Dr Sun Yat Sen's "Three Principles of the People".

Pao attended countless national and international conferences on education and culture and his expertise and opinions on the problems of Chinese language education in the Philippines were sought after, especially during the deliberations on the Filipinization of Chinese schools at the 1970 Constitutional Convention. He wrote extensively on the subject of the Filipinization of Chinese schools and asked the various school administrators to prepare for the inevitability of the measure being adopted in the new Philippine Constitution. He argued with Philippine officials that Chinese schools played a crucial role in helping the government educate generations of schoolchildren who contribute significantly to the development of the country. The Filipinization of Chinese schools was adopted in the 1971 Philippine Constitution and all the Chinese schools were given five years, or up to 1976, to fulfil the implementing guidelines.

Pao then rallied the various school administrators to improve the Chinese-language teaching curriculum in order to compensate for the reduction in teaching hours under the provisions of the Filipinization process. However, pushing for reforms is never easy and in later years, Dr Pao acknowledged that they could have done more to raise the quality of Chinese-language teaching in spite of the challenges.

On his retirement, with the help of students and alumni, the Shih Tien Educational Trust Fund (诗田文教基金会) was established to promote Chinese culture in the Philippines. Through this, books, dictionaries, and well known works on Chinese history and culture were donated to libraries of major universities. The trust fund also organized lectures and forums and published books on Chinese language and culture. Dr Pao's alma mater, UST, was a focal point and beneficiary of these activities.

On 9 March 2008, his family, friends, colleagues, officers, and alumni of Chiang Kai Shek College gathered at the Kaisa Heritage Center to commemorate his 100th birth anniversary. Through the efforts of his son, Frank Pao, and daughter, Fragrance Pao-Han, a seminar room at the centre was named Dr Pao Shih Tien Memorial Hall and dedicated in his honour as a tribute to his whole life's vocation and dedication to quality education for future generations.

Today generations of outstanding alumni of Chiang Kai Shek College who shine in various fields of endeavour and have made significant impact in mainstream Philippine society, are living testaments to Pao Shih Tien's lifetime achievement in education.

Dr Pao passed away on 25 August 2002.

Paua, Jose Ignacio

(刘亨赙, Liu Hengfu, 1872–1926)

Revolutionary leader, army general, mayor, Philippines

General Jose Ignacio Paua was the only pure blooded Chinese general who supported the Katipuneros (Philippine revolutionaries) in the fight against the Spaniards and later joined General Emilio Aguinaldo's army in the short-lived civil war against the American colonizers. Renowned historian Teodoro F. Agoncillo said Jose Ignacio Paua was "More Filipino than many Filipinos." General Emilio Aguinaldo, the first president of the Philippine Republic said: "Through his unselfishness and heroism, General Paua had earned the gratitude of the Filipino nation to whose freedom and welfare he dedicated his life. He loved the Philippines as his own country." Another historian, Dr Luis C. Dery, wrote: "The ferocity with which he contested every inch of soil lost to the American troops could also show his total transformation from Chinese to Filipino in heart and in deed." Truly, Paua deserves to be considered a hero of the Philippine Revolution and the pride of the Chinese-Filipino community.

Paua was born on 29 April 1872 in the impoverished village of Lao-nain in Fujian Province, China. In 1890, he accompanied his uncle to seek his fortune in the Philippines. The period marked the increasing bankruptcy of the Qing Dynasty of China, which brought untold suffering to impoverished peasants, especially those in the southern region.

Paua served first as an apprentice blacksmith in Jaboneros Street, Binondo, a job he held for many years until he became an expert. His skills as a blacksmith stood him in good stead during the revolution and he became an expert in many kinds of weaponry. Accompanied by his friend, Pantaleon Garcia, Paua attended meetings and fiestas in Cavite where he met General Aguinaldo, Artemio Ricarte and other revolutionary leaders. Aguinaldo admired Paua greatly for his knowledge of firearm's manufacturing, and his deep sympathy towards the cause of the Filipinos.

At the outbreak of the revolution in 1896, Paua quickly joined the army. Aware of the acute shortage of arms, he suggested to Aguinaldo to set up an ammunition factory in Imus, Cavite. With the help of his fellow Chinese blacksmiths, he finished the arsenal in two days' time. Under his skilful supervision, old cannons and broken Mausers captured from the enemy were repaired; large bamboo cannons taped with wires were manufactured, numerous paltiks (crude firearms) were made, and thousands of cartridges were filled up with home-made gunpowder. Not only did he manage the factory but he also taught the Filipinos how to melt metals, including church bells, for the manufacture of the much-needed arms and bullets for the revolutionary army.

Aside from his own participation, Paua promised the support of his fellow Chinese in the Filipinos' fight for freedom. In spite of his being a Chinese, he never hesitated risking his life for his adopted country. Teodoro Gonzales, a patriot-lawyer, said this of Paua in his unpublished memoir: "It was a strange sight in camp to see him — a dashing officer with a colonel's uniform but having a pigtail. His soldiers were Tagalogs, all veteran fighters; yet they were devoted to him and were proud to serve under his battle standard, notwithstanding the fact that he was a Chinaman."

Paua's valour was proven time and again in the battlefield, and he was thus promoted time and again by Aguinaldo, eventually to full general on 26 September 1898. He received his first baptism of fire in the Battle of Binakayan on 10 November 1896, which was personally directed by Governor General Ramon Blanco as an all-out offensive. Paua reportedly "fought like a wild cat. He and valiant bolomen grappled with the attacking riflemen. Several times, he stopped the bayonet charges of the enemy at the left flank of Gen. Aguinaldo's entrenched position." Despite their superior arms and number, "Governor Blanco sadly returned to Manila, with his tattered battle colors, shattered forces, and shiploads of wounded". Candido Tirona and many brave patriots died gloriously in that fierce battle. Two days after the Battle of Binakayan, Paua was promoted from lieutenant of the infantry to captain. He continued to prove himself again and again in other attacks on Spanish garrisons, and confrontations in Zapote, Perez Dasmariñas, Salitran, Imus, among others.

On 12 June 1898, Aguinaldo proclaimed Philippine independence in Kawit, Cavite, and raised its flag for the first time. Paua cut off his queue (braid), saying: "Now that you are free from your foreign master, I am also freed from my queue." Later, tasked with raising funds for the empty coffers of the newly established republic, Paua raised a staggering 386,000 pesos in Bicolandia alone, mostly from the Chinese. It was the largest cash sum ever collected by any fiscal agent of the republic.

When the Filipino-American war broke out, Paua was again at the forefront of the battle. Taught in the rigid discipline of martial arts, he trained his men well. Among the very few battles won against the superior fire power of the Americans were those led by Paua. He eventually became the scourge of the American troops, who greatly feared his attacks. University of the Philippines historian, Professor Luis Dery, wrote: "The ferocity with which he contested every inch of Philippine soil lost to the American troops showed his total transformation from Chinese to Filipino — in heart and in deed."

After the war, Paua retired in Albay and was once elected mayor of Manito, Albay. He told his wife and children: "I want to live long enough to see the independence of our beloved country and to behold the Filipino flag fly proudly and alone in our skies." His dream was not realized however, for he lost his life to cancer on 24 May 1926 in Manila.

On Independence Day, 12 June 1989, Paua was fittingly honoured when Kaisa Para Sa Kaunlaran, Inc., an organization of young Chinese Filipinos, and the Lam-an Lao-Na Family Association, in cooperation with the National Historical Institute, unveiled a nine-foot monument of this hero in Silang, Cavite, a suburb south of Manila. The same monument was later erected at Legaspi City in the Bicol region, in remembrance of Paua's bravery in winning the battles against the enemy in Legaspi. Funds for both monuments were raised from all sectors of the Chinese-Filipino community as a tribute to this unknown and hitherto unsung hero of the Philippine revolution.

Pedro, Cecilio

(施东方, Shi Dongfang, 1953–)
Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Philippines

Dr Cecilio Pedro is best known as the man behind Lamoiyan Corporation, which created Hapee toothpaste, one of the most recognized brands in the Philippines and one of the country's greatest success stories. His primary goal as an entrepreneur is to encourage more businessmen to be socially responsible — to help people and to give back to the community. He is a fine example of how a businessman can compete against multinational conglomerates by introducing a local brand that is not only more affordable, but of a quality equal to its competitors. His position as owner of one of the most successful companies in the Philippines has given him the opportunity to implement many socio-corporate activities that have benefited the country's poor.

Born on 17 July 1953, Pedro was conferred an honorary doctorate degree on Management Science/Doctor of Philosophy in Technology Management by the Technological University of the Philippines at the age of fifty-three.

His father was Shi Liangrui (施良瑞) who came from Jinjing (金井), Fujian, at the age of 13. His mother was Xu Meimei (许美美), a trained nurse from Xiamen. His father and older brother Shi Cixiang (施慈祥) came to the Philippines together and started the Birch Tree Company, the leading distributor of milk products in the Philippines until the 1980s.

He started out running Aluminum Containers, Inc. in the 1970s. His company supplied collapsible aluminum toothpaste tubes to toothpaste giants Colgate-Palmolive, Procter and Gamble, and the Philippine Refining Company, now called Unilever. Business went well until 1985, when plastic laminated toothpaste tubes, still being used today, were introduced locally. Toothpaste manufacturers found that customers preferred the new plastic tube more than the old aluminum ones, which mean that Aluminum Containers, Inc. was critically affected.

It seemed at the time that Pedro's only recourse was to close shop, which would have resulted in massive financial losses for him and his associates, not to mention the jobs of the company's many employees. Instead, taking inspiration from William Colgate, Pedro refitted the factory with equipment and went on to manufacture the very product for which he had been supplying tubes previously. Two years later, Hapee and Kutitap toothpastes had become household names, having captured a significant portion of the Philippine market and providing stiff competition for big foreign brands names. Along with the change of product came a change of company name — Aluminum Containers, Inc. became "Lamoiyan Corporation", named after Pedro's late grandmother, the first in their family to have converted to Christianity. Pedro, a devout Christian, believed that the multinational company's phasing out of aluminum toothpaste containers was a direct message from God for him to go into toothpaste manufacturing.

The recipe for Hapee toothpaste's success was simple, but risky. Aside from producing quality toothpaste able to compete with the international giants which, back then, not only dominated, but "were" the market, Pedro's toothpastes were 30 per cent below his competitors' prices. This tactic quickly made Hapee the third best-selling toothpaste in the country, next to international heavyweights Close Up and Colgate. When the latter responded with a 20 per cent price cut of their own, Pedro began diversifying his products, coming up with items such as flavoured toothpaste for children. It was three years before Colgate could respond, but this period was enough for Lamoiyan to capture a big share of the market. When Hapee entered the market in 1988, the big toothpaste makers made up 99 per cent of the market. Today, the figure has dropped to 65 per cent. Aside from Hapee and Kutitap toothpastes, Lamoiyan has other products such as Hapee Kiddie Toothgels, Dazz Dishwashing Paste, and All-Purpose Kitchen Cleaner, Fresher feminine wash, and Gumtect, a special, gum-formula toothpaste.

Pedro's company's dedication to product quality and social corporate responsibility is just like his entrepreneurial achievement, if not more impressive. Lamoiyan's many achievements include being named the Most Outstanding Toothpaste Manufacturer by the Consumer's Union of the Philippines for seven years; winning the Philippine Marketing Association's Agora Award for Marketing Company of the Year; earning the 1993 Apolinario Mabini Rehabilitation Award for the Employer of the Year; and attaining the Most Outstanding Program for Equal Employment, awarded by the Personnel Management Association of the Philippines the same year; as well as a citation from the Catholic Mass Media Council for Best Outdoor Advertising for the Hapee Singing Christmas Tree. Lamoiyan's latest success was garnering the Big Bird Award as the 2007 Asian Licensee of the Year. The company even caught the attention of Harvard University, which, after inviting Pedro to speak at a conference of Asian business leaders, later conducted a case study on how a local entrepreneur was able to penetrate a market dominated by multinationals.

Pedro himself has received many awards as well. He was among 1991's Ten Outstanding Young Men Awardees in the field of Business Entrepreneurship. He was an Entrepreneur of the Year finalist in the award of the same name given by the Entrepreneur of the Year Foundation in 2003; the same year he received the Aurelio Periquet Award for Business Leadership, and was named Most Outstanding Chinese Filipino in Business and Entrepreneurship by the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chamber of Commerce. He has also won the Most Outstanding Manilan Award in the field of Entrepreneurship and Humanitarian Service, the highest honour the City of Manila can bestow on its citizens.

Lamoiyan's goodwill extends not only to its employees, but to everyone it deals with, including customers, suppliers, and dealers. The company believes that forging a trusting relationship with these parties is one of the keys to the success of its products. The company also holds regular free dental missions to urban poor and rural areas around the country. In some areas, adults, including even the elderly, would see a dentist for the first time in their lives.

Personally, Pedro's Christianity plays a big part in his social activities. He has been chairman of the Board of the Deaf Evangelistic Alliance Foundation (DEAF), Inc., which has been helping the hearing impaired by providing them with education, skills training, and employment since 1992. In fact, 30 per cent of Lamoiyan's workforce are hearing impaired. Pedro often quips that his factory floors "are the quietest in the country". To bridge the communication gap, the company's managers are required to learn sign language. DEAF has been recognized by the Department of Education for its work in providing education and alleviating the conditions of the hearing impaired. Pedro is also treasurer of the Asian Theological Seminary, which trains evangelistic ministers; and is a member of the Chinatown Development Board, a body which seeks to restore Manila's Chinatown to its former glory. As part of Pedro's Christian advocacy, Lamoiyan holds Bible studies and prayer meetings for its employees and sponsors advocacies such as tree plantings and dental missions. The company holds as its motto: "To make a difference for the Glory of God".

Pedro's various socio-civic activities have earned him the label of "social entrepreneur". He was given the 2004 Socially Responsible Entrepreneur of the Year Award by international accounting and auditing firm Ernst & Young. That same year, Lamoiyan set aside P100 million for business expansion outside the Philippines. Lamoiyan hopes to reach other Asian countries, particularly Vietnam, China, and Indonesia. With such foresight and endeavours, it should not take long for Pedro to realize his vision of having "A Lamoiyan product in every home".

Peng Eng Lee

(方永利, Fang Yongli, 1958–)
Police commissioner, poet, Brunei

Dr Peng Eng Lee, now retired, was a law enforcer who played a critical role in the development of the police force of Brunei, contributing immersely to the firm security of society. He was also involved in arts and literature, having had his poetry published, and also participated in the country's censorship panel.

Peng received his primary education (Primary 1–5) at Chung Hwa Middle School, Bandar Seri Begawan (BSB). He then transferred to a government school, followed by the Sultan Omar Ali Saiffudin (SOAS) College (BSB) for two years, and then the Brunei Preparatory School for one year after which completed his primary education. He started his secondary education at Berakas English School (Forms 1–2), and completed it at St George's School (Forms 3–5).

Peng attended the Cosmopolitan College in Toronto, Canada, and obtained his High School (Honours) diploma in 1978. In 1981, he was awarded a bachelor of science degree with a major in chemistry, by the University of Saskatchewan, Canada. He next received a certificate in criminal justice education from the University of Virginia in the United States in 1990. A year later, Peng obtained a masters in business administration from Chadwick University in Alabama, the United States, and followed this up with a doctorate degree in business administration from Kensington University in California, the United States, two years later. In the same year (1993), the Association of European Correspondence Schools awarded him a certificate in distance education. Peng qualified for a master of science degree in training from the University of Leicester, the United Kingdom in 1996. In 2003, he obtained a postgraduate certificate of business administration from the Heriot-Watt University, in the United Kingdom. On 2 December 1996, he was accepted as a fellow of the Chartered Management Institute in the United Kingdom.

After obtaining his BSc degree from the University of Saskatchewan in 1981, he had in fact returned to Brunei Darussalam and worked in several jobs such as, bank officer, assistant manager in a bottling plant, contract soil chemist, and secondary school teacher for almost two years. In 1983 he began a stable job in the Royal Brunei Police Force (RBPF) as a probationary assistant superintendent of police, and served the force for more than twenty-five years, retiring as a senior assistant commissioner of police on 30 December 2008. During his tenure with the Brunei Police Force, he took time to attain the various educational qualifications just mentioned.

Peng was sent to the Singapore Police Academy in July 1984 to attend the Basic Police Cadet Course, completing it on 9 March 1985. Over the years in RBPF, he completed two important and prestigious trainings — graduating from the Federal Investigation Bureau (FBI) National Academy in Quantico, the United States, in September 1990; and graduating from the United Kingdom Police Staff College in May 1996. Other positions he held in RBPF included, officer-in-charge of criminal records and fingerprints; head of Interpol liaison office; officer-in-charge of criminal intelligence, head of training, head of personnel and administration, deputy director of the Administration and Finance Department, director of the Administration and Finance Department, director of the Criminal Investigation Department (2003–08), etc. Peng was also an authority in the RBPF Gambling Suppression Branch and is an experienced gambling expert. He had prepared expert reports and testified in courts on several big gambling cases regarding 4-Digit lottery, Katam-katam, jim rummy, card games, etc.

Peng served as head of Interpol Liaison between 1991 and 1996, and was quite active in ASEANAPOL (ASEAN Chiefs of Police Organisation), fostering relations between RBPF and international and regional police forces, especially in ensuring bilateral cooperation in law enforcement work. In October 1993 he represented RBPF in attending the ICPO-Interpol for National Central Bureau Officers held at the Interpol Headquarters in Lyons, France, for the purpose of upgrading international requests for RBPF services and assistance to and from Interpol member countries. Peng was also appointed the focal point for transnational crimes and counterterrorism for Brunei. He also served as the co-secretary of the Brunei National Committee on transnational crimes. He attended numerous international meetings, seminars, training sessions, and symposiums on the area of transnational crimes and counterterrorism. He also actively represented Brunei in several vital forums such as ASEAN Senior Officers Meeting on Trans-national Crimes and ASEAN Ministerial Meeting on Trans-National Crimes (ASEAN SOMTC and ASEAN AMMTC), ASEAN Regional Forum on Counter-Terrorism (ARF), and Asia-Pacific Economic Countries Counter-Terrorism Task Force (APEC CTTF).

While he was head of training in RBPF, Peng had vast experience in organizing several important local training sessions and courses in law enforcement. He always believed that private entities are also important in fighting crimes hand in hand with the police, especially for sophisticated crimes such as commercial crimes, money laundering, and bank frauds. Thus, with the cooperation of the Brunei Darussalam Association of Banks, the first ever two-day Joint Economic Bank Fraud Symposium was jointly organized in Brunei in January 1995, with police officers and bank officers from ASEAN countries invited to attend.

Peng has spoken locally and internationally on law enforcement issues, a highlight being his invitation as a speaker (police training in ASEANAPOL) for the 1st Asia-Pacific Conference on Police Education and Training, jointly organized by the International Association of Chiefs of Police and the Philippines Public Safety College, in November 1998.

Peng was an avid advocate of community policing and was once directed to take charge of a project on enhancing cooperation between the police and the public, especially in the area of information providing and crime prevention. After conducting some study tours overseas, he submitted a paper on the idea of a Neighbourhood Police Watch Group (Pengawasan Kejiranan Polis). On 28 April 1989, Peng chose his own village, Kampong Madang, to launch the first pioneer project. Over the years, the country has received a lot of benefits from the Neighbourhood Police Scheme, and, it has now spread to almost all the kampongs in the country.

To face the challenge of globalization and absolute accountability to the public, Peng formed a Crime Scene Unit within the CID in 2005, within a pressing timeframe with and limited number of staff. It allows for the processing and securing of crime scenes, especially for major crimes such as murder, robbery, rape, and kidnapping, with the highest integrity and professionalism. With the assistance of the Singapore Police Force, the Crime Scene Unit has progressed well in the last two years, during which it was equipped with proper laboratory set-up, modern equipments and trained personnel.

Peng was basically a ground man and was always personally involved in the investigation of major crime cases. This boosted morale among the CID personnel, as direct supervision and orders are essential in investigating this kind of big cases. As director of CID for more than five years, he has solved, with other CID personnel, all big cases, such as murder and gang robbery. This was a great success for the RBPF, and given firm assurance to the public.

In his leisure, Peng likes to jog and read books. In the 1990s, several English poems written by him were published in the United States. He has published a poetry collection titled The Untold Tales of the Dusk in association with the Southern Poetry Association, the United States. Two of his poems, titled, "The Untold Tales of Dusk" and "An Endless Journey", were selected to be included in the anthology Under the Canopy and Other Poems, published by CFBT (Brunei) Education Sdn. Bhd. The sultan also appointed Peng a board member of the Censoring of Films and Public Entertainment Panel for two years from 1 January 2009.

During his career as a police officer, Peng was awarded several medals, such as the Police General Service Medal, Police 75th Jubilee Medal, Brunei Independent Medal (March 1997), Brunei Silver Jubilee Medal, Meritorious Service Medal (PJK, July 1994), The Most Blessed Order of Setia Negara Brunei, 4th Class (PSB, July 2000), The Most Honourable Order of Seri Paduka Mahkota Brunei, 3rd Class (SMB, July 2005), etc.

Phaichit Uwatthanakun

(U Chu-liang, 余子亮,Yu Ziliang, 1899–1974)

Community leader, businessman, philanthropist, Thailand

Phaichit Uwatthanakunbt, better known as U Chu-liang, was a Chinese community leader in Thailand who supported the anti-Japanese movement during the Second World War. He was involved in various fund-raising activities and the establishment of newspapers in support of the Chinese war effort. His influence was not restricted to Thailand, but extended to Singapore and Malaysia as well. Aside from his success in business, he was also noted for his philanthropic acts, especially in the health-care sector. In 1961 he donated a hospital to the Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis in Thailand, and in 1962 he sponsored the establishment of a nursing home for the Red Cross Society of Thailand.

U Chu-liang was born on 15 April 1899 to a family of scholars in Raoping, Guangdong. When he was nineteen years old, he set off for Thailand alone and found a job in a relative's dye factory. Later he went on to set up his own business, the Yu Yuan Ji Paint and Dye Co., in Bangkok Chinatown with fellow townsmen. As his business thrived, he set up the De Ji Sewing Machine Co.

During the Second World War, he expanded his business out of Thailand, setting up a paper card factory in Penang. After the war, he ventured into many industries, both in and out of Thailand. In Thailand, he set up the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank (with Uthen Taechaphaibun and several others), Bara Windsor & Co., Ltd., and many others, and eventually formed one of the biggest Chinese consortia in Thailand. His business ventures in Thailand included warehouses, insurance, fabrics, and others. Outside Thailand he established the Nanyang Insurance Co. Ltd. in Singapore, and branches of the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank and Nanyang Insurance Co. Ltd. in Hong Kong.

In the 1930s he was one of the leaders of the Chinese community in Thailand, especially among the Teochews, and was one of the founders of the Teochew Association of Thailand. He was also an active supporter of the anti-Japanese movement and was vice-chairperson of the Association for the Promotion of the Sale of Municipal Bonds in Thailand. In this role, he urged fellow Chinese in Thailand to donate in support of the Chinese war effort against Japan. In addition, together with fellow founders of the Teochew Association, he set up the Zhong Guo Bao and Zhong Yuan Bao as mouthpieces for the anti-Japanese movement in Thailand. Shortly after the wartime Thai government entered into a formal alliance with Japan, U Chu-liang was stranded in Penang during a business trip. During his stay in Penang, he spent approximately S$7,000 to provide relief for some 400 students and refugees from Thailand. Apart from that, he also tried to arrange for transportation for those who wished to return Thailand. As a result, he was arrested by the Japanese military forces, who claimed he was a central figure in one of the anti-Japanese movements in Penang. He was eventually released at the conclusion of the war.

After the war, besides managing his businesses, U Chu-liang performed many philanthropic acts. During the famine which broke out in China just after the war ended, he donated rice to refugees, and also helped to establish a company in Chaozhou that sold rice at a low price. He was also generous in his donations to schools and educational institutions, both in and outside Thailand. In Thailand, he helped found Chung Hwa School before the outbreak of the Second World War. Later, he donated 10 million baht in 1960 to set up a foundation in his name to provide scholarships for students of all levels. In 1966 he donated a piece of land (approximately 64,000 sq. m.) for the building of a school. In his homeland, he set up two primary schools (one girls' school), a secondary school, and a library. He even refurbished his ancestors' house as a kindergarten. He participated in the founding of Han Chiang High School in Penang, which was initiated by Lim Lien Teng. He also donated generously to Chung Ling High School in Penang and to Nanyang University in Singapore.

U Chu-liang was also recognized for his generosity in the health-care sector. In 1949 he invested 6 million baht to build a hospital that specialized in the prevention of tuberculosis. This hospital also provided free medical services to the poor. In 1961 he donated this hospital, together with X-ray facilities and two mobile medical stations, worth up to 600 thousand baht, to the Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis in Thailand. In 1959 he had toured Europe to study medical facilities there for the prevention of tuberculosis. During this trip, he noticed that Europeans were concerned about both the prevention of diseases and the recovery of the sick. Hence nursing homes were common in Europe. Noting this, he thought it best for Thailand to learn from Europe. When he returned to Thailand, he put in 10 million baht to build a modern nursing home with state-of-the-art facilities in Bang Pu. This nursing home consisted of fifteen buildings, and covered an area of 60 rai (96,000 sq. m.). On its completion in 1962, he donated this nursing home to the Thailand Red Cross Society. King Bhumibol of Thailand honoured the opening ceremony of the nursing home with his presence and even bestowed on the nursing home its official name. Several years later, U Chu-liang developed a piece of land (approximately 136,000 sq. m.) near the nursing home into a recreation park.

In recognition of his contribution to Thai society, King Bhumibol awarded him the Most Illustrious Order of Chulachomklao in 1962 after he donated the nursing home. He was also awarded the Knight Commander (Second Class) of the Most Exalted Order of the White Elephant, Knight Grand Cross (First Class), and Knight Commander (Second Class) of the Most Noble Order of the Crown of Thailand, on other occasions.

U Chu-liang died of heart attack on 14 July 1974 at the age of seventy-five.

Phan Thiểu Vân

(潘少云, Pan Shaoyun, 1940–)
Community and business leader, Vietnam

Phan Thiểu Vân belongs to a rare breed of Chinese community leaders in Vietnam. In a position normally dominated by men, she stands out as the female leader of the Hainanese community in Danang, a city in the central part of Vietnam. She is overall in charge of the activities of the Hainan Native-Place Association (huiguan), maintaining continuity in the association's religious and social functions, and ensuring its connections with the local community, with Hainanese in Vietnam, and with Hainanese diasporic communities in the United States. She is also responsible for the financial independence of the association that she helms. A successful entrepreneur, she has expanded her banquet and restaurant business for at least three decades. She is currently a member of the Fatherland Front of Vietnam, Danang, and representative of Chinese women in the Women's Executive Committee of Hai Chau district, Danang (Ban Chấp hành Hội Phụ nữ, Quận Hải Châu).

Vân's restaurant, Kim Đô, is currently built on the land owned by her father, Phan Chánh Hồng (潘正鸿), who was born in Wenchang district (文昌县) of Hainan Island (China). Vân herself was born in 1940 in Tuy Hòa (Khánh Hòa province, Vietnam) where her father first established his Chinese medical hall. She was schooled in Danang where her father, also managed a Chinese medicinal shop called Tế Sanh Đường. The shop used to stand on the current site of the restaurant owned by her now. Most part of the land where the restaurant now stands was nationalized in 1976. Only a small part of it was used by her family who operated a food business on it. During what was called the Subsidy Period, from 1976 to late 1986, her family food business had to be jointly operated with a state-owned food and beverage cooperative in the planned economy, which rationed stamps for the purchase of goods and services. The partnership saw a new vice-manager and an accountant being dispatched to her restaurant from the local government office. In 1994, approximately eight years after the ratification of economic reforms in 1986, Vân bought the other parts of the land — in front of and behind the restaurant which used to belong to her family — from the government. The economic reforms refer to the new economic policies which allowed privately-owned enterprises to be involved in the production of goods and services. These reforms were initiated to give the socialist economy a market orientation.

In the past, Vân's father had provided shelter to migrants from Hainan Island, and the Guangxi Province of China at the back of his Chinese medicinal shop in Danang. Vân's husband, Lâm Phước (林富), was among the migrants who had taken shelter in the compound of his shop. Phước left his village called Ganlan Cun (橄榄村), located in the Wenchang district of Hainan, at the age twelve. He resided for about seven years in Hong Kong before coming to Danang. In 1997, those who had been living in Vietnam from before 1975 until 1997 could apply for Vietnamese citizenship. Phước became a Vietnamese citizen then. Vân's father, however, left Vietnam for the United States of America in 1983. The site where his first shop and family home used to be in Tuy Hòa was given to the local government after he had left for the United States. He passed away in California in 2001, leaving behind his wife, who is currently ninety-five years old, and nine children — seven of whom reside in California and two in Danang.

Vân received her education at Trường Thọ Nhân (树人学校), the only Chinese-medium school in Danang, which at the time also ran a secondary education programme. The school used to employ Taiwanese teachers and was renowned in the Chinese communities of Vietnam for its educational standard. As she had received a formal Chinese education, Vân has made sure her sons also acquire Mandarin. Even when Sino-Vietnamese relations were tumultuous and Mandarin learning and speaking invited suspicion and marginalization, she engaged a friend, a Chinese language teacher, to teach the language to Lâm Kiện (林健) (1970–), her oldest son who is the second eldest among her five children. Kiện is currently the best Mandarin speaker among his siblings. He is married to Huỳnh Quế Văn (黄桂文), whose sister, Huỳnh Quế Hà (黄桂霞), is first deputy president of Sacombank (Ngân hàng Sài Gòn Thương Tín; Saigon Commercial Bank).

In Danang, the two clan associations there are the Five Bang Association (Hội Quán Ngũ Bang), housing the Temple of the Heavenly Mother (天后宫), and Hainan Native-Place Association (Hội Quán Hải Nam), whose main deity are the 107 Hainanese heroes of Central Vietnam, Triệu Ứng Tử (昭应祠). The Five Bang Association of Danang was formed by five main Chinese dialect groups (Fujian, Teochew, Cantonese, Hainanese, and Hakka) due to their small population, while the Hainanese also has an association of their own besides being part of the Five Bang Association. An ancient belief, unique to the Hainanese of the central part of Vietnam, has it that on 16 July 1851, officers Tôn Thất Thiểu and Pha Xích killed 107 Hainanese on board three suspicious ships on the Isle of Chiem Du in Quảng Ngãi province (the province in the central region of Vietnam); one of the Hainanese on board escaped. Emperor Tự Đức then entrusted the Department of Justice to investigate the matter. When the truth of the officers' greed which caused the massacre of the Hainanese was disclosed, death sentences were passed and the emperor ordered the building of a temple to commemorate the Hainanese killed.

Vân has been the leader of Hainan Native-Place Association from 2006 to the present. She was also treasurer of the Five Bang Association from 1976 to 2004. As a leader, she has thought of a way to ensure the economic sustenance of the Hainan Native-Place Association and the continuity of its roles. In recent years, she successfully negotiated for repossession of a plot of land, formerly belonging to the Hainan Native-Place Association and nationalized in 1976. She has converted the land, located across Triệu Ứng Tử where the Hainan Native-Place Association is located into a public car park which leases out garage space to car owners for a monthly fee of 500,000 dong. Revenue from the lease helps to support the operations of the Hainan Native-Place Association.

In her private business, Vân owns several restaurants in Danang: King Palace, Queen Palace, and Kim Đô. Another restaurant she owns is located in the city next to Danang, called Kim Đô Làng Quê. King Palace has a western-style interior and its waiters serve in western uniforms; Queen Palace has a Cham-style interior and its core business is wedding banquets while Kim Đô and Kim Đô Làng Quê serve Chinese and local Central Vietnamese dishes. A beer garden restaurant, which serves a variety of Asian popular dishes in a French villa and garden next to her Kim Đô restaurant is her most recent business venture. Most of Vân's restaurants cater to international and domestic tourists, as well as corporate clients.

Vân has seven siblings residing in the United States and two in Danang. She spends time organizing activities for the Hainanese in Danang as well as maintaining ties with other Hainanese community leaders in other parts of Vietnam and in the United States. Her brother, Phan Ứng Bình (潘应平), like her, also assists in the operation of the two clan and native-place associations in Danang. Part of his time is devoted to balancing the books of the Five Bang Association.

In 2008, the Hainan Native-Place Association of Danang organized the 40th anniversary of its establishment and gathered every Hainanese clan leader in Vietnam to celebrate at its premises. It was a rare and memorable event which helped to forge relations of all the Hainanese leaders in Vietnam. It is likely that Vân will continue her community leadership as she has the assistance of her five children (one daughter and four sons) in the management of her business, thus allowing her to devote attention to community services.

Phan Xích Long

(潘赤龙, Pan Chilong; Phan Phát Sanh, 潘发生, year of birth/death unknown)
Early nationalist leader, Vietnam

Phan Xích Long was a Vietnamese nationalist leader who led the peasant movement against the French during the second decade of the twentieth century and later became a legend.

Phan Xích Long was the nickname of Phan Phát Sanh (潘发生), alias, Lạc (乐). He was the son of Phan Núi, a Chinese police agent in Chợ Lớn. The year of birth of Phan is unknown, but he emerged in the 1910s.

When he was young, Phan had aspirations to be a hero who went after villains and brought justice to the world. Since birds of the same feather flock together, he was able to organize his own group of people with similar aspirations, and to become their "big brother". According to David Marr, before becoming a secret society leader, Phan was a mystic who travelled from Vietnam to Siam as a fortune-teller. When he was away travelling, his associates installed an elderly man as a "living Buddha" in a village near Chợ Lớn. Soon peasants and trades-people came to his residence to make offerings. In mid-1912 the "living Buddha" died and Phan's associates claimed that the last words of the "living Buddha" were to make Phan the emperor.

From that time onwards, "Big brother" Phan Phát Sanh began to call himself Phan Xích Long, which means "red dragon" or Hồng Long, which also means red dragon. He acquired a yellow hat and yellow headscarf, put them on, and called himself a son of the Vietnamese king, Hàm Nghi, born in the palace of the empress. He soon named himself "emperor". Expensive accoutrements were made for the "emperor", including a medallion with the inscription, "Phan Xích Long Hoàng đế" (潘赤龙皇帝). With his "brothers", he established a secret society akin to a Heaven and Earth Society (天地会) with the purpose of pursuing a revolution against the French to restore the Vietnamese kingdom.

The aim of this Heaven and Earth Society was similar to the nationalistic, anti-Manchu/Qing dynasty Heaven and Earth societies found in China at the beginning of the Qing (Manchu) dynasty. In southern Vietnam, Heaven and Earth societies had members who were ethnic Hoa as well as Vietnamese, and they made the French occupiers the target of their struggle. In essence, therefore, Heaven and Earth societies in southern Vietnam at the beginning of the twentieth century, such as that started by Phan, were fighting for the independence of Vietnam. This society made guns and bombs for armed struggle, and leaflets for distribution all over Saigon, Chợ Lớn, and Bình Tây, to call on the people to revolt on 28 March 1913. It was said that Phan was in charge of the final attack plan which depended on a number of bombs, but the bombs failed to explode.

The uprising was soon put down and Phan was arrested in Phan Thiết. In all 111 persons were arrested and put to trial from 5–12 November 1913. After the upper courts heard the cases, fifty-four were acquitted; and six of them received life sentences of hard labour, including Phan. (However, according to Nguyễn Văn Huy, Phan was actually sentenced to death on charges of terrorism and was under detention in Chí Hòa jail in Saigon awaiting the day of reckoning. But it seems that this assertion is incorrect. Had Phan been sentenced to death, his followers would not have waited three years to stage a jailbreak.)

The capture and eventual sentences of Phan and his associates were earthshaking news to the underworld at the time. At the trial, Phan bravely told the court that he was rising against the French because they imposed heavy taxes; the bombs he placed were to cow the French into reducing taxes. He told he had learnt to make bombs in Thailand and thought nothing of death and even looked forward to a death sentence for his country.

In fact, since 1885 there had already been peasant uprisings against the French colonial government. In the twentieth century, the Vietnamese, including those of Chinese descent, continued to organize themselves to overthrow the French. The failure of the 1913 uprising did not deter them and the subsequent 1916 uprising involved more areas and took place during the German-French war. It therefore posed a more serious threat than that of 1913. Not surprisingly, the French colonial government was harsher towards the rebels in this uprising.

In March 1916, taking advantage of the German invasion of France, a number of young colleagues in Saigon from Phan's Heaven and Earth Society organized a major jailbreak to release their "big brother". The rescuers wore the black-coloured bà ba traditional tunic top and white-coloured pants, so as to recognize each other. They carried swords and machetes as weapons, and wore amulets on their chest. Some amulets were burned and dipped into water, and as they regarded the water as holy, they drank it, believing from then on they would be invincible to sword or bullets. They sneaked near the jail in small junk boats and began their operation at 3 am.

Their swords and machetes were, however, no match for French guns. Six were shot dead in the operation, and fifty-one of the rescuers were arrested and sentenced to death. On 22 February 1916, the French executed thirty-eight of these, and, on 16 March 1916, another thirteen. All the dead bodies were buried in a common grave in a field called the Common Training Ground that belonged to the church in Hiền Vương Street, Chợ Lớn.

The contemporaries of these fifty-seven people were honoured as heroes and stories about their fate were passed on orally among the people and patriots. These stories have served to inspire works of many operas, songs, and drama plays of the south.

Phat, David

(Sy Kong Huot, 徐光发, Xu Guangfa, 1946–)

Economist, writer, politician, Cambodia

David Phat is an economist specializing in studying the Cambodian economy. He is widely known for his bilingual book, Assessment of Cambodian Economy (《柬埔寨经济评论》), the first book on the macroeconomy of Cambodia, published in 2000, and one that he had started working on since 1998. The second edition of this book that was published in July 2007 was enhanced with more data and updated information on Cambodian's economic zones and rural development. Phat hopes that this book that provides a holistic picture on investment in Cambodia will, in turn, attract foreign investors to his country. In his book, he stresses that Cambodia has a liberal investment climate because companies can be wholly foreign-owned, taxes are low, and profits can be transferred out of the country without restrictions. This book was originally written in English, and was then translated into Chinese and Khmer languages. The Chinese version of the book has been reproduced in chapters by the local daily newspaper, the Commercial News, and the English version has been running in the local bi-weekly, the Mekong News and Business Advertisement. Sale of his book has since exceeded 12,000 copies, and it can be found in many bookstores and libraries worldwide.

Besides the above mentioned book on the Cambodian economy, Phat has also written a book entitled, Cambodia's Retrospect, which is about his experiences during the Khmer Rouge regime. This book has yet to be published because the genocide trial of the four top Khmer Rouge leaders for war crimes — Nuon Chea, Khieu Samphan, Ieng Sary, and Ieng Thirith — are still ongoing. During the Khmer Rouge regime, Phat's relatives and friends, who numbered as many as seventy, lost their lives.

Phat was born on 26 February 1946 in Kampot Province, to Sy Seng Yuoh alias Phat Kuy (father), and Heng Yoat Sieu (mother). His father, who was born in Hainan Province, Qiong San Prefecture, migrated to Cambodia in 1938, and married a second time after the migration, leaving his first wife and a son still living in China. Besides keeping communication ties with his immediate family, David Phat also maintains contacts with his uncle and a cousin who are also living in Hainan. During an interview with David Phat in June 2008, his own mother was said to be ninety years old while his father had passed away, at the age of 102 years. Phat is married to Diep Sieu Khin, alias Stefanie Diep Phat, and they have two sons. All his family members are now U.S. citizens. Both his sons are working in the United States, the elder as a shift mechanic, and the second, an application engineer. Phat himself is fluent in Khmer, Chinese, English, and Vietnamese, and speaks many Chinese dialects too.

Phat had gone to high school in Phnom Penh and between 1968 and 1971, worked as a manager at Khmer Honsa Airlines. Later, between 1971 and 1973, he was employed by Amtraco, an American company. He feels that he was lucky to have been employed by these companies because they helped him and his wife to evacuate from Cambodia when the Khmer Rouge came to power in April 1975. In 1973, he took up a diploma course in economics at the Chung Shing University in Taiwan and returned to Cambodia after his graduation in late 1974. After experiencing five of the hardest years under the Khmer Rouge regime, his first migration was in 1979 when he crossed the Cambodia-Vietnam border to unite with his sister in Vietnam. Between 1980 and 1988, he worked as an English teacher at Song Be High School, a former province of Dong Nam Bo region in South Vietnam. When the political situation continued to worsen in the region, he made his second migration to the Philippines in 1988. There, he found a job as an assistant teacher in the English language at the International Catholic Migration Commission, Philippines Refugee Camp. In 1989 he chanced upon an opportunity to migrate successfully to the United States with his family.

Phat's career has been diverse, having changed from an academic career to a business one after he settled down in the United States. He worked at Chinatown Express, a well known Chinese restaurant in Los Angeles, from 1990 to 1996. Then between 1996 and 2001, he returned to Cambodia to work as an operation manager at the KT Pacific Group, a company owned by his cousin, Okhna Kong Triv, who is a politician, as well as a well known entrepreneur in Cambodia. In October 2001, he returned to Los Angeles to live with his family and found a job as a case manager cum job developer at the United Vietnamese Community Council, where he stayed for three years. In May 2005, he was invited to return to the KT Group to assume the general manager position, a role he has kept to this day. During this time he has seen the company developing from a small family business in the early 1990s to a large group enterprise.

On 12 February 2007, in recognition of his knowledge in business and contributions to the economic development of Cambodia, the Government of Cambodia issued a royal decree to appoint him adviser to Samdesh, the president of the senate, and he was conferred a rank equivalent to under secretary of state. Phat also received the title of His Excellency (H.E) from then on.

Pho Chaeng

(普净, Pujing, 1901–86)
Religious leader, Thailand

Pho Chaeng Mahathera (普净上师, Master Pujing) was the monk dean general of Mahayana Buddhists in Thailand. He was also the chairperson of the Mahayana Commission of Thailand (Khana kammakan song chinnikai), and abbot of both Wat Mangkon Kamalawat and Wat Bhoman-Khunaram. His monastic name is Nengchi or Pujing. Throughout his life, he devoted himself to the promotion of Chinese Buddhist doctrines and made tremendous contributions. Through his efforts, Chinese Buddhism flourished in Thailand. Chinese Buddhist monks could be ordained in Thailand and many Chinese Buddhist temples were built. Pho Chaeng Mahathera enjoyed deep influence not only in Thailand, but also throughout Asia.

Pho Chaeng Mahathera was born on 16 June 1901 in Jieyang, Guangdong, into a gentry family whose surname was Huang. His father died when he was still very young, and he was raised by his mother, who was a devout Buddhist. Under the influence of his mother, he became interested in Buddhism and started studying various Buddhist scriptures. He admired Thailand as a flourishing Buddhist country and relocated to Thailand in 1927. He became a Theravada Buddhist monk in a temple at Phraphutthabat, Saraburi Province. During his six-year stay in Thailand, he devoted himself to the study and teaching of Buddhist doctrines. In 1934, he returned to China and was formally ordained in Huiju Temple on Baohua Mountain in Longtan, Jiangsu. During his two-year stay in Huiju Temple, he studied Buddhist doctrines diligently.

After he returned to Thailand in 1936, he established the Lihua Monastery to promote Mahayana Buddhist learning in Thailand. Many were attracted to study Buddhism under him. During the course of teaching, he felt the need to further his own studies in Buddhism. Hence he returned to China again in 1941. During this visit, he travelled to the north-western region of China, where he studied Vajrayana Buddhism.

When he returned to Thailand in 1947, he was bestowed a piece of land in Tha Maka, Kanchanaburi, by the king of Thailand to build a Vajrayana Buddhist temple, Wat Pho Yen. This became the first legal Chinese Vajrayana temple in Thailand, and was completed in 1950. While Wat Pho Yen was still under construction, Pho Chaeng Mahathera also founded the Pho Yen Hospital, Pho Yen Villa, Pho Tong Sutra Depository, and the Sangha College at the same time.

The following year, he headed to China for the third time and became the nineteenth great master of the Qianhua branch of the Ritsu School in China. He returned to Thailand in 1950 and was given the title, Left Monastic Director of the Chinese monks. In addition, he was also named abbot of Wat Pho Yen and given the religious authority to ordain monks by Thailand's Supreme Patriarch, who is the chief Buddhist monk in the country. He was the first Chinese Mahayana monk to be given such authority in Thailand.

In the following years, he was bestowed monastic titles seven times by King Bhumibol of Thailand, and was given more responsibilities within the Thai Mahayana community. In 1951 he was promoted to Right Monastic Director of the Chinese monks. Two years later, he was named abbot of Wat Mangkon Kamalawat. That same year, he became the first chairperson of the newly formed Mahayana Commission of Thailand, which manages Chinese Buddhist temples in Thailand. In 1964 he became the patriarch of the Chinese monks in Thailand.

Pho Chaeng Mahathera was celebrated widely for his efforts in promoting Chinese Buddhism. He founded and refurbished several Chinese Buddhist temples, including Wat Pho Yen, Wat Mangkon Kamalawat, and Wat Bhoman-Khunaram, which is often regarded as the most beautiful Chinese Buddhist temple in Thailand. Pho Chaeng Mahathera started preparations for the construction of the temple with bureaucrats, Chinese businessmen, and other Buddhists in Thailand from 1959. The temple was officially opened on 12 March 1964 after the first stage of construction was completed. It was finally completed after ten years. The total cost of this temple, which covers an area of 20 rai (32,000 sq. m.), was more than 30 million baht. In 1971, Wat Bhoman-Khunaram was also bestowed the honour to have the royal initials of the Thai king above its entrance.

Pho Chaeng Mahathera was also concerned about the quality of Chinese monks in Thailand. After gaining the religious authority to ordain monks, he was especially particular about the behaviour of Chinese monks and therefore set guidelines for the proper behaviour expected of them. In addition, he collected various Buddhist scriptures, and republished them in Chinese, English, and Thai to promote Chinese Buddhism in Thailand. He established numerous monastic colleges, for example, the Sangha College in 1947, and a monastic school within Wat Bhoman-Khunaram in 1966. Many of his disciples have become admirable figures within the Chinese Mahayana community.

Under his leadership, there was much development within the Chinese monastic community. Firstly, Chinese monks were able to be ordained in Thailand, instead of having to travel to China for ordination. Secondly, the Mahayana Commission of Thailand was formed as a centralized institution to manage all Chinese Buddhist temples in Thailand. Thirdly, the kathin ceremony was revived in the Chinese monastic community. After Pho Chaeng became abbot of Wat Pho Yen and Wat Mangkorn Kamalawat, he tried to revive the kathin ceremony — the ceremony of offering new robes to Buddhist monks at the conclusion of the Buddhist Lent — in the Chinese monastic community. Because of his efforts, both Thai and Chinese Buddhists, including high-ranking officials in the Thai government, could make donations during the kathin ceremony in Thailand's Chinese monastic community.

Pho Chaeng Mahathera was regarded as the most eminent monk among Southeast Asian Chinese. He was invited to give speeches or host Buddhist ceremonies in various countries, such as Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, and Laos, and was well received when he led a delegation to China.

He passed away on 25 September 1986 at the age of eighty-five. Many prominent members of the Thai Buddhist community, including the Thai Supreme Patriarch, graced his funeral.

Phoa Keng Hek

(潘景赫, Pan Jinghe, 1857–1937)
Community leader, founding president of Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan, Indonesia

The establishment of Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (THHK 中华会馆), the first modern Chinese organization in Indonesia, marked the beginning of Chinese cultural nationalism in the Dutch East Indies in the early twentieth century. It was this movement that forced the Dutch colonial government to introduce the HCS or Dutch School for the Chinese in order to win over the Peranakan Chinese. The founding president of this organization was Phoa Keng Hek, son of a wealthy kapitan.

Phoa was born in Bogor in 1857 and received his education at a traditional Hokkien school and a Dutch mission school (in Cianjur) where he came to know a fellow student, Lie Kim Hok. Phoa continued his education at the Primary School for Europeans (ELS, Bogor) and was thus able to speak and write Dutch. After marrying the daughter of a lieutenant he settled down in Jakarta and was engaged in the business of dealing in agricultural products. Because of his good command of Dutch, he was able to move in Dutch circles. At the same time he was able to communicate with the local Chinese community and, being outspoken, became the spokesman of the local Chinese.

Up to the end of the nineteenth century officers appointed by the Dutch were considered leaders by the Chinese in the community. These appointments were determined by their influence (derived mainly from wealth) in the Chinese community. Authority was vested in them by the Dutch and their function was primarily to administer the Chinese. However, by the end of the nineteenth century, a reform movement had emerged in China and Chinese nationalism was on the rise. The discrimination against ethnic Chinese in the Dutch East Indies (for example, "zoning" and the "pass system" targeting the Chinese) had also led to discontent within the Chinese community. Hence those descendants of officers and big businessmen who were exposed to modern education and political change in both China and the region started to lead a pan-Chinese movement in Java. In 1900 Phoa and other ethnic-conscious Peranakan such as Lie Kim Hok, Tan Kim San, and a totok, Lie Hin Liam, established the THHK, the first pan-Chinese association in Indonesia. Phoa served as its president up to 1923. He was not only the founding president, but also the longest serving president of the THHK.

The THHK was first established in Batavia (Jakarta) and initially aimed at promoting Confucianism, but soon developed into an organization promoting modern Chinese education in the Dutch East Indies. Phoa and his THHK group wanted reform in outdated Indonesian Chinese customs using the teachings of Confucius, especially regarding burial practices. To understand Confucianism, it was important to know the Chinese language, hence the THHK established its own schools, first in Jakarta, and later in Java and all over Indonesia. As Phoa also recognized the importance of English, the THHK offered classes for English instead of Dutch as a foreign language. The choice of Mandarin (rather than a dialect) and English for the THHK schools is significant. Phoa in a newspaper article (1907) stated:

> The Chinese in the Indies have opened their eyes. They know that the Chinese and English languages are widely used outside the Indies. It is not surprising that nowadays the Indies Chinese are more interested in teaching their children the two languages than the Dutch language, although they are still under Dutch rule. Moreover, the Chinese realize that if they are literate in Chinese and English, they can just take a two or three days voyage (Java-Singapore) into a wider world where they can move freely.
> With the knowledge [of these two languages], the Chinese here feel that the Indies is too small for them, because they are only allowed to live in a certain part of the town. If they wish to travel from one town to another, they have to obtain passes.

> I don't have to elaborate on this because it has been widely discussed in the newspapers.

It was reported that Phoa got the help of Lim Boon Keng in Singapore in finding an English school teacher for the THHK. To promote Confucianism, Phoa also personally invited Kang Youwei to visit Java in 1903 and treated Kang as an important guest. He was host to the leader of a Qing imperial mission in 1907 as well. However it was also reported that in 1911 he got in touch with the Chinese revolutionaries and supported the establishment of the Republic of China in 1912. However many of the Dutch-appointed "officers" were reportedly opposed to the revolutionaries and only accepted the ROC long after its establishment.

Phoa was also concerned with local issues and two examples illustrating this were mentioned in the local newspapers and widely known to the Indonesian Chinese communities. One was his effort to eradicate gambling, and the other, his success in breaking the robbers' syndicate. In 1904 Phoa leased a piece of private land in Bekasi (West Java) and in 1905 succeeded in securing the annual licence for operating a gambling house in Bekasi (in the Jakarta suburb). After getting the licence, he paid all the gambling taxes to the government out of his own pocket, but refused to operate the gambling house. He was sued by the local officer for breach of contract. Phoa argued that there was no stipulation that the licence holder had to operate the gambling house, and that he was doing society a good service by closing it down. He even urged the government to stop issuing gambling licences. The colonial government was unable to make him open the gambling house and so Bekasi had no gambling house, at least for a year.

At one time there were a lot of robberies in the Bekasi area. The government was unable to resolve the problem as no one was able to produce evidence that could lead to the arrest of the culprits. Apparently the robbers were collaborating with a local government officer in the robberies. The victims who wanted to get their stolen goods back had to pay 200 guilders to an agent, a sum which many of the victims could not afford. Phoa eventually collaborated with one victim and set a trap for the agent. He asked the victim to pay the agent with banknotes printed with certain serial numbers. The notes were traceable, which led to the capture of the ringleader who turned out to be a high-ranking local officer (asisten demang). Once the syndicate was dissolved, the robberies ceased.

Phoa was well known for his writings in the local newspaper. He was critical of the Dutch discriminatory policy against the Chinese and published a number of articles in Perniagaan (a major Peranakan newspaper in Jakarta) on this matter using Hoa Djin (or huaren which means "Chinese person", 华人) as his pen-name (1900s).

In 1937 Phoa received a knighthood from the Netherlands Crown, shortly before passing away in Jakarta.

Phonlachet Kitaworanat

(方思若, Fang Siruo, 1932–99)

Newspaperman, writer, entrepreneur, Thailand

Phonlachet Kitaworanat, better known as Fang Siruo among the Chinese-speaking community, made major contributions to Thai-Chinese literature and the Chinese press, and was president of Thailand's Chinese Literature Writers Association (泰华作家协会) and director of the Chinese newspaper Xinzhongyuan (《新中原》).

Fang was born in Bangkok, Thailand, in 1932. His ancestors were from Puning (普宁), Guangdong Province, China. He did not receive any formal education at all, having enrolled only in an evening school to study Chinese language for three years, but he was passionate about learning and was talented in writing. He worked as a street vendor, a construction worker and, finally, a newspaperman — the ideal career he was longing for.

Fang started his newspaper work with the Chinese newspaper, Mangu Xinwen (《曼谷新闻》, Bangkok News). Because of the company's lack of personnel and capital, he had to do almost everything. This means that he not only wrote all news releases, but was also responsible for the editing of the news section, and Mangu Gongyuan (《曼谷公园》, Bangkok Public Park), a supplement on literature and art. As a dexterous and humble writer, Fang sometimes made fun of himself, as he could write everything he was asked to. His job included, but was not limited to, editorials, film reviews, essays, short stories, novels, and poetry. Later, Fang decided to give Mangu Xinwen a new section on fiction, "Xiaoshuo" (《小说》), which soon became a readers' paradise to lovers of Chinese literature in Thailand.

When Fang took charge of this "Xiashuo" section, he appealed to his literary friends to publish their work there, especially their short stories. Many of his friends responded, and more than a hundred short stories were published in the section over a short period of time. That is why many of Fang's literary friends attribute their success in creating short stories to Fang's encouragement.

The running of a newspaper, as well as literary and artistic creation, was Fang's favourite occupation. He was smart, flexible, and creative, as demonstrated by his enthusiasm in encouraging his literary friends to join his project of writing Jielong Xiaoshuo (接龙小说), literally meaning "connecting dragon novel", which was written in turn by several writers — each author, having completed his chapter, would announce the plot of his chapter of the next author. The first such novel was Pobishe Waizhuan (《破毕舍歪传》, The crooked biography of a wealthy man who went bankrupt), which was started by Fang Siruo himself and completed by his literary friends such as Ni Changyou (倪长游), Li Xu (李栩), Yi Fei (亦非), and Shen Yiwen (沈逸文). It was well received by many readers. After its success, Fang and his wife, Pusadi Kitaworanat (He Yun, 何韵), who was also a prominent Thai-Chinese journalist, began to run their own Chinese weekly newspaper, Huafeng Zhoubao (《华风周报》), and again, invited their friends to create another novel in the form of the Jielong Xiaoshuo. The new novel, Fengyu Yaohuali (《风雨耀华力》, Yaowarat in Rainstorm), was first serialized from 1963 to 1964 in HuafengZhoubao, then printed in book form in 1983 by a publisher in Hong Kong. The nine authors who participated in it were Yi Fei, Yi She, Li Xu, Shen Yiwen, Li Hong (李虹, real name "Xu Jinghua", 许静华), Hong Ying, Bailing, Chen Qiong, and Fang Siruo (using the pen name Nai Fang, meaning Mr Fang). Yaowarat was a flourishing typical Chinatown in Bangkok, where a large number of ethnic Chinese of every class lived. Stories in the novel were set here, when two men of Chinese origin from southern Thailand, Li Jun and Ya Fu, came to earn a living in Bangkok. Li Jun was a soft-hearted intellectual who dreamed of being a Chinese newspaper man, while Ya Fu was a funny, less educated man who seemed to understand life better than Li Jun. They rented a cheap room in a small apartment owned by a greedy Chinese landlady in Yaowarat Road. In the same building, they made new friends and struggled on with their lives. The novel was very successful, and has become a classic in Sino-Thai literature.

However, Fang's Huafeng Zhoubao was unfortunately closed by the Thai authorities as it was considered to have been pro-People's Republic of China, and during that period, the Thai authorities were still suspicious of Beijing. Fang was prohibited from running a newspaper again. As a result, he had to give up literature and move into business In fact, the ban of Huafeng Zhoubao was a blessing in disguise for Fang. The real estate company that he established, Happy Land Group, later became very well known in Thailand, and contributed extensively to the development of the Bangkapi area of Bangkok.

Although Fang Siruo was a wealthy businessman, he never forgot where he came from. After the normalization of relations between Thailand and China in 1975, he returned to his lifelong love for literature. He took over the Chinese newspaper, Xinzhongyuan, and became its director in 1985. Under his supervision, the supplementary page on "literature and art" was vivid and dramatic. More importantly, Fang called on the literary circle to establish Thailand's Chinese Literature Writers Association with himself as its first president. In the "Foreword" of Thailand's Chinese Literary Magazine (《泰华文学杂志》) Fang wrote: "We are an old ox pulling an old cart on rough and muddy roads. We keep moving forward … regardless of the dead end; or whether there is a way out or not. We will continue our writing, and raise our standards. Thus, we have to do our best for our generation." This remarkable quotation reflects Fang's spirit of fortitude in promoting Chinese literature in Thailand.

Phraya Ratsadanupradit

(Khaw Sim Bee na Ranong, 许心美, Xu Xinmei, 1857–1913)

Businessman, governor of Ranong, Thailand

Born in the southern Thai province of Ranong in 1856, Phraya Ratsadanupraditmahitsoraphakdi or Khaw Sim Bee was the youngest son of the Fujian-born merchant Khaw Soo Cheang. His father had immigrated to Penang in the early 1820s and, after a period on that island, established himself in trading between Penang and such centres on the west coast of southern Siam as Phang Nga, Takua Pa, and Ranong. That trade saw cloth and other imported goods exchanged for products such as black pepper, tin, copra, and bird's nests.

Khaw Soo Cheang invested in the mining sector in Ranong and also went into the business of transporting Chinese coolies from Penang to work in the province's tin mines. In 1844 he secured the tax farm on tin in Ranong and was created of Luang Rattanasetthi. Not least in recognition of the revenues that he had transmitted to the Bangkok state, Khaw Soo Cheang was named governor of Ranong as Phra Ratthanasetthi in 1854. He was awarded the title Phraya Rattanasetthi in 1862 and died in 1882 as Phraya Damrongsucharitmahitphakdi. Among his elder sons, one would serve as governor of Lang Suan, and another would succeed him as governor of Ranong.

Some sources report that Khaw Sim Bee lacked any formal education and was, though multilingual, illiterate. At age twenty-five he became deputy governor of Ranong, serving under his brother Khaw Sim Kong, and was created Luang Siriraklohawisai. Four years later, in 1885, he became governor of Kraburi as Phra Atsadongkotthitraksa.

During a tour of the South in 1890/91, King Chulalongkorn noted the contrast between the poor state of administration in Trang and Khaw Sim Bee's achievements in Kraburi. He decided to appoint Khaw Sim Bee governor of Trang, with the title Phraya Ratsadanupraditmahitsoraphakdi.

Phraya Ratsada or Khaw Sim Bee made a great success of his work in Trang. Taking an active, developmentalist approach to government and to the economy of this centre of black pepper cultivation and node of Chinese settlement, he integrated the newly elected village headmen more fully into provincial administration, promoted the agricultural sector, and built roads. These latter included a seventy-kilometre road from Trang across the mountains in the centre of southern Siam to Phatthalung Province on the east coast of the peninsula. In 1893/94, he moved the province's seat of government or mueang from Khuan Thani to Kantang, on the Trang River some twelve kilometres from the sea. He laid out a well planned mueang at this new site and developed Kantang as an important port in Penang's commercial and social hinterland on the Andaman coast of Siam.

Trang's emergence as a model of administration for other Siamese provinces led King Chulalongkorn to promote Phraya Ratsada to the post of superintendent-commissioner of Phuket Circle in 1900. Under the thetsaphiban system introduced by interior minister Prince Damrong Rachanuphap starting in 1893, Siam's administrative circles, or monthon, grouped several provinces together as a means of furthering the Bangkok state's and its representatives' penetration, control, and administration of them. Phuket Circle included the provinces of Satun, Trang, Krabi, Phang Nga, Phuket, Takua Pa, and Ranong — the entirety that is, of the west coast of southern Siam from the border with Malaya to that with Burma.

In his new position, Phraya Ratsada introduced and energetically pursued policies similar to those that his developmentalist vision had brought to Trang. These policies fell in the areas of education, public health, local administration, and road building. They included the promotion of agriculture, commerce, and mining. And they saw Phraya Ratsada follow the example of his father in Ranong in bringing public order to a society made volatile by the presence of large numbers of immigrant Chinese mine workers and by the activities of "secret societies" among them.

In 1896/97, Phraya Ratsada joined King Chulalongkorn's party on a trip to Java in the Netherlands East Indies. He subsequently made a second trip there, this one devoted to studying the construction of roads in mountainous terrain. At the latest by the time of the latter trip, Phraya Ratsada had grown interested in the possibility of introducing Pará rubber to southern Siam and in its potential contribution to the economy of Phuket Circle. Aware of the rapid spread of rubber cultivation in Malaya during 1895–1900 and able by 1901–02 to arrange the licit export of planting materials to Siam, Phraya Ratsada introduced the new crop to Trang. In keeping with his customary developmentalist approach and working with his nephew and successor as Trang governor, Penang Free School alumnus Phraya Sunthorn (Khaw Joo Keat), he established a government demonstration plantation, made planting materials available to cultivators, and introduced further incentives to stimulate adoption of the new crop. His work helped make Trang and neighbouring parts of Phuket Circle one of the three principal areas in which Siam's smallholder-dominated rubber economy emerged in the first years of the twentieth century. The other two were Narathiwat Province, adjacent to the Malay state of Kelantan, and the Betong area of Yala Province, abutting Kedah and Perak at the southernmost point of Siamese territory.

One must understand Phraya Ratsada's role in the transmission of rubber from Malaya to the west coast of southern Siam in the context of his own and, more broadly, the Khaw family's leading position from the 1890s up until at least the time of the First World War in diverse sectors of the economy of that coast. These sectors included tin mining and smelting; tax farming; shipping and the trade in manufactured imports and primary exports; and provisioning tin mines with opium, labourers, and other supplies. The family's enterprises dominated the economy of Siam's Andaman coast. Other Penang concerns active there effectively operated under the umbrella of Khaw interests. Throughout Phraya Ratsada's long years of distinguished service to Siam, Penang remained in many ways at the centre of his activities; he maintained a large Italianate residence, named Chakrabong House after a son of King Chulalongkorn, in George Town.

Bangkok's reliance on Phraya Ratsada and other members of the Khaw family to bring order, modern administration, and prosperity to the west coast of peninsular Siam succeeded in three important regards. That reliance consolidated Siam's hold on that coast, blocked its informal colonization by Britain, and made it an important source of Siamese state revenue. At the same time, this policy reinforced the social and commercial linkages that tied the coast to Penang and, that, along with the infrastructure and prosperity that Phraya Ratsada helped foster in Phuket Circle, made it very much a place apart from the rest of Siam.

In 1911 King Wachirawut appointed Phraya Ratsada to his Privy Council. This honour recognized not only his long service to Bangkok and his success in consolidating administration on the west coast of peninsular Siam but also the important contribution of Phuket Circle under Phraya Ratsada's administration to the Siamese fisc. In late February 1913, a member of the staff of the Trang hospital shot Phraya Ratsada and his nephew Khaw Joo Keat on the docks in Kantang. Taken to Penang, Phraya Ratsada died on 10 April and his nephew less than a month later. Phraya Ratsada was buried alongside his father's tomb in Ranong on 1 June 1913.

On 1 July 1915, King Wachirawut bestowed the surname "na Ranong" on Khaw Yu Ngee, a grandson of Khaw Soo Cheang who at the time held the title of Phraya Rattanasetthi and served as governor of Ranong. The Thai branch of the Khaw family has used that surname ever since. Its many distinguished members have included Kittirat na Ranong, a former managing director of the Securities Exchange of Thailand who became minister of commerce and deputy prime minister in the government of Yingluck Shinawatra in August 2011. Although he was murdered before the surname's bestowal, Phraya Ratsada is known in Thailand as Khaw Sim Bee na Ranong.

Following the end of Siam's absolute monarchy in 1932, and despite both his close association with the ancien régime and his Chinese ethnicity, the country's new rulers in the People's Party invoked Phraya Ratsada's developmentalism with approval. In April 1951, during the second premiership of Field Marshal Po. Phibunsongkhram, five days of celebrations marked the dedication of a memorial honouring Phraya Ratsada in Trang. Featuring a statue of Phraya Ratsada, the monument was built in a pleasant park on the outskirts of the provincial centre at Thap Thiang, to which the mueang moved from Kantang just three or four years after Phraya Ratsada's demise. Standing on the same road to Phatthulung Province that Phraya Ratsada built during his term of service as Trang's governor, the monument symbolizes the Bangkok state's recognition of Khaw Sim Bee as an important figure in Thailand's national history. Serving as Trang's provincial monument, it is the site of an official ceremony to honour his legacy on 10 April of every year.

Pitt Chin Hui

(毕俊辉, Bi Junhui, 1906–81)

Lay Buddhist, educator, philanthropist, Singapore

Pitt Chin Hui was a devotee of Buddhism, a lay practitioner who was very interested in research and cultural work. She translated Buddhist scriptures, gave Buddhism talks on radio, and wrote bilingual Buddhism textbooks for both primary and secondary levels. Ven. Siong Khye (常凯法师) regarded the founding of Maha Bodhi School (菩提学校) and the World Fellowship of Buddhists Regional Centre in Singapore as the two gems of her contributions. He also commended her on her display of exemplary patience, determination, and resilience, which were keys to her many accomplishments in life.

Pitt was born on 23 September 1906 to a wealthy family in Hua County (花县), Pitt Village (毕村) in Guangdong, China. This birth date is verified by Pitt's nephew, Pitt Kuan Wah, and the "year" is as stated in her oral history records as well. The "1900" indicated in her autobiography could have been a typographical error. Her original name was a more feminine "Pitt Xiuying" (毕秀英), but she did not want to be a girl, and being the youngest in the family, as well as pampered and spoilt, she just changed it to the more masculine one she was known by. Her father passed away when she was one and her mother, Feng Qingkui (冯清葵), who was not willing to continue living in the village, left and joined a relative who was doing business in Penang. She returned later to fetch Pitt when the young girl was five so that she could receive a desired education. Pitt's mother was illiterate, and having realized the importance of education, arranged for a bilingual education for Pitt in Penang. In 1925, Pitt started teaching English at the Fujian Girls' School (福建女子学校). Two years later, her mother sent her to the Foreign Language Department of the Zhongshan University (中山大学) in Guangzhou where she furthered her studies and attended classes in the Chinese Language Department occasionally as well. However, she had to terminate her studies and return to Penang to take care of her mother who became seriously ill. After her mother's recovery, Pitt returned to Fujian Girls' School as an English teacher again.

In 1932, she chanced upon lectures by Ven. Taixu (太虚大师) and his disciple, Ven. Chee Hong (慈航法师), at the Khek Lok Si Temple (极乐寺) in Penang. She realized that Buddhism was not based on superstition, but was a doctrine that appealed to those who sought freedom from suffering. She then became a disciple of Ven. Chee Hong after Ven. Taixu had left, and studied Buddhism and Chinese culture under him at the Bodhi Institute (菩提学院). Pitt later became one of the founders of the Maha Bodhi Primary School (菩提小学) in Penang, teaching English and Buddhism in the afternoon, while retaining her teaching position at Fujian Girls' School, where she conducted English classes in the morning.

During the Japanese Occupation in the early 1940s, Pitt was the secretary (English) of the Rescue and Welfare Society, and escaped tragedy as the Japanese respected the Buddhists. In 1944, she went to Leng Feng Bodhi Institute (灵峰菩提学院) in Singapore with her teacher Ven. Chee Hong, and returned to Penang the following year after the Japanese had surrendered, and resumed her teaching at the Maha Bodhi Primary School. Pitt returned to Singapore in 1946 to lecture at Fah Si Lam Temple (法施林). It was then that Ven. Chee Hong encouraged her to stay in Singapore to establish a school like the Maha Bodhi Primary School in Penang. He felt that there was a need to promote education of the Buddhist way on this heavily populated piece of land.

After much hard work, Pitt was finally able to rent a shophouse at 743 Geylang Road as a temporary site, and the first Buddhist school in Singapore, Maha Bodhi School, was officially founded on 12 January 1948. Though a founder of the school, Pitt was not its first principal. Sister Wong Loon Soo (王弄书居士) was. Pitt herself taught in the morning and went around collecting monthly or yearly sponsorships in the afternoon. As finance was a problem, she also set up a night school and the fees collected were used to help pay for the school's expenses. As enrolment picked up after the board of directors was established in 1949, expansion was inevitable, and thus in 1950, the board decided to transfer the management of the school to the Singapore Buddhist Federation, and expansion was made possible with the financial assistance from philanthropist Aw Boon Haw (胡文虎). This was the same year when Wong returned to Penang and Pitt took over as principal. Maha Bodhi became a government-aided school in 1957 and continued to grow in scale. In 1969, due to Pitt's bilingual background, the Ministry of Education requested the school to conduct English classes, and so in 1970, Maha Bodhi School became the first government-aided school to provide a bilingual education. The academic performance of its pupils excelled over the years, and Maha Bodhi, together with Mee Toh School (弥陀学校), has since become renowned Buddhist schools. Pitt retired in 1971 and took up the appointment of honorary principal-cum-supervisor. In addition to Maha Bodhi, she also co-founded the Singapore Vocational Girls' Secondary School (新加坡女子职业中学) — which later became Pei Dao Secondary School (培道中学) — where she was a member of the school management committee. Pitt was involved in the development of another Buddhist school, the first and only Buddhist secondary school in Singapore, Manjusri Secondary School (文殊中学), and was a member of its school-building committee.

She was very active in Buddhist studies and activities. In December 1959, she started the task of translating the Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva Sutra from Chinese to English for the English-educated. Back in 1950, she had represented the Singapore Buddhist Federation, together with Ven. Kong Hiap, at the World Fellowship of Buddhists inaugural meeting in Colombo. On their return, she suggested to the Singapore Buddhist Federation that it set up an English section, incorporating a Singapore World Fellowship of Buddhists Regional Centre, but was rejected. The Regional Centre was set up two years later as an independent unit, with Pitt appointed honorary president, and H.G. Abeyratne, honorable secretary. The centre was active in promoting international Buddhist activities and charity works in Singapore. Pitt was also head of education for the Singapore Buddhist Federation, consultant for the National University of Singapore Buddhist Society among other roles she took on.

She contributed to charity mainly through her leadership at the Regional Centre, raising funds for various charities and welfare organizations such as the Association for the Deaf, Singapore Anti-Tuberculosis Association, Thong Chai Medical Institution (同济医院), Chung Hwa Medical Institution (中华医院), St Andrew's Children's Hospital, etc. Children and old folks' homes under the Social Welfare Department also benefited from her relentless efforts. She was also a member of the inspection committees of the Social Welfare Department on old folks' homes, Singapore Anti-Narcotics Association, etc. Some of her other social commitments included being a consultant for Singapore Kwong Wai Siew Peck San Theng (广惠肇碧山亭公所), honorary chairman of Fa Yun Clan Assocation (花县会馆), etc.

Pitt was recognized for her contributions to charity, education, and culture through various honour and awards, including the prestigious Public Service Star (BBM) by the first president of Singapore, Yusof bin Ishak, in 1964. In 1979, she was appointed justice of the peace by the second president, Dr Benjamin Henry Sheares.

Pitt passed away on 28 October 1981 in India at the All India Institute of Medical Sciences, New Delhi. She had remained single throughout her life and had a nephew in Singapore, Pitt Kuan Wah, who is director of National Archives of Singapore.

Preecha Phisitkasem

(谢慧如, Xie Huiru, 1913–96)

Philanthropist, Thai-Chinese community leader, promoter of Chinese culture, Thailand

Preecha Phisitkasen, better known as Xie Huiru in the Thai Chinese community, was the leader of the Teochew (Chaozhou) Clan Association (潮州会馆) and a promoter of Chinese culture.

Xie Huiru was born in 1913 in his ancestral Yihu Village, a poor and distant village located in Chao'an City in Guangdong Province of China. He was the fifth child in the family. Because of poverty, Xie did not receive a proper education as a child. He had to help his brothers earn a living, while his sister was sold as a child bride. He had to flee to Thailand when he was only fourteen because he was suspected by the Chinese government at the time (Kuomintang) of being involved in communist activities. After arriving in Thailand, Xie worked as secretary in a rice mill in Khon Kaen Province. He then set up his own agricultural products processing factory, developing business and engaging in international trade. It was not until the end of the 1960s that he moved to Bangkok and became a tycoon, owning more than seventy solely owned enterprises or joint ventures in rice, sugar, liquor, mining, construction, textiles, insurance, export and import, finance, cold storage, brick industries, and other fields. His companies included Tai Lian Co., Ltd.; Tai Lian Stack Co., Ltd.; Tai Lian Insurance Co., Ltd.; Tai Lian Construction Co., Ltd.; Bangkok Metropolitan Rice Mill Co., Ltd.; Yu He Long Local Product Co., Ltd.; Chumphon Sawmill Co., Ltd.; and Chumphon Mining Co., Ltd.

In the 1980s Xie handed over most of his business responsibilities to his children in order to engage more fully in philanthropy. He donated 30 million baht in sponsorship to Guo Fengyuan, a Taoist master, to build the Wihan Sian, a combined Buddhist/Taoist structure for antique exhibitions in Thailand. The Wihan Sian projected a glorious image of China and communicated the culture of and the emotions on two sides of the Taiwan Straits. He donated another 30 million baht to build a Buddhist Scriptures Tower to store the Tripitaka of the Tang Dynasty that he bought from China.

At the beginning of the summer of 1991, a rare flood disaster struck eastern and central China, while Shantou City was stricken by the typhoon No. 7, leading to tremendous losses. Xie Huiru took the lead in donating HK$1 million and 10,000 bags of rice to the disaster area.

Xie sought to provide proper Chinese education to the descendants of Thai Chinese. Hence, he donated 30 million baht to set up the Thai Chinese Culture Central Foundation (泰国中华文化慈善基金会) together with other Thai Chinese leaders and became its chairman. Later, he set up the Bangkok Oriental Culture Academy (东方文化书院) to provide part-time Chinese courses to adults. He donated another 37 million baht to facilitate the opening of the Huachiew Chalermprakiet University to develop Chinese university education in Thailand. Additionally, he donated 5 million baht to both the Srinakorn Foundation School in Hatyai and the Huachiew School in Khon Kaen.

The Bangkok Oriental Culture Academy was the project to which Xie devoted most of his efforts. His investment in the academy was estimated to be 100 million baht.

During the eight years from 1986 to 1994, Xie visited China ten times and donated considerable funds to the public welfare sector, totalling more than 100 million baht.

In Shantou City, Xie donated 20 million baht to create the Xie Huiru Chaozhou Folk Opera Art Center (谢慧如潮剧艺术中心), the Chenghai Guye Park, the Chao Shan Xing He Foundation (潮汕星河奖基金), the Welfare Foundation of Shantou, the Children's Welfare Fund of Shantou (汕头市儿童福利基金会), the Education Foundation of Shantou and the Advanced Vocational School of Shantou. He also sponsored the repair of the "Song Jing" gate on Nan Ao Island.

His hometown Chaozhou was the place to which Xie dedicated most of his effort in China, with donations of about 70 million yuan. While many construction projects were named after him, such as Huiru Park (慧如公园), Xie Huiru Library (谢慧如图书馆), Huiru Building (慧如楼), Huiru Road (慧如路), and Huiru Hall (慧如堂), there were also many public welfare organizations not named after him, such as schools, the Yile Theater (艺乐宫), a Thai temple, an education fund, a scholarship, and the honorary citizen award fund. The name of Xie Huiru was popular in the Chaozhou and Shantou area and the Guangdong Education Publisher even compiled his story in Chinese textbooks for primary schools.

Xie became one of the first directors of the China Population Welfare Foundation (中国人口福利基金会) and its only foreign director. He was also invited to be a permanent honorary consultant to the Sichuan Provincial Government; honorary chairman of the board of directors and visiting professor of Sichuan Union University; honorary consultant to the Tianjin municipal government; and permanent honorary chairman of the Chinese Culture Promotion Society of Tianjin Province. He had other honorary titles, such as "honorary citizen of Shantou" and "honorary citizen of Chaozhou". He was also honorary chairman of the Chaozhou Returned Ethnic Chinese Federation, honorary director general of the Children's Welfare Foundation, honorary director general of the Chaozhou Xinghe Foundation, and permanent honorary chairman of the Chaozhou Folk Opera Art Center, and the Chaozhou Folk Opera Development Foundation (潮剧发展基金会), among others.

Xie passed away on 12 May 1996. He was survived by three sons and two daughters.

Puey Ungphakon

(黄培谦, Huang Peiqian, 1916–99)

Leading Thai economist, educator, Thailand

Puey Ungphakon was born on 9 March 1916 in Talat Noi, Bangkok. His father, Nai Sar Ung, was an immigrant from China who worked in the fish market in Paknam. Puey's mother, Nang Soh Cheng, was Thai-Chinese, the eldest daughter of the owner of a cloth store in the Sampheng area. Puey was the fourth of seven children in his family.

Puey studied in the French program at Assumption School and after graduating at eighteen became a teacher in the school. In 1934, he decided to further his studies at Thammasat University and successfully graduated with a bachelor's degree in law and politics in 1937. On graduating from the university, Puey resigned from his position at Assumption School and became an interpreter for a French lecturer at Thammasart University.

In 1938, Puey won a government scholarship to further his studies in Britain. He subsequently attained a bachelor's degree in economics from the University of London and was granted the Leverhulme Scholarship to further his studies at the doctoral level. However, the Second World War broke out, and Puey decided to postpone his studies in order to give his full support to the Free Thai movement.

When Japanese troops invaded Thailand in December 1941, Prime Minister Field Marshal P. Phibunsongkhkram decided to become an ally of Japan and declare war against the Allied Powers. During that time, a group of Thai people worked against Japan as members of the Free Thai movement both domestically and internationally. Puey joined this movement in Britain and became a captain in the British army. He was then sent for training in guerilla warfare and espionage in India and subsequently sent back to Thailand in September 1943. He and his team attempted to establish a radio station to facilitate communications between the British Army in India and Free Thai agents in Thailand. Unfortunately, Puey ended up being arrested and charged with espionage and treason. It was with the help of Free Thai connections within the Thai police department that Puey had the chance to meet Pridi Banomyong, who was the Free Thai leader in Thailand. After the meeting, Free Thai agents managed to communicate with the British Army in India via radio.

At the conclusion of the war, Puey married Margaret Smith. In 1946, he resumed his interrupted doctoral studies at the London School of Economics and graduated in 1948.

On completion of his studies, he returned to Thailand in 1949. His first position as a civil servant was economist in the Comptroller General's Office in the Ministry of Finance. His contribution to the post-war recovery of the Thai economy earned him widespread recognition, and he rose rapidly through the ranks of the government's financial officers. In the early 1950s, Puey became the deputy governor of the Bank of Thailand. He participated in the adjustment of exchange rates between the baht and other currencies, which enhanced the financial stability of Thailand.

During his tenure as deputy governor of the Bank of Thailand, Puey clashed seriously with the highest authorities of the military government of the time. He refused to support Field Marshal Sarit Thanarat's proposal to purchase the Union Bank of Bangkok because of the bank's violation of the Bank of Thailand's regulations. Moreover, Puey was in conflict with Police Director General Phao Siyanon on the issue of the employment of banknote printing operators. As a result, he was demoted to the position of consultant in the Ministry of Finance, stationed at the embassy of Thailand in Britain, in 1956.

In 1959, Field Marshal Sarit Thanarat called Puey back to serve the government again, offering him the position of minister of finance. Puey refused this position, but took the post of governor of the Bank of Thailand in the end. He was concurrently director of the Economy and Finance Bureau, supervising both monetary policy and national finance. It was because of his contribution during his role as governor of Bank in Thailand that he was presented the Magsaysay Award for government service.

Puey played an important role in implementing Thailand's National Economic Development Plan. He also set up the first banknote printing company in Thailand and promulgated the Commercial Banking Act of Thailand in 1962. He also contributed to the expansion Thai banks' branch networks.

In 1964, he became dean of the Faculty of Economics at Thammasat University.

In 1971, Puey was invited to give a special lecture at Cambridge University. While he was in Britain, he wrote an open letter to Field Marshal Thanom Kittikhachon, prime minister and leader of the military junta that had seized power nearly a decade earlier, requesting that the military government resign and re-establish the democratic system of government at once. Puey signed the letter with his Free Thai codename, Khem Yenying. The authorities were dissatisfied with the letter, and Puey was obliged to resign from his position as dean of Thammasat's Faculty of Economics.

After the events of 14 October 1973, the military government was driven away and Puey was elected to succeed Sanya Dharmasakti as rector of Thammasat University on 31 January 1975. He was the first Thammasat graduate to become rector of the university.

In the era when Puey was rector of Thammasat University, political conditions were severe. Conflicts between the rightists and leftists escalated to a feverish height. Thammasat University was the centre stage of what was perceived to be the ultimate fight for social justice. On 6 October 1976, groups of the rightist militia surrounded Thammasat and later entered the university and violently dissolved student demonstrations within the walls of the university. The incident caused massive injuries and deaths. Puey resigned from his position and went into exile in Europe, living there until his death.

He died of a haemorrhage in the abdominal cavity on 28 July 1999 in London at the age of eighty-three. He is survived by his three sons, John, Peter, and Giles Ungphakon.

(方侨生, Fang Qiaosheng, 1946–)
Banker, Cambodia

Pung Kheav Se, who was born in 1946 in Phnom Penh, has transformed himself from a refugee to the founder of the largest bank in Cambodia, the Canadia Bank Public Ltd. Co., which holds a quarter of the nation's bank deposits. He is also the owner of the Independence Beach Resort Hotel in Sihanouville and the Sorya Shopping Centre in Phnom Penh. In terms of community involvement, he is chairman of both the Cambodian Bankers Association and Cambodia's Foreign Trade Banks. In the Cambodian political arena, he acts as the economic adviser to Cambodian Prime Minister Hun Sen.

On 11 November 1991, Pung's bank was established through a joint venture with Cambodia State bank and was named Canadia Gold and Trust Corporation Limited. Its primary services was offering transactions in gold, gold coin manufacture, and granting credit to local merchants. On 19 April 1993 the bank's name was changed to Canadia Bank Ltd., and it was licensed as a commercial bank with the National Bank of Cambodia and registered with the Ministry of Commerce. On 16 December 2003, it was renamed Canadia Bank PLC (Public Limited Company) and became the largest local bank offering various financial services through its branches within the country and international correspondent banks outside Cambodia. In Phnom Penh today, the building housing Canadia Bank PLC is 118 metres high, and is the only architectural structure that is higher than the Cambodian imperial palace.

Pung's parents migrated from Chao'an, Guangdong, in the 1930s. Like for most new migrants, making a living in a new place was not easy. His father started as a teacher in Cambodia, but when his family grew larger over the years, his salary was barely enough to provide two meals for the family. Soon, he decided to stop teaching and start selling vegetable seeds. With some savings from his small business, he opened a printing shop where his wife was tasked to manage the shop's daily operations.

Pung recalls that he never had a toy in his childhood. Clothes were passed down from the eldest child to the youngest child in his family. By the time he received his brother's clothes, they were usually too big or too old. He would wear these clothes before passing them to his younger brother.

Pung started to help in his father's business after finishing his secondary school. His father's business did not last long as the Khmer Rouge seized power in the 1970s. City dwellers were deported to the countryside to become farmers and Pung's family was not spared — they had to move to the countryside to do three years of collective farming and forced labour under the government's agrarian policy. During the three years of hardship nationwide, many people starved to death, especially elderly people. In the turmoil Pung lost his father and eight relatives and friends. All these made him decide to escape to the refugee camp in Thailand.

In 1978 Pung and his surviving family members tried to escape to Thailand, but they were caught by the Vietnamese army and ended up starting a new life in Vietnam. Here he survived working as a gold crafter. In 1980, after a period of eight months in Vietnam, Pung and his family made a second attempt to escape to Thailand, and this time they succeeded in making their way to the Thai refugee camp. They were later evacuated by the Canadian Government to seek asylum there.

In Canada Pung started a home-based gold craft business and made his name for himself because of his good gold craftsmanship. He was also known to be a person who never failed to deliver goods on time to his customers. As a result, many fellow Cambodians who had migrated to Canada found him to be a reliable person and preferred engaging him to help them remit their savings to their families in Cambodia than going through the local banks there. In 1981 he set up the Eastern Finance Company in Montreal's Chinatown in Canada. His customers were mainly overseas Chinese migrants from Southeast Asia who had migrated to Canada. Initially his business was in terms of sums remitted, but it gradually grew and by 1989 he had already helped remit an accumulated US$5 million. This remittance service he engaged in later motivated him to set up a bank in Cambodia.

In 1988 Pung received a letter from his uncle who had returned to Cambodia from Paris. In the letter his uncle explained that the political and economic situation had improved in Cambodia and that it was time to go back there to start a business. Therefore, in 1991 he led his family back to Cambodia. At the time he was not very confident about the Cambodian Government although their policy emphasized on attracting foreign investment, especially from Cambodian returnees. He started to invest in a trust company that could also provide banking services. At the time, there were only five banks in Cambodia. In February 1992, the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC) was established in Phnom Penh to ensure the implementation of Agreements on the Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict. UNTAC brought along an international team of approximately 20,000 soldiers and civilian police to carry out its mission. By the time the UNTAC mission in Phnom Penh completed its assignment in September 1993, Pung's business had grown tremendously because of the huge quantity of deposits the bank had received from the troops when they were stationed in Cambodia.

In 1993, because of the rapid growth of his financial business, the governor of the Bank of Cambodia proposed that he transform his trust company into a bank to achieve synergy with the government. At the time, his set-up capital was US$1.5 million. Business has flourished and, by 2002, his bank's total assets had grown to US$174 million. Of this sum, deposits amounted to more than US$150 million, and reserves came up to approximately US$18 million, accounting for 26 per cent and 32 per cent, respectively of the country's total deposits and reserves.

Since its privatization in 1998, the Canadia Bank PLC has become the largest local bank in Cambodia. It offers a wide range of financial services through its head office and its twenty-three branches in Phnom Penh and major cities throughout the country. Pung's bank was the first commercial bank to use the smart card and ATM machine in Cambodia. It also became the principal member of MasterCard and VISA card in 2001 and 2003 respectively. This has helped to enhance the country's image.

Pusadi Kitaworanat

(Hoh-Ung, 何韵, He Yun, 1938–)
Thai-Chinese journalist, Thailand

Pusadi Kitaworanat, also known as He Yun to her Chinese readers, is a renowned female political journalist in Thailand. She made a name for herself among politicians and journalists through her reports and was president of the Thai Journalists' Association up to 2009. She took over the management of the New Chinese Daily with her husband, Phonlachet Kitaworanat, in December 1985, and became the first female journalist to own a newspaper in Thailand.

Pusadi was born in 1938, the only daughter of a poor Chinese family in Thailand. She studied four years of Chinese while she was receiving her primary education in a Chinese school. She continued her secondary education in a Thai school while tutoring younger pupils to help supplement her family's income. After graduating from secondary school, she enrolled in Thammasat University's Faculty of Commerce. However, with the encouragement of her husband (then a friend), she switched to journalism. During her undergraduate years, she worked as a translator for the university's public relations department, and had to keep tabs on all Chinese publications in Thailand. Moreover she continued to work as a tutor, as well as night shifts at the Sirinakhon Chinese newspaper. Holding these jobs, she was able to finance her undergraduate studies and support her family.

In 1963 she graduated from Thammasat University and started working as a reporter for a newspaper. By now, she has been in the profession for more than forty years and has worked for Thai, English, and Chinese newspapers. Of the newspapers she has worked for, she has worked at the New Chinese Daily for the longest period of time. She has been the editor-in-chief and general manager there since 1985. She also worked for The Nation, an English-language newspaper, for thirteen years. Other newspapers she has worked for include Sing Sian Yit Pao and Tong Hua Daily News.

Pusadi started a column titled "Anecdotes during Interviews" (采访外记) in 1971, which turned out to be very popular. The popularity of this column is often attributed to her timely and truthful reports. In addition to her column, her special interviews also enjoyed much popularity. Many of her special interviews became the talk of the town after publication; some were even reprinted in Chinese newspapers in other countries, such as Singapore, Hong Kong, and China. This is a phenomenon rarely seen for a Thai Chinese journalist. In 1988 some of her columns, articles, and special interviews were reprinted in a collection entitled The Life of a Female Journalist: The World in the eyes of a Female Ethnic Chinese Journalist (《女记者生涯传真——一个华裔女记者眼中的世界》). This book is the first of a series of books published to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Chinese Daily newspaper (《中原报》).

The success of Pusadi's career is often thought to be the result of her sensitivity for politics, and her passion for the job. Because of her sensitivity, she is often able to sense an important change in politics even before the change is publicized. This enables her to break news before other reporters and she was thus nicknamed "the news falcon". Moreover, this sensitivity also enables her to write her reports focusing only on the important aspects. Her passion for the profession is most evident in her working attitude. She perseveres until she has obtained the necessary materials for her reports. For example, she will wait several hours to interview a subject and will also sacrifice her sleep and call ministers in the middle of the night for the latest updates on news. She is nicknamed "Iron Lady", as she never shows any tiredness despite her busy schedule. Apart from that, she is also praised for her professional ethics. Besides providing the latest, reliable news to readers, Pusadi also acts responsibly towards her sources. She will keep their identities confidential when requested, and does not distort their words. As a result, many important people welcome her to interview them. However, her career has not always been smooth sailing. She was blacklisted by Thanin Kraiwichian government (1976–77) for writing a critique of government personnel. Though she was able to keep her job at The Nation, she lost her job at the Chinese newspaper she was working for at the time.

In December 1985 she and her husband, Phonlachet Kitaworanat, took over a Chinese newspaper, the New Chinese Daily. He assumed the post of chairperson of the board of directors while Pusadi became editor and general manager. As a shareholder of the New Chinese Daily, she is thus "the First Female Boss in the Chinese Media of Thailand".

Through her husband, she also became involved in Thai Chinese literary circles. Phonlachet Kitaworanat, also known as Pung Sue Ziak (方思若), is a prominent Thai-Chinese writer and founder of the Thai Chinese Writers Association. In 1987 she accompanied him in leading a literary delegation to China. She was also the adviser to the delegation and later became adviser to Thai Sino-literature (《泰华文学》), a Chinese literary journal in Thailand. She is also active in other cultural activities. She founded the Artists' Promotion Group in 1990, which organizes events to help raise funds for various charitable causes. Pusadi is currently the editor of the New Chinese Daily, a member of the advisory board of the Thai Journalists' Association after being its president for years, and an adviser to the Thai Sino-literature.

Quách Đàm

(郭琰, Guo Yan, 郭谭, Guo Tan, 1863–1927)
Business leader, Vietnam

Quách Đàm (also known as 郭谭 or Guo Tan in Chinese) had the nickname, Thông Hiệp (通协). He was probably born around the year 1863, and was from Chao'an (潮安) in Guangdong, China. When he was about seventeen (one source says that he was fourteen), Đàm followed his uncle (father's younger brother) to Vietnam to seek work. This uncle died young and Đàm, poor and without anyone to rely on, had to earn his living as a piece-rate labourer helping to carry goods. Later he went on to trade in old goods and while continuing with his piece-rate labour. In the day he worked; when night came, he slept under the awnings of the streets of the old Chợ Lớn. Often, he was robbed of his savings by gangsters while asleep.

Harbouring aspirations to become rich, Đàm took his suffering in stride and saved his earnings. He was quick in seizing opportunities for trading and specialized in meeting shortages of the time as well as providing luxury items such as buffalo skin, fish fins, fish maws, etc. His perseverance, dexterity, and boldness paid off eventually and he saved enough to establish a trading company. Legend has it that Đàm asked a Chinese fortune-teller to name his company. When asked what the new company dealt in, Đàm told the fortune-teller that he traded in buffalo skins and fish fins and sold these overseas. The fortune-teller thought for a few moments and then wrote "Thông Hiệp" (通协 or Getting Through and Harmonious) in Chinese characters in very broad and bold strokes.

Indeed the business of Đàm were like kites that met with good wind, and he became very, very rich. Gradually, he began to expand the scope of his business to include farm produce and food, mainly by buying rice from the south-western provinces and exporting them. At first, the scale of this new business was moderate, but at its peak, Đàm became the second, if not the largest supplier of rice for the Saigon–Chợ Lớn region. Almost all the rice godowns (warehouses) in the Bình Đông area around the Lê Quang Liêm bus station in District 6 today used to belong to Đàm. Given his strong competitive spirit (especially against French businesses in the same line), his skilful management, and diplomatic and negotiation skills, he even obtained from the French colonial authorities the monopoly to purchase rice for export.

Đàm's office was located on Quai de Gaudot. At the time, it was not a road, but a little canal called Rạch Cầu Đường (also known as Rạch Chợ Lớn or Quai de Gaudot). A geomancer of Chinese origin advised Đàm to set up his office there and live there for prosperity. Đàm followed this advice and true to the predictions, was able to earn enough to buy the land along the canal and most of the houses on it within a short period of time. He was quickly able to set up factories to polish rice, as well as a fleet of boats to bring farm produce from the rural areas by the river and sea. Đàm was not lacking in strategy either and was also known to be cunning. He had even for instance, resorted to spreading rumours to manipulate prices of the goods he traded in. As the owner of the house his geomancer wanted him to buy repeatedly refused Đàm's request to purchase it. So he had to rent the house his geomancer wanted him to buy at a high price of 300 dong every month. Although he was rich enough to buy any other house in the city, he believed in the geomancer, had refused to move from there.

At the peak of his wealth and prosperity, Đàm had a total of four Chinese and two Vietnamese wives. He also had an opium stall that operated around the clock and he was one of its loyal customers. Many people had to wait for him just to get to meet him. On one occasion, a member of the Neighbouring governing council wanted to sell sugar cane plants to him and had to wait until Đàm had finished his opium. This degree of servitude was higher than that shown by anybody to the governor of the colonial authorities, which at the time was high and mighty. But even he at times had to go to Đàm to ask for favours.

According to some Chinese sources, Đàm initiated the establishment of the Chaozhou Gongsuo (Teochew Association 潮州公所) in South Vietnam, which later became a large clan association. He also helped in shipping the ashes of his clan men who died in Vietnam to Chaozhou, China, for burial.

In the 1920s, he was so rich that he began to think about how to further consolidate his legacy. He suggested to the Saigon-Chợ Lớn City authorities that he could donate the cost of building a market for the city. He made the offer of a piece of land in Bình Tây when he heard that a landowner in the city was asking the city to pay a very high price for the land that it had picked to build a new market. Đàm's land was bigger than the one to be bought, but it was marshland. He spent a huge sum of money to build the market using cement and iron pillars, but he had a condition when offering the land: that he be allowed to build rows of shophouses around the market for sale, which he did. He also tried persuading the colonial authorities to move its office to the market, but this offer was turned down. However his request to have his statue erected on the front porch of the market was accepted. Đàm erected a copper statue of himself wearing the clothes of the Manchu Dynasty of China. People interpreted this as evidence that Đàm missed his home country and wanted to become somebody important back home. The market was commonly referred to as Thong Hiep Market or New Chợ Lớn. Its most recent name is Bình Tây Market.

As he was so rich, in the early 1920s Đàm was able to play the role of guarantor for many debtors of the Indochina Bank, but those who wanted his service had to pay him a percentage as service fee. However Đàm could not see the financial crisis coming and many of these debtors went bankrupt. The bank seized and auctioned off Đàm's assets and he lost everything. He frequently blamed the fact that the government filled up the canal in front of his home and damaged his geomancy. But according to a French source, Đàm was a French citizen who died in 1927, after which his son, Quách Khoi, took over the business. Whether he went bankrupt or remained rich, the funeral of Đàm was the biggest ever up to then in Saigon-Chợ Lớn. People who sent him off followed the custom of accompanying the hearse to the burial place, and the line was more than a kilometre long. His tomb is located near the Giác Lâm Temple and nobody seems to be looking after it now.

Quách Tấn

(郭晋, Guo Jin, 1910–92)
Poet, Vietnam

Quách Tấn was one of the four well known poets of the Bàn Thành Quartet, whose other members were Chế Lan Viên, Hàn Mặc Tử and Yến Lan, in Bình Định Province in the central region of Vietnam. Tấn wrote prolifically under many pseudonyms: Đăng Đạo, Trường Xuyên, Định Phong, Cổ Bàn Nhân, Thi Nại Thị, and lão giữ vườn (meaning "the garden keeper"). He is well-known for composing poems based on the rules of Chinese Tang poetry, but with a distinguished charm of his own. In the history of modern Vietnamese poetry, he might be the only one who remained faithful to Tang verses for life while most of the other poets turned to contemporary poetry and were mostly influenced by Western styles. However he was entirely able to empathize with works by his poet friends, Chế Lan Viên, Hàn Mặc Tử, and Yến Lan, who switched from Tang poetry to innovative poetry and became the top modern poets of Vietnamese literature. While firmly following the basic formal principles of Tang poetry, he obtained and applied into his work a new sense of aesthetics. Tấn's Tang-styled works gained acclaim from Vietnamese readers who appreciated fine, non-stereotypical Tang poems.

Tấn was born on 1 January 1910 in Trường Định Village, Bình Khê District, Bình Định Province to an intellectual family educated in both Chinese and Western studies. His ancestors had migrated from Fujian province of China (福建) to Bình Định in the seventeenth century. The young Tấn learned the Chinese script until the age of twelve, after which, he studied in Vietnamese and French at Trường Pháp Việt, meaning "France Vietnam" School, in Quy Nhơn. After graduating with a French secondary school diploma, he got married and started to work as early as in 1929 to take care of his younger siblings since his parents had both passed away. His wife was Nguyễn Thị Nhiếp, who had twelve children with him, six of whom are still alive today. Tấn worked as a senior clerk in Hue (Huế), Dalat (Đà Lạt) and Nha Trang respectively from 1930 to 1945. From 1945 onward, he participated in the Vietnamese resistance war against the French and worked as a teacher in Bình Định (1949–53). After 1954 he continued to be an administrative clerk in Quy Nhơn (1955–57), Hue (1957–58), and Nha Trang (1958–65). He retired in 1965 and kept composing poems until the day he passed away on 21 December 1992 in Nha Trang.

Having begun writing poems since his school days, Tấn was proficient in many verse forms. When the Thơ Mới (New Poetry) Movement took place in 1932, he had his first poems publicized in several publications such as An Nam Magazine, Tiểu Thuyết Thứ Bảy (Saturday Novels), Tiếng Dân (People's Voice), and Phụ Nữ Tân Văn (Women's New Literature) thanks to the encouragement of Tản Đà and Phan Bội Châu, the two famous poets of Vietnam then. His works were then compiled into a collection entitled, Một Tấm Lòng (One Heart) in 1939, with a foreword written by Tản Đà, the representative of Thơ Mới Movement, and an afterword by Hàn Mặc Tử, one of the most innovative poets from Thơ Mới Movement. This collection, which received enthusiastic welcome from the traditional poets, but indifference from the innovative ones, is an anthology of poems written in the Chinese Tang verse forms such as thất ngôn bát cú (seven-syllabic regulated verse 七言八句) and tứ tuyệt (four lines 四绝). It primarily conveys the author's admiration for the scenery of his hometown and the places he had lived in and travelled through, as well as his feelings about the different experiences of his life. The words he used in his verses are easy to grasp and peppered with conversational language and vernaculars of the central region of Vietnam, with very few classic references.

His second collection, Mùa Cổ Điển (Classical Season), was published in 1941, with a foreword by Chế Lan Viên, another innovative poet. Just from its title, the work appeared to be a challenge to the Vietnamese poetic world at the time. In the late 1930s, the foundation for modernization had been established in new poetry in particular, and in Vietnamese literature in general. After the death in 1939 of Tản Đà, the most eminent name in traditional poetry, traditional poets almost tolerated being away from the spotlight. Tấn, on the contrary, mentioned "season" and honoured traditional poetry with the word "classical". The collection marked the peak of his career and a milestone in Vietnamese poetry. The publication was described by Hoài Thanh-Hoài Chân, in Thi Nhân Việt Nam (Vietnamese Poets), as having "closed down an era in Vietnamese poetry".

Mùa Cổ Điển (1941) consists of twenty-one Tang-style verse poems, nineteen of which were written in thất ngôn bát cú (seven-syllabic regulated verse) and the other two in tứ tuyệt (four lines). Despite the need to follow the tight rules of the poetic schemes, the poems are free from the constraints of strict tone patterns, and in the structure of their contents, touching the innermost feelings of love, friendship, loneliness, and nervousness. Though expressed in a verse form that was considered to be restricting and trite in the twentieth century, they are powerful enough to move the reader's heart through honest sentiments, evoking images and lively language. Verbs in Tấn's poems are varied, and their occasional appearance right in poem titles, such as Thơ Về (Poems Come), Đêm Thu Nghe Quạ Kêu (Hearing the Crows on Autumn Night), Dưới Liễu Chờ Xuân (Waiting for Spring under Willow Trees), and Mộng Thấy Hàn Mặc Tử (Dreaming about Han Mac Tu) stir up the natural tranquility of Tang poems and bring the scenes from the past right to the present. Under the influence of dialect and spoken language, daily familiarity is enacted and the poems are immediately relieved from expected formality. Yet the unique delicacy and grace in them remain. The most highly regarded pieces in Mùa Cổ Điển are Đêm Thu Nghe Quạ Kêu (Hearing the Crows on Autumn Night), and Mộng Thấy Hàn Mặc Tử (Dreaming about Han Mac Tu), which present the complexity in Tấn's creative style. Mùa Cổ Điển was reprinted in 1960, with the addition of thirty Tang verses written from 1945 to 1955.

Since 1941, Tấn has principally composed in tứ tuyệt verse and produced numerous compositions. War and the misery of his family, his people, and his lonely old age are immersed in immense sorrow in these compositions, but they only hint at the range of his poetry. He showed his brilliant mastery of other schemes in works such as, Đọng Bóng Chiều (The Stagnancy of Dusk), which contains 108 poems in thất ngôn tứ tuyệt (seven-syllabic quatrain 七言四绝), written from 1941 to 1954 and published in 1965; Mộng Ngân Sơn (A Dream about the Silver Mountain), which boasts 135 poems in ngũ ngôn tứ tuyệt (five-syllabic regular verse 五言四绝), composed from 1947 to 1965 and published in 1966; and Giọt Trăng (A Drop of the Moon), which has a collection of sixty poems in five-syllabic regular verse, written from 1966 to 1972, and printed in 1973 in Paris. All these works represent the poet's love for his country and people, and his anxiety over all the whirligig happening to them. Other creations in other forms and genres are Trăng Ma Lầu Việt (The Ghost Moon on the Vietnamese Castle), a fiction published in 1942; a translation piece in 1971, Tố Như Thi Trích Dịch (Translation of To Nhu's poems), and three monographs, Nước Non Bình Định (Scenery of Binh Dinh) published in 1968, Xứ Trầm Hương (Land of Aloe Wood) in 1969, and Đởi Bích Khê (Life of Bich Khe) in 1971. Last and not least, a research work entitled, Đôi Nét về Hàn Mặc Tử (A Few Points about Han Mac Tu), was published in 1988.

Quek Leng Chan

(郭令灿, Guo Lingcan, 1941–)
Banker, Malaysia

Quek Leng Chan, who was born in 1941 in Malaysia, is married with three children. He qualified as a barrister-at-law from Middle Temple in the United Kingdom. He is also a brother of Kwek Leng Hai and Kwek Leng San. His personal lifestory has remained quite private compared with his corporate affairs. Quek was honoured with the title "Tan Sri" from HM Yang di-Pertuan Agong for his contribution to the nation. From its humble beginnings as a trading company in 1963, the Hong Leong Group has grown progressively and tremendously into a diverse range of industries, thanks to Tan Sri Quek, who is the chairman and chief executive officer of Hong Leong Company (Malaysia) Berhad, the ultimate holding company of Guoco, and he sits on the boards of directors of the major public listed companies of the group. He has been the executive chairman of Guoco Group Limited since 1990. The Hong Leong Gorup was named after one of the brothers, Kwek Hong Leong.

The Kweks established Hong Leong in Singapore in 1941 and expanded into Malaya. They moved from trading in the 1940s to plantation investments and manufacturing in the 1950s, real estate and property development in the 1960s, finance and heavy infrastructural activities in the 1970s. Although it was public listed in 1982, many of the component companies remained privately owned through family ownership of the holding company in which the Quek family of Malaysia (Quek Leng Chan) and the Kweks of Singapore (Kwek Leng Beng) hold significant proportions in a complex interlocking shareholding structure.

Hong Leong's accelerated expansion was through takeovers, mergers, and joint ventures with the state and foreign multinationals. In 1982, Hong Leong purchased the Dao Heng Bank in Hong Kong to integrate its financial initiatives, as well as to exploit its relationship with the Kuwait Investment Office, a shareholder in the bank. The bid for the Malayan United Industries Bank (MUI Bank) in the 1990s was motivated by its large cash reserves, as well as its property assets and the need to incorporate a bank in Malaysia. Hong Leong paid US$370 million to Khoo Kay Peng for MUI Bank and US$250 million for MUI Finance in 1993. Immediately after the acquisition, MUI Bank was changed to Hong Leong Bank, listed on the stock exchange, and raised US$700 million. Hong Leong Credit and the Quek family held 61 per cent equity, with Bumiputra (5.3 per cent) and the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, Chase Manhattan, and Citicorp holding 15 per cent in total. The subsidiary, Hong Leong Finance (Malaysia), also increased its capitalization from US$4 million to US$6 million in 1983 by using shares in a Bumiputera enterprise, Beraya Sdn. Bhd. Its counterpart, Hong Leong Finance (Singapore), similarly increased its capitalization from US$35 million to US$80 million in 1982. Sovran Industries was transformed into Hong Leong Credit Berhad and Fancy Tile Works into Hong Leong Industries Berhad.

Tan Sri Quek is the chairman of Hong Leong Bank Berhad (HLB) and was appointed to its board of directors on 3 January 1994. He is chairman of the Executive Share Option Scheme Committee and the Executive Committee and Board Credit Committee of HLB. He is also the executive chairman of Hong Leong Industries Berhad, Hong Leong Credit Berhad, Hong Leong Properties Berhad, Hume Industies (Malaysia) Berhad, Hume Cemboard Berhad, Camerlin Group Berhad, Tasek Corporation Berhad and O.Y.L. Industries Bhd., and chairman of HLG Capital Berhad, Hong Leong Finance Berhad, and Hong Leong Assurance Berhad.

Quek Leng Chan has been heading Hong Leong Group Malaysia since 1973 and the group now comprises fourteen listed companies involved in a range of industries throughout Asia, with major stakes in the Hong Kong Stock Exchange and also the London Stock Exchange, including banking, financial services, semiconductor manufacturing, ceramic tile manufacturing, oil and gas, property development, motorcycle distribution, and hotels and gaming. In February 2006, the group's Hong Kong listed Guoco Group, through its investment arm, BIL International (now GuocoLeisure Limited), was awarded twenty-five of the eighty-nine casino licences in Britain. BIL is expected to start introducing casinos in selected Thistle Hotels, the luxury hotel chain in the United Kingdom. Quek also owns the Claremont Casino in Mayfair, London and Guoco also has a stake in Galaxy Mega Resort, a flagship development with 269,000 sq ft of gaming space and 1,500 hotel rooms which opened in 2008 in the Cotai peninsula of Macau. GuocoLand Ltd. pumped US$1.3 billion into a property project in Beijing in the run-up to the 2008 Olympic Games and doubled its investment in China to US$5.4 billion to tap the country's growing demands for homes. Quek Leng Chan also has interests in his cousin Kwek Leng Beng's empire in Singapore. The family businesses are linked via interlocking ownership stakes. With a net worth of US$2.3 billion, he is placed 524th in the Forbes world's billionaires list.

Quek rose to prominence in 2001 when he netted RM11.5 billion by selling his controlling stake in Dao Heng Bank of Hong Kong to the Singapore-run DBS Bank. It was the highest price paid for an Asian bank then especially noteworthy during the post Asian 1997 financial crisis. Quek has emerged as a significant shareholder in oil and gas fabricator Kencana Petroleum Bhd., which was listed in December 2006 by executive chairman Datuk Mokhzani Mahathir. Other acquisitions by Quek in 2007 included a 15.43 per cent stake via Associated Land Sdn. Bhd. in Mesdaq-listed fertility services provider TMC Life Sciences Bhd., and about 10 per cent of Multi-Purpose Holdings Bhd. from gaming firm Magnum Corp Bhd. The Hong Leong Assurance Berhad Group also registered a higher profit in 2007, attributed to a higher contribution from Dao Heng Insurance Co. Ltd., and a higher surplus transfer from the life business. Hong Leong Bank has also agreed to buy 20 per cent of Chengdu Bank for RMB1.95 billion, its first investment in China.

Kon Sean, the youngest of Quek's three children, has been groomed to be an heir to the Hong Leong empire. He is a graduate of the London School of Economics. Besides his role as executive director of Hong Leong Credit, Kon Sean is also on the board of HLG Capital, Hong Leong Assurance, and Camerlin Group Bhd.

The Hong Leong Foundation Charity Run pledges an annual RM1 million for the needy and is an event where public participation is encouraged and public awareness of a caring culture is cultivated. The Hong Leong Foundation is a charity body set up to cater to old and needy folks. In addition to the charity run, other projects undertaken by the foundation include the annual Student Assistance Programme where the foundation sponsors less fortunate schoolchildren in terms of uniforms, books, examination and school fees subsidies, as well as through an annual scholarship award programme for local undergraduate studies and diploma courses.

Quek, via his Hong Leong Group has emerged unscathed from the Asian Financial Crisis 1997, and his Hong Leong Bank Bhd. is the only other Chinese-controlled bank in Malaysia besides the also Chinese-controlled Public Bank, that has been allowed to remain one of the main anchor banks in Malaysia after the national bank merger exercise who also took over EON Bank Bhd. in 2011.

Quek Suan Hiang

(郭全强, Guo Quanqiang, 1930–)
Industrialist, educationist, Malaysia

Quek Suan Hiang (also known as Quek Chee Hiang) is a well known entrepreneur and leader in the Chinese education movement in Malaysia. He was chairman of the United Chinese School Committees Association of Malaysia (UCSCAM) for more than a decade. He worked closely with the United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia (UCSTAM) to further develop Chinese education in Malaysia and whilst working with them, established the Dong Jiao Zong Higher Learning Centre (董教总教育中心). Although Chinese education in Malaysia traditionally faced many unfavourable government policies, Quek was undeterred. He travelled extensively throughout Malaysia to garner support for the continued survival and development of Chinese education.

Although Quek's ancestors hailed from Hainan in China, he was born in Segamat in Johor in 1930. He then attended Pay Fong Chinese Primary School in Malacca, but the outbreak of the Second World War and the Japanese invasion of Malaysia in 1941 curtailed the rest of his education in the country. He and his family consequently fled to China where he completed his secondary school education. He then gained admission into Peking University and studied politics. He eventually married his university classmate, Leung Lai Ming, and returned to Malaysia seven years later.

When Quek's father passed away in 1956, he had to take over the family business in Malaysia. As a result, he settled down in Malaysia and ventured into business. With shrewd business acumen, hard work, and a pioneering spirit, Quek expanded the family business to encompass interests in tin mining, housing development, timber, oil palm, and the sundry goods trade. As a result, he became chairman of Kee Siang (Malaysia) Sdn. Bhd. and Suan H. Q. Holdings Sdn. Bhd. Due to his success in business, he became a pivotal figure in the Malaysian Chinese business community, and served in the Malaysian Chinese Chamber of Commerce.

Through his work with the Chinese Chamber of Commerce and his main business ventures, Quek gained a reputation as a charismatic leader. He also developed an interest in community work outside the sphere of business, and became particularly interested in the state of Chinese education in Malaysia. He was thus elected chairman of the Teachers and Parents Association of Kluang Chung Hwa Chinese Primary School No. 3 in 1973. This marked the beginning of his involvement in the Chinese education movement in Malaysia. From then on, Quek held important posts in various Malaysian Chinese education organization, including being chairman of the board of directors of Kluang Chong Hwa High School (1987 to the present), chairman of the state of Johor Chinese Schools Managers and Teachers' Association (1988-2005), and chairman of UCSCAM (1993-2005). Although he concurrently held many posts, he was able to contribute a great deal to these different organizations. As board chairman of Kluang Chong Hwa High School for eighteen years, he brought about significant physical development to the school by strengthening the school's management. He also took the lead to improve the quality of education and implement administration improvement programmes in the school. In so doing, he was able to chart a comprehensive development blueprint for the future of Kluang Chong Hwa High School.

As chairman of the state of Johor Chinese Schools Managers and Teachers' Association, Quek brought stability and development to Chinese education in Johor. He spearheaded various fund-raising campaigns for the construction of a building for the association. He also established a development fund for the association and was behind the setting up of its permanent secretariat office. As a result, the association hired a full-time executive secretary to manage its operations. These measures laid a strong foundation for the future development of the association and paved the way for subsequent leaders to further promote Chinese education further in Johor.

As chairman of UCSCAM, Quek adopted a pragmatic and moderate approach for the association. Under his leadership, the association was able to make considerable impact in safeguarding mother-tongue education in Chinese primary schools, promoting the further development of independent Chinese secondary schools, and establishing New Era College. These were commendable efforts towards realizing the long-held dream of the Chinese community in Malaysia for a complete system of mother-tongue education.

In the 1990s, Malaysia began to have a more open political climate. The Chinese community reaped the benefits of this open environment and enjoyed more freedom in the political, economic, cultural, and educational sectors. For example, the government approved the application by UCSCAM and UCSTAM to establish New Era College and this boosted the confidence of the Chinese community and improved the prospects of Chinese education in the country. However these positive steps forward for Chinese education in Malaysia were marred by dangerous undercurrents hampering the development of Chinese primary schools. TheVision School Project and the policy on the teaching of science and mathematics in English were perceived to be threats to the use of the Chinese language as the medium of instruction in Chinese primary schools. As a consequence, Quek worked closely with UCSCAM and UCSTAM to ensure the continued survival of Chinese primary education in Malaysia. Instead of maintaining an implacable stance on Chinese education, he believed it would behove the Chinese community in Malaysia to modify the way in which it campaigned for the rights of Chinese education. Quek proposed that all major Chinese organizations come together and present a unified stand on issues pertaining to Chinese education. Doing so would enable the Chinese community to campaign successfully for the preservation of Chinese education in Malaysia.

As one of the major leaders of the Chinese community in Malaysia, Quek had actively campaigned for equal rights for Malaysian Chinese for many years. Against tremendous pressure not to rock the status quo enshrined in the pro-Bumiputra policy in Malaysia, he led a delegation to present a petition to the Malaysian Government in 1999. This petition was from the Chinese community in Malaysia, and sought to convey the voices of the Chinese community to the government.

Quek was actively involved in the Chinese education movement in Malaysia for more than thirty years as the board chairman of an independent Chinese secondary school or head of the top Chinese education organization in the country. Although he encountered many setbacks, he continued to press forward without complaint. He travelled extensively throughout Malaysia and other countries with a sizeable Chinese diaspora to garner support for Chinese education in Malaysia. While the state of Chinese education in Malaysia is still threatened by many government policies favouring the use of Bahasa Malaysia, Quek is confident of the continuation of Chinese education in the country. At present, he has retired from active involvement in the Chinese education movement. However, he has expressed his willingness to contribute to the movement if he is called to do so. He is currently focused on the development of Hainan University in China. In recognition of his significant contributions to Chinese education in Malaysia, he was presented with the Spirit of Lim Lian Geok Award in 2005.

R

Rahardja, Hendra

(Tan Tjoe Hin, 陈子兴, Chen Zixing, 1943–2003)
Businessman, Indonesia

Hendra Rahardja, founder and owner of Bank Harapan Sentosa of the Harapan Group, and various smaller banks, was one of the most entrepreneurial and venturesome of Sino-Indonesian big towkay in the 1970–80s, although not usually ranked amongst the largest of them. His reputation — and that of his brother, Eddy Tansil — was controversial.

He developed extensive overseas branches of his banks in Singapore, Hong Kong, and China (Fujian). However, he ran into severe financial problems in Indonesia in the 1990s and ended up fleeing from justice initially to China, and later to Australia, where he was arrested. For a man who had started his life in Sulawesi in rather unpromising circumstances, Rahardja had come a long way by the end of it.

Born in Makassar of Hokcia (Fuqing) background in 1943, he attended a Chinese school, although not to any great effect. His father was a motor-cycle dealer and in his early years in that highly competitive industry Rahardja was spectacularly successful. At first he sold Vespa scooters, then in 1966 he began to deal in Yamahas, becoming known as "The Yamaha King", initially just importing them and later partially assembling them also. He was soon reportedly selling over 100,000 units each year, earning US$25 million. He also diversified into forklift trucks and office equipment.

Rahardja then formed the Harapan Group in 1974 and moved into real estate, acquiring several big commercial plazas in Jakarta and small banks in Surabaya and Medan. In Singapore he created the Town & City Properties group in 1977, with plans for six big hotels, three of which were actually built (most notably, the Meridien and Nikko) and was reported to have invested US$1,600 million there by the early 1980s, gaining the title "Hotel King". But an oversupply of hotels resulting from a recession there forced him to sell the three that were built in order to pay off debts. He moved to Hong Kong in 1980 with the establishment of the Unistock Financial Company, which made big investments in Fujian in the 1980s, including an airport and a large commercial complex. Rahardja became famous for his lavish lifestyle (and expensive artistic tastes) and married a second wife, a stylish Chinese lady who was the daughter of a wealthy Singapore businessman, in addition to his Indonesian first wife. He had seven children.

He returned to Indonesia in 1987 and went heavily into property development from which he made big profits. But he had earlier been investigated by the Attorney General for tax evasion, although the case against him was dropped after he repaid Rp1,700 million. There were reports that he had close relations with Brigadier General Sudjono Humardhani and General Ali Moertopo, close associates of President Soeharto.

He fell into serious difficulties in the 1997–98 Asian Financial Crisis when he received substantial government funds in the form of BLBI credits (Bank Indonesia Liquidity Supplements), much of which was misappropriated. Rahardja was named as a suspect in the misuse of Rp3.6 trillion (approximately US$2 billion at the then prevailing exchange rate) and the government closed the ailing banks, including Harapan Sentosa and Bank Guna, which were later sold for Rp13.5 billion. He fled Indonesia for Hong Kong and never returned. In June 1999 he fled to Australia where he was arrested on the basis of Indonesian charges of suspected involvement in the embezzlement of BLBI funds. He was sentenced to extradition to Indonesia, but that was not immediately carried out pending an appeal process. He died, however, in early 2003 before the appeal could be heard. Meanwhile the Central Jakarta District Court had brought a charge of corruption against him on which he was later found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment. "Never before in Indonesian legal history has someone been given such a severe punishment in a graft case", reported the Jakarta Post.

He died in prison in Sydney less than a year later (January 2003). Subsequently the Australian Government seized assets of his to the value of A$634,000 for transfer to the Indonesian Government. This was only a tiny part of his total private fortune which was salted away in Hong Kong, China, the Virgin Islands, and the Cayman Islands, from which such restitution was an unlikely process.

The career of his brother, Eddy Tansil (Tan Tjoe Hong, born in February 1934 (1948?) in Ujungpandang) was very similar to Rahardja's. He had made a promising start building bajaj (three-wheeled taxis) in the 1970s, then Kawasaki motorcycles, without much success. He next moved into beer production which did not do well in Indonesia, but did in Fujian when he moved there, becoming known as "the father of Fujian beer". With that source of funds he ventured into a petrochemicals company in Indonesia, but overexpansion and mismanagement left his company unable to pay its loans. Worse, he borrowed too extensively from the Bank Pembangunan Indonesia in the early 1990s to establish a big petrochemical complex in Cilegon and then misused the funds for other than the stated purpose, for which he was sued in court and sentenced to seventeen years' jail, with his financial assets seized to pay compensation.

It is perhaps no coincidence that their father, Tan Tek Hoat, had also fled from Indonesia to Hong Kong in the 1960s — with funds from his Bank Banteng — becoming similarly a fugitive from justice.

Rattanavan, Bou

(陈克威, Chen Ke Wei, 1934–) and Chen Ke Guang, Chen Ke Qi, and Chen Ke Qun
Entrepreneur, Laos

The Rattanavan brothers, better known as the Tang brothers among the Chinese in Laos PDR, are well known businessmen in the country. Bou Rattanavan (Chen Ke Wei), the eldest of the brothers, moved to Paris in 1975 and together with Bounmy Rattanavan (Chen Ke Guang) established a company that became multinational.

Chen (pronounced as "Tang" in Teochew dialect) Ke Wei is the eldest son of Chen Zhong Qing (陈仲卿), who was born in Puning. In 1924 when he was only fourteen years old, he left his hometown for Thailand to make a living. In 1941, after he had become familiar with the business climate of the Indochina region, he made a second migration, this time to Pakse, the largest city of Champasak Province in the southern part of Laos where he adopted a Laotian surname, Rattanavan. By the 1960s, the Tang family had already acquired a reputable economic status in the country as the owner of a sawmill, a monosodium glutamate factory, and two rice mills. The family also operated an export and import trading and retail firm.

Chen Ke Wei, who was born in 1934, gave up his high school studies in 1952 to help his father in his business so as to generate an income to support his ten siblings. He later married Zhang Xian Tao. In 1975, when Laos turned communist, he brought some of his siblings to Paris where he met up with his youngest brother, Chen Ke Guang (陈克光), who was studying electronic engineering at INSA Lyon University under a government scholarship. Currently Chen Ke Wei is holding French citizenship.

In Paris, Chen Ke Wei noticed a large population of Asians who were mostly migrant labourers and refugees and could see a business opportunity there selling daily necessities and groceries. A year later in 1976, he began running his grocery store at the twelfth arrondissement (District 12) in Paris and in 1981 founded Tang Frères SARL. Even at the time of the official launch of the company in August 1985, it was already the largest retailer of Asian products in France. It deals with the wholesale and retail of Asian food and handicraft products. It is the biggest overseas Chinese-owned company not only in France, but also in Europe. In Paris, Chen Ke Wei and his siblings own five shops, three Asian restaurants, one handicrafts shop, and one real estate company. They have also set up an integrated business centre comprising shops, warehouses, and eateries in the suburbs of Paris. In 1987, according to Le Nouvel Economiste, the company's sales exceeded two billion francs and thus gained international fame.

Chen Ke Wei has lived abroad for more than fifty years, but has not forgotten his hometown in Lao PDR and the Chinese language. He has four children, three of whom are helping him in his business.

His younger brother, Chen Ke Guang, is the fourth son in the Tang family and is the general manager of Tang Frères SARL in Paris. In 1960, Chen Ke Guang was admitted to a Chinese primary school in Laos and graduated from high school there in 1971. He then won a government scholarship to study in France. In 1976 he obtained a bachelor's degree in electronic engineering from INSA Lyon, France, after which, he assisted Chen Ke Wei in establishing Tang Frères SARL in Paris. Initially, the company was located in the twelfth arrondissement (District 12), but was later moved to the eleventh arrondissement (District 11), and finally, settled down in the main shopping area in the thirteenth arrondissement (District 13). He is married to Chen Shu Zhen (陈淑贞) and has two children.

In 1991, Tang Frères SARL became the first Chinese company to become a member of the Comité France-Chine (法中委员会). Since the inclusion of Tang Frères SARL into the committee, Chen Ke Guang has become an active representative of the committee in promoting France-China relations. For example, he was one of the members of the team selected to receive then Chinese Premier Jiang Zemin during his official visit to France in 1994. In 1997, he was the only Chinese entrepreneur invited to accompany the president of France, Jacques Chirac, on his official visit to China. In 2001, the French Government awarded Tang Frères SARL with a Medal of Honour for its contribution in promoting good international relations between the two countries.

In 2001, Chen Ke Guang invested RMB600 million in Haomen Beer Company in China. The annual production of beer of the company totalled approximately three hundred tonnes and it was employing about 1,500 production workers and 200 salespersons. The same year, he ventured into the media industry and established Tang Media. His company introduced China's channel to the French market and brought Europe sports channel into the Chinese market. On 13 April 1987 he also played a key role in helping his fellow ethnic Chinese establish a Conseil Pour L'integration Des Communautes D'origine Chinoise En France (CICOC, 华裔融入法国促进会，简称 "华进会"), which aims at assisting Southeast Asian refugees with problems on job hunting and living in France. Then in 1988, he initiated a movement to seek the French Government's recognition of the contributions of 15,000 Chinese labourers, who came mostly from Shandong Province in 1916 to render support for the troops in World War I. They were known as the Chinese Labour Corps and were mostly working on road construction in northern France.

Apart from Chen Ke Guang, Chen Ke Wei has two other brothers also associated with his business: second brother Peter Chen Ke Qi (陈克齐) and third brother David Chen alias Chen Ke Qun (陈克群). Peter Chen was born in Thailand and hence has a Thai name: Sackchai Wongmalasith. In his teenage years, he studied in Laos and Vietnam. In the 1970s, his parents often travelled between Laos, Thailand, Vietnam, and Myanmar on business. When war broke out in 1975 among the countries in the Indochina region, his father, Chen Zhong Qing felt that they had to move to a new land in order to live in peace. Chen Ke Qi volunteered to explore the possibilities of settling down in Thailand.

Ten years later in 1986, he established his company, Thai Agri Foods Public Co. Ltd., which specializes in canned food and fruit juices. Specifically, his business deals with the processing of canned food, frozen seafood and frozen Chinese delicacies such as dim sum. As his business was very successful after it was set up, and was soon launched on the stock market and became publicly listed. In 1998 he was named by the government as a "Model Entrepreneur" in Thailand.

The Tang brothers have always wanted to help in the development of Lao PDR. In 2003, they finally chanced upon an investment opportunity to embark on the construction of the Laos International Trade Exhibition and Convention Center" (ITECC) in Vientiane. Chen Ke Qi was entrusted with full responsibility to oversee the smooth running of the construction project which cost US$7.5 million and took about one year to complete. The building is located in the heart of the capital and is equipped with world-class facilities, such as a telecommunication system and both large and small conference rooms. It is the first of its kind in Lao PDR. On 3 February 2004, Lao deputy prime minister, Somsavat Lengsavad, was invited to inaugurate at the opening ceremony and he praised the Tang brothers' contribution to Laos' development highly.

Chen Ke Qi is a sports and music lover. In sports, he is a bodybuilder and had started training when he was fifteen years old. He insisted on exercising four times a week to keep his body physically fit. In supporting sports events, he once donated a sum of 3,000,000 baht to secondary schools in Thailand for the archery training of students in the hope that through such training, they will be well skilled when it comes to qualifying for the Asian Games.

As for his passion for music, on 18 October 1999, he led a choir in singing for guests at the dinner of the International Teochew friendship meeting.

Chen Ke Qun, the third brother, is an accountant and entrepreneur. He was educated in Laos and Cambodia before he continued his studies in Australia. In 1969, he graduated with a bachelor's degree in commerce from the University of New South Wales, Sydney and then returned to Laos to help in the Tang family business. His father made him fully responsible for the business in Vientiane.

In 1975, during the war in the Indochina region, he brought his parents, two sisters, wife and children, nephews, and nieces to Australia. At the time, as an accountant, he felt that a systematic accounting management system was important for the Tang family business. Hence, in 1978, he started to visit Chen Ke Qi in Thailand to help him work out an accounting system. Following this, he visited France to work out a similar accounting system for his two other brothers' business there. This has helped to propel the Tang family business to greater heights.

Chen Ke Qun had made trips to different parts of the world to seek the best place to establish his business, before finally settling down in Hong Kong. He felt that Hong Kong was an important business port that could perform a supporting role for his brothers' business in France and Thailand. In 1982 he established Tesana Ltd. in Hong Kong. The company exports different kinds of food products such as vermicelli, salted eggs, and canned food to Europe, America, Australia, and Africa. It has become one of the biggest exporters of Hong Kong food products.

Riady, James Tjahaja

(Lie Zen, 李白, Li Bai, 1957–)
Businessman, Indonesia

James T. Riady, the son of Mochtar Riady, is the Deputy Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of the Lippo Group (see entry on Mochtar Riady). He lived in the United States in the 1980s where he managed the investments of Lippo Group in the U.S. and served as the President of Worthen Bank of Arkansas. He returned to Indonesia in 1988 and followed the footsteps of his father in establishing a banking career. He is very well connected in business networks and has established good relationships across the spectrum, most notably with former U.S. president Bill Clinton and former Indonesian presidents B.J. Habibie and Abdurrahman Wahid. After the fall of Suharto in 1998, James Riady was appointed as a special envoy of the president to win back foreign capital amidst the financial crisis that swept across Asia. He is currently the Chairman of the Pelita Harapan University in Jakarta and has established private Christian schools catering for different social classes in Indonesia.

Born in Indonesia on 7 January 1957, James T. Riady is the son of Mochtar Riady and Suryawai Lidya. Since young, James was groomed by his father to be a businessman. To train him to be independent, his father sent him to Macau for studies when he was only 8 years old. After four years in Macau, James continued his studies in Australia. He graduated in accountancy and economics from the University of Melbourne in 1977. James served an internship with the Irving Trust and Investment Bank in Little Rock, Arkansas in the United States and did a 10-month internship at Stephens Finance Ltd. in Hong Kong before returning to Indonesia in 1979. In Indonesia, he built his reputation as an aggressive young banker at Bank Perniagaan Indonesia (BPI) — the backbone of the Lippo Group, led by his father Mochtar Riady — where he poached three vice presidents from Citibank to join his company.

In 1982, James married Aileen Hambali. They gave birth to two sons and two daughters. James and Aileen lived in the United States for several years where he was appointed by his father to look after Lippo Group's U.S. investment. In 1984, Lippo Group bought $16 million worth of stocks from Worthen Bank of Arkansas. James assumed an increasing authority in the distressed Worthen bank. He negotiated business on his father's behalf during Worthen's crisis. When two of the principal officers resigned to take responsibility for the bank's losses, James became the bank's president.

The Riadys sold their investment in Worthen at a loss in the late 1980s. James then moved to Los Angeles, where he bought the Bank of Trade in California, the oldest Chinese-American bank in the region. He renamed it Lippo Bank and concentrated on an Asian American clientele. However, in 1990, The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation had found repeated banking violations at Lippo Bank, issuing three separate cease-and-desist orders against the bank, citing slapdash management and questionable transfers of funds.

When he was 30, James returned to Jakarta from the United States. He later became the Chief Executive Officer of Lippo Group. He brought the American "go-getting" style to Lippo Group that differed from Indonesian low-key business practices. James was criticized on two fronts: Chinese-Indonesians businessmen found him too brash and Americanized, and indigenous businessmen questioned his loyalty to Indonesia given the amount of business his company invested abroad.

James was known to have a close relationship with former U.S. President Bill Clinton. He had known Bill Clinton since he was doing an internship in Little Rock, when Clinton was the state attorney-general of Arkansas. Moreover, when James became the president of Worthen Bank of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton served as the bank's attorney. James was one of the few non-American to be personally invited by Clinton to attend the pre-inaugural economic summit in 1992. The Riady family was also invited to attend the inauguration of Bill Clinton as president of the United States in 1993. After Clinton became president, James had made at least 20 visits to the White House and had met privately with the president three times. James also attended the Asian Pacific Economic Conference in Seattle in November 1993, and was on hand for President Clinton's November 1994 visit to Indonesia.

James Riady was a major contributor to the Democratic Party in the 1996 U.S. election campaign. The Republican Party questioned the Lippo Group's donations suggesting the aim was to influence U.S. government policy. The Riady family and executives of Lippo Group have contributed money the Democratic National Committee since 1991, despite the fact that foreign contributions to U.S. campaigns are against the law. An investigation on the financial scandal of the 1996 presidential campaign was carried out by the United States Senate in 1998. James was indicted and had pleaded guilty to campaign finance violations by himself and his corporation. In 2001, he was ordered to pay a fine of $8.6 million — the largest monetary penalty ever levied in a case of unlawful campaign finance — and was put on probation for two years and was ordered to do 400 hours of community service.

In May 1998, following the fall of President Suharto, Indonesia witnessed a massive anti-Chinese violence across its major cities. Many ethnic Chinese business people brought their capital with them in their flight to safer haven overseas. During that time, James Riady stayed put in Indonesia and insisted that he would not leave the country and would not liquidate any big local investments. The then President B.J. Habibie appointed him a "business ambassador" to win back foreign capital and gave Lippo Bank first call on government recapitalization funds in 1999.

After two years of low-profile restructuring, James helped to bring Lippo Group to a comeback from the verge of collapse in the beginning of 2000. James also has a reputation as a wheeler-dealer, juggling dozens of Lippo deals at any one time and profiting in the stock market — he is considered Indonesia's most successful businessman at raising funds in the capital market.

Besides his business endeavours, James has also contributed to the private education sector in Indonesia. He has a vision to start 10 schools for the upper-class people, 100 schools for the middle-class people, and 1,000 schools for the lower-class people. As a result, Sekolah Pelita Harapan (SPH), which adopts a Christian curriculum, was established by Lippo Group in 1993. James is currently serving as the Chairman of a Christian university, Universitas Pelita Harapan, established by his father.

Since converting to Christianity in 1990, James has been an ardent evangelical. His management approach has an evangelical aspect that encourages his employees to attend church retreats and introduce them to the Christian faith. Apparently, many staff of the Lippo Group are also devout Christians and have fervently prayed for the success of the group's projects. James had planned to quit the family business and enter into Christian ministry.

Riady, Mochtar

(Lie Mo Tie, 李文正, Li Wenzheng, 1929–)
Businessman, banker, Indonesia

Mochtar Riady, the Chairman and Founder of Lippo Group, is a renowned banker and businessman. He was ranked #14 in GlobeAsia list of 150 Wealthiest Indonesians in 2010 and #38 in Forbes Indonesia 40 Richest List in 2010. His company, Lippo Group, controls over 50 subsidiaries and employs more than 50,000 people. His business empire spans across the Asia-Pacific region, with presence in areas such as financial investments, property and urban development, retail and services, information technology and a variety of industrial activities. The Lippo Group also controls the largest private healthcare and hospital group in Indonesia and sponsors an education foundation that operates schools, universities and a recently inaugurated nanotechnology research institute named after Mochtar Riady himself. Mochtar Riady has received Honorary Doctorate titles from Golden Gate University in San Francisco, California and Southeast University in China. He was also bestowed the status of Honorary Citizen by the cities of Xiamen, Nanjing, Putian and Meizhou in China.

Son of a batik trader, Mochtar Riady was born in the city of Malang in East Java on 12 May 1929. His aspiration to become a banker began since he was 10 years old. This ambition emerged from his experience of being awed by the majestic office building of the Nederlandsche Handels Bank (NHB) which he passed by everyday on the way to school. Mochtar was an anti-colonial activist and the president of the East Java Overseas Chinese Student Association during his school days in Java. He supported the Indonesian guerillas and participated in anti-Dutch demonstrations. His dream in becoming a banker was derailed in 1947 when he was arrested by the Dutch authorities and exiled to Nanjing, China. There, he took the opportunity to study philosophy at the then Nanjing University (now Southeast University). He fled to Hong Kong because of raging wars in China, and returned to Indonesia in 1950.

Upon his return to Indonesia, Mochtar's pursuit of a career in the banking industry was again postponed. In a relatively deprived environment, his father advised him against entering the banking sector which was then an industry only for the affluent. Following his marriage in 1951, Mochtar lived in the town of Jember in East Java to run a small store belonged to his in-laws. Within three years it became the largest store in town. In 1954, he departed for Jakarta, against his family's wishes, to pursue his dream of becoming a banker. He was confident that he would realize his ambition despite his lack of experience or business networks in Jakarta. He began to work for a small company in Jakarta's trading district for 6 months. This job opened up many new opportunities and allowed him to build new business relationships.

Later Mochtar opened a small shipping business with an acquaintance. His first foray into banking finally began when a friend informed him that Bank Kemakmuran, a small bank owned by Andi Gappa was in dire financial state. Mochtar convinced Gappa to appoint him as a director of the bank. Without any banking experience and accounting skills, Mochtar learned as he journeyed on. Within a year he managed to turnaround Bank Kemakmuran. He then moved on to Bank Buana in 1964, where he again made his mark by steering the bank through a recession and allowing it to emerge stronger than before.

In 1971–1975 Mochtar successfully developed the Panin Bank — a new bank from the merger of three other banks — into one of the largest private banks in Indonesia. He was poached by business tycoon Liem Sioe Leong to join Bank Central Asia (BCA). He soon became Liem's right-hand man in the bank and was given a 17.5% share. He left BCA in 1990 to focus on expanding the Lippo Group that he founded. When Mochtar was appointed to BCA, its assets were merely IDR 12.8 billion, and when he left, its assets were worth IDR 5 trillion. In each bank, Mochtar managed to craft a success story for himself. His outstanding skills and experience in revitalizing ailing banks have earned him the title: "The Magic Man of Bank Marketing". Many also respect him for continuing his business in Indonesia during the May 1998 anti-Chinese riots, when many wealthy businessmen fled overseas.

Lippo Group has become a multinational group of companies spanning the Pacific basin with interests in financial investment, property and infrastructure development, retail, education and media. As Mochtar ages, he began to delegate responsibilities to his sons, James and Stephen, who will inevitably be the successors to the business empire. At the shareholders Annual General Meeting of Lippo Bank on 4 March 2005, Mochtar resigned from his position as the Chief Commissioner of the Bank. His resignation marked the end of the Riady family's direct involvement in the management of the bank.

To create a lasting legacy, Mochtar Riady began to venture into education and health sectors over the past decade or so. Apart from establishing a private Christian university, Pelita Harapan, he has also established dozens of Christian schools, and more recently, an institute of nanotechnology, named after himself. Most of these world-class facilities, together with the Siloam Hospital for upper class patients, are housed at Lippo Karawaci — a town located west of Jakarta developed by Lippo Group, where the Riady family resides.

Mochtar Riady has a deep conviction to promoted quality education in Indonesia. He believes that education, or more precisely, the development of human resource, is the key to developing a strong nation. He is also committed to philanthropic work in the region, through the development of education and health care. He plans to build one thousand "Schools of Hope" in remote areas of Indonesia to offer free education for the underprivileged. He has financially supported the establishment of Putian University in Fujian, China, and Ma Chung University in Malang, Indonesia. In 2007, Lippo Group donated S$21 million to the National University of Singapore Business School. The funds have been used to build a Mochtar Riady Building to honour the founder of the Group, and to fund two distinguished professorships named after his sons James and Stephen Riady. In 2011, Mochtar Riady donated S$5 million to Singapore Management University to set up the Mochtar Riady Scholarships to support undergraduates from China and Indonesia.

Mochtar Riady is regarded as a visionary magnate whose business philosophy and experience have become an inspiration for budding entrepreneurs. He is an avid reader and an active writer. He has authored three books: Searching for Opportunities amidst Crisis (1999), Nanotechnology Management Style (2004) and Ancient Philosophy and Modern Management (2006).

Robredo, Jesse Manalastas

(林炳智, Lin Bingzhi, 1958–2012)
Political leader, Philippines

Jose Manalastas Robredo was known for his attempt at steadfastly implementing good governance that stemed from a genuine concern for others. Born on 27 May 1958, he served as secretary of the Department of the Interior and Local Government. He was appointed by President Benigno C. Aquino III because of his success as Mayor of Naga City, as well as his untarnished reputation in the field of governance.

In the wake of the Philippines' People Power Revolution in 1986, Jesse Robredo responded to President Corazon C. Aquino's call to dedicate oneself to public service. He abandoned his executive position at San Miguel Corporation to head the Bicol River Basin Development Program in Naga, his hometown. In 1988 he won in the elections to become mayor of Naga by a slim margin. He was twenty-nine.

Once the queen city of the Bicol region, the Naga that Robredo inherited from his predecessor was a dispirited provincial town of 120,000 souls with a 8-million-peso debt. Traffic clogged its tawdry business district and vice syndicates operated at will. City services were fitful at best. Meanwhile, thousands of informal settlers filled Naga's vacant lands.

Under Robredo's leadership as mayor for three consecutive terms of three years each, Naga blossomed into a model city, regaining such a status after having been downgraded to third class during his first stint as mayor. Naga bested bigger and richer urban centres when it was recognized thrice as the "Most Business-Friendly City" by the Philippine Chamber of Commerce and Industry, thus elevating it to the Hall of Fame. Naga is also a winner of the Asian Institute of Management-Ford Foundation Galing Pook Innovations Program Award, and the recipient of the Presidential Gawad Pamana ng Lahi Award of the DILG. It was named "Most Child-Friendly City" in 2006 by the Philippine Council for the Welfare of Children, and received the Galing Pook Foundation's Award for Continuing Excellence.

During Robredo's incumbency, Naga received more than 150 awards and recognitions in diverse fields of local administration. These include being named Most Cost-Effective City in Asia by the United Kingdom's Foreign Direct Investment Magazine (2005); being the Public Service Awardee for Local e-Governance from the United Nations Department of Public Administration and Finance (2004); receiving the Women-Friendly City Award from the U.N.-Habitat and the U.N. Development Fund for Women (2004); being chosen Model City for Government Procurement from the World Bank and Procurement Watch (2003); being a CyberCity Awardee for its i-governance initiatives from the United Nations Development Programme (2002); and being a Dubai International Awardee for Improving the Living Environment from U.N. Habitat (1998).

Naga is also one of only nine areas in the country cited by the United Nations Development Programme as the leading lights in the implementation of the U.N. Millennium Development Goals. It led the Bicol region in achieving the following goals halfway to the 2015 deadline: eradicating extreme poverty and hunger, achieving universal primary education, reducing child mortality, improving maternal health, combating major diseases, and providing basic amenities.

Robredo himself was duly recognized several times for his skills and competence in his work when he was given fourteen major awards including the 2000 Ramon Magsaysay Award for Government Service for being one of the Outstanding Young Men of the Philippines, the 1996 Outstanding Young Persons of the World Award, the 1998 Konrad Adenauer Medal of Excellence as Most Outstanding City Mayor of the Philippines and the first ever "Dangal ng Bayan " Award of the Civil Service Commission. In March 2008, he was also given an honorary doctor of humanities degree by the Far Eastern University in Manila.

This road to success was a constantly painstaking and uphill battle against the city's long-held traditions of patronage and nepotism. Robredo began with a strike against patronage. He introduced a merit-based system of hiring and promotion reorganizing city employees on the basis of aptitude and competence. He then moved against the local vice lords, ridding Naga of gambling and smut. Next, he relocated public transportation terminals outside the city centre, ending gridlock and spurring new enterprises at the city's edge. In partnership with businesses, he revitalized Naga's economy. Public revenues rose and by 1990 Naga was a first-class city again. Robredo's constituents took heart and re-elected him twice.

Spurning bodyguards, Robredo moved freely among the people. By enlisting the support and active assistance of Naga's non-profit organizations and citizens, he improved public services dramatically. He established day-care centres in each of Naga's twenty-seven districts and added five new high schools. He built a public hospital for low-income citizens. He set up a dependable 24-hour emergency service. He constructed a network of farm-to-market roads and provided clean and reliable water systems in Naga's rural communities. He launched programmes for youth, farmers, labourers, women, the elderly, and persons with disabilities — drawing thousands into civic action in the process. No civic deed was too small, he told the people, including the simple act of reporting a broken street lamp. He sometimes swept the streets himself.

Consistently, Robredo prioritized the needs of the poor. Through his Kaantabay sa Kauswagan (Partners in Development) programme, more than 4,500 once-homeless families moved to home lots of their own. They became part of Naga's revival. So did a revitalized city government. Applying techniques from business, Robredo raised the standards of performance, productivity, and morale among city employees. As a culture of excellence overtook the culture of mediocrity at City Hall, Naga's businesses doubled and local revenues rose by 573 per cent.

Re-elected without opposition in 1995, Robredo urged the Naga City Council to enact a unique Empowerment Ordinance.This created a People's Council to institutionalize the participation of non-profit and people's organizations in all future municipal deliberations. When obliged by law to step down after his third term, the popular Robredo made no effort to entrench his family, as is the case with many political dynasties.

Contrary to popular belief, Robredo was neither raised nor groomed to be a public servant. Robredo's paternal grandfather was a Chinese immigrant named Lim Pay Co who arrived in the Philippines at the turn of the 20th century. Lim Pay Co later converted to Christianity and adopted the name, Juan Lim Robredo.

Amidst the emergent turbulence in political history during the period of Martial Law in the Philippines, he was never drawn to activism. However, he was neither ignorant of, nor indifferent to, political issues. His father, Jose Lim Robredo, had always encouraged his children to speak their minds and, at mealtimes, when everyone was required to be present, he encouraged lively discussions, including those on politics.

Even at a young age the value of simple living and genuine concern for other people's welfare were instilled in his heart by his parents. His father imparted to him the importance of guarding the integrity and honour of the family. From his mother, a devout Catholic, Robredo learned to pray daily, a habit which he passed on to his children. Since the family lived in an area located both near a business district and also squalor, the young Robredo made friends from both the fairly rich and the poor. These priceless life lessons became the essential foundations in setting the mould for the makings of a remarkable leader.

Robredo was a secondary school student at Ateneo de Naga — the only Catholic high school for boys in the city, run by the Society of Jesus and highly regarded for its emphasis on personal discipline and academic excellence — when then President Ferdinand Marcos declared Martial Law in 1972. He entered university in 1974 and obtained undergraduate degrees in Industrial Management Engineering and Mechanical Engineering at the De La Salle University.

Robredo was an Edward Mason fellow and holder of a Master's degree in public administration from John F. Kennedy School of Government, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1999). He also completed his Master's in business administration at the University of the Philippines.

Robredo died in a plane crash on 18 August 2012 and his body was found on 21 August 2012.

S

Sahat Mahakhun

(Tia Lan-chan, 张兰臣, Zhang Lanchen, 1895–1961)

Community leader, businessman, philanthropist, Thailand

Sahat Mahakhun was a prominent leader of the Chinese community in Thailand. He was elected chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Thailand for more than ten years, making him one of the most favoured and supported leader in the Chinese community. He arranged a delegation to Taiwan, Japan and Hong Kong in 1954, which led to the successful formation of a trade triangle among Thailand, Taiwan, and Japan. He was also noted for his efforts in implementing government policies among the Chinese, as well as protecting the interests of the Chinese community.

Sahat was born in Chao'an, Guangdong, in 1895, the second son of Zhang Suixian. His ancestors used to live in Puning, Guangdong, but had moved to Chao'an during the Qing Dynasty. Zhang Suixian was the first in the family to make a living in Thailand. He opened Zhang Tong Store in Nakhon Pathom Province, and earned his living by selling construction materials.

When he was eighteen years old, Sahat relocated to Thailand to help out in his father's business. With the aid of his elder brother, he later set up his own construction company, Yuan Lian Tai Co., in Bangkok. He contracted many public projects, such as the building of the Central Post Office and many buildings of Chulalongkorn University. In 1931 he established the Eastern Asia Match Factory with fellow businessmen from Chao'an. Later he ventured into other businesses, such as insurance and banking.

Before becoming chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, Sahat was active in the Teo Ann Assistance Society (now the Teo Ann Townsmen's Association of Thailand). In 1934 he became the eighth chairperson of the society and continued to hold this position in the society, and, later, in the Teo Ann Townsmen's Association, until 1958, when he stepped down and became the honorary chairperson of the association. When Hiaguang-iam Iamsuri was assassinated in 1939, he was elected the seventeenth chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Thailand. He was also the chairperson of the board of directors of the Poh Teck Tung Foundation during the same period, and was elected the fourth chairperson of the Teochew Association of Thailand in 1941. Aside from the positions mentioned above, he held positions in other Chinese associations, for example as chairperson of the board of directors of the Tien Hua Hospital of Thailand.

In 1947 Sahat was again elected chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Thailand and remained in this position for fifteen years. This tenure, together with his first appointment in 1939, means he was the first person in history to undertake this position for more than ten years, implying that he was one of the most favoured and supported leaders of the Chinese community in Thailand. As a result of his long tenure, many referred to him as "chairperson" only, instead of "chairperson Tia".

During his appointment as chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Thailand, he was the bridge between the Chinese community and the Thai government. He was supportive of the Thai government and responded to its various policies and appeals. For example, he took on the responsibility of raising funds for various public projects such as, the construction of the Police General Hospital and providing relief for child refugees. At the same time, he fought for the welfare and interests of the Chinese community in Thailand. In 1950, when the Thai Government announced that all foreign residents without valid passes would have to apply for one by the end of the year, Sahat negotiated with the government for the deadline to be pushed to the end of 1951, and eventually to 1953. Moreover, many Chinese associations were able to apply for the necessary permits of residence in Thailand on behalf of their members. He also urged the Thai government to allow Chinese criminals who were to be deported to remain in the country and make a living in Phetchabun Province.

Sahat Mahakhun was not only a prominent leader locally, but was also recognized internationally. In 1954 he led a delegation to Taiwan, Japan, and Hong Kong in an effort to establish triangular trade relations for the benefit of Thailand. The delegation achieved great success as a trade triangle was eventually established among Thailand, Taiwan and Japan. Furthermore, as the chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Thailand and leader of the delegation, he petitioned the government of Hong Kong to relax its regulations on the import of rice from Thailand. In 1959 he was invited by the Committee for International Cultural Exchange to visit various industrial facilities in the United States.

Aside from the prominent positions mentioned above, Sahat also held many other positions both in the Chinese Nationalist government and in Thailand. A few major examples include being a member of the Committee on Chinese Overseas Matters in the Chinese Nationalist government, a member of United Nations International Children's Fund in Thailand, member of the board of directors of the Thai Red Cross Society, vice-chairperson of the Tuberculosis Association in Thailand, a member of the City Appearance Rectification Committee, and a member of the Board of Trade of Thailand. In recognition of his contributions to Thailand, he was awarded the Most Exalted Order of the White Elephant several times by King Bhumibol of Thailand. The Teo Ann Townsmen's Association of Thailand has also named its auditorium in memory of him.

His wife, Huang Longzhao (黄龙招), was also actively involved in the community. She was once the chairperson of the board of directors of a children's home in Bangkok. Within the Chinese community, she was an adviser to the women's committee of the Kwong Siew Association. She was also a prominent businesswoman and was known to have invested in a fabric factory and established a cable factory.

Sahat died of illness on 29 July 1961 at the age of sixty-six. When the news of his illness spread, many high-ranking officials in both the Nationalist Chinese government and the Thai government sent their regards to him, or even paid their respects at his wake. After his death, King Bhumibol bestowed on him a golden outer coffin. Many high-ranking officials of the Thai government also attended his funeral.

Salim, Anthony

(林逢生, Lin Fengsheng, 1949–)

Businessman, Indonesia

The youngest son of Indonesian tycoon and top Suharto crony Liem Sioe Liong, Anthony Salim has helmed the Salim Group since the fall of President Suharto in May 1998. Anthony has been credited with saving the group, which long was the country's largest business conglomerate, through intense negotiations with authorities after the collapse of the rupiah and a run on its flagship bank, Bank Central Asia (BCA), left Salim saddled with more than US$5 billion in debt. To settle it, he gave stakes in 108 companies to the government, which sold them. In 2004, Anthony received a "release and discharge" document saying he had met his obligations. He went on to rebuild Salim, now fully under his control, and in the process, re-established the group as one of the country's preeminent business firms.

When the chaos that engulfed Jakarta in May 1998 helped bring down Suharto's 32-year-old leadership, many people thought the end was near for the mighty Salim Group, an important support pillar of the president. Suharto's fall deprived the group of a powerful patron and the Asian financial crisis piled Salim with huge debts. BCA was crippled by a massive run, as the president's exit spawned a sharp backlash against his family and cronies like Liem, Salim's founder. Several members of the new Cabinet under President B.J. Habibie wanted the Salim Group destroyed. Efforts to try to save Salim couldn't be undertaken by the frail Liem, then nearly 81 years old, and almost completely blind. Days before the Jakarta riots, he had left for California for a scheduled eye surgery. He would never live in Jakarta again. The job of salvaging parts of the business empire he built fell to Anthony who years earlier had been understudying his father and gradually assumed leadership of the conglomerate, which at its peak, controlled some 600 companies.

Events proved Liem's wisdom in grooming Anthony as his successor, although for years, Liem sidestepped questions about his heir apparent. Traditionally, a Chinese business patriarch would make the eldest son his successor. Liem, for all the criticism that he became extremely wealthy due to his close links with Suharto, was wise, and unafraid of breaking from the norm and giving control to his youngest son. Highly intelligent and shrewd, Anthony proved a quick learner in the many businesses undertaken by the group. A master of detail, he proved adept at planning complicated corporate moves, and he changed or ended some partnerships his father had entered.

Anthony was born in October 1949 in Kudus, Central Java, where Liem settled after migrating from China in 1938. By his own admission, he was a less-than-mediocre student, often impatient with classroom learning. But from young, his father's many business ventures intrigued him and he tagged along to factories and meetings. His high school education was interrupted by chaos and the purge of alleged communists after the abortive 30 September 1965 coup that would lead to Sukarno's downfall, and to the ascendancy of Gen. Suharto. He continued his schooling in Singapore and spent two years at a college in the UK for his tertiary education. Upon graduation in 1971, he returned to Jakarta, eager to get involved in his father's businesses.

By 1975, Liem had already built up a strong level of trust in his youngest son. He had Anthony get involved in an important negotiation — getting banker Mochtar Riady on board to run Liem's BCA. Mochtar Riady had built a reputation for 'rescuing' flagging banks, was planning to leave Panin Bank, and BCA at the time was floundering. Liem found the banker receptive to the challenge to building BCA to become the country's largest private bank. However, Liem shocked and disappointed Mochtar when he sent Anthony — then aged 26 and dressed like a hippie — to conclude the negotiations. "I thought Pak Liem was not serious," recalled Mochtar. But after the meeting with Anthony the banker emerged with a different view, impressed by this "bright young man."

The 1970s were learning years for Anthony, who during the New Order was careful not to step beyond his father's shadow. Liem heeded Anthony's advice — to move to separate ownership from management; to seek good, non-family professionals to manage their businesses, to venture beyond Indonesia in order to hedge its bets (and give some distance — plus assets — away from the Suharto family, though naturally this goal was never publicly stated). Anthony also nudged his father to part ways with Liem's two brothers, so the ownership of their companies would be more clear-cut.

Over time, Anthony would prove to be a consummate deal-maker. He would make it a point to learn from those who Salim chose to partner. Besides Mochtar in banking, his 'teachers' included Ciputra, who was a partner with the Salim Group in property, and Sukanto Tanoto of Raja Garuda Mas in the palm oil business. Anthony also engineered the bulk of the Salim drive for a global presence. He and a banker friend, Manuel Pangilinan, started a business in Hong Kong in 1981 that grew into diversified First Pacific. By 1983, it bought the Dutch trading company Hagemeyer, followed by Hibernia Bank of San Francisco. First Pacific had a chequered history, performance-wise, and was billed by critics as Deal Pacific. After frequent strategy changes, it settled into having just two main, big assets — holdings in Indofood and Philippine Long Distance Telephone — rather than a hodgepodge collection of companies.

Of Liem's three sons, Anthony was most like his father in character. Both father and son had good instincts, which they relied on in conducting business. They were willing to spend top dollar to attract good people and were magnanimous to their patrons and supporters, from Suharto and his family to high ranking military officers, and to nearly anyone who came to their door. Over time, the Salim Group built a reputation of being able to outmaneuver some business rivals, and along the way, created some enmity. Some Indonesian businessmen consider Anthony ruthless, and even more shrewd than his father. "We never willingly set out to hurt others," Anthony said. For sure, Anthony has intensely pursued strong ambitions and goals. Doing business has been his life, and he has developed a reputation as a workaholic. He has an excellent memory. Liem said of his son: "Anton's mind is like a computer." Early on, the son understood what was needed to operate in Suharto's Indonesia, but added a more international approach and professional touch.

In nearly every corporate move Salim made — moves driven by Anthony — the group generated controversy. Its 1989 public offering of PT Indocement Tunggal Prakarsa upset some because the company got a waiver of a Finance Ministry rule in order to sell shares. Asset shuffles in 1992 and 1995 that involved food businesses also stirred controversy, as critics said they benefited Salim's main owners more than minority shareholders. Anthony defended the corporate moves as "creating value" for all shareholders. Anthony sought to diversify in a way that businesses with the Suharto family became a decreasing share of the Salim empire. But to the public, the Salim name was inextricably tied to Suharto's, and the shareholding of BCA was often cited as proof — Suharto's children's (eldest daughter Tutut and eldest son Sigit) ownership of 30 per cent equity.

During the aftermath of the 1997 financial crisis, when Anthony led the effort to settle the massive debts to the government, he pursued a strategy of giving up chunks of the Salim empire while striving to secure continued control of its most important pillar, its food business. In the end, the group lost its other two pillars — cement (Indocement) and banking (BCA), but Anthony got majority-ownership of Indofood shifted into First Pacific of Hong Kong, in which Salim was the biggest shareholder. In 2004, he became Indofood's president-director.

To those who knew Anthony, his success in sustaining Salim wasn't a surprise. Although he can be charming and engaging, he is also determined and feisty. At the debt settlement negotiations with IBRA (Indonesian Bank Restructuring Agency), Anthony was tough and tenacious. But he won some kudos when compared with some other debt-saddled tycoons who did not cooperate as fully with the government. International bankers came out impressed.

Suharto's fall bred a new generation of Indonesian executives, and Anthony, after showing Salim could survive, worked with several key new figures. One was Hary Tanoesoedibjo, who took over much of Suharto son Bambang Trihatmodjo's Bimantara Group and became a media mogul. Other new partners included Chairul Tanjung, owner of Bank Mega, and Eddy Sariaatmadja, who owned plantations.

While he rebuilt significant parts of his portfolio at home, Anthony expanded outside Indonesia, particularly in China. Salim China invested in property and other businesses. Back home, he returned to a major role in auto business Indomobil, which expanded to include mining. At the start of 2012, Anthony remained chairman of First Pacific, which through a Manila unit had expanded significantly in the Philippines in water, tollroads and other infrastructure areas.

Anthony and his wife Margareth have three children — Axton, Astrid and Alston. Axton started working at Indofood in 2004 and in 2009 became a director.

Salim, Soedono

(Liem Sioe Liong, 林绍良, Lin Shaoliang, 1917–2012)

Businessman, Indonesia

Detractors derided him as Indonesian President Suharto's top crony, but Liem Sioe Liong (Soedono Salim) was also one of Southeast Asia's most pivotal and skilled businessmen. Liem arrived in Java from China in 1938 with barely more than the clothes on his back. Despite his lack of formal education, he parlayed his close association with Suharto into making his Salim Group one of the region's first multinationals, and he was — for many years — the wealthiest Chinese businessman in Southeast Asia. At its peak, the group encompassed 600 companies and employed an estimated 200,000 people. Long after Suharto's fall in 1998, the Salim Group had not only survived a strong backlash in Indonesia, but was again thriving, thanks to the tenacity of Liem's youngest son, Anthony Salim. He took the group into new activities in multiple places. Salim expanded in China and, through its Hong Kong-listed First Pacific unit, invested in water, tollroads, mining and other areas in the Philippines. The Indomie brand of instant noodles, owned by Salim's core business Indofood, had many customers in parts of the Middle East and Africa.

Liem was born in 1917 in a village in Haikou district, near Fuqing, Fujian province, China. He was the second son of a farmer who had 11 children and who died in 1937. The following year, Japanese troops invaded southern China, precipitating a call to draft young men. That prospect, combined with a severe drought, pushed Liem to leave home and join his older brother Sioe Hie and an uncle in the Netherlands East Indies.

In the early years in Central Java, Liem, like many Chinese immigrants, tried various trades. Starting off as an itinerant textile and clothing peddler based in Kudus, he extended credit to his mainly Javanese customers. Liem, his brother and uncle started a peanut oil business, and later they ground, packed and sold coffee. Liem rode his bicycle many kilometres to sell his goods. Thanks to his personality and instincts, Liem soon made more money than his brother, who had come to Java nine years earlier.

The Japanese Occupation wreaked havoc on Liem's business. But there was one happy episode during those dark years — he met a pretty Indonesian Chinese student of Peranakan heritage 10 years his junior. They married in 1944.

The Japanese surrender in 1945 was followed by the struggle for Indonesian independence. As the Netherlands tried to reassert control over its longtime colony, republican units who hid in the mountains conducted raids against Dutch soldiers. Liem and some fellow Hokchia (his dialect group clansmen) suppliers took risks by running provisions such as coffee, rice, sugar and kreteks (clove scented cigarettes) to independence guerrillas. One of the unit leaders was a rising officer named Suharto, then a lieutenant-colonel, and that was where the two first got acquainted. Liem moved to Jakarta in 1952 in search of better opportunities. But the 1950s and early 1960s — when Sukarno railed against capitalism — were rough times for private business.

Liem's ambition to expand beyond trading was stymied by the difficulty of obtaining funds. In the 1950s, he remained a small and relatively unknown businessman. His fortunes changed dramatically following the controversial events in 1965–66 that led to Suharto becoming president. Liem's reputation as a reliable supplier — secured from his ties with Suharto and his men, which grew while Suharto commanded the Semarang-based Diponegoro Division — put him in good stead with the new president.

Contrary to popular belief, however, Liem was not the Chinese businessman closest to Suharto when he gained power. There were several others, but as Suharto's New Order took shape in the late 1960s, Liem emerged as the president's main 'cukong' (a financier enjoying patronage). Liem, who worked well with Javanese, was able to deliver whenever called upon by the president, whether supplying imports or raising funds.

Another businessman who was in Suharto's good books was a fellow Hokchia who had also lived in Kudus, Djuhar Sutanto (Liem Oen Kian). His late father was a friend of Liem's. Suharto suggested that they work together. The President had earlier introduced Liem to his cousin Sudwikatmono and recommended they become partners. Djuhar brought along his pribumi associate, Ibrahim Risjad. These four men formed what was dubbed 'The Gang of Four.' Their first venture, PT Waringin Kencana, was in trading and the manufacture of crumb rubber. Liem started a bank, Windu Kencana, with some of Suharto's generals. He also worked with foundations started by Suharto including those of Kostrad (Army strategic reserve command). By 1968, Suharto had assigned Liem to be one of only two permitted importers of cloves (the other was the president's half brother Probosutedjo). This was a big money-spinner for Liem.

A huge plus for Liem was his ability to obtain capital at a time when most Indonesian businessmen could not. In the late 1960s, Chin Sophonpanich of Bangkok Bank was seeking clients among astute and well-connected overseas Chinese businessmen. He met Liem and the two hit it off immediately. Chin provided needed funds and introduced Liem to entrepreneurs elsewhere. Chin was the link to Taiwanese businessmen who invested in and provided technical assistance for Liem's cement plants. Liem credits Chin with giving him a headstart as an industrialist.

The end of the 1960s and early 1970s cemented the extremely close ties between Liem and Suharto. In the late 1960s, when the Chinese community was urged to drop their Chinese names, Suharto gave Liem an Indonesian one, Soedono, while the 'Salim' part was derived from Liem and his two brothers – san lin, meaning the three Lins (Liem's Chinese surname).

Preceding Liem's cement plants was his flour-miller, PT Bogasari, for which he received help from Malaysian commodity trader Robert Kuok. Also a recipient of Bangkok Bank loans, Kuok invested in Bogasari. Backed by Bulog, the state commodities agency that had the monopoly to import wheat, Bogasari effectively elbowed out PT Prima, a miller listed in Singapore that tried unsuccessfully to have Java plants. Bogasari's articles of association stipulated that 26% of the profits go to two Suharto foundations. Helped by Bogasari profits, Liem was able to build and expand PT Indofood Sukses Makmur, which became the world's biggest maker of instant noodles.

Aside from food and cement, Liem's third business pillar was banking. His flagship bank, Bank Central Asia, was foundering until Mochtar Riady (Li Wenzheng) came in to manage it in 1975. Riady, who had a reputation of being a Mr Fix-It for ailing banks, brought his magic touch to BCA, growing it to become the country's largest private bank. The banker was a prime example of Liem's management strategy: Hire the best person for the job and give him plenty of leeway to manage. "If you don't trust the person, don't hire him," Liem liked to say.

The Liem-Suharto bond operated informally yet comprehensively on a "favours-for-favours" basis. Suharto assured that Liem's ventures would be more or less protected, or favoured, while Liem would channel some proceeds to the president's foundations, his family members, and to wherever the leader sought. In accepting Sudwikatmono as a business partner, Liem gave him equity. Suharto's eldest son Sigit and daughter Tutut were given a total of 30% of BCA.

Liem could be counted on to build some of the industrial development that Suharto wanted, and in turn received privileges to ensure these businesses were highly profitable. In 1985, when an economic slowdown put Salim's cement businesses in serious financial trouble due to too-rapid expansion, Suharto had the Finance Ministry bail it out by injecting US$335 million for 26% in PT Indocement Tunggal Prakarsa. (Four years later, the company was given a waiver from a rule that should have blocked it from getting listed on the Jakarta Stock Exchange.) Prior to the cement bailout, Liem did Suharto a favour by investing in a specialised steel project, Cold Rolling Mill Indonesia, that the president wanted built to expand the capabilities of state-owned Krakatau Steel. (For some years, Liem got a monopoly to import the steel sheets the plant would later make.) In 1990, when Suharto was embarrassed by a scandal from $420 million in foreign-exchange losses at private Bank Duta, owned by three foundations he chaired, Liem together with timber baron Prajogo Pangestu contributed much of the money to recapitalise it.

In the 1970s, Liem began expanding outside Indonesia through a few small ventures on his own, including a spinning mill in Singapore. At the start of 1980s, overseas expansion was stepped up, much of it through First Pacific, which was started in Hong Kong in 1981. It bought a California bank, Hibernia, and Dutch trading company Hagemeyer, which was founded in Surabaya in 1904.

While Suharto was president, Liem was regularly under attack as his main "cukong". The overseas investments, especially those in Liem's home province of Fujian, led to strong allegations in Indonesia of capital flight and disloyalty to his adopted homeland. While Liem almost never talked to the media, he showed exasperation at a factory opening in 1991 by complaining to reporters "If I invest abroad, you call it capital flight. If I invest here, you say I want a monopoly."

During the May 14, 1998 riots in Jakarta, Liem's house was burned. He was in California at the time, undergoing eye surgery. On May 21, Suharto resigned. BCA suffered a massive run as a backlash against the Salim Group got underway. The run led to the government taking over BCA and saddled Salim Group with huge debts for injections made by the central bank.

After Suharto's fall, Anthony Salim worked to salvage the empire. Although Indocement and BCA were lost, he managed to have Salim retain control of Indofood (and its milling unit Bogasari), with First Pacific becoming the biggest shareholder. After 1998, Liem, who became First Pacific's honorary chairman, lived a quiet life with his wife in Singapore.

The couple had four children, born two years apart, starting with Albert Halim, born in 1945. After running the group's Volvo agency, Albert left to do his own businesses in the 1980s. Second son Andree Halim had an active role in Salim ventures, particularly managing BCA especially after the departure of Mochtar Riady in 1991. Following the 1998 riots, Andree withdrew to Singapore where he now runs listed food producer and distributor QAF. The remnants of the giant Salim Group were completely in the hands of third child Anthony. Youngest in the family is daughter Mira, whose husband Franciscus (Franky) Welirang is an Indofood director and a key player in Bogasari.

A high point for Liem came in 1996 when he was awarded the Dean's Medal at the prestigious Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania. The medal's citation read: "Entrepreneur, Industrialist, Patriot and Patriarch — In Recognition of a Lifetime of Management Leadership, Achievement and Commitment to Family, Country and the Pursuit of Excellence."

Little known among Liem's achievements was his role in helping more than half a million Chinese in Indonesia obtain citizenship. He quietly lobbied Suharto, and helping to pay for the bureaucratic procedures. "He did a great thing," said Sofyan Wanandi, a businessman active in a foundation, Prasetiya Mulya, that Liem and other Indonesian Chinese tycoons founded.

Liem died on 10 June 2012 and was buried at the Choa Chu Kang Chinese cemetery, Singapore.

Sampoerna, Putera

(Liem Tien Pao, 林天宝, Lin Tianbao, 1947–)
Businessman, Indonesia

Putera Sampoerna is a businessman at the helm of Sampoerna family business empire. He is a visionary business leader, who sold the family's successful cigarette business and invested in new industries. He is also known for his contributions to education.

Liem Tien Pao, later known as Putera Sampoerna, was born into a wealthy business family, whose riches stemmed from a successful cigarette company founded by his grandfather. Putera himself was born on 13 October 1947 in Schiedam, the Netherlands, as the son of Indonesian Chinese father and mother of Dutch descent. He is currently leading the Sampoerna family enterprise.

His grandfather, Liem Seeng Tee, migrated from Anxi in China to Surabaya with his father in 1898, when he was still a child. His father died only six months after they arrived, and Liem Seeng Tee lived with a foster family in Bojonegoro. He engaged in various jobs, and met his future wife, Siem Tjiang Nio, a peranakan girl, whom he married at the age of 19. Together, they started operating a provision stall in 1913, which existed until 1984.

In the stall, Liem Seeng Tee sold a variety of goods, including blends of manually rolled kretek (clove) cigarettes. Initially, each cigarette was custom made, but later, the couple pre-rolled the cigarettes and experimented with different flavors. This eventually gave rise to the famous Dji-Sam-Soe brand, which means 2-3-4 in the Hokkien dialect. Liem Seeng Tee's lucky number was nine, and it was therefore no coincidence that the numbers in the brand added up to nine, in addition to having nine letters. This auspicious number still prominently figures in all the family ventures until today.

In 1932, the cigarette business had grown large enough for Liem Seeng Tee to buy his first real factory. The Sampoerna family also lived on the premises, in order to be close to the work floor. The grounds, called Taman Sampoerna, also housed a theatre that was a novelty in colonial Surabaya. At present, the place is used as the Sampoerna museum. Until the Second World War the company flourished and the cigarettes, blended and enriched with sauces according to a secret recipe, became famous.

However, when the Japanese invaded the Dutch Indies, Liem Seeng Tee was imprisoned by the Japanese, as were his two sons, Liem Swie Hwa (Adi Sampoerna) and Liem Swie Ling (Aga Sampoerna), Putera's father. Much of the family wealth was looted during this period, but the family managed to rebuild it quickly. The day Liem Seeng Tee was released from prison, August 27, became a day for annual celebrations at Sampoerna.

With the death of the founder in 1956, the business faltered and declined, until Swie Ling, Putera's father, took over the leadership and brought it back on track. Swie Ling had in the meantime married Nan, a lady of Dutch descent, and they had three children of which Putera was the middle one. Putera was born in the Netherlands in the tumultuous post-war period, where his mother escaped the violence in Surabaya, and he spent most of his childhood in Hong Kong and the United States. After graduating from the University of Houston, he went to Malaysia to start a palm oil business before returning to Indonesia in the 1970s. In 1977, he became one of Sampoerna's directors and gradually assumed the leadership role of the family enterprise.

Putera Sampoerna has a reputation of being a farsighted and visionary leader with a global mindset and a rational approach to running a business. He is credited with modernizing the family's cigarette business in almost every respect. He mechanized part of the production and improved the working conditions of the thousands of women that hand-rolled Sampoerna's kretek cigarettes. He introduced information technology and created one of the most powerful brands in Indonesia.

In addition, he reorganized the distribution system in such a way that it was fully controlled by the Sampoerna company. This was not easy, as most of the agents had been working with the firm for a long time, and had become rich and powerful. The move meant breaking away from old traditions and relationships. Yet, Putera argued the reorganization was necessary in order to successfully introduce and distribute new brands. Most people believe Putera was ahead of his time with his views. When he introduced A-mild, a light brand of cigarettes, in 1989, it quickly became a best-selling brand in Indonesia, supported by an innovative marketing campaign, including TV commercials with the motto "how low can you go".

On 27 August 1990, Putera Sampoerna took his company to the Jakarta Stock Exchange, and issued 27 million shares at 12.600 rupiah each, displaying again the family's preference for their lucky number nine. Over time, H.M Sampoerna, as the company was officially called, became one of the top-3 cigarette producers in the country and surpassed its competitors Djarum and Gudang Garam in terms of profitability. In the midst of the successful rise of H.M Sampoerna, Putera stepped back and allowed his youngest son Michael to become president director, being only in his early twenties at the time.

Business was not the only thing on Putera's mind. He believed that the development of a nation depended on the quality of its education system, and he therefore argued that improving the education of Indonesians was of utmost importance. Hence, the Sampoerna Foundation was born in 2001, which Putera Sampoerna endowed with USD 150 million. The foundation, initially headed by his daughter Michelle, is often praised for its innovative and professional education programs.

In a move that shocked the Jakarta business community, Putera announced in 2005 that the Sampoerna family reached an agreement with Philip Morris to sell their entire stake in listed family firm H.M. Sampoerna, a move that was unprecedented among ethnic Chinese tycoons. The proceeds, around USD 2 billion, were channeled into a family enterprise, which subsequently invested in a wide range of activities, from plantations to telecoms to gambling. In addition, the family bought Sampoerna Strategic Square, an office tower complex in the Jakarta business district, which houses most of the family companies, as well as the Sampoerna Foundation.

Putera Sampoerna is married to an American Chinese woman, Kathleen Chow, and has four children: Jacqueline Michelle; Jonathan Bradford; Farah Khristina and Michael Joseph. Aside from his modern business ideas, Putera is also known for his expensive hobbies, including gambling and private jets. His daughter Michelle created an illustrated family and business history entitled The Sampoerna Legacy in 2007.

Sarasin Viraphol

(吴汉泉, Wu Hanquan, 1946–)

Scholar, diplomat, business executive, Thailand

Known to many as a fine scholar, a leading diplomat, and a successful business executive, Dr Sarasin Viraphol is a third-generation Chinese-Thai. Born in Bangkok on 2 September 1946, his grandfather migrated to Thailand from Shantou, Guangdong, China. His father, Ngow Hong Gim, (吴逢金) is a self-made entrepreneur while his mother, Ow Po Tieng (胡宝珍), is a housewife. Sarasin received his primary education in Bangkok. His parents sent him to St Stephen's College in Hong Kong for his secondary school education (1959–63). He finished his secondary schooling at Woodside Priory School in California (USA) in 1964.

Sarasin received his B.A. major in International Relations from the American University (Washington D.C., 1967), an M.A. (in Area Studies — East Asia) from Harvard University (1971), and a Ph.D. (in History and East Asian Languages), also from Harvard University (1974). His dissertation entitled, "Tribute and Profit: Sino-Siamese Trade, 1652–1853," was later (1977) published as one of the Harvard East Asian Monographs. This is the first published work which gives a detailed analysis of the actual trading relationships within the tributary framework between China and a Southeast Asian country. Both Qing China and Siam used the tributary relations to legitimize and promote trade to the benefit of both. John K. Fairbank wrote in his "Foreword" that the subject of "how international commerce was conducted within the tributary framework makes an absorbing study, and we are accordingly indebted to Dr Sarasin Viraphol for his basic account of the two centuries of Sino-Siamese trade before the modern world." Fairbank also noted that "His book opens the way for further studies of a complex political and economic relationship". It also corrects the conventional view that the East Asian economy was stagnant in pre-modern times. In Fairbank's words, "In short there was a Maritime China active overseas in East Asia before Maritime Europe expanded into that region".

Between 1968 and 1976 Sarasin was employed first as a lecturer and later as an assistant professor at the Chulalongkorn University. But it seems that he was more attracted to the diplomatic world. His expertise on Sino-Thai history and his good command of many languages: English, Thai and Chinese (Mandarin, Cantonese and Chaozhou or Teochew) would make him an ideal Thai diplomat in China. Not surprisingly he was sent to the Royal Thai Embassy in Beijing where he was Second Secretary between 1976 and 1979. After returning from Beijing, he served in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) in Bangkok, first as First Secretary, Political Department (1979–1981) and later as Counsellor, Office of the Permanent Secretary (1981–1983), and Director, Policy and Planning Division as well as Assistant to Foreign Minister, ACM Siddhi Savetsila (1983–1984). From 1984 to 1986 he was sent to Japan as Minister Counsellor at the Thai Royal Embassy in Tokyo. Between 1990 and 1992 he was Ambassador to the Republic of the Philippines, where he received the Datuk Sekuna Order from the Government of the Philippines. After the completion of his term he returned to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. His highest position in the MFA was Deputy Permanent Secretary (1995–1996). In 1995 he was awarded Knight Grand Cordon (Special Class) of the Most Noble Order of the Crown of Thailand (Maha Vajira Mongkut). He also received other honours from the governments of Brazil and Japan.

After spending 20 years in the diplomatic service, Sarasin took early retirement and left the government to join the private sector. He was recruited by Charoen Pokphand Group (known as CP) and has been its Executive Vice President since 1996. His "primary responsibilities are in international business development focusing on new business startups." CP is a Thai multinational enterprise engaged in agribusiness. It is best known for its involvement in animal feed production, vertical livestock integration, crop integration, aquaculture, and food processing. Apparently Sarasin has been able to bring his knowledge, experience and connections to this major multinational corporation and help the company further develop. He travels widely and most often he goes to India and China. In October 2006, he was interviewed by Umesh Pandey, a reporter from Bangkok Post. He responded when asked about the CP group and the challenges it faced:

> China has now turned into a huge global factory consuming 40% of the world's natural resources, the country is now proving to the world that it is not just the world's largest marketplace but also the world's largest factory ... India, on the other hand, is looking to open its agricultural sector to more input from other countries and Thai companies should take advantage of this. Opportunities to develop > infrastructure in India are also plentiful.

He further explained:

> The opening up of the Indian market in the agricultural sector is inevitable and is only a matter of time ... CP is ready to expand its presence in India as the need arises. However, the biggest challenge CP faces in its various ventures across the globe is finding the human resources to expand its operations. Business potential in Africa, for example, is going untapped because of a lack of people skills.

When asked about the future of the Thai economy, Sarasin noted that vision is needed. He was of the view that "Thai businesses and government agencies should step up the effort to help create a niche for Thai industries to thrive in the globalised world; if not, the country could be left out in the cold."

Regarding the impact of China on Southeast Asia, Sarasin noted in an international conference in Singapore in April 2005, "The rise of China's economic influence should galvanize governments and businesses of ASEAN states to devise collective approaches and trade and investment strategies." He also stressed that "For Southeast Asian businessmen, they realize the necessity in meeting the challenge of a rising China for their own ultimate survival, which calls for working realistically and creatively to boost their interaction with China in trade and investment."

Although Sarasin is executive vice president of Thailand's largest agribusiness conglomerate, he has also been engaged in academic activities. He has been invited to participate in various seminars and conferences, especially on China and Southeast Asia. He delivers lectures on the rise of China and its impact on Southeast Asia with special reference to Thailand, ethnic Chinese and Sino-Thai relations, Chinese business etc. Through the international forums, Sarasin has been able to share his knowledge and experience with his fellow academics.

Sarasin is a unique figure. He spent eight years in the academic world, twenty years in the diplomatic world and fifteen years in the business world. He is a product of three cultures: Chinese, Thai and Western (mainly English and American) and is a bridge for Thailand and the outside world.

Savanvaly, Thao Leng

(张贵龙, Zhang Guilong, 1946–)

Entrepreneur, community leader, Laos

Thao Leng Savanvaly was born in 1946 in Savannakhet Province, Laos. His parents had migrated to Laos in the early 1940s from NigouVillage, Puning City in Guangdong Province. They were engaged in the grocery business and were prominent Chinese leaders actively involved in community service in Vientiane. Savanvaly holds the directorships of seventeen companies and is chairman cum Laos representative of the Association for the Peaceful Reunification of China.

After graduating from high school at Ecole Chinoise Lieu-Tou (寮都公校), Savanvaly was unable to continue his education due to the lack of higher learning institutions at the time. Therefore, he started helping out at his parents' grocery business in his teenage years. At the age of twenty-five, he established the Victory Trading Export-Import Co. Ltd. and focused on importing goods from Thailand and Hong Kong, which were in high demand in Laos. At the same time, he was able to foresee the need for timber in the construction industry in countries such as Thailand, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and China, and started exporting timber from Laos to those countries. His business acumen, insight on the supply and demand of the market, and entrepreneurship, enabled him to set up his second company, Dragon Wood Industries Corporation, in 1990. Currently his factories produce various kinds of fabricated wood products for export to global markets. He is director of seventeen companies doing businesses ranging from commodities, to telecommunication equipment, and real estate to construction.

The fact that Savanvaly only finished high school has not deterred him from pursuing a bachelor's degree in arts, majoring in sociology, when he was in his sixties. He is interested in the study of human behaviour, especially its origins, organizational behaviour, and relations between the individual and society. Biographies of prominent Chinese personalities, their management philosophies, and successful life histories in particular fascinate him. The life stories of Chinese leaders such as Tan Kah Kee and Li Ka Shing have been a powerful source of motivation for him.

Savanvaly is chairman cum Laos representative of the Laos Association for the Peaceful Reunification of China (老挝中国和平统一会) which has about 200 members. He firmly supports the anti-secession law, China's promotion of developing peaceful relations across the Taiwan Strait, and the peaceful reunification of China. He believes that the anti-secession law is an act of peace to bring about the smooth development of cross-strait relations. He represents Lao PDR in the annual worldwide meeting of the various associations for the Peaceful Reunification of China.

Concurrent with this appointment, he holds the chairmanship for the Laos Teochew Association (老挝潮州乡亲会) and travels regularly to other countries to attend the meetings of the World Teochew Association (世界潮团谊会). He also sits on the advisory board for the Laos National Education Foundation and is one of the governors of the Association Chinoise de Vientiane (Vientiane Chinese Association) and the Laos Commerce Association. At the same time, he holds directorships in Ecole Chinoise Lieu-Tou, Sino Chote Public School (Laos Savannakhet Public School), and the China Guizhou Overseas Exchange Association as well. He pays regular visits to these organizations and makes himself available as much as possible for meetings and discussions.

Savanvaly has received many national certificates, medals, and badges from the Lao Government in recognition of his contributions to the economic development of the country. In 1993 he cooperated in a joint venture with Sop Sisomphou to establish the first private commercial bank in Lao PDR — Vientiane Commercial Bank Limited. Today the bank has developed into a private bank with world-class credentials. ANZ in New Zealand began operations as ANZ Vientiane Commercial Bank Ltd. in September 2007 with the purchase of a majority shares in the bank. It moved to 100 per cent ownership in August 2010.

In conjunction with the progressive development of tourism in Lao PDR in the 1990s, Savanvaly invested in a joint venture to build the first five-star hotel in Vientiane, the Lao Plaza Hotel, in 1997. Besides providing accommodation to tourists, Lao Plaza Hotel has since become the choice hotel for visiting foreign leaders and diplomats.

Outside of Lao PDR, Savanvaly has made huge monetary donations to victims of natural disasters such as floods and earthquakes in China. In the early 1990s, owing to his patriotism to his country and his good communications and interpersonal skills, he was selected as one of the permanent Lao representatives to attend diplomatic exchanges and national conferences. In 1991, he participated in a ministerial strategic conference on the Mekong River Basin development in Kunming in Yunnan, China. In 1993 he was selected as the Laotian representative to visit China on a friendship exchange trip that allowed leaders of mainland China and prominent overseas Chinese to network. In 1997, he represented the Government of Lao PDR as one of the invited guests to witness the historic return of Hong Kong to the People's Republic of China as a "special administrative region" (SAR). And in November 2000, he was one of the delegates to receive President Jiang Zemin during the latter's official visit to Lao PDR.

Savanvaly is married with one daughter.

Seah Cheng Siang

(佘正祥, She Zhengxiang, 1922–90)
Leading physician, educationist, Singapore

Seah Cheng Siang was a clinical physician, gastroenterologist and educationist. He was also known as Singapore's Father of Gastroenterology. Seah was born on 9 March 1922 in Singapore and was educated at Anglo-Chinese School (ACS) and later at Raffles Institution. A keen cricketer and hockey player, he represented ACS, the YMCA, King Edward VII Medical College, University of Malaya, and Singapore Chinese Recreation Club in both sports. He was an outstanding student, topping his Junior Cambridge class in History and his School Certificate class in Religious Knowledge. In 1940, Seah entered the King Edward VII Medical College to study dentistry. Once again, he demonstrated his scholastic prowess, becoming Exhibitioner in his first year. However, his studies were interrupted by the onset of War and when he returned to the College in 1946, he opted to continue his studies in medicine instead.

Seah graduated with an MBBS in 1951, winning the Lim Boon Keng Gold Medal for Medicine and the Brunel Hawes Gold Medal in Clinical Medicine. Upon graduation, he became a houseman at Medical Unit 1 at the Singapore General Hospital. The following year, he was named one of two Queen's Scholars, alongside Poh Soo Jin. The scholarship enabled him to further his studies in the United Kingdom. In 1957, he obtained his Doctor of Medicine (MD) degree from the University of Malaya for his thesis, 'A Study of non-specific Lung Abscess'. Seah was thereafter appointed Senior Registrar of Medical Unit I.

In 1960, Seah was appointed Consultant Physician and Head of the Medical Unit at Toa

Payoh Hospital (now converted into Changi General Hospital). That same year, he was elected Master of the Academy of Medicine, a post he held till 1973. In 1970, he succeeded Dr Gwee Ah Leng as Head of the Outram General Hospital's Medical Unit III, and was himself succeeded at Toa Payoh Hospital by Dr Lee Yong Kiat. Seah held the headship of Medical Unit III for a remarkable 17 years till his retirement in 1987. Upon his retirement, Seah was appointed Visiting Consultant and Advisor to the Hospital and continued treating patients right up to a week before his death.

As a researcher, Seah focused on diseases of gastrointestinal tract and liver, especially peptic ulcer, primary cancer and chronic diseases of the liver. In his distinguished career, Seah published over 80 articles and papers in medical journals. In 1967, together with Drs Chua Kit Leng and Jeyeratnam, Seah pioneered the flexible gastroscopy procedure in Singapore. He has also served on the editorial board of the Medical Journal and the Medical Research Council. He is acknowledged as the Father of Gastroenterology in Singapore. In the mid-1980s, he founded the Gastroenterology Society and served as its first president.

Seah was a legendary clinician and teacher. A student of the great Gordon Arthur Ransome, he was said to have inherited his teacher's mantle in his ability to diagnose ailments through good history-taking, examination and diagnosis. He taught his students not to rely entirely on sophisticated medical technology but their own instinctive feel and touch. In 1982, when the National University of Singapore began conferring professorships on government doctors and dentists to recognise their roles in medical and dental education, Seah was conferred the title of Senior Professor of Clinical Medicine.

Ever a believer in lifelong learning, Seah played an instrumental part in establishing the Postgraduate Medical Studies as well as the Master of Medicine degree in 1970. He was Deputy Director of the school and chief examiner in internal medicine from 1970 to 1988.

In 1973, Seah was elected President of the Singapore Medical Council (SMC) and served in this position for sixteen-and-a-half years till ill health forced him to step down. That year, he was also elected President of the ACS Old Boys' Association. In his first year as President of the SMC, Seah called for the establishment of an Institute of General Practice.

He was also Fellow of the Royal Australasian College of Physicians (since 1969); Fellow of the London and American Colleges of Physicians, and Honorary Fellow of the Singapore College of General Practitioners. Among the many other positions Seah held were: Member, Medical Faculty; Chairman, Expert Committee on Australian Antigen, and Committee for Internal Medicine; Member, Drugs Advisory Committee, Singapore; and Chairman, Penal Cases Committee, Credentials Committee. In recognition of his public service, he was conferred the Public Administration Medal (Gold) in 1970 and the Meritorious Service Medal in 1975. In 1980, Seah was conferred a Datukship by Sultan Iskandar of Johor for his contribution to medicine in Johor.

Ironically, it was liver disease that claimed Seah prematurely. He died on 23 June 1990 after a battle with liver illness. He was survived by his wife, Dr Maureen Lim, whom he married in 1953, and four children.

As tributes poured in, the Academy of Medicine decided to set up a Seah Cheng Siang Memorial Fund and to raise a sum of between $4 million and $5 million to endow it. The fund will be used to organize an annual lectureship; award an annual medal to the top candidate in the Master of Medicine examinations in internal medicine; and sponsor and promote medical research projects in Singapore. The Seah Cheng Seah Lecture was inaugurated in 1992. Held annually in conjunction with the Annual Scientific Meeting of the Chapter of Physicians, Academy of Medicine, it is open to distinguished members of the medical profession by invitation.

Seck Hong Choon

(宏船, Hongchuan, 1907–90)
Buddhist leader, educator, Singapore

Venerable Seck Hong Choon (宏船法师) was a Buddhist leader with international influence. His contributions extended from China to Singapore and the region, including the improvement of diplomatic ties among them through Buddhism. He developed the Kong Meng San Phor Kark See Monastery (光明山普觉寺) into Singapore's largest Buddhist temple and was active in education and social welfare.

Seck Hong Choon, whose vernacular surname was Zhu (朱), was born on 3 September 1907 of the lunar calendar, which would be 9 October in the solar calendar, to a middle peasant family in Xiafu Village (霞福村), Jingjiang (晋江) in Fujian, China. He had five sisters, and being the only son in the family, was given intense care, receiving an education at home at an early age. His mother passed away when he was nine, and soon afterwards, he was sent to a private school in his grandmother's village to learn Chinese classical literature. Under the influence of his grandmother, he became a vegetarian and began to have a better understanding of social life.

In 1922, at the age of sixteen, he decided to become a monk and was ordained by Ven. Huiquan (会泉法师), his master, at Chengtian Temple (承天寺) in Quanzhou (泉州), and was named Benci (本慈) and Hong Choon (宏船). He then received his precepts' order under Ven. Benru (本如) at Guanghua Temple (广化寺) in Putian (莆田). Ven. Seck Hong Choon followed his master to Nan Putuo Temple (南普陀寺) in Xiamen the following year, which broadened his outlook and inspired him to be more committed to his Buddhist studies and practice. This was also the place where he met Ven. Taixu (太虚大师), from whom he sought guidance for three years, specializing in the Vidyamathnsiddhi-Tridasakarika-Sutra and Vijnaptimatrasiddhi Sutra especially.

During the Japanese invasion, Ven. Seck Hong Choon and his master fled to the south to seek refuge and arrived in Singapore in 1938, where they resided at Leong San See Temple (龙山寺) and Phor Kark See Monastery for six months. They then proceeded to various places, including Rangoon, Medan, Indonesia, and finally settled down at Meow Siang Lodge (妙香林) in Penang. After the war and the demise of his master, Ven. Seck Hong Choon succeeded as abbot, and was invited to Singapore by the Singapore Buddhist Lodge, Putuo Temple (普陀寺), and the Chinese Buddhist Association in 1943, to take charge of Phor Kark See Monastery.

As the abbot, Ven. Seck Hong Choon developed Phor Kark See from a small monastery with only two shrine halls and a piece of farmland, into the largest temple in Singapore. His active personal involvement in the preaching of Buddha Dharma was one of the factors which drew him an extensive number of followers. He even travelled to Malaya to deliver his lectures. The main expansion plan took place after 1971, when he organized the Great Compassion Dharma Meeting in water and land (水陆法会) in 1966, which was the first meeting of such a scale out of China. These ceremonies were to commemorate Ven. Seck Hong Choon's master Ven. Zhuandao (转道法师) and to nurture potential Buddhists.

Ven. Seck Hong Choon was a critical influence on the Buddhist and religious landscape of Singapore in many ways. He lead a committee that successfully appealed the government to gazette Vesak Day as a public holiday. He was the founder of the Singapore Inter-religious Organisation in 1949; and in 1964, after the merger of Singapore and Malaysia, managed to unite all the religious leaders to promote racial harmony and peace during the racial riots. In 1965, he organized the Singapore Buddhist Sangha Organisation and was appointed its chairman, and also formed the Buddhist Precepts and Decorum Society the following year. He was the founder of the Nanyang Buddhist journal, which saw its first publication in 1969, with Ven. Siong Khye as the publisher. This Buddhist journal has existed for the longest period in Singapore and is still in print today. He also paid attention to female Buddhists, sponsoring the formation of Wan Shi Female Buddhists Classes (万石佛学女众班), now known as "Minnan Female Buddhists Classes" (闽南佛学院女众班), at Wan Shilian Temple (万石莲寺). Other important appointments Ven. Seck Hong Choon took up were as president of Singapore Buddhist Federation, religious adviser of the Singapore Buddhist Lodge, among others. In education, he assisted in the expansion of the first Buddhist school in Singapore, Maha Bodhi School (菩提学校). He also led in the establishment of the first and only Buddhist secondary school, Manjusri Secondary School (文殊中学), officially opened in 1982, and was appointed the chairman of its board of directors thereafter.

Ven. Seck Hong Choon was very involved in charity and social welfare as well. In 1967, he used the remaining donations from the first Great Compassion Dharma Meeting held the previous year as development fund for the Buddhist Free Clinic's Foundation, and was appointed chairman on its completion in 1969. The clinic saw its first branch established three years later, and the second in 1979, both under the charge of Ven. Siong Khye. Ven. Seck Hong Choon also looked into other aspects of social needs, including forming the Drugs Rehabilitation Counselling Service within the Singapore Buddhist Federation, together with Ven. Siong Khye, and setting up "Evergreen Home", an old folks' home in Phor Kark See.

He was also the bridge connecting Singapore to the region and China. He was abbot of Meow Siang Lodge in Penang, abbot of Xinyuan Temple (信愿寺) and Huazang Temple (华藏寺) in the Philippines, and director of Nengren Secondary School (能仁中学) in the Philippines as well. In the last eight years of his life, from 1982, he led devotees to China eight times, visiting famous and historical temples, establishing contacts with Buddhist colleges and associations, and improving the understanding between China and overseas Buddhists. Some highlights of the trips included the pilgrimage homage to the four Buddhist Sacred Mountains, and the paying of homage to His Holiness Panchen Lama (班禅喇嘛) twice. Ven. Seck Hong Choon also invited prominent Buddhist representatives from overseas to Singapore, notably Zhao Puchu (赵朴初), president of the China Buddhist Association, who visited in 1988. This series of visits were of diplomatic significance. It can be perceived as informal diplomacy in the absence of formal diplomatic channels between Singapore and China, prior to the official establishment of diplomatic ties.

In 1987, he was awarded the title of "Supreme Chinese Monk" (Phra Ajancin Bodhi Sangvara Sinhanakorn Kanachan) by the Thai king for his contributions to Buddhism. He was the first in Singapore to receive such honour from the king. There are memorial halls in China and Singapore to commemorate the Ven. Seck Hong Choon at the Chengtian Temple and Phor Kark See Monastery respectively.

Ven. Seck Hong Choon died on 25 December 1990 at Phor Kark See Monastery.

See Chinben

(施振民, Shi Zhenmin, 1932–86)
Academic, social activist, Philippines

Chinben See was a leader in the Chinese-Filipino community who advocated national integration of ethnic Chinese into mainstream Philippine society and considered Philippines as their homeland and country. He was also a scholar who helped to develop Chinese-Filipino studies. His untimely death was a blow to the movement but his wife, Teresita Ang-See, and close friends continued his unfinished work in his memory.

See Chinben was born in Hui Liao, Jinjiang, Fujian, China on 19 April 1932. In 1936, accompanied by his mother (a daughter of a Chinese physician) and younger brother Tekben, he left China and joined his father, See Chay (施至菜) (a small trader) who had earlier migrated and settled in Cebu, Southern Philippines. See Chinben considered Cebu as "the hometown of his childhood" (童年的故乡), not Jinjiang, where he was born as he left China when he was four years old and too young to remember anything. He wrote: "We also have dreams, but the dream never brought us back to the moonlit beaches of Southern China but to the fabulous sunsets along the banks of Manila Bay. …Coconuts and pineapples figure in our dreams but never the longans and the lychees."

See often reminisced about his early experiences in Cebu, even if it was a difficult one, especially when the Japanese occupied and ravaged the province during the war. He learned to speak the Cebuano dialect like a native due to early exposure to exclusively Filipino neighbors. These unforgettable early experiences had profound impact on his outlook and his life.

See received primary education and junior high school in Cebu and then he and youngest brother Huybin, transferred to Chiang Kai Shek High School in Manila where he finished his senior high school. See went back to Cebu after high school to help his father manage their business but when his second brother, Tekben, himself finished high school, See convinced his father to allow him to continue his tertiary education. See left for Taiwan in 1956 since the cost of education was much cheaper there. He took up history at first but after attending a lecture given by the world famous anthropologist and archaeologist, Professor Li Chi, See found his niche and love for anthropology. He obtained a Bachelor of Arts degree in Anthropology from the National Taiwan University and applied for graduate studies with the Harvard-Yenching Fellowship. He was accepted to Harvard University (1962–65) where he received a Master of Arts degree in Anthropology.

Returning to the Philippines, See taught at the Xavier University in Cagayan de Oro City southern Philippines in 1969-70, after which he became founder and director for Southern Philippines of Pagkakaisa Sa Pag-unlad (合一协进会). He met his future wife, Teresita Ang (Hong Yuhua 洪玉华), who was a member of Pagkakaisa in the activities of the association. Despite the age gap, love sparked due to the common interest and shared vision. They got married in 1975. In 1975–78, he was part of a Harvard-Yenching Foundation funded interdisciplinary research project at the Academia Sinica in Taiwan to study the settlement of the Changhua Plain in Central Taiwan and another research project on the study of the San Francisco Bay Area in the United States. When See and his wife Teresita returned to the Philippines, See taught at the De La Salle University (1978–80) as an assistant professor, and the Asian Centre at the University of the Philippines (1981–85) as associate professor. See was consciously building the Chinese-Filipino studies and gained acceptance and popularity among the students. He also continued to participate in international conferences and submitted many thought-provoking papers.

See had published a number of fine academic papers, including the studies on the Chinese in Taiwan and the United States, but his most valuable works and the largest in number were his works on the Chinese in the Philippines. According to Professor Edgar Wickberg, See's studies on Chinese organizations in the Philippines are "more detailed, more historically treated and raise more questions of analysis and explanation… they raise the questions that should help guide the rest of us as we continue the work."

Apart from the academic works, See also published numerous popular articles on the Chinese in the Philippines as he saw himself not only as an academic but also a member of the Chinese-Filipino society and wanted to contribute to its development. Not surprisingly, he was one of the founders of the Pagkakaisa (Unity) Sa Pag-unlad (Progress), a non-government organization made up of idealistic and socially conscious Chinese Filipinos. It was established in 1970 and advocated a pioneering concept of unity in cultural diversity in the Philippines. The aim was to push an amendment of the 1935 constitution which was based on jus sanguinis (by blood) rather than jus soli (by birth place) which denied citizenship to many Philippine Chinese who were born, grew up and educated in the Philippines.

See became director of the organization's Southern Philippines chapter and as such, he went around the southern regions (from Visayas to Mindanao) to drum up support for the idea of integration as well as preparation for the campaign for the Constitutional amendment for the jus soli citizenship provision. This was, at the outset, a very arduous task because at that time, the idea of integration was not heartily embraced by the Chinese community. The older generation Chinese mistakenly thought that with integration, they were being asked to give up their heritage and traditions. See had thus to point out their misperception. He used his network of relatives, classmates and friends in gathering support for Pagkakaisa and for the objectives and activities of the organization.

The new Constitution, promulgated in 1973, did not adopt the jus soli principle of citizenship but in 1975, then President Ferdinand E. Marcos, passed a decree allowing for easy access to naturalization of citizenship by administrative means. See himself was among those who were granted Filipino citizenship under the decree. The decree was meant to prepare for diplomatic recognition of the People's Republic of China (PRC). Marcos did not wish to have a sizeable number of Chinese citizens owing allegiance to a communist PRC. To a large extent, the road towards preparing the ethnic Chinese community towards this end had already been paved through the efforts of See and his Pagkakaisa organization.

From 1979–80, with Pagkakaisa colleagues, See started a weekly column entitled "Crossroads" (十字街口) for the Chinese newspaper Orient News (东方日报). The writers' insights had a lot of impact on the Chinese-Filipino community. The theme "we are all Filipinos in our national identity but we should take pride in our Chinese heritage" resonated in the hearts and minds of young Chinese Filipinos.

On 23 February 1986, the EDSA People Power Revolution broke out. At that time, See was undergoing a battery of tests to find out what was wrong with his failing health. Even though he was wracked with fever, he went out to his friends to solicit support for the revolution and to convince the Chinese-Filipino community that "this is our revolution too because we are integral parts of this society." When Marcos was deposed and President Corazon C. Aquino was sworn in as President, See gathered his friends to resurrect the Pagkakaisa Sa Pag-unlad, which was forced to hibernate during Martial Law. Unknown to him he had liver cancer. He was undaunted when he learned of the shattering prognosis that he had few more months to live. He lived each day fully and doubly treasured each bonus moment. He worked on proposals to improve the Chinese-language teaching in the country and to put up a Chinese-Filipino cultural center. Despite his illness, he continued giving talks in conferences and discussion groups on what the Chinese Filipinos could do to help rebuild the country ravaged by 20 years dictatorship. At his death bed, See completed his last academic paper to be presented at the October 1986 International Association of Historians of Asia (IAHA) conference at Singapore.

On 29 November 1986, See finally succumbed his illness leaving behind his wife, a nine-year-old daughter Carmelea, and an one-year-old son, Sean. His good friends Go Bon Juan (in the Philippines) and

Lily Chua (in the United States), launched a fund-raising campaign via World News (世界日报) to establish a memorial scholarship fund and a book procurement fund in his memory. His wife also published a 550-page collection of his writings, The Chinese Immigrants, in 1992.

In 1987, the Kaisa Para Sa Kaunlaran, successor to the Pagkakaisa group, was organized. In 1999, See's proposal for a cultural center, written with his frail hand on his death bed, came to fruition. With the help of Dr Angelo King, who had read the proposal, the Kaisa Heritage Center with the Bahay Tsinoy — Museum of the Chinese in Philippine Life — was inaugurated. In memory of See's life of continuous learning, his entire library collection and an endowment fund of P3 million was given by his wife and children for the Kaisa Heritage Center where the library, Chinben See Memorial Library, was named to honor him.

Seow Houtseng Sribunrueang

(萧佛成, Xiao Focheng, 1864–1939)

Leading Thai-Chinese journalist, community leader, Thailand

Best known as Seow Houtseng, he was a leading Thai-Chinese journalist who supported the revolutionary activities of Sun Yat-sen. He had special relationships with Rama VI, which made it possible for him to survive despite his ardent Chinese nationalist views. He got into trouble after Rama VI passed away.

Seow Houtseng was born in British Malaya in 1864 to Seow Liang-an and Yiew, but his family relocated to Bangkok when he was still an infant. His father became the owner of one of Thailand's first few rice mills. The Seow family was quite cosmopolitan. Though he grew up mostly in Thailand, his father had him registered as a British subject from a very early age. Seow and his brothers were well educated in both the Thai and Chinese languages. This would later play a major part in his role as a bilingual news editor, and his image as the model transnational Chinese-Thai citizen or Chino-Siam as they were popularly known during the early twentieth century.

The young Seow Houtseng helped his father run the family business, but later chose not to carry on with this when his father passed away. Seow instead pursued a personal interest in both the Thai and Chinese languages. He launched three daily and monthly newspapers: the Thai daily, Chino-Siam Warasap, the Chinese daily, Hua Siem Sinpao (《华暹新报》), and the monthly, Phadung Witthaya.

Chino-Siam Warasap commenced publication on 15 April 1907. Apart from advertisements, it also published articles and news stories, carried government and business announcements, and printed obituaries of prominent people. Through this paper, Seow occasionally expressed or exchanged personal views with His Majesty King Wachirawut (Rama VI), with the monarch adopting the pseudonym, Atsawapahu.

As a journalist, Seow could not avoid getting involved in politics. Questions were raised as to whether Chino-Siam Warasap had supported the foiled rebellion of 1911, and whether it had exhorted Thais to boycott Japanese products towards the end of World War I. In fact, Seow himself was quite keen on the politics of both Thailand and China. He was a loyal supporter and close associate of Sun Yat-sen from the earliest years of Sun's revolutionary activities in Overseas Chinese communities throughout Southeast Asia. He helped facilitate Sun's four visits to Thailand during the first decade of the twentieth century and assisted him in garnering support from the Chinese community in Thailand through his various publications.

During the early years of the Republic of China, Seow was continuously recognized as the leader of the Siamese branch of the Kuomintang. His newspapers were frequently used to promulgate Chinese Nationalist propaganda. As dynasties were being toppled one after the other in the early twentieth century, it was only natural that the Thai ruling class soon began to be suspicious of Seow's close relationship with Sun Yat-sen and the Chinese Republic. Moreover, with King Wachirawut's promotion of a brand of nationalism that had a rather obvious anti-Chinese overtone — Atsawapahu's Jews of the Orient being the prime example — it was almost unavoidable that a character such as Seow would come into direct ideological conflict with the fledging Thai nationalist movement of that era.

At one point, Prince Thewawong Warophakon branded the Chino-Siam Warasap a public enemy and proposed to King Wachirawut that Seow Houtseng into exile. However, the monarch opposed the idea, reasoning that Seow's wife was Thai, his children were all raised mostly in Thailand, and the majority of his relatives and business associates resided in Thailand. The king believed that Seow was propagating Chinese nationalism mainly to sell his newspapers, and that he would have great difficulties if he were to be banished to China.

Moreover, King Wachirawut was a staunch supporter of the free press and insisted on being as lenient as possible towards the news media. He suggested a much subtler way of dealing with Seow Houtseng and his publications; he decided to offer subsidies to some of Seow's publications in exchange for Seow's regular reports on crucial news and developments within the Chinese community in Thailand. Consequently Seow served as King Wachirawut's secret agent within the Chinese community in Thailand, while the crown secretly supported Seow's publishing business. While engaging in this secret cooperation, Seow, on the one hand, made certain that his published statements supported republicanism only in the context of China, and openly expressed his loyalty to the crown in the case of Thailand. King Wachirawut, on the other hand, was willing to tolerate Seow's dissenting views and continued to engage in journalistic debates with Seow to the end of his reign in 1925.

Seow, however, did not enjoy such a cordial relationship with the crown in the reign of King Prachathipok (Rama VII). With political tension constantly escalating in Thailand, Seow's publications began to be shut down soon after the death of King Wachirawut. Without his royal patron, Seow began to fade from the Thai political scene and became more involved in Chinese politics, especially after Japan began its expansion into China with the invasion of Manchuria in 1931. Seow was then at the forefront of the underground movement in Thailand for Chinese national salvation. In the early 1930s, he accepted a ministerial position with the Chinese government, and relocated to China, remaining there until his death in 1939.

Seow's wife was Rian Yamitrai, and they had four children.

Setiono, Benny Gatot

(Khouw Thian Tong, 许天堂, Xu Tiantang, 1943–)

Community leader, writer, Indonesia

Benny G. Setiono is a community leader and head of the Chinese Indonesian Association, Jakarta Branch. He is also the writer of Tionghoa Dalam Pusaran Politik (1,137 pages), published by Elkasa in Jakarta in 2003, with an introduction by Daniel S. Lev, the late American political scientist and authoritative commentator of Indonesian politics from the Washington University in Seattle. Setiono received the Wertheim Award 2008 from Wertheim Stichting (Wertheim Foundation) in Leiden-Amsterdam for his efforts and work for freedom in the Indonesian nation.

He was born on 31 October 1943 in Kuningan, West Java. When he was little, Benny's house was burnt down by a mob calling themselves the "People's Army", and his grandfather was killed by the Hisbullah group. The incident happened in 1947, during the first clash between Indonesian nationalists and the Dutch. After the incident, his parents and their children moved to Cirebon city, West Java, before moving again to Jakarta, where the family settled down. The young Setiono went to school and grew up in Jakarta. His father, Khouw Sin Eng, later known as Endang Sunarko, was able to speak Dutch, English, and French. He was a freelance writer who often contributed articles to Sin Po daily and Pantjawarna magazine, also under the management of Sin Po. Khouw was also an activist in Xiongdi Hui, an anti-Japanese resistance organization before World War II.

Setiono went to three different primary schools in Jakarta, the last one being a Dutch school, which was closed down in 1954 together with other Dutch schools. He was then transferred to an Indonesian primary school at Gang Komandan, where Soe Hok Gie (political commentator, college instructor, and former student leader) was also schooled, albeit at a different time. After finishing his primary education in 1956, Setiono studied at a Christian junior high and senior high school in Jakarta and graduated in 1962. He was admitted to the Faculty of Economics at Res Publica University (known as URECA), a university established by Baperki (Badan Permusyawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia. The Consultative Body for Indonesian Citizenship), a Chinese social organization that was close to President Soekarno. When he was in his third year, there was the 1965 upheaval in Indonesia, known as the G-30-S, which led to the fall of Soekarno, the banning of the Communist Party of Indonesia, and the emergence of the military. In the turbulence, the Ureca campus was burnt down in October 1965 by an illicit group supported by the militia. The new authority took over the campus soon after that and renamed it Trisakti University.

Setiono was then compelled to leave the university. When in Ureca he was active in the Students' Council and made many friends. According to his recollection, his short university life had a profound impact on his thinking. After leaving the university, he went into several business ventures, and his longest involvement was with PT Dewi Sani Mustika, which introduced TV Satellite in 1985. He also established another business, PT Jaya Sakti Indonesia, which supplied maintenance equipment for golf courses. However, being a social activist at heart, he began to organize social and political parties just like his Indonesian counterparts, when Soeharto was forced to step down in May 1998, after a series of riots which ushered in the era of Reformasi. Together with other Chinese, Setiono helped found Perhimpunan Indonesia-Tionghoa (INTI, Chinese Indonesian Association) in Jakarta in April 1999. He then sold his businesses in order to concentrate on the organization.

When Johanes Herlijanto from the University of Indonesia asked him for the reason he joined INTI, Setiono explained that during the Soeharto administration, like other Chinese, he had no choice but to become a middle-class entrepreneur, something he did for more than thirty-two years. It took none other than the 1998 May Riots to make him aware that throughout all those years, the Chinese "had been made so powerless, put in the cage, led only to do business, and finally made as scapegoats". Thus he now realized that "the Chinese should wake up and do something, at least to increase their political awareness in order to be able to struggle for equality as citizens" (Herlijanto 2004, p. 71). Setiono also expressed his idea of "bring[ing] as many Chinese as possible into the mainstream of Indonesian nation, without giving up their Chinese-ness". He strongly believed that "the Chinese should work together with other Indonesian groups to build a democratic and pluralistic Indonesia which is free from poverty, injustice and corruption", so the gap between the rich and the poor "could be diminished".

In 2002, he and several friends established ELKASA (Lembaga Kajian Masalah Kebangsaan), Institute for the Study of National Problems, which published his book, Tionghoa Dalam Pusaran Politik (Chinese in the Political Turbulence) in 2003, with an introductory note from Daniel S. Lev. Lev noted that although Setiono was not a "professional scholar", he "has a brain and a heart of a real scholar who is interested in historical details and want to understand the puzzling mystery of an evolutionary process by reviewing and asking various new questions". Lev further noted that "the focus of that book is actually Indonesian history, within which Chinese minority also has a role, and their perspectives are changing and a balance is always sought among many actors in a very complex history in order to obtain a realistic picture of history of the people who have long become part of Indonesian society, as an Indonesian who due to the making of a history is coincidentally a minority". The book has also been translated into Chinese by Professor Zhou Nanjing of Peking University in 2004.

On the practical side, Setiono at INTI — Jakarta Branch — together with other managerial members, has developed a "clinic on the move" programme which provides free medical charity for the poor, Chinese and non-Chinese alike. The programme is under the chief of the committee of social service, Dr Hapsarini. The coordinator of the programme is Dr Lie Dharmawan. According to Setiono, "his organization was reaching out to poorer Indonesians of all ethnicities and providing food and medicines" (Fuller 2006). "Ethnic Chinese," he said, "also need to be more mindful of the wealth gap and must work to reduce it if racial harmony is to be maintained" (Fuller). On Sunday, 2 March 2008, the organization established the fantastic record of providing 11,136 of residents of Tegal City and its surrounding area with free medical treatment. This feat was acknowledged and recorded by Indonesian Record Museum (MURI).

Besides being the head of the INTI Jakarta branch, Setiono is also known as a social observer on the ethnic Chinese. He has written numerous articles for the mass media and the Internet, such as "Bung Karno and Etnis Tionghoa", Indonesia Media Online, December 2002, and "Kebangkitan Organisasi Tionghoa di Indonesia Jangan Sampai Kebablasan", Berpolitik.com, 27 August 2007.

Shaw, Runme

(邵仁枚, Shao Renmei, 1901–85)

Movie magnate, philanthropist, Singapore

Runme Shaw was a China-born movie magnate and philanthropist, and co-founder of The Shaw Organisation.

Runme Shaw was born in Shanghai, China on 24 October 1901, the third of 10 children of textile merchant, Shaw Yuh Hsien (1867–1920) and his wife Wang Shun Xiang (1871–1939). The Shaw children grew up in Shanghai and were educated in traditional Shanghainese schools learning Confucian classics and classical Chinese literature. When he was older Runme worked in his father's trading company as sales manager.

In his spare time, he and his older brother Runje (1896–1975) would produce plays in a small family-owned opera theatre called the Laughter Theatre. Once, during a performance of Runje's play The Man from Shensi, the stage collapsed and the hero fell through the floorboards. The audience found this very amusing, so Runje and Runme incorporated the incident into the play. The play's success encouraged the brothers to buy a primitive movie camera and set up a film company, Unique Film Productions. They then made a silent film based on Runje's play, which was a great success. They followed this up with a string of other successful silent movies. Casting their eyes beyond the China's shores, the Shaw brothers looked to promoting their films in Southeast Asia, and as Runme was the company's distribution manager, it was his task to open up the markets. At age 23, he left Shanghai and headed for Indochina where he hoped to meet up with some film distributors. However, he was denied a permit to land and he looked further south, choosing Singapore as his base to distribute Shaw films to the large Chinese migrant population in the region. Two years later, his younger brother Run Run (b. 1907) joined him in Singapore. Runje remained in Shanghai and continued to make films.

In 1924, Runme established Hai Seng Company at 116 Robinson Road for film distribution. This company later became Shaw Brothers Pte Ltd, and then Shaw Organisation. The Shaws found the Singapore film market cliquish and protected and monopolized by established players. They decided that the only way for them to expand their market share was to operate their own cinema, which they did. In 1927, they leased a cinema in Tanjong Pagar for the princely monthly rental of $2,000 and started showing their own films. Their movies were a hit.

To expand his business into Malaya, Runme hoisted a projector on his back and travelled around Malaya and started showing films in major towns like Ipoh, Penang and Kuala Lumpur, often in tents or in the open air with a makeshift screen. When talking films were introduced, the Shaw brothers began making their own 'talkies'. The first one, which was a great hit, was called Romance of the Opera. They also attempted some Malay movies at a film studio, Malay Film Productions Ltd in Jalan Ampas, but the early ones were failures as the directors were Chinese and did not understand Malay culture very well. The Shaws did, however, revive their Malay movie business after the War when it engaged two popular Indian film directors, BS Rajhans and Phani Majumdar to direct their films. From 1947 to 1967, the Shaws produced over 300 Malay films, many of which have become classics. Among the most famous actors to emerge from these studios was the multi-talented P. Ramlee.

By 1939, the Shaw brothers owned and operated a chain of cinemas in Singapore, Malaya, Thailand, Indonesia and Indochina. Among the famous Singapore cinemas were: Pavilion, Roxy and Alhambra (Singapore's first air-conditioned cinema). Having established themselves in the movie world, the Shaws diversified into other entertainment ventures. These include amusement or entertainment parks similar to those in Shanghai, offering a variety of programmes, such as magic shows, gambling tents, cabaret stages, Malay bangsawan and Chinese opera stages, and cinemas that showed Indian, Chinese, Indonesian, Middle Eastern and American movies. Between the mid-1930s and the 1980s, the Shaws owned and operated two of the three amusement parks in Singapore: New World (on Jalan Besar) and the Great World (on Kim Seng Road). The Shaws later started parks in the Malayan towns of Malacca, Ipoh, Taiping and Alor Star.

The entertainment world came to an abrupt halt when the Japanese invaded Singapore in February 1942 and took over all theatres and amusement parks. Runme tried unsuccessfully to hide from the Japanese who captured him and offered him a salary of $350 in Japanese currency to run the cinemas and screen propaganda films produced by the Japan Film Distribution Company. When the Japanese Occupation ended in 1945, the cinemas and parks were returned to the Shaws and they were able to commence business again. The post-War years were particularly profitable ones for the Shaws, especially after the privations of the Occupation. Demand for movies – one of the most affordable forms of entertainment — was so great that in the late 1950s, Run Run left Singapore for Hong Kong to make movies to meet this demand. The Shaw studios churned out up to 60 movies a year and Runme continued in his role as master distributor. Later, the Shaws also became exclusive distributors for Universal, Warner Brothers, United Artists and British Pathe.

By the 1970s, the Shaw chain of cinemas comprised some 230 theatres worldwide, including cinemas in Hong Kong, Japan, Indonesia, North America, Canada and Australia. When cinema audiences began dwindling in the 1980s, the Shaws started developing cineplexes, opening Prince and Jade cinemas in 1988. In 1993, they transformed their landmark Lido cinema into a 22-storey mixed development complex that included shows, restaurants, offices and an 8-screen Cineplex. By the 1980s, management of the sprawling business devolved to the second-generation of Shaws: Runme's sons, Vee King and Vee Foong; and Run Run's son Vee Meng. In 1982, Runme was forced into retirement when he suffered a serious fall and went into a coma.

Runme Shaw was very active in public life as well, serving as Chairman of the Singapore Tourist Promotion Board (1969–76); Chairman of the Singapore Turf Club (1964–83); President of the St John's Ambulance Service Council and the Alliance Francaise; Vice-President of the National Kidney Foundation; and Patron of a large number of charities including the Singapore National Heart Association, the Singapore Association for Mental Health and the YMCA.

His public service work was recognised with a series of awards and titles including: Darjah Indera Mahkota Pahang, by Sultan of Pahang (1968); International Dag Hammarskjold Award (1982); Honorary Doctor of Letters, National University of Singapore; Meritorious Service Medal, Republic of Singapore; Panglima Mangku Negara, awarded by Yang di-Pertuan Agong of Malaysia; Dato Kurnia Perkasa, by Sultan of Pahang; Knight of the Order of Merit of the Republic of Italy; Grand Officer of the Order of Merit of the Italian Republic, conferred by the Italian President; Order of the Holy Sepulchre, His Holiness Pope Paul VI Officier de la Legion d'Honneur, French Government; and Associate Knight Officer, St John.

Despite his numerous contributions to business and public life, Runme Shaw is perhaps best remembered as a philanthropist. He began his charitable work in 1948 when he and Run Run distributed money and gift bags to the aged in Singapore, Malacca, Ipoh, Kuala Lumpur and Penang during Chinese Yew Year. In 1957, the brothers established the Shaw Foundation, believing that wealth should be returned to society. Since its establishment, it has given away hundreds of millions of dollars to various charities and to the cause of education, welfare, medicine, arts and heritage. It is one of the largest philanthropic organisations in Asia.

Runme never recovered from the coma he went into after his 1982 fall. On 2 March 1985, he suffered a stroke and died at the age of 84. He was survived by his wife Peggy Soo Wei Ping and six children: Doris, Vivien, Nora, Sylvia, Vee King and Vee Foong.

Shen Demin

(Shen Teh Min, 沈德民, 1936–)

Cardiac surgeon, founder of Humanity Foundation Bandung, community leader, Indonesia

Shen Teh Min, better known as Shen Demin, is a pioneering cardiologic surgeon in Indonesia, general chairman of the Humantiy Foundation (Bandung), director of Rajawali Hospital (Bandung), and president of the Perhimpunan INTI West Java Branch.

Shen was born in Jakarta in 1936 into a middle-class family. His father, Shen Woo Pow, was a technician at Shanghai Colour Printing who had migrated to Indonesia before the outbreak of World War II. In 1948, he established the Shanghai Lithograph Company in Bandung that later became the Friendship Colour Printing Work which did well. Shen Demin is his eldest son.

The young Shen Demin received his primary and secondary education in Chinese schools in Bandung and graduated in 1953. Although he was Chinese educated, he paid special attention to his study of the Indonesian language and was able to pass the Indonesian national examination with excellent results. He was admitted to the School of Medicine at the University of Indonesia (Jakarta), which was difficult to get into, especially for ethnic Chinese. He performed very well at the school and graduated as a doctor in 1960. According to Tempo, he decided to become a doctor because of the encouragement of his mother. At one time his elder sister was very ill the family sent for a doctor who never showed up; she passed away subsequently. "After that my mother never stopped encouraging her children to become doctors," Shen noted.

After his graduation Shen worked in the Yang Seng Ie (养生院, later renamed Husada Hospital) in Jakarta and learned more about surgical operations. The following year he moved to the Chinese Hospital in Bandung, where he was encouraged by its director and colleagues there to go overseas for further studies. He thus applied to the University of Pennsylvania in the United States to study general surgery. He was accepted and spent five years (1962–67) getting a Doctor of Medicine (M.D.) degree. From 1967 to 1968 he worked at the St Vincent Hospital specializing in cardiac surgery. Later he joined the Cleveland Clinic in Ohio where he specialized in cardiology and worked under the supervision of two leading pioneering cardiac surgeons, Dr Donald B. Effler (1915–2004) and Dr Rene G. Favaloro (1923–2000). He also received further training in thoracic surgery and cardiac surgery, and assisted in heart transplant work. Shen was at the time only thirty-three years old and, already recognized as a young cardiac surgeon. He became a fellow of the American College of Surgeons (FACS) and later, a fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons of Canada (FRCSC), a recognition that he gained after working at the Royal Victoria Hospital of the McGill University in Canada before returning to Indonesia.

In 1970 Dr Shen Demin returned to Indonesia to work as a deputy head of the Intensive Care Unit (ICU) of the Hasan Sadikin General Hospital in Bandung. The lack of basic facilities for conducting cardiac operation at the hospital prompted him to remark that without aequate equipment, he felt as if his hands were tied up during an operation. His vision to build a modern and well equipped hospital was shared by some of his Indonesian colleagues. Together with Dr Soegijanto Soegijoko, Sanusi Hardjadinata, and Suhadi Sutisnahmidjaja, Shen set up a Humanity Foundation (Yayasan Kemanusiaan) in 1975 with the view to establishing the dream hospital. The team found a piece of land in Rajawali Street and began work building the Rajawali Hospital. According to Tempo, its initial capital of only 17 million rupiah came from the revenue of the badminton world champions tour in Bandung, Semarang, and Bali in 1976. The local authorities, Shen's father, and the local Chinese communities were all enthusiastic about helping this young doctor to realize his dream. It took a few years to build such a modern hospital and, when it was ready, it came with a special room for conducting emergency operations and an ICU. It is worth noting that there is also an acupuncture and TCM (traditional Chinese medicine) department. It is under Dr Shen Demin's leadership that the Rajawali Hospital in Bandung has developed into a well known heart centre in Indonesia. Reportedly Dr Shen himself conducted an open heart surgery in 1980, the first of such operations in Indonesia.

Shen was interested in medical research. He enrolled in the Ph.D. programme at the post graduate school of the Institute of Agriculture in Bogor (Institut Pertanian Bogor, IPB), West Java, to do research on heart-related disease and submitted a dissertation on the influence of the EDTA on atherogenesis in high risk monkeys. He obtained his Ph.D. from IPB in 1991. In 1998 he also obtained a Master's degree in Health Care Management from the University of Gajah Mada (UGM), Yogyakarta, after submitting a thesis on an analysis of the shortage of heart specialists in the Rajawali Hospital.

As an Indonesian of Chinese descent, Shen was aware of the situation of the Chinese in Indonesia. In fact, he could have stayed overseas after completing his post-graduate education. But, he chose to return to Indonesia. He stated that he wanted to contribute to the development of Indonesia as it was his country. Nevertheless, he felt that he was still being discriminated against as a member of a minority group and that he was not accepted by mainstream society. Not surprisingly Shen noted that he is recognized internationally as a cardiac surgeon and has been invited to various countries for his expertise, yet he was not given a professorship in Indonesia although a professorship was conferred on him by the Peking Union Medical College in 1995. This has not deterred him from advocating meritocracy and all Indonesians working together for the success of their country.

When Soeharto stepped down and Abdurrahman Wahid (Gus Dur) became president and advocated cultural pluralism in Indonesia, Shen became an ardent supporter of Gus Dur. He took the view that Gus Dur made a major contribution by introducing pluralism to Indonesia, which benefited all communities, including the Chinese. He noted that without Gus Dur, Chinese Indonesians would not be able to enjoy the cultural freedom they do now. Gus Dur passed away on 30 December 2009, and on 9 February 2010, coinciding with forty days after Gus Dur's passing, and also coinciding with the lunar (Chinese) new year, Shen organized a commemoration service for Gus Dur rather than a Chinese new year celebration in order to remember Gus Dur's contributions.

When asked by a reporter from Pikiran Rakyat (a Bandung daily newspaper) whether Gur Dur's ideal of "pluralism" had been realized in Indonesia, Shen stated that the situation had improved, but racial discrimination still existed. Chinese doctors were taken on by Indonesian state hospitals, but they were always put into less important positions.

Shen has been active in the Chinese community to promote its integration into mainstream of Indonesian society. He joined INTI (General Organization of Chinese Indonesian) and most recently was elected chairman of the INTI West Java Branch (2010–14). In 2011, a group of Chinese Indonesians who had received some Chinese education decided to establish an ASEAN Nanyang University (ASEAN NU) in Indonesia. An ASEAN NU preparatory committee was set up in Bandung of which Shen was elected chairman. On 6 June 2011 a declaration was made stating that the ASEAN NU (later renamed ASEAN Nanyang International University) was to be established with the advent of the rise of China as an economic power; it was time for Indonesians to promote cultural exchange between China and ASEAN. It also stated that the setting up of ASEAN NU was inspired by Tan Kah Kee (who established the Xiamen University in China for overseas Chinese), Tan Lark Sye (who established the Nanyang University in Singapore), and Lim Lian Giok (who was an advocate of Chinese education in Malaysia). No definite date for the establishment of the university has however been set.

Shen is married to Geraldine Waligorski, an American anaesthetist whom he met when he was studying in the United States. The two were married on 4 July 1967 and have one son (Paul) and one daughter (Michelle). Shen likes playing volleyball and table tennis, and doing judo for which he is the holder of a brown belt.

Shen Ren Shi

(沈仁史, 1886–1964)

Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Shen Ren Shi was a businessman and a community leader in the oil-producing Belait district of Brunei Darussalam, which grew from a backward monarchy to a cash-rich state. He was a leader of the Chinese in business, education, and community matters, and was eventually regarded as an unofficial Chinese Kapitan.

Shen was born and educated in Tai-pu county (大埔县) of Guangdong Province at a time when China, under the rule of the Qing Dynasty, was in a state of turmoil. In 1907, just four years before Sun Yat Sen and his fellow revolutionaries succeeded in overthrowing the feudal dynasty, Shen, aged twenty-one then, made up his mind to migrate south, hoping to seek a better future in Bau, in the Kuching Division of Sarawak, a place well known to the Hakka for it is where their predecessors made their fortune through gold-digging.

In Bau, Shen was employed by a fellow inhabitant from Tai-pu, who ran a blacksmith shop. Not long afterwards, he became acquainted with Xie Zi Cheng (谢紫臣), who ran a roaring business, importing drapery and other sundries into Miri, an oil town that sprang into being when 1910 the first oil well drilled by Sarawak Shell struck oil. At Xie's prompting, Shen went with him to Miri to work in his shop as secretary and bookkeeper.

In 1929, twenty-two years after Shen's overseas venture, he decided to seize the business opportunities opened up by the discovery of oil in the Belait District, which is over twenty miles from Miri. He migrated to Kuala Belait and started his own drapery and sundries shop under the business name of Hua Qiang (华强). With his encouragement, quite a number of fellow Tai-pu inhabitants followed him to Kuala Belait — Zheng Cheng Chang (郑诚昌), Nyau Tze Lim (饶梓琳) etc. being notable examples.

By 1931, the sleepy fishing village had developed into a town, complete with a row of wooden shops erected on concrete floor and some ten makeshift shops built with palm leaves (atap) along the river bank, now known after the name of the river, Belait, which is also the name of the tribe living along it.

Though the condition was harsh and primitive, it had by then attracted a considerable number of immigrant workers, mainly Chinese, comprising Hakka, Cantonese, Hokkien, Foochow, Hainan, and some other minor dialect groups. They were the customers that sustained the early pioneering shops such as coffee shops and restaurants, bicycle shops, barber salons, provision stores, etc. Shen's Hua Qiang was one of the most prominent shops.

By now, the provision of education to the children of school age became a pressing matter. The British Resident then would rather leave the Chinese community to sort out the problem. Out of an esrit de corps, Shen, along with nine other prominent community leaders representing various dialect groups, co-founded Chung Hwa Chinese School, sited at the present-day car park off Jalan McKerron. There were forty-two pupils in the first batch. It was headed by Liang Shuo Fu (梁硕夫), from Tai-pu. Two years later, this school was relocated to a new, two-storey wooden building in Jalan Bunga Rambai, constructed on a concrete floor, and comprising a hall, a library, an office, eight classrooms, and staff quarters. This new school building was the fruit of strenuous fund-raising efforts made by Shen and his cohort, and it stood as a symbol of Chinese unity and the Chinese spirit of self-help within the community.

After the war, Brunei Shell made great efforts to rebuild the oilfield, which was set on fire just about the time the Japanese retreated for home. There was then a surge of new immigrants, mainly oilfield workers from Hong Kong, Malaya, and Singapore. Kuala Belait was booming. However, the Chinese community was not properly organized and at times clannish tensions flared up. There was a clear need to form a Chinese Chamber of Commerce to represent and speak for all shopkeepers (taukay). In June 1951, Shen publicly proposed the formation of a Chamber of Commerce to the shopkeepers in Seria and Kuala Belait. The response was overwhelming. A pro tem committee headed by Nyau Tze Lim was subsequently established. It consisted of eight persons, four from each of the two towns. This was supported by the then Assistant British Resident G.A.T. Shaw, who went out of his way to grant Shen a prestigious site in Jalan Pretty especially for the construction of the proposed association.

In due course, the groundwork for the foundation of a Chinese Chamber of Commerce was completed, and the association was officially established in 1955. The first management committee was sworn in on 1 January 1956, headed by Shen. Construction of the association's premises commenced in April 1956, and was completed in less than a year at a cost of over $100,000. It was officially declared open on 28 April 1957 with great pomp and fanfare. The new concrete modern building was an impressive landmark, another milestone in Shen Ren Shi's personal contribution to Brunei Darussalam — with the collective help of local community leaders.

In the course of thirty-five years living in Brunei — from the year he settled down in Kuala Belait in 1929 to the year he passed away in 1964 — Shen had served his community selflessly. The then assistant British Resident valued his service very highly, passing all matters relating to the Chinese community to him for resolution. These often included the registration of marriage according to Chinese customs, the dissolution of Chinese marriage by agreement, and settling disputes within the Chinese community. He was seen acting as a bridge between the colonial government and the people, promoting understanding, and improving communication between them. He also played a crucial role in promoting racial peace and harmony. His duties were many and his sense of responsibility to the public wore him down. He hardly had time and energy to attend to his own personal interests. His shop, Hua Qiang, actually suffered due to his negligence. In an interview with his eldest son, Shen Wei Huai, conducted by Niew Shong Tong when he was doing research in Brunei in the 1980s, Shen Wei Huai lamented his father's failure to look after his own shop or exploit any business opportunities presented to him as a popular, well-liked taukay. In the words of his son: "My late father in the eyes of the community is a very nice person, not mercenary, never seek or expect reward whenever he helps out. He has done many a good deed, earning the respect of his community…"

Because of his influence and the respect he gained from the Chinese community, Shen Ren Shi was often regarded and addressed as "Chinese Kapitan", although he was not officially appointed as such.

Shen Ting

(沈亭, 1915–91)

Educationist, Malaysia

Shen Ting, a distinctive Chinese educationist in Malaysia, had been the principal of an independent Chinese secondary school. Under the Education Act 1961, all Chinese secondary schools were required to be converted into national type schools with a subsidy provided by the government. Those Chinese secondary schools which did not accept the conversion would not receive any such subsidy and were thus considered as "independent" schools. Many of these independent Chinese secondary schools were facing financial difficulties and low student enrolment.

In Perak, there were at the time nine independent Chinese secondary schools. These schools could only attract students who could not enter the government or national type secondary schools because they failed the government entrance examination. Most of these schools were on the verge of closing down. In such tough circumstances, Shen

Ting had played a pivotal role in the history of Chinese education in Malaysia by starting a revival campaign for independent Chinese secondary schools in Perak. This campaign had far reaching impact and it later expanded into the National Revival Campaign for Independent Chinese Secondary Schools. It was this nationwide campaign that saved the many independent Chinese secondary schools in Malaysia from collapse and laid the foundation for their subsequent development into dynamic and reputable educational institutions in the country.

Shen Ting was born in Zhao'an (诏安) in Fujian (福建) province in 1915 and was the fourth child in his family. He attended a traditional private school when he was young and later studied in a modern school. In 1934 he completed his secondary education at Ping Min Secondary School (平民中学) in Quanzhou (泉州). Subsequently he took another year to study Education for Agricultural Villages as he had decided to devote himself to teaching the children in the villages. He moved to Penang soon after his wedding in 1935 and was employed the following year to teach language, history, and geography at Chung Hwa High School (中华中学) in Penang. During the Japanese Occupation, he operated a small business to earn a living. After the war, he resumed his teaching career and taught at Poi Lam Secondary School (培南中学) in Ipoh in 1955. When the government implemented the conversion of Chinese secondary schools in 1962, he was appointed vice-principal of the converted Poi Lam National Type Secondary School, a post which he held only in name without any extra allowance received. In order to supplement his income, he worked part-time as the head of general affairs in the newly established Poi Lam Independent Chinese Secondary School. He retired from his post in Poi Lam National Type Secondary School in 1975 at the age of sixty.

Soon after his retirement, Shen Ting was employed as principal of Shen Jai High School (深斋中学) in Ipoh. He served the school for ten years and during this time he was also actively involved in the revival campaign for independent Chinese secondary schools in Perak. Riding on the momentum of this campaign and with the cooperation from the board of directors as well as staff of the school, he was able to transform Shen Jai High School from an insignificant independent school into a reputable private educational institution in Malaysia. By the time he left Shen Jai High School, he had served in the education sector for about half a century.

Shen Ting had served in independent Chinese secondary schools in Perak for many years and knew the plight of these schools too well. In 1972, he was already brooding over the idea of raising funds for these independent Chinese schools. On 1 April 1973, representatives from the nine independent Chinese secondary schools in Perak held a joint meeting at Yuk Choy High School (育才独中) in Ipoh to discuss ways to improve their schools. Shen Ting was then vice-principal of Poi Lam National Type School and head of general affairs in Poi Lam Independent Chinese Secondary School. It was at this meeting that he first proposed the idea to launch a fund-raising campaign to establish a development fund totaling RM1 million for the nine independent Chinese secondary schools in Perak. In 1974, the Council of Perak Chinese School Committees (霹雳董联会) officially launched this fund-raising campaign and Shen Ting was elected honorary secretary of the council. He served in that capacity with utmost dedication and assisted the council to launch many activities, thus contributing much to the Chinese education movement in Perak.

Shen Ting was the actual mastermind behind the revival campaign for independent Chinese secondary schools in Perak. At a time when these schools were facing threats to their survival due to declining student enrolment and distrust from many parents, Shen Ting was confident that the independent Chinese secondary schools were the real Chinese schools. He realized that if these schools could not survive, then Chinese education in Malaysia would die a natural death. It was, in fact, such a realization that motivated him to initiate the revival campaign for these schools. The idea to launch a fund-raising campaign for these schools was born out of his real experiences and far-sightedness. In managing the fund-raising campaign, he had to face many parents and members of the public who would always make scornful remarks and describe the independent Chinese schools as mere tuition schools. However, despite the challenges and hardships, Shen Ting had no regrets working with the various leaders of the Chinese education movement to seek donations from all corners of the Perak state. His significant role in the revival of these independent Chinese schools was unrivalled. In recognition of his dedication and contributions to the development of Chinese education in Malaysia, he was presented with the Spirit of Lim Lian Geok Award in 1991. Shen Ting died the same year in Ipoh.

Shih Choon Fong

(施春风, Shi Chunfeng, 1945–)

Engineer, educationist, Singapore

Shih Choon Fong, who was born in 1945 in Singapore, is often credited for being the president of the National University of Singapore (NUS) who elevated the country's foremost tertiary institution into a "world class university". However the truth is most NUS students have no idea who he was or what he did in the university.

Originally educated in Monk's Hill Primary School and thence Beatty Secondary School, Shih did not go to university immediately after his secondary education, choosing instead to head to the Singapore Polytechnic where he obtained a diploma in engineering. This did not deter him from further bettering himself for he obtained his Master's and PhD from Harvard University in 1970 and 1973 respectively, after which he decided to dedicate his career to research and education. Accordingly, he led the Fracture Research Group at the GE Corporate Research Lab in the United States following the attainment of his PhD. In 1981, he joined Brown University as an academic. When he became a full professor, he returned to Singapore and headed NUS Institute of Materials Research and Engineering as its director. In 1997, he was promoted to deputy vice-chancellor, and in 2000, president of the university.

In his nine years as NUS president, Shih was widely credited with creating the university's research-intensive focus, as well as enhancing NUS reputation internationally. Shih utilized his experiences in Harvard and Brown universities to initiate a performance and market-based evaluation system for the academics in NUS, which determined the academic staff's marketability and research potential. He was also credited for drawing on his American experience in injecting more flexibility and responsiveness to the rigid, British-based Singapore higher education system through the implementation of new teaching and grading methodologies from the American system. In doing so, the Times Higher Education Supplement claimed that Shih's efforts had successfully augmented NUS growing international recognition and achievements. In order to promote NUS global profile, Shih presided as chairman emeritus of the Association of Pacific Rim Universities (APRU), a consortium of forty-two leading research universities along the Pacific Rim, which was modelled after the prestigious Association of American Universities (AAU). He also sat on the governing boards of several university consortiums, including Universitas 21 and the International Alliance of Research Universities (IARU), and chaired the Governing Board of the APRU World Institute, an institute of advanced studies to address scientific, social, and economic issues of global importance.

Shih did not spend his time only in the administrative running of NUS, but also continued to pursue his interest in academia. Indeed, he was in the list of highly cited engineering researchers in the world compiled by the Institute for Scientific Information (ISI). Likewise, in his academic capacity, Shih made significant contributions in non-linear fracture mechanics and computational methods for fracture analyses. He had some 150 publications in top scientific journals to that effect. Among his academic honours were the Swedlow Award and the George Irwin Medal, both from the American Society for Testing and Materials (ASTM).

Given his continued interest in the development of technologies in the field of engineering, it was not surprising to discover that Shih was a foreign associate of the U.S. National Academy of Engineering and a foreign honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He was the inaugural recipient from the Asia Pacific of the Chief Executive Leadership Award, presented by the Council for Advancement and Support for Education. He also received the decoration of "Chevalier" or Knight of French Legion of Honour. Brown University similarly honoured him by bestowing on him an honorary doctorate of science in recognition of his contributions to higher education and research.

Outside of academia and the administration of NUS, Shih was a former consultant to the National Aeronautics Space Administration, Oak Ridge National Laboratory, and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and a member of the MIT Corporation Visiting Committee for the Department of Materials Science and Engineering. Locally, Shih served on several national level committees in Singapore. He was chairman of the Singapore-MIT Alliance Governing Board, as well as an executive committee member of the Economic Development Board. Professor Shih was a founding member of the Singapore International Foundation, as well as a board member of the National Research Foundation chaired by former Deputy Prime Minister Dr Tony Tan. In 2002–03, his performance and market-based evaluation system for academics in NUS attracted the attention of then Deputy Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong. This in turn resulted in Shih's seat on the Economic Review Committee, whereupon he and others in the committee crafted wide-ranging strategies for remaking Singapore.

Shih stepped down from his position as president of NUS at the end of 2008 and has served as founding president of the King Abdullah University of Science and Technology (KAUST) in Saudi Arabia since 1 December 2008. Shih's successor is a Singaporean physician, Professor Tan Chorh Chuan, who is concurrently the deputy chairman of A*STAR.

Sia, Isidro C.

(谢西乐, Xie Xile, 1953–)
Medical doctor, Philippines

Dr Isidro Sia is a medical doctor who has focused on two underserved fields in medicine — community pharmacology and ethnopharmacology. Sia's work has benefited both national and international organizations such as the World Health Organization, the Ministry of Health of Vietnam, and the ASEAN Technical Committee on Traditional Medicines and Health Supplements.

It is rare to find among Filipino medical doctors one who has devoted an otherwise lucrative career to these two underserved fields in medicine or to scientific study correlating ethnic groups, their health, physical habits, and methodology in creating and using medicine. Dr Sia is this rare find, and is truly deserving of the many awards he has garnered for his pioneering work in documenting and applying his findings on the healing traditions and medicinal plants used by indigenous tribes in the Philippines.

Sia readily says that it was his Chinese heritage and his environment that were influential in instilling in him the passion for his life's work. Growing up in the province of Tayabas, Quezon, he was fascinated by life in the countryside. As a boy, he observed and interacted with the Aeta people until it was time for him to study at a university in Manila. While in Manila, he developed a special interest in herb vendors of Quiapo, Manila, and the Chinese drug stores in Ongpin (Chinatown). Sia's father used Chinese traditional medicine and this added to his interest in the use of traditional medicine, particularly the practices of Philippine indigenous groups.

One of his most significant works is the documentation of the healing traditions of more than twenty ethno-linguistic groups in the Cordillera Region, the Sierra Madre mountains, provinces of Mindoro, Palawan, and Davao — areas that span different islands from the northern to the southern parts of the archipelago. This documentation is a rich source of study materials for potential medicinal agents and a rallying point for forest conservation in the country.

Drawing from the deep belief that trees and plants in the forest are what give people health and life, indigenous tribes have learned the value of cherishing their environment. Sia's research highlights the potential of using traditions and beliefs to safeguard the forests. He says there have been numerous results of his research that have benefited indigenous communities. The establishment of a medicinal plant herbarium is planned on his research team's findings. As well, his research is used to promote advocacy for the rich traditions for health of the indigenous peoples, while developing culture-sensitive health education materials that incorporate beneficial local practices with acceptable western medicine practices to be used by indigenous communities.

This is not commonly done even among action-oriented researches. With this undertaking, he emphasizes that indigenous peoples are the object and not the subject of his research. With his writings and when he is teaching, he underscores participatory research and looking at research from the point of view of indigenous peoples.

The communities are also encouraged to use results of the research for their advocacy on protecting their ancestral domain. In fact, the National Commission on Indigenous Peoples has recognized the weight of his ongoing research into the Aeta peoples in Aurora Province and offered to partner his team. Research results will be used for the promotion of the protection of the Aeta ancestral domains and the founding of an area-based cultural studies centre in a local institution in Aurora. He and his team believe that specific programmes and projects should cater to the uniqueness of individual indigenous communities, so government projects would be more meaningful for them. It is through these programmes that existing legislation to protect the rights of indigenous peoples is given more strength.

Sia has also conducted community-based research to determine the efficacy, safety, and acceptability of medicinal plants used in indigenous communities for common ailments such as scabies, skin fungal infection, rheumatism, diarrhoea, and cough.

His other research activity, done among the communities of lowland cultural groups in Luzon, resulted in beneficial home remedies from plants that may be used by family health care providers. His involvement in an integrated, multidisciplinary programme on medicinal plant research has brought attention to the use of scientifically validated medicinal plants among people living in urban areas.

Working with a team from various disciplines, Sia has determined the efficacy and safety of certain medicinal plants, including lagundi (Vitex negundo) for cough, and sambong (Blumea basamifera) for urinary stones. These and other plants have since been accepted and endorsed by the Department of Health for popular use around the country.

One of Sia's published research works, "Parmakolohiya sa komunidad: Mga nakatagong gamot sa mga bahay sa Brgy. Bungo, Gapan, Nueva Ecija", (Community Pharmacology: medicinal plants in Barangay Bungo, Gapan, Nueva Ecija) was recognized as an Outstanding Research Publication by the National Academy of Science and Technology in 1995. The paper focused on medicine used at home in general, and was not specific to medicinal plants. Of the numerous awards that Sia has received, he says, this has a personal significance. His co-researchers were community health workers, who were overwhelmed on receiving the award at ceremonies held at the Department of Science and Technology. The research paper, which was written in Filipino, was later published in the Acta Medica Philippina, the scientific journal of the University of the Philippines College of Medicine.

Regardless of the accolades and awards he has already won, Sia has even bigger hopes for his projects. When permitted by the community, he puts information gathered from research in a national database as documentation on the cultural heritage of the health of Philippine indigenous communities. Further research on their medicinal plants may also be done to look into their efficacy and safety in order to develop new medicinal agents, for which the intellectual property rights of the indigenous peoples to any product that is developed will be respected.

Sia has also been serving as community physician in Nueva Ecija, Pangasinan, and Rizal during weekends since 1982. He gives importance to training community health workers so that they become competent in health education, nutrition, hygiene, management of simple illnesses, proper use of medicine and herbs, recognition of and referrals for serious medical problems, community leadership, and organization.

National and international organizations such as the World Health Organization, the Ministry of Health of Vietnam and the ASEAN Technical Committee on Traditional Medicine and Health Supplements have benefited from Sia's work. His principal focus with WHO and with the Vietnamese Government is the rational use of medicine. With ASEAN, it is the harmonization of the regulation of health supplements and traditional medicine. On the side Sia always discusses with colleagues work in ethnopharmacology in their countries.

At the local level, he serves as project leader for the National Drug Information Center, which has significantly supported the work of the National Drug Policy Program, National Drug Committee, Bureau of Food and Drugs, and National Poison Control and Information Center. He has also helped prepare the Philippine National Drug Formulary used by the Department of Health.

As a professor and physician at the University of the Philippines, Manila, for twenty-two years, Sia always emphasizes patient-oriented and local-based content and employs student-friendly teaching methods.

He handles a course on traditional medicine and various elective courses on herbal medicine in order to impart interest in traditional medicine and community service to students. For these, Sia was given the "Outstanding Basic Science Teacher Award" in 1995, and the "Angelita Reyes Gantimpala sa Kagalingan sa Pagtuturo ng mga Saligang Agham" (Angelita Reyes Award for Best Teaching Practices in Science) in 2001. As well, he was given an award for excellence in the field of medicine in the 2008 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence, organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran.

He continues to expose young medical students to underserved Filipinos to emphasize the need for medical practitioners to stay in the country. Some of his students have been inspired by this teacher's dedication to his advocacy and have even followed in his footsteps. At the moment, he has many young researchers who are involved in studies of ethnopharmacology and community pharmacology with current projects involving the Aeta people of the Aurora province. He has also served as chairman of the Department of Pharmacology, associate dean of the College of Medicine, dean of the Graduate School, and vice-chancellor of U.P. Manila. He is currently director of the Institute of Herbal Medicine.

Sia submits his all his accolades to his family's support. His father was only ten years old when he migrated to the Philippines from Shui Kou Village, Nan An, Fujian during the 1910s. The elder Sia set up a small copra business in Quezon when he grew up. Even though Sia's parents did not get past primary school, they persevered to make sure all seven of their children finished university. Isidro Sia himself was born on 6 April 1953 and has a brother who is a retired teacher in Fujian Province. His other siblings have careers as accountants, teachers, and there is a sister who is a nurse.

He says insufficient quality time with his family is the price he pays for his dedication to his advocacy. Yet despite all his awards and recognitions, he is not resting on his laurels because of his deep interest in the cultural diversity of the Philippines, and concern for its indigenous communities, which he feels are still underserved.

Siauw Giok Tjhan

(萧玉灿, Xiao Yucan, 1914–81)
Community and political leader, journalist, Indonesia

Siauw Giok Tjhan was the most influential Chinese Indonesian politician in the two decades after 1945. As the chairman of Baperki, the largest organization of Chinese Indonesians, from 1954 to 1965, he had widespread support from both Peranakan and Totok Chinese. His radical left political sympathies and status as a Chinese community leader made him a controversial figure, especially among anti-communists and advocates of assimilation. They also led to his arrest in November 1965 and subsequent internment without trial for twelve years.

Siauw Giok Tjhan was born in the Kapasan Chinese quarter of Surabaya on 23 March 1914. His father, Siauw Gwan Swie, was a Peranakan with no knowledge of Chinese; his mother, Kwan Tjan Nio was the daughter of a Totok Hakka who only agreed to his daughter's marriage on condition that the couple's eldest son be sent to a Chinese school. As the eldest child, Siauw Giok Tjhan was therefore sent to the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan school in 1918. After his maternal grandfather returned to China in 1920, Siauw's father transferred him to the Buys Instituut (a prestigious Dutch preparatory school) and then to the Europeesche Lagere School (ELS — a Dutch elementary school attended by indigenous and Chinese, as well as Dutch students). When the grandfather returned to Surabaya six years later, he was horrified to discover that Siauw had no knowledge of Chinese. He was not forced to return to a Chinese school, but was required to work at his grandfather's general retail shop after classes at the Hoogere Burger School (HBS — the most prestigious Dutch secondary school). His HBS schooling made him well versed in English, French, and German as well as Dutch, and he was a voracious reader of romance and detective fiction in all four languages. He also read the Malay language newspapers, such as Pewarta Soerabaia and Sin Tit Po, to which his father subscribed, as well as the Malay translations of Chinese books, and the Indian epics, Mahabharata and Ramayana.

The world economic depression had a severe impact on his family and changed the course of his life. His father, who had become quite wealthy speculating in agricultural products, now made massive losses because of their dramatic fall in value. With the bankruptcy of the Incasso Bank, his father's savings, which had been deposited in that bank, were converted into promissory notes that were difficult to cash. His grandfather sold up his business to pay his debts and returned to China. In 1932, his final year at the HBS, his mother and then his father died within the space of six months.

Aged eighteen years, Siauw was now an orphan, responsible for his own livelihood, and that of his fourteen-year-old brother, Siauw Giok Bie, who had just completed his study at the Meer Uitgebreid Lager Onderwijs (MULO — Junior High School). It was at this time that he began to be actively interested and involved in politics. When he took part in the boycott action led by Liem Koen Hian against the Netherlands Indies Football League (NIVB) and its Surabaya branch, he was suspended from school for a week. His growing anti-colonialism and admiration for Liem led him to join Liem's new pro-Indonesian Partai Tionghoa Indonesia (PTI — Indonesian Chinese Party) and to seek a career in journalism. With Liem's help he started work for the Surabaya daily, Sin Tit Po, but when Kwee Hing Tjiat established the daily, Mata Hari, as a PTI mouthpiece in 1934, he recruited several PTI supporters, including Siauw, to work in Semarang. In 1937 Kwee sent him back to Surabaya to head a branch office of Mata Hari. By now Tjoa Sik Ien and Tan Ling Djie — two radicals who, as students in the Netherlands, established a pro-Indonesian Union of Indonesian Peranakan Chinese (SPTI) — had returned to Surabaya. Tjoa became chairman of PTI and Tan, editor of Sin Tit Po, and they led both in a more radical direction. Strongly influenced by Tan (who was also active in the "Illegal PKI" — the underground Indonesian Communist Party organization set up by Musso), Siauw was now attracted to Marxism and the struggle against fascism. His translation of Edgar Snow's Red Star Over China appeared in serial form in Sin Tit Po, and he was actively involved in the Tjin Tjay Hwee movement to provide support for victims of the Japanese military expansion in China.

In 1939 Kwee Hing Tjiat closed the Surabaya office of Mata Hari and recalled Siauw to Semarang. Shortly thereafter, Kwee died and Siauw took his place as editor-in-chief. In Semarang, he met Tan Gien Hwa, whose father was a successful trader in Pemalang, and they married in 1940. Soon afterwards both her parents died and the couple became responsible for her four younger siblings. When the Japanese invaded, they closed Mata Hari and interned the staff. Siauw was out of the office at the time, thus escaping internment. During the Japanese Occupation he was in hiding, mainly in Malang. Even in this situation, he was able to become leader of the Kebotai, a Chinese militia established by the Kakyo Shokai (an organization of Chinese set up by the Japanese). In this capacity he urged the Chinese to support the struggle for Indonesian independence, forging links with leaders of Indonesian paramilitary organizations, and contributing (with Tan Ling Djie and Tjoa Sik Ien) to the ideas presented by Liem Koen Hian to the body set up by the Japanese authorities in Java to prepare for Indonesian independence.

After independence was proclaimed, Siauw was actively involved in politics. He joined the Partai Sosialis (Socialist Party) at its formation in December 1945. In April 1946 President Soekarno appointed him a member of the KNIP (Central Indonesian National Committee — the de facto legislature of the republic during the revolution). In 1947 he became a member of the Badan Pekerja (Working Committee) of the KNIP and was minister for minority affairs in the Amir Sjarifuddin cabinet (July 1947 – January 1948). After the fall of that cabinet he went into opposition as a member of the FDR (People's Democratic Front) led by Amir, but when Musso returned from exile in August 1948 and merged the left wing parties into the PKI, he stayed outside the expanded party. His status as a non-party member of parliament did not prevent his arrest by the Hatta government in September 1948, together with other leftists in connection with the Madiun Affair. When the Dutch seized Yogyakarta in December 1948, Siauw escaped from internment only to be re-arrested a few days later, this time by the Dutch. Among his fellow political prisoners were prominent figures who had been opponents of the FDR. On his release in August 1949 Siauw resumed his political career as a member of the Badan Pekerja. He unsuccessfully opposed concessions made by the Hatta government in its negotiations with the Dutch, but as a member of the Badan Pekerja, automatically became a member of the parliament (DPR) of the new federal Indonesian state (RIS) which came into being in December 1949.

In January 1950 Siauw resumed his journalistic career, publishing Sunday Courier (a weekly), and editing Republik (a monthly). A year later, he launched Suara Rakjat, a weekly, which in July 1951, became a daily under the name, Harian Rakjat. In October 1953, Harian Rakjat became the official organ of the PKI under the leadership of Njoto, who had been actively engaged in this newspaper and the Sunday Courier from their inception. Siauw continued to contribute to Harian Rakjat and his close association with prominent PKI leaders such as Tan Ling Djie (who lived with Siauw and his family from 1951 until late 1965 when both were arrested) and Njoto led many to believe that he himself was a party member. It seems clear that his sympathies were with the radical left, but he remained without any formal party affiliation for the rest of his political career. His newspaper ventures were supported by funding from Totok businessmen with sympathies for the People's Republic of China. After selling Harian Rakjat to the PKI, he set up a foundation called Yayasan Kebudayaan Sadar, which published magazines and books in Chinese, including the weekly Jue Xing (Sadar), which were addressed to a Totok Chinese readership.

As a member of parliament, Siauw was a vigorous opponent of moves to restrict access of ethnic Chinese to Indonesian citizenship, and moves favouring the economic interests of indigenous Indonesians at the expense of ethnic Chinese. His most important political achievements were as chairman of Baperki (Consultative Body for Indonesian Citizenship) from its founding in March 1954 to its dissolution in late 1965. Under his leadership, it became the largest ever organization of Chinese Indonesians with a claimed membership of nearly 300,000 in1965 (although this included some non-Chinese members). In 1957–58 when pupils with Indonesian citizenship were required to attend national schools and foreign schools with links to the Kuomintang were closed, Baperki stepped in to become a major provider of national schools, and in 1960, set up its own university (URECA — Universitas Res Publica). Although technically not a political party, Baperki gained 180,000 votes in the 1955 elections (entitling it to one seat in the national parliament which Siauw occupied) and fared even better in the 1957 regional elections.

Siauw was able to attract support from Totok as well as Peranakan Chinese, from business people and intellectuals, and from members of both the older and younger generations. His influence was enhanced by his close friendship with prominent indigenous political leaders, including President Soekarno. Support for him was not universal among ethnic Chinese, though. Most of his opponents were anti-communist, particularly from Catholic and PSI (Indonesian Socialist Party) circles, some of whom, such as Auwjong Peng Koen and Tan Po Goan, defected from Baperki as early as 1955. Yap Thiam Hien, another vocal critic, remained a member, but was unable to lessen Siauw's domination of the organization.

Although Baperki's membership was broad-based, in the highly polarized political environment of President Soekarno's Guided Democracy, Siauw increasingly aligned it with Soekarno, the PKI, and other "progressive revolutionary forces". At this time, Baperki came under attack for its alleged "exclusiveness" from a movement of anti-communist ethnic Chinese (backed by the Indonesian army), who advocated assimilation into the wider Indonesian society (see Sindhunatha, Kristoforus). In the changed circumstances after an abortive coup on 1 October 1965, Baperki was forced to disband and many of its leaders were interned. Siauw himself was arrested in November 1965 and spent the next ten years in jail and a further two years under house arrest. In September 1978 he was allowed to go to the Netherlands for medical treatment. Despite his ill health, over the next three years, he was active among Indonesian political exiles there, rallied support for former political prisoners and their families in Indonesia, and gave lectures about the current situation in Indonesia. Minutes before he was due to give a lecture at Leiden University on 20 November 1981, he suffered a heart attack and died. He is survived by his wife and children. Siauw was respected by his opponents as a man of principle and integrity.

Sidharta, Myra

(Ew Yong Tjhoen Moy, 欧阳春梅, Ouyang Chunmei, 1927–)

Noted researcher and writer on Chinese-Indonesian culture and philosophy, Indonesia

Myra Sidharta is one of the most prolific and widely respected researchers and writers on Chinese-Indonesian culture and philosophy. Before she began studying the Chinese in Indonesia, Sidharta was a practicing psychologist who taught psychology and Chinese philosophy at the University of Indonesia.

Sidharta is a third-generation Chinese-Indonesian. Her grandfather migrated to Indonesia in 1872 from the county of Meixian in the Guangdong province of China. Although he planned to work in the gold and tin mines in Belitung, he was employed by a Dutch mining company to be an administrative employee and as an interpreter. He later became one of the most prominent figures on the island of Belitung. Sidharta's father, who received a Dutch education, also worked at the same Dutch company where her grandfather had worked.

As the child of an employee, Sidharta was allowed to attend a small Dutch-language school run by the mining company. The teachers were recruited from The Netherlands, and most of the pupils were Dutch. Due to her Dutch education and the many Dutch magazines that her father subscribed to, Sidharta had a good grasp of Dutch culture and language. This is why she decided to further her studies at The Netherlands after finishing high school. In 1958, she graduated from Rijks Universiteit Leyden with a degree of drs. (Dutch equivalent to a Bachelor's degree) in psychology.

Although Sidharta had a western educational background, she always remembered her Chinese roots. Like most Chinese on the island of Belitung, she spoke the Hakka dialect at home and with other Chinese in social situations. Through the help of a Mandarin teacher who was residing at her grandfather's house, she learned how to speak Mandarin and write Chinese characters. It was during her Chinese lessons that she first read books written by classical Chinese authors such as Ba Jin and Lu Xun, novelists who were active in depicting China's social problems in the first half of the twentieth century. Her tutor and cousin, who attended Chinese schools, were the ones who helped her to comprehend the stories.

In her essay, "In Search of My Ancestral Home", she discloses that her Chinese studies, along with the many stories about Meixian that her grandfather had shared, made "a visit to Meixian became a pilgrimage that [she] resolved to make in [her] lifetime" (2001, p. 149). In 1982, she finally visited Meixian, where she met her "warm," "hardworking" and "friendly" relatives and where she gained a deep appreciation of the county's beautiful landscape and lively cultural heritage. Sidharta admits that her trip to Meixian brought her happiness because she could finally spend some time with her Chinese relatives, but she affirms that she is happiest in Indonesia, the place where she works and feels most needed.

In Indonesia, Sidharta practised psychology upon her graduation in 1958. She opened a children's psychiatric clinic and co-wrote several scientific books on psychology with M.A.W. Brouwer and Anna Alisyahbana (Menuju Kesejahteraan Jiwa, 1977 and Rumah Sakit Dalam Cahaya Ilmu Jiwa, 1983). She also lectured on psychology at the University of Indonesia from 1958–1967 and the University of Malaya from 1967–1971. She began taking a deep interest in Chinese culture and philosophy when she met M.A.W. Brouwer, a Catholic priest with whom she co-wrote the above articles on psychology. Brouwer encouraged her to study Chinese-Indonesian women because no one has done it before. Her curiosity piqued, she began reading Chinese-Indonesian novels published in the 1920's and 1930's to obtain clues on how the Chinese-Indonesian women lived during that era. Her findings were published in 1982 as a chapter in the book, Indonesian Women in Focus. The chapter is entitled "The Making of the Indonesian Chinese Woman". It has been widely used by scholars to gain insight on Chinese-Indonesian women.

Following her publication on Chinese-Indonesian women, Sidharta published and presented many other articles and books on Chinese culture and philosophy, with wide-ranging topics. She wrote about Kho Ping Hoo, the writer of Kungfu stories in Indonesia (paper presented for the International Study Society of the Chinese Overseas in San Francisco in 1991 and later published in 2004 within her biographical collection of 8 Chinese-Indonesian writers, Dari Penjaja Tekstil Sampai Superwoman, 8 Biografi Penulis Peranakan Tionghoa di Indonesia, published by Gramedia). She also wrote on localized Chinese cuisine (Old Recipes, New Meals, the Localization of Chinese Food in Indonesia, paper presented on the 9th Symposium on Chinese Dietary Culture, National Chengkung University, Tainan, Taiwan, in 2005), Chinese gravestones ("The Manufacture of Chinese Gravestones in Indonesia," article published in collaboration with Claudine Salmon as part of the archeological magazine, Archipel 72, in 2006) and Chinese marriages in Indonesia (The Role of the Go-between in Chinese Marriages in Batavia, paper presented at the IIAS Workshop on Chinese Archival Sources and Overseas Chinese Communities (1755–1950) at Leyden, The Netherlands).

As a researcher and writer on the Chinese in Indonesia, Sidharta highly appreciates the value of archival materials. While doing research on a woman who opened a home to save Chinese girls brought to Indonesia from China to become prostitutes, she sought and gained permission to study the Kong Koan archives. The Kong Koan was a legal institution where the Kapitan or leader of the Chinese community during the Dutch colonial era kept notes and proceedings of legal cases between 1600 and 1900. The oldest book that Sidharta found in the archives was one from 1745. When she arrived at the Kong Koan archives, Sidharta saw decay and disrepair because no one was taking care of the rare archival materials. She then sought the help of a friend, Jean Smith, at the United States Library of Congress who had connections with the Genealogical Society in Utah. Upon seeing the wealth of information at the Kong Koan archives, Smith asked and obtained the permission to microfilm marriage and birth certificates for the Genealogical society. Later on, Ohio University microfilmed the whole archive for their database. In 1991, Sidharta was invited to talk about the remnants of the Kong Koan archives ("On the Remnants of the Kong Koan Archives," paper presented at the seminar organized by Hong Kong University on Local History of the Asian Pacific Region: Contribution of the Overseas Chinese). Sidharta's efforts in conservating the Kong Koan archives finally caught the attention of Leyden University, which decided to bring the archives to The Netherlands. Researchers and students all over the world have made journeys to Leyden University to study the priceless archives, which have all been digitalized.

Up to this day, Sidharta continues to conduct research on Chinese-Indonesians, especially on the writers of novels, food and religious life. She is also an active free-lance feature writer for several newspapers and magazines. In her own words, "I will never stop writing. Writing is my life and it is one of the ways through which I can contribute to my country."

Sidharta, Priguna

(Sie Pek Giok, 薛碧玉, Xue Biyu, 1924–2003)

Leading neurologist, university professor, Indonesia

Priguna Sidharta, better known as Sie Pek Giok among his friends, was a leading neurologist in Indonesia and was also recognized as a good teacher and pioneer in his field.

Sie was born on 18 December 1924 in Losarang, Indramayu (West Java), the eldest son of a Peranakan family. His father, Sie Hway An, and mother, Tan Hong Heng, both received primary education at the Dutch school. They had eight children, but one of their sons died a few days at birth. Sie Pek Giok did not originally have this name, which is a girl's name. He was initially called Sie Pek Hie, but because he often suffered from high fever and stiffness, his uncle suggested that his name be changed to Pek Giok instead. As soon as this was done, he was rid of the high fever and stiffness.

Sie Pek Giok went to a missionary school in Indramayu for his primary school education (1931–38) and then attended a Dutch normal school for indigenous Indonesians (Hollands-Inlandse Kweekschool) in Solo (1938–41), followed by a Dutch high school (HBS) in Jakarta (1946–47). Therefore he had non-Chinese as classmates. He performed well in high school and, as a result, won a scholarship to study medicine at Rijks Universiteit (1949–54, Leiden). In the early 1950s, Indonesian Chinese students in the Netherlands were divided into several groups. Some were pro-PRC and some were pro-Taiwan. There was also a newly emerging group led by Lauw Chuan To (later known as Junus Jahja), which was Indonesia-oriented and advocated "assimilation" into Indonesian society. It was also in the Netherlands that Sie fell in love with a psychology student, Ew Yong Tjhoen Moy (also known as Myra Sidharta) and the two got married in 1953 before he finished medical school. In 1954 Sie got his medical degree. As he was academically inclined, he continued to pursue his graduate work and in 1956 received his doctoral degree from the same university after successfully defending his dissertation, "Localization of Fibre Systems within the White Matter of the Medulla Oblongata and Cervical Cord in Man" (Leiden, 1956).

From 1955 to 1956 Sie worked at Rijks Universiteit as special assistant and, from 1956 to 1958, as acting head of the Neuropathology section of the same university. He was doing very well in the Netherlands and many of his professors there advised him to stay on in the country, but, his parents urged him to return to Indonesia telling him that it was better for him to be well known in his own country than in a foreign land. The Medical Faculty of Indonesian University (FKUI) also wanted him on its staff so he eventually brought his family back to Indonesia and taught at the FKUI from 1959 to 1968, with a break from 1962 to 1963, when he did post-doctoral work at the Montreal Neurological Institute in Canada.

In 1968 the University of Malaya began to teach courses in Malay rather than in English and required the service of Indonesian professors. The British Council recommended Sie who had by then changed his name to Priguna Sidharta. Sidharta accepted the invitation to teach at the Department of Medicine, University of Malaya, as a senior lecturer (1968–70). However, after finishing the contract, he wanted to return to FKUI, but was rejected due to university politics.

Unable to return to FKUI, he served as a volunteer doctor in Persahabatan Hospital in Jakarta. The Universitas Katholik Atma Jaya (Jakarta) then invited him to teach as a senior lecturer at the Faculty of Medicine (1973–86) which he accepted. He continued to publish research papers and more importantly, Indonesian textbooks that were badly needed. In October 1987 he was promoted to professor of neurology at the same university and this promotion to a full professorship was published in the local newspapers, including Kompas. Sidharta received a lot of congratulations and support from the medical community and his former students, including many who claimed to be his students because they had read his books and felt they had benefited from them. But it seems that he was not without enemies, however. A reader sent a letter to the editor of Kompas saying that Sidharta was not qualified to be a full professor. In fact, twenty years ago when Sidharta was the second most senior person in the department at FKUI, Professor Mahar Mardjono of FKUI had wanted to promote him to full professor, but this was blocked by a few individuals. Many believed that it was a matter of ethnic prejudice rather than scholarly merit. Because it was alleged that Sidharta was getting publicity for himself in Kompas, he was interviewed by the Indonesian Doctors' Association, but they did not find anything improper in his professional conduct.

It is ironic that although he was the one who advocated the assimilation of the Chinese into Indonesian society, some "indigenous" Indonesians were apparently not yet able to accept him as one of them. Nevertheless Sidharta did not lose his fighting spirit. Whenever young medical students/doctors of Chinese descent encountered racial discrimination and wrote to him, he always advised them to continue to work hard and fight for their place in Indonesia.

In fact, Priguna Sidharta was also a well known doctor in Jakarta. His patients consisted of ordinary persons as well as high-ranking government officers. Even those who were prejudiced against ethnic Chinese went to see him for medical advice and treatment. He was so popular that he had to work until late at night every day. Eventually he suffered a stroke.

Sidharta liked to talk about his rich experiences with his intellectual friends. Many encouraged him to write his autobiography and one of these was Arief Budiman. Sidharta eventually wrote his memoirs entitled, Seorang Dokter Dari Losarang: Sebuah Otobiografi (A physician from Losarang: an autobiography), published in Jakarta in 1993.

He also published numerous research papers and more than ten medical books, including Neurologi Dasar (Basic Neurology, Jakarta, 1967); Pengobatan Penyakit Saraf (Treatment for Neurological Illness, Jakarta, 1968); Neurologi Klinis Dasar (Basic Clinical Neurology, Jakarta, 1978); Neurologi Klinis dalam Praktek Umum (Clinical Neurology in General Practice, Jakarta, 1980); Ketegangan dan Akibatnya (Tension and Its Consequences, 1981); Kembali Hidup Dengan Cacat (Living Again with Handicaps,1981); and Encok-Remetik (Rheumatics, 1983).

Sidharta died on 3 July 2003 in Jakarta. He was survived by his wife Myra Shidarta, daughters Sylvia and Julie, and son Amir.

Siem Piet Nio

(沈泌娘, Shen Biniang, pen name: Hong Le Hoa, circa 1907–1980s)
Writer, feminist, Indonesia

Siem Piet Nio is a freelance writer, founder, and editor of Soeara Persatoean Kaoem Prampoean Tionghoa Indonesia, the first known Sino-Indonesian feminist magazine to be published in the Malay language.

She was born in 1907 in Purbolinggo, East Java, into a Peranakan family and received her education at the Sekolah Bethel, a missionary school of her native place. Soon after graduation she founded the Ping Min Niu Sze Hui (平民女子会) or Association for Women Masses. In the late 1920s she moved to Banyumas (Central Java) and began to contribute articles to various magazines such as Panorama, founded in 1927 in Batavia by the well known writer and social critic, Kwee Tek Hoay (郭德怀, 1896–1951). Another magazine to which she contributed was Liberty, launched in 1928 by the writer and journalist, Ong Ping Lok (王秉禄, 1903–1978) in East Java, first published in Jember, and then in Surabaya.

In an issue of Panorama (7 January 1928), Siem, under her pen name, Hong Le Hoa, published a short article entitled, "Persatoean jang diharap" (The Federation which we Expect), in which she presented the aims of the federation of women's associations that she wanted to create. She wrote: "Hong Le Hoa is neither a person of great ability nor someone capable of being a leader, but she is a strong and reliable supporter who will do her best to devote her energy and thoughts to her aim, and will work very hard in order to launch this federation."

Her project was well received and within a few weeks enthusiastic letters came from seven women's associations which were all based in Java, namely the Chie Mei Hui (姐妹会, Sisters' Association), which was founded in Bogor in 1922 by Kwee Yat Nio (郭悦娘, 1907–1993) for young single Peranakan (or local born) Chinese women; the Lo Chun Hui (乐春会, Spring Appreciation Association) in Sukabumi; the Chiun Nie Hui (群女会, Women's Association) in Cianjur; the Fu Nie Hui (妇女会, Women's Association) in Cilacap; the Hoedjin Siotjia Hui (夫人小姐会, Married and Unmarried Women's Association) in Kebumen; the Lie Hak Seng Hui (女学生会, Female Students' Association) in Malang, and the seventh in Sukaraja, the name of which is not known. In spite of their Chinese names, which were spelled according to the Hokkien dialect, these associations were run by Peranakan girls, some of whom were very young, such as Siem Piet Nio herself and Kwee Yat Nio, who was just fifteen years old when she founded the Ping Min Niu Sze Hui.

Soon afterwards, Siem Piet Nio, who was based in Banyumas, launched the first issue of her magazine entitled, Soeara Persatoean Kaoem Prampoean Tionghoa Indonesia ("The Voice of the Federation of Indonesian Chinese Women"), which was printed in Sukabumi with the help of the Lo Chun Hui. It was apparently the first Sino-Indonesian magazine concerned with the improvement of the social status of women. This publication seems very hard to come by, and does not appear in the catalogue of the National Library in Jakarta. The editor herself, whom I met in Sukabumi in the late 1970s, had lost her own collection during the Second World War.

Writer Kwee Tek Hoay, who held Hong Le Hoa in great esteem, wrote a review of the first issue (Panorama, II, 87, August 1928, pp. 1370–73) in which he said that while, from a technical point of view, the journal was still in infancy, its contents were nevertheless quite satisfactory. He added that the magazine had the great merit of having been voluntarily launched by members of the federation without any external help, and of being circulated free of charge, with all expenses covered by the "persatuan" (federation). Kwee did not allude to its circulation.

The magazine consisted of one and a half page, and was divided into three parts: the first dwelled on federation news, the second, with the world of women, while the third was devoted to literary works from women writers. The first page began with an introduction (permulaan kata) in which its authors explained the aim of the organ, and presented the editing and administrative staff. This was followed by a series of news concerning the federation in particular: its concrete organization, its main purpose, which was the promotion of women, and the moral obligation of the federation to help women achieve their emancipation. The second part focused on domestic life: family matters, children's education and health, domestic work, food, and cooking… The last part was devoted to literary works: a novel which would be presented in instalments, as well as two Malay traditional poems or syair. It is not known when exactly the magazine ceased to appear.

In the late 1920s Siem, under the pen name, Hong Le Hoa, published a long story entitled, "Poetri dari Salome" or (Salome's Daughter) which was published in instalments in the magazine, Panorama (II, 74–84, 12 May–21 July 1928), as well as several short stories.

Siem married Liauw Seng Toh (who died in 1970), a journalist and a member of the Shiong Tih Hui (兄弟会, "Brothers' Association") in 1930, and settled in Sukabumi where she contributed articles for Menara, the organ of the Shiong Tih Hui, an association aimed at promoting education among Peranakan Chinese. She apparently ceased to write many years ago, but was still keeping a shop in Sukabumi in 1979. She died in the 1980s in that city.

Silalahi, Harry Tjan

(Tjan Tjoen Hok, 曾春福, Zeng Chunfu, 1934–)

Former student leader, political activist, Indonesia

Harry Tjan Silalahi was a former student leader and political activist. Together with Jusuf Wanandi and others, he founded the Centre for the Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Jakarta. He also played a significant role during the transition from the Soekarno period to the New Order in 1965–66.

Born in Yogyakarta on 11 February 1934, Harry Tjan was the son of a male nurse. Except for his two years at the HCS (Dutch Chinese School), he was educated in Indonesian schools. He attended the SD (primary school), SMP (lower secondary school), and SMA (higher secondary school) in Yogyakarta. While at high school, he was a member of the Ikatan Pemuda Pelajar Indonesia (IPPI), an Indonesian student and youth organization. He was also a member of the Chung Lien Hui (Zhong Lian Hui 中联会), a Peranakan Chinese high school student association in Indonesia, and became its chairman in 1952. Under his leadership the name Chung Lien Hui was changed to Perkumpulan Peladjar Sekolah Menengah Indonesia (PPSMI, the Indonesian High School Students Organization), indicating its Indonesian orientation.

After graduating from high school, Tjan moved to Jakarta to study at the Faculty of Law, University of Indonesia (FHUI), in 1955.

For two years he worked concurrently as an administrator for the Yayasan Strada in Jakarta and in 1957 became a teacher and later principal of the Ricci School (primary and secondary school) in Jakarta Kota (Chinatown). Tjan was reportedly interested and participated in cultural activities, such as acting in school plays. When he came to Jakarta, he continued to be active in the drama circle. He played major roles in a number of plays produced by the Sin Ming Hui Jakarta (新明会), a Peranakan social organization, and the Catholic University Student Association (PMKRI): Penuntutan (Prosecution, 1956), adapted from "Witness for the Prosecution", produced by PMKRI; Mawar Hutan (Wild Rose, 1958), directed by himself and produced by the Sin Ming Hui; Taufan (Storm, based on the play by Cao Yu, 1958), directed by Steve Lim (later known as Teguh Karya) and produced by the Sin Ming Hui. One of the founding members of this organization was a leading lawyer and politician during the Soekarno era, Oey Tjoe Tat.

With the passing of time, Tjan left his drama circle and came to be involved in student politics and later national politics. During his university student years, he was elected chairman of PMKRI-Central for 1961–62 and went to the United States and Europe several times to attend student conferences, representing PPMI and PPSMI, of which he was the vice-chairman.

In 1962 (1961?), he graduated from the University of Indonesia (UI) and worked for Pan American Oil (Pekan Baru), though not for long. He returned to Jakarta and came to be associated with K. Sindhunata and his Lembaga Pembinaan Kesatuan Bangsa (LPKB) to promote the assimilation of ethnic Chinese into Indonesian society. In June 1965 Tjan joined Partai Katholik and later served as its secretary general. During the struggle between the army and the PKI, he and other Catholic leaders sided with the army in crushing the PKI. In 1965 he was elected secretary general of the Front Pantjasila, a federation of anti-communist mass and political organizations. After the 1965 G-30-S movement, he became secretary general of the Kesatuan Aksi Pengganyangan Gerakan September Tigapuluh (KAP-Gestapu), or United Action for the Elimination of the 30 September Movement.

From 1967 to 1971 Tjan was an appointed member of the DPR, and chairman of "Commission 1", in charge of Information on higher and non-departmental institutions. In 1971 he participated in the general election as a candidate for Partai Katholik, but was not elected. He then left Partai Katholik and joined the CSIS which he helped to found and served as vice-chairman on its board of directors. He became a pillar of the CSIS. It was reported that he was close to Major General Ali Moertopo and General Benny Murdani, the two major supporters of CSIS, and served as their advisers. In 1978 he was appointed a member of the DPA (Dewan Pertimbangan Agung) by President Soeharto, and in 1985, became vice-chairman of Badan Komunikasi Penghayatan Kesatuan Bangsa Pusat (Bakom PKB-Pusat, or the Appreciation of the National Unity Body at the National Level). Bakom was a new name for the defunct LPKB and the chairman of Bakom was K. Sindhunata.

In fact, the assimilation movement had started in 1960 in opposition to the integration approach of Baperki. One of the purposes of this movement was to change Chinese names to "Indonesian names". But the actual name changing would only take place after Soeharto came to power. Unlike most of the assimilationists, Tjan did not change his surname, but added an indigenous Batak clan name to his Chinese and western names.

There is an interesting story with regard to his Batak surname. Tjan had a close relationship with Albert Bolas Silalahi, chairman of the Catholic Party at the Tapanuli Utara (Sumatra) chapter. It was through Silalahi that he became a member of the Silalahi clan (a Batak ethnic group) in 1967 and Tjan had been adopted by the Silalahi family and hence took Silalahi as his surname.

Since 1966 he has served as an executive member of the Trisakti University Foundation (Jakarta). Trisakti University was the new name given to the Univeritas Res Public (Ureca) established by Baperki, a mass socio-political organization which was banned after the 1965 coup. He has also served as a member of the Advisory Board of the Management School of Prasetiya Mulya (Jakarta) and was also a member of the Advisory Council of Tarumanegara Foundation and Atma Jaya Foundation. Both are university foundations in Jakarta. In the legal field, he was active in Persahi (Persatuan Sarjana Hukum Indonesia), an Indonesian Law Graduates/Lawyers Association.

Tjan has published a number of articles and monographs, one of which being Konsensus Politik Nasional Orde Baru (Jakarta, 1990). He married twice. His first wife, Theresia Marina Gani, who died of cancer, was a graduate of UI. His second wife, Theresia Ying, was also a graduate of the same university.

Sim Kee Boon

(沈基文, Shen Jiwen, 1929–2007)

Retired senior civil servant, head of civil service, chairman of Keppel Corporation, Singapore

Sim Kee Boon was one of a select group of early senior civil servants who saw Singapore through its early years of nationhood. A man of wide-ranging experience and unusual acumen, he is best remembered as the man who created Changi Airport and turned it into one of the world's best airports, as well as for turning Keppel Corporation around.

Sim was born on 5 September 1929 in Singapore. He was educated first at the Anglo-Chinese School and then at the University of Malaya in Singapore where he graduated with an honours degree in economics in 1953. Later on, Sim obtained a departmental scholarship to study business administration at the London School of Economics. On graduation, Sim joined the prestigious administrative service and was posted to the Ministry of Commerce and Industry as an administrative officer. In 1960, Sim was appointed deputy director of the Trade Division of the Ministry of Finance, and two years later, at the young age of thirty-three, Sim was appointed acting permanent secretary of the Ministry of National Development, and then acting permanent secretary of the Ministry of Finance. In 1966, Sim was promoted to the post of permanent secretary of the Ministry of Finance where he remained till 1975. He subsequently served as permanent secretary of the Ministry of Communications (1975–84) and Finance again (1983–84). In 1979, Sim succeeded George Bogaars as head of the civil service. Though he officially retired in September 1984, he stayed on for another eighteen months as permanent secretary (special duties) in the Prime Minister's Office to ensure a smooth handover to his successor, Dr Andrew Chew.

It was when he was at the Ministry of Communications that the Singapore Government decided to build a new airport at Changi, as well as expand the existing airport at Paya Lebar. Sim was given the task of coordinating this mammoth project — the largest public works to be undertaken by the government up till then. A massive land reclamation was undertaken to ensure that the runway could accommodate the latest, most up-to-date aircraft. Sim oversaw every single aspect of the works, including the land reclamation and squatter resettlement. Work began on Changi Airport in 1975 and, by 1981, Terminal One was operational. Sim, who took on the mantle of chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority of Singapore immediately on his retirement as head of the civil service in September 1984, remained closely connected with the airport and its development till he retired in 1999. He was succeeded by Tjong Yik Ming.

Sim had no special training to manage the airport project and approached it as a layman would, asking his staff for suggestions and querying basic assumptions and practices. He advocated the practice of "management by walking around" and sought from his staff, the simplest, most effective solutions to problems at hand. Sim's hands-on approach endeared him to his staff who were often stumped by his command of and attention to detail. Sim believed in leading by example and won the respect of his staff for fostering an "airport family culture". Nothing escaped his scrutiny and Sim had inputs on every aspect of airport construction and management, including the type of trolleys used, the colour of the carpets, and the quality of the airport toilets. One of his famous admonishments to his staff was, "Don't give me 1,001 reasons why it cannot be done; just give me one reason how it can be done." By the time Sim retired, he had overseen the development of Terminals One and Two at Changi, which many travellers regard as among the very best airport terminals in the world. Sim regarded the development of Changi Airport as his "national service". Changi Airport has continuously been featured in the world's best airports lists since 1987.

After Sim retired from government service, he joined Keppel Corporation Ltd as its executive chairman. At the time of his taking over the helm at Keppel, the public listed corporation was bleeding from an ill-timed takeover of Straits Steamship Company by Keppel's subsidiary, Keppel Shipyard, in 1984. By consolidating Keppel's core business, writing off bad debts, and trimming and rationalizing its manpower requirements, Sim was able to slash Keppel's S$845-million debt. In 1986, just two years under Sim's leadership, the Keppel Group posted a modest $5.1-million profit. By the time Sim stepped down as Keppel's executive chairman in 1999, the once debt-ridden company had been transformed into one of the largest and most successful congolomerates in Singapore. For the first half of 1999, it posted S$2.1 billion in profit. He was succeeded by former cabinet minister, Lim Chee Onn.

Other important positions Sim has held include: chairman, Insurance Corporation of Singapore (1968–82); chairman, National Grain Elevator Ltd (1968–87); and chairman, Straits Steamship Land Ltd (1984–96); chairman and managing director, Intraco Ltd (1968–74); chairman, Far East Levingston Shipbuilding (1984–92); senior adviser, Keppel Corporation (2000–03); founder chairman of MobileOne

Ltd; chairman, Singapore-Suzhou Township (1993); and chairman, Changi Airport Advisory Group (2007). Sim also served on the boards of the Development Bank of Singapore (1968–81) and Temasek Holdings (Pte.) Ltd. (2000–07); and was a member of the Council of Presidential Advisors (1997–2006), of which he was chairman from 2004 to 2005.

For his public service, Sim received the Pingat Jasa Gemilang (Meritorious Service Medal) in 1963, and the Darjah Utama Bakti Chemerlang (Distinguished Service Order) in 1991. Sim was an avid golfer, and was responsible for the formation and construction of the Tanah Merah Country Club. He died on 9 November 2007 after a seventeen-year battle with cancer. He was survived by his wife, Jeanette (a former teacher), five sons, and five granddaughters. In July 2008, the Singapore Management University (SMU) announced the establishment of the Sim Kee Boon Institute of Financial Economics with a S$17-million endowment fund. Its first director is Professor Roberto S. Mariano, dean of the School of Economics at the SMU.

Sim Mow Yu

(沈慕羽, Shen Muyu, 1913–2009)
Educator, community leader, cultural figure, Malaysia

Sim Mow Yu was a central figure in the Chinese educationalist movement in Malaysia. He was born on 20 July 1913 in Malacca, the sixth child of Sim Hong Bo (沈鸿柏), who was a cultural activist and supporter of the Kuomintang revolutionary movement in China, the influence of which extended to British Malaya at the beginning of the 20th century. Sim attended the Peifeng (培风) Secondary School in Malacca and upon graduation, served in the school as a teacher, and later, a principal, until his retirement. Since his youth, Sim had demonstrated a strong political commitment to fight for ethnic Chinese rights within the established order, and was determined to protect and preserve vernacular Chinese education which was regarded as the chief transmitter of Chinese culture. His lifelong involvement in the Chinese education movement and cultural activities earned him immense respect from Chinese communities and organizations both at home and abroad.

The transformation of Sim's political orientation was representative of the generation of his time. Before and after the Second World War, different ethnic communities were fighting for its legitimate political places in the peninsula. Political orientation and attitudes of the elite and intelligentsia underwent changes, from quasi-feudalism to nationalism, from being China-oriented to being Malaya-oriented. The ethnic Chinese were divided into three camps: the Kuomintang sympathizers; the Straits Chinese, and the communists. All regarded the fight to gain citizenship as the utmost priority.

The Koumintang-leaning Sim joined the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA), which was able to reconcile the first two groups when it was founded in 1949 in a call to ethnic Chinese to apply for Malayan citizenship. In 1955 Sim helped set up the Malacca branch of the MCA Youth Wing. In 1965, the Chinese Guilds and Associations initiated a nation-wide movement to appeal for the Chinese language to be made an official language, but Sim's popularity and unpromising stand angered MCA president Tan Siew Sin (see later entry) who subsequently took the unprecedented step of sacking Sim from the party.

In 1971, the MCA, under Tan's leadership, thought the time was ripe to revive the party's legitimacy after its embarrassing electoral defeat three years previously. It organized the Chinese Unity Movement, in which Sim, due to his enormous popularity with the Chinese community, was invited by Tan to participate. In audience-packed rallies, Sim called for equality between Bumiputera and non-Bumiputera and fair treatment to vernacular Chinese education. However, Sim and another orator, Gu Xing Guang (顾兴光), were detained under the Internal Security Act (ISA) by the authorities for making seditious comments in public rallies in Ipoh. Both were later released without being charged.

In 1987, Sim was detained again after a 2,000-strong protest staged by the Dong Jiao Zong (Chinese educationists) at the Hanainese Association Building, beside the Thian Hou Temple in Kuala Lumpur. What ignited the protest was the Malaysian Education Ministry's appointments of some 100 non-Chinese (Mandarin) conversant senior assistants and principals to vernacular Chinese schools. Politicians from the major Chinese-based parties (the MCA, the DAP, and GERAKAN) also joined the protests, which, according to the authorities, evoked racially sensitive issues. Sim was among the 119 people detained under the Internal Security Act 1960, an operation which came to be known as "Operasi Lalang".

Sim was supportive yet sceptical of a group of Chinese educationists, led by Lim Fong Seng, also a fellow detainee of "Operasi Lalang", who joined the DAP and Gerakan at the wake of the 1990 elections as a means "to penetrate the Barisan Nasional, and to modify the Barisan Nasional". He commented that this act was similar to the brothers who were "forced to ascend the Liang Mountain" (逼上梁山) in the novel, Water Margin, a comment which appropriately reflected the situation at the time. In his retirement, Sim was still regarded as an authoritative voice, making critical comments on government policies which he regarded as unfair to the Chinese. In 2000, he was invited by MCA president Ling Liong Sik to rejoin the MCA. He refused by saying that he felt much "freer" by remaining a non-partisan figure. In 1987, United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia established a foundation to publish Sim's speeches, biography, diaries, writings, and calligraphies.

Sim held many positions in Chinese organizations and associations, the more important of which are: president of United Chinese Schools Association (1966–94), vice-chair of Merdeka University Berhad, chairman of Confucius Association, Malacca. He has also received many prestigious honours which include Justice of the Peace awarded by the queen of England (1956), JMN awarded by the king of Malaysia (1959), DMSM (which carried the title "Datuk") awarded by the Malacca governor (1999), and the Cultural Medallion Award by the Taiwan Government (1997).

In addition, Sim also practised traditional Chinese calligraphy which was popular and highly valued by collectors. Sim saw in the calligraphy of the martyred Tang dynasty statesman, Yan Zhenqing (颜真卿), a visual embodiment of the values of righteousness and integrity. Sim's reputed artistic style stemmed more from a political rather than purely aesthetic basis. "Correct", "serious", and "forceful" were terms habitually applied to describe his calligraphic style. He also regarded calligraphy as an effective way to enjoy healthy life and longevity.

His realistic yet firm and unyielding stance on the preservation of Chinese education was a cornerstone in the Chinese community's struggle against the discriminatory policies of the UMNO-dominated government. Sim, as president of the United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia and a leader in the Chinese education movement, contributed greatly to the subsequent continuation and advancement of Chinese education in Malaysia. His humble, sage-like personality provides the moral legitimacy that Chinese education needed so badly in times of trials and tribulations.

Unlike Lim Lian Geok (林连玉) who was more orthodox and remembered more for his uncompromising and confrontational style with the authorities, Sim was a pragmatic reformer, progressive thinker, and tactful leader. He demonstrated at the time that he understood how politics work, and that Chinese education would perish if the community kept on retreating from the onslaught of the government's pro-Bumiputera policies. He was acknowledged as a community leader and cultural figure of distinction by many prestigious organizations. On 5 February 2009, Sim died in Malacca at the age of ninety-six. He is survived by six sons and two daughters.

Sim Wong Hoo

(沈望傅, Shen Wangfu, 1954–)

Businessman, philanthropist, Singapore

Sim Wong Hoo, the founder, chairman, and CEO of Creative Technology Ltd, is a notable Singapore entrepreneur. Many young Singaporeans owning Creative Technology MP3 players will also tell you that Sim is the creator of the Sound Blaster audio card and heads the company that makes cutting edge multimedia products.

Born in 1954, Sim, who is known as something of a maverick in the Singaporean engineering circle, graduated from the Electrical & Electronic Engineering faculty of the Ngee Ann Polytechnic in Singapore. On 1 July 1981, Sim and Ng Kai Wa (his school friend) set up a shop in Pearl Centre called Creative. This marked the humble beginnings of Creative Technology. In those days, it was little more than a computer repair shop. While running this modest shop, Sim conceptualized an add-on memory board for the Apple II computer. This add-on sold very well, leading Sim to create customized personal computers (PC) adapted for the Chinese language, inclusive of enhanced audio capabilities whereby speech and melodies could be produced. This new audio interface was a resounding success and soon led to the full development of a stand-alone sound card named Sound Blaster, thereby marking Creative's first real product.

In time, the Sound Blaster came to be used as a standard forcomparison of sound cards.

With the introduction of the Sound Blaster line of audio card products, Creative and Sim Wong Hoo successfully brought a dedicated audio processing card to the general consumer. Gradually other audio processing products were developed and released in the market such as the Monaural Sound Blaster cards in 1989, and the Sound Blaster Pro stereo cards in 1992. After much trial and error and further development, the sixteen-bit Sound Blaster AWE32 and AWE64 were enhanced with wavetable MIDI as well as thirty-two and sixty-four voices respectively. By 1988, the market was once again stunned by the Creative's latest offering — the Sound Blaster Live!, the first Peripheral Component Interconnect (PCI) based sound card. As the years went by, the Sound Blaster garnered further enhancements and eventually came to provide 3D audio and home theatre quality sound directly from a PC.

By the late 1990s, Creative had come to dominate the PC audio market. Its meteoric rise, however, was momentarily dimmed when it became embroiled in a series of lawsuits with Aureal Semiconductor in 1998, whereby Aureal alleged that Creative had infringed on its various technology patents, such as the PCI audio and the 2D/3D positional sound APIs. Not to be outdone, Creative responded by countering with a series of lawsuits whereby it alleged, among other claims, that Aureal used false advertising. For a while, it looked as though the ensuing legal tussle would rend the Singaporean technological world asunder. Fortunately, the numerous lawsuits were resolved when Creative acquired Aureal's assets in September 2000 for US$32 million.

Despite Creative's many innovations in the realm of PC sound cards, the company and Sim failed to make an impression in the CD-ROM market. Its developments and marketing strategy to that effect failed to take off, resulting in a desperate attempt by Creative to cut its losses. It did so by writing off nearly US$100 million in inventory when the market collapsed due to a glut of cheaper alternatives.

Creative managed to bounce back into the game, so to speak, when it developed a portable audio player in the late 1990s. In 2000, it launched the Creative NOMAD Jukebox, and was the foremost choice for youngsters who wanted to store and listen to their music in MP3 and wav formats while on the go. Indeed, Creative was so successful with its MP3 player line that it remained a serious competitor in the portable audio player market until the entry of Apple's iPod. In true Sim Wong Hoo style, Creative took the introduction of the iPod in its stride and conceptualized a new line of portable music players known as the ZEN MP3 player. The new technology developed led Creative to apply for U.S. Patent 6,928,433 on 5 January 2001, and it was awarded the patent on 9 August 2005. As it turned out, the ZEN patent was awarded to Creative for the invention of a user interface for portable media players. This patent opened the way for potential legal action against Apple's iPod and the other competing players as evinced in May 2006 when Creative took legal action against Apple. However, the issue was resolved amicably between Creative and Apple when both companies entered into a broad settlement whereby Apple would pay Creative $100 million for the licence to use the Zen patent. On its part, Creative was to join the "Made for iPod" programme. In so doing, the company was afforded new opportunities. It also became the first Singaporean company to be listed on the NASDAQ.

Like most mavericks and those of an innovative turn of mind, Sim was highly critical of the drone mentality of the people he saw in Singaporean society, asserting that Singaporeans tended to have a compliance mindset whereby their thoughts and actions had to be approved by higher authorities. In saying so, he must clearly recall the discrimination he faced in the Singapore job market where employers generally favoured university graduates rather than polytechnic graduates. Sim dubbed this, the No-U Turn Syndrome (NUTS). He made this statement about the No-U Turn Syndrome in his book, Chaotic Thoughts from the Old Millennium, in response to the reams of red tape he had encountered with government bureaucrats. Since he was developing technology that he liked on his own free will, without official sanction, some of the bureaucrats were none too pleased about this. Sim spoke out against such a mindset, claiming that it stifled creativity in Singaporeans — the same creativity that the government has been trying to promote in the recent years. Indeed, the No-U Turn Syndrome was also a thinly veiled criticism of the rigid Singapore education system in which students are taught from a young age to obey instructions in an unquestioning manner, in a society where grades and paper certification are emphasized at the expense of some life skills.

His successes in Creative Technology made Sim the youngest millionaire in Singapore at the age of forty-five. His contributions to the technological and business world culminated in his being the first person to be named the Businessman of the Year twice, in 1992 and 1997. In 2002, the Singapore Computer Society recognized his contribution to the IT industry by declaring him Person of the Year. Indeed, Sim continues to be widely acknowledged as Singapore's star entrepreneur. It is believed that he will bring Singapore to new technological heights during his current tenure as chair of the Technopreneurship 21 Private Sector Committee.

Sima Gong

(司马攻, 1933–)

Thai-Chinese writer, Thailand

Sima Gong is a prominent Chinese writer in Thailand. His works come in many different genres, including prose and poetry, novellas, and literary analyses, all of which are well received by his readers. He joined the Thai Chinese Writers' Association (泰华写作人协会) in 1987 and became its vice-chairperson in 1988. He then served as chairperson of the association for more than two decades before retiring and becoming the honorary chairperson in 2010. He is celebrated for his support and generosity towards Chinese literary activities in Thailand. Using profits from his business, he donated generously to support Chinese literary activities and writers both within and outside Thailand.

Sima Gong's real name is Ma Junchu (马君楚). Of his pseudonyms, Sima Gong is the most well known. Others include Jiancao (剑曹) and Tianyin (田茵), which he uses when writing poetry. He was born in 1933 in Thailand, but received his primary and secondary education in China. After graduation, he returned to Thailand to help out in his family business at the age of twenty-one. In 1966 he started writing and published his works mainly in the literary column of the Tong Hua Daily News. He travelled to many places both in Thailand and around the world, and wrote many pieces of prose describing his journeys. His travel diaries became very popular because Sima Gong was adept in describing the beauty of the places he visited. He became a famous writer in the 1970s, having published widely both in Thailand and Hong Kong. His works during this period consisted mainly of prose and poetry.

Later, as he became busier with his business, he stopped writing for ten years. In 1985 he resumed writing and published his works in the literary columns of various Chinese newspapers. After a talk with a Singaporean writer, Huang Mengwen, in 1989, he was inspired to promote a new genre, the novella, in Thailand's Chinese literary circles. Two months after that meeting, Sima Gong published his first novella in the literary column of the New Chinese Daily. From July to December 1990, he published more than thirty novellas. Since then, an increasing number of Thai Chinese writers have written novellas, and this has become an established genre of literature in Chinese literary circles.

Although Sima Gong's works generally receive compliments regardless of their genre, his pieces of prose are usually considered to be his best work. They are highly praised for their lyrical elements. Many of them express his love for his hometown, Chaoyang County in Guangdong Province, and his admiration for the beauty of Mother Nature. Sima Gong is especially good at using metaphors and similes to demonstrate his feelings and thoughts explicitly. His prose also demonstrates his unique perspective on the world, which is the strength of many of his works.

One of his more famous prose collections is The Collection of Cold and Warmth (《冷热集》), which was published under the name Jiancao. This collection was first printed in 1988 by the New Chinese Daily as part of its celebrations for the fiftieth anniversary of the Zhong Yuan Bao, and its own fifteenth anniversary. It is a collection of 100 short pieces of prose, selected from those he had written for "Articles of Cold and Warmth" (冷热篇), a literary column in the New Chinese Daily. Each of the pieces selected is a playful satire which touches on different aspects of life. They are a display of Sima Gong's unique perspective on life, his humour, as well as his knowledge and proficiency in the Chinese language.

Sima Gong is also celebrated for his novellas. He is one of the first few Thai-Chinese authors to write novellas and employs an array of literary techniques in doing so. Each of them is not necessarily of the same form and structure because Sima Gong plans his novellas according to their content. Actors (演员) is his first collection of novellas. Each novella in Actors is a scene from everyday life. Sima Gong has written them in such a way that each novella is of a different structure and form, and with a different emphasis. By putting the novellas together, the reader is able to gain a better insight into Thai society.

In the postscript of his novellas collection published in 2008, Sima Gong said that he loves both non-fiction prose and the novellas for different reasons. He loves non-fiction prose for its "truthfulness" and "sincerity". His non-fiction prose is the outward expression of his feelings and thoughts. Thus, all recorded events and characters are real. On the other hand, he also loves his novellas, which are fictitious. Even when he has obtained his inspiration from real life, the final product would not be a truthful representation of the original event.

Aside from being a writer, Sima Gong contributes to Thai-Chinese literary circles in many other ways. He is active in many Chinese literary activities. For instance, he was invited to be judge of many writing competitions such as the Thai-Chinese Golden Pen competition (泰华金笔奖文艺比赛), organized by the New Chinese Daily and Joint Chinese Association (八属会馆) in 1974, and the writing competition organized by the Huachiaw Chalermphrakiat University in 1993 and 1995. He has attended many literary seminars and conferences in China. As chairperson of the Association of Chinese Writers in Thailand, he organized a seminar on novella writing in 1996, a Chinese art camp, and a delegation to China in 1998. Aside from participating in literary activities, Sima Gong is also well known for donating large sums towards literary activities and groups.

Although Sima Gong has stepped down from his position as chairperson of the Association of Chinese Writers in Thailand, he is still deeply involved in Thai-Chinese literary circles. He is currently the chief editor of the Thai-Chinese Literature (《泰华文学》), a literary journal in Thailand.

Sin, Jaime Lachica

(1928–2005)

Religious leader, Philippines

Jaime Lachica Sin (辛), the thirtieth Roman Catholic archbishop of Manila, is best known for his role in Philippine political affairs. He was acclaimed in the Philippines and all over the world for his moral leadership and defence of freedom, justice, and peace.

In the hastily called presidential elections of 1986, when the government's defence chief and a general in the armed forces broke away from the administration of President Ferdinand Marcos, Cardinal Sin called for the citizenry to go out into the streets and peacefully defend the revolutionaries. Millions heeded the call that capped a long struggle to oust Marcos. The event came to be known as the "People Power" or "EDSA" revolution. The latter is the name of the highway where people gathered to demand the restoration of democracy. President Corazon Aquino was sworn in as the country's first female president.

In 2001, the cardinal led another peaceful revolt, "EDSA II", which led to the resignation of former President Joseph Estrada, who was accused of corruption and misrule.

Throughout his twenty-nine years as archbishop of Manila, Sin fully immersed himself in the affairs of the state — providing a moral compass and becoming the moral conscience of politicians and public servants.

He received numerous awards from the Philippine Government and other foreign governments, religious and lay organizations, and private groups. He was given more than thirty honorary doctorate degrees and awards by universities and colleges in the Philippines and abroad. A few months before his death, he became the first Filipino to be given the Golden Palm of Jerusalem, the highest service award of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem.

During his term as archbishop of Manila, he ordained 237 diocesan priests and 460 religious priests. He erected 171 parishes in addition to the 101 that were present when he assumed the role of archbishop.

After the celebration of the Great Jubilee of the Year 2000, Sin recommended to Pope John Paul II the division of the archdiocese of Manila into several smaller dioceses for more effective pastoral management and ministry. This resulted in the erection of five new dioceses in 2004 — the dioceses of Parañaque, Novaliches, Cubao, Pasig, and Kalookan. He presided over ceremonies for the establishment of these dioceses and the installation of their respective bishops.

This move was a testament to the magnanimity of Cardinal Sin. The archdiocese of Manila used to encompass the whole of Metropolitan Manila and beyond, and there was only one leader, the cardinal archbishop of Manila. But with the growth of the population, the archdiocese became too big and unwieldy. Cardinal Sin recognized this and voluntarily asked for power to be devolved from one bishop (himself) to several bishops.

Born on 31 August 1928 in New Washington, Aklan, a small coastal town on an island in central Philippines, Sin was the seventh of nine children of Juan Sin — a Chinese businessman who had migrated to the Philippines from Fujian, China — and Maxima Reyes Lachica.

After an early education at the New Washington Elementary School in his hometown, he entered the St Vincent Ferrer Archdiocesan Seminary in Jaro, Iloilo, in June 1941. When his studies were interrupted by the outbreak of the Second World War and the subsequent occupation of the Philippines by Japanese forces, he spent much of this period serving in the local parish church as an altar boy of the priests, and caring for old clergy residing in the church compound.

His mother died on 8 June 1945, just before the war ended and before he returned to the seminary to resume studies for priesthood, more determined than ever to fulfil his childhood dream of a consecrated life of service. Sickly and afflicted with asthma throughout his childhood and seminary days, he put his fate in the hands of the Virgin Mary, mother of Jesus Christ, to whom he had always been intensely devoted. On 7 October 1953, the feast day of Our Lady of the Most Holy Rosary, one of the Virgin Mary's many titles, he wrote a letter to her, asking for healing from his congenital illness as a sign that he should pursue his vocation to priesthood.

He was ordained to priesthood on 3 April 1954 at the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception in Roxas City, Capiz, and never suffered from asthma since.

For three years (1954–57) he was a missionary-priest of the diocese of Capiz, evangelizing the remote parishes of the province while raising funds for the construction of the St Pius X Seminary in Roxas City. The seminary was completed and he became its first rector in 1957, serving for the next ten years until his appointment as bishop.

On 10 February 1967, he was appointed auxiliary bishop of the archdiocese of Jaro, based in Iloilo City, and was ordained as a bishop on 18 March 1967. He rose through the ranks, eventually becoming archbishop in October 1972.

Just over a year later, Pope Paul VI appointed him the thirtieth archbishop of Manila. He was installed in this new post on 19 March 1974 at the Manila Cathedral and he chose the motto, "Serviam" (I will serve).

Two years later, on 26 May 1976, he was elevated to the rank of cardinal by Pope Paul VI. He was the third Filipino to be appointed cardinal by the pope.

As a cardinal, he was present at five world meetings of bishops, known as synods, in Rome (1977, 1978, 1980, 1983, 1987), at the Second Extraordinary Assembly of Bishops (1985), and the Special Assembly of Bishops for Asia (1998). He participated in two conclaves — on 25–26 August 1978 to elect Pope John Paul I; and on 14–16 October 1978, to elect Pope John Paul II. The pope is the head of the worldwide Catholic Church and is elected by a majority of cardinals, of whom there are fewer than three hundred in the world.

Over the years, Cardinal Sin served in various Vatican congregations or commissions in Rome. In the Philippines, he served two terms as president of the Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines (1977–81). He led the Philippine Church in ceremonies for the two pastoral visits of Pope John Paul II — in February 1981, for the beatification of St Lorenzo Ruiz, the first Filipino saint, and in 1995, for the 10th World Youth Day in Manila, which saw the participation of more than four million people, the largest Christian gathering ever in history.

In 1987 Cardinal Sin established the Lorenzo Mission Institute, a seminary for the formation of priests, with a special focus on the evangelization of the Chinese, both in the Philippines and elsewhere. The founding of the institute followed the cardinal's historic visit to the church in China in 1985, at a time when the Chinese Catholic Church was not permitted to interact with catholic churches in the rest of the world.

Cardinal Sin's commitment to the training of future priests came to the fore again when he founded the Holy Apostles Senior Seminary, designed especially to welcome late vocations. This allowed older men to train for priesthood and was the cardinal's way of responding to the shortage of priests.

Some say that Cardinal Sin was too involved in politics, but for Southeast Asia and the world, he is an exemplar of religious faith that is non-violently engaged for social change.

On 21 November 2003, he retired from active ministry as the archbishop of Manila. He was seventy-five by then. Sin died on 21 June 2005 at the Cardinal Santos Medical Center in San Juan, Metro Manila.

Sindhunatha, Kristoforus

(Ong Tjong Hai, 王宗海, Wang Zonghai, 1933–2005)

Assimilationist leader, lawyer, naval officer, business consultant, politician, Indonesia

Kristoforus Sindhunatha was a lawyer by training who rose to the rank of major in the Indonesian Navy, but he is best known as the leader of the assimilationist movement among the ethnic Chinese. An ardent Indonesian patriot, he believed that Chinese Indonesians would only become fully accepted by abandoning their Chineseness and assimilating into the wider Indonesian society. The ideas of his group had an important influence on the formulation of government policy in the early years of President Soeharto's New Order, but were subjected to considerable criticism after Soeharto's fall in 1998.

Kristoforus Sindhunatha was born in Jakarta on 20 March 1933, the second of three sons of Dr Ong Hok Lan. His original name was Ong Tjong Hai. His father was trained as a doctor at the NIAS (Nederlandsch Indische Artsen School — Netherlands Indies Medical College) in Surabaya and pursued further studies in the Netherlands before Sindhunatha's birth. He died young, when Sindhunatha was only four years old.

Sindhunatha himself was raised in a Dutch-speaking household and was a member of the last generation to be educated at one of the prestigious HBS (Hoogere Burger School) Dutch secondary schools in Indonesia. He nevertheless grew up a committed Indonesian patriot. A student of the Law Faculty at the University of Indonesia, he graduated in 1961. As a student he was active in the Catholic student organization, PMKRI (Perhimpunan Mahasiswa Katolik Indonesia) and was its deputy chairman (1957–59). This brought him into contact with leaders of other student and youth organizations. After graduation he joined the legal division of the Indonesian Navy, thus becoming an officer in the armed forces. This was unusual for an ethnic Chinese.

By this time an assimilationist movement had started to develop among Chinese Indonesians. Although he was not a signatory to the earliest public statements of the movement, such as the Assimilation Charter at Bandungan (Ambarawa) on 15 January 1961, Sindhunatha was in complete sympathy with their views and soon emerged as their leader. When a Bureau for the Promotion of Nation Building (UPBA — Urusan Pembinaan Kesatuan Bangsa) was set up under army auspices using martial law powers in June 1962, he was named the chairman of its executive body. Soon after this, he abandoned his Chinese name, becoming one of the first ethnic Chinese to make use of the name-changing law of 1961. He then became head of UPBA's successor, the Institute of Promoters of National Unity (Lembaga Pembina Kesatuan Bangsa) formed in early 1963, and remained head of the government's Institute for the Promotion of National Unity (LPKB — Lembaga Pembinaan Kesatuan Bangsa) that replaced it in July 1963, until its dissolution in November 1967.

From the outset the LPKB was engaged in a political struggle on two fronts with the large organization, Baperki (Badan Permusjawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia — Consultative Body for Indonesian Citizenship). On the one hand, Baperki opposed racial discrimination and urged the integration of ethnic Chinese as Indonesian citizens, whereas the LPKB campaigned for Indonesian citizens of Chinese descent to assimilate into the Indonesian population by replacing their Chinese names with Indonesian-sounding ones, marrying indigenous Indonesians, and abandoning associations with exclusively Chinese membership. On the other hand, in the highly polarized political environment of President Soekarno's Guided Democracy, Baperki's leadership had aligned the organization with the "progressive revolutionary forces" of the left (which included the Indonesian Communist Party — PKI) whereas the LPKB was aligned with the anti-communist camp (which included the Indonesian army). Both proclaimed themselves in full support of the president and vied for his endorsement of their respective platforms. Baperki was much more successful in this endeavour, and the LPKB was on the defensive until the political landscape changed dramatically in October 1965.

When six leading army generals were kidnapped and murdered on 1 October 1965, members and sympathizers of the PKI (including Baperki members) were blamed for it. At the time Sindhunatha was in France, but on his return, the LPKB, under his leadership, seized their opportunity. After the buildings of Baperki's Res Publica University (URECA) were gutted by fire by anti-communist mobs on 15 October, Sindhunatha and other LPKB activists were active in replacing it with a new Trisakti University, and rebuilding the campus with financial aid from the Netherlands. He remained actively engaged with the university for the rest of his life, serving successively as deputy chairman and chairman of the Trisakti Foundation for more than thirty years.

The LPKB, with army backing, played a leading role in pressuring Baperki members to dissolve their branches in late 1965, and became an important contributor to the development of government policy on what was called "the Chinese problem". After the LPKB itself was dissolved in November 1967 (and its functions transferred to the Department of Home Affairs), Sindhunatha claimed a number of policy successes for the LPKB under his leadership. These included a ban on the Chinese language press, the appeal by the government for Indonesian citizens of Chinese descent to change their names, the abolition of the colonial laws requiring Indonesian residents to be classified on the basis of their descent in civil registry offices, and the adoption of a firm line of division between citizens and foreigners. The Soeharto government adopted assimilation as its policy and the rival concept of integration was stigmatized through its association with Baperki for the three decades of the New Order.

Sindhunatha resigned from the navy's legal division in 1971 with the rank of major after ten years of service and became active in PT Indulexo, a consultancy firm. Within a few years he returned to an active role in assimilationist politics. Rioting in Jakarta in January 1974 and a growing consciousness of the widening gap between the rich and the poor led him and kindred spirits to form a new Organization for the Creation of National Unity (BPKB) under the authority of the Jakarta governor. In July 1977 the Department of Home Affairs sponsored a conference of ethnic Chinese and officials which led to the establishment of a new national body, BAKOM-PKB (Badan Komunikasi Penghayatan Kesatuan Bangsa) of which Sindhunatha was to be general chairman up to 1995.

When his old comrade-in-arms in the assimilation movement, Junus Jahja (formerly Lauw Chuan Tho), converted to Islam from Protestant Christianity in 1979, Sindhunatha welcomed it as an act of personal conviction, but he himself remained a staunch Catholic. Unlike Junus Jahja, who became a proselytizer for conversion to Islam as the final stage of assimilation, he did not urge religious conversion upon his fellow ethnic Chinese, and stressed the plurality of religion in an Indonesian state founded on the principles of the Pancasila.

When President Soeharto resigned in May 1998 after mass violence against ethnic Chinese in Jakarta, Solo, and elsewhere, the political environment changed dramatically. In a new era of reform, restrictions on freedom of expression were lifted and Indonesia embarked on democratization. New political parties were formed to participate in the first genuinely free elections since 1955. True to his assimilationist principles, Sindhunatha joined with Amien Rais in founding the mainstream National Mandate Party (PAN) in 1998, but was one of a group of disappointed members who resigned from it in January 2001.

In the more open post-Soeharto era, assimilationists such as Sindhunatha found themselves criticized publicly for their role in formulating the New Order government policies towards the Chinese. Ethnic Chinese who resented the suppression of the expression of Chinese culture were prominent among the critics. Sindhunatha did not resile from the views he had championed, but was now prepared to concede openly that the Soeharto government, by continuing to discriminate against the ethnic Chinese in various ways, had not been consistent in its adoption of his assimilation agenda.

Sindhunatha was a hard-working, unpretentious, straightforward, and patient leader who was willing to listen to others. Consistent in his beliefs, he led by example. The Indonesian Government recognized his dedication by awarding him the Bintang Mahaputra Pratama. In 1983 the French Government awarded him the honour of the Chevalier de l'Ordre National du Mérite for his contribution to relations between France and Indonesia as deputy chairman of the Indonesia-France Association.

Sindhunatha died in Jakarta on 16 August 2005 of lung cancer and complications from other diseases. After a requiem mass led by the Jakarta Catholic archbishop, he was buried with naval military honours at the Kalibata Heroes' Cemetery. He is survived by his wife, Hudiani Sutikna (Kiem Hoey), and their three children.

Siong Khye

(常凯, Changkai, 1916–90)

Buddhist leader, physician, educator, Singapore

Venerable Siong Khye (常凯法师) was a Buddhist leader who contributed in different areas, from promoting Buddhism, to medical therapy and education. He was key in proposing Buddhist studies to be included as an 'O' Level subject, and was the first Buddhist monk in Singapore to have received the Public Service Star (BBM).

Ven. Siong Khye was born on 19 November 1916 of the lunar calendar, which would be 13 December in the solar system. His mother passed away two years later and he was raised by his aunt thereafter. His education commenced with the studies of Confucian texts when he was six, and he moved to Nanyue Temple (南岳寺) in Jingjiang (晋江) with his father three years later, where he learnt martial arts and medicine from Ven. Master Yuanzhen (元镇和尚). In 1927, he was ordained by Ven. Yuanzhen, and followed him to Taiheng Temple (泰亨寺) in Shishi (石狮), where he furthered his studies in Buddhism and training in martial arts. In 1931, he received full precepts order from Ven. Zhuandao (转道和尚) of Dakaiyuan Temple (大开元寺) in Quanzhou (泉州). After the demise of his father the following year, Ven. Siong Khye went to several places for his Buddhist studies over a period of five years, including the Wanshi Buddhist Research Centre (万石佛学研究社), studying under Ven. Huiquan (会泉大师); at the Bao'en Buddhist College (报恩佛学院) of the Qita Temple (七塔寺) in Ningbo (宁波); and the Buddhist College of Yuantong Temple (圆通寺佛学研究社) in Shanghai.

Following the outbreak of the Japanese War in 1937, Ven. Siong Khye joined the Sangha Rescue Team (僧侣救护队) in Shanghai to provide medical aid to the soldiers. He returned to Fujian the following year and served in Chongfu Temple (崇福祖庭) and Chengtian Temple (承天寺). In 1944, he was entrusted with taking charge of Chongfu Temple after the demise of Grand Master Ven. Miaoyue (妙月和尚). 1946 was the year his leadership was recognized officially, as he was being elected director of general affairs of Jinjiang Branch, Buddhist Association (晋江佛教支会), and also permanent committee member of the Fujian Buddhist Association (福建省佛教分会). He also established the Minnan Buddhist Fellowship (闽南佛教联谊会) that year.

Ven. Siong Khye's service to Southeast Asia started in 1947 when he arrived at Meow Siang Lodge (妙香林) in Penang to assist in its management. Two years later, he went to Singapore, giving medical consultations at Putuo Temple (普陀寺). The same year he was elected head of charity of the Singapore Chinese Physician Association. He contributed outside Malaysia and Singapore as well, examples being accepting invitations to give Dharma talks in the Philippines in 1953, and conducting the triple-grand-precept conferment rites (三坛净戒) there in 1984.

In 1954, he founded the Katho Temple (伽陀精舍) in Singapore. It was set up with a clinic in Lorong 31, Geylang. This was where he conducted Chinese pugilistic and physician osteopathy courses, and after rebuilding it in 1969, the Nanyang Buddhist journal was founded there the same year, with Ven. Seck Hong Choon (宏船法师) as president and himself as publisher. This Buddhist journal has existed for the longest period in Singapore and is still in print today.

Ven. Siong Khye was well versed in the art of healing, specializing in orthopedics and osteopathy. He was very recognized in this area and held various appointments in different organizations, such as being a committee member and lecturer of the Chinese Physician Medical School, honorary adviser of the Singapore Chinese Physician Association, and dean of the Medicinal Research Centre. Apart from research, teaching, and consultation, Ven. Siong Khye contributed to social charity and welfare in the medical field as well. In 1951, he and committee members of the Singapore Chinese Physician Association established the Chinese Free Clinic, later known as the Chinese Physician Free Clinic, where he volunteered as a physician on top of being a member of its management team. In 1972, he set up the first branch of the Singapore Buddhist Free Clinic, and in 1979 the second. Together with Ven. Seck Hong Choon, Ven. Siong Khye formed the Drugs Rehabilitation Counselling Service within the Singapore Buddhist Federation.

Ven. Siong Khye contributed to education as well, believing it was necessary to promote the modernization of Buddhism and education. In 1981, the first and only Buddhist secondary school, Manjusri Secondary School (文殊中学), was completed. It was officially opened in 1982 and Ven. Siong Khye was a member of the school building committee as well as supervisor. One of his important initiatives to promote Buddhist studies was to represent the Buddhist Federation in proposing to the Ministry of Education the introduction of Buddhist Studies as an 'O' Level examination subject. On its approval, he worked closely with the ministry in the curriculum design and teacher training. He also proposed setting up the Singapore Buddhist Teachers Association and was invited to be the adviser on its establishment.

Ven. Siong Khye was indeed an important Buddhist leader. In addition to the various appoints mentioned above, he was also elected deputy director of the Missionary Department; secretary general, vice-chairman, and Chairman of the Singapore Buddhist Federation on separate occasions. He also co-founded the Singapore Buddhist Sangha Organisation with Ven. Fale (法乐法师) and served as its honorary secretary. In 1966, Ven. Seck Hong Choon invited him to organize the triple-grand-precept conferment rites and the Great Compassion Dharma Meeting in water and land (水陆法会), which was the first on such a scale out of China. These ceremonies were to commemorate Ven. Seck Hong Choon's master, Ven. Zhuandao, and to nurture potential Buddhists. In 1987, Ven. Siong Khye led a pilgrimage to China, visiting famous Buddhist mountains and temples, including Mount Putuo (普陀山) and Mount Jiuhua (九华山); and also led a team to Taipei in 1989 to take part in the 5th Meeting of the World Sangha Council, where he was elected vice-president for Singapore. In 1988, he organized the Laity Precepts Conferment Ceremony for lay Buddhists, taking up the role of chief instructor monk, and was honourably graced by then Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew. As a leader, Ven. Siong Khye even tried to unite Buddhists from different school of thoughts by initiating the Vesak joint-celebration in 1966.

In recognition of his contributions, Ven. Siong Khye was conferred the Public Service Star (BBM) by the president of Singapore on National Day in 1985, and was the first Buddhist monk to receive this honour. He was also awarded the Medal for Services to Education in 1990 by the minister for education, Dr Tony Tan Keng Yam. However, Ven. Siong Khye felt that he was merely fulfilling his duties as a Buddhist and should not claim any credit for himself, humbly sharing all accolades with all his fellow Buddhists and the public. He advocated that the value of life be measured by the depth and performance of one's service to others.

Among Ven. Siong Khye's works, which were mainly on Buddhism and medicine, were a compilation of the works of the late Ven. Huiquan, and also an account of the triple-grand-precept conferment rites in Singapore mentioned above, titled The Gems of Precepts (《戒月心珠》). He was very serious in his medical research, having participated in the World Chinese Medical International Conference 1987 in Shanghai, written papers, and authored a book on osteopathy (《正骨心要》). He also documented his last pilgrimage (《名山纪游》).

Ven. Siong Khye died on 7 September 1990 at Katho Temple, and was cremated on 13 September 1990.

Soe Hok Gie

(史福义, Shi Fuyi, 1942–69)

Social and political activist, public intellectual, Indonesia

Writing about the late Soe Hok Gie is like writing about a person with multi-personalities and talents. He was an intellectual, outspoken social critic, humanist, student leader and activist, prolific writer, historian, and lecturer of history at the University of Indonesia. As an angry young man who was impatient with all the ills he saw in Indonesian politics and society, he was one of the earliest persons who reminded Indonesians with his writings about the danger of environmental degradation and destruction. He was also a mountain climber and a nature lover.Among his friends he was known as Hok Gie.

Soe was born in Jakarta on 26 December 1942 into a Peranakan intellectual family. His father, Soe Lie Piet, who later changed his name to Salam Sutrawan, was a novelist and a journalist. His elder brother, Arief Budiman, has a Ph.D. in Sociology from Harvard University, and is an accomplished writer and a social critic. The difference between the two brothers is like between fire and water. Arief's writings are usually "cool" and thoughtful, while Soe's writings are to the point, harsh, and most of the time, kurang ajar (impolite) by Indonesian standards.

Soe received his early education in Catholic schools, including Kanisius College, the famous and elitist senior Catholic high school in Jakarta. Although members of the family considered themselves Catholics or Christians, Soe once clarified that the family seldom attended church activities as a result of an incident. One day when arriving early for a mass, the family was not allowed to sit in the front row because the seats were reserved for the rich who had contributed much money to the church. He also wrote that he once offended his high school history teacher when he criticized the latter who he believed had given some historical fact the wrong explanation. He was a keen reader particularly of books on history and politics.

Soe's productive writings and activities were during his student days in 1962–69 at the Faculty of Letters (Fakuktas Sastra), the present-day Fakultas Ilmu Pengetahuan Budaya (Faculty of Humanities), University of Indonesia, in Jakarta. During his early days as a student, he joined the Gerakan Mahasiswa Sosialis (Socialist Student Movement) which was clandestinely active in opposing the Soekarno dictatorship. But he later left the organization because he felt Indonesian socialists were "bourgeois" and elitist.

However he still maintained a good relationship with famous, socialist leaning personalities such as the late Sumitro Djojohadikusumo who became minister of finance during the early years of Soeharto's New Order government, and the late Sudjatmoko, who was once Indonesian ambassador to Washington. He was also on good terms with army officers who were against Soekarno's left-leaning domestic and foreign policies in the early 1960s. Soe was indeed a fierce anti-communist figure.

He participated actively in student demonstrations against Soekarno's Old Order government after the failure of the September 1965 Movement and was one of the thinkers of Kesatuan Mahasiswa Indonesia (Indonesian Student Unity), the student organization that became the main force behind the mass movement of young Indonesians in toppling Soekarno. However he was disappointed with those student leaders who started out being anti-establishment, but later joined the government as ministers or Members of Parliament after the establishment of the New Order government.

Soe also criticized the military and the New Order government for their treatment of people who were accused of being communists and involved in the 30 September 1965 Movement. Although he was strongly anti-communist, many of his writings protested against the mass killings of those considered members of Partai Komunis Indonesia (PKI — Indonesian Communist Party) in Central and East Java, and Bali.

The killings were executed by mass organizations affiliated with anti-communist parties, with the strong backing of the military. He also protested against the treatment of people accused of being communists or members of the then banned PKI who were imprisoned or interned on Buru Island in the far eastern side of Indonesia without trial or being put through any legal process. His writings appeared in various major Indonesian newspapers such as Kompas, Sinar Harapan, Mahasiswa Indonesia, Harian Kami, among others.

His sympathy for those who were oppressed or defeated in their political struggles is reflected in his Sarjana (comparable to today's BA) thesis, "Simpang Kiri Sebuah Jalan" (Left Side of a Road), which tells the story of those who organized the communist rebellion in 1948, popularly known as the "Madiun Affairs", and how they were suppressed. His thesis was rated "fully satisfactory" and he obtained his degree on 12 December 1969, shortly before he died.

He also attacked the rampant corruption within the Soeharto government. At the time when all powers were held by the Indonesian military, he openly criticized the corruption within the state oil company, Pertamina, led by the late Ret. General Ibnu Sutowo. At a time when the ethnic Chinese were being sidelined in most of the political activities in Indonesia, Soe did not seem to be held back by worries about his ethnic background. A writer wrote that because of Soe's boldness and directness in presenting his criticisms, he was more Indonesian than the Indonesians. When he was once reminded by his friends about his own safety, he responded without hesitation that he was not afraid of being killed as a result of his criticism, but of being turned into a disabled person because he would then be a burden to his family and friends.

From 8 October 1968 to 3 January 1969, Soe, together with a group of student leaders from Asia and Australia, had the opportunity to visit America and Australia for seventy days, at the invitation of the U.S. Department of State. He wrote many articles on the visit from various angles.

He was actively involved in the creation of Lembaga Pembinaan Kesatuan Bangsa (LPKB — Institute for the Promotion of National Unity), an organization created by Indonesian ethnic Chinese leaders (Drs Junus Jahja and K. Sindhunata among others) who believed that the full integration of ethnic Chinese into mainstream Indonesian society was through assimilation. This move was taken as a reaction to the integration, but non-assimilation idea of Baperki a mass organization of Chinese Indonesians led by Siauw Giok Tjhan. But Soe left LPKB believing that it had become "too bureaucratic" and a government agent in integrating the ethnic Chinese. As a member of LPKB, he was active in the establishment of the organization's newsletter, Bara Eka, and was its editor in 1964–65.

He became chairman of the student senate of the Faculty of Letters of the university for the period 1967–68 and during his chairmanship, put emphasis on the well-being of the students of the faculty. With others, he established the Kino Club by cooperating with various foreign embassies and cultural centres to show good quality films for the students.

To arouse student interest in reading, he organized a book club which held monthly book discussions. He gave administrative support to poor students who were unable to pay their tuition fees, with recommendations for them to be given free tuition or payment relief. He also established a forum for students who felt they were being treated unjustly by their dosen (lecturers) to voice their dissatisfaction. The programme worked well with the cooperation of the late Professor Harsya Bachtiar who was then dean of the faculty.

His final act before he died was sending make-up accessories to former colleagues who had become Members of Parliament during the heyday of student demonstrations. He sent the accessories with the following note: wear this to make yourself to look beautiful" in front of the authorities. This became the stuff for public ridicule and, of course, aroused the resentment of those who received the accessories.

Soe's hobby was mountain climbing. With his friends, he established a mountain climbers' organization named Mahasiswa Pecinta Alam Prajna Paramita (Prajna Paramita Nature Lover Students). He wrote several articles on the forest destruction (caused by humans) and its consequences. Ironically he died of gas poisoning while climbing Mount Semeru in East Java on 16 December 1969, just ten days before his twenty-seventh birthday.

Several of his writings have been published. Among these are: Kisah Penumpasan RMS (The story of the quelling of Republic of South Maluku, Jakarta, 1965); Demonstrasi Mahasiswa Djanuari 1966 (Student Demonstration of January 1966, Jakarta, 1966); a book titled Di bawah Lentera Merah — Riwayat Sarekat Islam Semarang 1917–20 (Under the Red Lantern: The Islamic Union of Semarang between 1917–20, Jakarta, 1991) which was originally his Sarjana Muda thesis. However the New Order government banned the book as soon as it was published arguing that it "could spread communism and socialism which was against the Pancasila as a state ideology". His selected articles were also published under the title, Zaman Peralihan (Era of Transition, Jakarta, 1999). To commemorate the fortieth anniversary of his death, his friends published a book titled, Soe Hok-gie, Sekali Lagi (Soe Hok-gie, once more, Jakarta, 2009). In 2005 his life story was made into a motion picture entitled, Gie, which was nominated in twelve categories at the Festival Film Indonesia (FFI, Indonesian Film Festival) and won three awards: Best Picture, Best Actor, and Best Cinematography. Soe Hok Gie has become the icon of young, courageous, and idealist Indonesians, regardless of their racial origins.

Soeryadjaya, William

(Tjia Kian-liong, 谢建隆, Xie Jianlong, 1922–2010)

Business leader, Indonesia

William Soeryadjaya was the principal founder of PT Astra (along with his brothers), which, for many years, was the second largest conglomerate in Indonesia, next to Liem Sioe Liong's very different Salim group. Astra was widely considered in its early years to be the best run of all the large corporations in the country, and William was a frequent recipient of management awards. He himself was by far the most eminent of the relatively few large Peranakan tycoons of the Soeharto era — most of the big ones being Totok — a fact that had direct relevance to his admirable Javanese social values and public behaviour.

Astra struck a crisis in 1992–93 when Soeryadjaya's eldest son, Edward, ran the group he controlled, PT Summa, into trouble. He allowed it to become seriously overextended, with the result that it had to be bailed out through the sale of a large part of the Soeryadjaya family assets in Astra, which thenceforth fell largely into the hands of Soeharto cronies. Fortunately his second son, Edwin, maintained the family business thereafter on a much more prudent basis. The business gradually re-established its eminence as one of the country's wealthiest business corporations. However, Soeryadjaya himself played a less prominent part in the business in the last fifteen years of his life, relying increasingly on Edwin to run it.

Soeryadjaya was noted for his distinctive personal qualities. He was a Christian with a firm belief in God's decisive role in human affairs. He had a relatively humble lifestyle and a strong sense of broader national purpose for his business ventures. He preserved an unusually high degree of autonomy from President Soeharto, a stance which weighed against him heavily in the 1992 crisis when PT Summa received no assistance from the government. Yet by 1996 the Soeryadjaya empire was estimated to be worth US$1 billion and within less than a decade had re-emerged to rank among the twenty largest groups in the country.

Born in 1922 in a family of modest local means, Soeryadjaya was brought up in Majalengka, West Java. He was orphaned when he was twelve but had earned enough by his early twenties to finance taking a technical course in the leather industry in the Netherlands for several years after World War II. On his return to Java in 1949 he engaged in a range of trading ventures although without much initial success (particularly in the leather industry). In 1957 he established PT Astra with the aid of his brothers, which soon came to dominate the import of motor scooters, then motor cycles, and later, the automotive sector more generally, plus heavy equipment and office equipment.

He had various ups and downs in the following years, and, most notably, a lucky break in the late 1960s when Astra benefited from fluctuations in the exchange rate. It had imported 800 Chevrolet trucks at a very favourable rate of Rp141 to US$1 which then turned to Rp378 by the time of their resale. Another lucky break was his close association with PT Toyota in the 1970s, which became the largest importer of cars and cycles in the following decades. This gave Astra a dominant position in the rapidly growing motor cycle and automotive industries in the 1970–80s, when its earnings rose to more than US$1 billion per year, second only to those of Liem Sioe Liong.

On the basis of his European experience of company management, Soeryadjaya put together a team of young professionals to assist in the running of the company and a very competent manager, Theodore Rachmat, as president director, with whom he worked closely. In 1984 Astra also entered the agribusiness industry by buying 15,000 ha of land in South Sumatra on which it began the large-scale cultivation of palm oil and cassava for cooking oil. This later led Astra into big investments in oil palm plantations and cooking oil. Astra was floated on the Jakarta Stock Exchange in 1990 in the largest float ever at that time in Indonesia.

In the late 1980s Astra became much more diversified and expanded aggressively. This involved both strengthening its core businesses and moving into new fields such as production for export (initially in paper and chemicals) in response to the government policy of promoting non-oil exports. Its development of wood-based industries (notably plywood) and other agricultural products, including sugar cane, was an important part of this new strategy. Real estate proved not to be a success, however, and was phased out of Astra and into the family assets under Soeryadjaya's daughter, Judith. The chief executives of Astra firms were encouraged to develop ventures they personally favoured and some fifty to sixty of these were created in due course.

This optimistic phase of Astra's growth was brought to an end in 1992, however, when PT Summa was threatened with collapse after becoming grossly overextended under Edward Soeryadjaya and had to be bailed out to the tune of roughly $1 billion from the family's personal fortune. This led to the family having to sell off a large part of its 75 per cent stake in Astra to safeguard its shareholders and clients. Astra fell under the control of timber magnate Prayogo Pangestu and several other Soeharto cronies. Soeryadjaya could have merely sacrificed his family's shares in Summa, but for the sake of the good name of his company, felt obliged to reimburse its shareholders. He never regained his former influence in the company, although he retained a stake in it and continued to try for some years to recover a controlling interest there, but without success.

The Soeharto regime is said to have been ill-disposed towards PT Summa after it had made history in 1991 by entering into a business agreement with the Muslim organization, Nahdahtul Ulama, under which hundreds of small local Muslim banks were financed by Summa, under the name NUSUMMA. This aroused some hostility from pribumi organizations. However, both the NUSUMMA venture and Soeryadjaya's generosity towards the Summa shareholders must be ranked among his most outstanding gestures towards contributing to the social advancement of the rest of the Indonesian population. His reluctance to become dependent on the Soeharto regime was said to have been sparked by the fact that an Astra showroom in Bandung was trashed by student demonstrators during the course of the Malari riots in 1974, due to the company's close links with Ibu Tien (Soeharto's wife). Thereafter he kept his distance from the palace.

The Soeryadjaya family group re-emerged in the wake of the Summa disaster under various groups headed by William's son, Edwin, and two daughters. The foremost of these groups was PT Surya Raya, headed by Edwin, who proved to be a much more cautious and low-key chief executive. (Edward remained in Singapore for the most part, although he was later made direktur utama of one of Soeryadjaya's most important companies after 2000.) Even after the loss of control of Astra to Prayogo Pangestu in 1993, Soeryadjaya still retained a substantial business empire of 322 firms. He had lost only 28 per cent of his total business network and still had majority shareholding in various large groups.

His Peranakan background and strong sense of involvement in Indonesian society marked him out from the other cukongs (tycoons) of the Soeharto era in various ways. His sense of an obligation to spare the nasabah (clients) of Summa Corp. from losses lay behind his decision to take over the losses they incurred from his son's overexpansion and also his efforts to build up an autonomous Indonesian auto industry. He made little use of personal contacts with key members of the Soeharto regime and his Christian values also played an important part in his business dealings. He had a strong sense of the importance of helping to develop the standards of education in Indonesia and gave a generous subsidy to the Prasetya Mulya Foundation when he sold part of his land to it for its offices at a much reduced price. He was also on the international board of the Asia Foundation in New York.

Soesastro, Hadi Marwoto

(Tan Yueh Ming, 1945–2010)
Economist, policy analyst, public intellectual, Indonesia

Hadi Soesastro's full name is Martinus Yosefus Marwoto Hadi Soesastro, but he was called Hadi by his colleagues, and Mingkie (derived from the "dutchification" of his name, Ming) by his family and close friends. He was one of the pillars of the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), founded in Jakarta in September 1971 with the objective "to provide independent analyses on international and national developments as a basis for policy formulation". Its focus was, therefore, on policy research. At that time, it was probably the only such research institute set up by private initiative.

At the beginning, however, the centre was perceived as a "think tank" of the Soeharto government because General Ali Moertopo and General Soedjono Hoemardani, both then aspri (asisten pribadi), or "personal assistants" of Soeharto, were among its founders. Both have since died. However, through the solid research work CSIS had produced and the high-quality national and international scientific meetings they organized, negative perceptions towards the two aspri changed. CSIS is now a highly respected and probably the best known policy research institute in Indonesia, nationally and internationally. The driving force behind the creation of the centre came from Jusuf Wanandi (Liem Bian Kie) but in its preparatory stage of establishment, Soesastro was already involved in shaping its structure and content. He was recruited while he was still studying in Germany and returned to Indonesia in 1971 to be one of the leading figures in the CSIS. He started as research staff, and became executive director shortly thereafter (1973–74). Over the years, he held one key position after another, and from 1999, he became its executive director again until he passed away of cancer in 2010.

His education in Germany and his experience as an active participant in the Indonesian student organization in Europe (Perhimpunan Pelajar Indonesia) were an asset for the broad vision that CSIS has adopted since the beginning. Furthermore, his Ph.D. education at the then Rand Graduate Institute in the Management Science Department added value to his credentials and contributions to CSIS. His leading roles as an internationally recognized economist, senior researcher, and organizer of scientific meetings, have immensely contributed to the continuing success of CSIS. This is also evident in the number of his publications. Among the 354 titles that he has written, approximately 200 discussing a variety of topics, especially energy, economic reform, and regionalism, were published by CSIS.

His works have often been cited in academic and policy circles. Besides his full-time work at CSIS, Soesastro has an outstanding teaching record as a lecturer at both state and private universities, including the staff college of the Indonesian Navy. He was invited twice, the last time in 2005, as visiting professor at Columbia University, New York.

His concern to increase the number and quality of scholars, especially young scholars, led him to accept positions on the editorial boards of various scientific journals and on the management boards of research institutions in Indonesia and abroad. He was also a judge for the national scientific writing competition, as well as a member of various national committees of, for example, the World Energy Conference, and the Pacific Economic Cooperation Council. From 1996, he was a member of the International Advisory Board of the Asia Society, New York. From 1999, he accepted eight government assignments, the last of which was as co-chair of the Joint Study Group on the India-Indonesia Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement and as a member of the ASEAN-Korea Eminent Persons Group. He also had remarkable experience working in the private sector.

From 2005, he was an independent commissioner of Semen Gresik Tbk, PT Sepatu Bata Indonesia and PT Adira Finance. In 2005, he received the Dharma Karya Pertambangan dan Energi Award, presented on the occasion of the 50th Anniversary of the Republic of Indonesia by the then Minister for Mines and Energy of the Republic of Indonesia, Dr Purnomo Yusgiantoro.

Soesastro born in Malang (East Java) on 30 April 1945 in the last few months of the Japanese Occupation, is the second child and first son of four children. His father was Tan Sien Giok, and mother, Kwee Ting Lan. His father ran a printing and publishing business, Paragon Press, which he had taken over from his father-in-law, Kwee Sing Tjhiang. It should be noted that Tan Sien Giok and Kwee Sing Tjhiang were pre-war Peranakan writers.

In 1949, Tan and Kwee went to Holland, taking the young Soesastro and his sister along on that trip. They lived in Den Haag for almost a year. His father attended some courses and training in new printing techniques and technology, leaving the children with a Dutch nanny. They went to a nearby public school, where he became fluent in Dutch. What he remembered well of his stay in Holland was his fourth birthday, which was also the birthday of Queen Juliana, and he participated in the big public celebration.

Back in Indonesia, he and his sister went to the school run by the Ursuline nuns in Malang, where they were introduced to the Catholic religion. In 1952, they were baptized. They were the only Catholics in their family and only much later, were his mother and grandmother also converted to Catholicism. His father remained a Buddhist and took care of the Buddhist altar at their home. Soesastro's younger sister was a Catholic, but his younger brother became Moslem when he married a Moslem girl. The variety of faiths in the family did not create any problems; in fact, his father used to take the children to church on Sunday and wait in the car to drive them home. He also had good relations with the Dutch bishop in Malang and liked to invite priests for dinner at home as he enjoyed conversing with them on a range of topics.

Soesastro's parents spoke Dutch with their close friends, but the language at home was Indonesian mixed with what was called "passer Maleisch", including some Javanese and Dutch. No one in the family spoke Chinese; hence, his family is clearly Peranakan Chinese with an inclination towards speaking Dutch. According to Soesastro, there was no incentive to learn Chinese, something he regretted very much later in life. He was, however, fluent in Indonesian, English, Dutch, and German.

His high-school education was also in Malang — at the Catholic senior high school, St Albertus — where national figures in the Soeharto cabinet such as Widjojo Nitisastro (Economic and Finance Minister), Rahmat Saleh (Governor of Bank Indonesia), and Rudini (Army General and Minister of Home Affairs) were among the alumni. Soesastro was also involved in activities outside school. From the age of nine to eighteen, he was what he himself called a "fanatic boy scout".

In 1963, when he was eighteen, he went abroad for further studies. His entire family, including his grandmother, travelled to Jakarta to see him off. They all stayed at the then newly opened Hotel Indonesia. It was the first time he was in a building that was fully air-conditioned. He flew by KLM to Amsterdam where he was taken care of by his relatives. He then went on to Aachen, where he was accepted at the Technische Hochschule. He started studying shipbuilding, but due to the influence of B.J. Habibie (who later became the third President of Indonesia), who was then a doctoral candidate at the same school, he switched to aeronautical engineering. He finished his studies in six and a half years, six months longer than it should have been. But he insisted this was a good thing because he was very much involved in the students' organized activities and was getting involved in the East-West controversy. Later, when he had almost finished his studies, he was "discovered" by Sofyan Wanandi, who was looking for people for the research institute that he and his brother, Jusuf Wanandi, were planning to establish. That was how he was recruited to become one of the leading figures of CSIS.

Soesastro passed away in Jakarta on 4 May 2010 after a long illness that did not deter him from continuing his work whenever he was able to do so. His untimely death was mourned, not only by his family, but by numerous friends and colleagues, both in his age group as well as younger ones. In the "In Memoriam" article in the Bulletin of Indonesian Economic Studies (BIES) of August 2010, Hall Hill and Mari Pangestu aptly referred to him as "M. Hadi Soesastro: Indonesian Public Intellectual, Asia Pacific Visionary".

Soeto Meisen

(Sze Tu Mei Sen, 司徒眉生, Situ Meisheng, 1928–)

Journalist, businessman, Chinese community leader, Indonesia

As a journalist and businessman who had close ties with Indonesian political leaders such as President Sukarno and Foreign Minister Adam Malik, Soeto Meisen played a unique role in the evolution of Indonesia's diplomatic relations with China after the 1950s. In the words of Roeslan Abdulgani (1914–2005, Secretary General of Afro-Asian Conference in 1955 and Minister of Foreign Affairs, 1956–57), Soeto Meisen was an ordinary Chinese who "participated in the making of history."

Born on 12 August 1928 in the western Java town of Sukabumi, Soeto Meisen was the second son of Soeto Tjan (1900–1978) and Liu Jinduan (1904–1995). Soeto Tjan, born in Kaiping of Guangdong Province, was one of the major Chinese community leaders and important educators in Indonesia, having served as Chairman of the Chinese School Teachers' General Association and President of the Qiao Zong (Overseas Chinese General Association) before being expelled back to China in 1960 for criticizing the Indonesian government's policy toward the local Chinese. Liu Jinduan was born in Sumatra and educated in Singapore. Like her husband, she too was a teacher who actively contributed to Chinese education and welfare. There is no doubt that Soeto Meisen was profoundly influenced by his parents' life-long dedication to the Chinese community.

Soeto Meisen was educated in Guangren School and Huazhong Chinese School in Jakarta. Both he and his parents were captured and detained for their participation in an anti-Japanese underground organization during the Japanese occupation. In 1947 Soeto Meisen joined the Harian Thien Sung Yit Po (Tiansheng Ribao), a newspaper associated with the Kuomintang (KMT) and became acquainted with President Sukarno. He joined the Chinese newspaper, Hsin Pao (Sin Po), in the early 1950s as a journalist and political editor, which gave him the more opportunities of meeting with Sukarno on an informal basis. At the request of Sukarno, Soeto Meisen acquired for him a large number of publications in Indonesia and Hong Kong pertaining to the new China, such as Barioen's Melihat Tiongkok Baru [Look at the New China] (Jakarta: Rasda, 1952). Partly through these writings and through extensive journalist accounts about Indonesian impressions of the PRC (written by reporters such as Soeto Meisen), Sukarno became captivated by China's socio-economic progress and political change. He even suggested in 1954 that Indonesia should establish a People's Congress similar to the one in China. According to some written and oral history reports from both the Indonesian and Chinese sides, during the preparations leading to the Bandung Conference in 1955, Soeto Meisen served as an informal messenger between Sukarno and the Chinese embassy officials in Jakarta pertaining to China's participation in the Conference.

While still a formal employee with the Hsin Po, Soeto Meisen was engaged by Sukarno as an informal personal assistant dealing with China affairs and accompanied the President in his historic visit to China in October 1956 during which Soeto Meisen served as an interpreter on some occasions. With the founding of Guided Democracy in July 1959 and the increasingly warm relations between Indonesia and China, Soeto Meisen resigned from his post at the Hsin Po at the end of 1959 to become Sukarno's personal assistant, drawing a stipend from the government (but not a salary as he was not a formal civil servant). From 1963 to 1965, he served as the director of the Shoudu Ribao (Indonesian name: Harian Ibukota), a semi-official Chinese-language newspaper published in Jakarta. In the early 1960s, he accompanied Sukarno on two more state visits to China and took part in activities relating to Indonesia-China diplomacy, including serving as the secretary of the team of medical specialists dispatched from Beijing to help cure Sukarno's kidney problems (the Chinese team was led by Dr Wu Jieping, a renowned physician who later became vice-chairman of the Standing Committee of the Ninth National People's Congress).

Immediately after the 30 September 1965 Movement which would eventually lead to Sukarno's downfall two years later, Soeto Meisen left Indonesia and since lived in Macau. In 1969 he set up the Sunny Land Investment Co. Ltd, which was to "invest on [sic] the real estate projects of Macau including the construction of residential buildings, business offices and industrial factories." According to the company's official profile, "In recent years, the company starts to invest on [sic] the real estate projects in Beijing, Shanghai, Guangzhou, Xiamen, Zhuhai and Hubei Xiangfan of Mainland China. It also carries out the investment of other industrial and transportation projects in Mainland China." Apart from engaging in business activities, Soeto Meisen served as the honorary Chairman of Kaiping Hometown Association in Macau and donated 1 million Hong Kong dollars to establish the Soeto Tjan Science Museum in Kaiping.

While in Macau, Soeto Meisen continued to keep close contact with Indonesia, including with Adam Malik (1917–1984). As the Indonesian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Malik was President of the 26th Session of the United Nations' General Assembly which in October 1971 passed the historic resolution to restore the lawful rights of the People's Republic of China in the UN. According to the memoir published in 1998 by Luo Qingchang, Deputy Director of Premier Zhou Enlai's Office dealing with foreign affairs, Soeto Meisen served as Malik's personal messenger to Beijing prior to the meeting of the UN General Assembly, conveying the latter's intention to facilitate the PRC's return to the UN.

In 2003/2004, with the support of President Megawati Sukarnoputri, Soeto Meisen and two of his sons opened a new business in Indonesia, introducing traditional Chinese medicine to the country. Seoto Meisen passed away on 13 October 2010 in Macau. His business has been in the care of his sons.

Somsath, Boun Iene

(陈文森, Chen Wensen, 1959–)
Entrepreneur, Laos

Many Laotians may not know who Somsath Boun Iene is, but the people in Vientiane, be they residents or migrants, will probably know Meely Haysoke Hotel, Meely Seafood Steamboat Restaurant, Meely Dry Cleaner, and Meely Travel Agency. Opened in 1991, Meely Dry Cleaner was Somsath's first business in Lao PDR, while Meely Haysoke Guesthouse was opened in 1998. His latest business achievement was when he spent 23 months to successfully construct a modern seven-storeyed commercial building, the tallest building in Vientiane. The official opening was launched by Deputy Prime Minister, Somsavat Lengsavad in October 2011.

Somsath plays an important role as the "envoy" for Sino-Lao friendship that is much appreciated by the officials and businessmen. He started his business from zero and became a prominent entrepreneur. He holds directorships for many companies and is frequently invited by the Laotian Government to be present in negotiating business deals with its Chinese counterparts from China. He is also a well known leader among the Chinese community in Lao PDR.

Somsath, whose original name is Chen Wen Sen, was born on 21 April 1959 in Puning (普宁) district, Chaozhou (潮州) Perfecture in Guangdong (广东) Province. He is a first-generation Chinese immigrant in Lao PDR and has one brother and a sister who both migrated there a few years after him. His parents, another brother, and another two sisters are still residing in China. He has four children. The eldest, a son, was educated in Thailand, and is now helping to manage most of his business. His second child is the daughter who had graduated from the Republic Polytechnic in Singapore and is currently managing Haysoke Hotel, a 3-star hotel established in 2006 in Luangphabang, which has been named a World Heritage City by UNESCO. Somsath's third child, also a daughter who graduated from Jinan University, Guangzhou, is managing Meely Décor, an interior design company. His youngest child, a son, is pursuing his diploma studies in Micro Nanotechnology, also at Republic Polytechnic, Singapore. Prior to this, he had graduated from Marsiling Secondary School, Singapore.

Somsath graduated from senior high school at Puning Diyizhongxue (普宁第一中学) China in 1977 and started trading in tangerine upon his graduation. At the time his daily routine was to transport five to six trucks of tangerines to sell in Zhanjiang. As trading in tangerine could generate only small profit, he changed to trading in construction materials, wine and cigarette business. These businesses were not profitable, especially when he had to support his family. It was in 1987 that his paternal uncle who was an early migrant to Thailand invited him to help in his business. Somsath agreed and at the same time, explored business opportunities for himself. Somsath, after living in Thailand for a year, found that there was potential in doing business in Laos because after the country's liberation, Laotian government introduced an open policy to invite foreign investment. In Lao PDR, Somsath's first job was as a helper in a grocery store. It was eight months later, in 1988, that he heard about a dry-cleaner who wanted to sell his business. After some careful consideration, he decided to use all his savings to buy over the business. He not only kept its original name, Meely Dry Cleaner, but thereafter named all his businesses "Meely". Initially, he was working alone and had to collect, wash, and deliver the laundry to his customers on his bicycle. He persisted in doing such hard work for more than two years before he began to have some savings. At the time, one of his main sources of income was from washing bedsheets and guests' clothing items for Novotel Hotel, a Singaporean-owned hotel in Vientiane. Unlike other dry-cleaners in Vientiane, Meely Dry Cleaner is the only one that has survived till today; it even has three branches in the city.

Somsath's businesses have been strongly supported by his wife and children. He was married to Fang Yan in 1981, 6 years before he migrated to Laos. Three of his children were born in China, with only a youngest son born in Laos. In 1996, his whole family succeeded in obtaining Laotian citizenship and started using Lao names. For example, his wife, Fang Yan was named Phansing Somsat. In 1994, his wife migrated to reunite with him in Laos, and started the 'Meely Seafood Steamboat Restaurant', the first of its kind in Vientiane. Fang emphasized the need for fresh ingredients and was able to attract many customers, to the extent of having a long queue outside their shop every day. When others rode on the boom and opened their seafood steamboat restaurants, the market become saturated. Somsath then closed his restaurant business and moved into the hospitality trade. In June 1998, he opened Haysoke Guesthouse. It was an opportune time as the hotel business was booming due to the increasing numbers of tourists visiting the world heritage sites in Luangphabang and Vientiane as the capital city of Laos is the gateway to enter the country. Almost every day, his hotel occupancy rate hit 100 per cent. During the outbreak of SARS in 2004 many hotels closed down, but Haysoke Guesthouse in Vientiane and Haysoke Hotel in Luangphabang were still able to maintain a 50-60 per cent occupancy rate.

Every year, Somsath contributes to education funds and municipal constructions in various counties in Lao PDR. For his contributions, the Laos government has awarded him a medal engraved with the flag of Lao PDR, the national emblem and a star as a gesture of Sino-Lao friendship.

Song Ong Siang

(宋旺相, Song Wangxiang, 1871–1941)

Lawyer, Christian leader, social reformist, historian, Singapore

Famed author of One Hundred Years' History of the Chinese in Singapore, Song Ong Siang, also known as Sir Ong Siang Song, was knighted by King George V in 1936. After Song returned from his studies in the United Kingdom in 1893, he embarked on his career and religious work. He led church activities for almost fifty years, and was a key Christian leader of his time. He embraced the mission of reforming the Straits Chinese community and, together with Lim Boon Keng, led the reform movement. One of his significant contributions was the founding of the Singapore Chinese Girls' School, the first girls' school established and managed by the Chinese in Singapore and Malaya. Being a lawyer was his lifetime career and, like Lim Boon Keng, he was a professional who rose to be a prominent social leader.

Song Ong Siang's ancestry can be traced to Nan Jing County of the Fujian Province, China. Song himself was born in Singapore on 14 June 1871, a third-generation Straits-born Chinese. His father and grandfather were born in Malacca. Song's father, Song Hoot Kiam, who was the strongest influence in Song' life, followed the famous sinologist, Rev. Dr Legge, to Britain, met the queen, and had his baptism in a church there. He then returned to found the oldest family of Straits Chinese Christians in Singapore, becoming a dedicated leader at the Prinsep Street Presbyterian Church. Song's mother, Phan Fung Lean, was a Penang Nonya from a Christian family. She was Song's first Malay-language teacher and gave him a good foundation in the language which he pursued at Raffles Institution. In 1907 Song married Yang Hee Neo at the first military wedding held for a Chinese volunteer officer. Yang was loyal to the British Empire, passionate about the church, education, and voluntary work, making her Song's great lifetime partner. They did not have any children of their own, but adopted two girls.

Song received an English education, treading the educational path designed by the local colonial government for outstanding Straits Chinese students. He went to Raffles Institution, and then furthered his studies in Britain after being awarded the Queen's Scholarship. He was the first Chinese person to be admitted to the Downing College of Cambridge University. Following his return after graduation, he started his career in law, and also devoted himself to church work, social reforms, and pro-British activities. The three circles he was active in were closely linked.

Song is an important figure in the developmental history of Christianity in Singapore and Malaya. He led the Prinsep Street Presbyterian Church and Chinese Christian Association for almost half a century (1893–1941). During this period, he assumed the position of an elder for forty-one years, and served as president for forty-eight years. Much of his wealth was donated to religious purposes after he passed away.

During the Victorian age, there were many Christian intellectuals actively involved in societal affairs. Combining religion, knowledge, ethics, and social responsibility, they embraced the ideal of improving the quality of life of, and being of service to, people. Song was one such Christian intellectual. His ideas on social reformism, however, were also inspired by Malay literary works, mainly the works of Abdullah Munshi. In the hope of enlightening the Straits Chinese, he published the Bintang Timor, a daily Malay newspaper. With his good friend, Lim Boon Keng, Song took on the task of reforming the Straits Chinese society and the education of its members. They formed a reform party, launched The Straits Chinese Magazine (1897–1908), and tried their best to elevate the Straits Chinese's level of knowledge, and change their outdated attitudes. After The Straits Chinese Magazine ceased publication, he founded The Straits Chinese Annual to raise funds for the setting up of the Singapore Chinese Girls' School. The girls' school was founded in 1899 as part of the goal to reform the Straits Chinese community. This school produced many outstanding graduates and is currently a very well established and prominent girls' school.

Song's social reformism was one that was tolerant and allowed scope for negotiation. He was not against the social reform movement upholding Confucianism instead of Christianity as its flagship. He also agreed to the merging of modern systems and Confucian classics as the main objective of the girls' school, and not spreading the Christian faith within the school. A Reading Club was established within the Chinese Christian Association, which valued education highly and nurtured youths using outstanding literary works. The club placed emphasis on language, and artistic and philosophical training. Song acted as the club's adviser for a long period of thirty-one years and had the opportunity to influence hundreds of students. But he had never forced students to change their religious faiths.

Song was loyal to Britain all his life. One of his motivations for participating in and leading the Straits Chinese community reform movement was to prove to Britain that this community deserved to be British subjects. The Chinese Philomathic Society, Straits Chinese British Association, and Chinese Volunteer Company, which Song set up with Lim Boon Keng, were key organizations that pledged allegiance to Britain. In the First World War, Song led the Straits Chinese to support the British in whatever way they could. The local colonial government in turn appreciated this loyal subject, appointing him assistant editor of the Straits Settlement's Law Reports, an unofficial member of the Legislative Council, and a member of various boards and committees.

Song's loyalty and contribution won British praise and One Hundred Years' History of the Chinese in Singapore, the book which bore favourable testimony to the British Empire for the world, won him even more credits. He was awarded the C.B.E. and K.B.E. in 1927 and 1936 respectively. The Indian newspaper, Calcutta Englishman, described this book as an epic poem that moved hearts in the British Empire. This grand major work contains a large quantity of historical data on important personages and events and remains an invaluable work of reference on Singapore history today. It is a pity that the editor-cum-author was pro-British and westernized, and was detached from the immigrant masses and working classes, thereby affecting the selection of materials, as well as his writing perspective. The bias is evident and the book appears more to cover one hundred years' history of the Singapore Straits Chinese.

As the sun set for the British Empire, the world stage underwent a change of scene. The Japanese arrived at the beginning of 1942, occupying Song's birthplace after driving out the local colonial government. Song however, passed away in Singapore on 29 September at the age of seventy. His passing on meant that he escaped the turbulent fate of being caught up in the inevitable dilemma of mourning the fall of the British master while serving the new political ruler.

Soon Peng Yam

(孙炳炎, Sun Bingyan, 1912–2009)
Leading businessman, Singapore

Soon PengYam was a leading businessman and founder chairman of the Sim Lim Group of companies.

Soon Peng Yam was born on 6 January 1912 in Tong An District of Fujian Province, China, the third son in a family of five. His father owned one of only two sundry shops in their village and did fairly well. However, conditions were very feudal and oppressive — with bigger, more powerful clans bullying smaller ones — in their village and this made it impossible for his father to carry on the sundry shop business. In 1926, the entire Soon family departed for Singapore.

As a young boy, Soon studied Chinese classics and Confucian works in the village school and was about to complete his primary education when his family decided to leave for Singapore. The family stayed first at Weld Road with some relatives and then moved to Beach Road. His two older brothers sought employment in various businesses while his father became a street hawker. At the recommendation of a family friend, and because he was anxious to learn Malay, Soon started work in a small provision shop in a Malay village in the Race Course Road area. He stayed there for less than two months because the long hours and need to deliver very heavy sacks of rice to customers. Soon resigned and proceeded to work a number of jobs — as shop assistant in a liquor store; a clerk in Boon Liew Company in Rochor Road (for 5 years); and then chief clerk at the Lam Huat Pineapple Factory in the Kranji area. He was hardworking and capable and much valued by his employers. In the evenings, Soon studied English and brushed up his Chinese to the point he was able to write articles for the local newspapers, using a pen name.

In 1934, age the age of 22, Soon decided to strike out on his own. The idea to go into business was mooted by one of Soon's second brother, and it was decided that they should go into the timber business. Having accumulated sufficient knowledge about business, Soon took the plunge, providing $2,000 to start the business at 89 Geylang Road. The business was called Sim Lim Sawmill, a name inspired by the fact that Sim Lim means 'forest' in Chinese and its Chinese characters contains five 'mu' or 'wood' characters. The business did well but within a year, Soon's elder brothers could not see eye to eye with each other. Consequently, they went their separate ways with the eldest brother starting his own shop, Sen Yew and the younger brother, Sen Ann. Soon bought out his brother's shares in Sim Lim and continued running it. The business turned a 15% profit within the first year.

Before long, Soon went beyond the timber business, importing and distributing a whole range of building materials, and specializing in cement from Vietnam. In 1937, following Japan's invasion of Manchuria, the Chinese community in Singapore responded to a call by Tan Kah Kee to raise funds and contribute to the China Relief Fund to help finance China's war effort. Soon was appointed to the Committee and was in charge of the Geylang District Relief Committee and was very active, giving speeches and mobilizing people to contribute.

When the Japanese invaded Singapore, Soon was a wanted man. He spent much of the Occupation evading the Japanese military police and bribing them into leaving him alone. He even tricked them into thinking that he had gone to till farm land in Endau in Johore. In many ways, he was very lucky. Unable to sit still while the Occupation was on, Soon started doing business again, but all his goods were taken away by the Japanese who paid him cost price for the goods.

After the War, Soon resumed his business. By this time, his head office and sawmill were at Sungei Road at the site where he would eventually build Sim Lim Tower. To cope with increasing business and to cut costs, Soon purchased a godown in Kallang and thus began his foray into the warehousing business. While timber remained his main trade, Soon diversified into materials like cement, zinc sheets, bricks, tiles, sand and hardware products such as iron bars and nails. Soon also expanded his business beyond Singapore, setting up offices in Thailand, Java and Sumatra.

Unlike the other more traditional building materials suppliers, Soon was constantly looking further and further afield for his products. He imported a large amount of west European and American products, in addition to the more traditional and popular Chinese products. His ability in seeking out non-traditional sources of construction materials was demonstrated once again when he became Singapore's first businessman to tap into Taiwan's fledgling cement manufacturing industry. Through him, Taiwanese cement found its way into the Malaysian and Singaporean markets.

In 1952, Sim Lim & Company became a private limited company, and Soon assumed the post of general manager. Soon explained that he did this to give some of the company's shares to his loyal staff. The company eventually went public in 1976. After going public, Sim Lim went into property development. In the early 1980s, Sim Lim Investments bought two plots of land in Rochor Road and Bencoolen Street to build Sim Lim Tower and Sim Lim Square. Both buildings have since become Singapore's electronics and computer retail centres. Another major property investment for Sim Lim was Yunnan Gardens, a luxurious freehold residential project in Jurong West.

Beyond the business world, Soon was active in the community. He was Chairman or President of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry (1965–68); Siew Sin Sia and Ee Hoe Hean Club (both rich men's clubs, the latter from 1966 to 2001); Patron of the Soon Clan Association; Chairman and Trustee of the Chinese Swimming Club for a staggering 38 years; Honorary President of the St John's Ambulance Brigade; Committee Member of the Singapore Detainees After-care Society; President of the Singapore Building Materials and Timber Traders' Association; Chairman of Chng Hwa Free Clinic Foundation (1972–81); Vice-Chairman of the Singapore Hokkien Huay Kuan; and advisory committee member of Ai Tong School.

Soon never fully retired from business although he spent less time on its management and more time on social causes when he reached the age of 70. A long-time diabetic, he died on 30 April 2002 at the age of 90. He was survived by his wife, Chang Yoke Ling, six sons and three daughters and more than 20 grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Soon Seng Lee

(孙胜利, Sun Shengli, 1945–)

Educator, businessman, community leader, Brunei

Soon Seng Lee was an educator who was keen in promoting education in Brunei. He was a leader in other fields as well, mainly in business and social organizations, and was even involved in the sports scene.

Soon was born in Kampung Lupak Luas, Brunei, right after the end of the Second World War, on 16 December 1945. To commemorate the defeat of the Germans and its allies, as well as the victory of the Allies, he was named Seng Lee (meaning victory in Chinese) by his father.

At the time, Brunei successfully became a British Protectorate.

In 1947 Soon's family moved from Kampung Lupak Luas to a freshwater village in Brunei, where he spent his bittersweet childhood and adolescence. In the early years at the village, life was tough, lacking essentials such as water and electricity. However the villagers, though from different backgrounds and religions, were very supportive of one another, which is regarded as priceless. Transport was very inefficient too. Although the villages were connected by a nexus of bridges, Brunei Town could only be reached by boat. His family supported themselves basically by managing a small store, which was incidentally the one and only store in the village. This store could be said to have operated twenty-four hours a day because, regardless of whatever time of the day it was, as long as the villagers had any needs, even during rest hours, the family would serve them. The usual mode of transport between his house and the town area was by boat. At a very young age, Soon had to help out at home and was also required to do some heavy physical work at the store; he then grew up slowly from a weak and sickly child into a healthy adult.

Due to the limited means of transport, he only attended kindergarten when he was nine. Every day, he had to row a boat by himself to the "Bomanka" village near town and leave his boat at Uncle Wu's house. When the tides were low, the boat could not reach Uncle Wu's house. At such times, he would have to wade through the mud to push the boat. The sort of hardship he experienced can only be understood by those who lived through it. Due to his poor family circumstances and strict parents, Soon and his siblings were brought up to be thrifty and hard-working. In his primary school days, he spent his leisure selling small items such as ice cream, sweets, tikam-tikam, etc. at the village. His father would give him 20 per cent of the sales to encourage him to save money. Besides attending school and selling small items, Soon spent the rest of his time helping his parents to manage the shop. His second brother had to stop going to school before graduating even from primary school to help the family out because of its financial problems. Soon was more fortunate though and could have successfully complete his high school education at Chung Hwa Middle School in 1967. Although he had good results and had thought of furthering his studies in Taiwan like most of his fellow classmates, he did not ask his parents to support him in th is. Being a considerate son, he had no choice, but to allow the opportunity to pass him by.

Between 1968 and 1971, Soon taught at Chung Hwa for four years. He was an assistant in the administration and was in charge of selling textbooks. In 1971 his family decided to leave the water village they had lived in for twenty-five years to move to Tutong. Soon considered himself fortunate as the Tutong Chung Hwa School (都东中华学校) had vacancies for teachers and the principal. With the encouragement of his father-in-law, Wu Chun Fa, who was the school's the head of board of directors, he started teaching in the unfamiliar environment with his wife, Lin Feng Ying. Four years later, in 1975, he was promoted to headmaster of the school, a position which he held for four years, and was later promoted to principal. As a teacher, he wanted to promote the teaching of Chinese in the school. With the cooperation of the directors, teachers, and students' parents, the school's education gradually became mainstream and the students' results were promising. Between 1980 and 1984, he left his education career, and was employed by Pusat Johnson as a business manager.

In 1985 he left the company to establish his own business in Kampung Petani in Tutong District. His company, Lee Ta Trading Co., has been selling personal computers, electrical generators, water pumps, etc. until today.

Soon's participation in associations and community service varies in different areas. In education, from 1983 to 2008, he was a member of the board of directors of, and since 2009 Chairman of Chung Hwa School, Tutong, acting variously as director, supervisor of education, secretary, and vice-chairman as well. He is currently chairman of the board. From 1984 to 2009, he was a supervisor of education on the board of directors of Kiudang Chung Hwa School. Currently he is the Chinese secretary. From 1988 to 2008, he was chairman on the board of directors of the Chinese Charity Association, Tutong. He now holds the position of vice-chairman here. And from 2000 to the present, he is, an adviser of the Chung Hwa School, Tutong Alumni. From 1997 to 2010, for the Chung Hwa Middle School, B.S.B. Alumni, he had held the positions of director, vice-secretary, and vice-public relations, and is currently vice-chairman. In business, he was secretary, and then supervising director of the Electrical Association, Brunei from 1995 to 2009. For charity, Soon was head secretary on the board of directors of the Chinese Charity Association, Kiudang from 2008 to 2009. Within the Chinese community, he was an adviser in the Guang Hui Association, Brunei (广惠互助社) from 2008 to 2009. He also acted as chairman for the Tutong District Chinese Society Sultan's Birthday Celebration Committee for ten years — from 1998 to 2008.

Soon was involved in sports as well, and was appointed as a member of the board of directors of the Tai Chi Association, Belait from 1994 to 2010, holding positions like the director of Education, head secretary, commercial affairs director, vice-director of welfare. He is currently director of welfare. He has also acted as vice-chairman for the Wushu Association, Brunei from 2003 till 2010. As well, Soon was chairman of the Amateur Basketball Association, Brunei from 1978 to 2009, and is currently its vice-chairman. In addition he was honorary adviser for the Tai Chi Association, Brunei-Muara from 2008 to 2009.

Soon has held various appointments with different government authorities as well. To name a few: he was member of the municipal board of Tutong District (2006–08), one of the supervisors for the Drug Rehabilitation Centre (2008) and Brunei Prisons (2007), director of the Orphan Fund in Tutong District (1987–2009) and Cultural and Arts Association, Tutong (2005–08), treasurer for the Sultan's Birthday Celebration Committee in Tutong (2003–08), the Kampung Sengkarai Information Association (2001-13), and the Tutong Town Country Information Association (2007–11).

Su Bin

(Tsui Tze Man, 徐四民, Xu Simin, 1914–2007)
Media leader, community leader, Myanmar

U Su Bin has always been credited for keeping the Sino-Burmese connection alive through his mass medium — the press. He was the founder of New Rangoon Post, a daily in Rangoon in the 1940s, and also that of The Mirror three decades later in Hong Kong where he became a citizen. His active political engagement further saw him contributing to the smooth handover of Hong Kong to China in 1997.

He was born on 3 July 1914 in Rangoon. Xu Zanzhou (徐赞周), his father, was reported to be a philanthropic and patriotic overseas Chinese migrant to Burma. He came to Rangoon via Penang in 1891, and was one of the founders of the first Chinese school, Zhong Hua Yi Xue (中华义学), in 1902. Xu Zanzhou provided funds to establish Chinese schools in Burma and was one of the founding directors of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in 1911. During the early years when fires were frequent occurrences in Rangoon, he also provided care for the overseas Chinese fire victims. Xu not only actively took part in Sun Yat Sen's Revolutionary Party, the Tung Meng Hui (同盟会) Burma branch, but also recorded how Burmese overseas Chinese were actively participating in its political movement in two historical monographs: Revolutionary History of the Overseas Chinese of Burma, 1901–1912 (《缅甸华侨革命史1901–1912》) and Geography of Burma (《缅甸地理志》). These are valuable primary sources for the study of the Burmese Chinese in the early twentieth century. Xu's wife, Daw Saw Lan (郭素兰), was a Burma-born overseas Chinese of Hokkien descent. They had two sons and three daughters. The eldest son, U Sein Aye (徐世英), is currently chairman of the Mirror Cultural Enterprise Company.

U Su Bin began formal education at the age of thirteen, when he attended classes at Chung Ling Chinese Middle School (钟灵中学) in Penang. After a year of schooling, he returned to Rangoon and continued his studies at Hua Qiao Middle School, one of the best Chinese schools at the time in Rangoon, and completed his secondary education within three years. The reason he could excel in his studies can be traced back to the early days when he started work in his father's bookshop as a typesetter. In 1936, he sat for the entrance examination at the Arts Faculty of Amoy University and succeeded in securing a place, but his education was interrupted the next year by the advent of the Japanese invasion. After completing his basic education, he founded New Rangoon Post, a pro-Beijing daily in Rangoon, in 1940. U Su Bin spent the first fifty years of his life in Rangoon. In 1949, when China gained her independence, he was a delegate to the 1st Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, and a the 1st National People's Congress. In 1950, he was secretary general of the Preparatory Committee for welcoming Yao Zhongming (姚仲明), the first Chinese ambassador to Burma, and his embassy members. It was an event organized by the overseas Chinese in Burma. In 1952, he became the consultant to the Orient Trade Company and the Burma China Trade Company in Rangoon. When Chinese Prime Minister Zhou Enlai (周恩来) visited Rangoon enroute one of his overseas trips in 1954, U Su Bin was responsible for hosting the premier on behalf of the overseas Chinese in Burma. Premier Zhou reportedly visited Burma nine times on his way to other Asian and African countries, and it was reported that Director Liao Chengzhi (廖承志), a senior Chinese official in Beijing and a good friend of U Su Bin, said that "if you need help, look for Xu Si-min". From 1960 to 1964, U Su Bin was elected chairman of the Burma Chinese Chamber of Commerce for its eight, nineth and tenth Term Committee.

In 1962, all of Burma bore the brunt of the military coup, especially Rangoon, since it was the capital city. In 1964, U Su Bin's businesses in Rangoon were nationalized by the Burmese Government under General Ne Win. He returned to Beijing and worked as a member of the China Overseas Association, getting allowance of about 100 RMB a month. Together with his investment income in Guangdong Overseas Chinese Investment Company, which gave him an additional monthly income of 300 RMB, he was able to provide some level of comfort for his family. After about seven years in Beijing, he finally received approval to migrate to Hong Kong in September 1976. He officially settled there as a Hong Kong citizen in 1977. As it was his passion to write and express his views and open support for Communist China, he set up The Mirror, a pro-Beijing magazine to support the policies of modern China. Between 1995 and 1997, he was a member of the SAR Preparatory Committee for the historical handover ceremony which saw the British returning over Hong Kong to China after a hundred years of British rule.

As a strong and ardent supporter of the Chinese Communist Government, U Su Bin was nicknamed "Big Cannon Xu". He was conferred the Grand Bauhinia Medal by the Government of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (SAR) in 1997. The next year, he became chief adviser to the Hong Kong Association of International Investment and led a Chinese delegation to visit and invest in Myanmar. In December 1999, at the invitation of the Myanmar Government, he led a delegation of the Hong Kong Association of International Investment to Myanmar, and was conferred an award for his outstanding contribution to Myanmar by Lieutenant General Khin Nyut, then secretary-1 of the State Peace and Development Council of Myanmar.

U Su Bin died of organ failure on 9 September 2007 in Hong Kong, at the age of ninety-three. Gao Siren, Beijing's liaison person in Hong Kong, praised the late U Su Bin for his support of the law of Hong Kong and the "one country, two systems" policy. Mourners at his funeral included high level officials from China and Hong Kong, such as Chief Executive of Donald Tsang (曾荫权); director of China's Hong Kong and Macau Affairs Office of the State Council, Liao Hui (廖辉), and the former Hong Kong leader, Tung Chee-hwa (董建华). Chinese President Hu Jintao (胡锦涛), Premier Wen Jiabao (温家宝) and the head of China's congress, Wu Bangguo (吴邦国), also sent wreaths and flowers. He was buried at Dapeng Bay (大鹏湾) in the city of Shenzhen, China. Hong Kong Chief Secretary for Administration Henry Tang wrote the eulogy and read: "Xu provided valuable opinions and counsel on the development of the country. Xu also made his significant contribution to Hong Kong's smooth reunification with the motherland and the implementation of the 'one country two systems' principle".

Su Guaning

(徐冠林, Xu Guanlin, 1950–)

Academic, scientist, engineer, Singapore

Su Guaning has made important contributions to the scientific and technological landscape of the city state of Singapore. As president of the Nanyang Technological University (NTU) and holder of various positions in the Defence Science Organisation and the Defence Science and Technology Agency, he was able to shape on science and technology.

Su's father, Su Kee Lay (徐其礼), was a Johore (Malaysia)-born Chinese who went to Fujian Province, China, for his high school and tertiary education. He obtained a degree in electronic engineering from Xiamen University, where he was schoolmates with Lim Yih Chern (林仪贞), who graduated in physics and later became his wife. The couple moved to Taiwan where Su Guaning was born. When the young boy was four years old the family migrated back to Malaysia and, two years later, moved to Singapore. Both Su's parents taught at the Chinese High School (华侨中学) and Su went to a nearby primary school, the Nanyang Girls High School Primary Section (南洋女中附小), for his education. He then went to Catholic High School and Raffles Institution where he won a President's Scholarship and a Colombo Plan Scholarship in 1967 to study electrical engineering at the University of Alberta in Canada. He subsequently attained a master's degree at the California Institute of Technology before returning to Singapore as one of the earliest research engineers in a unit of the Ministry of Defence that subsequently became the Defence Science Organisation (DSO). He later completed his doctorate at Stanford University on a DSO Scholarship.

When Su returned to Singapore, he was appointed deputy director and later director of the Defence Science Organisation (DSO). In 1997 the DSO was incorporated as DSO National Laboratories and Su became its CEO. During his time at the DSO, he was awarded the Public Administration Medal (Silver) in 1989 and the Public Service Medal in 1997. Despite his commitment to the DSO, he still found time to pursue a career in academia as he wanted to inculcate an appreciation of the importance of technological development in the younger generation. In 1991 he was appointed adjunct associate professor in the Department of Electrical Engineering at the National University of Singapore where he taught radar systems and signals processing. He was appointed as adjunct professor in 1995.

In 1997 Su left the DSO to head the Defence Technology Group at the Ministry of Defence. His years of experience in design, research, project management, and general management of research and technology at various organizations stood him in good stead at the Ministry of Defence, where he spearheaded several major initiatives, including the setting up of the Defence Technology Group as the Defence Science and Technology Agency, which he served as founding chief executive. With his long experience in research and raising Singapore's status as a technological hub, Su has also played a prominent role in decision making on the national science and technology policy since 1988: he helped to establish the National Science and Technology Board, and served as board member from 1991 to 2001.

Su's contributions to academia should likewise be acknowledged because since his inauguration as president of NTU, he has striven to improve NTU as a globally known research intensive university on par with the National University of Singapore (NUS). As soon as he became president of the university, Su took into account the wishes of the graduates from the Class of 1999–2003 for the NTU to have a more transparent academic system in which students would be better able to find out where they stood in terms of their performances. Similarly, he increased the number of professional internships available to the students.

Su also stirred up a small controversy during his time as NTU president when he supported the idea of renaming NTU as "Nanyang University" to reflect its rich cultural history as one of the first tertiary institutions in Southeast Asia offering higher education to the Chinese community. This proposal from some alumni, although welcomed by many graduates of the former Nanyang University, was not universally supported. Instead, the counter arguments were supported by a significant number in the community. The first argument was that the NTU is a separate institution from the Nanyang University that was established by the Chinese community of the 1950s. The second stemmed from concerns over possible confusion in the job market and the effect the renaming of the institution might have on the brand equity that the NTU had cultivated over the years. Such misgivings eventually led to a decision to postpone the move indefinitely while Su focused on building academic strengths and scientific and technological developments at the university. These include expanding the NTU student population to 7,000 students, establishing new schools, revamping undergraduate curricula, research in a major way, raising general academic standards, introducing new academic governance, expanding China programmes and entrepreneurship programmes, converting itself from a government agency to a corporation, alumni increasing the membership of its alumni association and fund-raising, as well as raising its international reputation. During his term the decision was made to establish a medical school with the Imperial College in London. He also founded the Global Alliance of Technological Universities and served as chairman from 2009 to 2011.

For his contributions in shaping the science and technology policy in Singapore, Su was awarded the Public Administration Medal (Gold) in 1998, and the National Science and Technology Medal in 2003. He was similarly acknowledged by the French president in 2005 when he was awarded the Chevalier of the Legion of Honour. In 2011, he received the Meritorious Service Medal from the president of the Republic of Singapore, and the Friendship Award from the Government of China.

On 30 June 2011 Su stepped down as president of the NTU and was made president emeritus. He was succeeded by Bertil Anderson, a Swede. At the appreciation dinner given in his honour, the NTU's chairman, Koh Boon Hwee, said: "Professor Su transformed NTU from a practice-oriented, teaching university to an internationally-recognised research university, with the establishment of two research centres of excellence." Su himself stated: "The fact is, with our collective efforts, NTU has built a world reputation. We recognize 1955 Nantah, 1981 NTI and 1991 NTU as milestones in the history of the university, and shall continue to climb, united by our common heritage."

Sun Yanzi, Stefanie

(孙燕姿, 1978–)

Singer, song-writer, Singapore

Stefanie Sun Yanzi was born Sng Ee Tze, the second daughter of Sng Yeow Hong (an engineering professor) and his wife Ee Kwai (a teacher) on 23 July 1978, in Singapore. She has an older sister, Yee-kia and a younger sister, Ee-mei. Sun was educated at Nanyang Primary School, St Margaret's Secondary School, Raffles Girls' School and St Andrew's Junior College. She obtained a degree in marketing from the Nanyang Technological University in 2000, the same year her debut self-titled album, Yan Zi (燕姿) catapulted her to fame.

Sun's musical education began at the age of 5 when she started learning the piano. When she completed her final piano examinations at age 19, her mother saw an advertisement in the newspaper for a singing course at the Lee Wei Song School of Music. It was during her vocal lessons with the famous Lee brothers — Wei Song and Si Song — that her talent blossomed. Her teachers urged her to make a demo tape and sent it to Samuel Cho, managing director of Warner Music in Taiwan. Cho knew that she was a rare talent and immediately negotiated to sign her on as an artiste. Over the next 1½ years, Warner worked on her debut album. When Yan Zi was released in May 2000, it was an instant hit, selling 330,000 copies in Taiwan, 200,000 copies in China, 12,000 copies in both Hong Kong and Malaysia, and 17,000 copies in Singapore. Sun became the first Singaporean artiste to sell more than 10,000 copies of an album locally. One of the songs featured in the album — Cloudy Day (天黑黑) became the most-requested song on Singapore radio.

Her second album, My Desired Happiness (我要的幸福) was released in December that same year and sold more than 380,000 copies in Taiwan alone, and over 1,000,000 copies in China. In 2001, Sun released her third album, Kite (风筝), and it sold over a million copies worldwide. This was followed by Start (自选集), a collection of covers. It sold over 250,000 copies in Taiwan and over a million in China. Back in Singapore, Sun was so popular that she was invited to sing the official National Day songs for the National Day Parades of 2002 and 2003: We Will Get There (一起走到) and One United People (全心全意). Her fifth album, To be Continued … (未完成) was released in early 2003, and once again, it sold over 250,000 copies in Taiwan and over a million copies in China. Two more albums followed, and by the end of 2003, Sun had sold over 7 million albums in Asia with just seven albums.

By the end of 2003, Sun was exhausted and suffering from depression. She had released seven albums in just over three years, performed numerous concerts and embarked on several tours but she was having difficulties relating to her colleagues and friends and grew suspicious of those around her. She decided that it was time to take a year's break to recover and to rethink her career and the direction it ought to take. The break did wonders and by the end of 2004, a more cheerful Sun was back, ready to release a new album, Stephanie. The self-titled album is a reprise of her debut Yan Zi, and was intended to herald in a new Sun and a fresh approach and attitude. It was a smash hit, selling over 2.3 million copies in Asia; her most successful album till then.

Sun's 2005 album, A Perfect Day (完美的一天) showed a maturing Sun, who was determined to focus on the quality of her music without comprising her artistic integrity. Although it was commercially less successful, Sun still managed to sell over a million copies of that album in Asia. The following year, Sun went on an extensive concert tour, with four sell-out concerts at the Hong Kong Coliseum and a much-anticipated homecoming concert in Singapore. All the touring took a toll on Sun who was heavily criticized when she went off-key during a performance at Taiwan's Golden Melody Awards 2006. It was a major blow to Sun who had won the Best Female Mandarin Singer award at the Golden Melody Awards the year before.

In 2007, after 9 albums with Warner, Sun switched record labels and released Against the Light (逆光) under the EMI/Capitol label. Her move to EMI was precipitated by the departure of her long-time producer Sam Chen, former president of Warner Music Taiwan, for EMI. This move made EMI Taiwan the largest music label on the island. Like Sun's previous albums, it was a hit, selling 60,000 copies in the first three days of its release in Taiwan, and over 500,000 copies in China in the first week. That year, Sun had a harrowing experience while filming a music video in Cairo when she and her mother were extorted by local gangsters. After handing over RMB200,000 (about S$38,000) and with the help of Singapore embassy staff, Sun and her team were able to leave Egypt.

Over the years, Sun has collaborated with other artistes as well, most notably with her good friend, Jolin Tsai, another Taiwanese singer; A-do; Tanya Chua; JJ Lin; May Day (五月天); FIR; Wang Leehom; and Wang Feng.

On 8 March 2011, Sun her first album in four years, It's Time (是时候) with her new label, Wonderful Music (a subsidiary of Rock Records), which shot to the top of the charts. Two months later, on 8 May 2011, Sun married her Indonesian-Dutch boyfriend Nadi van der Ros at a glittering wedding at the posh Capella Singapore hotel on Sentosa.

For her outstanding artistic achievements, Sun was named Her World magazine's Young Woman Achiever Award in 2001; NTU Outstanding Young Alumni Award in 2005; awarded the Singapore Youth Award (Arts and Culture) in 2007; and Business China's Young Achiever Award in 2011.

Sung, T. S.

(宋之绚, Song Zhixuan, 1896–1976)
Educator, Brunei

Teaching and managing a school, spreading Chinese culture, and promoting Chinese education made up T. S. Sung's lifelong career. He taught in Yang Zheng (养正) School in Singapore during the 1920s, and thereafter, in Miri (Sarawak), until the Japanese occupied the oil-rich town. After the war, he continued teaching in Brunei until he retired in 1967 at the age of seventy-one. He was clearly an exception to the general pattern of early Chinese migration to Brunei. His contributions to Chinese schools and his influence in the affairs of Chinese communities were widely acknowledged in Brunei.

In the early twentieth century, especially after Dr Sun Yat Sen overthrew the Qing Dynasty in 1911, and in the early years after World War II, many who came to Brunei were peasants or the unemployed in rural areas, but not in Sung's case.

He was a law graduate from Dong Wu University (东吴大学) in Guangdong. After sailing first to Singapore in the 1920s, then to Miri in Sarawak, and finally to Brunei immediately after the war, he became effectively bilingual, fluent in both Mandarin and English. He was widely accepted as a very stern, knowledgeable, and capable intellectual — one not inclined to do business or engage in activities just to make money. He had a dream that was different from those of the majority of Chinese immigrants — to promote Chinese education and culture.

In February 1946, Sung giving up golden opportunities to represent Miri in Sarawak's first Legislature, accepted an invitation by the management committee of Chung Hua Middle School in Kuala Belait to serve as its headmaster, which was a critical turn both for him and the school.

Chung Hwa Middle School was founded in 1931, fifteen years before he took over its administration. Its solitary building was one of the few left standing after the bombings by the Allied planes. By the time he took over its administration, it was in a state of dilapidation. Undeterred, Sung, together with his wife, Lin Mojun (林默君), plunged into their respective work of salvaging the school by administering and teaching in it. Sung, relying on his experience as a dean of studies at Chung Hua Public School. Miri, set up systems, laid down rules and regulations, and quickly started his plans to build staff quarters and offices for teachers.

In the course of 21 years, from 1946 to 1967, Chung Hua School was turned into a Chinese school with lower secondary and kindergarten education, supported by the Chinese community, and capable of adjusting to changing circumstances. In 1957, it was renamed Chung Hwa Middle School Kuala Belait (CHMSKB, 汶莱马来奕中华中学). Its secondary school provided its primary school graduates with access to secondary education without hassle.

The increase in the number of students meant that Sung had to recruit more teachers and construct more buildings. His best teachers were recruited after 1949 from Hong Kong or Taiwan. These new teachers were generally believed to be anti-Communist mainlanders, but they, knowing that most Chinese in Southeast Asia then were pro-mainland China, hardly allowed their political beliefs to interfere with their teaching. The number of school buildings also increased — from one to five. CHMSKB, under the leadership of Sung, emerged as an outstanding Chinese school, one of eight in Brunei, of which three were secondary schools, complete with primary and kindergarten classes.

As principal, Sung took charge of the school, led his staff, and set an example by being a dedicated and disciplined teacher. His ambition was to make CHMSKB famous in both the academic and athletic fields.

In his role as administrator, Sung was good at maintaining harmony and unity in the management committee. He sorted out differences among members from different dialect groups, and showed his flair for tackling the "newly rich" people from the world of business. He was also actively involved with the affairs of clans and associations after school hours, offering his service as advisor or secretary, ex gratia. He played a pivotal role in the yearly fund-raising activities, such as the New Year lion dance performance and school concerts.

In recognition of his abilities and services, the British Resident appointed him a member of the Belait Chinese Affairs Advisory Committee in 1954, and the following year, the only Chinese member in the State Education Advisory Committee. In 1956, three years before the United Kingdom granted self-government to Brunei, Sung was awarded an MBE by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II —the only Chinese in Brunei to receive such an honour.

Sung's influence and his weight in the Chinese society in Brunei can be measured by his contributions in the two instances below:

In November 1955, the Department of Education informed all Chinese schools by mail that the Brunei Government would, from 1 January 1956, grant them financial aid amounting to 50 per cent of their current and capital expenditure. This was viewed as a timely award to the Bruneian Chinese communities for keeping their schools free from political disturbances — at the time a common occurrence in the region. The announcement was, of course, a tremendous boost in furtherance of Chinese education. It also helped to overcome the difficulty Brunei graduates faced in pursuing further education abroad. It was generally believed that Sung, who was articulate and English speaking, had a positive influence on the British Resident.

On 3 February 1958, the State Education Advisory Community received word that the government had decided to stop granting aid to the school from 1959. In response to a call for action, Pehin Dato Temonggong Lim Cheng Choo (林清注) convened a meeting of representatives of the management committees of all the Chinese schools, eight in total on 315 March. That meeting elected seven prominent persons, namely Lim Chen Choo, Ong Kim Kee, Yap Chong Teck , Lim Teck Hoo, Yong Chee Shan, Lim Teck Jin and Sung, to sign a petition to be submitted to the British Resident, appealing to him to withdraw the government's decision on the said matter. The appeal was upheld. As it turned out, the government only finally ceased granting aid eleven years later.

In the twenty-one years from 1946–67, many students of CHMSKB did well in their later endeavours after graduation, whether in Brunei or overseas, and acknowledged that their success was due to the sound foundation laid down by the strenuous efforts of Sung and his wife.

Sung passed away peacefully in 1976 at the age eighty, survived by his wife and an adopted daughter, who has now settled in Australia. His wife died a few years later after him. They were both buried at Kuala Belait Chinese Cemetery. Part of his estate was used to set up a scholarship named after them in accordance with his will — a charitable act consistent with his philosophy and outlook on life.

Suryono, Bambang

(李卓辉, Li Zhuohui, 1938–)

Journalist, former editor-in-chief of Guoji Ribao, writer, Indonesia

Bambang Suryono, better known as Li Zhuohui in the Chinese-speaking community, is arguably the most well known Chinese newspaper editor in Indonesia in the post-Soeharto era. He was editor-in-chief of Guoji Ribao (Jakarta), the largest Chinese-language newspaper in post-Soeharto Indonesia.

Li was born in 1938 in Indonesia, but his place of birth is unclear. According to a recent book written by him, he used to live in a village where he received his primary school education in Chinese. He probably received his high school education in Singapore which was the cultural centre of the Chinese and the centre of English education in Southeast Asia in the 1950s. According to him he taught Chinese language in Chinese high schools, most likely in Singapore or Malaya, until 1960 when he returned to Indonesia. In 1963 he joined the Zhongcheng Bao (忠诚报), the Chinese edition of Warta Bhakti, a leftist newspaper owned by Chinese Indonesians who published the influential newspaper, Xin Bao (新报, Sin Po) before 1960. Li was the executive editor cum chief writer of Zhongcheng Bao.

The person taking overall charge of Warta Bhakti/Zhongcheng Bao was A. Karim D.P., an indigenous Indonesian journalist who belonged to the Nationalist Party and who was close to President Soekarno. On 30 September 1965 there was a coup which led to the banning of PKI, the fall of Soekarno, and the rise of General Soeharto. All Chinese-language newspapers were banned and Li Zhuohui lost his job. In fact, after coming to power, Soeharto implemented a total assimilation policy towards the Indonesian Chinese community. The three Chinese cultural pillars namely, Chinese mass media, Chinese schools, and Chinese organizations, were all abolished. Chinese journalists, teachers, and cultural workers were unable to work in their own professions and began to move to the commercial field. Li was no exception. He began to learn new skills such as business administration, and eventually became head of a paper manufacturing factory, a job he held for more than twenty years. He later resigned and set up his own electronics shop. Nevertheless, he continued to pay attention to Indonesian politics and the Indonesian Chinese community, especially the Chinese speaking community.

In May 1998, prior to the fall of Soeharto, there were student demonstrations and a power struggle within the influential elites, especially within the military. Anti-Chinese riots were instigated and Chinese Indonesians became the victims. Li's electronics shop was looted and forced to close down. There was an exodus of the Chinese and the Indonesian economy got into tremendous difficulties. Soeharto was eventually forced to step down, but the situation remained unclear. Li fled Jakarta for a while and started writing reports on the socio-political situation in Indonesia for Singapore's Lianhe Zaobao (联合早报), Malaysia's Sin Chew Jit Poh (星洲日报), and Hu Sheng (Aspirasi, Jakarta). Indonesia itself went through an era of reform which led to the re-emergence of the three Chinese cultural pillars. A few Chinese-language newspapers were published in the major cities of Indonesia, with the largest number in Jakarta. Xiong Delong (熊德龙), chairman of the Guoji Ribao (国际日报 or International Daily News) group in the United States, decided to launch the Guoji Ribao in Indonesia and invited Li to be its editor-in-chief. That was in 2001.

Under the editorship of Li, Guoji Ribao developed into a large Chinese daily in Jakarta. The paper also collaborates with mainland Chinese newspapers (for example, China's People's Daily, Hong Kong's Wenhui Bao), and their "overseas editions" are distributed as Guoji Ribao supplements. Because of these supplements, Guoji Ribao has become an "international newspaper" and not purely a Chinese Indonesian paper.

Li is a very prolific editor and writer; he pens most of the editorials in Guoji Ribao. As he is also interested in the history of the Chinese community in Indonesia, he has also written a number of essays on the subject. With the assistance of his staff and friends, he has edited, and published a series of books on Indonesian Chinese pioneers in the socio-political and cultural fields. He has also collected some of his analyses on Indonesian politics and published them in books. To date, he has published at least nineteen books in Chinese including four on Indonesian Chinese leaders, and four on Indonesian-Chinese culture and education.

In these publications, he clearly puts forward his views on a number of important issues. On Chinese education in Indonesia, he argues that "the prejudice and misunderstanding of mainstream society towards ethnic Chinese is strong and deep-rooted, and requires many generations to narrow the gap, most importantly through education, including the revival of Chinese language education". He also maintains that it is necessary "to encourage ethnic Chinese to be integrated into mainstream society, but ethnic Chinese should not forget their roots; they have to learn the Chinese language, spread Chinese culture and morality, in order to contribute to the country and society".

Li argues that Confucianism and Chinese education should be combined, stating "Confucianism should be popularized. We need to learn from the ways in which Christianity and Islam are proselytized, spread Confucian sayings and teachings and make them practical." He takes the view that Indonesia and other ASEAN states lagged behind the "four dragons" economically due to the fact that they rejected Confucianism.

As far as China is concerned, his views have been consistent. When he was the editor of Zhongcheng Bao in the 1960s, he wrote editorials to promote cordial relations between the PRC and Indonesia; after becoming chief editor of Guoji Ribao, he continued to hold the same view.

On the question of Chinese participation in Indonesian politics, he wrote: "Ethnic Chinese should stand up and participate in [Indonesian] politics together with other races in order to safeguard their own rights; they need to oppose discrimination, oppose hegemony, oppose resorting to non-democratic means … they need to work together with other ethnic groups, share their joys and sorrows, join the army, and participate in building the country in various ways…"

On 4 January 2012, Li stepped down as chief editor of Guoji Ribao. Prior to this, Li had been involved in the preparation of the ASEAN Nanyang University in Indonesia, together with Shen Demin, a leading heart surgeon in Bandung.

Susanti, Susi Lucia Francisca

(王莲香, Wang Lianxiang, 1971–)
Badminton world champion, Indonesia

Lucia Francisca Susi Susanti who was born in Tasikmalaya, West Java, is often considered to be the finest female badminton player that Indonesia has ever produced. She won the first gold medal for Indonesia at the Barcelona Summer Olympics in 1992 and dominated the women's singles event in the early to mid 1990s. Now retired, she became Indonesian team manager for the Uber Cup in 2008.

Most viewers who watched Susi Susanti receive Indonesia's first gold medal at the Barcelona Summer Olympics in 1992 would remember seeing tears streaming down her face while the Indonesian national anthem was being played. In that historic moment, Indonesians across the nation were united in feelings of immense pride and joy as they shared her sweet victory.

While Susi's gold medal at the Barcelona Summer Olympics is considered to be the pinnacle of her contribution to Indonesia, Susi has lifted up Indonesia's name numerous times throughout her glittering career as Indonesia's greatest female badminton player.

She dominated the women's singles event in the early to mid 1990s, winning All-England in 1990, 1991, 1993 and 1994, the World Badminton Grand Prix consecutively from 1990 to 1994, and the International Badminton Federation World Championship in 1993.

She won at the Japan Open three times and won the Grand Prix Series in Bali in 1990. She also won various Badminton Grand Prix Series and Badminton World Cups. She led the Indonesian team to win the Uber Cup in 1994 and 1996. Other than her gold medal at Barcelona, she also won a bronze medal at the 1996 Olympic Games in Atlanta, the United States.

Susi was inducted into the International Badminton Federation (IBF, currently Badminton World Federation or BWF) Hall of Fame in May 2004 and received the Herbert Scheele Trophy from the IBF Council in 2002 for outstanding exceptional services to badminton.

Susi admitted that many sacrifices had to be made to achieve success. Since secondary school, she had to leave her family in Tasikmalaya, West Java, where she was born, to live at a dormitory and enroll at a school that was only for athletes. She said that she was socially awkward because she only had athletes as friends. It is no wonder that she chose to marry Alan Budikusuma, who was also an Olympic gold medalist at Barcelona and fellow badminton player. They were married on 9 February 1997.

As an athlete, her training schedule was extremely packed. She would train for six days in a week (Monday to Saturday), from 7 to 11 in the morning and from 3 in the afternoon until 7 in the evening.

She also had to follow strict guidelines for her meals, sleeping times and clothing. She was not allowed to wear high-heeled shoes to avoid spraining her ankle. Visiting malls and going the movies could only be done on Sundays. However, she was often so tired that she opted to rest on Sundays rather than going out.

In order to be a world champion, Susi fully understood that she had to focus on her training and give up many things that non-athletes could enjoy. As she recalled, "It is impossible to be a badminton world champion if you do not put your heart and mind in your goal. I even gave up my tertiary education because I could not concentrate on my game while studying for exams. But I have no regrets. How else could I contribute to my country while achieving my dream at the same time?"

Until 1997, Susi continued to win badminton championships for Indonesia, the final one being the Badminton World Cup 1997. In 1998, she also led the Indonesian female badminton team to its runner-up position during the Uber Cup competition in Hong Kong. It would be another decade (in 2008) before the Indonesian team could qualify for the Uber Cup final, with Susi as the team manager.

Susi recalled that the May 1998 riots broke out when she was in Hong Kong for the Uber Cup final. Being a Chinese-Indonesian, she feared for her family and friends back in Indonesia. Thankfully, her family and friends escaped the wrath of the mob during the riots.

The condemnation by the international community of the May riots was intensely felt by Susi, who was interviewed by CNN (Cable News Network) regarding her position as a Chinese-Indonesian badminton world champion. During the interview, Susi said candidly that she was deeply concerned about the situation back home because she realized that news reports of the riots were much more vivid in Hong Kong than in Indonesia. Nevertheless, she maintained that she is still an Indonesian first and foremost, and would not hesitate to keep representing Indonesia in international badminton championships.

Her pregnancy, however, caused Susi to willingly leave the world of badminton in 1998. Following the birth of her daughter, Laurencia Averina, she dedicated herself to being a full-time mother. She was again blessed with the arrival of a second child, Albertus Edward, two years later. Her third child, Sebastianus Frederick, was born in 2003.

Even though she and her husband had a stellar career as badminton players, Susi does not want her children to follow in their footsteps. She feels that athletes are underappreciated in this country. Unlike Korea and China, which have comprehensive pension plans for ex-athletes and offer a host of benefits and incentives for star athletes, Indonesia does not offer its athletes a bright future. She attributes this as one of the reasons which explain the declining quality of badminton players in the country. With the exception of several corporate sponsors such as Djarum and Ciputra, Indonesian badminton players and federations receive little financial support for their efforts and achievements.

She shares how she and Alan had to pool their own resources to establish a sports equipment corporation, Astec (Alan and Susi Technology), to support their family. They have also opened a foot reflexology and sports physiotherapy center, Fontana, in Kelapa Gading.

Based on her own experiences and observations, Susi wants her children to concentrate on their education. Badminton, she says, "can come after they have completed their education. Education provides more tangible benefits than the uncertain future facing badminton athletes."

In spite of everything, she still hopes that the Indonesian government and society would value badminton players more to restore her nation's supremacy in the competitive world of badminton.

Sy, Henry

(施至成, Shi Zhicheng, 1923–)
Entrepreneur, Philippines

On a bright Sunday morning, a typical Filipino family goes about their day this way: they wake up and head off to the shopping mall.

And these days, the SM Malls have become the one-stop place where families begin their days with a mass, followed by lunch, then a movie, maybe a visit to the doctor or dentist, reading and shopping for a couple of books, checking out the latest gadgets, doing some shopping, and even letting the toddler play with other toddlers.

The SM Mall is the brainchild of Henry Sy (born 25 December 1923), dubbed the "Retail King" and richest man in the country. SM Malls have certainly, irrevocably, changed the lifestyle of millions of Filipino families. Because of the SM Mall, families do not have to move from place to place for their spiritual, social, health, physical, entertainment needs. For the last fifty years, generation after generation of Filipinos have been given the convenience to access and attend to all aspects of their being at one place of convergence.

"With the SM shopping malls, people tell me I changed Philippine lifestyle. Families and friends spend time together in malls. They shop, dine, and have fun whatever age, whatever budget they have," Sy says.

More than half a century ago, Henry Sy was not wealthy and a mall was but a figment of his imagination. Before the Second World War, Sy left his homeland of China to accompany his father to the Philippines and try their luck here as retailers. They opened a corner grocery in Manila. Sy recounted how they were so poor that at the end of a day of attending to customers, he would clear the counter for a place to sleep.

Sy held on to the dream of becoming an entrepreneur. In 1946 he opened a small shoe store in Quiapo. By 1950, he had earned an associate of art degree in commercial studies from the Far Eastern University. It was then that he began to conceive of greater things, beyond the small shoe store in Quiapo.

"I thought if I sold a pair of shoes to every Filipino, I would be a successful man."

In 1958, Shoe Mart (SM) was born. With perseverance, determination, and discipline, he endured travelling for forty hours by propeller plane to New York to get his supply of shoes. From shoes, his business began to offer other products such as clothes and bags. By 1985, SM City North Edsa in Quezon City was built. This department store, relying heavily on the sale of low-priced consumer goods, could not have been built at a worse time. The country was undergoing political upheaval, the economy was in a slump, and the location chosen for the store was "in the middle of nowhere". With tenacity, Sy defied all the naysayers. When the customers came, concessioners and other businesses followed and SM City North Edsa was transformed from being in the "middle of nowhere" to being the centre of everything — a mall in effect.

With the success of the first SM City, other malls were built all over the metropolis, next in other cities and provinces in the country, then all the way to China and Guam. Each SM Mall has SM department stores, SM cinemas, SM supermarkets, and a toy kingdom. Selected SM supermalls offer special facilities, such as SM skating rink, SM bowling centres, and the SM IMAX theatre. What retailers in the malls offer range from the usual products of food, clothing, and accessories to gaming arcades for children of all ages, play places for children under five years old, medical and dental clinics, wellness centres, and even spas.

At present Sy boasts of twenty-three supermalls, translating into 2,905,833 square metres, luring close to two million visitors every day. Of all these malls, Sy refers to the SM Mall of Asia (MOA) as "the greatest project of my life". Opened on 20 May 2006, the MOA, standing on reclaimed land along Roxas Boulevard, incorporates hotel, leisure, and entertainment facilities, schools, medical centres, a church, and residential and office condominiums. It houses the first IMAX movie theatre in the country and provides ample facilities for major trade fairs, exhibitions, and conventions.

Sy's business has gone beyond building and managing malls and has ventured into banking, property, and tourism development. He claims that all his businesses — retail merchandising, mall operations, banks, condominiums and resorts — all complement a single vision: creating synergy.

These businesses are managed efficiently and effectively by Sy's six children, all of whom have become experts in their respective fields. Teresita, the eldest, is president of Shoemart, Inc. and chairman of Banco de Oro Universal Bank. Henry, Jr. is president of SM Investments Corporation and senior vice-president of SM Prime Holdings, Inc. He is also tasked to keep an eye out for new business opportunities. Hans is the head of mall construction and operations while Herbert is in charge of SM supermarket. Elizabeth is the senior vice-president for marketing. Harley is SM Prime's senior vice-president and treasurer. Even with the scope and continued expansion of the family business, Sy was said to run it using the principles of running a corner grocery. He met regularly with his six children to discuss and oversee every aspect of the business. They spent Saturdays inspecting the SM malls first-hand: from the malls to department stores to supermarkets. On Sundays, they would meet again to report on their respective inspections and make further plans for improvement. Sy values the contributions of each of his children and would like his family to continue to run the enterprise. Teresita, the one expected to head the business, envisions another strategy. The family would provide the oversight while professional managers handle day-to-day operations. This way the family can somehow relax and enjoy what they have built through years of hard work, dedication, and perseverance.

More than his dedication to creating SM Malls, Sy is also committed to contributing to Philippine society. FORBES Magazine recognized Henry Sy, Sr. in 2009 as one of forty-eight (one of four Filipinos) heroes of philanthropy. His efforts through the SM Foundation have touched countless Filipino lives. Established in 1990, the foundation focuses on health, education and spiritual needs. It is responsible for running clinics near SM malls, and repairs and refurbishes paediatrics wards and hospices. It also organizes medical missions and mobile health and dental clinics, as well as respond to relief work during calamities.

In 2008 it successfully treated 164,000 people in remote areas through its 401 medical missions. The foundation is also active in building Catholic chapels, youth centres, and public school buildings. It has built and maintained a total of eighteen facilities by 2008. In the field of education, the SM Foundation helps hundreds of scholars develop into productive citizens by providing education, as well as moral, social, and spiritual guidance. One of the more recent projects of the foundation is the Kabalikat sa Kabuhayan Farmers Training Program. Aside from the training given to the participants, the SM Foundation also provided linkages to its suppliers and concessionaires which would procure the produce of the farmers. All these programmes are aligned with Henry Sy's vision of helping Filipinos.

"We must do something to help others in society. I am pleased that through SM Foundation, we are able to do so many socio-civic projects, and support at any one time 400 college scholars in need."

SM Malls have also been active in creating environmentally and socially responsible supermalls: the Big Malls with Big Hearts. The chain has launched its own solid waste management programmes and its SM Malls also serve as a monthly venue for "Trash to Cash", a programme where customers bring their solid waste products, such as paper, plastic, and electronic products, in exchange for a certain amount of cash. SM malls are also mindful of their water and energy consumption. Water conservation is done through treatment plants and the use of waterless urinals in the men's restrooms. To control the use of electricity, computerized systems are installed to regulate the air-conditioning, ensuring that no more energy than is practicably necessary is utilized.

To reduce the use of plastic bags, the Green Bag Project has been launched. This project encourages SM shoppers to use and reuse a green cloth bag instead of using plastic bags to carry their purchases. SM malls not only initiate environmental awareness, but also cater to the special needs of certain sectors of society by installing and providing facilities for people with disabilities. They conduct seminars for their employees about better treatment and accommodation of patrons with disabilities. SM Malls have also allotted certain areas as breastfeeding stations. This guarantees that nursing mothers will have a designated private space to care and respond to their infants even in a public mall. These environmental and socio-civic projects implemented within the SM Malls create an atmosphere of responsible citizenship, not only for corporations, but also for individuals who tread in these spaces.

Sy Kong Triv

(徐光秀, Xu Guangxiu, 1947–)
Businessman, politician, Cambodia

Sy Kong Triv was born to well-to-do ethnic Chinese parents, Sy Seng Ho (1918–73) and Uong Kim Uor in Kampot Province on 8 August 1947. He is chairman of K.T. Pacific Group, a manufacturing and distribution company that provides one of the largest varieties of services in Cambodia. In his personal capacity, he owns many local businesses, including KTE Mitsubishi electronics and the Mondial Center that was built on 90,000 sq metres of land, and is the largest business and festivals centre in Phnom Penh. He is one of the vice-presidents of the Cambodian Chamber of Commerce, and honorary chairman of Cambodia's Hainan Clan Association. He is fluent in Khmer, Thai, Vietnamese, and Mandarin. He also speaks two Chinese dialects: Hainanese and Teochew. He has two daughters and two sons, all of whom were educated in the United States. Currently, three of his children have returned to Cambodia and are helping him in his business.

Sy's father, Sy Seng Ho, had fled from Qiongshan, Hainan Island in China, to Cambodia during World War II and started a job as a teacher. In all, Sy Seng Ho had four sons and three daughters. It was because of his deep interest in and devotion to education that he was highly respected and appreciated by his students and the community. However, as his salary as a teacher was not enough to feed his family properly, he turned to running a small business of his own and eventually became an influential businessman.

Sy Kong Triv graduated from junior high school in Kampot Province with excellent grades, but could not continue his studies because of the civil war from 1970 to 1975. When the war ended with the fall of Phnom Penh to the Khmer Rouge on 17 April 1975, hardship continued to prevail in Cambodia until 1979. During the time of Khmer Rouge regime, Sy and his family were deported to the countryside to become ordinary peasants working on farms with millions of other Cambodians. Three of his brothers died from starvation during this horrendous period.

During its reign, the Khmer Rouge completely destroyed the Cambodian economy, culture, and social structure, resulting in a complete collapse of the country's infrastructure. After liberation in 1979, Cambodia became the poorest country in Asia and faced the challenging task of rebuilding itself from scratch. Like many Cambodians who did not seek asylum in a foreign country during the decade-long turmoil, Sy Kong Triv returned from the countryside to Phnom Penh. He started a small business trading in daily necessities such as thread and needle, combs and towels, etc., buying these goods at the Cambodia-Thai border in Koh Kong Province, and carrying them by his bicycle to sell in Phnom Penh. The distance between the two locations he used to ply for his trading activities was approximately two hundred kilometres. After a couple of years, his hard work paid off when he managed to save enough money to set up a trading company in Koh Kong Province.

During the U.S. economic embargo on Vietnam from 1985 to 1989, Koh Kong Province was the only available conduit into Cambodia for goods and commodities. The Cambodian Government appointed Sy Kong Triv's company as the representative for importing goods for use in Cambodia. These goods ranged from electrical appliances and clothing to colour television, motorbikes, and second-hand vehicles. These were initially imported from neighbouring countries such as Thailand and Singapore, but later expanded to as far away as Hong Kong. The imported goods catered not only to demand in Cambodia, but were also re-exported to Vietnam.

In 1990 Sy Kong Triv established the K.T. Pacific group, which originated from a string of former family businesses. Its portfolio of businesses is diverse and encompasses a range of industries from manufacturing, engineering, construction, to trading, land development, markets and entertainment. Over the years, as his business grew, Sy gradually established joint ventures with local as well as foreign companies, such as, the British American Tobacco (BAT) Ltd., Eastern Steel Industry Corporation, Muhibbah Engineering (Cambodia) Co., Ltd. (MEC), KT HINO Ltd. Co., and also facilities management of the Phnom Penh International Airport and Siem Reap International Airport.

Sy's contributions to the country's economic development and improvement of educational standards have resulted in his receiving numerous letters of recognition, awards, and medals from both the Royal Government of Cambodia and local and foreign communities. In 1994 he was granted the honorary title of Oknha by then King Norodom Sihanouk. On 14 July 1999 he was appointed special economic adviser to Samdech Chea Sim, chairman of the Cambodian Senate. In 2004 he was conferred the title, Naek Oknha by King Norodom Sihamoni. Naek Oknha is the most prestigious and highly respected title bestowed by the king to individuals in recognition of their valuable contributions to the economic, social, and educational development of Cambodia. In January 2006, following a nomination by the Cambodian People Party (CPP), Sy was selected as a senator, together with three other ethnic Chinese personalities.

Sy Sieng Suy

(Sy En, 施性水, Shi Xingshui, 1904–63)
Community leader, Philippines

Sy Sieng Suy was among the most respected early traditional leaders of the Chinese community in the Philippines and served as an effective bridge between the community and mainstream society. As presidential adviser of the late President Carlos P. Garcia, he played a crucial role in safeguarding the rights of the local Chinese while at the same time instilling in them the need to help their chosen country of residence.

Born on 15 March 1904, Sy Sieng Suy (施性水, legal name, Sy En) came to the Philippines at eleven years of age. He stayed in the store of an uncle, Sy Zhi Qiong (施至岑), to learn business as a working student while studying at night school at the Anglo Chinese School. Despite the heavy workload, he showed unmistakable leadership qualities and was chosen to head the student council, and also to be captain of the basketball team. He continued college at Po Ti (普智学校), a night school where he learnt bookkeeping. After graduation, he worked as the general manager of Hock Teck Foundry Shop (福德 鼎厂), which he ran well and gained the trust of customers and fellow businessmen.

With this trust and respect from the Chinese community, Sy became president of Lin Pok Sy Association for five years, and chairman of the Ban-Siong Hue Kuan (闽商会馆) for eight years. On 7 July 1937, when the Marco Polo Bridge Incident triggered mass indignation in the Chinese community, he led the Philippine-Chinese Anti-Japanese Society (菲华抗敌委员会), "Kang Ti Hui" for short, and "The Boycott Japanese Goods Movement". Understanding the extreme need of China for resources to resist the Japanese, he was among the conveners of the Philippine-Chinese Salvation Committee and the fund-raising effort for the National Salvation Movement among Southeast Asian Chinese communities through the Federation of Overseas Chinese National Salvation Associations (华侨救国联合会). At the time, he was already a committee member of the General Headquarters of the Kuomintang Party (国民党) in the Philippines and an executive committee member of the Manila Chinese Chamber of Commerce (中华商会). With his anti-Japanese activities, he became the target of a manhunt when the Japanese occupied the Philippine in 1942, but he was able to escape and went underground for three years.

At the end of the Second World War, Sy exerted efforts to help the community recover from the devastation of war, and supervised many of the rehabilitation efforts. As chairman of the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association (善举公所), he headed the fund-raising efforts to repair and rehabilitate the Chinese General Hospital, calling on the Chinese community to practise austerity and donate instead to medical welfare causes. Through the increased donations, the hospital was able to cater to both poor Chinese and Filipinos at discounted rates. Sy also spearheaded many medical missions to poor areas with free medical consultation and medicine. For indigent Chinese families, he provided burial lots for free or at discounted rates at the Chinese cemetery.

As duly elected chairman of the Manila Chinese Chamber of Commerce in consecutive terms from 1950 to 1961, Sy led the reconstruction of its office, the present YMCA, and building of the Chinese Embassy in Dewey (now Roxas) Boulevard. He headed the liaison committee of the Chinese Consulate General's Office and was elected president of the Philippine Chinese Educational Association. Other responsible positions he held at the time were executive committee member of the Philippine Regional Headquarters of the Federation of Overseas Chinese National Salvation Associations, chairman of the Youth Cultural Publications Association, and chairman of the Board of the Philippine Chinese High School.

Due to his stature and leadership positions in the Chinese community, Sy was invited to be an adviser to the late Philippine President Carlos P. Garcia (1957–61), and his Cadillac was given a special No. 36 plate number as an amenity of his position. With that appointment, Sy was able to use his concurrent influential positions as chairman of the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association and chairman of the Manila Chinese Chamber of Commerce to look after the general welfare of the Chinese and their fellow Filipinos and encourage them in joint business ventures as well, even including those with overseas Chinese.

It was during Sy's leadership at the Chinese Chamber of Commerce that the Retail Trade Nationalization Law was passed in 1954. That law was one of the most devastating blows to the livelihood of Chinese businessmen in the Philippines. Sy acted as a bridge to mediate between Malacanang Palace, Congress, and the hapless businessmen who were unable to adapt quickly to the significant change wrought by the Retail Trade and subsequent nationalization laws. There were many deportation cases for those arrested for transgressing provisions of the law and Sy acted to mitigate the harm and adverse effects of the new laws. When community leaders found the Manila Chambers of Commerce inadequate, they started a national movement to organize the nationwide chamber into a Federation. Sy was at first reluctant to sacrifice the traditional historical role of the Manila Chambers of Commerce, but when he saw that the problems and challenges of the times called for a bigger and more powerful federation, he later gave in and paved the way for the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce to be the lead organization in the country which it still is today.

Sy undertook all his responsibilities with great passion, often missing his meals because of the many demands on his time. Sometimes, as early as six in the morning, there were already people who approached him for help with their difficulties. He was never known to have turned away anyone who came to him. Sy was also often the mediator of conflicts between family members, business partners, or of misunderstandings between different organizations.

As Sy had dedicated most of his life to charitable work and having addressed the concerns of the community, his death at the prime age of fifty-nine brought profound grief and mourning to community members. He passed away on 8 November 1963 and his wake was held at the Ongpin Gymnasium of the YMCA. Two hundred and sixty Chinese organizations had signed up for the funeral committee, encompassing nearly all the existing Chinese organizations in the 1960s. The funeral cortege during his interment was likewise unprecedented. While the leaders in the procession had already arrived at the Chinese cemetery in La Loma, its end was still lined with mourners queuing up at the YMCA, a distance of more than 3.5km, signifying how much Sy was loved and mourned by his followers and the people he had helped wholeheartedly with passion.

Sy Yinchow

(Chua Kee; 施颖州, Shi Yingzhou, 1919–)
Writer, translator, journalist, sportsman, Philippines

Sy Yinchow, using pen name Chua Kee, holds the world record as the longest serving editor-in-chief. He started newspaper work in 1945 and, now at the age of ninety-three, is still actively editing the United Daily News and putting out a weekly one-page literary supplement in the same paper. His lifetime commitment to journalism and creative writing influenced at least three generations of Chinese Filipinos. Many of his works and commentaries reflect the sentiments and the situations of a sector of the Chinese-Filipino community who still reads Chinese. His works are also quoted or reprinted in foreign newspapers, magazines, and journals. He was also among the earliest Chinese writers to have translated Filipino works into Chinese, for which he is recognized by China as an authority on Philippine literature.

Born in China's Fujian province on 16 March 1919, Sy's family migrated to the Philippines when he was three years old due to the instability in southern China. Born in the year of the May 4th Movement, Sy was exposed to China's new literature at a very young age and his love for literature became a lifetime pursuit. Although journalism is his vocation, literature has always been his passion, and Sy is distinguished in both disciplines.

Sy founded his first newspaper, the Manila New Day, an underground resistance newspaper, in 1945 during the Japanese Occupation. Since then, he has served as editor-in-chief of three other newspapers. His last and longest stint is as chief editor of the United Daily News, which was among the first Chinese broadsheet to resume publication after martial law (1973 to the present).

Sy's closest rival for the record of being the longest continuously serving editor-in-chief is Sir Etienne Dupuch in the Bahamas who was editor-in-chief of the Tribune from 1919 to 1972, and later contributing editor of Nassau Daily. Technically, therefore, Dupuch held the editor-in-chief title for only fifty-three years. Sy served as editor-in-chief for a total of sixty-two years — Manila New Day (1945); Chiang Kai Shek Daily News (1946–48); The Great China Daily News (1949–72); and United Daily News (1973-present).

He has also served in various press associations and was the keynote speaker of the 20th Assembly of the World Chinese Language Press Institute (1987, Manila). Both as a journalist and as a writer, he has written extensively about the issues seriously affecting the Chinese-Filipino community — Chinese language-education, the deterioration of the Chinese-language facility among the young generation, the peace and order situation, and the undercurrents of racism and racial stereotypes. He exhorted the community to take extra care in helping their Filipino countrymen and their own workers so that racist tendencies can be dissipated.

Sy's passion for literature started at a very young age, and he started writing at age sixteen. At eighteen, Sy had his poems published in Xiamen and Shanghai, and even caught the attention of China's renowned writer, Ba Jin (巴金). Sy is a true pioneer in the literary movement among Chinese writers in the Philippines, which he started even before the war. In the post-war era, he was also the first to relaunch and promote the Chinese literary movement. He published the first collection of Chinese literary works in the Philippines in 1946, and the first Chinese poetry selection in 1949 and again in 1950. He also published the literary works of the Overseas Chinese in the Philippines under the auspices of the Federation of Chinese Writers Association (菲华文联, 1950–72), for which he served as founding chairman and executive director until the organization closed down when former President Ferdinand Marcos declared martial law and shut down media outfits.

As soon as media control became more relaxed, Sy established the Filipino-Chinese Literary Arts Association in 1982. The group remains active until today, publishing a monthly, full-page literary supplement in the United Daily News. In his position as convenor of the Chinese Literary Association in the Philippines, he was elected to head the 2nd Asia Chinese Writers Conference held in Manila in 1985. He concurrently served in two other international writers organizations — as vice-president of the Asia Chinese Writers Association, based in Taipei, from 1985 to 1994, and as honorary president of the World Chinese Writers Association, based in Hongkong, from 2004 to the present. He is also a fellow of the International Writing Programme of the University of Iowa. As a writer, he has presented papers in more than 100 international meetings all over the world.

Poetry translation is another of Sy's forte. The twenty-seven books he has published include Anthology of World Poetry, which translated 330 masterpieces by 128 great poets from twenty countries into Chinese. There is also Best Chinese Poems from Tang and Sung and Shakespeare's Sonnets. His expertise encompasses the theory of poetry translation, having published more than twenty articles on the theoretical basis of translation work. All his translation works have been reprinted many times in other countries. His world poetry translation, for example, is world renowned as a great feat.

In the Philippine literary field, Sy was among the earliest Chinese writers to have translated Filipino works into Chinese and is recognised by China as an authority on Philippine literature. His translation of Dr Jose Rizal's Mi Ultimo Adios has been incorporated in many anthologies of poetry in Chinese translations. In 2010, the Manila Critics Circle, a renowned Philippine literary awards giving body, recognized Sy for a lifetime of translating Philippine literature into Chinese. He has three anthologies of Chinese translations of Philippine short stories.

As a sportsman, he was active in track and field, especially in his youth, and is one of the five leaders of the Philippine Chinese Track and Field Association. For half a century, he collected data on track and field in China and since 1958, has been a member of the Association of Track and Field Statisticians (International), which publishes the International Athletics Annual. He is renowned as an authority on Asia's track and field statistics.

Among the awards and honours he has received are the President Macapagal Gold Medal for Outstanding Poet and Rizalist (1964); President Marcos Gold Medal for Outstanding Poet and Translator (1966); President Chiang Kai-Shek Prize for Culture (1968 and 1970), Lifetime Achievement Award for Journalism at Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence (2004); Asia Chinese Writers Foundation Lifetime Achievement Prize (2004); Philippine National Book Award 2006 (for his book, Best Chinese Poems from Tang and Sung), among others.

Now ninety-three, Sy Yingchow has had a life that has spanned nearly five generations. He is an eyewitness at the inauguration of all presidents of the Republic of the Philippines. His phenomenal and institutional memory of major events in the Philippine society and in the Chinese-Filipino community is unrivalled and is a marvel to people who have interacted with him. Philippine literature is now known and appreciated in China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and other Chinese-speaking communities because of Sy's pioneering works.

Sy and his wife, Jade, who is the first woman to have received the "Exemplary Mother" Award in the Chinese-Filipino community, have been living in the same house in Binondo since they got married. His son, John, is a writer, poet, and translator like him. One of Sy's daughters, Joan Sy Cotio, served as president of Chiang Kai Shek College from 1994 to 2007.

SyCip, Washington

(薛华诚, Xue Huacheng, 1921–)

Accountant, entrepreneur, public intellectual, Philippines

Washington SyCip is sometimes called, "Mr Global" and "The Wise Old Owl", and for great reasons. His lifetime achievements span several generations on all continents.

Directorships in an amazingly wide range of giant corporations and advisory councils in Europe, the United States, Australia, and Asia keep him, his little carry-on suitcase, and the courier company which chases after him with Manila's newspapers and assorted documents wherever he may be, on the run.

Yet he shows up at those international meetings in a natty suit and tie (he keeps suits of clothes in several capitals), ready to dispense radical advice and ideas — when they are sought — in soft, measured sentences.

Global and national leaders, public figures, and business tycoons who seek his ideas, opinions, and analyses on political, social, and economic issues do not go away disappointed. They know they will learn something of value from "The Wise Old Owl". On the other hand, certain leaders may not be happy to find that he will express his views when asked, no matter what they may be — a mark of the man's integrity.

Despite being recognized as a citizen of the world, SyCip's heart nevertheless lies on Philippine soil. His greatest anxiety, at ninety, is seeing the Philippines forever mired in where it is today — from being a leading Asian nation in the 1960s, to being barely ahead of Burma, Laos, and Cambodia. His greatest passion is to see the country's head held high again among the community of nations one day.

SyCip's family was hardly a typical overseas Chinese family of the early twentieth century. While the majority of families emigrating from China sought jobs in a new country or faced penury at home, SyCip's grandfather migrated to the Philippines some time in the mid-nineteenth century to leave behind the turmoil China was undergoing in that period.

Sy Ching Cip, the grandfather, came from Xiamen, in Fujian Province, China. Two of his sons, Alfonso and Albino, were renowned in the Chinese-Filipino community as founders and key officers of important institutions among which were the Chinese Chamber of Commerce (founded in 1904), the Chinese Charitable Association, and the Anglo-Chinese School (the first Chinese school in the Philippines established in 1899).

Born in 1883 in Manila, the Philipppines, Alfonso was educated in China and returned to the Philippines in 1903. He worked in Cebu for eleven years, founded the Cebu Chinese Chamber, Cebu Chinese School, Chung Hua Hospital and set up the Chinese cemetery. He returned to Manila in 1912 and became one of the leaders of the Chinese community. His longest stint in Chinese organizations was as president of the Manila Chinese Chamber of Commerce.

Albino, Washington SyCip's father, was born in 1887. After his education in China, he pursued studies in law at the Michigan University in the United States. After receiving a law degree, he returned to the Philippines in 1912 and topped the Philippine Bar Examinations that year (the president of the University of the Philippines, Jorge Bocobo, was placed second). His wife, Helen Bau, came from a prosperous Chinese Presbyterian family in Shanghai, which owned the Chinese Commercial Press, the largest printing press in Asia at the time. Meeting on their way back to Asia from studies in the United States, Albino and Helen made their life in the Philippines. Albino was one of the founding trustees of China Banking Corporation, the first Chinese-owned commercial bank in the Philippines, founded in 1924.

The Philippines was a U.S. colony from 1898 to 1946. In February 1921, Alfonso, as vice-president of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce (with Dee C. Chuan as president), presented Governor-General Francis B. Harrison with a petition against the Bookkeeping Law, which banned Chinese businessmen from keeping their books of accounts in Chinese. When the chamber lost the case in the Philippines, Dee and Alfonso sent Albino, the lawyer (accompanied by another officer, Rafael Gotauco), to represent the Chinese community in arguing the case against the Bookkeeping Law before the United States Supreme Court. The case was won, and the law was declared unconstitutional.

Both Alfonso and Albino were also key leaders in anti-Japanese resistance movements, for which they were imprisoned in January 1942. Alfonso was granted amnesty after one year because of his age and released on 18 February 1943. Alfonso's family fled to Fuga Island in Northern Luzon to avoid being under Japanese rule. Unfortunately, a few members of the family died when the United States bombed Fuga. Albino's family decided to stay behind in Manila so they could visit him in prison. This decision saved them from harm.

Washington SyCip was born on 30 June 1921 while his father, Albino, was fighting the Bookkeeping Law at the U.S. Supreme Court. Elated by his victory then, Albino chose to name his infant after the capital of the United States. Two younger sons, Alexander and David, were also named after leaders of men.

Bowing to the wishes of his maternal grandmother, SyCip's parents took him to Shanghai to live for five years. He learned to speak Shanghainese and was taught Chinese by private tutors. He came home to Manila once in a long while, but his mother visited frequently. As the time for his formal schooling approached, she brought him back to the Philippines.

SyCip's father insisted that he and his siblings study in Filipino public schools and that they walk to school three kilometres away, instead of riding in the family car. He did not want his children to grow up only in the company of the rich, or associate with only a specific racial or cultural group. Compared with his two brothers, Alexander and David, Washington had a more difficult time back in the Philippines because he would be teased for his Chinese ways and accent. It is a tribute to the man's genius that he later learned to speak perfect English and graduated at the top of his class at P. Burgos Elementary School and, later, V. Mapa High School, both times as valedictorian.

Today SyCip is one of the most respected names in the world. "Perhaps my Chinese heritage contributed a lot to whatever success I may have achieved," Washington once said. "My father had always taught me that it's really important to work hard and be frugal." "Wash" would later also adopt his father's policy of not allowing his children to work in his company. "If my children do well," his father had said, "people will claim that it is because they are the Chairman's children. If they do not do well, people will judge them even more harshly; that they must be really stupid not to do well despite being the Chairman's children."

Albino SyCip's policy worked. His three sons' successes were all hailed as their own personal accomplishments. SyCip's brothers, David, a successful businessman, and Alexander, a lawyer, were also renowned in their time. David headed the Asset Privatization Trust in the post-Ferdinand Marcos regime, handling the privatization and return to their rightful owners of the many assets sequestered by Marcos. Alexander's law office was good training ground for young interns such as law graduate Franklin Drilon, who would later become president of the Senate of the Philippines.

Two sisters, Elizabeth and Paz, were born after the boys. SyCip himself has three children — sons George, a businessman and an investment counsellor, and Robert, an investor, and daughter Vicky, an educator.

SyCip graduated summa cum laude in accounting from the University of Sto. Tomas (UST) in Manila. He passed the board examinations for Certified Public Accountants at age nineteen, two years short of the required minimum age to be licensed. While at Columbia University in New York for doctorate studies, Pearl Harbor was bombed. He then enlisted with the 2nd Philippine Regiment and, because of his facility with languages, was sent to a Japanese language school to learn Japanese and then posted to India to break Japanese wartime codes.

SyCip could have stayed on in New York after World War II, but he chose instead to return to the Philippines to help rebuild his war-torn country. At the age of twenty-five, he opened a one-man accounting office in Chinatown, called Binondo, while teaching at UST. In 1947, SyCip's fledgling accounting firm expanded to become SyCip, Velayo, Jose & Co. after SyCip took in Vicente Jose and his bosom buddy, Alfredo Velayo.

The company became the pioneer in the Filipinization of the accounting profession in the 1950s, after the country gained independence from the United States. Tom Fernell, a Scottish accountant, decided to return to his homeland and negotiated to merge his practice with Sycip's on condition that his two Filipino accountants — Arsenio Reyes and Ramon J. Gorres — would be Sycip's partners. From this relationship, the largest accounting firm in the Philippines – SyCip, Gorres, Velayo & Co (SGV) — derived its current name.

SyCip's link through the SGV Group, foreign affiliates, various boards, and professional organizations, render him and his firm, of which he was chairman until 2007, among the most well connected Asian personalities and institutions in the world. The firm began correspondent relations with some of the leading western institutions in the west such as Arthur Andersen & Co., Ernst & Ernst, Haskins & Sells, and Arthur Young, and SyCip has used these links to entice investments and draw business enterprises to the Philippines, often by quietly placing his considerable personal credibility on the line.

In 1966 SGV institutionalized social responsibility by organizing the SGV Foundation (SGVF). To this day, SGVF participates in uplifting the industrial management sciences through financial support and grants for professorial and research chairs, scholarships, and other programmes. In 1971 SyCip launched the SGV Professional/Social Involvement Program, through which the company donates professional services to non-government organizations devoted to civic affairs and social problems.

A man of integrity, SyCip is uncompromising when it comes to questions of honesty and incorruptibility. His perennial advice to businessmen and capitalists is: "Pay the right taxes. You will never grow big by cheating."

of Harvard professors led by Stephen Fuller, and top business schools in the country, SyCip has formed the Asian Institute of Management (AIM), a region-wide institution guided not only by a Filipino board of trustees, but also by a board of governors drawn from throughout Asia. AIM opened its doors to students from all over the region in 1968.

Serving as founding chairman of AIM, SyCip held that position until his retirement in 2001. He now serves as chairman emeritus of the board of trustees and board of governors of AIM. Both the SGV and AIM are among SyCip's crowning achievements. The two institutions greatly enhance the Philippines' image abroad, training professionals to be at par with graduates from the best international business schools.

Schools, in fact, are his favourite beneficiaries of grants and endorsements. Education, more than any other form of support, is what SyCip says will "lift Filipinos from poverty," and improve the Philippines' economic profile. At age ninety, when all his contemporaries have long retired, SyCip still actively involves himself with organizations like the Synergia Foundation, an organization that seeks to improve Filipino students' access to quality basic education, and the Kaisa Heritage Foundation which serves to preserve and promote the legacy of Chinese-Filipinos in all aspects of Philippine life.

Personal Interview in April 2009.

T

Tạ Mã Viễn

(Tjia Ma Yeng, 谢妈延, Xie Mayan, 1862–1940)
Business tycoon, Vietnam

Tạ Mã Viễn, also known as Tjia Ma Yeng, was a rich capitalist of Hokkien origin who lived in the later part of the nineteenth century and the first forty years of the twentieth century. According to the latest information, his ancestor was an overseas Chinese from Batavia (now Jakarta), Dutch East Indies (present day Indonesia). Tạ Mã Viễn himself was born in Batavia and his mother died when he was young. His father then took him to Xiamen (Amoy), Fujian, to study and learn English. His surname, "Tjia", is the Indonesian-Dutch spelling for Xie (谢) in the Hokkien dialect. Viễn later migrated to Vietnam from China. However, according to another source, Viễn came to Cochinchina in 1885 when he was twenty-four years of age. He started as a clerk in a Chinese business firm and rose to become a famous rice trader and miller. In 1905 he obtained French citizenship.

Viễn was also known as Má Chín Dảnh. During the French Occupation period, the nickname, Má Chín, was used for people who were middlemen or who were agents of big French companies, banks, and Chinese trading companies. To the owners of those companies, má chín were trustworthy people, often tasked to market goods and services, as well as source for goods. To them, má chín were the only buyers and sellers they knew. Má chín made it easy for the Chinese companies to do business. They were also known as compradors (mại bản 买办). In present times, má chín are the marketers and purchasers. Viễn was originally a má chín, and was a rich businessman.

However, originally he was not rich. According to what is known, Viễn was the eldest son of a rich trader who went bankrupt. In the nineteenth century, his father moved the entire family to Saigon — Chợ Lớn to restart a career. When Viễn was turning into an adult, his father advised him that in the business world, great deeds were predicated on a dynamic mind, and that this was more valuable than wealth. His father believed that Viễn would be able to make it in business. True to this assessment, five years after Viễn stepped into the business world, he managed to restore his family's wealth by becoming a skilful má chín.

The following account is believed to be how Viễn became rich and prominent. Around 1908 in Saigon, there was a notorious person nicknamed "Four-Eyes Big Brother" who was the head of the mafia that protected gambling halls. He was pesky and terrifying Chinese businesses that wanted peace to conduct their business, so they needed someone else to protect them from "Four-Eyes Big Brother". Viễn fitted the bill. Even though "Four-Eyes" was a gangster, Viễn was able to negotiate quietly with him, by promising to pay him a big sum of money. The strategy worked, and the Chinese businesses were left in peace. The money was of course contributed by Chinese businesses to Viễn. His reputation rocketed after this affair, and he naturally became a strategist and adviser in many important matters that concerned the Chinese community.

Entering the 1920s, with the rise of prices of commodities in the world economy, Viễn became a major trader for eastern medicinal products. In the mid-1920s, his main activity was exporting rice through his company, Hock Guan Hong, of Chợ Lớn. He also owned two steamships and many estates in Saigon and Chợ Lớn, as well as played the role of strategist and coordinator for the trading activities of the Chinese in Saigon-Chợ Lớn. For instance, when business leader Quách Đàm wanted to export rice to Singapore and Hong Kong, he could not help but sought the advice of Viễn so that his venture could be successful. With his diplomatic skills and social network, Viễn had close liaisons with the business world in Asian countries. He researched the markets of the world and the region, forecast the trends, and was able to design wise trading strategies for his Chinese friends in Chợ Lớn. One could say that his every move moved the prices of the market.

Viễn was apparently as wealthy as Quách Đàm. He was also in real estate, constructed houses, did rice polishing, and owned many rice polishing enterprises. Complementing these were his many means of transportation that plied the roads, bringing rice to the entire region of Southern Vietnam. He was very much a strategist working behind the scenes, as he always worked silently and also traded without fuss. It was said that at one time, his total assets and money made up half of all the assets and money of the Chinese community in Saigon-Chợ Lớn. In the 1930s, when the economy of Vietnam met with increasing difficulties and recession, Viễn transferred his wealth and his businesses to Hong Kong.

The Chinese in Chợ Lớn now remember Viễn as one of five persons who built the beautiful and famous Hà Chương (河章) Temple in District 5. Viễn had many wives, and his wives were the owners of many properties close to the temple. Viễn's relatives were also known to have built the Sùng Đức (崇德) and Phước An (福安) temples. Viễn himself was the owner of many properties and houses. His home has become the office of the Young Pioneers. Another house at 122 Đỗ Ngọc Thạch Street in District 5 is now the court house of the district.

Tam Assou, Franciscus Xaverius

(Phanxicô Xaviê Đàm Á Tô, 谭亚苏, Tan Yasu, 1855–1934)

Religious leader, Vietnam

Tam Assou was a Chinese Catholic priest leading the Chinese Catholic community in Saigon, the present-day Ho Chi Minh City in Vietnam, in the early twentieth century. Tam was the first Chinese priest ordained in Saigon and the first Chinese priest of the local Chinese Catholic Church in Cholon (Chợ Lớn), the "Chinatown of Saigon", which is the present-day Fifth District in Ho Chi Minh City. His most important contributions were the revival of the Chinese Catholic community in Cholon in the early twentieth century, and establishing a new church on new land without any prominent support from the local Chinese laymen. He founded an orphanage and a school of Catholicism in Cholon and also built many small houses around the church to shelter poor Chinese residents. The Chinese Catholic community that he built in Cholon in the early twentieth century grew in importance during the Vietnam War and the Cold War in the latter half of the century.

Tam was born in 1855 in Macau and raised by a French convent in Hong Kong called Sisters of St Paul de Chartres (沙尔德圣保禄女修会). He was baptized by Bishop Pellerin, a French Bishop in Vietnam who, at the time, was in Hong Kong to escape the oppression towards the Catholics in Vietnam. When Tam was eight, the Sisters of St Paul de Chartres established a branch in Saigon, and Sister Benjamin le Noël de Groussy took him to Saigon, and allowed him to live with Father Philippe, a French priest with the Paris Foreign Missions Society (MEP), a Catholic missionary society established in the seventeenth century by French priests, assigned to East Asia by the pope. Father Philippe was at the time also the priest of the Chinese Catholic church in Cholon.

In 1865 Father Philippe organized a Chinese Catholic group in Cholon, among whom were the former patients of Cho Quan (Chợ Quán) Hospital, which was located between the present-day First District of Ho Chi Minh City and Cholon. It was one of the important facilities for the education and service of medicine in French Indochina in the nineteenth century. The chapel and house of Father Philippe was a small Vietnamese hut.

Tam, while living in "Chinatown" with Father Philippe, acquired more Cantonese and Chaozhou dialects in addition to the French he spoke. When he turned thirteen, Father Philippe who was on his way to France to seek treatment for an ailment took him to College General, a seminary in Penang in the Malay Peninsula, for his studies. The college had been an important seminary and sanctuary for Asian seminarians, especially Vietnamese ones, since the nineteenth century.

When Tam returned to Saigon, the Chinese Catholic community was already established. As French colonization of the southern part of Vietnam began in the latter half of the nineteenth century, the central area of Saigon-Cholon saw an influx of Chinese immigrants.

In 1866, Admiral Pièrre de la Grandière, the governor of Cochinchina, was impressed with the church congregation and gave them land to build a bigger church. The new building was the first church of the Chinese Catholic community in southern Vietnam.

After 1879, the church was managed by a Father Brillet and the number of ethnic Vietnamese devotees started increasing. In 1881, he built a chapel for them next to the Chinese church. Later, in 1898, the Vietnamese group started to use the building of the Chinese church and the diocese became a Vietnamese diocese. The Chinese and Vietnamese congregations then became divided in Cholon.

Tam was ordained a Catholic priest in Saigon on 30 November 1882, after which he worked in the Saigon diocese for sixteen years. During that period, he was vice-priest of the cathedral in Saigon. In 1898, he was asked to go to Cholon by the bishop in Saigon, who was at the time concerned about the decline of ethnic Chinese Catholics there. Tam was to take care of the spiritual health of forty Chinese believers residing in Cholon.

Tam developed a plan to build a Chinese Church in Cholon, and found a desirable piece of land in the centre of Cholon. However, as its owners were either in China or Southeast Asia, it was very difficult to reach an agreement with them to buy the land. Nevertheless he succeeded in acquiring it and soon began the construction of the church that was named after St Francisco de Xavier. On 3 December 1900, on the holy day of St Francisco de Xavier, the ceremony to lay the cornerstone of the church was held. The building was completed in 1902.

Although there was no single donor who was prominently known to have contributed to church projects then, the inscriptions on a tablet on the wall inside the church record that more than two hundred Chinese individuals and shops contributed to its construction in a fund-raising event initiated by Tam. The inscriptions on two plates at the entrance of the building further signify that there were several groups of Chinese devotees classified by their native places in China, such as Guangdong and Fujian.

At the turn of the twentieth century, more Chinese children were baptised, as Tam established a school and an orphanage for them. However, the overall number of Chinese believers remained stable because many Chinese children were raised in their native villages in China, and overseas Chinese men were also not settled in one place. The Chinese Catholics numbered about four hundred.

In 1932, the golden jubilee of the Father Tam Assou's ordination was celebrated on a large scale in Cholon. Tam died two years later on 24 January 1934 in Cholon. The church is situated in the centre of Cholon, and is fondly called "Nhà thờ Cha Tam", which means "the church of Father Tam" in Vietnamese. In Chinese, the church is called "Sheng Xin Tang" (圣心堂), which means "the church managing the School of Sacred Heart". The church of Father Tam is still the central place for Chinese Catholics in Ho Chi Minh City. It is the only Chinese parish in the city where its priest is responsible for pastoral work relating to ethnic Chinese residents over the entire country of Vietnam. It has been estimated that in Ho Chi Minh City, there are 2,800 Chinese Catholics.

At the entrance of the church, one will be able to see decorative plates in Chinese that were donated by Chinese devotees on the opening of the church. Beneath them lies the gravestone of Father Tam Assou. A room exhibiting historical relics of the church stands next to the church, in another building. In 1963, Ngô Đình Diệm (president of the Republic of Vietnam, 1955–63) was in the church just before his assassination. The seat he used for his prayers has been preserved inside the church and labelled with a plate that explains the historical event. The church therefore attracts many tourists besides Catholics.

Several Chinese priests who have connections with the church and seminary are active in Vietnam and abroad. For example, Father Pièrre Lam Minh (1953–), the present emeritus bishop of the Diocese of Hong Kong, is a graduate from the School of Sacred Heart and Chinese seminary in Cholon. Father Lam Minh had been both impressed by the establishment of the Chinese seminary in Cholon in the 1960s and inspired by the fact that a Chinese man, such as Tam, could become a Catholic priest. Tam Assou is a historical hero for the local Chinese Catholics in the southern region of Vietnam.

Tan Ah Tah

(陈亚达, Chen Yada, 1906–76)

Judge, Singapore

Tan Ah Tah was the first Asian to be appointed to the Singapore High Court.

Tan Ah Tah was born in Penang in 1906, the eldest son of Mr and Mrs Tan Chin Kim. The elder Tan served in the Government for 36 years and retired as an accountant of the Labour Office. Other than Tan Ah Tah, Tan Chin Kim had two younger sons, Ah Ee and Ah Fee. In 1933, he was awarded the Imperial Service Medal. Ah Tah was educated first at Victoria Institution in Kuala Lumpur before proceeding to the Penang Free School in 1918 to continue his studies. In 1925, he won the prestigious Queen's Scholarship (along with schoolmate Tuey Say Koo) and proceeded to study at Christ's College in Cambridge where he graduated with a BA and LLB. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1930, and called to the Bar of the Straits Settlements on 10 August 1932. He practised at the Penang law firm of Logan, Ross & Samuel for the next 10 years, before joining the Straits Settlements Legal Service in 1940.

On 30 October 1935, he married Choo Yu Keun, youngest daughter of Mr & Mrs Choo Kia Peng of Kuala Lumpur. The elder Choo was a prominent tin miner and had served as President of the Selangor Miners' Association. He was awarded the CBE (Commander of the British Empire) medal by the Colonial Government for his services to the business community. The wedding took place at Ampang House, home of the Choos. The best man at the wedding was Tan Teow Bok (later co-founder of the law firm, Shook Lin & Bok).

Tan's first appointment in the Legal Service was as Assistant Registrar of Companies, Deputy Commissioner for Estate Duties and Deputy Commissioner of Stamps, Straits Settlements. Tan was in service for only slightly more than a year before the Japanese invaded Malaya. He remained in his post throughout the Japanese Occupation and was put in charge of the Estate Duty Office. Following Liberation in August 1945, Tan was put in charge of the Stamp Office.

After civil government was restored in 1946, Tan resumed his duties and was appointed Commissioner of Estate Duties, the first local-born Chinese to hold a post previously only held by Malayan Civil Service officers. In October 1947, Tan Ah Tah, together with Tan Thoon Lip, became the first two Chinese to be admitted to the Colonial Legal Service, the premier service. In July 1948, he was made Third District Judge in place of his old friend Alfred V. Winslow. He held the post for slightly over three months, before he was made First District Judge and First Magistrate, in place of E.P. Shanks. Between 1949 and 1953, Tan was transferred among several posts, serving as: Criminal District Judge, First Magistrate, and Civil District Judge.

In July 1954, Tan became the first Asian to be appointed to the Supreme Court bench when he was made Acting Puisne Judge in place of Justice E.N. Taylor who was set to go on two months' leave. He was confirmed as Puisne Judge in May 1955. In February 1956, he was one of three judges appointed to sit in the newly-constituted Public Security Appeals Tribunal (the others being Justice E.N. Taylor and Justice J.W.D. Ambrose). This tribunal had been established under the Preservation of Public Security Ordinance.

Tan Ah Tah made legal history once more in August 1958 when, upon the retirement of the incumbent Chief Justice, Sir John Whyatt, he assumed duties as Acting Chief Justice. He was sworn in on 18 August 1958 by Governor Sir William Goode. By this time, Singapore was headed towards self-government and it was widely expected that Tan would be self-governing Singapore's first Asian Chief Justice. It thus came as a shock to the bar when it was announced in November that year, that the colonial government intended to appoint Sir Alan Rose as the new Chief Justice of Singapore. Almost immediately there were loud protests. Together with two of his colleagues, Professor Lionel A. Sheridan, Head of the Department of Law at the University of Malaya, who, with two of his colleagues protested the appointment in a letter to the Straits Times. Later, an extraordinary meeting of Singapore lawyers was called on 29 November 1958 to protest against Sir Alan's appointment as Chief Justice, the first time lawyers had ever protested against the appointment of any judge.

The Secretary of State justified the appointment of Sir Alan on the grounds that a permanent appointment to 'this important post' should await the advice of the incoming Prime Minister when he had an opportunity to give it his full consideration. Sir Alan Rose arrived in Singapore on 6 January 1959 to take up his new appointment. He had been Chief Justice of Ceylon up till 1955 and was on leave from his appointment as Chairman of the Medical Appeals Tribunal in the UK. Tan Ah Tah never became Chief Justice. When Sir Alan retired in January 1963, Wee Chong Jin was appointed Chief Justice while Tan remained Senior Puisne Judge. In January 1964, when Singapore was part of the Federation of Malaysia, Tan was appointed a judge of the Federal Court — which is an appeals court — in Kuala Lumpur.

Upon reaching the mandatory retirement age of 65 in 1971, Tan retired from the bench. The Constitution was amended to allow the President to appoint judges on contract terms after they reached retirement age. Tan's service was thus extended, and he retired for the second time on 29 November 1975. Numerous tributes were paid to him upon his retirement. All those who knew him thought that he had the perfect judicial temperament — courteous, kind, polite, dignified and with a good listening ear. Beyond his judicial service, Tan was active in two other organizations: the Singapore Old Frees Association, an old-boys' society for former students of the Penang Free School; and the Stamford District Scout Association. He served as President of the latter from 1973 till his death on 12 August 1976. Tan was survived by his wife Choo Yu Keun, his daughter Eileen Tan Siew Lean; and his two sons: Cheng Lim (a doctor) and Cheng Guan (a lawyer). Cheng Guan also studied at Cambridge and was called to the Bar by his own father in 1965.

Tan Chay Yan

(陈齐贤, Chen Qixian, 1871–1916)

Pioneer rubber planter, merchant, Singapore

Tan Chay Yan is best remembered as the pioneer in commercializing the cultivation of rubber in Asia. Back in 1895, he brought in the now historic nine seedlings from the Singapore Botanical Garden and planted them in a 43-acre piece of land in Bukit Lintang, Malacca. Nobody took Tan's venture seriously until he exported his first shipment of 450kg of rubber sheets overseas in 1904. His pioneering effort brought immense prosperity not only to his family, but also to British Malaya and then later the Federation of Malaya. By the year 1920, the rubber industry had become the backbone of British Malaya with 2.2 million acres planted with rubber. The British Government officially acknowledged Tan's first plantation as the first rubber plantation in Malaya and Asia. In Singapore, he also invested in a rubber plantation in Choa Chu Kang together with other prominent Chinese businessmen such as Lim Boon Keng, Lee Choon Guan, and Tan Jiak Kim. For his contributions to rubber plantations and also his philanthropic activities, two roads were named after him respectively in Malacca and Singapore; namely, Jalan Tan Chay Yan in Malacca (formerly known as Jalan Kampong Empat), and Chay Yan Street in Tiong Bahru, Singapore.

Tan was born in 1871 in a prominent Peranakan (Straits-born Chinese) family which traditionally engaged in the property and land business, as well as tapioca plantations in Malacca. He was the eldest son of Tan Teck Guan and a grandson of Tan Tock Seng (1795–1850) who was a well known philanthropist and businessman in Malaya and Singapore. Tan Chay Yan's ancestors came originally from the Hai Cheng district of Fujian Province in China and married with local Peranakan in Malacca. Tan was brought up in Malacca and educated at the Malacca High School. He did exceptionally well in his studies, but his main interest was in plants and gardens. He was probably influenced by his father who excelled in gardening and, in fact, specialized in the cultivation of orchids. Tan's interest in rubber began when he met Henry Ridley in England. Ridley was a botanist, a geologist, and the first scientific director of Singapore Botanical Gardens between 1888 and 1991. He spent many years promoting rubber, which was native to South America, as a commercial product in Ceylon and Malaya. When Ridley arrived in Singapore, he strongly encouraged Tan to venture into rubber planting. Tan was convinced and then took the historic nine seedlings from Singapore to Malacca where he converted his ancestral tapioca plantations into rubber estates. His experiment turned out to be a great success. From there, he went one step further by establishing the Malacca Rubber and Tapioca Company to plant rubber on a bigger scale, totalling 4,300-acre land at Bukit Asahan, Malacca. When the rubber plantation turned out to be another success, he sold the rubber estate to a European firm called the Malacca Rubber Plantation. With these achievements in rubber planting, he fervently encouraged other Chinese businessmen to invest in rubber planting in Malaya and Singapore, and could well take credit for his immense contribution to promoting rubber planting and its commercialization in Malaysia. As a result, the rubber industry is one of the mainstays of the Malaysian economy till today.

With his increasing wealth in rubber planting, he, like his contemporaries, diversified his business into finance and insurance. He was the first chairman of the Eastern United Assurance Corporation, a position he held till his death in 1916.

Like his grandfather, Tan was also a philanthropist in the region. Among his philanthropic activities, the most outstanding one was his donation ($15,000) to the construction of a building named after his father in a medical school in Singapore. The medical school was to become the King Edward VII Medical School, the forerunner of the University of Singapore's Medical Faculty. In Malacca, he also donated a huge sum of money for education. In fact, he co-founded Pei Fong High School which is situated at Jalan Tan Chay Yan, the road named after him. Pei Fong High School is now a renowned independent Chinese high school in Malacca.

Tan was equally active in politics and public service. As young as twenty-one years old, he was already appointed by the Straits Settlement Government to the Malacca Municipal Council. Three years later, he was made a Justice of Peace for his contribution in public service. In 1900, he was appointed by the government to be a member of the Malacca Sanitary Board. In the meantime, he was equally active in politics. When Tan Jiak Kim, Seah Liang Seah, Lim Boon Keng, and Song Ong Siang set up the Straits Chinese British Association (SCBA) in Singapore on 17 August 1900, he responded by establishing the Malacca branch of the association in October 1900. The association was a political and cultural association of the Chinese Peranakan in the Straits Settlements of Malacca, Penang, and Singapore, which provided a platform for the Straits-born Chinese to voice their views on politics, and also championed their rights. Ironically, Tan was also active in China-centric nationalism. In 1906, he became a founding member of the Malacca branch of Dr Sun Yat Sen's Tung Meng Hui, which advocated the overthrowing of the Qing Dynasty in China and was a predecessor of the Kuomintang Nationalist Party later.

In 1916, Tan was seriously ill with malaria because of the long hours spent in his rubber plantations. Unfortunately he did not recover and died at the age of forty-six in Malacca, leaving behind his wife, six daughters and a son. His wife, Chua Wan Neo, who belonged to the tenth generation of Nyonya in Malacca, was the only Chinese woman recipient of the King George V Silver Jubilee Medal in 1936. His son, Robert Tan Boon Siang, who was the former president of the Malayan Orchid Society, developed a new hybrid of orchid variety and named it Vanda Tan Chay Yan in honour of his father. The hybrid won the highest award given by the Royal Horticultural Society of the United Kingdom at the Chelsea Flower Show in 1954.

Tan Chee Khoon, David

(陈志勤, Chen Zhiqin, 1919–96)
Opposition party leader, Malaysia

Few politicians in Malaysia commanded the deep respect from all sides that Tan Sri Dr Tan Chee Khoon did throughout his political career. A staunch multiracialist, he was often given the honorific, "Conscience of the Nation".

Born on 4 March 1919 to humble Hokkien immigrants in Cheras outside Kuala Lumpur — his father came from a Methodist family and his mother was an Anglican — Tan was the second son in a close-knit family with five children. In 1932, when he was thirteen years old, he accidentally pushed a knife into his left eye. It had to be replaced with a prosthesis.

An ardent reader of books on history, Middle Eastern history, and military history, Tan was educated at Kajang High School and Victoria Institution. He failed to win the Queen's Scholarship in 1938, but managed nevertheless to begin studies at Singapore's King Edward VII College in medicine on smaller scholarships.

When the Japanese Occupation interrupted his studies, he went back to Kuala Lumpur. During the war, he married Liew Fong Ying and, by the time he was back at college after the war, the couple already had a son. Between 1947 and 1949, the college's students' union elected him as treasurer, vice-president, and president successively. Later in life Tan established a series of scholarships at his old schools, most of them named after his parents, Tan Chin Ghee and Tay Kim Siew.

He developed his general practice into the Sentosa Medical Centre, and remained a keen Christian all his life, being active in the Kuala Lumpur Methodist Church where he fought for its Malayanization, until health reasons forced him to slow down in 1976. He was also deeply involved in the Malaysian Medical Association, of which he became president in 1967.

Between 1959 and 1971, Tan was on the council of the University of Malaya. He was involved in several memorable clashes, including the selection of the university's first professor of economics. He strongly and successfully supported Dr Ungku Aziz against Professor Thomas Silcock's candidacy. When he left as chairman, the university awarded him a doctor of laws degree.

Tan's involvement in politics began when he joined the Selangor branch of the Labour Party in 1952, encouraged by his old schoolmate, Lee Moke Sang. Lee became the first chairman of the national Labour Party of Malaya when this was formed in 1954. He helped prepare the party's memorandum to the Reid Commission, whose terms of reference for formulating a parliamentary democracy had been provided by Tunku Abdul Rahman, Malaya's first prime minister.

Although Tan became chairman of the Kuala Lumpur branch of the party in 1956, and the party's national treasurer in 1959, he did not run in general elections until 1964. He headed the Selangor Selection Committee of the Socialist Front in 1959, when it won five parliamentary seats in the state. Between 1964 and 1978, he served three terms as Member of Parliament for Batu, and state assemblyman for Kepong, though, interestingly, as representative for different parties each time. He was also the official leader of the opposition in parliament during that period.

Tan helped found Parti Gerakan Rakyat Malaysia in 1968 after the Labour Party, by now strongly radicalized towards the left, decided to boycott the approaching elections. Gerakan turned out to be hugely successful in the 1969 general elections due to a successful electoral agreement with other opposition parties, winning eight parliamentary seats and twenty-six state seats. For various reasons, Tan's announcement on May 13 that Gerakan would not form an opposition coalition in Selangor, and instead wanted the ruling Malay party to form the state government, was delayed and made public on Malaysian TV only late in the day. Some believe that an earlier announcement would have defused the tense situation sufficiently to avoid the racial clashes that took place that evening.

Top-level infighting in Gerakan prompted Tan to leave in 1971 and he reluctantly founded a new non-communal party, Parti Keadilan Masyarakat (Pekemas). He refused to be enticed into joining the ruling coalition, and purportedly also rejected an offer to become chief minister of the state of Penang should he agree to cross the political divide. He also rejected a request from the government for Pekemas to join the ruling coalition and refrained from contesting in Sabah state in 1974.

As MP, Tan was prone to using quotes from the Bible, which gained him a reputation as a religious person, and the title of "preacher" from Tunku Abdul Rahman. He became popularly known as Mr Opposition, and was famed for his courage, compassion, integrity, and deep sense of justice.

In November 1976 he suffered a stroke that forced him to retire from politics and many other commitments. Over the years, Tan refused several awards from the political establishment, but in 1980, accepted the Panglima Setia Mahkota (PSM) from the king, which carried the title of "Tan Sri". He was also awarded the Datuk Paduka Mahkota Selangor (DPMS) by the sultan of Selangor.

With this new respectability, Tan was asked to write for the mainstream press. He consented and his weekly column for The Star, titled, "Without Fear or Favour", was well received. His topics were largely about multiracialism and democracy, as well as interviews with prominent politicians. But after more and more of his writings were censored or stopped by the editors, he let the column die after four years, and concentrated instead on writing his memoirs. His column in the Chinese Nanyang Siang Pau also suffered the same fate.

The award that Tan showed particular delight in receiving was that of "Outstanding Malaysian", given him by the human rights group, Aliran, in 1984. The citation for the occasion stated: "Truth and progress can be hindered or hampered but only temporarily; their victory is inevitable. The question is whether man himself is prepared to fight for truth. People like Dr Tan, because they are not afraid to stand up against existing power structures, have earned for themselves a noble role in the march of civilization."

Tan passed away on 14 October 1996 at the age of seventy-seven.

Tan Chee Yioun, Vincent

(陈志远, Chen Zhiyuan, 1952–)
Leading businessman, Malaysia

Vincent Tan is one of the new breed of prominent Chinese businessmen to emerge in Malaysia in the New Economic Policy era. Known for his close connections to influential officials and politicians, he became chairman and chief executive officer of Berjaya Corporation Berhad, a diversified conglomerate which controlled a wide array of businesses in leisure and gaming, property and construction, vacation, hotels and resorts, insurance, investment holdings, food and beverages, telecommunications, and manufacturing.

Born in Batu Pahat in 1952, Johor, Vincent Tan was the fourth child in a family of six sons and a youngest daughter. His father had migrated from Eng Choon Prefecture in Fujian, China, to British Malaya before the Second World War. After working for a number of years, Tan's father used his savings to start and operate a small transportation company. Although he wanted to study law, Tan had to start working after finishing his English secondary school education in 1970 because his father could not afford to pay for his tertiary education. His first job was as a clerk with the United Malayan Banking Corporation. While working as a bank clerk, Tan also moonlighted as an insurance agent for the American International Assurance in the evening to supplement his income. Because of his natural flair for making deals, Tan did so well in selling insurance that he decided to do it full-time in 1972 and before long was promoted at age twenty-one to be an agency supervisor.

By the end of the 1970s, the ambitious Tan decided to strike out on his own in the Klang Valley, the political and economic hub of the country. In quick succession he ventured into a series of businesses in retail, transport, real estate, car importing, and a joint undertaking with Tokyo Marine & Fire Insurance in insurance. His first major break came in 1981 when he won the franchise to bring McDonald's fast food restaurants into Malaysia, after having first contacted them in 1973 when he read about the company in Fortune magazine. His winning the McDonald franchise over other powerful and well established Malaysian business groups enhanced his credibility in business and political circles. By 2008, besides expanding the McDonald franchise to more than 180 restaurants all over Malaysia, Tan had also added several other companies to his food and beverage business, including the American Roasters Grill, Starbucks, and 7-Eleven franchises.

In the mid-1980s, he emerged as a member of an exclusive group of businessmen who were closely connected to powerful politicians and influential civil servants, especially Mahathir Mohammed (prime minister, 1981–2004) and Daim Zainuddin (minister of finance 1984–91). Influenced by the successes of the Japanese zaibatsu and Korean chaebol business models, the Mahathir administration handpicked a coterie of businessmen to establish, develop, and operate huge Malaysian business conglomerates; Tan was one of those handpicked businessmen. He was thus given favourable access to major privatization projects without tender, soft or government-guaranteed loans for business acquisitions, and expansions, and other perks and privileges. Besides his political and bureaucratic links, Tan without fail would include Malay partners in most of his business ventures, thus fulfilling the NEP's Bumiputra quota objective.

Tan's first major business foray with Malay business partnership was the acquisition of a 38 per cent interest in Berjaya Corporation, whose principal activity was the manufacturing of wire products in 1984. Renamed Berjaya Group, it became his holding company for his ever expanding business empire. The critical phase in the development of his business empire was Tan's biggest coup — when he successfully negotiated with the Mahathir administration in 1985 to privatize the state-run Sports Toto lottery — to Berjaya without any open tendering process. Berjaya bought up 70 per cent of Sports Toto, and Tan listed the company on the Kuala Lumpur Stock Exchange in 1987. Within days the share price of Sports Toto rose fivefold and Tan used this opportunity to raise funds by reducing his ownership percentage. In 1990, Tan gained full control of the lucrative Sports Toto operation through a series of controversial manoeuvres. Indeed, over the years Sports Toto has become the main cash cow for Tan to expand his Berjaya Group into a huge, diversified, and ever changing business conglomerate.

From the mid-1980s until the Asian Financial crisis in 1997, Tan rapidly built up his business empire through a dizzy myriad of shares-for-assets swaps, takeovers, and reverse takeovers, frequently with the support of, or in collusion with influential UMNO politicians or well connected Malay businessmen. The economic depression years in the mid-1980s provided excellent opportunities for a well connected and funded businessman such as Tan to acquire financially distressed companies relatively cheaply. By the mid-1990s, he had emerged as one of the most successful of Malaysia's growing class of politically connected business tycoons.

Under the holding company, Cosway, Tan expanded into the manufacturing of personal care and household products, and distribution of cosmetics, toiletries, and fashion jewellery, and durable consumer goods, and, in the 2000s, also the distribution of audiovisual and children's educational products. Berjaya also bought a number of real estate and leisure businesses such that by the mid-1990s it had emerged as a strong player in the country's hotel and resort vacation industry, with holdings including the Bukit Tinggi Resort in Pahang. In the real estate sector, Berjaya successfully increased its land banks holding, especially in the Klang Valley. In 1995, Tan launched a massive shopping, entertainment, and leisure centre project named Berjaya Times Square in the central business district of Kuala Lumpur. While the Times Square project was launched in 1995, its progress was stalled by the Asian Financial Crisis in 1997 and was only completed in 2003.

Tan was also the recipient of a number of privatized services and companies that the government implemented without any open tendering process. In 1994, the government awarded him the concession to operate the national sewerage system through a build-operate-transfer (BOT) arrangement. Tan established Indah Water Konsortium Sdn Bhd to run the national sewerage system, but the company incurred losses without fail until it was later renationalized. In the mid-1990s, because of increased car ownership and escalating traffic congestion in the Klang Valley, the government decided to build a light-rail transit system and Berjaya was one of three independent companies selected to participate in the project. Tan's KL Monorail (previously known as Peoplemover Rapid Transit — PRT) opened in 2003, but was eventually renationalized in 2007 because of the company's escalating debts. However, Tan was more fortunate with the telecommunication concessionaire he was awarded in 1995 which he successfully developed into Malaysia's third largest mobile phone operator, and number one in prepaid services sales by the early 2000s.

Like all of Mahathir's handpicked businessmen, in the aftermath of the Asian Financial Crisis in 1997, Tan was faced with soaring debt levels at the beginning of the 2000s. To address his financially distressed situation, he controversially managed to get the government in 2000 to renationalize his loss-making company, Indah Water Konsortium Sdn. Bhd. Tan was also forced to embark on the controversial, extensive restructuring of his Berjaya Group by transferring most of the former company's assets into a new vehicle. In exchange shareholders and investors were given one share in the new company for every four shares they had previously held. He sweetened the deal by adding a number of his personal assets, such as part of the Times Square development. Indeed, the manner in which he managed to extricate himself from the adverse impact of the Asian Financial Crisis demonstrated his astute survival skills. By 2003 not only had Tan recovered from the financial crisis, but was already beginning to expand his business empire again.

His many critics have questioned Tan's strong relationship with the government and his answer to them was: "It's only prudent for a businessman to be friendly with the government of the day, but I'm not into politics and our companies are well run." Indeed, for Tan, his close relationship with influential politicians and well connected Malay businessmen has been a very profitable investment.

Tan Chee-Beng

(陈志明, Chen Zhiming, 1950–)

Anthropologist, researcher, scholar, Malaysia

Tan Chee-Beng who was born in Batu Pahat in 1950 is professor and head of the Department of Anthropology at the Chinese University of Hong Kong. He has made major anthropological contributions to the study of ethnography of the Chinese community in Malaysia and beyond. He is multilingual and highly proficient in Chinese, English, and Malay. Besides teaching and coaching young scholars in the field of anthropology, he has written and published extensively.

A renowned scholar in the field of cultural studies and ethnic relations, Tan is a highly reputable anthropologist who has shown special interest in the unique cultural identity of ethnic Chinese communities. His anthropological studies include the Baba in Malacca; and the Hui Hui and Chinese Peranakan in Terengganu.

He is best known for his in-depth knowledge of the Baba community, which is a subethnic group of the Chinese Malaysians. He has revived the terminology Peranakan to refer to the highly integrated Chinese community in Terengganu and Kelantan who experienced acculturation in terms of language, daily customs, and a consciousness of identity, as a result of living with the Malay people in Peninsular Malaysia.

In 1974, Tan obtained a Bachelor of Social Science (Hons.) degree from the University of Science Malaysia in Penang. Later he left for the University of Cornell in the United States, where he was conferred a Master of Arts (M.A.) degree two years later. During his pursuit of a Ph.D. degree, he conducted a seventeen-month fieldwork, observing the anthropological aspects of the Baba Nyonya community. In 1979, he obtained his Ph.D. in Anthropology with a thesis entitled, "Baba and Nyonya: A Study of the Ethnic Identity of the Chinese Peranakan in Malacca".

Tan was a lecturer in the National University of Singapore from 1979 to 1980. On his return to Malaysia, he taught at the Department of Chinese Studies, University of Malaya, from 1980 to 1996. During that period, he was promoted to associate professor of the Department of Anthropology and Sociology and was the head of "Project of Ethnic Relations Studies", initiated by the Faculty of Arts and Social Science of the same university. In 1997, he joined Hong Kong Chinese University and is now a professor and head of the Department of Anthropology and Sociology.

Tan has been the project director for "East-Asian Cultural Relations and Identity" and the Editor-in-chief for Journal of Asian Anthropology. He has also been co-editor and later editor of Journal of Chinese Overseas (Singapore). His scope of research includes topics such as cultural transformation and identity, Chinese religious beliefs, the development of Chinese Peranakan, Overseas Chinese, the cultural identity of Hong Kong and China.

As an internationally recognized scholar, Tan has published fifteen books on various topics concerning the Chinese community in Malaysia and Singapore. Although he often writes in English, his works are also translated and appreciated in the Chinese and Malay languages. For example, The Development and Distribution of Dejiao Associations in Malaysia and Singapore has been translated into the Chinese language. His passion for constructing a theoretical framework to understand the Chinese ethnic identity proves to be a constant motivator for younger scholars to venture into similar areas of study.

His interest in studying the ethnic minorities was evident when he conducted a research and co-authored a book entitled, Three studies on the Orang Asli in Ulu Perak with two other authors, Mohd. Razha b. Hj. Abd Rashid and Syed Jamal Jaafer. He worked on this when he was still an undergraduate student in 1973.

In 1988, Tan authored two important monographs: The Hui Hui (Chinese Muslims) in Terengganu; and The Baba of Melaka: Culture and Identity of a Chinese Peranakan Community in Malaysia. The latter was based on seventeen months of fieldwork in Malacca and was indeed an eye-opener for researchers and readers who have an interest in acculturation and the study of comparative culture. His research provided fresh insights and perspectives for many to examine the Baba culture and identity. Malaysian society began to realize that the Baba community preserved Chinese cultural traits despite acculturation with the Malay community.

With his vast knowledge of the traditional Chinese religions, he edited The Preservation and Adaptation of Tradition: Studies of Chinese Religious Expression in Southeast Asia (1990) and Bibliography on Ethnic Relations: With special reference to Malaysia and Singapore (1992). In 1997, drawing on some of these examples, he published a book entitled, Ethnic Groups, Ethnogenesis and Ethnic Identities.

In 2000, Tan co-edited The Chinese in Malaysia with Lee Kam Hing. This comprehensive monograph provides an informative description and analysis of the development of the nationals of Chinese descent in Malaysia. In the Preface to The Chinese in Malaysia, Lee Kam Hing and Tan Chee-Beng wrote, "Our hope is that the volume succeeds in showing that there has emerged a community of Malaysians but of Chinese origin which the term Chinese Malaysians emphasizes." The cultural diversity, religious practices, and ethnic identity of Chinese Malaysians have always attracted his attention even after he left Malaysia and worked at the Chinese University of Hong Kong in the late 1990s.

His passion for the people in Malaysia also included the indigenous people in Sarawak and he has worked closely with the indigenous communities and produced a monograph on the communal associations of the indigenous communities of Sarawak.

Tan has contributed to the study of the family and religious lives of the Chinese in Malaysia and Asia. His work on the Baba, Peranakan in Terengganu, Hui Hui and other indigenous people in Sarawak has greatly enhanced anthropological knowledge of the Chinese in Southeast Asia. He has made contributions to the Malaysian anthropology field by providing theoretical perspectives on the ethnogenesis and ethnic identities of these minority groups.

In 2003, he published Chinese Minority in a Malay State: The Case of Terengganu in Malaysia. Of late, Tan's research interest has been on the identity of the Chinese in China. In 2004, he wrote Chinese Overseas: Comparative Cultural Issues. His many years of research on cultural change and Chinese ethnicity in Southeast Asia have enabled him to examine the effects of localization and its impact on the identity construction of the Chinese overseas.

He has also conducted research on Quanzhou and Yongchun (both in Minnan and Southern Fujian), of which he is a descendant. In 2006, he published a book entitled, Southern Fujian: Reproduction of Traditions in Post-Mao China. In 2007, Tan wrote Chinese Overseas: Migration, Research and Documentation.

Besides anthropological research, Tan has co-authored several books on popular foodways in Asia. In 2001, he co-authored Changing Chinese Foodways in Asia. In 2007, he co-authored with Sidney C.H. Cheung, Food and Foodways in Asia: Resource, Tradition and Cooking. His latest publication is entitled, The World of Soy.

In conclusion, Tan Chee-Beng's fieldwork has contributed theoretically to the understanding of Chinese in Southeast Asia, as well as Chinese in Fujian and Yunnan. His more recent contributions on migration, intermarriage, cultural reproduction, cultural heritage, cultural identity, religious belief, and sociolinguistics of China and the overseas Chinese are also prominent in the respective areas. His genuine passion for the communities under study continues to inspire local and foreign research interest to venture into the anthropological field of study.

Tan Cheng Lock

(陈祯禄, Chen Zhenlu, 1883–1960)
Politician, businessman, Malaysia

Tun Tan Cheng Lock was a founding member of the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA), and its first president from 1949 to 1958. He led MCA alongside the leaders of UMNO (United Malays National Organisation) and MIC (Malaysian Indian Congress) to gain Malaya's independence from the British in 1957.

A fifth-generation Malacca-born baba, Tan Cheng Lock, born 5 April 1883, studied at the Malacca High School and completed his secondary school education at the Raffles Institution in Singapore. He obtained his Cambridge School (Leaving) Certificate, but his hope of studying law at a university in the United Kingdom came to nought when he was not awarded a Queens Scholarship. Financial constraints compelled him to accept a position teaching English and literature at the Raffles Institution in Singapore in 1902. He returned to Malacca in 1908 to work as the assistant estate manager, Bukit Panjang Rubber Estates.

In 1913 he married Yeo Yoke Neo, the only daughter and heiress of a wealthy Malacca businessman. The couple had four daughters and one son, Tun Tan Siew Sin (陈修信), who later became the second and longest-serving finance minister of Malaya (later Malaysia). Tan Cheng Lock's nephew, Dr Goh Keng Swee (吴庆瑞), was finance minister, and later deputy prime minister of Singapore.

The British colonial administration, recognizing Tan's leadership potential, appointed him a Justice of the Peace in 1912 and a Malacca municipal commissioner from 1913 to 1922. In 1923, he was nominated an unofficial member of the Legislative Council of the Straits Settlements where he served until 1934, and of the Straits Settlements Governor's Executive Council from 1933 to 1935.

Tan devoted his life and resources to social and political reform in Malaya. His leadership and participation in many government committees and civil society activities were remarkable. In 1915 he helped to re-establish the Straits Chinese British Association (SCBA), and revive the Chinese Company of the Malacca Volunteer Company, in which he served as a volunteer private from 1915 to 1919. He was appointed a member of the Malacca Rural Board in 1916.

From 1926–32 he was vice-president of the Malacca Chinese Chamber of Commerce, and from 1947–51, its president. In 1927, he founded and became the first president of the Asiatic Planters' Association. From 1928–35, he was the president of the Malacca branch of the SCBA. In 1931 he founded and became the first president of the Malayan Estate Owners' Association. In the same year, he was a member of the Straits Settlements Rice Cultivation Committee. He was also a member of the Straits Settlements Trade Commission from 1933–34 and from 1949–52, he was a member of the University of Malaya Council.

Tan was also president of the Malacca Hokkien Community Association and patron of the Malacca Chiang Chew Hoo Association (the ancestors of whose members were the Chinese pioneers who first emigrated from China to Malaya some 500 years ago). As a trustee of the 300-year old Cheng Hoon Teng Temple (青云亭) dedicated to Kuan Yin, the Buddhist Goddess of Mercy, he persuaded the colonial government to pass an act (The Cheng Hoon Teng Temple Incorporation Ordinance, 1949) to protect the temple, the only religious institution in Malaysia to be given this distinction. He sat on many government committees, such as the Technical Education Committee, Trade Commission, Housing Committee, Committee on Destitution, Rubber Restriction Committee, and the Chinese Marriage Committee.

Concerned with the damaging effect of opium on the Chinese population, Tan agitated against its widespread use, and eventually had it banned. Opposed to the sale and enslavement of young Chinese maidens (mui tsai) recruited from mainland China, he moved to restrict their entry, and finally end the trade. He also enacted the Monogamous Marriage Act as he was against the irresponsible polygamous practices of the Chinese. After the Act was passed, he "married" his wife at the civil marriage registry. He helped Malay farmers and Indian plantation workers as well as the landless and squatters, but failed in his campaign to provide Chinese farmers with paddy land to produce rice on a commercial scale.

He respected honest work and paid tribute to the worker and "the masses" for their invaluable contributions to the country's development. He proposed minimum wages, and "a gigantic programme" of subsidized government public housing for poor and working people. Tan also suggested publicly-funded "homes for decrepits and the destitutes", and "free hospitals, clinics and dispensaries… for the benefit of the poor classes".

As a baba, Tan Cheng Lock could not speak any Chinese dialect or read or write Chinese. He spoke baba Malay and English, but was extremely proud of his Chinese heritage. Tan's ancestor, Tan Hay Kuan, first arrived in Malacca in 1771 and married a local Chinese woman.

Recognizing English as a lingua franca amongst all ethnic groups, and believing in the intrinsic value of education, he clamoured for free English elementary education, while also strongly supporting the provision of free Malay schools. He advocated for, but failed to gain, state funding for Chinese-language schools and education. But this failure did not undermine his firm belief that language underpins the survival of a culture. As MCA president, he ensured that Chinese schools, especially in the "new villages", were subsidized by the MCA.

Tan read widely and owned a large collection of eastern and western classics. He was rooted in Buddhist teaching, steeped in Confucian philosophy, and guided by their fundamental concepts, such as loyalty and filial piety, ancestral worship, observance of traditions, and close familial ties. While his world views and values — a blend of western and eastern philosophies — were largely influenced by his readings, his four-year sojourn with his family in Switzerland (to facilitate his wife's recovery from a debilitating illness) from 1935–39, and another four in India (from 1942–46 when he and his family evacuated to escape the Japanese Occupation of Malaya) reinforced his abiding faith in multiculturalism in a western-style democracy.

Tan had been criticized for abandoning the country at a critical time during the war. But he was vindicated subsequently by the fact that the Japanese had looked for him, as for other Chinese who were prominent public figures and businessmen, soon after they captured Malaya, to coerce them into raising funds for the Japanese war effort.

As early as 1926, at the meeting of the Straits Settlements Legislative Council on 1 November 1926, Tan, a nationalist and visionary, mooted the concept of self-government. But it was an uphill task for the Chinese population was divided by dialect, occupational and educational differences, as well as income. Tan repeatedly appealed to Malayan Chinese to sink their differences and declare their allegiance to Malaya and not China. In 1943, while in India, he founded the Overseas Chinese Association, the precursor of the MCA. There he wrote and sent to the Colonial Office in London his treaties entitled "Memorandum on the Future of Malaya" which laid out a model for an independent Malaya. He fought unsuccessfully against the dismantling of the Malayan Union set up in 1946, even resorting to using the hartal (closure of shops and offices — one of Indian nationalist Gandhi's tactics), and its imminent replacement by the Federation of Malaya in 1948. The same year, he attempted to reconstitute it into the Malayan Chinese League. His dream for Chinese unity culminated in the formation of the MCA on 27 February 1949 at a historic meeting with sixteen other Chinese leaders.

At the most crucial time in Malaya, he rallied the Malayan Chinese to oppose the communist insurgency, known as the "Emergency" that lasted for twelve years (1948–60). He mooted the idea of protecting vulnerable Chinese in small towns and rural areas from the influence, coercion, and attacks of the communist guerillas, a proposal later appropriated by the colonial administration into the "Briggs" plan that created "new villages" into which the Chinese were cordoned off. In these new villages, Tan and the MCA worked tirelessly to alleviate the hardship of the residents, by, for instance, providing agricultural land and building amenities and schools, which greatly helped to turn the odds against the Communist insurgents. Tan's strong stand against the communists made him a target; he was injured in a hand-grenade attack on 10 April 1949 during a speech he gave to MCA members in Ipoh. This incident did not deter his unrelenting anti-communist campaign. At the same time, it catapulted him into the mainstream of multiracial politics in which he was the acknowledged leader of Malayan Chinese who were anti-communists.

In October 1949, in his presidential address to the MCA, he reiterated his call for Malayan independence of "one country, one people, one government", expounding a peaceful and harmonious multiracial and democratic Malaya where all ethnic groups — Malays, Chinese, Indians, and others — would have equal rights. He recognized the handicap of the Malays in economic development and exhorted the Chinese and the MCA to initiate and support necessary measures to alleviate their disadvantage. The call for "one government" was because in the new Federation of Malaya structure, implemented in 1948, the British had left out Singapore. The Malaya he envisioned would include Singapore.

He later won the trust and support of the British, the Malay political elite, and other Chinese leaders, and this facilitated the negotiations that led to independence for Malaya. Tan and the MCA had fought successfully for citizenship eligibility for non-Malays, based on the principles of jus soli (right by birth), which thus increased the electoral franchise potential from 10 to 50 per cent. Amongst the rights he and the MCA bargained for were freedom of religious practice and the right to elementary mother-tongue education. In return it was agreed that Islam, the Malay language and the special position of the Malays, would be accorded official status in the Malayan Constitution.

The basis of these negotiations and bargaining was rooted in the informal Communities Liaison Committee that brought Tan together with other Malay, Chinese, and Indian leaders in late 1949 through to 1951.

Tan was awarded the Commander of the British Empire (CBE) by King George V in 1933. In 1952 he was knighted (Knight Commander of the Order of the British Empire — KBE) by King George VI, which carried the title "Sir". In 1949, the sultan of Johor honoured him with the award "Dato' Paduka Mahkota Johor" (DPMJ). In 1958 the Yang di-Pertuan Agong (King) of Malaya bestowed on him one of the country's highest awards, the Seri Maharaja Mangku Negara, with the title "Tun". His legacy has been commemorated through the Tun Tan Cheng Lock Scholarship, at the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, Singapore, by his daughters Alice Scott-Ross and Agnes Tan; the Assunta School of Nursing, Petaling Jaya, Malaysia, by his son Tun Tan Siew Sin; the Baba House in Singapore by Agnes Tan; and the Tun Tan Cheng Lock Memorial, by the National Archives of Malaysia. Two roads are named after him in Malacca and Kuala Lumpur.

Tun Tan Cheng Lock died in Malacca on 13 December 1960 at the age of seventy-seven. He was accorded a state funeral on 20 December, the first to a non-royalty.

Tan Chi'-Loong, Benedict

(陈智龙, Chen Zhilong, 1967–)
Sportsman, sailor, Singapore

An avid sailor, Benedict Tan received his education at the National University of Singapore and the Australian Institute of Sports. He is best known for excelling in both sailing and in the academic arena. Indeed, he pursued his studies in medicine simultaneously with his interest in sailing. Many still recall Dr Tan's adept juggling of his medical career as well as his competition at international level in the Laser Sailing.

Sailing since the age of 12, Dr Tan dedicated much of his time on and off the water to the development of what pundits have called his trademark consistency of performance. His systematic training and adroitness gave him a comfortable advantage in competitions. As a result, it was with relative ease that Dr Tan won the Laser Gold Medal in the 12th Asian Games in Hiroshima without needing to sail the last race. This win marked the end of a fourteen year medal drought in sailing for Singapore. He also won gold medals in sailing in four consecutive Southeast Asian (SEA) Games in Kuala Lumpur 1989, in Manila in 1991, Singapore 1993, and Chiang Mai in 1995.

His consistent performance and dedication to the sport of sailing were acknowledged at international platforms when he participated in the Laser World Championships and the International Yacht Racing Union (renamed the International Sailing Federation in 1996) World Championships. Dr Tan's competitive spirit and steady performance at those events kept him within the top 50 sailors in the official world rankings in 1995. He won the gold at the Laser World Championships in 1989, 1991, and 1993.

Due to his outstanding performance at Hiroshima and at various SEA Games, Dr Tan came to well respected in the sailing world. Singapore acknowledged his achievements by naming him Sportsman of the Year three times in 1992, 1995, and 1996. As a testament to his skill and consistency on the water, he managed to finish mid-fleet in a field of pre-qualified Olympic-level sailors in the hurricane-prone venue of the 1996 Olympic Games in Savannah in the United States.

For his outstanding performance at the Asian Games, Dr Tan was the first recipient of the $250,000 cash award from the Singapore National Olympic Council's Multi Million Dollar Award Programme. To honour his achievements in the sporting arena, the Singapore Government awarded him with the Public Service Medal in 1993, the Public Service Star in 1995, and the Singapore Youth Award in 1995. He was also formally inducted into the Singapore Sports Council Hall of Fame. His consistency on the water is still much admired today. Recently, Dr Tan was placed by Time Sport magazine in the top 10 on their Millennium Series on Singapore's Sporting Greats.

Although he is now retired from competitive sailing, Dr Tan continues to unite his passion for medicine as well as the sport in being a physician-cum-sports scientist for athletes. For much of his competitive sailing career, he was also a medical student. He did not allow either his academic pursuits or his sporting prowess to falter. He demonstrated his mettle at balancing both studies and sports when he clinched a gold medal in the Manila Southeast Asian Games in 1991 and graduated with his medical degree from the National University of Singapore in the same year. He followed up his education in medicine by reading a master's degree in Sports Medicine at the Australian Institute of Sport. This Master's degree was obtained in 1997. Still a keen sportsman, Dr Tan worked at the Sports Medicine and Research Centre of the Singapore sports so as to keep an eye on the health and wellbeing of the country's athletes. He also demonstrated his dedication to both sports and medicine when he served as Team Physician for the Singapore's sporting representatives at the 1998 and 2002 Asian Games, and the 1999 and 2001 Southeast Asian games. At present, he is the Medical Director of the Singapore Sports Medicine Centre as well as the Head and Senior Consultant Sports Physician at Changi Sports Medicine Centre in Changi General Hospital.

Dr Tan has maintained his passion for sailing even though he no longer competes in the sport. His book, Complete Introduction to Laser Sailing, is testament to both his love for the sport as well as his interest in introducing it to the general public. The book has been moderately successful and is sold worldwide. It has also been translated into Mandarin, Japanese and Polish. Currently, he still contributes to the Singapore sporting scene and the sport of sailing through his numerous appointments. At present, he is Vice-Chairman of the Medical Commission of the International Sailing Federation (ISAF), President of the Singapore Sailing Federation Executive Committee, Chairman of Athletes' Commission, executive committee member of the Singapore National Olympic Committee (SNOC), Chairman of the High Performance Sailing Committee, executive committee member of the Football Association of Singapore, Adviser to the Singapore Ice Skating Association, Chairman of the Sports Safety Committee, and Resource Panel member of the Government Parliamentary Committee (GPC) for the Ministry of Community Development, Youth and Sports (MCYS). He is also Sports Patron of the Singapore Disability Sports Council and former president of the Sports Medicine Association of Singapore, and Council Member of the Singapore Association for the Study of Obesity. He has published a popular book on weight loss management titled, 'Fight the fat — What You Must Know and Do to Lose Weight'. Likewise, his interest in sports medicine led him to publish original research material in international peer reviewed medical journals.

In honour of his contributions to the sports scene in Singapore, Dr Tan was presented with the NUS Outstanding Young Alumni Award in 2006. Presently, he keeps fit by running marathons recreationally. Since 2002, he has completed over ten marathons, including the Boston and Berlin Marathons. At the Standard Charted Singapore Marathon on 7 December 2008, Dr Tan completed the 42 kilometre run in 2 hours 56 minutes 20 seconds. It is a personal best time for him, and he was the third fastest Singapore runner in that marathon. He attributes his success in marathons to the structured support offered by training partners. His achievements in sailing, medicine, and marathons have cemented Dr Tan's place in Singapore sporting history as an all-round high achiever. Indeed, Dr Tan still continues to inspire many young Singaporeans today with the dream that is possible to juggle both academia and sports at the same time.

Tan Chin Tuan

(陈振传, Chen Zhenchuan, 1908–2005)
Banker, political leader, philanthropist, Singapore

A man of many facets, Tan Chin Tuan was best remembered for his long-time chairmanship of the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC). He was also active in public affairs, being a member of the Straits Chinese British Association, the Straits Settlements (Singapore) Association, Municipal Commission, and the Chinese Chamber of Commerce.

Tan Chin Tuan was born in Singapore on 21 November 1908 to Tan Cheng Siong and Lee Guay Eng. He was educated first at Methodist Girls' School and then at Anglo-Chinese School where he completed his Junior Cambridge Certificate. Owing to the sudden death of his father, Tan left school after this to start work at the Chinese Commercial Bank on 1 March 1925, starting out as a clerk and then being promoted through the ranks. When the Chinese Commercial Bank merged with the Overseas Chinese Bank and Ho Hong Bank to form the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation in 1932, Tan was appointed manager of the bank's property arm, Eastern Realty Company. In 1933, he became the company's managing director.

Like many ambitious and politically conscious Straits-born Chinese, Tan joined the Straits Chinese British Association (SCBA) as well as the Straits Settlements (Singapore) Association. In August 1939, he was invited to serve on the Municipal Commission. When Britain declared war against the Axis Powers in 1939, the colonial government in Singapore established a Passive Defence Council to oversee the island's civil defence preparations. The Municipal Commission nominated Tan and Lazarus Rayman as their representatives on the council. Among other things, Tan helped Kenneth K. O'Connor draft the Passive Defence Regulations for the colony. He was also appointed Division Commander of the Passive Defence Force and tasked with recruiting local personnel for civil defence work, constructing air raid shelters, and supervising air raid drills.

With war looming on the horizon, OCBC's management decided to remit part of its funds, as well as a set of its records to the Bank of New South Wales in Australia (now Westpac Bank) for safekeeping. At the same time, Tan was appointed co-managing director of the bank with Tan Ean Kiam, and given the task of re-establishing and re-registering the bank in non-occupied British territory during the Japanese Occupation (1942–45). On 4 February 1942, Tan evacuated from Singapore and headed for Rangoon, but was eventually sent to Australia as the boat he was travelling in came under fire. He later registered OCBC's headquarters temporarily in India. After the war, Tan returned to Singapore and relocated the OCBC's headquarters there. He took over as the bank's sole managing director as Tan Ean Kiam had died during the war.

When civilian rule was re-established in 1946, he continued to play an active role in public affairs, being appointed to: the Governor's Advisory Council, the Singapore Legislative Council Reconstitution Committee; the Municipal Constitution Committee; the Finance and Revenue Committee; the Legislative Council; the Executive Council; the Singapore-Malaya Joint Co-ordination Committee and the Rendel Constitutional Commission. In 1947, Tan also became a justice of the peace. In 1951, he was appointed deputy president of the Legislative Council in 1951, the highest post open to a local person in Singapore then. As deputy president, Tan ranked second in protocol to the governor who was the president. He withdrew from public office to concentrate on his commercial responsibilities in 1955.

In recognition of his contributions to public service, Tan was made a Commander of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire (1951) and presented with the Queen's Coronation Medal (1953). He is credited with building OCBC into one of the world's soundest banks. The bank which started in 1932 with an issued capital of $10 million, saw its shareholders' funds soar from approximately $15 million in 1945, when Tan was sole managing director, to $70 million when he assumed chairmanship in 1966. By the time Tan retired in 1983, the funds had exceeded

$1.1 billion, and the bank's market capitalization stood at a then record $5.3 billion. Over the years the OCBC stable of companies included: Fraser and Neave, Malayan Breweries, Straits Trading Company, United Engineers Limited, and Wearnes Brothers Limited.

For his contributions to banking and finance, Tan was made the first Asian fellow of the Australian Institute of Management, and of the Institute of Bankers in London. In 1975, the OCBC commemorated fifty years of its service by endowing the Tan Chin Tuan Visiting Professorship in Banking and Finance in the University of Singapore. In 1991, the National University of Singapore (NUS) honoured Tan with an honorary Doctor of Law degree. The following year, the Curtin University of Technology in Australia conferred on Tan the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters, in recognition of his distinguished leadership in international banking and business. In 2005, the Tan Foundation of which he was life chairman donated $29 million to the National University of Singapore to endow four Tan Chin Tuan Centennial professorships. The administrative wing of the new university hall was named in his honour.

Tan died on 13 November 2005 after a brief illness. His wife, Helene Wee (the sixth daughter of banker Wee Theam Seng), whom he married on 18 September 1926, had predeceased him, as had his son, Keng Siong. He is survived by his two daughters, Kheng Lian and Kheng Choo, several grandchildren, and great-grandchildren.

Tan Chong Tin

(陈忠登, Chen Zhongdeng, 1948–)

Neurologist, medical educationist, Malaysia

Tan Chong Tin is a well known neurologist and dedicated medical educationist. He is also a clinical scientist who has made significant contributions in the research of Nipah virus encephalitis and other tropical neurological diseases and his research discoveries have been well received in Southeast Asia and the international arena. He holds several key positions in medical research such as professor of neurology at the University of Malaya, vice-president of the International League Against Epilepsy, and editor-in-chief of the Neurology Asia journal. He has also contributed to the Malaysian Chinese community at large and is is past president of the Centre for Malaysian Chinese Studies, and chairman of the Malaysia Bible Seminary.

Tan was born in Penang, Malaysia, in 1948, the eighth child of his parents' eleven children. His father, Tan Whye Choon, came from Fujian province in China and was a trader in hardware. The elder Tan passed away when Chong Tin was thirteen years old. Despite losing his father at an early age, Tan had already learnt the importance of discipline, integrity, and thrift from him.

He attended Chung Ling High School in Penang before heading to Australia to read medicine, and graduating with a bachelor degree in medicine and surgery (MBBS) from the University of Melbourne in 1972. After graduation, Tan returned to Malaysia and worked as houseman in Johore Bahru. He later worked as a medical officer in Internal Medicine in Kluang, Johore. In 1976, he left for Glasgow in the United Kingdom to take part in the Membership of the Royal College of Physicians (MRCP [UK]), a postgraduate medical diploma. After passing the examination, he remained in the United Kingdom and worked in Sheffield. Whilst there, he began his training in neurology. He returned to Malaysia in 1977 and joined the Department of Medicine at the University of Malaya as a lecturer. In 1982, he was a Commonwealth medical fellow in clinical neurophysiology and neurology at the Institute of Neurology, located in Queen Square in London which is one of the foremost neurological centres in the world. After much hard work, Tan obtained his doctorate of medicine from the University of Malaya. He was promoted to associate professor at the University of Malaya in 1984. By 1992, he had become a full professor. He has also been a senior professor at the University of Malaya since 2003.

During the time when Tan was at the University of Malaya, he became head of neurology in the early nineties. In the thirty years he has been there, he has helped shape the University Malaya Medical Centre as the premier neurology centre in Malaysia for patient care, teaching, and research. Tan's contribution also extends to the development of studies in neurology in the country. When he first joined the University of Malaya's teaching hospital, there were only a handful of neurologists in the country. And at the time, all these neurologists were located in Kuala Lumpur, the capital of Malaysia. By 2008, the number of neurologists in Malaysia had slowly grown to more than sixty. However, the neurologist to population ratio in Malaysia is still very low according to standards of the developed world. Tan has shaped the field of neurology in Malaysia, and many neurologists in the country have had some training with him. His general contribution to the development of neurological science studies in the country is also reflected in his role as chairman of the Accreditation Committee for Neurology in the National Specialist Register. He has had that post from the committee's formation to the present and is also one of the founders of the Malaysian Neuroscience Society as well as its former president.

Tan is also one of the leading clinical scientists in Malaysia and his most celebrated work is on Nipah virus encephalitis. The Nipah virus caused an outbreak of fatal encephalitis among pig farm workers in Malaysia and Singapore in 1999, resulting in billion-dollar losses in the pig farm related industry. The Faculty of Medicine at the University of Malaya received the Mahathir Science Award in 2006, Malaysia's most prestigious science award, for its scientific work on Nipah encephalitis. The award honours contributions to the tropical sciences and is open to scientists and institutions worldwide. Tan is the leader of the Nipah Encephalitis investigation team that won the award in 2006. His other work is on multiple sclerosis, a disease common in the western world, but was at the time, believed not to exist in Malaysia. Tan meticulously studied some forty patients. and his study demonstrated that the manifestations of multiple sclerosis were different in Malaysians.

He also studied cryptococcal meningitis, a fatal fungal infection of the brain, and was the first to hypothesize that high intracranial pressure (which caused blindness in meningitis) was treatable. As a result, he proposed aggressive measures to relieve the high pressure even though brain imaging appeared normal. Tan's research interest has been on neurology in Asia. He proposed that neurology in Asia be a discipline of study in medicine and defined neurology in Asia as a field of medical sciences pertaining to the neurological diseases peculiar to Asia. He is the founder and editor-in-chief of Neurology Asia, a journal formerly known as the Neurological Journal of South East Asia, and the official journal of the ASEAN Neurology Association. Neurology in Asia is the chief focus of Neurology Asia. It was first published in 1996, and is now the foremost regional neurology journal.

Tan has opined that state boundaries between countries are often arbitrary. According to him, it is good to have concerns transcending one's own ethnic group, language, and religious beliefs. He also believes that it is important to have concerns transcending national boundaries. It is through this mode of progressive thinking that his research work has gained international recognition. Tan is currently the vice-president of the International League Against Epilepsy (ILAE). He also chairs the Asian Epilepsy Academy, which promotes epilepsy education in the region through workshops and fellowship exchanges. He is chairman of the Pan-Asian Committee on Treatment, Research and Investigation of the Multiple Sclerosis (PACTRIMS) Inaugural Congress, and was the previous chairman of the Multiple Sclerosis Asia Pacific Study Group. He is also the founder and previous chairman of the ASEAN Neurological Association. His contributions to creating greater awareness of epilepsy internationally were acknowledged when the ILAE named him "Ambassador for Epilepsy" in 2004.

Tan is also a Christian leader in Malaysia and has been chairman of the board for the Malaysia Bible Seminary for over twenty years. He is an elder of the Chinese Brethren Church in Petaling Jaya as well. As a Christian leader, he is a strong advocate for reaching out to society at large and integrating the Christian faith with the marketplace and has written four books in Chinese on these themes. Tan believes that professionals should also contribute to the community at large, as evinced by his long time involvement with the Centre for Malaysian Chinese Studies. In addition to promoting research on cultural and socio-political issues of the Malaysian Chinese community, he also advocates greater communication between the medical profession and the public. He was one of the first physicians to organize medical lectures for patients and the public in Malaysia. He has likewise travelled to many small towns, educating the public about health care. He has also written three books in Chinese explaining common neurological diseases in layman's language.

Tan has two sons with his wife, Yek Siew Hong, a biology graduate from Sarawak.

Tan Chye Cheng

(C.C. Tan, 陈才清, Chen Caiqing, 1911–91)
Lawyer, Singapore

Tan Chye Cheng (better known as C.C. Tan) was born in 1911, the only child of Tan Guan Chua. The Tans were a well-to-do Straits Chinese family. Tan's grandfather, Tan Yong Thiam, was a well known trader, and his father, a prominent businessman who was active in the local football association and on the Chinese Advisory Board. He studied at his father's old school, St Joseph's Institution, in Bras Basah Road, completing his studies in 1928.

The year he completed his studies, Tan won a scholarship to study at the St Joseph's Academy in Blackheath, London, along with his classmates, Koh Cheng Yam and Vivian la Salle. While in London, he was honorary secretary and later president of the Alumni Association of Brothers' Schools in Malaya, and the Malayan Students' Union. One of his best friends in London was Ong Hock Thye, later to be chief justice of Malaya. He was the best man at Ong's Ipoh wedding in 1935.

Tan was admitted to read law at the Middle Temple in 1928. He passed his Bar final in July 1931, but being under the age of twenty-one, had to wait till 1932 to be called to the English Bar. He returned to Singapore and was called to the Bar on 13 January 1933. He first joined the firm of Aubrey Davies & Company with offices at 15 Bonham Building before moving to Rodyk & Davidson where he specialized in conveyancing, equity and company law. He practised at Rodyk & Davidson till the outbreak of the second world war.

While in practice, Tan was actively involved in a number of civic organizations, especially the Christian Brothers Old Boys' Association, the Island Club, where he was a very keen and able golfer, and on the Bar Committee as well. In respect of the latter, he was elected to the Bar Committee in 1941, serving under H.D. Mundell as chairman.

In 1939 Tan married Joyce Lim Chin Lien, the daughter of Lim Cheng Kung of Penang. Lim was the brother of lawyer Lim Cheng Ean and at one time served as secretary to the Chinese Legation in London. During the war, Tan and his family evacuated to India, returning only after the Japanese had surrendered. In 1946 he was nominated an unofficial member of the Singapore Advisory Council under Governor Sir Franklin Gimson. This was a singular honour as only the most trusted and respected locals were invited to be part of what was effectively, the governor's cabinet.

In 1947, together with A.P. Rajah and Cheah Heng Sin, Tan formed the law firm of Tan Rajah & Cheah. That same year, he founded the Progressive Party (PP) with John Laycock and Nazir A. Mallal, and was later joined by A.P. Rajah, Thio Chan Bee, and John Ede. Tan was elected president of the party and was Singapore's first local-born election candidate. He was also active in the nine-man commission headed by Sir George Rendel to review the state's Constitution in 1954.

Most of Tan's contemporaries viewed him with great respect even though they thought him a little austere. He was not a very communicative man, but was able to dominate most proceedings on account of his intellect and high social standing among the English-educated Chinese and establishment figures. He was not an effective public speaker and tended to be slow to develop his ideas while on his feet. But this did not deter him in the least. Men such as Tan had great integrity and, more importantly, were loyal to the British. They were not radicals seeking instant solutions, but were prepared to cooperate with the colonial masters to work towards self-government. Another contemporary felt that the British Establishment had the "highest respect" for him as he was very intelligent, well educated, and had a great sense of history. He was, however, "never a fire-brand" and was possibly "too much of an intellectual" such that he could not "win an election by speech-making and propaganda".

Notwithstanding these caveats, C.C. Tan was the dominant figure in Singapore politics from 1947 to 1955. In the election of 1948, the Progressive Party won three of the six elected seats, and in 1951, they won six of the nine elected seats. However, by the early 1950s, the climate was changing and the PP's small electoral base and elitist profile alienated it from the public.

The PP's dominance ended with the automatic registration of voters in 1954. This immediately increased the number of voters from 76,000 to 300,299, the bulk of whom had never even been on the PP's radar screen. This was the age of mass politics and the PP was totally unprepared for it. Its leaders did not expect to have to mobilize support from the masses to remain in power. C.C. Tan himself did not feel it necessary to go around electioneering; his reputation and standing should have been sufficient, he thought. Alas, it was not. In any case, Tan was "just not that type of person to go out shaking people's hands and tapping people on their heads — doing the things that politicians have to do".

In the 1955 general election, not one of the PP candidates won a seat. C.C. Tan himself lost his seat and resigned as chairman of the party, which eventually joined forces with the Democratic Party to form the Liberal-Socialist Party (LSP), with Tan as its leader. The LSP did poorly in the 1959 general election and C.C. Tan retired from active politics thereafter.

Although he was ultimately unsuccessful in politics, Tan served his profession well, both in the Bar Committee, the Advocates & Solicitors Society, and the Law Society, for many years. He also served on the Presidential Council for Minority Rights in the 1970s, was chairman of the Straits Times Press (1966–82); and president of the Singapore Olympics and Sports Council (1951–62). Tan also left a significant legacy in the form of the Central Provident Fund Act, which he sponsored during his service on the Legislative Council.

In 1966 the Legal Profession Act was passed to create the first Bar Council of the Singapore Advocates and Solicitors Society (later Law Society). At the election in 1967, Tan was elected its first president. Previously he had been chairman of the old Bar Council for three terms. Later he became the first president of the Law Society, serving in 1963, 1964, and 1967. He was an avid sportsman and a keen golfer and served as president of the Singapore National Olympic Council and president of the Singapore Island Country Club (1964–67).

When he retired from politics, Tan was made chairman of the Straits Times Press. He retired from his post in 1982 at the age of seventy, after sixteen years of service. He was also chairman of United Engineers and in 1988, retired from the board of directors of Robinsons department store. Tan continued going to his law office till the day he died on 6 March 1991. His daughter, Margaret Leng-Tan, is a leading figure in the avant-garde classical music world, being an exponent of the prepared piano and toy piano. His son, Tan Chin Seng, followed in his footsteps and continues to practise at Tan Rajah & Cheah.

Tan, George G.

(Tan Chong Gok, 陈掌谔, Chen Zhang'e, 1899–1981)

Sportsman, educator, Philippines

An accomplished athlete, George G. Tan was a rare person who looked upon the development of sports as a reflection of a nation's development and wealth. He exerted himself in cultivating an enthusiasm for sports in China despite the poverty and adverse conditions there. He made a similar effort when he moved to the Philippines pouring his energy into training athletes, writing about sports, and collecting a wealth of data about the Olympic Games. He was one of the athletes mentioned in 2008 (at the opening of the Beijing Olympic Games) for his contributions to the promotion and development of sports in China and the Philippines.

For the Chinese in general, the 2008 Beijing Olympics was not just a matter of China hosting the event but also a matter of national pride. After all, the Chinese had been subjected to national humiliation and insult since the opium wars of 1840–42. They were insulted and dubbed "the sick men of East Asia" (东亚病夫) by the westerners and in particular by the Japanese at a time when China was a backward nation and the Chinese performed poorly in sports. But the 2008 Olympics put an end to all that and China has emerged as a power strong in sports.

On 8 August 2008, the opening day of the Beijing Olympics, Xinhua.net posted an article paying tribute to the overseas Chinese who had contributed to Chinese sports and the 2008 Olympics. Two Chinese in the Philippines: George G. Tan (陈掌谔 Tan Chong Gok) and Peter M. Lim (林珠光 Lim Chu Kong) were given mention. Tan's contributions, however, were not only to China's sports but also to physical education in Southeast Asia particularly the Philippines.

Born in Xiamen on 11 November 1899, Tan received his physical education from the American Tongwen Institute (同文学院) in Xiamen, China. In 1915 he made an impressive showing in the first inter-school sports competitions in Xiamen. In May, 1919, he was Captain of the China Team in the 4th Far Eastern Games held in Manila, Philippines. He was an active member of the basketball, football, volleyball, and track and field teams of the Tongwen Institute in 1914–1919. The sports competitions in which he had made his mark include:

- All-round Track & Field Championships in South China Athletics Meets, 1915–1919;
- First Honors in 100-yards, 880-yards Mile Run, and Decathlon in China National Tryouts for the 4th Far Eastern Games, Shanghai, April, 1919;
- Three first honors in Track & Field, American College of Physical Education, 1923–1924, Chicago, U.S.A.;
- High Jump honor and Decathlon Championship at George Williams

College and Chicago Intercollegiate Athletic Meets, U.S.A., 1924–1927.

It was Tan's passionate wish to raise the standards of sports in China to be at par with the best in the world. He went to George Williams College (the former Young Men's Christian Association College) and the American College of Physical Education, both in Chicago, Illinois, for further studies, and obtained his Bachelor of Science degree in physical education from both colleges in 1927. Immediately upon graduation, he returned to China to teach physical education at the Jinan University in Shanghai. In the 1930s, he went back to Xiamen and taught at Xiamen University. In 1934, he helped organize the Xiamen athletic club to develop sports activities in the city. He served as chief trainer and judge at the Xiamen City Athletic Association. He also held numerous positions in various capacities in a number of Chinese universities and sports organizations in China.

In April 1938, Xiamen fell during the Japanese invasion. Tan left China for the Philippines where he became the one and only scholar in sports and physical education in the Chinese-Filipino community while serving Philippine mainstream society. He taught at the University of the Philippines while pursuing his further education and was awarded his Master's degree in 1941 by the University of Manila. He was a candidate for a doctorate at the University of Santo Tomas in 1942 when Japan occupied the Philippines.

Aside from teaching, Tan headed the Chinese Athletic Federation where he supervised the development of sports and athletics in the Chinese-Filipino community. He was the founder, publisher, and editor-in-chief of the bilingual (English-Chinese) Physical Education Today Magazine (《体育杂志》, Taiwan-Manila, 1953).

Even before World War II, Philippine-Chinese players had excelled in basketball as exemplified in the national games held in Wuhan, Hubei, China in 1926 where the Philippine-Chinese team won all the matches. The team was started and supported by Tan's contemporary, philanthropist and sports patron, Peter M. Lim Chu Kong. Lim was the team leader, as well as organizer and financier of the first ever basketball team to play in the United States representing China in 1929. This team was in fact made up mostly of Philippine-Chinese players from the Chinese community in the Philippines. Tan continued to get help from Lim in his endeavors to promote sports competitions in various Chinese schools at the time.

The wealth of Tan's experience and expertise led to the publication of his book, A History of the Ancient Olympic Games in 1952. In his foreword, he said that at the time of his writing, no books on ancient Olympics had been written in Europe and America. He went on to publish 15 other books including A Study of Sports Stamps since 1896 (published in 1953), A Study of Marathons since 1896 and The World Champions of Decathlons, the last two in 1959. From 1963 to 1966, he had a stint with the Department of Physical Education at the National University of Singapore. Before he passed away on 19 November 1981, he was the owner of a 3,000-stamp collection with a focus on Olympic events, part of which was donated by him to China through the Chinese ambassador.

Both George Tan's father, General Tan Bu Chai, and grandfather, General Tan Kim Tong, served in the Chinese armed forces in the Qing dynasty. George Tan's daughter, Dr Tan King-king (陈卿卿), MD, a pediatrician, is outstanding in her field. She currently serves as Associate Medical Director at the Chinese General Hospital and Executive Director at the College of Nursing, Chinese General Hospital Medical Center in the Philippines. She headed and taught the Department of Pediatrics of the Far Eastern University and the Nicanor Reyes Medical Foundation in the country. As an alumnus and a member of the Board of Trustees of the Philippine Cultural High School, Dr Tan King-king is engaged in raising the quality of education in Chinese schools in the Philippines. She has also given scholarships to students in physical education and medicine at the Xiamen University in China in memory of her late father.

Tan Hong Boen

(Ki Hadjar Sukowijono, 陈丰文, Chen Fengwen, pen names: Im Yang Tjoe; Im Jang Tju, 1905–83)
Journalist, writer, Indonesia

Tan Hong Boen was a versatile writer. He compiled an encyclopedia of prominent Chinese in Java and also wrote some interesting novels, some of which reflect their historical backgrounds. Less known is his successful pharmaceutical invention, Pil Kita, allegedly conceptualized while meditating on the slope of a mountain.

Born in 1905, Tan came from an affluent family in Slawi; his father was the owner of a tea plantation. It is not known what school Tan Hong Boen attended, but he seemed to have been fluent in Chinese, Dutch, and English, and, after 1945, also Bahasa Indonesia.

He was special in that he used different pen names for his writings and the only work that bears his real name is the encyclopedia of prominent Chinese in Java entitled, Orang Tionghoa jang terkemoeka di Java (Who's Who?). This book contains the biodata, educational background, occupation, and achievements of the famous figures. It was published in 1935, but is today still considered an important publication on the Chinese of that period.

For his historical novels, Tan used the pen name, Ki Hadjar Dharmopralojo; for a romantic story about a native Indonesian girl and a Chinese boy, he used the exotic name, Madame d' Eden Lovely. Of all, his noms de plume, his favourite Im Yang Tjoe, which he used for most of his works written from 1925 to 1950. In 1950, he stopped writing novels and devoted himself to writing wayang (theatrical shows) stories for which he used the name, Kihadjar Sukowiyono.

As a journalist, he used to travel in Java and Bali on a bicycle to find subjects to write about. His stories could be read in magazines such as Liberty and Penghidoepan and he won several prizes for his works. His first award was for a short story entitled, Boeroeng Pedasih di moesim dingin (The pedasih bird in the cold season), which was published in Sin Po Weekly. His second work, also a short story, was Boengah Trate di Rawa Peloeng (Lotus flower in Rawa Peloeng) and this was awarded a gold medal from Liberty weekly of Surabaya. The third work was a novel entitled Oh, Penghidoepan, (Oh, Life), which won first prize in a writing contest of the literary monthly, Penghidoepan, for the best story about the meaning of life. This last story is reminiscent of the Daoist stories, where a wanderer encounters people during his journey and each of them has a certain meaning for him.

Besides working as journalist for the Soemanget daily in Bandoeng, he was president of the The Biographical Publishing Centre in Solo. He also published a literary monthly, which he called Boelan Poernama (Full Moon) in 1929. It came out on the fifteenth of each month of the lunar calendar, when the moon was full. In an introduction to this new monthly, he announced that he wanted to publish the best reading materials for society. Most of the publications were written by himself, and only a few were by others such as Nyoo Cheong Seng and Tan King Tjan. There were also some by a Japanese writer named Harakawa Mashida, and a Javanese writer, R.P Tjondrowinoejoeng.

Inspite of its popularity, as reflected in the letters which came from readers from as far as Palembang and Irian to the editor, the monthly came to an abrupt end in 1932. The only plausible reason for this was his political imprisonment by the colonial government. Not only had he criticized the government in his capacity as a journalist, but also as novelist, for instance in his stories about life during the construction of the Grote Postweg (The Great Post Road). It was during his imprisonment in Sukamiskin, near Bandung, that he met Ir Soekarno, who was imprisoned for his anti-government activities. He was able to interview Soekarno, and the result was a biography on Soekarno published in 1933.

In 1935, we see the name, Tan Hong Boen, appearing for the first and last time in the pre-war period — on his three volumes of Orang-orang Tionghoa terkemoeka di Java (Who's Who), published in Solo. After the war, he wrote a number of short stories and novels and a wayang story, which was discontinued after two episodes in the Pantjawarna monthly. His novels, written under the name, Im Yang Tjoe, were less critical of the government; he instead attacked immoral men and women. He also tried to introduce readers to the mystic world of the Javanese culture by writing about the different creatures that could influence lives. One such creature was the gandaruwo, which liked to disturb happy families; however, there were benevolent creatures such as the brahala, which was a protector of pretty, kind-hearted, and unselfish girls.

His wayang stories were not conventional stories, but those he had gathered during performances in the villages. They were usually full of humour and criticisms of the government. While writing, he was also busy manufacturing a drug, which he called Pil Kita. He claimed to have obtained the formula for this herbal drug through meditation. The drug was especially popular among truck drivers, who claimed to have felt refreshed and energetic again after taking it. In the late 1970s, he founded a company, P.T. Marguna Tarulata APK Farma, to manage his newly established factory that manufactured his Pil Kita.

His last years were spent in Slawi where he could be seen surrounded by people listening to his wayang stories — which he told like a dalang (storyteller) without the puppets and screen or, just walking alone in the tea plantation, or meditating.

He died in 1983, leaving behind a will which stipulated that 40 per cent of the shares of his factory should go to a foundation that he had established. The foundation was tasked to identify intelligent but needy students eligible for scholarships. It was to pick forty-five elementary school pupils, seventeen secondary school students, and eight high school students for this scholarship. The numbers were taken off the date of Indonesia's Independence Day — 17 August 1945.

Tan Howe Liang

(陈浩亮, Chen Haoliang, 1933–)
Sportsman, weightlifter, Singapore

Tan Howe Liang has the distinguished honour to be the first ever Singaporean to win a medal at the Olympic Games. He is still remembered as one of Singapore's foremost weightlifters in the lightweight category.

Born on 5 May 1933 in Swatow (present day Shantou) in Guangzhou, China, Tan was the third of seven children. Although Tan Howe Liang was born in China, the stirring political turbulence in the country gave his family cause to seek greener pastures elsewhere. Indeed, Tan's father had tried to make his fortune in Hong Kong and Vietnam before moving to Singapore. The Tan family relocated to Singapore in 1937, where they lived in Chinatown. However, tragedy soon struck, for Tan's father died in a death-house at Sago Lane. Tan was only 14 years at the time. He attended Tuan Mong Secondary School for a year. During that year, Tan played any sport that he could. Owing to the fact that he had to help support the family, he did not focus on pursuing any one sport. The necessity of supporting his family also resulted in him leaving school after a year of secondary school education.

It was only after the Second World War that Tan developed an interest in weightlifting. While walking past the former Gay World Amusement Park with his friends one day, Tan witnessed a weightlifting competition. It was then that his attention was drawn to the sport and he decided to try weightlifting 'just for the fun of it'. Armed with only his interest and a single set of barbells, Tan trained in earnest with no formal coaching. He subsequently joined a weightlifting club in 1952. A year later, aged 20, Tan's dedication to the sport paid off when he won both the National Junior and Senior Weightlifting Championship titles in the lightweight category. Owing to the lack of financial support, Tan had to pay for his own training needs and expenses. Despite working hard as a mechanic and a clerk at Cathay Organisation, he continued to pursue the sport. This is because he had promised his father in his early youth to be "the strongest man in the world." Though these words may be attributed to a young boy wishing to prove himself useful to his family, Tan appeared to take this promise very seriously and continued to train himself in the sport. His hard work paid off when he participated in the 1954 Asian Games in Manila, Philippines, and distinguished himself by taking fourth place. Spurred on by his moderate success there, Tan tried for a medal in the 1956 Olympics in Melbourne. While that venture was unsuccessful, he had firmly established himself as one of the foremost weightlifters in Singapore. Despite blacking out after his first attempt, Tan still managed to place ninth out of 18 contenders.

After that achievement, Tan grew from strength to strength and came to dominate the lightweight category of the sport. He went on to distinguish himself in the Commonwealth Games in Cardiff in 1958 by clinching both a gold medal as well as establishing a world record in the jerk with a lift of 347 lbs. Later that year, he lived up to expectations and won a gold medal at the third Asian Games in Tokyo. He also walked away with top honours at the first Southeast Asian Peninsular (SEAP) Games in Bangkok in 1959.

Despite his successes in the sport, Tan still lacked sponsorship. He was forking out his own funds to pay for his training. As the 1960 Olympic games loomed closer, Tan realised the salary he drew as a store clerk could not cover his living expenses and the cost of weight training. Fortunately, Tan's so-called godfather, the President of the Singapore Amateur Weightlifting Association, Chua Tian Teck, helped him out by paying for some of Tan's expenses.

These financial difficulties notwithstanding, Tan's determination to improve his form shone through. As a result, he was fielded in two subsequent Olympics in 1960 in Rome and in 1964 in Tokyo. These forays into the Olympics and his achievement of the silver medal after lifting 380 kg in the underweight category in September 1960 made him Singapore's sole Olympic medallist. As the Russian competitor, Viktor Busheuv, had already broken the world record and clinched the gold medal. It came down to a contest between Tan and Abdul Wahid Aziz from Iraq for the silver medal. Tan had one more clean and jerk lift left when he felt some pain in his legs. However, he disregarded the doctors' advice to return to the Athlete's Village for treatment. Due to his determination not to withdraw from the competition after coming so far, he beat thirty-three rivals for second place. For this feat, he was awarded with a meritorious service medal in 1962. Additionally, the leotard and belt he wore on the occasion are now on display in a glass case in the Singapore Sports Council Museum.

The silver Olympics medal was only one of Tan's numerous successes in weightlifting. He remains the only Singaporean to have walked away with medals in the major international games of the Olympics, Commonwealth Games, Southeast Asian Peninsular Games, and Asian Games. He was also the first weightlifter in the world to be awarded the International Weightlifting Federation Gold Award in 1984. To commemorate his Olympic silver medal in the 1960 Rome Olympics, he was inducted into the Singapore Sports Council Hall of Fame in 1983 and was awarded with a Silver Pin by the International Olympic Committee in 1988.

Following his win at the Olympics, Tan returned to Singapore where he tried to run a restaurant business. This enterprise unfortunately failed and he later became a taxi driver. Despite his formal retirement from competitive weightlifting, Tan returned to the sport in 1974 as a weightlifting coach. In November 1982, he was hired by the Singapore Sports Council (SSC) as a gym supervisor at the Kallang Family ClubFitt.

In his capacity as weightlifting coach, Tan trained young weightlifters such as Chua Koon Siong who won a gold medal at the first ASEAN Weightlifting Championship. Indeed, his coaching methodology is considered remarkable for his protégé, Chua Koon Siong broke the Commonwealth record with his performance. Another of his trainees, Tung Chye Hong, also clinched a silver medal at the same game. Under his tutelage, Teo Yong Joo won a SEA Games gold in 1983 and a Commonwealth Games bronze in 1986.

To this day, his achievements in the sport are still remembered. The image of him lifting weights was cast on one side of a commemorative medallion produced by Singapore Mint on 26 June 1996 to mark the occasion of the 1996 Atlanta Olympics. The gruelling feat he endured at the 1960 Olympics is still remembered internationally, for he was featured as one of Singapore's sporting greats in Time magazine's Millennium series. Tan was also nominated for "Spirit of the Century" in 1999 and "Singapore's Greatest Athlete". His modesty, however, meant that he graciously conceded the award to former badminton champion, Wong Peng Soon. He was also voted second greatest athlete of the twentieth century by the media in 1999. The President of the Singapore National Olympic Council, Teo Chee Hean, honoured Tan's achievements as Singapore's first Olympic medallist by awarding him with the "Sport: An Inspiration to Youth" trophy in 2010. As these awards demonstrate, Tan still remains a role model for aspiring weightlifters in Singapore today.

Tan Joe Hok

(Hendra Kartanegara, 陈友福, Chen Youfu, 1937–)

Leading badminton player, Indonesia

Tan Joe Hok was the first Indonesian to win the All England Championship and he did so in 1959. During the 1958 Thomas Cup competition, he was the youngest member of the Indonesian team and was also a team member in 1961 and 1964. Indonesia then came to be known as the kingdom of badminton and went on to dominate the badminton world for one and a half decades.

Tan was born on 11 August 1937 into a Chinese family in Bandung, West Java. He went to Nanhua Xuexiao (南化学校) in Bandung for his junior middle education and Huaqiao Zhongxue (华侨中学), also in Bandung, for his senior middle school education. His father, Tan Tay Ping, was a petty textiles trader and travelled frequently in order to sell his textiles. Both his parents were badminton enthusiasts; his father even turned the front yard of his modest home into a badminton court. The young Tan began playing badminton when he was eleven or twelve, (depending on the sources). At the age of fifteen he was discovered by a badminton coach from the Blue White Club in Bandung, Lie Tjuk Kong, who invited him to join the club. Tan got up at 5 am every morning and started running for two hours. One day, while watching a boxing match, he was greatly impressed by the fast foot movement and excellent coordination of the hands and feet of the boxers. He was inspired by what he saw in the performance of the boxers and took up skipping as part of his regular training. He trained hard every day and, at the age of sixteen, won the local championship (Bandung).

At the age of seventeen he defeated Njoo Kiem Bie, a more senior player known for his powerful smashes. Two years later, in 1956, he defeated Eddy Jusuf, another well known player, and won the Indonesian national title. Tan was known for the spartan training he went through and his powerful smashes which left a mark on the badminton scene in Indonesia. That same year he participated in both the Selangor (Malaya) and Singapore tournaments, and began to be exposed to the international scene. The following year (1957) he took part in the East Indian international competition and won the championship.

In 1958 he joined the Indonesian Thomas Cup team as its youngest member. The team also included Olich Solihin, Lie Po Djian, Tan King Gwan, Tjan Kiem Bie, and Ferry Sonneville. It is worth noting that it was a multi-ethnic/multiracial team, but the majority happened to be Chinese Indonesians. In the competition Tan played in the men's singles and doubles and defeated two powerful players from Denmark, namely, Erland Kops and Finn Kobbero in singles matches. There was no doubt that his participation in the Indonesian Thomas Cup team contributed to the Indonesian victory. It was the first time in badminton history that Indonesia won the Thomas Cup.

The Indonesian victory was cause for major celebrations in the country. The Thomas Cup players were welcomed as heroes when they arrived home in Jakarta, the capital, where both the Cup and the players were paraded; it became the Indonesian national event. Tan thought that it was the most memorable moment in his life. He felt that he was Indonesian and accepted by the population as their hero. For the next two Thomas Cup competitions: that is, in 1961 and 1964, he continued to play and help win the Cup for his country. In 1961, after Indonesia won the Thomas Cup for the second time, Tan was awarded the Satya Lencana Kebudayaan (Cultural Medal). He received the award from Soekarno who said to him: "I am so proud of you. We have so many doctors and engineers, but people who can represent and bring fame to the nation and country like you are very few."

As an individual player, Tan won the All England singles in 1959. This was the first Indonesian winner in the history of the All England championship. The same year, he also won both the Canadian Open and U.S. Open championships, and his victories were reported in the sports magazines of the two countries. Tan was dubbed a "Giant Killer" by one of the sport magazines.

After the first Thomas Cup championship of 1958, Tan was awarded a scholarship to study at Baylor University in Texas at its pre-medical school, majoring in chemistry and biology. Hence after winning the All England singles, he went straight to Texas for this. Only when there was a need for him to join the Thomas Cup team and the Asian Games did he return to Indonesia for training. And after winning the competitions he would return to his university to study again. In 1963 (one source says it was 1967) he finished his Bachelor degree, but did not pursue a higher degree as he realized his interest was still in badminton.

In 1965 Tan married Goei Kiok Nio, an ex-national badminton player. In 1969 and 1971, he went to Mexico and Hong Kong to work as a coach, returning to Indonesia in 1972 and starting the pest control business. However, he later returned to badminton and became a coach in a local badminton club.

When the Indonesian Thomas Cup team was preparing for the 1984 Thomas Cup in 1983, Tan was involved in training the members. The team was able to win the Thomas Cup back from China and Tan was considered to have made a major contribution. He was awarded the title of "Best Coach of the Year" in 1984.

In 1965 Soekarno was overthrown and General Soeharto came to power. At the end of 1966, the new authorities introduced the name changing regulation which was implemented in 1967. Tan, who was already well known by his Chinese name, was asked to use a new name. An army general suggested "Hendra" for his first name, and he himself created Kartanegara as a surname. He felt a bit unhappy about the name changing as Ferry Sonneville, another Thomas Cup player who was of Dutch Indonesian descent, did not have to change his Western name to an Indonesian sounding name. Apparently, only Chinese Indonesians were required to change their names.

Tan felt that the rise of the Soeharto regime signified the rise of racial discrimination in Indonesia. During the Soekarno era, Chinese Indonesians were considered Indonesians, but in the Soeharto era, Chinese Indonesians were no longer seen as such; they had to be completely assimilated into the so-called indigenous population. The year 1998 was a "memorable year" for him. In February his wife died, and in May there were large-scale anti-Chinese riots in Jakarta and Surakarta. Concerned with the safety of his son and daughter, Tan frantically looked for flight tickets for them to leave Indonesia, thinking he would not be able to protect them. Unable to get the tickets, and faced with no alternative, the three family members gathered in the living room the whole night, expecting the worst. Fortunately, the situation came under control and the threat to their lives was lifted.

After the fall of Soeharto, Tan was involved in the anti-discrimination movement. Together with many well known Chinese Indonesians, he appealed to the new Indonesian Government to abolish laws and regulations which were discriminatory in nature.

Tan is now retired.

Tan Kah Kee

(陈嘉庚, Chen Jiageng, 1874–1961)
Community leader, promoter of educator, entrepreneur, non-partisan political leader, philanthropist, Singapore and Malaysia

Touted as Malaya's rubber king and the "Henry Ford of Malaya", Tan Kah Kee (Chen Jiageng) is best known for investing all his personal fortune in education. He was a key founder of the Singapore Chinese High School (1919) and the sole founder of Amoy University (1921), both of which are still thriving today.

Born on 21 August 1874 in Jimei (Chi Mei) village, Tong An district in Fujian province in China, Tan Kah Kee was the eldest son of Tan Kee Peck (1840–1909) who had emigrated to Singapore prior to 1874 with his two other brothers. The three of them became successful businessmen, specializing in the rice trade and pineapple canning. Tan Kah Kee received rudimentary Confucian classical education for nine years (1882–90) which put him in good stead as a literate migrant. In 1890, he joined his father in Singapore to begin his own business training, first as an apprentice, and then as manager to his father's rice and pineapple canning firm, Soon Ann. The experience in business dealings and accounting practices he accumulated enabled him to branch out on his own in 1904 by establishing a rice firm called Khiam Aik, with a capital of $7,000 (Straits currency). In 1906, he ventured into the rubber plantation industry by planting some 180,000 rubber seeds in his pineapple estate in Singapore. This meagre and chance investment of a mere $1,800 laid the economic foundation of his vast business empire till 1934. The rise of the modern motor car industry in the United States saw a steep rise in rubber prices which turned Tan Kah Kee into a millionaire in 1911. He became a multimillionaire during the First World War (1914–18) by going into maritime shipping, which made him a net profit of $4.5 million. After the war, Tan having immense faith in rubber as a commodity, ventured into the complete line of the industry, from planting, milling, trading, rubber goods manufacturing, to retailing. At the pinnacle of his business career in 1925, he made a net profit of $7.8 million. It was during the 1920s that he was showered with such tags as Malaya's "rubber king" and "Henry Ford of Malaya" by the public media. It was also during the 1920s that Tan & Co. became one of the largest employers in British Malaya, estimated to have employed between 10,000 and 30,000 people daily.

Deeply imbued with Confucian values such as fulfilment of social responsibility to make a difference, Tan supported charitable works and funded numerous educational projects. In Singapore, he became a founder of a host of Chinese schools, including Tao Nan (1907), Nanyang Girls' School (1918), the Singapore Chinese High School (1919), Nanyang Fishery and Marine School (1939), Nanyang Normal School (1941), and Nan Chiao Girls' High School (1947). Furthermore, Tan also promoted English education in Singapore, donating $30,000 to Anglo-Chinese School (1919) and $10,000 to the Raffles College (1929). However, Tan Kah Kee devoted much of his own time and energy, not to mention much of his fortune, to educational development in his home district in Fujian province. His Fujian educational endeavours were largely driven by his passion and commitment to produce talents in all fields for the modernization of China after the fall of the Manchu regime in 1911. His Fujian educational blueprints were well thought out and were implemented step by step. Starting in 1913, Tan Kah Kee first founded Chi Mei Primary School and then followed by Chi Mei Normal School (1918), Chi Mei Kindergarten (1919), Chi Mei Marine School (1920), and Chi Mei Commercial School (1920), all catering to students from South China and Southeast Asia. More schools were established in the ensuing years. In 1927, Tan streamlined all his educational institutions in Jimei under ten schools, namely, a boys' primary school, a girls' primary school, a men's normal school, a boys' secondary school, a marine and navigation school, a commercial school, a girls' secondary school, an agricultural school, a kindergarten teachers' training school, and a specialized school for learning Chinese. The various Chi Mei schools have survived to this day, with the Chi Mei secondary schools producing 57,293 graduates between 1913 and 1983.

While the founding and funding of these Chi Mei schools already enhanced Tan's social status in South China and overseas, his establishing the Amoy University in 1921 single-handedly boosted his reputation as an educational promoter nationally and internationally. During his lifetime, Tan contributed a sum estimated to be over $10 million (Singapore currency) towards his educational ventures in Fujian province alone.

Education aside, Tan also provided a sum of $500,000 to various charities before the Second World War (1939–45). More importantly, he personally led five major fund-raising campaigns for charity during the interwar years, including the 1917 Tianjin Flood Relief Fund, the 1924 Fujian-Guangdong Flood Relief Fund, and the 1935 Bukit Ho Swee Fire Relief Fund, among others.

Tan was a noted social reformer who attempted to strengthen community structure and provide leadership, and was capable of meeting needs in times of crises. In 1923, he became the president of the Ee Hoe Hean Club, a millionaires' club, and quietly embarked on social reforms within the club and in the community at large. Within the club premises, he set up a library from scratch to cater to the needs of members. By improving the reading skills of its members and increasing their interest in current affairs, Tan hoped that members would be more responsive to the needs of the Chinese people in the colony and in China. Another of Tan's important moves was to broaden its membership base by inviting non-Fujian community leaders to join it. By so doing, he believed that the Chinese community in Singapore would be more united and coherent because their leaders were better informed and more ready to provide leadership to effect change. In 1929, Tan took over the leadership of the Singapore Fujian Huiguan (Hokkien Huay Kuan), the top organization of the Fujian people in Singapore. Again, he restructured the organization by adopting a new and more democratic constitution for electing office bearers and installed in them a stronger sense of social obligation towards its members and the Fujian community in Singapore at large. The reorganized association had forty office bearers to man two committees (executive and supervisory) and five departments (general affairs, economics, education, construction, and welfare). The education department, for example, promoted efficiency in funding Chinese education by controlling three Chinese schools and subsidizing eight others in Singapore. The construction and general affairs departments jointly carried out extensive campaigns for modernizing old Chinese rites and customs. As president of both the Ee Hoe Hean Club and the Singapore Fujian Huiguan, Tan made two bold attempts, in 1929 and in 1939, to reform the Chinese community. He proposed that the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce be replaced by a more representative and democratic body, such as a Chinese Association, which would accept members from all walks of life and not just from the mercantile sector of the community. According to him, the new association would establish amenities such as a public library, a swimming pool, and a large public hall to cater to the needs of members on all occasions. However, his proposals were rejected by the colonial authorities which had endorsed the Chamber's constitution in 1906 and had established sound relationships with the Chamber's leadership.

Being a Chinese-educated immigrant, Tan was naturally passionate about Chinese education, culture, race, and the national survival of China under duress. He seldom shied away from China politics and had never been far away from the spotlight of China politics. He resented the loss of Taiwan at the end of the first Sino-Japanese War (1894–95) and became an overtly ardent nationalist during the second Sino-Japanese War (1937–45). To protest against the tottering Manchu regime for all China's woes, Tan clipped off his pigtail in 1910 and joined the Singapore branch of the Tongmenhui (T'ung Meng Hui) (the United League) which aimed at the overthrow of the Qing dynasty by force. After the fall of the Qing dynasty, he became deeply involved in China politics through raising funds for various relief campaigns for China of a charitable and political nature. These relief funds included the Fujian Protection Fund (1912), the Shandong Relief Fund (1928–29), the Singapore China Relief Fund (1937–46) and the South Seas China Relief Fund Union (1938–49). Each campaign involved the mobilization of manpower for the collection of funds. In order to raise more funds, fund collectors invariably resorted to propagating the ideals of Chinese nationalism. As a result, the Chinese in Southeast Asia in general, and Singapore and Malaya in particular, became more thoroughly politicized amid real foreign threats in China and British Malaya. As Tan was neither a member of the Malayan Guomindang (Kuomintang, KMT) nor the Malayan Communist Party, he regarded his own leadership in these campaigns to be non-partisan, and hence more acceptable to the colonial authorities and more capable of providing a united-front leadership to the Chinese community for achieving designated goals. Indeed, the British authorities often gave Tan's non-partisan leadership official blessing mainly because both the Guomindang (KMT) and Malayan Communist leaderships would be more threatening and damaging to their colonial rule.

Tan's prolonged involvement in leading various fund-raising campaigns greatly helped enhance his reputation, power, and influence, as well as earn considerable British trust. A case in point was Sir Shenton Thomas' (governor of the Straits Settlements) numerous pleas to Tan on the eve of Japanese invasion of Singapore to head the Singapore Mobilization Council to assist in the civil defence of the island. After the war, Sir Shenton charitably acknowledged that both Tan and the Singapore Mobilization Council had done much useful work in terms of watch and ward, and in providing needed labour for the civil defence of Singapore.

During the Japanese Occupation of Singapore and Malaya, Tan escaped to East Java where he made a major contribution by writing and compiling a 300,000-word memoir, Nanqiao-huiyi-lu (Nan-ch'iao hui-i-lu), which provides a body of primary sources for the study of Singapore and Malayan history of the colonial era. After the war, Tan returned to Singapore and became a rather controversial political figure because he jettisoned his non-partisan political leadership of the pre-war years by siding with Mao Zedong in the Chinese Civil War (1946–49). This shift in political loyalty away from Chiang Kai-shek's Guomindang regime had its roots in 1940 when Tan led a fifty-men China Comfort Mission to comfort the wounded and to assess wartime conditions in China. His nine-month political odyssey in China took him to both Chongqing and Yenan and allowed him ample opportunity to meet with the leaders of both the Guomindang and the Chinese Community Party. In Chongqing, Tan found Chiang Kai-shek to be more hostile towards the Chinese communists than the Japanese. In Yenan, he found the Communist leadership clean and efficient, and hell-bent to drive out the invading Japanese. Moreover, Tan appreciated Yenan's spartan lifestyle and Yenan communism at work. Soon after he left Yenan, Tan was delighted to inform some members of the Comfort Mission that he had found in Mao Zedong the saviour of the Chinese people. Tan's political leanings towards Yenan had untold personal and regional political repercussions. It split the immigrant Chinese community in Southeast Asia into pro-Chiang and pro-Mao forces in China politics. For Tan personally, his 1940

Comfort Mission enlarged his political role in the post-war era. Together with the outbreak of the Cold War and the Malayan Emergency (1948–60), which created distrust on the part of colonial authorities towards a partisan Tan, the 1940 mission paved the way for his exit to China in 1950 to help reconstruct the country of his birth.

After his return to China in 1950, Tan held various government positions, including being a member of the People's Political Consultative Conference (1949–53) and its vice-chairman (1954–61), an executive member of the People's National Congress (1954–61), and a member of the People's Government and of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Commission (1956–61). He helped complete the repairing and rebuilding projects of the Amoy University and the Chi Mei Schools. When he died in Beijing in 1961, he was honoured by the Communist leadership with a state funeral. Tan left behind many enduring legacies in both China and Southeast Asia, the most important being the various educational institutions, his so-called "Tan Kah Kee Spirit" as a guide for human action, and a number of worthy successors to perpetuate the tradition of philanthropy for the good of mankind.

Tan Keng Yam, Tony

(陈庆炎, Chen Qingyan, 1940–)

Politician, banker, Singapore's 7th President

Dr Tony Tan has straddled the fields of academia, politics, and banking. Abandoning an earlier career as a university don, Tan took up banking before turning his attention to politics where he rose to the position of deputy prime minister of Singapore. In 2011, he was elected Singapore's 7th President.

Tony Tan Keng Yam was born in Singapore on 7 February 1940 to Tan Seng Hwee and Jessie Lim Neo Swee. He was educated at St Patrick's School (1947–56) and St Joseph's Institution (1957–58) where he was a top student and won a state scholarship to study physics at the University of Singapore. There he graduated with a first class honours in physics in 1962 and then proceeded to do postgraduate work at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology under an Asia Foundation Scholarship, obtaining an MSc in operations research in 1964. He returned to Singapore and taught at the Physics Department of the University of Singapore for a year before being awarded a Research Scholarship by the University of Adelaide to study for a Ph.D. in applied mathematics. He obtained a Ph.D. in applied mathematics in 1967 and then returned home where he was appointed lecturer in the Department of Mathematics at the University of Singapore.

In 1969 Tan resigned from his teaching post and took up the position of sub-Manager at the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC) which was then headed by his uncle, Tan Sri Tan Chin Tuan. By 1978, Tony Tan was the bank's general manager. In January 1979, a series of seven by-elections were held in Singapore. These by-elections were prompted by the People's Action Party's (PAP's) renewal process as well as by the death of Anson constituency's P. Govindaswamy. Nomination day was on 31 January 1979 and polling day on 10 February 1979. Tan was persuaded to stand as the PAP's candidate for Sembawang constituency. The other constituencies being contested were Anson, Geylang West, Mountbatten, Nee Soon, Potong Pasir, and Telok Blangah. Tan had no problem overwhelming his opponent, the United People's Front's Harbans Singh, securing 78.4 per cent of the 16,714 votes. He was immediately appointed senior minister of state for education and thus had to resign his position at the OCBC.

On 1 June 1980, Tan was promoted to minister for education and concurrently served as vice-chancellor of the newly created National University of Singapore (NUS), a post which he held for only a year. The NUS had been formed by a merger of the former University of Singapore and the former Nanyang University. In 1981, Tan was appointed minister for trade and industry and although he relinquished his vice-chancellorship and education portfolio, he continued to oversee the development of higher education in his capacity of minister-in-charge of the NUS and the new Nanyang Technological Institute. In October 1983, Tan became minister of finance in addition to his concurrent appointment as minister for trade and industry.

In January 1985, Tan was again appointed minister for education, a post he retained till he stepped down from the cabinet in 1992 to return to banking. During his tenure as education minister, Tan introduced pastoral care and career guidance in Singapore schools and also established independent schools that were given much greater autonomy. As a former academic, he was also concerned with academic research and encouraged this through tax incentives and grants through the universities.

Tan's return to the private sector — as chief executive officer of the OCBC, his former bank — was regarded as a major loss to the government. Indeed, former Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew considered Tan so capable that Tan was his first choice to succeed him as prime minister. Tan remained a member of parliament for the Sembawang Group Representation Constituency. In 1995, when both deputy prime ministers — Lee Hsien Loong and Ong Teng Cheong — were diagnosed with cancer, Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong asked Tan to rejoin the cabinet as his deputy. Tan was minister for defence from 1995 to 2003 and deputy prime minister from 1995 to 2005. In 2003, Tan was appointed coordinating minister for security and defence till his retirement from politics in August 2005. Throughout his political career, Tan was known for his scholarly and measured speeches and gentlemanly demeanour. In December 2005, he succeeded Lim Chin Beng as non-executive chairman of the Singapore Press Holdings Group.

In June 2011, Tan confirmed widespread rumours that he was re-entering politics by contesting the presidential elections scheduled to be held at the end of August that year. On 23 June 2011, he resigned from his posts at the Government of Singapore Investment Corporation (GIC) and Singapore Press Holdings to offer himself as a candidate for the presidency. The ensuing elections were the hotly contested since the office was made competitive in 1991. Running against Tony Tan were his former PAP colleague, Dr Tan Cheng Bock, Tan Kin Lian and Tan Jee Say. Tony Tan, who described himself as 'Tested, Trusted and True', campaigned on the platform that his vast experience will enable him to help steer Singapore through the anticipated financial uncertainty ahead. His candidacy was supported by the 10,000-strong Federation of Tan Clan Associations; leaders of 19 NTUC-affiliated unions; the leaders of the Singapore Federation of Chinese Clan Associations and the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce & Industry. When the votes were counted after the 27 August 2011 election, Tony Tan received 35 per cent of the 2.1 million votes cast, narrowly defeated Tan Cheng Bock (by just over 7,000 votes) and became Singapore's 7th President. He was sworn in on 1 September 2011.

Other non-government positions he has held include chairman of: NTUC Investment and Cooperatives Committee (1979); NTUC Income Board of Trustees (1980–91); EDB International Advisory Board; and the Singapore-U.S. Business Council. He was also patron of the Singapore Dance Theatre.

In 1994, the Loughborough University in the United Kingdom conferred an honorary Doctor of Science degree on Tan. This was followed the next year by the award of an honorary Doctor of Laws degree by Murdoch University in Australia, and another honorary Doctor of Laws degree from Sheffield University in 1998. In 1997, Tan was also made honorary fellow of the Singapore Institute of Physics and in 2005, he was honoured with the inaugural Eminent Alumni Award by the NUS, as well as with the Centennial Torch as a symbol of his inspiring leadership in higher education and research in Singapore. The following year the Academy of Medicine inducted him into its portal with an honorary fellowship of the academy.

Tan married Mary Chee Bee Kiang in 1964 and they have three sons and one daughter.

Tan Koon Swan

(陈群川, Chen Qunchuan, 1940–)
Entrepreneur, politician, Malaysia

A colourful figure in his own right, Tan Koon Swan rose from humble beginnings to become general manager of Genting Highlands Bhd. and president of the Malaysian Chinese Association. Tan had a very acute sense of what the well-to-do and those in a position of power had the capability to do to improve the life of the less fortunate. This stemmed from his childhood. He was born on 24 September 1940 in Puchong New Village, Selangor to a poor family and had to help out at his parents' hawker stall whilst still in school. Despite these hardships, he worked hard and on completing his secondary school education, joined Lembaga Lektrik Negara as a clerk. While thus employed, he also sought to study part-time for his High School Certificate. His big break came in 1970 when he became general manager of Genting Highlands Berhad. His entrepreneurial vision helped ensure that the resort was a success. Soon afterwards, he attended a senior management course at Harvard University in the United States. Later, he became a laboratory technician with LLN before moving on to be an investigator of the Inland Revenue Department and then a tax consultant with Esso.

Tan's involvement in politics began in 1977 when he accepted an invitation by the then MCA president, Tan Sri Lee San Choon, to head the Koperatif Sebaguna Malaysia (KSM). He was initially called in to spearhead Chinese participation in all spheres of economic development in Malaysia, and to this end, was appointed managing director of Multi-Purpose Holdings Bhd. (MPHB).

Although this venture began as a purely economic and business-oriented one, it eventually led Tan to participate in politics. He must have felt that he would have been able to do more for the less fortunate and less well-to-do Malaysians if he had been able to change things at the state level. So it was that Tan formally entered politics on 8 July 1978 in the general elections in which he won the Raub parliamentary seat in Pahang. This in turn led to his officially joining the MCA Central Committee in 1979. Soon afterwards, his passion for liaising with the citizens resulted in his appointment as chairman of the MCA Wilayah Persekutuan State Liaison Committee. In the 1982 general elections, he again won a parliamentary seat in the Democratic Action Party (DAP) stronghold of Damansara.

However, the MCA's electoral successes did not foreshadow similar successes within its party for it was soon plunged into a leadership crisis in 1984 following the issue of phantom membership. The matter only came to be partially resolved when a group of Central Committee members held a seven-hour meeting on 17 March and demanded a task force to investigate the existence of phantom membership. When the demand was rejected, fifteen Central Committee members wanted an extraordinary meeting of the general assembly to be convened on 22 April so as to adopt a resolution to elect a committee to investigate the matter of phantom membership. The party's inability to resolve the matter during the 17 March meeting led to the dismissal of Tan from the Wilayah Persekutuan Liaison Committee on 19 March.

The troubles Tan faced and endured during this time did not dampen his spirit. He must have been well respected within the MCA for on 21 March 1984, a group of central delegates placed advertisements in the newspapers calling for all central delegates to demand a meeting to be held on 29 April to reinstate all who had been expelled, as well as to call for a special committee to probe into the phantom membership allegation. These advertisements also demanded the suspension of branch and divisional elections (which were to be held from March to May) to allow for the checking of the party's register. The calls for tighter scrutiny and a thorough investigation met with overwhelming support. Within 48 hours, 1,499 signatures were collected, representing 59 per cent of the total 2,517 central delegates. Unfortunately, the proposed meeting was blocked. In order to settle matter, the case was brought before the Ipoh High Court where the MCA was exposed for having 21,693 fake members in ten "controlled" divisions. This discovery led to forty-five MCA Members of Parliament and state assembly persons, with the support of 80 per cent of divisions and branches, including those of Wanita MCA (the women's wing of the MCA) and MCA Youth, to call for reforms within the party.

The crisis finally came to an end after twenty months when Deputy Prime Minister Ghafar Baba proposed that the MCA hold a fair and clean election. Thus, on 24 November 1985, a party election was held and Tan became the new president. Keeping his pledge to transform the MCA into a more liberal and democratic party, Tan organized a special delegates conference on 2 March 1986 to amend the party constitution so as to limit the presidential power in expelling members. Despite his political acumen, Tan was unable to keep a firm grip on his private business dealings. When he was charged in Singapore over his private business dealings, Tan sought to resign from the MCA presidency. This could be because he felt that a political leader should be free from any kind of scandal. However, his attempts were repeatedly rejected by the Central Committee. When the Singapore High Court finally made its verdict against him, Tan tendered another resignation. Although an MCA Central Committee delegation was dispatched to Singapore to persuade him otherwise, he refused. Thus, On 27 August 1986, the Central Committee accepted Tan's resignation with regret.

On his resignation, Dr Ling Liong Sik, who was then the MCA's deputy president, took over the leadership of the party in accordance with the new party constitution. Despite Tan's resignation, his legacy in reshaping the structure of the MCA lives on as Ling continually pushed forward his predecessor's plans for a more democratic and liberal MCA.

Tan Lark Sye

(陈六使, Chen Liushi, 1897–1972)

Community leader, educational promoter, political rights campaigner, rubber magnate, Singapore and Malaysia

Tan Lark Sye was a businessman who played many roles in modern Singapore and Malaysian society. However, he is best remembered as founder of the Nanyang University in Singapore in 1956, then the first and only Chinese-medium university outside China. Between 1959 and 1980, the year Nanyang University was amalgamated with the Singapore University into the National University of Singapore, it produced twenty-one batches of graduates, numbering some 12,000 persons.

Born on 7 June 1897 in Chi Mei, Tung An district, in Fukien province, China, into a farming family with seven sons, Tan Lark Sye was the second youngest. In 1902, both his parents passed away and so did his eldest brother a few years later, leaving the Tan household's youngsters to fend for themselves. With the exception of him and his second eldest brother, they all migrated to Singapore for better economic conditions. At the age of nineteen in 1916, Tan arrived in Singapore to join his other brothers, after having received a few years of free education at Chi Mei Primary School, founded by his clansman and uncle, Tan Kah Kee (1874–1961).

Tan Kah Kee had been a fellow emigrant himself, and since 1890 had built up an array of business enterprises involving pineapple canning, rubber planting, milling and trade. It was no surprise that four of the five brothers sought employment with him after their arrival. Tan Lark Sye first toiled at Tan Kah Kee's rubber mills and was then promoted to a foreman. Before long, Tan Kah Kee showed his appreciation of Tan Lark Sye's leadership qualities and work ethics by posting him back to the head office as a headquarters employee. Tan Lark Sye quickly learned the intricacies of the rubber trade, ranging from accounting, finance, and the import and export business. A few years of rigorous training sharpened his business acumen, broadened his own business networks, and hardened his determination to succeed in Singapore's commercial world as a rubber trader. His association with Tan Kah Kee and other staff members obviously helped lay the foundation for his own emergence as a rubber magnate from the 1930s.

In 1924, Tan Lark Sye and his brothers began to branch out on their own by forming a partnership in a rubber trading firm, Lien Ho Co. Under his brothers' management, Lien Ho Co. did rather poorly until he lent a hand. In 1925, a fully fledged Tan Lark Sye officially parted with Tan Kah Kee to establish a second rubber firm, Aik Ho Co., in direct or indirect competition with all other rubber traders in Singapore.

Under Tan Lark Sye's management, Aik Ho Co. expanded from merely doing rubber trading to rubber milling and planting in a fiercely competitive but increasingly depressed commercial world. Partly because Aik Ho Co. was not overextended and thus did not become indebted to local banks, it survived the Great Depression (1929–34) which destroyed many rubber firms, including Tan Kah Kee's business empire. By 1937, Aik Ho Co. had more than recovered from the slump and Tan Lark Sye was hosting a lavish banquet for visiting American rubber merchants, local business leaders, and friends. There were some 380 guests invited for the occasion, a memorable event well reported by the local public media. In 1938, Aik Ho Co. was transformed into Aik Ho Co. (Private) Ltd. with a capital of $1 million (Straits currency). In 1940, its capital was increased to $2 million, signalling ambitious business expansion. Indeed, from 1938 onward, Aik Ho Co. (Private) Ltd., had ventured into neighbouring countries by establishing branches in Malaya, Indonesia, Thailand, and Vietnam. Tan Lark Sye's firm rivalled Lee Kong Chian's Lee Rubber Co. Ltd. as two of the largest Chinese rubber firms in British Malaya.

After the Japanese Occupation of Malaya and Singapore (1942–45), Tan and his brothers rebuilt Aik Ho Co. (Private) Ltd. which peaked during the Korean War (1950–53) with rubber prices skyrocketing. Apart from rubber, Tan also had extensive interests in banking, insurance, and various manufacturing industries. He was a founder of Overseas Union Bank Ltd. in 1949, a board of directors member of the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation Ltd., and chairman of board of directors of both the Asia Insurance Co. Ltd. and Asia Life Insurance Co. Ltd. During the 1960s, Tan invested heavily in Malaysian paper mills and cement manufacturing companies and had extensive interests in the hotel and building construction industries.

Tan was a public man and community leader in his own right over a long period of time. He drew much of his support and influences from various business or community organizations, such as the Rubber Trade Association of Singapore, Singapore Rubber Manufacturers' Association, the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce, the Singapore Hokkien Huay Kuan, the Ee Hoe Hean Club, and the Tanjong Rhu Club. Each of these organizations often served as his power base, pressure group or lobbying body to effect economic, educational, and political changes.

As president of the Rubber Trade Association of Singapore in 1953, for example, Tan fought tooth and nail against government legislation to set up rubber export registration boards, allegedly to oversee the quality of rubber exported overseas. Tan and many Asian rubber traders firmly believed these quality control measures and procedures actually undermined the interests of Asian interests vis-a-vis those of European and American importers. A scrutiny of the minutes of Rubber Trade Association of Singapore between 1947 and 1956 will confirm that Asian rubber traders struggled against local European interests and rigid government control and restrictions on rubber trade. In a nutshell, Tan and fellow Asian traders championed free trade with less government control and interference in their business operations.

In 1950, Tan became president of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce for a two-year term against the backdrop of a decolonization process and the rise of communist China. Tan was blessed in having a united group of leaders within the Chamber to help him map out new strategies for educational and political change. This group of leaders consisted of Lee Kong Chian, Lien Ying Chow, Tan Chin Tuan, Ng Yik Huan, Ko Teck Kin, Tan Siak Kew, and Yap Pheng Geok who saw the need for the Chamber to take a more active political role in late colonial Singapore. They cleverly picked citizenship, the Chinese language and education issues to campaign for the political rights for residents who had been disfranchised.

In February 1951, the Chamber submitted a memorandum to the governor of Singapore, suggesting that citizenship conditions should be made easier for applicants. On 11 May 1951, Tan brought the citizenship and political rights issues to the open by urging overseas Chinese (hua-ch'iao) to demand for political rights, including the rights to elect members to the Legislative and Municipal Councils. He stressed that the Chamber would help residents apply for citizenship and become eligible voters. From 1952 to 1955, Tan repeatedly encouraged immigrant Chinese to become Singapore citizens or Singaporeans, loyal to the land of their adoption. After years of agitations and campaigns on the part of the Chamber, the number of registered voters increased sixfold from 48,155 in 1950 to 300,299 in 1955. However, the citizenship rights issue was not settled to the satisfaction of the Chamber until 1957, two years before Singapore achieved self-government.

Tan Lark Sye was best known by far as an educational promoter by founding Nanyang University in Singapore in 1956. The idea of founding a Chinese-medium university had been mooted in 1946 by Tan, Lee Kong Chian, and Ng Yik Huan. The three of them had consulted Tan Kah Kee at the Ee Hoe Hean Club on the proposal, but was rejected by the latter. Tan Kah Kee argued that immediate post-war economic conditions were hardly ripe for launching such a large project. In any case, he urged Chinese secondary school graduates to further their tertiary education at his Amoy University. The concept of a Chinese university remained dormant until 9 September 1950 when Tan Lark Sye, then president of the Singapore Hokkien Huay Kuan, revived the issue without providing concrete plans. His idea only received lukewarm response from the print media. On 16 January 1953, Tan made a formal proposal for the founding of a university, later known as Nanyang University, with a donation of $5 million from him personally. His 1953 proposal finally came to fruition in 1956 with a Jurong campus in Singapore.

Initially, the Colonial Office and the Malayan Government were vehemently opposed to its establishment, but a set of historical circumstances and key personnel got the university over the hurdles: popular Chinese community support, the U.S. Government endorsement, the Singapore Government's reluctance to reject it outright, and the laudable rationale by the commissioner general for Southeast Asia and chancellor of the University of Malaya, Malcolm MacDonald that the new university should be judged by its academic standard and not on political grounds.

As the Nanyang University was born during the era of the Cold War, the Malaya Emergency, and decolonization, it was inevitable that the new university was subject to control and influence by contending political forces of its times. From 1956 to 1965, student radicals provided strong leadership and enjoyed the lion's share of power and influence on campus, often to the chagrin of the colonial and Singapore Governments. Radical student activitism and its impact have yet to be properly assessed and documented.

It is worth noting that Tan also endorsed English education in Singapore and Malaya. A case in point was his donation of $300,000 in March 1950 to the University of Malaya's Foundation Fund. In 1953, the governor of Singapore, Sir John Nicoll, awarded him a Singapore Certificate of Merit for his education endeavours.

On 22 September 1963, the People's Action Party government rescinded Tan Lark Sye's citizenship seemingly on the grounds that the latter had become involved in party politics by siding with the opposition in the 1963 general elections. Tan had done so because quite a number of Barisan Sosialis candidates were graduates of the Nanyang University.

On 11 September 1972, Tan Lark Sye passed away in Singapore, leaving behind nine sons, three daughters, and numerous grandchildren.

Tan Lo Ping

(陈罗平, Chen Luoping, 1920–2007)
Chinese chess master, Philippines

Tan Lo Ping was the co-founder of the Asian Chinese Chess Federation which he served as secretary general for twelve years. He later became vice-president and honorary president of the Asian Chinese Chess Federation.

He was born on 6 December 1920 in Manila. At thirteen years of age, he was sent to Jimei in Xiamen, Fujian, to study. He stayed there for seven years. Chess was quite popular in Xiamen at the time and he used all his leisure time either to play chess or in the library reading the Chinese chess column edited by Zhou De Lu in the Hong Kong Daily. He studied the columns meticulously and read up on the classical references to chess. His real name was Tan Ing Lue, but in February 1940, at the age of twenty, he joined a national chess competition for the first time, unbeknown by his father, who disapproved of his joining chess competitions. As he did not let his father know about this, he entered the competition using a different name. He not only won spectacularly in that competition, but he also broke records. When the papers reported the news, his father did not know it was he who won. From then, he always used Tan Lo Ping as his name since playing chess stayed with him his whole life.

In 1982 he was vice-chairman of the World Chinese Chess Federation where he served in the committee to standardize rules in international Chinese chess tournaments. Drawing from competition rules from different countries, the committee succeeded in working out standard rules — an invaluable contribution to the world of Chinese chess.

Tan gained world renown and recognition when he was chosen as expert judge in world Chinese chess. He also spent time writing about chess for popular consumption, including editing a chess journal and chess bulletin from 1947 until his death. In his columns he gave examples of traps and tricks that could be adopted in the opening stage, moves to gain advantage during the middle stage, and more tricks and moves for the ending stage. His special skill is in the ending stage. He explained in his columns the advantages and disadvantage of moves made by players in a particular game.

He persisted in churning out his weekly columns in a Chinese language daily continuously for sixty years without receiving any remuneration. His work was done in a spirit of volunteerism, sparked by his desire to share his expertise with a greater audience.

In November 1997, at the age seventy-eight, he won the championship for overseas participants in the Cheng Du world invitational chess tournament.

He established the Fei Hua Xiangqi Hui (Philippine Chinese Chess Club, currently Philippine Federal Chess Enthusiasts Association, Inc.) in 1948 and he became its lifetime secretary general. In this role, he single-handedly planned chess competitions many times. Later he also helped spread interest in chess outside Manila and was co-founder or initiator of the xiangqi hui (chess club) in Cebu City (1951), Davao City (1953), and Cagayan de Oro City (1957).

In 1960 he began to organize the first tournaments outside the country — in Hong Kong and Taiwan. Other countries such as Singapore and Malaysia soon followed. In 1976 a tournament in Beijing, China, was held, followed by tournaments in western United States in 1980 and 1989. A year later, the Philippine Federal Chess was the first country that invited China's chess players to the Philippines.

Tan's biggest contribution to world chess was the founding in 1978 of the Asian Chinese Chess Federation in Kuching, East Malaysia, which he served as secretary general for twelve years and later became its lifetime honorary president. The present name of the organization is Asian Xiangqi Federation. After the Asian Federation was organized, member countries held a tournament every year and a conference every two years. These activities served to promote friendship and deeper relationships among the chess players, their countries, and the association. Tan saw to it that he attended all the activities of the federation.

In 2001, Tan co-edited Shijie Xiangqi Paiju Daquan (世界象棋排局大全) published by 成都蜀蓉棋艺出板社 in March 2001. His co-editors were 杨典 (Liaoning, China), 王前民 (Hubei, China), and 李树明 (the United States). This book is a collection of writings from famous creators of Chinese chess puzzles (排局) all over the world so chess players around the world can sharpen their skills in solving puzzles.

A memorable event in his life as Chinese chess master occurred from 25 September 1991 to 2 November 1991 when the Philippines hosted the Women's World Chess Championship Match where Xie Jun (of China) was pitted against the thirteen-year reigning champion, Maya Chiburdanidze (of USSR). Tan took extra care of young Xie Jun and looked out carefully for her health, especially in the hot Philippine climate. Xie Jun won the match and wrested the queen title on 29 October 1991. Tan was ecstatic and organized a surprise party for Xie Jun at the Emerald Garden Restaurant near Rizal Park the next day which happened to be her twenty-first birthday.

Tan's last column appeared on 3 June 2007, two days before he passed away. In his last column, he told his readers that for the last sixty years since 1947, he had continuously produced his columns, with the support of chess lovers. "But then due to unavoidable circumstances, I have to say goodbye and to thank all my supporters." He appeared to have a premonition of his demise. His contribution to Chinese chess is something we bow our heads to. His whole life was that of a chess master, ans for his last ten years, he had chess as his companion, as his organization, his family, his great passion, and honour.

Tan was revered not just for his skills and expertise that surpassed others, but also — perhaps more — for his significant contributions to the development of chess. Not only was he renowned as a chess master in the Philippines, but his unstinted contributions and sacrifices for the promotion of Chinese chess worldwide remain unparalleled.

Tan Lok Han

(陈洛汉, Chen Luohan, 1911–96)
Musician, Malaysia

Tan Lok Han, real name Chen Chengxin (陈成欣), was born in 1911 in Fujian Province, China and came to Malaya with his relatives when he was nine years old. During the Second World War, he changed his name to Chen Liangmin (陈良民) and later Tan Lok Han (陈洛汉) to disguise his identity from the Japanese army as he had taken part in the campaign to propagate songs of anti-Japanese war. He was a self-taught musician, violinist, cellist, clarinettist, pianist, and composer, and had devoted his life to promoting music education and composition. His works were included in the albums Dai Ni Zou Jin Yi Pian Ge Sheng (带你走进一片歌声) (Leading You Into the Realm of Songs), Shi Jie Ming Ge Gai Bian (世界名歌改编) (Rearrangement of Famous Songs Around the World), Han Li Bao Ge Ju (汉丽宝歌剧) (Hang Li Poh The Opera), etc. However, many of his compositions have not been compiled into collections yet.

Tan Lok Han's exposure to music started in 1920 when he was in primary school. He was allocated a piccolo when he joined the school band and brought it home and explored the wonderful and beautiful world of music all by himself. He was then irrevocably committed to music since. Tan was considered to be a music genius of his time, learning brass music, Chinese orchestra, symphony, bamboo flute, Chinese vertical flute, violin, cello, and piano all by himself. Not only that, but he also discovered the distinct characteristics of each instrument and blended them together in his musical compositions of light musicals, choruses, suites, accompaniment music, even school songs, and official songs for associations.

Han Li Bao (汉丽宝) (Hang Li Poh) and Zhong Guo Gua Fu Shan (中国寡妇山) (China's Widow Mountain) were two musical extragavanzas composed by Tan. The former was indeed his blood, sweat, and tears, and also his greatest consolation, and it took him four years (1966–70) to complete and was over a hundred pages thick. In 1971, when Han Li Bao was performed for the public at the Kuala Lumpur City Hall, the auditorium was packed to the brim without an empty seat for nine consecutive evenings. It earned rave reviews from all circles. On 17 November 1979, a special concert featuring Tan Lok Han's works held at the auditorium of the Institute of Language and Literature was yet another recognition of this musician's contributions. In 1981, he led the Ren Jing Theatrical and Choir Troupe (人镜剧社合唱团) to perform in Hong Kong and Taiwan, creating history as the first ever Malaysian choir to perform overseas and to showcase local compositions on the international stage. In 1993, during the Asian Music Festival in Singapore, Han Li Bao was performed for the second time and again it won a unanimous accolade from the audience.

Tan Lok Han's compositions have been performed in many countries such as Singapore, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Korea, America, Italy, etc. They were never meant to make money. In all these decades when his works were selected to be featured in any concert or singing competition, he never rejected the request or intervened in their rendition. Tan had continuously written over forty school songs or official songs for associations all over the world. Other than composing songs, he had also rearranged countless famous songs from around the world, folk songs, and Malay rhymes for choirs. The characteristics of his composition are their natural and smooth flowing melody with strong contrast and clearly defined levels.

Tan Lok Han's contribution to promoting music education and popularizing music has been recognized in many ways, including being awarded the honorary title of "PJK" by the Sultan of Selangor in 1974. He was also one of the recipients of the 1st Chinese Cultural and Art Award from the Malaysian Chinese Cultural Society in 1992. In 1995, his biography was included under the Local Studies subject of the Chinese Primary School Year 5 syllabus and the Teacher's Guide by the Malaysian Ministry of Education, and both books started to be used in 1997. In 1995, he also received the Highest Honorary Award in the category of Local Compositions in the 1st Malaysian Performing Arts Xin Chuan Award.

Tan Lok Han had many students and disciples, such as famed baritone Xu Qingqiang (许庆强) (Richard Hooi) who resided in Canada; famed local sopranos Lee Shuilian (李水莲) (Lillian Lee Chooi Lean) and Zhuo Ruyan (卓如燕) (Angela Chock); tenor Chen Rong (陈容) (Armando Chin Yong), pianist Chen Zhangyao (陈章耀) (Chen's nephew) etc. On 9 July 1996, Chen succumbed to a heart complication and his eighty-five years of life in music came to an end.

Tan, Lucio

(陈永栽, Chen Yongzai, 1934–)

Business leader, community leader, philanthropist, Philippines

Lucio Tan is known today as one of the wealthiest and most influential men in the Philippines, and even in Asia. He is among the first successful Chinese-Filipino businessmen to control a true conglomerate that includes companies in the most diverse fields of endeavour, including food and beverages, chemical products, tobacco, airlines and aviation-related businesses, hotel and tourism related businesses, real estate and property development, banking and finance, agri-business, hospital, publishing, and education. His business, wealth, and influence span continents. He is also renowned for his community leadership and his philanthropy in support of indigents in general, and education in particular.

Tan and his family came from humble beginnings and it took him a lifetime of struggles, hard work, courage, and risk taking to reach his present stature. Born on 17 July 1934, he is the eldest son of Tan Yan Kee and Chua King Ha. As with many families of southern China at the time, life was difficult and resources were scarce. Tan was just four years old when he travelled with his parents from their hometown in Qingyang in Jinjiang, Fujian Province, to the Philippines. They escaped the ravages wrought by the invading Japanese Imperial Army.

War caught up with the family when Japan invaded the Philippines in 1942. Tan's philosophy and attitude in life were forged by the hardships and challenges that the war brought to them. They had to compete for scarce resources, find ways to stay together, and survive the persecution and hardships of the Japanese Occupation. After the war, the young Tan first lived with his uncle in Naga City in Bicol, in southern Philippines, then finished secondary school in 1955 at Chiang Kai Shek High School. His father worked as an employee of Cheng Ban Yak Company's tobacco factory.

Being the eldest in the family, Tan had to work while studying to help support his family. He worked with Bataan Cigar and Cigarette Company to save up for his university degree. His job entailed buying tobacco leaves from farmers in Ilocos, in northern Philippines. Not only was he exposed to the dealings between the company and the farmers-suppliers, but he also learned the many aspects of the daily operations of the tobacco company. He took up chemical engineering at the Far Eastern University and later became the chemist of the cigarette company.

In the late 1950s, he started two small companies, an electronic shop and a cornstarch factory. Both businesses failed, but Tan was determined to learn from these experiences. When the cornstarch company closed, he tried his luck with chemicals, starting with the production of glycerine. Tan realized that glycerine, a main ingredient in cigarette manufacturing that was then imported, is made up of coconut oil and caustic soda, which were readily and cheaply available in the Philippines. Tan's enterprise, Himmel Industries, succeeded beyond expectations and became the leading supplier of glycerine. It expanded into manufacturing and trading other chemicals and food and beverage additives.

Tan expanded his enterprise with the knowledge and experience he gained as a very young employee of the Bataan Cigar and Cigarette Company. In 1965, he set up his own cigarette company, Fortune Tobacco. His success in this endeavour led him to many other fields and businesses, but not without first suffering a huge setback. A super typhoon destroyed most of Fortune's facilities in 1968. With the help of his workers, they salvaged what they could and Tan used this chance to modernize the equipment and facilities that finally made the company on a par with the world's top cigarette makers.

In 1970, Tan ventured into the agriculture business and acquired a state-of-the-art hog-raising facility in Taiwan which he placed on his property in Tanay, Rizal. This became Foremost Farms, one of the largest hog farms in the country and in Southeast Asia. In 1977, Tan bought the ailing General Bank and Trust Company, and infused it with new resources and better management to make it into what is now Allied Bank. The bank currently has a network of more than 250 branches, including some in London, Xiamen, Singapore, Guam, and Bahrain. It also expanded into loans insurance, leasing, and finance. A year later, Tan acquired Riverside Steel, Inc., the Philippine subsidiary of Kawasaki Steel, one of the biggest steel companies in Japan. It was renamed "Grandspan Development Corporation" and went into large-scale building and construction projects. The quality of its steel fabrication attracted partners from Singapore, Hong Kong, and Japan, which enabled it to go into large-scale steel production that fabricated the steel rails of the Metro Rail Transit, the longest highway in Metro Manila, running the whole stretch of Epifanio de los Santos Acenue (EDSA).

One of Tan's boldest business ventures was to challenge the monopoly of San Miguel Beer Corporation, the biggest beer producer in the country, with the establishment of Asia Brewery in 1982. Using advanced technology and facilities, he introduced new products and brands of beverages and beers (Beer Hausen, Carlsberg, Budweiser, Colt 45, among them) to end San Miguel's long-standing monopoly of the Philippine beer market. In 1988, Asia Brewery was complemented with the acquisition of Tanduay Distillery, one of the oldest and biggest manufacturers of rum in the world, established in 1854. With greater zeal, Tan expanded Tanduay's business through a modernization of its machinery.

Tan also acquired the 500-room, five-star Century Park Hotel in 1985, which is now a favourite of visiting dignitaries, including top China leaders such as Zhu Rongji (朱镕基), Jiang Zemin (江泽民), and Jia Qinglin (贾庆林). Complementing the hotel and tourism venture was the establishment of Macro Asia in 1995, which provides catering, ground handling, and engineering and maintenance services to over twenty international airlines landing in the Philippines.

Two rather controversial business ventures which Tan went into against the advice of his family and business advisers were the rescue of the country's flag carrier, Philippine Airlines (PAL), in 1995, and the Philippine National Bank in 2000. Both were on the verge of collapse, beset as they were with labour problems and huge debts. Tan's quixotic decision to rescue PAL arose from the fact that he could not stand by and see the pride and symbol of the Philippines, Asia's first airline, being swallowed up by foreign owners. He infused US$400 million to purchase forty new planes and rehabilitate the company. His relentless efforts paid off. In 2000, for the first time in a decade, the airline registered a profit. His success in PAL led to his boldness in acquiring the debt-laden Philippine National Bank, again due to his quixotic desire to protect a national interest. Tan's affinity to his origins in China did not preclude him from his loyalty to and fierce love for the Philippines, the country of his hopes and fulfilment of his dreams.

Today, the Lucio Tan Group of companies, made up of more than a hundred companies, has diversified into at least forty sectors, giving employment to 50,000 workers and a million farmers. Tan himself is a workaholic who puts in sixteen to eighteen hours a day.

From 1999 to 2000, Tan was elected 23rd president of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce. His twenty years at the federation was marked with his efforts at promoting better Philippine-China relations. He led the federation in its first official visit to China in 1994, and again in 1997. He also donated hundreds of schoolhouses, under the Operation Barrio School Building Programme of the Federation, through the Tan Yan Kee Foundation, set up in 1986 in honour of his father. The foundation is also involved in building hospitals in sustained programmes aimed at strengthening health and social welfare needs, livelihood, sports, and in anti-crime and anti-drug campaigns. And as a community leader, on 12 June 2000, Tan spearheaded the Chinese-Filipino community's first grand celebration of Philippine Independence Day, a practice continued to this day.

Tan's commitment to education includes the establishment of the Foundation for Upgrading the Standard of Education (FUSE). It has programmes to raise the teaching skills of educators, in the specific subjects of English, science, and mathematics. To date, FUSE has trained more than 15,000 teachers in sixteen regions of the country. Tan also sends physicians abroad for further studies and specialization through the Asia Brewery Medical Scholarship Program. His only condition is that the scholars return to the Philippines to serve their less fortunate countrymen. To implement his vision of education at the university level, Tan, in 1990, acquired the University of the East and the U.E.-Ramon Magsaysay Medical Center, both in Manila. Investing heavily in this education institution, he was able to improve the quality of education through better facilities, training, and management. From 2001 to the present, he supports Tsinoy students on a five-week intensive Chinese-language learning course. In 2002, the Tan Yan Kee Library was built and now boasts of a collection of 50,000 volumes.

Tan's life has indeed touched many people — scholars, the homeless, aged, abandoned and sick; and his success has also inspired and encouraged many other budding entrepreneurs.

Tan, Mary Christine RGS

(1930–2003)

Religious leader, human rights advocate, Philippines

Sister Christine Tan (陈), a sister of the Religious of the Good Shepherd, was many things to many people in the Philippines. She was a human rights advocate, a nationalist activist, a religious leader. But most of all, she was a true friend of the poor. She broke through class boundaries and, like the model of the Good Shepherd, strode into untested waters to reach out to the last, the least, and the lost. The outpouring of affection and appreciation after she died from those who had experienced her goodness was proof of her zeal and the breadth of her embrace.

"I have no regrets," Sr Mary Christine Tan said shortly before she died in 2003. "I have given my all." In prayer and in the bosom of the poor, she said, she had found the "pearl of great price".

In many ways, Sr Christine was controversial, unconventional and unorthodox. Though she was always in the thick of things, she remained deeply spiritual and would often withdraw to connect through prayer with her personal god, the god "with a thousand names". She loved silence and was known to be a woman of few words.

Together with several Good Shepherd Sisters, she lived and worked among the poor for almost twenty-five years starting in 1979. They gave up the material comforts most religious enjoyed and journeyed with the dispossessed, fighting alongside them, praying with them.

With her fellow nuns, Sr Christine founded the Alay Kapwa Christian Community and set up cooperatives and livelihood projects for the poor in Manila, Cavite, Quezon, and Cebu. She encouraged the poor to come close to God through prayer, by living the gospel, and reaching out to their fellow poor. She wanted them to discover their dignity as Filipino citizens and children of God.

Sr Christine came from a family of comfortable means. Born on 30 November 1930 in Manila, she was christened Amanda Justina and nicknamed Mengie. She was the fifth of seven children of Judge Bienvenido Tan Sr and Salome Limgenco. Her father, though part Chinese, was raised in the traditional Filipino way. Her mother was pure Chinese.

Sr Christine's paternal grandfather, Tan Ut Ko, was born in Yu Hue in Zhangzhou, China on 12 January 1852. His real family name was Go, but he took on the Tan name after the Tan family in China adopted him. The Tans maltreated him so he stowed away on a boat to the Philippines. There he married a Filipino woman who bore him two sons. After his first wife died he married his sister-in-law, Clemencia. He was baptized a Catholic and took on the name Gonzalo Arceo Tan.

Clemencia and Gonzalo had three daughters and two sons. One of their sons, Bienvenido Sr, was Sr Christine's father.

Sr Chrstine's grandfather on her mother's side was Lim Uy Geng, born 14 November 1871 in Quanzhou in Xiamen, China. He came to the Philippines when he was in his early teens and worked as a coolie. His name was changed to Antonio Heras Limgenco when he was baptized a Catholic. (His godfather's name was Antonio Heras.)

Antonio Limgenco's wife was Tomasa Victorino Dee whom he met in a cigar factory.

The union produced ten children. One of them, Salome, was Sr Christine's mother.

Sr Christine's parents did not have an easy courtship. Salome came from a wealthy Chinese family while Bienvenido Sr was a lawyer whose father, though wealthy at one time, had lost his fortune during the Spanish-American War. Beinvenido Sr and Salome had one son — Bienvenido Jr, who became an outstanding public servant and headed the Bureau of Internal Revenue during the presidency of Corazon Cojuangco Aquino from 1986–92, and six daughters — Consuelo, Caridad, Teresita, Amanda (Sr Christine), Leticia, and Angeles.

The young Amanda attended St Scholastica's College in Manila where she graduated with a liberal arts degree, with a major in mathematics. In 1954, one year after she graduated, she joined the Religious of the Good Shepherd. She spent her novitiate in Los Angeles, the United States, and was given the religious name, Sr Mary Christine. She returned to the Philippines in the late 1950s.

In 1970, she was elected the first Filipino provincial superior of the Religious of the Good Shepherd of the Philippine Province (which included Korea, Hong Kong, and Guam at the time). Invoking the statement of the First Asian Bishops Conference on making an "option for the poor", Sr Christine pushed open many doors and urged more sisters to go out to the materially poor and live among them. She was ever thankful that "a man named John", had come along (referring to Pope John XXIII who made possible radical changes in the Church through the Second Vatican Council).

When President Ferdinand Marcos imposed Martial Law in 1972, Sr Christine, who was at the time chair of the Association of Major Religious Superiors of Women in the Philippines, and other leaders in the religious sector, organized themselves to fight military abuses and prevent arbitrary detention, torture, and involuntary disappearances. They set up task forces to address the crying need for justice work, communication, and organizing in rural and urban areas. Those were dark and dreadful years that required strong and daring leadership.

When her term as provincial superior was over in 1976, Sr Christine continued to serve various sectors through non-profit organizations and human rights movements. But it was for the materially poor that her heart bled most.

When she and a handful of nuns moved to the slums in Leveriza Street in Manila's Malate district in 1979, there was only stark poverty. Many things have changed since then — not just in the physical landscape but, more importantly, in the hearts of many.

Her good friend, former President Corazon C. Aquino, said of her: "She possessed the qualities I was looking for — integrity, patriotism, selflessness and dedication. I think Sr Christine was a great woman. She had clearly shown by example how we should love God and our neighbor."

In 1986, after the Marcos dictatorship ended through People Power, President Corazon C. Aquino appointed Sr Christine to the commission that drafted the 1987 Constitution. Later, under the Estrada administration, she served on the board of the Philippine Charity Sweepstakes Office, where she stirred a hornet's nest when she exposed irregular fund disbursements that involved members of the Estrada family.

Her fellow Good Shepherd nuns paid her tribute for breaking ground during "the angry 70s" and for "bringing new wineskins for new wine". She not only sent poor kids to school on scholarships, but she also personally tutored them in the afternoons.

Sr Christine never thought of her lifestyle as severe. Sleeping on the hard floor was good for the back, she said. What's bad, she said, was the drunkenness of men. She admired the women. "It's the women who are strong. At first we tried to help everybody but we created parasites. The hardworking we help, the lazy are left to die, ignored completely."

It is in prayer that she found the meaning of everything. "In prayer," she confided, "when you go deep into the silence, you actually feel God. You and God are merged as one. In that utter stillness you could feel the light, and the fire and tight embrace, and the tenderness enfolding you. Then you become strong like a bull, you go straight like an arrow."

Sr Christine died on 6 October 2003 after a seven-month bout with cancer. Her body was cremated immediately. On 10 December 2004, Human Rights Day, her name was engraved on the Wall of Remembrance at the Bantayog ng mga Bayani (Monument for Heroes). She was hailed for her uncommon courage and leadership during the dark days of martial rule, for her nationalist stance, and for her compassion and love for the poor. She was also conferred the Bukas Palad Award by the Ateneo de Manila University. When she was alive, she had also received a number of citations for her courage, among them the Chino Roces Award.

Tan, Mely G.

(Tan Giok Lan, 陈玉兰, Chen Yulan, 1930–)
Sociologist, Indonesia

Tan Mely G., commonly known as Mely, is one of the first women social scientists of Chinese descent who received her Ph.D. from the University of California (UC), Berkeley. She is a leading expert on Chinese Indonesians and has been active in promoting the movement of anti-violence against women.

Tan was born on 11 June 1930, the third child of five children, and second daughter of a Peranakan father who, as a young man, moved from Manado (North Sulawesi) to Java and eventually to Batavia (now Jakarta), where he met and married his Peranakan wife. Tan was sent to the Hollandsch Chinese School in Jakarta for her primary education. She went on to the Hogere Burger School (HBS) — also in Jakarta — for her secondary education. Due to this basic training and the daily use of Dutch at home, she is fluent in the language. Although she learnt Mandarin at the Department of Sinology, she never really mastered it.

She was the first woman in her family to study abroad. In 1963, two years after she finished her M.A. degree at Cornell in July 1961, she was the only woman among twelve persons recruited as part of the institutional development program funded by the Ford Foundation of the Center for Economic and Social Research of the Indonesian Council of Sciences (renamed Indonesian Institute of Sciences in 1967) to continue studying for her Ph.D. in Sociology at UC, Berkeley. Since then, her career as a researcher and scholar has become very clear. Tan is a scholar who, according to Charles Coppel (2008, p. ix), is known for "the objectivity of her sociological analysis as well as for her attention to detail". Actually, according to Tan herself, her career as a researcher started when she was a third-year student in the Department of Sinology, University of Indonesia. She joined a science writing competition organized by the Catholic Scientific Circle, and won the prize for her paper on the ethnic Chinese in Jakarta.

Her interest in research was motivated further by the arrival in 1957 of G. William Skinner, a professor of anthropology from Cornell University, who, through Professor Tjan Tjoe Som, the head of the Sinology Department, involved her in his project on Chinese Indonesians. The study she did in Sukabumi that became her M.A. thesis at Cornell — like Donald R. Willmott's study on the Chinese in Semarang which was published in 1960 — is now one of the few studies on a local ethnic Chinese community of that period. As mentioned above, between 1963 and 1968, she studied at U.C. Berkeley to obtain her Ph.D. degree in sociology, and on her return to Indonesia, became the first woman with a Ph.D. in sociology. Due to the scarcity of qualified people, despite her "triple minority" status — as a woman, an ethnic Chinese, and a Roman Catholic – Tan was able to get a leading position. Besides being recognized as an expert on Chinese minority issues, she is also known as an expert on development indicators and changes in social stratification, on women and health, and on women and empowerment.

Her first health-related project was a joint project of LEKNAS-LIPI and the Directorate of Nutrition of the Department of Health, sponsored by UNICEF in 1970, on "Social and Cultural Aspects of Food Patterns and Food Habits in Five Rural Areas in Indonesia". Her work on women started in 1973, and in 1976, she became co-author of the Occasional Monograph Series ICP Work Agreement Reports of the Smithsonian Institute on "Women in Jakarta: Family Life and Family Planning", in Cultural Factors and Population in Developing Countries. Since then, she has worked consistently on four issues: ethnic Chinese, societal development, women and empowerment and women and health. On the last topic, she made a study with Budi Soeradji, and published Ethnicity and Fertility in Indonesia in 1986 by the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies in Singapore. Tan has travelled extensively for scientific and academic meetings and assignments, which include being a guest lecturer at the University of Malaya in Kuala Lumpur in 1989. She was also a visiting scholar at the CSEAS of Kyoto University in 1986–87, and a member of the task force on psycho-social research of the World Health Organization from 1977 to 1981, and again from 1990 to 1993. For her continuing work as a dedicated researcher, scholar, and civil servant, she received the Bintang Mahaputera Pratama from President Abdurachman Wahid in August 2000. After she retired from LIPI in 1997, she was invited to become head of the Research Institute at Unika Atma Jaya until December 2001.

At present, she is a lecturer for the Graduate Program on Police Sciences at the University of Indonesia. Throughout her career of almost fifty years as a sociologist, she wrote a great number of articles on ethnic Chinese, societal development, women and health, and women and empowerment which were published in Indonesia and abroad. Her latest book — launched together with a festschrift on the occasion of her seventy-eighth birthday which was organized by the Lembaga Penelitian dan Pengabdian Masyarakat (LPPM) Unika Atma Jaya — is Etnis Tionghoa di Indonesia: Kumpulan Tulisan. It is a collection of her selective writings on ethnic Chinese written in Indonesian between 1990s and 2004. The book was published by Yayasan Obor in 2008, with a preface by Charles Coppel. In that book, Tan also included her career history as an Indonesian social scientist, titled "Indonesian Odyssey: Jakarta, Cornell, Berkeley, Jakarta". Her works on the Chinese, as Coppel indicated, have moved from her earlier concerns with the question of assimilation to focus more on discrimination and how to end this (2008, p. x). The shifting perspective is particularly obvious in her writings after the 1998 May riots, and can be seen in chapters 10 and 11 of her latest book. In chapter 10, she talked about the social and cultural dimensions of gender-based violence in Indonesia, which is, in her opinion, "the result of compound or multiple discrimination, or what is now referred to as intersectionality in discrimination" (Mely G. Tan 2008, p. 250). According to her, "[t]o stop this process from continuing, there should be the realization that Indonesian society is multicultural, which in turn requires the acceptance of a positive view of diversity as leading to the enrichment of all… and [t]here should also be the realization that discriminative behaviour towards particular groups in society is indicative of a mindset that is basically unjust" (Mely G. Tan 2008, p. 258). "To establish this type of attitude and behavior," she continued, "there needs to be an enabling environment. This means legal reform, changing the mindset of society…" (Tan 2008). I think it is in relation to her idea of how to end discrimination that she then explores the issue of "transitional justice" in chapter 11 of the same book, as an effort to put right the discrimination in race, ethnicity, and religion (Tan 2008, pp. 277–78).

Tan, Michael L.

(陈万杰, Chen Wanjie, 1952–)
Medical anthropologist, educator, Philippines

Michael Tan is among the foremost experts in Philippine anthropology. Tan's work as an educator has benefited thousands of students who have entered his classroom. As a writer in one of the leading broadsheets in the country, he offers insight that have reached millions of Filipinos. As a public health professional, he embarked on forays that took him from the mountains of the Cordilleras to the boondocks of Mindanao.

It seems natural for the young, curious Tan to have started out as a veterinarian as his family loved animals, especially dogs. He wanted to care for them, and hence took up the veterinary medicine course in college. However when he was doing volunteer work in the rural areas, the contrast between the rich and poor pained him, and he therefore got more involved in community projects, especially those in public health. This exposure led him to take a doctorate degree that focused on medical anthropology so that his interests in both medicine and community work would find a happy marriage in his career.

Today, he is chair of the Anthropology Department of the University of the Philippines, as well as a member of the Faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences, and is also serving in the Faculty of the Ateneo de Manila College of Medicine. Additionally, he also serves as Philippine country adviser for the David and Lucile Packard Foundation (California); a member of the International Working Group on Sexuality and Social Policy, Columbia University (New York); and a member of World Health Organization's Expert Advisory on Drug Policies and Management. He has written more than a thousand articles analysing and explaining the behaviour of Filipinos in more than one of the leading dailies in the country and has authored many books and articles, often focusing on indigenous medical beliefs, sex and sexuality, reproductive and sexual health (particularly HIV/AIDS), pharmaceuticals, and health policy issues.

Tan was born on 12 September 1952 to Chinese parents and raised in Manila. The maternal side of his family imposed a predominantly Chinese environment for them, which resulted in a "very strong Chinese upbringing in the sense that people spoke Hokkien, ate Chinese food, and observed many Chinese rituals on birthdays and deaths". This same maternal side brought Tan and his siblings to the Fujian province during their vacations, where they were exposed to the lifestyle there. Tan remembers that his father, who spent many years in China, also tried to stress the Chinese side, but being an internationalist basically, he emphasized English as the lingua franca at home. Tan's mother tended to mix Chinese and Filipino cultures. Tan and his siblings were exposed to Chinatown culture but also had a strong dose of Filipino culture, especially of the Catholic religion. This dichotomy in his cultural upbringing presented a unique perspective for the young Tan: he underwent strong schizophrenia initially, then learnt to appreciate his mixed background and upbringing. This same background emphasized the need to be more open. Tan defines himself a multicultured person and is proud to be so. He extends this thinking into what he sees as an exaggeration of how people tend to label themselves.

At the same time, his consciousness of his heritage has never been an issue for the good doctor. From the very beginning, Tan saw himself as a Filipino, primarily; his Chinese heritage has only strengthened his identity. "Multiculturalism is always an advantage because you are able to draw on a larger store of transmitted wisdom, which is what culture is all about." This openness to other cultural orientations spurred Tan towards the desire to reach out and know why people act the way they do. His forays into community health brought him to far-off places — into the boondocks of the Cordilleras even — where he came across people very different from himself. There he understood that there is more to this thing called "culture" than how much of one's "blood" percentage is Chinese or Filipino or whatever else.

This evolution brought Tan to the crossroads of his career. Knowing that he loved medicine, anthropology, and writing, he decided not to choose, but to integrate all three. He now sees himself as primarily an educator and his efforts at reaching out to youth through the academe has borne fruit. "We have a very high demand for our courses. Students don't usually know too much about anthro when they enter UP but if they happen to take one anthropology course as an elective, they tend to keep coming back. Others even shift to our courses. On average, we get only about 10 to 15 new anthro freshmen each year, but about 20 to 25 shiftees or transferees from other courses. People do appreciate the importance of cross-cultural understanding, once they're exposed [to it]."

He adds that, "anthropology can contribute in terms again of appreciating our cultural diversity as a strength, rather than as a hindrance. The United States would not have developed as it has without cultural diversity; we need to recognize that asset too in the Philippines."

To do this, Tan suggests a middle ground of sorts, "Today, we speak more of integration, retaining Chinese culture even as we become Filipino. It's happening anyway, whether we recognize it or not; for example, the Chinese spoken in the Philippines is losing its tones, incorporating many Filipino words. There are even variations like Cebuano Hokkien and Ilokano Hokkien, depending on where the Tsinoy is growing up."

Tan sees the Filipino culture as a continuing evolution. This and his consciousness of his social responsibility keep him busy professionally, "There are just so many needs in public health, in education that one's work will never be enough."

Tan's father, Julio Tan, is himself a scholar who worked as a journalist and served as Secretary-General of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, Inc. He also helped in anti-crime activities of the community and was appointed a commissioner of the Presidential Anti-Organized Crime Commission in 2002 to 2010.

On the home front, Tan does his best to live up to the principles he has learned from being the product of more than one culture.

"We all leave our imprint by what we do, rather than we say or write. I try very hard to walk the talk with ethical living, from being pesco-vegetarian (fish and vegetables, and I'm working on reducing the fish part too), using less of the car, using solar heating, even using organic diapers for the kids (I did try cloth ones but had to give up; it was too difficult). I'm a converted Quaker and our principles are simplicity, integrity, peace and justice. We don't believe, however, in preaching, but in witness [sic.], i.e. living out our principles. (Even writing that I'm Quaker already makes me uncomfortable.) I do recognize my Catholic heritage as well, which remains important to me."

He also imparts this knowledge to his own children. "I am raising them as Tsinoys and Tsinays but want them to be Filipino foremost. I also want them to be Filipino but with a global outlook, appreciative of the wonders of cultures throughout the world."

In looking at Tan's life, one will realize — this doctor-educator isn't just living up to his principles, he is serving as an example to everyone else. Tan does not rest on his laurels; rather, he sees the world around him and understands that we are what we are, and there is so much more to life than mere labels and terms. Life for this multicultural individual is an evolution and it will always reveal new things about people. And so his works continue to leave a mark for posterity.

Tan, Paulino Yu

(陈忠诚, Chen Zhongcheng, 1946–)
Computer scientist, educator, Philippines

It is a tremendous achievement to build another level of innovation on an existing structure with a deep foundation. On the other hand, to be one of the people who actually helped lay the foundation for that same structure is an even rarer thing. Dr Paulino Yu Tan holds the distinction of being the latter — as one of the pioneers who helped develop information technology education in the Philippines, as well as one of the principal movers in charting its course throughout its very young history in the archipelago.

The youngest of six children, Tan, who was born on 22 June 1946, grew up in the historic district of Quiapo, Manila, where his father, Tan Chi King, ran a shoe store called King's Shoes that specialized in the famous Marikina shoes, Tan became exposed at an early age to a mixed business and family environment common to many Chinese-Filipinos.

Living above the shoe store meant constant exposure to this environment of "consistent, diligent hard work" which, he notes, eventually became an integral part of his way of life. His mother, Yu Beng Jit, took care of family-related work while his father, with the help of his siblings — particularly his eldest brother and sister — would work from early morning to late evening running the store. When he grew older, he eventually helped out in the store. Instead of the customary route of preparing him to work for the family business eventually, his father encouraged him to focus on his studies and make something of himself on his own.

Possessing a keen intelligence that leaned towards more quantitative fields, he chose to focus on engineering. He attended what was then the De La Salle College (now De La Salle University), which was among the top engineering schools at the time. His only option within engineering was between mechanical engineering or chemical engineering. Tan humbly admits that since he was poor at drafting, he opted for chemical engineering. Far from being a mere default course, his choice proved the right one. With diligence and hard work, he eventually graduated summa cum laude in 1967.

Unfortunately, right after graduation, he could not take the board examinations for chemical engineering because he was considered a Chinese citizen having been born to Chinese parents. President Ferdinand Marcos's mass naturalizaton act of 1975 later allowed him to become a Filipino citizen. He was then permitted to take the board exams in 1976 and promptly topped them.

His transition from chemical engineering to information technology seemed highly unlikely given that in the 1960s, no courses on information technology were being offered even in other countries, let alone the Philippines. Tan recalls that his first encounter with information technology came through a fellow DLSC alumnus, an engineering graduate, who gave a talk on it after returning from the United States. This passing encounter proved to be the precursor to what would later become his lifework. The University of Notre Dame in Indiana, the United States, accepted him on scholarship for further studies in chemical engineering and he completed both his master's degree in 1969 and Ph.D. in 1971 here. A number of teaching/research assistantships undertaken for the school also helped him complete his studies.

The professor of his chemical reaction kinetics class at Notre Dame first introduced him to the practical applications of a computer in the real world. During one session, the professor introduced a problem where the solution was quite time consuming, repetitive, and mind-numbing, if done by the human hand and brain. The professor demonstrated how a computer could be used to solve the problem.

This example of using the computer as a machine that helps humans perform their tasks became Tan's constant model rather than a paradigm of the computer being the end-all in itself. As he asserts, "IT is an enabler technology. It improves efficiencies and expands services. It empowers a person to do more. All these result in developing and building the nation towards improving the standard of living of its people."

On his return to the Philippines in the early 1970s, his transition from engineering to information technology began. As he was one of the few people at the time who was knowledgeable about computers, SM (his wife is the sister of Henry Sy, owner of SM or Shoemart, now SM Malls) hired him as a consultant to convert their manual in-house credit card system into an electronic based one. At the same time, with his teaching position at the De La Salle Chemical Engineering Department, he helped introduce computer use in engineering by initiating a course in "Numerical Methods for Engineers" that connected the engineering department to a time-sharing computer.

A small Ford Foundation grant expanded the teaching of computers to De La Salle faculty, which resulted in other departments offering their own subjects for computer use. In 1981 Tan became an active participant in developing the Philippines's first ever full-fledged computer science course programme at De La Salle. The university also pioneered the use of computers for administrative purposes.

This pioneering computer science programme eventually grew into one of the largest fields of study and application in the country and in the world today, with institutions such as Tan's own Asia Pacific College offering it as their primary educational foundation.

In hindsight, he analysed that in 1960s and 1970s, "IT practitioners were mostly technology or business based individuals who shifted to IT. They managed to understand IT principles experientially and applied them to an ever-expanding field. In the 1980s, more advanced development of IT required a deeper understanding of computer science".

Coming from both lines of IT practitioners gave Tan the unique position of combining and applying an extensive technical academic foundation that prepared him for the sudden changes, innovations, and instabilities within this very new field; learning new things from experience; as well as testing and applying these different kinds of knowledge in real world situations.

He rose steadily in his academic ranks at the DLSU and eventually became Executive Vice President of the university in 1988, the first Chinese-Filipino to attain this highest rank in a prestigious academic institution.

After leaving De La Salle in 1991, IBM approached him to create short-term training programmes for a training school it wanted to establish to add manpower to its pool of IT workers. Tan convinced IBM to form an educational partnership with the SM Group of Companies to establish a school that offered both short-term training and baccalaureate education. Both groups asked him to head this school and thus the Asia Pacific College (APC) was born.

At Asia Pacific College, Tan continues to place himself at the perfect venue for sharing his principles on IT: "a focus on business and industry linkage, and not purely on academic teaching. This emphasis is on IT as a platform and a tool to do one's work in any field". He does this through methods such as Project-based Learning, whereby a student group worked on the same project over different subjects spread out over a whole academic year, and through its pioneering programme — a six-month, full-time internship in companies for APC students.

Just as business and family were both components of the environment he grew up in, industry and education are now two of the key components of much of his life.

Tan's influence in IT education reaches far beyond his pioneering and formative experiences with De La Salle and his current captainship of APC. Since the early 1990s, he has been a consultant for government's IT education policies. Most significantly when the Commission on Higher Education was formed in 1995, he headed the institution's policymaking body — Technical Panel for Information Technology Education.

Perhaps the most significant framework developed by this body are its three main tracks of IT education: a theoretical field or B.S. Computer Science; an application field or B.S. Information Technology; and where the IT relates to the business and industry setting, B.S. Information Management, now known as Information Systems. These categories streamlined Philippine IT by helping to eliminate confusion between different fields of IT specialization within the academe, as well as the professions or industries these courses could eventually lead to. For his pioneering contributions to the field of education, he was given an award for excellence in the 2007 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran.

In 2008 the Department of Science and Technology celebrated Tan as one of the "50 Great Men and Women of Science". A modest man, he commented on the award as "an honor to be recognized, especially considering the company of the men and women in the list". This man's so-called "modest" contributions to the improvement of IT education have helped influence directly and indirectly possibly thousands of students who have passed through IT educational courses over the last three decades. In turn, the impact of these students who eventually went on to IT professions has been staggering as IT permeates through much of everyday life.

Tan, Samuel K.

(陈清风, Chen Qingfeng,1933–)
Scholar, educator, Philippines

Samuel K. Tan has devoted almost his entire life to the academe: teaching, doing research, and writing. He started teaching in Siasi Academy, Jolo, in 1956 and at Ebenezer Bible College and Seminary in Zamboanga where he later became the dean of men. For more than three decades, he was a professor at the History Department, University of the Philippines (1963–96), and served as its chairperson from 1977–1982.

Tan has taken the way of the scholar-warrior — where the pen is mightier than the sword. As a historian, he has spent a lifetime writing on the Muslim Filipinos in the larger context of Philippine history: their origins, aspirations, and struggles as a people confronted by the advent of Spain's cross and sword, and America's "manifest destiny". He has examined the impact of Spain on Muslim Filipinos and the beginnings of the conflict between the Muslim community and the Spanish colonial regime, a conflict that has continued to the twenty-first century with successive Christian-dominated Philippine governments.

Notably, he has focused on presenting the Muslim Filipinos' perceptions of their own history and culture; the historical roots of the Muslim-Christian problem; the armed struggle of Muslim Filipinos from the Spanish period to the present, and the internationalization of the Bangsamoro struggle.

His works have also explored the pre-Hispanic world of the sultanates of Sulu, and the Muslim world at the turn of the century. He has also written on Islam in the Philippines, Muslim literature, and the Jawi tradition in the Philippines. He gives us an interesting glimpse of the lives of Muslims during the early period of American rule in "Letters of the Sultanate of Sulu", a compilation of letters by well known Muslims in Sulu, in original Jawi, (a type of Arabic script adapted for writing Malay and other Austronesian languages) in Tausug, and in English.

In his short book, A History of the Philippines, Tan notes that he has tried "to give to the cultural communities, 'the other Filipinos,' a space they deserve in Philippine history". He further writes that, "unless a new spirit of nationalism and Filipinism changes the neo-colonial tendency to ignore the legitimate cries of the cultural communities the foundation of national unity and peace will remain fragile". In another book, The Filipino-American War 1899–1913 (2002), he reiterates "the need to re-emphasize in our national consciousness the known story of the Filipino struggle for freedom from colonialism in a new national perspective that integrates the rationale of the non-Christian resistance against American rule".

"By reinterpreting history from the perspective of the 'cultural communities' a new strand is added into the historical fabric of the Filipino-American War, to make it really the struggle of the national community regardless of ethnic origin and religious-cultural differences," he says.

Through his numerous books and publications, he has made a substantial contribution to the understanding of the Muslim Filipinos and the Mindanao conflict. He puts in perspective the historical and socio-economic dimension of the continuing struggle of the Muslim community in the Philippines for independence — a fundamental reality that has remained active in Muslim consciousness, stated Tan in a paper, "Understanding the Mindanao Conflict", presented at the Cotobato City Peace and Development Forum (July 2000). "That independence was still the underlying essence of autonomy for all social movements (MNLF, MILF, etc.) regardless of differences." He has also stressed the reality of the Muslim Filipinos' spirit of resistance that has not changed an iota to this day. In fact, he has noted that the struggle has strengthened amidst a new generation of young Muslim Filipinos who have been marginalized and radicalized even further. Furthermore, he noted in the same paper, "the ultimate hope of the Muslim community in the Philippines for progress and prosperity lies not in the Christian-dominated state but in the dynamic relation and linkage to the Islamic world".

The Mindanao problem has generated to this day a cycle of violence, peace talks and negotiations, truces, and more violence on both sides: the Christian Filipinos versus the Filipino Muslims. According to the United Nations Development Programme, the Mindanao conflict has resulted in a conservative estimate of 160,000 dead and two million displaced people.

Tan's works on Mindanao and the Muslim Filipinos serve as a beacon of history that guides us on the path that must be taken in order to find a practical and acceptable solution that would bring genuine peace and order to Mindanao and its people.

His books include Sulu Under American Military Rule, 1899–1913 (1967); The Filipino Muslim Armed Struggle (1977); Selected Essays on the Filipino Muslims (1982); A History of the Philippines (1988 & 1998); The Critical Decade (1993); The Internationalization of the Bangsamoro Struggle (1993); The Filipino American War, 1899–1913 (2002); Annotated Bibliography of Jawi Materials of the Muslim South (1996); Filipino Muslim Perceptions of Their History and Culture as Seen through Indigenous Written Sources (2003); and Letters of the Sultanate of Sulu, Vols. I & II (2005).

He co-authored Surat Maguindanaon (2002) with Samier M. Bakuludan; and Tawi-Tawi: The Philippines' Southernmost Frontier (2001) with Bona Elisa O. Resurreccion and Noli C. Gabilo.

He serves as the convenor of the Mindanao Studies Program of the Center for Integrative and Development Studies, University of the Philippines, in Diliman, Quezon City. He was the chairperson and executive director (October 1997–March 1999) of the National Historical Institute.

Tan has also worked as a consultant in various government offices and international organizations: Office of the President, Malacañang Palace (1974–84); Office of the Governor, Tawi Tawi (1986), and Office of Senator Santanina Rasul (1987–92). He headed the National Committee on Historical Research of the National Commission for Culture and the Arts from 1992–95. He was involved with a National Library project (1981-83) and led the Mindanao team that published four volumes: Region IX-Haylaya; Region X-Linibung; Region XI-Bagani; and Region XII-Darangen, as part of the Land and People series. He was the coordinator of a UNESCO project on "Civilization Related to Rice Cultivation", (1979-80), and a member of the UNESCO Advisory Committee for the Study of Southeast Asian Cultures (1982–84).

In 1998, he was conferred the title of Paduka Datu by the Grand Assembly of the Western Mindanao Kadatuan for his contribution to the cause of the Muslim people. Tan was also the recipient in 1998 of the University of the Philippines Alumni Association's Outstanding Professional Award for History. In 2007, he was awarded the third "Dangal ng Haraya" Award for Cultural and Historical Research by the National Commission for Culture and the Arts.

Samuel K. Tan was born on 30 December 1933 in Siasi, Sulu, of Tausug-Sama-Chinese parentage. Later a professor, scholar, historian, and specialist on the Filipino Muslim armed struggle, he had spent his elementary years in Siasi, graduating as the class valedictorian in 1949. He finished his high school in Zamboanga City High School in 1953 and graduated with two university degrees — a bachelor of theology from Ebenezer Bible College (1960) and a bachelor of arts in history, summa cum laude, from Zamboanga A.E. Colleges (1962), in Zamboanga City. He obtained a master of arts in history (1967) from the University of the Philippines, Diliman, and a Ph.D. in social science interdisciplinary (1973) from the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University in New York.

Tan Siew Sin

(陈修信, Chen Xiuxin, 1916–88)

Politician, government minister, businessman, Malaysia

Tun Tan Siew Sin, founder member and president of the Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA) (1961–74), minister of commerce and industry (1957–59) and minister of finance (1959–74), was the most prominent Chinese public leader of post-independence Malaysia. As the country's second and longest serving finance minister, he played the dominant role in setting the country's economic agenda over a fifteen-year period that laid the foundation for a robust economic expansion in which Malaysia emerged as a major trading country in the international economy. The last MCA figure treated as an equal by United Malays National Organization (UMNO) leaders, Tan, who enjoyed the full confidence of Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman, wielded much greater influence than any other Chinese political leader since independence.

While he had been universally lauded as the first architect of Malaysia's economic prosperity, he was often faulted by the Malaysian Chinese for not having sufficiently advanced Chinese education and language interests. He consistently held that Chinese interests could be best advanced through a free market economy where Malays and non-Malays would compete on a level playing field. By putting less emphasis on Chinese education and language interests while vigorously promoting the welfare of the Chinese business community, Tan's support from Chinese educationists and the Chinese-educated was notably lacking.

Born in Malacca on 21 May 1916 to a Straits Chinese family with roots in Malaysia dating back to the 1770s, he was the only son of Tun Tan Cheng Lock, the ideological father of the MCA, and Toh Puan Yeo Yeok Neo. His great-grandfather, Tan Choon Bock, had established one of the earliest steamship services in Malacca, and his father, Tan Cheng Lock, was a successful rubber planter. Tan was educated at the Malacca Methodist Chinese Girls School, Malacca High School, and Raffles College in Singapore before pursuing a year of legal studies in London in 1938. After returning to Malaya from India, where he spent the years of the Japanese Occupation (1942–45) with his parents and siblings, Alice, Agnes and Lily, he worked for the family rubber company, United Malacca Rubber Estates. He married Lim Cheng Neo in 1947.

Tan started his political career in 1946 as a commissioner in the Malacca municipality. He was appointed to the Federal Legislative Council in 1948, and elected a member of parliament in the country's first federal elections in 1955. He successfully contested his Malacca-based parliamentary seat in every subsequent election until 1974 when he retired from active politics.

As he was his father's closest confidant and adviser, the political fortunes of both father and son were intimately tied. During their India exile, inspired by the Congress Party's fight for independence from the British, Tan helped his father conceive the idea of a party, the Malayan Chinese League, to protect Chinese political and economic rights, promote interracial harmony, and work with Malay political organizations to attain self-rule. In February 1949, due primarily to British encouragement of leading Chinese business leaders (especially Tun H.S. Lee and Tun Leong Yew Koh) to mobilize Chinese support behind the government's counter-insurgency initiatives during the Emergency declared in the wake of the communist insurrection, the MCA was formed with Tan Cheng Lock as its first president, and Siew Sin as a Central Working Committee member.

From mid-1950 to 1952, Tan supported the joint efforts of his father and then UMNO president Datuk Onn bin Jaafar to decommunalize Malayan politics by opening the MCA and UMNO to non-Chinese and non-Malay members respectively. When their efforts failed in the face of opposition from their parties, father and son backed Onn's initiative in establishing the multiracial Independence of Malaya Party (IMP). Preferring to campaign for the IMP in the country's first municipal elections in Kuala Lumpur in 1955, the junior Tan did not play an active role in the formation of the UMNO-MCA alliance, an initiative launched by Selangor MCA stalwarts, Ong Yoke Lin (later Tun Omar Ong) and Tun H.S. Lee. It was when the IMP failed so dismally in the elections that he turned his full attention to the consolidation of the Alliance Party.

During the independence movement, he frequently served as his father's proxy (especially after 1955, when the latter suffered a debilitating stroke) in MCA committees tasked with negotiating the terms of independence with UMNO and the British. He was a major player in conceiving the so-called "social contract" between the UMNO, MCA, and MIC, a deal in which non-Malays born after independence were entitled to citizenship based on jus soli in exchange for non-Malay acceptance of Malay special rights, Malay as the sole national language, and Islam as the state religion. In addition, Tan and his MCA colleagues obtained constitutional guarantees for non-Malays to preserve, practise, and propagate their religions, cultures, and languages freely, and for safeguards governing non-Malay "legitimate interests".

From 1957 to the outbreak of the race riots in May 1969, Tan was arguably the third most powerful man in Malaysia, after Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman and his deputy, Tun Abdul Razak bin Hussein. Wielding undisputed authority over the country's economic life, he fiercely upheld Chinese economic interests and successfully fought back efforts by Malay economic nationalists to launch a far-reaching Malay special rights policy, notably an attempt in 1963 by Abdul Aziz Ishak, minister of agriculture and cooperatives, to replace Chinese-dominated rice milling enterprises with state run cooperatives.

Although his ability to advance Chinese business interests waned after the New Economic Policy (NEP) was promulgated to distribute wealth more equitably between Malays and non-Malays in the wake of the May 1969 race riots, he used his authority as chairman of the powerful Capital Investment Committee to blunt the full force of the NEP. Most notably, the Industrial Coordination Act — which required non-Malay businesses to comply with the 30 per cent Malay equity-restructuring objective — was not promulgated until he stepped down as finance minister in 1974.

Compared with his many fine achievements as finance minister, his performance as MCA president drew mixed reviews. An English-educated Baba Chinese who did not speak Mandarin and who gave top priority to Chinese business interests, Tan was widely perceived to have been overly accommodating of UMNO's stance on Malay education and language issues. During the 1960s, the party's predominantly Chinese-educated leadership and grass roots became increasingly critical of his failure to push for the recognition of Mandarin as an official language, and to set up a Mandarin-medium university (Merdeka University). While he did not play up issues of Chinese race and language to boost his party's popularity ratings, in contrast, Chinese opposition parties — the Democratic Action Party and Gerakan Rakyat Malaysia — campaigned strongly for equal cultural and economic rights for non-Malays. When the MCA suffered heavy electoral losses in the May 1969 elections, Tan considered, but decided against, taking the party out of the Alliance government.

In the politically constrained post-1969 environment, when power became even more heavily concentrated in UMNO, he sought to restore Chinese confidence in the MCA. Initiatives to revitalize the party included the Chinese Unity Movement and the Perak Task Force, which focused on rebuilding the party's New Village support base in that state. The MCA's standing improved when he obtained government approval and partial funding for the establishment of the Tunku Abdul Rahman College. Since its inception in 1972, the TAR College has produced thousands of Chinese graduates, most of whom had failed to gain admission to state universities due to stringent admission policies for non-Malays. When Tan stepped down as MCA president in April 1974 after undergoing major lung surgery, he left behind a revitalized party. His successor, Tan Sri Lee San Choon, was the first Chinese-educated president to have risen to the party's top post.

After Tan relinquished his cabinet and party positions for health reasons, he continued to serve as financial adviser to the government, a position created for him by Prime Minister Tun Abdul Razak. He was nominated by Tun Razak's successor, Prime Minister Tun Husein Onn, as chairman of Sime Darby, a major government-linked corporation. Tan also served as chairman of the United Malacca Rubber Estates, the company founded by his father. In addition, he sat on the boards of several other companies, including Unitac, Siemens, Pacific Bank, Highlands and Lowlands, and Guardian Royal Exchange Assurance. His involvement in philanthropic causes included establishing and funding the Women's Aid Organization in 1982, the first NGO in the country dedicated to providing shelter, counselling, and financial assistance to battered women.

The many awards he received attest to his reputation for integrity, incorruptibility, and steadfast service to his country and community. In 1969, he was awarded the Seri Setia Mahkota, the highest award for Malaysian commoners, which carries the title "Tun". Tan and his father, Cheng Lock, remain to date the only father and son recipients of this award. Other honours include the Grand Cross Order of Leopold II of Belgium (1967), a French knighthood (1967), Order of Sikatuan of the Philippines (1968), and the Bintang Mahaputera Kelas Dua of Indonesia (1970). When he died on 17 March 1988, he, like his father, received the accolade of a state funeral, the first father-and-son non-Malays to be so honoured. In September 2001, a road in Kuala Lumpur adjoining Jalan Tun Tan Cheng Lock was renamed Jalan Tun Tan Siew Sin.

Tan, Sofyan

(1959–)

Educator, physician, Indonesia

Sofyan Tan (陈) is well known as the Chinese-Indonesian who advocated the "integrated school system" (sekolah pembauran) in Sunggal near Medan, Sumatra, which produces high quality students. His students are multi-ethnic/multireligious and he is regarded by many indigenous Indonesian leaders as more "Indonesian" than some indigenous Indonesians. Even Professor B.J. Habibie, who was critical of the Indonesian Chinese community, acknowledged in 1994 that Tan was a true member of the Indonesian nation (putera bangsa). For his hard work, Tan received the title, "Fellow Ashoka for Ethnic Relations and Education" in 1989, and the Wiyata Mandala award for education in 2002 from North Sumatra Governor Rizal T. Nurdin.

Tan whose Chinese name is said to be Tan Kim Yang (not yet verified) was born on 25 September 1959 in the Sunggal district on the fringe of Medan. He was the youngest of ten siblings. His father was a tailor who became a petty businessman dealing in grocery and then went bankrupt when Tan was studying in medical school at the Universitas Methodis. The young Tan therefore gave tuition to high school students to support himself. After graduating from medical school, he did not practise medicine, but went on to build his dream school instead.

Tan had an ideal — which was to build a multi-ethnic and multireligious school in the area where poor Chinese Indonesians lived.

At one time he set up a yayasan perguruan (educational foundation) and started to raise funds in Jakarta, but managed to get only 500,000 rupiah. In 1988 he started to build his dream school in stages. He borrowed sixty million rupiah from the local bank to build the classrooms and by 1995 his debt had increased to 500 million rupiah. The school was a three-storey building comprising kindergarten, primary, and secondary sections (SMP & SMA). The secondary school section is linked to a local savings bank so that students studying economics and commerce can practise in the bank.

Apart from the building, the school has its own free clinic for the students, a playground, and a school bus. The school is called Sultan Iskandar Muda, named after the first sultan of Aceh. The full name of the school is Yayasan Perguruan Sultan Iskandar Muda, abbreviated as Sekolah YPSIM. The school is unique. It is not an ordinary Chinese Indonesian school, but an assimilated school whose students are multi-ethnic and multireligious. There are Chinese, Malays, Bataks, Tamils, and non-Tamil Indians.

Unlike other Chinese Indonesian schools whose students and teachers are mainly ethnic Chinese, the YPSIM school's student composition is almost half Chinese and half indigenous Indonesians, and the majority of the teachers are indigenous. In 1995, for instance, non-indigenous Indonesian students (mainly Chinese) made up 53.5 per cent of the student population, and the indigenous students, 46.5 per cent, while 90 per cent of the eighty-seven teachers were indigenous. Therefore, there was inevitable mixing between the Chinese Indonesians and the non-Chinese. In this integrated school, various religious festivals are celebrated and all students are required to participate in them. They are encouraged to learn about other ethnic group's customs and traditions and to respect one another. Moreover, the school encourages good students from poor families to enrol.

To many people's surprise, Tan's school has been a success and produces students who are well qualified. Many have been able to gain admission into local universities without having to sit for an entrance examination. For his achievement Tan was awarded the "Pioneer Youth" (Pelopor Pemuda) by the North Sumatra Governor in 1990. He was also commended in 1993 by the minister of environment, Ir. Sarwono Kusumaatmadja, for his dedication and the sacrifices he has made. As someone trained as a doctor, he could easily have practised as one and earned enough money to live a comfortable life, but he chose to be the founder of a school and live a less comfortable life.

When asked by Kompas reporters why he had made that choice, Tan replied that there were many doctors, but very few people would contribute to the development of education. He felt that he would be able to help integrate/assimilate the Chinese Indonesian community into Indonesian society this way. By going to the same school children of different communities would grow up together as friends and accept one another. The Chinese community felt that the indigenous people were unfriendly towards the Chinese, but his own experience during the anti-Chinese riot in Medan on 10 November 1966 had given him a different impression. On that day there was the killing of the Chinese Indonesians who were believed to have been involved in the 1965 coup. The mobs were gripped by frenzy and were not selective about their targets; as a result, many innocent Chinese Indonesians became victims of the violence. Their houses were burnt down and people were beaten up and killed. To Tan's surprise, his house was safe and was even guarded by some indigenous youths. He noted that his parents mixed well in the Sunggal areas where many villagers knew him and his family members. Tan thus felt that not all indigenous people were hostile towards Chinese Indonesians. He decided then that he had the obligation to promote ethnic/racial integration.

For Tan to establish an integrated school was not easy, especially with regard to the funding, but he never gave up. He has a group of dedicated friends who wanted to make the project a success. Eventually he got support from the local government, local community, business groups, and foundations. In order to get good students from poor families, he went to the villages and interviewed the good students. He convinced their parents to send their children to his school which was free of charge. He introduced the "adopt a child" system, and appealed to individuals, companies, and foundations to "adopt" one or a few of his school children from poor families and pay their education expenses. This plan has yielded results. In 1994 Minister of Research B.J. Habibie adopted twenty-five students and donated 25 million rupiah to the school. Political leader Marwah Daud, entrepreneur Anthony Salim, and foundations such as Yayasan Prasetya in Jakarta also participated in this project. In 1995, for instance, out of 1,105 students, 112 were "adopted children". Interestingly adoptive parents often pick students not of their own ethnic groups. Tan's school in general has been able to produce high quality graduates. Students in the "adopted children" scheme have also obtained good results.

Tan has attempted to use education as a means to bring about integration/assimilation (the term in Indonesian is pembauran). He also believes that integration/assimilation should be implemented in the economic field, especially in small and medium enterprises (Usaha Kecil dan Menengah, or UKM). Not surprisingly he has become an entrepreneur himself and has also been involved in a local koperasi (cooperative) to improve the economic conditions of the poor. He has served as chairman of the Forum Nasional UKM (National Forum for SMEs). In addition to this, he was interested in local politics and contested in the 2004 elections for membership in the local parliament, but lost.

Tan is married to Eliner, a Chinese Indonesian. They have two daughters, Tracey and Cindy, and one son, Felix.

Tan Swie Hian

(陈瑞献, Chen Ruixian, 1943–)

Artist, sculptor, poet, calligrapher, translator, Singapore

Tan Swie Hian is recognized as the cultural icon of Singapore and Southeast Asia. Not limited to any single mode of artistic expression, his art appears in multiple media, straddling and fusing painting, sculpture, printmaking, calligraphy, seal carving, and dramatic performances. He is the author of poetry, essays, stories, criticism, and translations and the editor of literary and Buddhist publications. He has exhibited worldwide and participated in group shows, and designed costumes, masks, and stage for performances. His work has earned him international recognition and numerous awards. He is also the only living artist to have two private museums dedicated to him.

Tan Swie Hian was born to Tan Chan Pok and Lee Soe in Pulau Halang, Sumatra in Indonesia on 5 May 1943 and came to live in Singapore as early as 1946.

After completing his primary and secondary education in Hwa Min Primary School and Singapore Chinese High School, he studied modern languages and literature at the Nanyang University of Singapore, majoring in English language and literature, with French and Malay as selective subjects. After graduating in 1968 he started his career as the press attache at the French Embassy. After twenty-four years in the position he gave it up to devote all his time to art. He married Hao Hsiao Fu in 1971 and has a son, Pe Chen, and a daughter, Chiao Joan.

As a member of the second generation of a Chinese family that settled in Southeast Asia, Tan sees himself as a descendant of the Chinese cultural tradition. But he will not be contained. His fascination with different civilizations has led him to explore the cultures of India, Southeast Asia, and the western world. He is attracted to both the new and the old, the East and the West, and tries to combine the spirit of ancient Chinese philosophy, Indian philosophy, particularly Buddhism, and the feelings and thoughts of a Chinese Singaporean.

Tan likes to describe himself as a hummingbird to show how a free mind functions by flying forward, backwards, sideways, as it soars, swoops, or remains stationary in the air. Art could be the rainbow that leads to the ultimate great white light and the universe.

Tan first burst upon the local scene in 1968 with The Giant, a collection of poems considered the culmination of the Chinese modernist literary movement in the history of Chinese literature in Singapore and Malaysia. To date, he has fifty published works of poetry, essays, stories, criticisms and translations to his credit. He has extensively translated works by great Indian philosophers such as Ramana Marhashi, J. Krishnamurti, Sri Aurobindo, and N. Chaitanya. Being multilingual, Tan is the first to have translated works by such literary giants as A. Huxley, H. Michaux, J. Prevert, S. Beckett, V. Nijinsky, and M. Sorescu into Chinese.

Tan Swie Hian experienced spiritual illumination for the first time in 1973 and has been a spiritual seeker for the past few decades. He has studied and practised the art of Buddhist meditation and, through the process, destroyed desires and attained spiritual liberty. Since then his creations have never been the same again. Buddhism has become his motivation for creation and his source of inspiration. Through meditation, he acquires cosmic visions which he expresses in his art. Just as it liberates his mind, religion also liberates his art. He has developed a style that defies definition because it breaks down all forms and conventions and makes everything possible. As a result, his work has a freshness that continues to surprise.

Tan held his first exhibition in 1973 and since then has exhibited his paintings in oil, Chinese ink and acrylic, as well as sculptures, calligraphy, "cartogravures", prints, and seal engravings in twenty solo shows and numerous group shows in Singapore and worldwide. In 1987, he was conferred the Singapore Cultural Medallion. He went on to win a Gold Medal in Salon des Artistes Francais, Paris, in 1995, and the Seoul International Calligraphy Gold Medal in an international calligraphy exhibition to mark the Korea/Japan World Cup 2002. He was conferred the prestigious Crystal Award by the World Economic Forum for outstanding artistic achievements and contribution to cross-cultural understanding in 2003. The same year, the president of Singapore conferred on him the Meritorious Service Medal, which is the highest honour for a cultural personality in the republic.

He published the five-volume Selected Works by Tan Swie Hian in China in 1993 and the calligraphy of Tan's preface to the Museum of World Famous Chinese Artists' Works along the Yangtze River in China was inscribed in a stele in 1996 and erected at the museum's entrance.

Two years later in 1998, he won the Marin Sorescu International Poetry Prize from Romania and was elected by the United Nations, together with ninety-seven other established artists from all over the world, such as Hockney, Christo, Lichtenstein, Boey, Matta and Tapies, to illustrate a new edition of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to mark the 50th Anniversary of its adoption by the world body.

Then in 2004, he was among thirty-nine artists from around the world invited to work with Nelson Mandela on a series of lithos for a charitable cause.

In 2000, his essay and calligraphy to celebrate the birthday of the Yellow Emperor was inscribed on a boulder and erected in the Imperial Mausoleum, Shanxi, which is the Number 1 Ancient Tomb in China.

Exhibitions he held in 2003 include exhibition of oils, inks and acrylics at the Congress Hall, World Economic Forum, Davos in Switzerland, the Tan Swie Hian Mulpa Exhibition at the Mulpa Art Centre, Seoul, Korea, and an exhibition of oils, inks and acrylics in United Nations, Geneva, in Switzerland.

Since 1987, Tan has been the first and only Southeast Asian artist to be elected as a correspondent-member to the oldest and most prestigious artistic institution in the world — The Academy of Fine Arts of the Institute of France. To honour his contribution to French-Singapore relations in the artistic field, he was first decorated by the French Government in 1978 when he received the title of Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres. In 1989, he was conferred another prestigious honour — the title of Chevalier de l'Ordre National du Mérite. On 5 June 2006, Tan was conferred the title of Officer (Officier) in the National Order of the Legion of Honour by Jean-Paul Réau, the French ambassador to Singapore, who presented the award on behalf of President Jacques Chirac. The Legion of Honour (Légion d'Honneur) is an order of chivalry established by Napoléon Bonaparte in 1802. It remains the most senior order in France today and is conferred on individuals, including non-citizens, for outstanding achievements in areas such as culture, science, industry, and trade.

Back home, his collector, Tan Tien Chi, a Singapore businessman, built the first private art museum in Singapore — The Tan Swie Hian Museum — in 1993. Since 2001, work has started on the world's first earth art museum, The All-Wisdom Gardens: Tan Swie Hian Earth Art Museum, which sprawls over two square kilometres on a mountain range in Qingdao, China. Tan also completed a gigantic enamel mural and an immerse granite floor calligraphy in 2003 for the subway station in Chinatown at the historical heart of Singapore. In 2006, Tan donated more than 6,500 books, manuscripts, and artefacts to the National Library, and the Tan Swie Hian Collection is located on the tenth floor of the National library Building.

Tan has worked with choreographers, dancers, and dramatists for numerous performances. He is also a stage and costume designer. Through the collaboration with the Singapore Chinese Orchestra, Tan Swie Hian has demonstrated on stage his art of Chinese calligraphy during the performance of the SCO when "Singapore Season" was held in England in 2005, and in China in 2007. In February 2008, Tan did a 2.4m by 1.2m ink painting, while hoisted on a platform 12m up in the air, for the finale of the Chingay Parade, as the Singapore Chinese Orchestra played.

On 8 September 2003, he received an honorary degree of Doctor of Letters from the Nanyang Technological University (NTU) — presented by the university's chancellor, Singapore President S. R. Nathan — in recognition of his many literary and artistic achievements. He was also NTU's 2005 Nanyang Distinguished Alumni Award winner.

Tan Tai Bin

(陈台民, Chen Taimin, 1927–83)
Historian, Philippines

Graduating from Adamson University with a degree in chemical engineering in 1952, Tan Tai Bin was one of the earliest scholars to devote himself to the systematic study of the Chinese in the Philippines and on Philippine-China relations. His pioneering work in Chinese on Philippine-China Relations and Huaqiao in the Philippines (中菲关系与菲律宾华侨, Manila, 1961) became classic references on the subject matter at a time when there was an extreme dearth in studies about the Chinese community. The book collated his articles and writings published in the Chinese Commercial News (华侨商报) from 1958 to 1961. The extensive collection of articles was originally planned to fill up ten volumes, but due to his early demise, only the first two volumes of articles that he had already edited and updated were ready for publication. Two years after his death in 1983, the first volume was combined with the second volume and published in Hong Kong as a tribute to, and in commemoration, of his life's works. Shortly after his first book was published, two more books saw print in Hong Kong in 1961: Vignettes on the Philippine Chinese History (菲律滨华侨史话) and Philippine Myths, Legends and Folk Tales.

Tan almost died from his first heart attack in 1965 due to physical stress. In 1967, he went into banking and was designated branch manager of Consolidated Bank branches in Legaspi, Zamboanga, and Paco, Manila. He retired from his bank job early due to heart disease. He became ill again in 1970 and 1977. In 1979 he retired completely from his bank job and rested at home. From then, he devoted his time to research and writing a regular column in a Chinese newspaper. During the Martial Law period, he continued to write weekly columns for the Amity Newsletter (an official publication of the pro-China Amity Club in the Philippines [菲华联谊会] since its inception in 1975). In 1981, when the World News (世界日报) started publication, he was responsible as editor of foreign news and later became its editor-in-chief.

When he started writing his columns in 1958, his whole time and attention were focused on research on the history, issues, and problems concerning the Chinese in the Philippines. The entire second floor of his house and his room were filled with books, magazines, journals, and news clippings — important references for his articles and columns. Back then, he could have been the only Chinese-Filipino who already owned the complete 54-volume Blair and Robertson's The Philippine Islands and had a subscription to the Philippine Studies Journal.

Tan was born on 15 January 1927. His father, Tan Ying Yee, was a well known textile merchant in Manila and his mother was So Siok Ching of Butuan in Mindanao. He finished his elementary school at St Stephen's High School (then known as the First Chinese Girl's School) in Manila and his secondary school at the Philippine Chinese High School. The school was closed during the Japanese invasion of the Philippines. Tan was sixteen then. While still at school, teachers and school officers encouraged students and school personnel to participate actively in anti-Japanese resistance activities.

Five years before the Japanese invasion of the Philippines, ethnic Chinese in the Philippines were well known to have actively participated and helped in anti-Japanese resistance in China, including organizing the nationwide "boycott Japanese goods" movement. These young students did not only learn resistance against an aggressor, but their activities also provided them with the chance for widespread cultural enlightenment and theoretical learning.

Tan Tai Bin was an active element in this student movement and this became the cornerstone that laid the foundation for his subsequent literary achievements and academic research. He devoured studies in social science and social economics, which later nurtured his interest in history and theory.

During the 1942 Japanese invasion of the Philippines, a hundred thousand Americans surrendered and abandoned the Filipinos to suffer at the iron hands of the Japanese. Those were the darkest hours for both Filipinos and Chinese-Filipinos who suffered from torture, persecution, slavery, and starvation. However, for every persecution there was a counter resistance. Several anti-Japanese resistance guerilla units were organized as their members wished to avoid being slaves of the Japanese. The Youth Resistance Grand Alliance against Japanese Aggression (青年抗日反奸大同盟 or Qing Kang, 青抗, for short) was organized and not too long afterwards, Tan was recruited and became one of the youth leaders.

The youth who joined Qing Kang were imbibed with stalwart principles and determined to sacrifice themselves if necessary. They conducted underground activities under the very noses of the enemy and without any thought of danger to themsleves. Tan came from a well off family, but he still joined the underground movement, undertook dangerous work, and was sorely tested in the three years of anti-Japanese struggle. Being a youth leader, he was able to influence a huge number of young people who were recruited to join the cause in defence of freedom.

Manila was devastated as an aftermath of the war and mainly because of the massive bombardment by the Americans during the liberation of Manila. Epidemics broke out as hungry children and refugees filled the refugee camps. Tan joined the groups working to help the refugees day and night, and in medical and relief missions. After the war, he headed the education group of Qing Kang. They used the Philippine Chinese High School as their base to convene the Social Science Research Forum on two occasions, with Tan as one of the speakers. This forum had a long lasting influence on the pursuit of research and further education among members of the youth groups.

After liberation and the return of public order, Tan went back to school to continue his studies. In 1950, he graduated from Adamson University as a chemical engineer.

The immediate post-war Chinese community was rocked by long periods of unrest and uncertainty. First came a dark period of accusations and counter-accusations for collaboration with the Japanese. Members of the Chinese community were summarily executed on suspicion of being Japanese collaborators. It was a period of great unrest because some of the executions were unjustified. Some of the suspected collaborators only showed a pro-Japanese front, but were in fact actively supporting the underground guerrilla movement.

The collaboration issue was shortly followed by the anti-communist witch hunt in the early to late Fifties. There was a mass arrest of Chinese-Filipinos in a dark episode which the Chinese media branded as jinqiao-an (禁侨案). Many suspected communist sympathizers were accused, persecuted, arrested, and deported, some, unfairly. Staff and contributors of the pro-China Chinese Commercial News, and former members of the anti-Japanese resistance movement were the most affected. The case against the Chinese Commercial News (商报案), which erupted in 1961 and went on till 1963, was an offshoot of this communist paranoia. Many were pursued, persecuted, and forced to go into hiding. It was as if the entire community had lost its equilibrium and played into the hands of communist witch hunters. Tan was both an anti-Japanese guerrilla and a contributor to the Chinese Commercial News. As such he was of course not spared and was among those arrested, detained, and prosecuted. He suffered a huge personal loss due to this incident — the manuscript for the second volume of Huaqiao in the Philippines was already bound and ready for printing, but it was scattered during a raid at his house. Fortunately, the original drafts were still intact.

The case against the Chinese Commercial News went through long litigation, but in the end was dismissed because the evidence presented was deemed insufficient. While the criminal case was dismissed, the trauma of the psychological persecution and attack had a long lasting impact on the Chinese community at the time. Many suffered unfathomable loss, not just of money and resources due to the long litigation, but also the loss of trust and confidence of fellow businessmen and customers who distanced themselves from those accused out of fear.

Tan, however, refused to be discouraged by this trial. When the situation normalized, he went back to work and continued to pursue his life's interest in social science research and in writing about the Philippines, China, and the Chinese community, up to the time of his untimely demise. He died of a heart attack on 30 May 1983 at the age of fifty-six. Colleagues and friends considered his early demise an irreparable loss to the Chinese-Filipino community.

Tan Thoon Lip, John

(陈椿立, Chen Chunli, 1910–59)
Lawyer, Singapore

John Tan Thoon Lip was a leading lawyer and the first Asian registrar of Supreme Court of Singapore.

Tan was born in Singapore on 22 February 1910, the son of Tan Kwee Swee (great grandson of pioneer Tan Tock Seng). His only other sibling was his sister, Maggie. He was educated at the Anglo-Chinese School where he showed himself not only to be an excellent student, but also an accomplished pianist and musician. At the age of just sixteen, he formed an amateur orchestra that gave regular concerts. Known as Tan Thoon Lip's Orchestra, the amateur group received good reviews for its performances. Tan himself was an excellent pianist and regularly gave concert performances, handling such difficult works as Beethoven's late sonatas. He was also a capable and enthusiastic tennis player, competing regularly in tournaments and competitions.

Tan later transferred to Raffles Institution where he enrolled in the special Queen's Scholarship class. A popular student, he was head Prefect of the school. In 1929 he won one of the two Queen's Scholarships, alongside Ong Tiang Eng of the Penang Free School. His achievement led to a great day of celebration at Raffles Institution, which had failed to produce a single Queen's scholar since it was reintroduced in 1924. A school holiday was proclaimed on 24 January 1930 in celebration of Tan's outstanding achievement.

In August 1930 Tan left Singapore on board the Kaiyan to read law at St John's College, Cambridge. That year, his younger sister, Maggie, became the first woman ever to win the Queen's Scholarship and proceeded to London to study medicine. Tan obtained his LLB in 1933 and was called to the English Bar in January 1934.

On his return to Singapore, Tan was selected as one of the first two appointees to the Straits Settlements Civil Service (the other being Stanley Stewart). On 3 September 1934 he was appointed Assistant Official Assignee, Singapore. He was called to the Singapore Bar on 9 August 1935. In December 1936 he was transferred to Malacca, also to serve as assistant official assignee, for a year. On his return to Singapore, he was appointed the first Chinese magistrate in Singapore, succeeding CFJ Ess, as fifth magistrate on 1 March 1937. Ess was the first Eurasian in Singapore to be appointed a magistrate. In August 1940, Tan was appointed assistant official assignee for Singapore once again.

Tan's career was then interrupted by the onset of war. At the beginning of the Japanese Occupation, he worked in the Office of Enemy Property, but in late 1942, was accused of corruption, arrested, beaten, starved and water-boarded, and forced to make a confession to a baseless accusation. He was released after two months and asked by the Japanese to become registrar of the Syonan Koto-Hoin or Supreme Court. Despite his misgivings, Tan accepted the post for his own safety. He wrote about his wartime experiences in a book entitled, Kempeitai Kindness, and testified against his chief tormentor — Sgt Major Toyoda Akiichi — in the post-war war crimes trials. Akiichi was sentenced to death for causing the death of two civilians.

After liberation in 1945, Tan was recruited by the British Military Administration as second district judge to hear cases of food profiteering and black market sales. In October 1947 he was appointed assistant registrar, and then deputy registrar of the Supreme Court, and sheriff of Singapore. In 1948 he acted briefly as commissioner for workmen's compensation, but returned to being a judge in 1949. This made him only the third Singapore-born Asian to be elevated to the Colonial Legal Service. He was also one of the first two Chinese to be so promoted. The other was Tan Ah Tah, who later became the first Asian to be appointed judge of the Supreme Court.

In 1955 the chief minister of Singapore, David Marshall, sent Tan to New South Wales to study the free legal aid system there, with a view to introducing a similar system in Singapore. Tan spent three months studying the system before returning home to make his recommendations to the government. Legal aid was introduced in Singapore through the Legal Aid and Advice Ordinance in 1956.

Outside his work in law, Tan was a keen tennis player and member of the YMCA, serving as its president from 1948 to 1950. In 1948 he also formed a music circle to "sponsor a love of music". Concerned that young boys were idling and wasting their time, he formed the Katong Boys' Club in 1946 and served as its president and benefactor for many years. He was also the first chairman of the management committee of the University Club of Singapore. In 1948 Tan founded and became the first president of the Singapore Film Society. He was also interested in orchids and, for a time, served as the first secretary of the Malayan Orchid Society after it was revived in 1956.

Tan retired in January 1957 from his post as registrar of the Supreme Court on account of his failing health. He died on 14 March 1959 after a long illness and was buried at the Bidadari Christian Cemetery. A life long bachelor, he was survived by his mother and only sister, Maggie. Later that year an orchid hybrid (Vanda memoria Tan Thoon Lip) was named for him. In 1967 his sister donated over 700 books to the National Library in his memory.

Tan Tian Zhen

(陈天振, Chen Tianzhen, 1912–92)
Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Like any other early Chinese who had gone to Brunei in search of livelihood, Tan Tian Zhen had experienced a difficult process of hard struggle since uprooting from China, his birth place, at the age of 17. His was a typical case of striking out on his own and creating a glorious career out of hard work and tenacity. After having established himself in his career, he never forgot to give back to the society. He earned due respect for his long term contributions to the Chinese education and community.

Tan was born on 24 May 1912, in the West Residence of Lieyu Village (列渔村), Jinmen county (金门) of Fujian province, China. He was the youngest among the 4 brothers. He was not educated formally, and helped in the family farm since young.

Having heard stories about seeking livelihood in Nanyang (the South Seas), he harbored the idea of setting out to the south to earn a living since young. This desire was finally materialised in 1929 when he was 17, following a friend's family to Bandar Seri Begawan, the capital of Brunei by boat. Tan first worked in a grocery shop named Jian Fa (建发), and was earning a meager monthly salary of 5 dollars. He later moved on to another grocery shop, Jin Cheng Chun (金成春), and though there was an increase in pay, the working hours were long, starting from 6 in the morning till almost midnight daily.

In 1935, when he was 23 years old, Tan married the daughter of the owner of Jian Fa (建发). Having a family meant an increase in daily expenses, and so he had no choice but to leave Jin Cheng Chun to look for a better job. He managed to earn more by plying trade by boat in the Kampung Air (Water Village), situated on the opposite side of the capital daily, it was hard work but he was awarded with increased salary.

During the Japanese occupation, Tan started to work in the countryside cutting rubber trees, planting rice and vegetables. He was later commanded by the Japanese to work in the salt producing business until the departure of the Japanese.

After the Japanese had surrendered, Tan ventured into the business of making rubber shoes, taking advantage of the easy accessibility to rubber saps from his father-in-law's rubber plantation. Later, he went back from the countryside to live in Kampung Air and took up the old trade of doing business in his boat again.

The year 1947 marked the turning point in Tan's life, when he bought a shop with his wife's brother, and named it "Chop Chin Seng" (振成号). It started with just sales of groceries and tailoring, as the business grew, it gradually expanded into the food and beverage business, cold storage, soft drink factory and real estate. By the late twentieth century, Tan had gained a firm financial footing for the next generation to take over.

Though not adequately educated, Tan nonetheless knew the importance of the education of mother tongue and the cultural heritage. He felt that the Chinese in Brunei could only be vitalised with the identification and comprehensive grasp of its own culture, and also the only way to ensure the Chinese culture to be disseminated and passed on to the succeeding generations. As such, the propagation and passing on of Chinese education had always been his top priority. As Member of the Directorial Board of Brunei Chung Hua Middle School, he consistently made large donations to the School, and appealed the public to do the same. His children were impelled by this spirit and in turn supported the Chinese education enthusiastically, especially his eldest son, Chen Xian Long (陈仙隆), who was nominated Chairman by the Board of Directors of Chung Hua to lead them to scale greater heights. Tan's second son, Chen Xian Fu (陈仙福), had also been working at the Board for more than a decade and was instrumental in helping to raise funds for the School.

Besides providing ardent support for the School, Tan contributed to Chinese community as well. Due to his outstanding performance in business and his impeccable conduct, he was nominated as the Chairman of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Bandar Seri Begawan. He was also deeply concerned about the only Chinese temple in the capital, Teng Yun Dian (腾云殿), and was its financial controller, helping the temple to resolve many of its administrative matters. His outstanding contributions in many areas had earned Tan the title of P.S.B, conferred by the Brunei Sultan in 1982.

Tan was amiable, helpful and charitable. He treated everybody equally, regardless of race and ethnicity. He never took advantage of anybody and was not bothered by personal gains or losses, and was deeply respected by all. He instilled upon his children the value of good attitude and never resorting to unscrupulous means to get what they want, and to be honest and trustworthy. Because of this philosophy, his company Chop Chin Seng won the trust of suppliers and customers and enjoyed a good reputation. Words spread and his business flourished day by day. Under the influence and stewardship of Tan, his descendents propagated the tradition of trustworthiness of the business and carried it to the next level.

Tan passed away in Brunei Darussalam on the 28 July 1992, at the age of 80. He was survived by his wife, Lin Jin Huan (林金环); three sons, Xian Zhu (仙助), and the two mentioned above; and two daughters, Mei Jin (美金) and Mei Zhu (美珠).

Tan Tjeng Bok

(陈清木, Chen Qingmu, 1899–1985)

Keroncong singer, stage and movie actor, Indonesia

Tan Tjeng Bok was a leading actor in Indonesian popular opera and movies before the Second World War and he continued to work even after Indonesia became independent, both in movies and on TV.

Tan, nicknamed Item (Black) as he had dark skin, was born in Batavia (Jakarta) sometime between 1899 and 1901. His father was a migrant from China, a petty merchant who ran a sundries shop. His mother, Darsih, a Peranakan Chinese, was from Jakarta. When Tan was two years old, his mother gave him away to her younger sister who then raised him. His stepfather, Tan Soen Tjioe, was a petty merchant and the family moved to Bandung. The young Tjeng Bok was sent to the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (中华会馆) school for only a year and was then transferred to HCS, a Dutch school for Chinese Indonesians. He was already twelve years old when he was still in primary two. Tan was often absent from school and spent his time watching performances of keroncong (Indonesian music characterized by the jingling of bells and believed to have been influenced by Portuguese music). He had aspirations of becoming a keroncong singer and his idol was Oey Beng Oen, a popular keroncong singer at the time. He even joined a keroncong group without the knowledge of his stepfather.

Tan's wish to become a keroncong singer was strongly opposed by his stepfather, who took the view that being a singer was not a respectable occupation in local Chinese society at the time. However he insisted on becoming a singer which resulted in his expulsion from home. He then joined the Keroncong Hoot Visen. Being blessed with a good voice, he was popular in keroncong circles and would become much more popular than Oey Beng Oen. Around this time, he also joined a Peranakan Chinese opera group, Soei Bian Lian, and performed in operas in Malay (Indonesian). based on Chinese classical stories. Before long he joined a theatre that travelled between Krawang and Jakarta, and was put in charge of film projectors. Still, his real interest was in singing and acting on stage.

Later, Tan, then better known as Item, came to know the owner of a well known travelling drama troupe called Dardanella. The leading actress of Dardanella was an Indonesian opera actress named Devi Dja, who was married to the owner of the troupe, Piedro (Pyotr Litmonov), a European of Russian descent. Being tall, dark, and blessed with a good voice, Tan gradually emerged as a leading actor. This time, he used his real name, Tan Tjeng Bok, as it was respectable to have a Chinese name then. According to one source, he had an affair with Ivera Litmonov, the mother of Pyotr Litmonov. They eventually got married, but divorced before long after which Tan left Dardanella and joined another travelling drama troupe called "Miss Riboet Orient". Towards the end of the 1930s, or perhaps in 1940, he was discovered by the Peranakan Chinese movie producers, The Teng Tjoen and Tan Tjoei Hok, and began playing leading roles in Indonesian movies.

Before the Second World War, the movie industry in Indonesia was in an embryonic stage pioneered by Peranakan Dutch and Peranakan Chinese. In fact, the latter played a major role in the industry and formed a few film companies. Many producers and directors were from the Peranakan Chinese community. Tan had acted in at least twenty movies before World War II as a leading star. Because he played the role of a hero in most of the pre-war movies, he was called the "Douglas Fairbanks of Java" (Douglas Fairbanks van Java). Some of his better known movies included, Srigala Item (Black Wolf, 1941), Tengkorak Hidoep (The Living Skeleton, 1941), Si Gomar (A Man called Gomar, 1941), and Singa Laoet (Sea Lion, 1941). It was reported that Tan became the most highly paid actor, but he also had a lavish lifestyle and had squandered most of his income before long.

During the Japanese Occupation, the movie industry in Indonesia went into decline and most of the companies closed down. In order to make a living, Tan established a drama association in Bojonegoro (East Java) called Tjahaja Merdeka to put up performance of songs and dances. It was apparently not a success. He also went on to organize some travelling drama troupes in East Java. After Indonesia became independent, Tan moved to Jakarta where he continued to perform on stage until 1954, when he was given another opportunity to do films again. But by this time, he could no longer play the leading role. He co-starred in a number of Indonesian movies, for example, Melarat Tapi Sehat (Live in Poverty but Healthy, 1954), Djudi (Gamble 1955), Peristiwa Surabaja Gubeng (The Incident of Surabaya Gubeng, 1956), Badai Selatan (Southern Storm, 1960), Bengawan Solo (The Solo River, 1971), Si Rano (A Man called Rano, 1973), and Donat Pahlawan Pandir (Donat — A Stupid Hero, 1978). Apart from acting in movies, he also appeared on many TV programmes in cooperation with Komedia Jakarta and Senyum Jakarta. Both were comedian organizations. In these TV programs, Tan usually played a husband and his "stage wife" was Fifi Young (alias Tan Kiem Nio, 1912–75), a veteran actress who was a Peranakan Chinese herself, and a colleague of Tan in the Dardanella before World War II.

Tan married — the first time in 1917 — and divorced many times. His last wife was Sarmini with whom he had two children. They lived in a kampung house and the wife manned a kiosk in order to make a living. Tan led a very simple life at the time. It was reported that two reporters had interviewed him in his kampung house and seen a picture of him together with President Soekarno in the palace. In the picture a smiling Soekarno was pointing his finger at Tan while facing a group of artists. Tan told reporters later that President Soekarno was telling the other artists who were present at the palace that he liked Tan's singing and asked the group to sing together. When asked about Soekarno's singing skills, Tan said that he sang well.

Tan continued to work until the late 1970s. He then fell ill and had to be hospitalized. In 1982, he suffered from a liver disease, but could not afford to have an operation. Sinar Harapan, a Jakarta newspaper, then launched the "Dompet Tan Tjeng Bok" (Tan Tjeng Bok Pocket) campaign and raised funds for him. Many readers donated money which enabled him to have an operation and buy a decent house. Tan died of a heart attack in 1985 in Jakarta.

Tan, Vidal Arceo

(1893–1978)

Scholar, educator, Philippines

Dr Vidal Tan (陈) was a renowned university professor of mathematics. He was a pioneer in the crafting and publication of mathematics textbooks for use locally in colleges and universities nationwide. His rise through the ranks at the University of the Philippines (U.P.) culminated in his being president of the State University from 1951 to 1956, the first Chinese Filipino to be distinguished with such a high honour. Tan also held the distinction of being among the first batch of U.P. graduates in civil engineering, the first Filipino to get a doctorate in mathematics, the first Filipino to become dean of the U.P. College of Engineering. Moreover, Tan, with his accomplishments, was offered good opportunities abroad but he chose to serve his native land. His students remember in particular his exhortation to them that graduating from the university would not mean a thing if they did not do anything to improve the lives of their fellow countrymen.

Tan was born on 28 April 1893 to Gonzalo Tan and Clemencia Santeco in Bacolor, Pampanga. He attended the University of the Philippines in Diliman, Quezon City, and earned a bachelor of arts degree in 1913. Shortly after graduation, he worked as an assistant instructor in the Mathematics Department prior to taking a civil engineering course at the College of Engineering. However, this was cut short when he qualified as a government pensionado and went to Cornell University, where he continued his civil engineering education. Despite the fact that he completed his engineering degree abroad, the U.P. College of Engineering listed him as one of the institution's first batch of civil engineering students, recording him in the university's history. He then taught as associate professor of mathematics before becoming a full-time professor, and subsequently headed the Mathematics Department in 1920. Later, he went to the University of Chicago and earned a doctoral degree in mathematics, becoming the first Filipino to earn a Ph.D. in mathematics in 1925. That same year, he returned to U.P. and served as chairman of the Mathematics Department. He was concurrently part-time consulting civil engineer at the Metropolitan Water District from 1925 to 1928. In 1926, U.P. president Rafael Palma gave him the additional appointment of handling student registration. From 1931 to 1933, he was a member of the board of regents, to which he would return with a concurrent status while serving as U.P. president from 1951–56. Later, he was appointed dean of the College of Arts and Letters, and in 1938, when the University of the Philippines, Baguio, was opened, he was appointed head of the College of Arts and Sciences. In 1939, he became the sixth dean of the College of Engineering, the first Filipino to be appointed, as his predecessors were all Americans. At the same time he was appointed head of the Department of the Mechanics and Engineering Drawing. On 3 October 1949, he resigned as dean and went over to the Far Eastern University in Manila as its fourth president, a role he held until 1952, when he went back to the UP to serve as its eighth president.

On 4 April 1951, when he succeeded U.P. president Bienvenido Gonzales, the university undertook several corollary programmes that further bolstered its status as one of the premier learning institutions in Asia, including the improvement of the quality of its instruction, the development of the faculty, its physical expansion and addition of new units, the strengthening of research, and cultural development. A great leap for the U.P. College of Engineering was made in 1953 when it implemented the new engineering curriculum that required five years of study instead of four. The additional year accommodated the inclusion of several social science and humanities subjects and the legislated requirement of twelve units of Spanish. The advance of technology at the time required the addition of new subjects and laboratory courses.

One of the challenges Tan faced as U.P. president concerned the university chapel, which was shared between Catholic and Protestant students. With the growing population of students on the campus, Tan's attention was called to requests that separate chapels be built for the two groups. Thus, he allocated parcels of land in the non-academic section of the university. These were trying times for Tan as he dealt with issues of academic freedom, the threat of sectarianism, fraternity and sorority violence. It was in the middle of this maelstrom that the idea for a "saucer" type chapel started. In May 1954, the Protestant chapel was the first to have its construction started and its modern structure by university architect Cesar Concio was completed a year later. The Protestant Chapel of the Risen Lord was funded by donations from the United States. The Catholic chapel, named "The Chapel of the Holy Sacrifice" was not as lucky and had to scrounge and scrape for funds raised entirely by the U.P. congregation. Students missed their lunches and faculty donated portions of their salaries to the fund in order to complete the said Catholic Chapel. People remember Tan for his initiative to have two distinctive chapels within the U.P. Diliman campus built.

Student welfare was another area to which Vidal Tan gave his personal attention.

On receiving complaints from the university's alumni and students about the teachers' "meanness", he addressed the members of the university faculty through a memo dated 26 June 1952 and asked each member to look into his method of teaching and his attitude towards students. He cited a case in which a student who was an outstanding medalist from a previous school, failed repeatedly his mathematics subject. The student then left U.P., went to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) in the United States, and was ranked close to the top on graduation. Tan emphasized that the lack of instructional efficiency and effective methodology did not motivate the students enough for them to excel. He called for more patience towards, and sympathy for students. He cited that education often failed because of valid complaints and criticisms about teachers' inability to reach out to the students and motivate them to appreciate a subject more.

Likewise, it was also Tan, authorized by the board of regents, who opened the U.P. Preparatory School in 1954. It was a unique, first-class high school in Manila, with a curriculum designed for students with the aptitude and talent for university-level education. It has since then graduated highly talented students and is now known as the U.P. Integrated High School, located in a part of the U.P. Diliman campus.

Tan published books in mathematics, among which, are Modern High School Arithmetic for the Philippines (1924), Applied Arithmetic for Philippine High Schools (1934), General Mathematics (authored with F. Perez, 1940), Plane and Spherical Trigonometry with Solid Geometry (1950), First Course in College Algebra (1956), and Arithmetic for Community Living (1961). He was also an accomplished playwright and essayist. His plays include the popular The Husband of Mrs. Cruz, The Meeting of the Town Hall, "Souls in Torment" (which is part of his Glimpses of 'Noli Me Tangere'), The Waves, A Daughter of Destiny, and Penpals Wanted (a one-act comedy). Tan articulated his philosophical ideas on education through his essays. Foremost among them are: "The Role of Our State University", an inaugural commencement address he delivered when he took his oath as president of the University of the Philippines on 8 April 1952; "Our Philosophy of Education; and Role of Science in Man". His only poem sketched on a piece of paper did not see print, but echoes his longing for a peaceful departure, and ends with a prayer for his country and countrymen.

Tan breathed his last breath on 7 February 1978 at his residence in San Juan, Metro Manila. He and his wife Teresa Yulo, had only one child, Lieutenant Vidal Lorenzo Y. Tan, Jr., who died at age twenty-five, as a hero of World War II. He was a scholar, a promising lawyer, a talented poet, and essayist, whose works have been collated in a book titled, Message of Quiet: A Collection of Poems and Essays.

Tan Wee Hin, Leo

(陈伟兴, Chen Weixing, 1944–)

Marine biologist, educationist, Singapore

Leo Tan Wee Hin was born on 19 October 1944 in Singapore, the son of Leo Kok Soon, an accountant and Maisie, a nurse. He was educated at St Joseph's Institution and then at the University of Singapore where he graduated with a BSc (Hons) in zoology. By his own admission, Tan was a good but not outstanding student and it was not till his second year at university that he really blossomed as a scholar. He did well enough to be awarded a research scholarship to pursue his doctorate in zoology (marine biology) at the University of Singapore. In 1973, while still writing up his doctoral dissertation, he was appointed Senior Tutor at the University. The following year, he graduated with a PhD in marine biology and while undergoing his deferred National Service stint, he was invited by University of Singapore Vice-Chancellor Dr Toh Chin Chye to become a Lecturer at the Zoology Department at the University of Singapore.

From 1973 to 1986, Tan taught at the Zoology Department and was promoted to the post of Senior Lecturer in 1982. In 1982, Tan joined the Singapore Science Centre as director while concurrently continuing his teaching at the University. The idea for establishing the Science Centre Singapore (SCS) was first mooted in 1969 by the Science Council of Singapore. At the time, the Singapore Government was keen on promoting scientific education and it was decided that the scientific collection of the National Museum would form the core of the new Science Centre. It was officially declared open in 1977 and its first director was Dr R.S. Bathal. When Bathal resigned to take up a research position in Australia in February 1982, Tan took over as Director, having been seconded from the University.

In 1986, Tan became full-time Director of the Singapore Science Centre and once again shot to national fame. To many Singaporeans, Tan was already a familiar face. For 7 years (1975–81), he was quiz-master in the annual television schools' science quiz and challenge. His great enthusiasm for teaching science and for bringing the subject to the masses endeared him to many who saw the Science Centre grow into one of the best public educational institutions in Singapore. At the Centre, he began a series of pocket-sized guides on nature for the layperson; organised regular talks and exhibitions and was responsible for the building of the Laser Theatre, the $18 million Omnimax Theatre (1987) and the $1.5 million Observatory. Tan served as Director of the Centre for a decade and his name became synonymous with the institution and continues to be closely identified with it despite his having left the Centre for over two decades. During his tenure at the Centre, Tan raised visitorship from 90,000 to 900,000 with a blockbuster dinosaur exhibition in 1991, his last year as Director.

In 1991, when the Government decided to establish a Science Faculty at the new National Institute of Education (NIE), Tan was invited to be its Foundation Dean. Returning to academia, which is his first love, Tan got down to work quickly and put his formidable administrative skills to work. He was appointed full Professor just a year later. In 1994, Tan succeeded Professor Gloria Lim as Director of NIE. Under his leadership, the NIE grew into a teacher education institution of high regard. The NIE became turnkey consultants to Abu Dhabi (2002) and Bahrain (2007) to build colleges of education on the model developed by NIE.

In 2008, Tan left NIE and returned to NUS as Professor and Director of Special Projects in the Dean's Office, Faculty of Science. Among his duties is to set up a joint master's programme for science communications. Returning to NUS also gave Tan the opportunity to return to his original love — marine biology. He was very much involved in Project Semakau, a three-year project to document the unique species of marine flora and fauna on Palau Semakau, an artificial landfill. The project was undertaken by the Raffles Museum of Biodiversity Research and was funded by HSBC Bank and supported by the National Environment Agency.

After Tan's return to NUS, he was appointed by the Raffles Museum of Biodiversity as chairman of its fund-raising committee to build a standalone natural history museum. The current museum — a modest set-up housed in the NUS Science Faculty — is home to one of the world's most famous and important natural history collections. Over the next three years, Tan and his team raised S$46 million to build the Lee Kong Chian Museum of Natural History, to be located at the new University Town of the NUS.

Beyond academia, Tan has also been active in many civic organisations: Chairman of the National Parks Board; President, National Academy of Science, Singapore; President, Federation of Asian Scientific Academies and Societies; Honorary Fellow, Singapore Institute of Biology; Founder member, Science Council of Asia; Chairman of the National Youth Achievement Award.

Among his many decorations and awards are: Public Administration Medal (Gold) (1995); Public Service Medal; Public Service Star (2001); National Science and Technology Medal (1999); Green Leaf Environmental Award (1997); National Order of Merit (Officer) France; Distinguished Friend of Ngee Ann; Distinguished Science Alumnus NUS; Public Administration Medal (Gold)(Bar) (2007); and President's Award for the Environment (2007).

Tan is married to Dr Wong Chor Chon, an opthalmologist, and they have two sons, Lionel and Lester.

Tan Yoke See, Henry

(陈玉书, Chen Yushu, 1943–)
Bowling pioneer, Singapore

Henry Tan Yoke See was the first Singaporean ten-pin bowler to achieve iconic status. The game was introduced in 1964, when Jackie's Bowl Orchard opened its doors. Tan was one of the first customers to book a lane to play. Already a good sportsman with an interest in table tennis and athletics, he developed an individual, left-handed bowling style that brought him local and then international success. Within five years Tan had confirmed his place as a local bowling legend. He ousted local champion S.P. Loh, and went on to win the individual silver medal at the World Games in Copenhagen in 1970. A multiple winner of the Sportsman of the Year award, he also achieved acclaim as a coach and role model.

Tan was born in Singapore on 26 September 1943, the fourth son of five siblings. His father, Tan Kah Woon, migrated to Singapore from Hainan Island (China) in the early 1930s.

As the popularity of the game increased rapidly, the name Henry Tan appeared regularly in the results columns of the newspapers. Local leagues and competitions, including playing teams from Ipoh and Penang, were an important feature of Tan's early exposure to a career. Within two years he was recording the highest individual series scores in league competitions. A major landmark was his selection to represent Singapore in the International Masters regional finals in Bangkok in October 1967.

Consistent high scores during the next two years enabled him to compete internationally. In 1969 he earned a taste of international success at the Asia Invitational in Hong Kong where he won a silver medal. He appeared in individual and doubles tournaments and narrowly missed out on an all-expenses paid, round the world trip when coming second in an international 120-game doubles marathon in Kuala Lumpur in early 1970.

As a prelude to a later stunning success, Tan took the top honours on the first day of the First Federation Internationaledes Quilleurs (FIQ) Asian Zone bowling championships. With his partner, S.P. Loh, he won the pairs competition, defeating a Japanese pair by 75 pinfalls.

Shortly before the World Games success, local writer Anthony Ramasamy highlighted some of Tan's notable characteristics. Magnanimous in defeat, he was described as a humble winner, though sometimes pessimistic about his prospects in a competition. In November 1970, Tan was convinced there was a jinx on him when he came in second in the World Cup. In the final play-off against Klaus Müller of West Germany, he was defeated by 651-581. It was a major achievement, but to Tan, facing reality meant to acknowledge that Müller was the better bowler and that chance often plays an important role in competition. He averaged 201 pinfalls during the tournament.

The following year Tan experienced additional fame by being the subject of a television feature. His second place in Copenhagen and the Sportsman of the Year award made him a worthy celebrity. In 1973 the Wold Cup was staged in Singapore and he was selected to represent Singapore. He was unable to repeat the 1970 success, finishing in fifth place.

If Tan had once considered himself to be a born loser, his attitude must have changed dramatically in 1975. His old adversary, Loh Sin Yun, had to pull out of the World FIQ Championships in September. Tan was the reserve and travelled to London.

First, with Denis Tay, he claimed second place in the pair's event, losing narrowly to the English team. Then he shattered the world record with a total of 298 pinfalls out of a possible 300 in the singles event. Singapore High Commissioner Yong Nyu Lin led the celebrations in London. Bowling was included in the Southeast Asian Peninsular (SEAP) Games for the first time in 1975 in Bangkok and Tan took the All-Events gold medal, finishing with identical 238 scores in the final two games. These three major successes ensured that he would again win the Sportsman of the Year award.

An injury, first sustained in 1974, limited Henry's participation in competition from 1976 to 1978, but he was still able to achieve record breaking performances, notably, a 219 average at Jackie's Bowl in June 1976. He made a full comeback in 1979 when he won the Masters title at the National Championships.

Tan took on more coaching responsibilities at the beginning of the 1980s, combining his work with personal preparations for competition. The 12th SEA Games were held in Singapore in 1983 and these represented an opportunity for Henry to crown a glorious career. He was both a competitor and a coach at the Games. He was a member of the teams of three and five which clinched gold medals. The team as a whole took seven out of the twelve gold medals available. This outstanding performance with the younger bowlers led to his selection by the Singapore National Olympic Council as Coach of the Year. He was an inductee to the Singapore Sports Council Hall of Fame in 1985.

Over the next ten years, Tan continued to coach members of the national bowling team at the Katong Centre. One of his most illustrious students was Grace Young, who started bowling relatively late, but also became an iconic figure in bowling in her own right. Young has reflected on the nurturing side of Henry's personality and described him as a survivor who loves life and what it offers. He is a coach who knows his protégé with his heart and a friend she can call on, whatever the time.

In 1993 Tan played a significant role in establishing bowling as a curricular activity for schools. He retired from managing Jackie's Bowl (Katong) in 2002, but continued to be involved in the game. His coaching activities included guiding the St Andrew's Junior College team. His approach to this type of task did not relate exclusively to the skills and techniques of bowling. In 2005 he said that coaching young bowlers was not just about teaching the game, but also about creating a positive environment for them to learn about life through sport.

Tan joined Singapore Bowling (Federation) as one of the national head coaches in 2006, but has also spent time working in Indonesia. More recently he continued to impart his knowledge to the team and was instrumental in the nation's bowling success in the 1st Asian Youth Games, which were hosted by Singapore in 2009. The bowling team secured a total of eight medals.

In January 2011 Tan received a Singapore Bowling Federation Commendation Award in recognition of his outstanding contribution to the local bowling scene and the bowling fraternity. Just four months later, as one of the three national head coaches, he was again named Coach of the Year in the Singapore National Olympic Council Sports Awards for 2010.

Personal Interview (2011).

Tancaktiong, Tony

(陈觉中, Chen Juezhong, 1960–)
Entrepreneur, Philippines

Filipino taste comes first. This is the most potent ingredient behind Jollibee Restaurants' success. A mix of honesty, hard work, integrity, humility, discipline, frugality, and other traditional Confucian virtues is the recipe Tony Tancaktiong uses in his chain of food service business ventures, Jollibee Foods Corporation.

Starting from a tiny ice cream parlour three decades ago, Tony Tancaktiong slowly built his business to become one of the leading companies in the Philippines today. "Jollibee" has become a household word throughout the country. Truly, a Filipino family outing, or a balikbayan's (expatriate) homecoming, is never complete without a Jollibee meal. Most importantly, the presence of a Jollibee restaurant in any place has now become a benchmark for that particular area's growth.

Tancaktiong's beginnings are as humble as the lives of some of the people Jollibee serves everyday. Born on 7 October 1960, he and his siblings first studied at the Philippine Sakya Academy, a Buddhist school in Manila, because his father was a cook in a Chinese temple. His father's employment got them scholarships to study in the school for free. Tancaktiong and his siblings did well in school and lack of money was not a hindrance to their getting top grades or enjoying a close-knit family life.

When Tancaktiong was eleven, the whole family moved south to Davao where his father was invited to set up a Chinese restaurant. Tancaktiong finished his high school education at Davao Chinese High School. It was also in Davao that he and his siblings were first introduced to the food business. Brothers and sisters waited on tables, cleaned up, and learned how a restaurant is run when school was out for the day. He admitted that at times they created more mess than help but they all learned the tasks in a restaurant business.

Tancaktiong graduated from secondary school as one of the top three mathematics students. Among his siblings, he was the only one who moved to Manila for a university education. There he took up chemical engineering at the University of Sto. Tomas. His intention to work overseas after graduation was set aside when he got married right after university and felt the need to make a living immediately to support his new family.

Inheriting his father's entrepreneurial flair, Tancaktiong saw a poster in school about the Magnolia Ice Cream Parlor looking for franchisees. His father lent him the initial capital and he immediately set up two Magnolia ice cream parlours in two of the busiest districts of the metropolis — one in Cubao, Quezon City, and the other in Quiapo, Manila. Typical of Chinese families, his siblings left Davao for Manila to help him out. Tancaktiong and his wife managed the Cubao branch, while his brother and a sister handled Quiapo.

Summers in the Philippines being hot and humid, ice cream parlours were a hit at the time Tancaktiong opened his. They were not just places to cool off and have dessert, but were also the "in" thing where classmates, officemates, friends, and families would gather for special occasions such as birthdays. The newly introduced parfaits, ice cream concoctions and milkshakes were especially savoured when enjoyed in the company of friends and relatives.

Tancaktiong soon found an opportunity to serve not just ice cream but simple snacks for those who wanted to offer their friends a bigger treat. Since his sister had a good recipe for hamburgers, the parlours started selling these too. Through word of mouth, the sales of the burgers soon outpaced ice cream. This recipe remains a closely guarded secret. The few people in the company who know the secret are required to sign confidentiality agreements.

The family changed the restaurant's name to Jolly Bee in 1978. This was later shortened to Jollibee, which still meant happy bee. The bee symbolizes industriousness as well as the spread of sweet things. The choice of the word "jolly" is very appropriate for Tancaktiong, who admits he rarely gets angry.

Jollibee's range of offerings "capitalizes on the unique Filipino taste that is sweet and oozing with flavorful smell". "We knew something important all along: Filipino taste is sweet. This is very Filipino — very Asian. We may not be conscious of it, but we tend to prefer the sweet side of food," he reveals. Tancaktiong recognizes that aside from the penchant for sweet tastes, Filipinos love to smell their food before they go for their first bite. Guided by this concept, coupled with the right attitude to challenges and competition, he has made Jollibee Foods Corporation the great establishment it is today.

News reports say that from a measly two million pesos in sales in its first year in 1978, Jollibee reached the 500-million peso annual mark in annual sales in 1984, just six short years later. This feat propelled the company into the list of the Top 500 Philippine Corporations. In 1987, the company landed on the list of Philippines' Top 100 Corporations. It is the first fast food chain to break the one-billion peso sales mark in 1989. Sometime in the mid-1990s, Jollibee acquired Greenwich Pizza and Delifrance franchises.

In 1993 Tancaktiong's growing company became the first food service establishment to be listed on the Philippine Stock Exchange. The following year, it was cited as one of Asia's leading companies in the Far Eastern Review, while the Asian Business magazine named Jollibee Employer of the Year in 1998, and Most Admired Company in the Philippines in 2000.

In 2000 the company additionally bought out Chowking Foods Corporation. Later it also took over Tom's Teriyaki, Amici di Don Bosco, as well as the majority shares in Yonghe, a fast food chain in China. In 2010 Jollibee acquired a 70-per cent stake in the country's biggest chicken barbecue chain, Mang Inasal.

Today Jollibee is the Philippines' biggest homegrown fast food conglomerate, with more than a thousand outlets of its own and those of franchises in the country. The Jollibee outlets alone now number more than 600 local branches and there are also over fifty international stores located in countries such as the United States, Hong Kong, and Brunei.

In recognition of his achievements, Tancaktiong has deservedly received various awards in entrepreneurship. He was named Ernst and Young's World Entrepreneur of the Year (EOY) in 2004 after besting thirty-one other finalists from around the world. During the award ceremony in Monte Carlo, Monaco, the distinctive red bee that is Jollibee's logo was cited as the Philippine symbol for happiness.

Tancaktiong was chosen by an international panel composed of nine judges who were all past participants in their respective countries' EOY awards. They particularly took notice of Jollibee's "ability to fund its own growth by reinvesting profits". Says Howard Stevenson, professor of entrepreneurship at the Harvard Business School and chair of the judging panel, "[Jollibee] is a success story based on solid foundations, not a meteor that will burn itself out."

Jollibee was moreover hailed by the WEOY organizers for its astronomical growth from an ice cream parlour to a leading fast food restaurant in just a matter of years. They recognized the company as "an unofficial measure of the health of the wider Filipino economy".

Tancaktiong was also given a special award for Business and Entrepreneurship in the 2006 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence, organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran, a leading Chinese-Filipino organization.

Certainly, these achievements are clear proof that a Filipino company can compete with foreign firms and that there is hope for the Philippine economy to develop further. Over 40,000 people have jobs, hundreds of suppliers have income opportunities, and many entrepreneurs have gained access to a thriving food service venture through its franchise scheme.

Even before the Jollibee Foundation was set up in 2004, the company had already been making significant contributions to the reshaping of national values. Jollibee's "Kaya mo, Kid" social development programme, foster positive values in children. Advertising campaigns also highlight strong national pride, good family values, and faith in the Filipino. Another programme, "MaAga ang Pasko," is the longest running Christmas gift collection drive in the country. Meanwhile, the "Nurture the Future" programme provides supplemental feeding to malnourished children nationwide. Jollibee's social commitment is also evident in projects with Habitat for Humanity Philippines (a poverty housing project) and the Give-A-Life Charity Foundation (which aims to raise funds for the purchase of desperately needed life-saving medicines and hospital equipment for indigent paediatric patients).

Tancaktiong's and his family's standard of living remains conservative as he grew up in a household that upheld a frugal lifestyle. His son who finished his computer and business studies, is now working in China, while his eldest daughter teaches English, also in China. The youngest Tancaktiong offspring is still studying, while Tancaktiong's wife remains a valuable adviser at Jollibee although she no longer gets involved in the day-to-day operations.

For all his honours and achievements, Tancaktiong remains his humble self. He has been quoted as saying, "We share with our people any honor and success that come our way." He credits his mother's resourcefulness and optimism for fostering in him his hard-working attitude in life.

In another interview, Tancaktiong also attributes his restaurant's accomplishments to what his father instilled in him many years ago: "If you're a tailor, you make sure the shirt fits your client. If you're in the restaurant business, you make sure your food tastes good."

Tang Choon Keng

(董俊竞, Dong Junjing, 1901–2000)
Businessman, entrepreneur, Singapore

Tang Choon Keng, better known as C.K. Tang or the Curio King, was a pioneer of Singapore's retail industry and best known as the founder of Singapore's famous home-grown departmental store C.K. Tang.

Tang Choon Keng, alias Tang Un Tien, was born in Guihu, Chaoyang in Guangdong in 1901 to an itinerant Presbyterian preacher. He grew up with his nine other siblings at the back of a church in Shantou (Swatow) where part of his time was spent helping church members wash, iron, and pack the lace and embroidery for which Shantou is famous before they were sent to fellow Teochews overseas to sell. It was probably during these sessions that he heard stories about places such as Rangoon, Bangkok, Hong Kong, and Singapore which motivated him to try his luck in Singapore at the age of twenty-one.

With the encouragement and blessing of his parents, he embarked on the journey to Singapore after buying drawnwork lace, bedsheets, tablecloths, napkins, napery, and handkerchiefs in preparation for their sale at his destination. After packing all his goods into a leather suitcase and a metal box which he kept till the end of his life, he paid $16 for the difficult voyage to Singapore on board the Hong Seng, where he slept in the hold of the vessel, and ate his meals from a wooden bucket of rice and vegetables shared by other hold passengers.

On his arrival, Tang received help from members of the Presbyterian Life Church in Prinsep Street in renting a room at Arab Street for $10 a month. He hired a handcart for his linen goods and began his new life in Singapore as a door-to-door salesman, using simple Malay which he had picked up after his arrival to approach European households along Tanglin Road, Holland Road, and in areas such as Bukit Timah, Katong, and Pasir Panjang. Realizing that Singapore was a British colony and that the Europeans preferred to deal with salesmen who were honest, he adopted his lifelong philosophy of fair and consistent pricing in his business, which earned him recommendations and referrals from his customers and became the cornerstone of his business dealings.

Having built up a base of a regular clientele and made arrangements for a regular supply of linens and drawnworks products from Shantou, Tang was able, within a decade, to rent a retail shopfront in River Valley Road. His business was so good that it quickly expanded from one floor in a shophouse to three shop units. He also became an employer of five to six shop assistants, including his younger brother, Tang Guang Hock, who had came to Singapore to study. Even in his retail business, he maintained the same philosophy of honesty and fair pricing which kept his customers returning to him.

After eight years in Singapore, he returned to China to get married, although he made it a point to return quickly to Singapore to ensure he didn't lose any of his customers. After a short stay of four months in China, Tang returned to Singapore with his new wife, mother, and extended family, right in the throes of the Great Depression. But as he recalled, his business was, in fact, not very much affected by the poor economic climate as his clients were still mostly European and despite the Great Depression, continued to receive their salaries and were thus able to continue to buy linen products from him.

By the eve of the Second World War, Tang was able to amass enough capital to buy a piece of land at the corner of Jalan Mohamad Sultan and River Valley Road and build his own three-storied property. He named the building Gainurn Building, after his father, Tang Gan Urn, and used two floors in the building for his business while his family resided on the third floor. However, less than nine months after they moved in, the Japanese marched into Singapore and this marked the end of the first phase of his business.

During the Japanese Occupation, Tang closed his business and even almost lost his new shophouse to the Japanese who had initially wanted to requisition his premises as barracks. He was also called up for inspection by the Japanese during the Sook Ching operation and while he managed to escape, his elder brother was not so lucky. Tang relied on some local clients for survival during the Japanese Occupation and afterwards was able to restart his business quickly after the war as the Japanese had left most of his goods untouched. The skyrocketing prices of goods in the immediate aftermath of the war enabled him to accumulate capital which he sought to reinvest in property since the volatile situation in China then also meant that a new supply of linen goods was difficult to obtain.

The real estate which caught his eye was along Orchard Road where, according to him, prices were similar to pre-war levels. At that time, the land along Orchard Road was not popular with investors due to the existence of the Tai San Ting cemetery. Yet Tang, with Singapore's future tourism sector in mind, was able to foresee that Orchard Road, being in a central location, would become a prime district of Singapore. The land along Orchard Road was then owned by the Jews and he made contact with someone called Nassim who put him in touch with Jewish owners of the properties. The independence of Israel in 1949 had attracted many Jews in Singapore who were eager to move to Israel and so many of the landowners, including the Manasseh family, sold their land and houses along Orchard and Scotts Roads to him very cheaply, at the cost of one to three dollars per square feet. These purchases were to prove the turning point of his career.

Tang then embarked on the next phase in his retail business career by building a new retail building known as the House of Tang at the Orchard Road site, modelling the architecture of the building after the Imperial Palace in Beijing. He personally made a trip to Beijing to inspect and observe the old-style buildings there, and on his return, worked closely with his contractor to achieve the look and style he wanted, going to the extent of ordering green roof tiles from Malacca. The original House of Tang cost him $200,000 to build and was completed in 1958.

With the new start and the growth of his retail business, Tang continued to oversee his business personally, monitoring sales figures every three hours from his office and walking all the shop floors. Even though he employed managers and assistants, he remained a very hands-on boss, making decisions on what to sell, devising selection tests for job applicants, hand-picking and teaching his employees. Known affectionately among his long-time staff as "Ah Gong" or grandfather, his hands-on management style extended to the shop floor, where his frugality was also legendary — he used to instruct his sales staff to recycle price tags as well as boxes and strings for gift wrapping and exports. In addition, C.K. Tang stood out from the other retailers in Singapore with his decision to close the business on Sundays, due to his philosophy that as profits could always be made, a day of rest each week would not dent earnings much. It was a practice that would be maintained by the company till 1996 when the competitive retail scene forced a change of policy.

As an employer of more than a hundred employees, Tang was unable to escape the labour unrest of the 1960s in Singapore. In his oral interview, he recalls how his workers were instigated by two Indian men to go on strike, causing so much disruption to the business that he decided to wind it up in 1960. A year later, however, he re-registered the business and started all over again.

From then on, the business grew and underwent several changes of names from C.K. Tang (Singapore) Limited in 1961 to C.K. Tang (S) Private Limited in 1969 and as the publicly listed C.K. Tang Limited in October 1975, with a authorized capital of $50,000,000 and a management board of four directors, including Tang himself, his eldest son Tang Wee Cheng, his nephew Tang Wee Hee, and Dr Ee Peng Liang. The initial public offer of 4,260,000 ordinary shares in October 1975 was oversubscribed by 12.9 per cent, an indication of the public interest in the company. The decision to go public was made in the long-term interests of the company so that it would, in comparison to other Chinese companies which lasted only a few decades, last longer. Tang was aware that if the company remained privately owned and managed by the family, differences of opinions would sooner or later cause a break-up. Even so, despite enlarging the pool of professionals in his employment, the top management positions in C.K. Tang continued to be dominated by his sons, and Dr Ee remained, for many years, the only outsider on its board of directors.

The first four years after the public listing of C.K. Tang Limited were profitable ones for the company which rode on the boom in the retail industry, so much so that in his chairman's statement of 1977, Tang declared that the company was embarking on what he called a "great leap forward in expansion" for more retail space. With an eye on the booming tourism industry in Singapore, he also took a step into the unknown by announcing plans to build a new House of Tang, comprising a hotel-cum-shopping commercial complex, costing a total of S$70 million. The completion of the entire project was celebrated with the grand opening of the new departmental store and the newly opened Dynasty Hotel on the fitting occasion of the company's golden anniversary in 1982.

Tang retired in 1987 at the age of eighty-five, after fifty-five years at the helm, handing the reins of C.K. Tang Limited to his younger son, Tang Wee Sung, who was assisted by a younger management team of professionals. His retirement was marred by a long-running family feud among his sons which ended in 1994 with the closure of the Dynasty Hotel, which eventually reopened as the Marriott Hotel. Two years later, in 1996, C.K. Tang finally ended its long practice of closing on Sundays. In 2000, C.K. Tang Limited was estimated to be worth S$37.4 million.

Tang died at the age of ninety-eight in September 2000 and was survived by his second wife, eight children, twenty-two grandchildren and thirteen great-grandchildren.

T'ang Leang-Li

(Thung Liang Lee, 汤良礼, Tang Liangli, 1901–75)

Reporter, writer, politician, Indonesia

T'ang Leang-Li, better known in Indonesia as Thung Liang Lee, was a legendary figure who was a reporter, a writer in Dutch, English, and Malay (Indonesian). He became a politician in Kuomintang (KMT) China, serving as a secretary to Wang Ching-wei (Wang Jingwei, 王精卫). T'ang eventually returned to Indonesia and worked for the Indonesian Foreign Ministry. As a Dutch-educated Chinese Peranakan from Java who spoke Dutch, Malay, and English, T'ang was able to communicate with the elité in China, possibly in English rather than Chinese. Perhaps he later learned Chinese and was able to speak it, but his command of the language was definitely limited and he published no books in the Chinese language. In later years, he even claimed to be a descendant of a Banten aristocrat who had joined a Chinese family in Bogor to escape the persecution of the Dutch colonial government. This story cannot be verified.

Descended from a prominent Peranakan family in Bogor, West Java, he studied at a Dutch High School (HBS, Jakarta) and received a B.Sc. degree in economics at the University of London (1926). He also attended the University of Vienna. His subsequent career took him between China and Europe, where he was a journalist and correspondent for the KMT Central Executive Committee (in 1929–30) and worked for the Sozialdemokratischer Pressedienst Deutschlands (Berlin), the Daily Herald and the New Leader (both London), and Sin Po (Jakarta, Indonesian language edition). Later in Beijing he was a correspondent of the New York Times.

T'ang was a prolific writer in English (and German), as the number of books he wrote and edited listed below shows. His first book was China in Revolt, which was published in 1927. Another book of his, China's New Currency System, published in 1936, was later referred to by Milton Friedman, a Nobel Prize winner in economics. He worked with and wrote a political biography of Wang Ching-wei, who later became a Japanese collaborator during the Sino-Japanese War. T'ang's best known work, The Inner History of the Chinese Revolution (London, 1930), betrays his admiration for Wang Ching-wei, and like Wang, he was sympathetic to the left wing of the KMT. While acting as managing director of the China United Press and editor of the People's Tribune (published 1931–41), he also was English-language secretary to Wang and in 1934 became minister without portfolio in Wang's cabinet.

When war broke out between China and Japan in 1937 Wang, revolted by the "scorched earth" policies pursued by the retreating Chinese troops, decided to seek accommodation with the Japanese invaders. T'ang followed him into the "collaborationist" government later established in Nanking. Not much is known about the life of T'ang towards the end of the Wang Ching-wei regime. One source says that he was arrested by the government, but was eventually released.

After the end of the war, T'ang returned to Indonesia where he lived in Jakarta. There he joined Liem Koen Hian, a pre-war founder of the Indonesian-oriented Partai Tionghoa Indonesia (PTI), in founding the Persatuan Tenaga Indonesia (also abbreviated as PTI) in 1950, and worked for the Indonesian Ministry of Information. He also wrote for local newspapers and, after Soeharto came to power in the 1960s and the new government announced the name changing regulation, he changed his name to Tubagus Pranata Tirtawidjaja. He helped found the Indonesian Institute of International Affairs in Jakarta and was editor of its journal, Indonesian Review of International Affairs, after 1969.

According to Thung family records, he was married to Bernardin Lien and died in 1975.

Tang Pui Wah

(邓佩华, Deng Peihua, 1933–)
Sportswoman, Singapore

Tang Pui Wah holds a unique dual distinction. She was not only the first female athlete to represent Singapore at the Olympic Games, but was also the first ever Southeast Asian female athlete to participate in the Olympic Games. As such she became the object of close public attention during the 1950s — a dubious honour. Her career in athletics provides a reference point for contemporary debate on "foreign talent". Given a different political climate during the late 1940s, she might well have represented China rather than Singapore.

Tang was born on 11 October 1933 in Singapore and spent her infancy in Tanjong Pagar Road. Adopted by Tang Peng Hung, the owner of a soya sauce factory, she spent her early years close to Cross Street. Like other privileged youngsters she spent time quietly reading comics and watching the hustle and bustle of Chinatown; she attended Fairfield Girls' School in Neil Road, later. Nanyang Girls' High School in King's Road, and for a brief period, attempted to sharpen her English by attending Raffles Girls School. It was at Nanyang that she made a name for herself as an all-rounder — first as a high jumper, then a hurdler and sprinter. Her height and speed gave her an advantage at the Chinese Schools athletics meets. Because she needed only three steps between the hurdles, instead of five, she won the races. She may have had the advantage of size and age, but she also had determination and drive and represented her school against a visiting Philippines women's basketball team in 1950.

Tang competed regularly during a nine-year period from 1948–56 and benefited from the sponsorship provided by wealthier supporters. Her victories at meetings organized by the Singapore Chinese Amateur Athletic Federation were featured regularly in the Chinese and English press. She owed no particular allegiance to the two main athletic clubs (Achilles and Swifts were run by predominantly English-speaking officials), being content, initially, to attend different training sessions arranged on her behalf by the Chinese section of the sporting fraternity. Over a period of eight years, she was associated with four track coaches — Tay Kai Teck, Ng Liang Chiang, Tan Eng Yoon, and Goh Teck Phuan. Each played his part in transforming an initially reticent Tang into an internationally recognized athletics star.

The defining moment for Tang occurred in 1948 when she was vying for a place in the team to compete in the China Games. She desperately wanted to travel to China, but was denied the opportunity when she was eliminated from the high jump competition by a school friend. Athletes such as Tang looked to China, not within the British colony, for inspiration. The failure did not dampen her competitive spirit — she did not want to be second anymore, she wanted to be first. She did not go to China in 1950, but she did become an All-China record holder later.

Tang broke the China Olympic record for the 100-metre hurdles event in 1949 at the age of fifteen. A year later she created a new All-China record in the 80-metre hurdle challenge with a time of 13.3 seconds. In 1951, at the age of seventeen, she won the Malayan Games 100-metre sprint and was selected to represent Singapore in the First Asian Games held in New Delhi the same year. She came third in her heat and fourth in the final, behind two Japanese stars and Englishwoman Laurie Dowdeswell, an Armed Forces sergeant based in Singapore. It was during these games that Neo Chwee Kok won four gold medals in swimming and the water polo team also brought home the gold.

Tang became a legend of her time in the interstate competitions that were the testing grounds for young athletes. At the 1951 Malayan Amateur Athletic Association (MAAA) sports meet in Kuala Lumpur, she was the "Triple Crown" winner: gold in the 100-yards race, 220-yard race, and 80-metre hurdles. Based on these results, newspaper correspondent Ken Jalleh confidently named her the "best Chinese woman athlete" of her day.

At the XVth Olympic Games held in Helsinki in 1952. Tang's experience was anti-climactic. In the cool, rainy environment of the Finnish capital, she recorded disappointing times. She registered 13.8 seconds in the 100-metre sprint. Her time of 12.8 seconds for the 80-metre hurdles was much better, relatively speaking, but there was still a distance to catch up. The strange track and the enormity of the occasion proved to be too much for her to deal with, but her enjoyment of the Games in the company of fellow athletes far outweighed any disappointment. Little has been recorded about these experiences, but it is apparent that Tang was already at a disadvantage in terms of the coaching expertise available to her at the time. She had developed a rather upright style leading over the hurdles and probably spent too long in the air and not enough time on the ground. She later recognized those limitations, but amusingly reflected that the solidity of the wooden hurdles somewhat discouraged a lower trajectory.

After the Games, the Helsinki girl dominated the Singapore Chinese Interschools championships and was successful in the 32nd Malayan AAA Championships. Tang broke the record for the 80-metre hurdles event, coming in "at least 10 m ahead of the field". However in the 100-metre sprint, she was defeated by Annie Choong and Fay Siebel of Selangor.

Tang continued to improve on her performances in local and state meets. In 1953 she set two new records at the MAAA Championships, which were held again in Kuala Lumpur. Her crowning moment came in 1954 during the 2nd Asian Games in Manila. The 80-metre hurdles race produced a bronze medal although there were some unpleasant moments to endure. Even before the event, she was emotionally weakened. Her mother had just passed away. Then came the drama of the finals in Manila.

Tang was penalized for a false start in the finals. She believed that the starter cheated by accusing her of starting too soon. To her it was the girl from the Philippines who had beaten the gun. She became nervous and lost fractions of a second when the race finally began. Two Japanese hurdlers, Iwamoto and Miyashita, took the gold and silver medals respectively. The girl from the Philippines, Cinco, was in fact disqualified, thus causing ugly crowd scenes.

New challengers were emerging from the track and field scene in Singapore and Malaya. So for Tang the sport represented a transition phase in her life. Unable to maintain her speed over the sprint distances, she was gradually overtaken by younger girls who saw her as their inspiration, but also a target. In 1956 the Singapore Olympic and Sports Council set a qualifying time for the Olympic hurdles event that was to prove beyond her capability. Rather mysteriously, she failed to join the state team for the 35th Malayan Championships held in Penang.

Tang's career ended in 1956, after she had blazed the way for girls to take their rightful place in competitive sport in Singapore. What is often overlooked is that her pioneering efforts for women in sport brought with them a considerable burden. As the focal point of public interest she attracted more attention than her male counterparts because she was one of a few women in a man's world. Happily for Tang, she was one of the stars of the Golden Age of Sport in Singapore who had been able to contribute actively to the sporting education of younger Singaporeans. Trainee teachers at the National Institute of Education have been entertained and enlightened by the candour and humour of Singapore's pioneer female Olympian. Fifty-seven years after receiving her Asian Games medal, she still demonstrates physical and mental agility.

In May 2011 she was presented with a medallion to commemorate her appearance at the Helsinki Olympic Games. As one of Singapore's 167 acknowledged Olympians since 1936, she has been assigned the number 10 in the chronology created by the association known as Olympians Singapore.

Taw Sein Ko

(杜诚诰, Du Chenggao, 1864–1930)
Archeologist, Myanmar

Taw Sein Ko was the first archaeologist in British Burma and a prolific writer.

Born in 1864, Taw was both a racial and cultural hybrid. His father was a Hokkien migrant and his mother, a Shan princess. He therefore had a Sino-Burmese upbringing because of this mixed parentage. However, he received a British education and sojourned in London and Peking. As a result, he became a bearer of three cultures: Chinese, British, and Burmese, which, in many ways, put him into the fuzzy border zone that resisted colonial attempts at demarcation and division. He was also a bridge between two eras, that of the indigenous, traditional literati or the "old order", and the new one which emerged in the wake of colonialism.

In his formative years Taw received a Burmese monastic education and grew up among the aristocratic community in Mawlamyine of the Mon State in Lower Myanmar. That developed his familiarity with the Pali and Burmese languages and literature. He later spent a year in 1892 at the Inner Temple in London and Christ's College in Cambridge. On his return to Burma in 1893 he was appointed assistant secretary and government translator and as such he undertook and completed his first archaeological tour throughout the Burmese Mon countryside. He advocated the preservation of the Mon language through the conservation of manuscripts and relics at the Bernard Free Library and Pharye Museum, as well as the Pitt Rivers Museum in Oxford, and the British Museum.

In the 1880s and 1910s, he emerged as a key advocate for the establishment of a university for Burma and for women to receive formal education. He frequented Chinatown and its temples and in his later life called his Mandalay home "Peking Lodge". He was fluent in spoken and written Burmese, conversant with Jataka tales, and keen to promote Pali education. His familiarity with the folklore and legends of Burma was due to his Burmese mother, and the Buddhist monastic education which he received in his youth, which gave him the orientation and a localized dimension in his deep attachment to and admiration for Mandalay.

He wrote Archaeological Note on Mandalay (first printed in 1917), which became very popular and was reprinted recently. In 1886, he wrote Maung Po: A Product of Western Civilization. In his numerous articles and speeches, he advocated education reform and popularized knowledge of Burmese culture and history. In an early essay on "Moral Education" (1884), he welcomed the expansion of state schools under British rule, but expressed strong reservations at the lack of Buddhist education and the unavailability of Burma's traditional books on morals.

Taw also translated the Kalyani Pali inscriptions, which were recorded on ten sandstones at the Kalyani Thein historical Ordination Hall erected by King Dhammachedi of Mon Kingdom in Pegu (now known Bago) in 1476, into English, and had it published in 1893 in Bombay. (A Preliminary Study of the Kalyani inscriptions of Dhammachedi, 1476 A.D., 1893, 601 pp. + plates). He reportedly was the first to translate the Kalyani inscription into English among scholars.

In 1894 George Morrison, an Australian sinologist, visited Burma and came to know Taw, who accompanied him on a tour to Rangoon's Chinese quarters. Morrison was impressed by Taw who was fluent in Burmese, Pali, Hindustani, and Chinese.

In 1896, two years after the first Sino-British Boundary Treaty (1894) was signed, Taw was sent to Peking to study the Chinese language and literature. On his return to Burma in 1898, he was appointed adviser on Chinese affairs, which enabled him to play a significant role in the Sino-Burmese Boundary Commission and to negotiate the second Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty of 1897.

In May 1899, the establishment of an archaeological department was sanctioned. However, it was not realized until December 1901 when Lord Curzon visited Pagan and Mandalay. He was then appointed government archaeologist, a role he held in conjunction with other posts until 1916. In particular, Taw served as an intermediary for European views of temple conservation.

By 1910 he enforced a government ban on using temple maintenance funds for traditional merit-seeking activities. He was more active in religious temple conservation, indicating that the preservation of the "national culture" had become more important than religious practices of holding temple celebration. That became his point of contention with Buddhist authorities commonly associated with Burma's nationalist movement.

In Burma's nationalist mantra, ah-myo-bhartha-thatenaa (race-language-religion), coined by the Young Men's Buddhist Association in 1906, language took the principal position. Language and literature became central preoccupations of the young, western educated elite. Their efforts to identify and conserve a body of especially Burmese cultural and national traditions owed much to individuals such as Taw.

Between 1883 and 1913, many of his writings were published in popular journals and magazines, such as Buddhism, Rangoon Gazette, Journal of the Burma Research Society, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, Transactions of the Ninth Oriental Congress (1892), Indian Antiquary, Epigraphia Indica, and the Asiatic Review.

The majority of his articles were compiled into the book, Burmese Sketches (Bibliotheca Orientalise: Burma, Vol. I & II) published by Rangoon's British Burma Press in 1913, and reprinted in 1999 by Thailand's Orchid Press. The writings reflected Taw's keen interest in Burmese tradition and culture, such as Burmese ethnology, Burmese language and literature (Chinese works in the Burmese language), Burmese history, archaeology, biographies of Burmese kings, superstition and folklore, Burmese religion and Chinese folk religion, education in Burma, criticism of Burmese Buddhist law, and fiction.

Being a Burmese of Chinese descent, he was concerned with Chinese education and the preservation of Chinese-Buddhist rare manuscripts in the Chinese community in Burma. His contributions towards the Chinese community in Burma can also be traced in overseas Chinese records. Taw, together with Ch'ng Yeen Aun (庄银安), the founder of Kwang Wah Yit Poh (光华日报, one of the world's oldest surviving Chinese newspapers), and supporters of Tung Meng Hui (Sun Yat Sen's revolutionary organization), established Zhong Hua Yi Xue (中华义学, 1906), the first Chinese school in Myanmar.

As an official witness, he was instrumental in the negotiations with the colonial museum administrator to preserve 791 volumes of the Chinese-Buddhist scripture of the Tripitaka (龙藏大藏经, Qing dynastic version) in the colonial museum.

The Tripitaka was bestowed by Empress Dowager Cixi of the Qing Court to the Chinese community of Burma in exchange for a Mandalay marble Buddha image in 1899.

The thirty cartons of scriptures were brought by Venerable Ming Guan (明宽法师) to Rangoon. (The Tripitaka Buddhist scriptures were returned by the British colonial government when the Chinese temple, Zang Jing Luo, in Bahan in north central Yangon, was completed in 1940).

Tay Chong Hai

(郑宗海, Zheng Zonghai, 1931–)
Leading physician, Singapore

Tay Chong Hai is the discoverer of hereditary disease, trichothiodystrophy or Tay Syndrome. He was the first doctor in Southeast Asia to have a disease named after him.

Tay Chong Hai was born on 11 August 1931 in Malacca. Both his grandparents and parents had gone to Malaya from China and were in the wine and distillery business. He attended the Anglo-Chinese School in Malacca, but his education was interrupted by the Japanese Occupation. After the War, the Tay family moved to Kuala Lumpur and the young Chong Hai enrolled first at Batu Road School and then at Victoria Institution where he studied from 1947 to 1953. He was a good student and gained entry into the University of Malaya in Singapore in 1954.

Tay graduated in 1959 and commenced his housemanship at the Singapore General Hospital (SGH). Thereafter, he was appointed house physician first at SGH, and then later at the Kandang Kerbua Maternity Hospital. In 1964, being keen on further studies, he sold his car and resigned his job to go to London. He applied for jobs in small provincial hospitals there while reading for his Membership of the Royal College of Physicians examinations which he cleared in 1967. Although he was keen to remain in the United Kingdom, he was urged to return by Professors Seah Cheng Siang and Khoo Oon Teik who told him that they were very short of doctors with higher qualifications.

He returned to Singapore in 1967 and was appointed Senior Registrar of at Toa Payoh Hospital where he joined Medical Unit II under Professor Seah Cheng Siang. It was, he said, a 'blessing in disguise' as he was treated as an academic doctor, just like the university staff and was able to do a great deal of research and teaching as well. Tay subsequently obtained his Fellowship of the Royal College of Physicians of Glasgow and Fellowship of the Royal Australasian College of Physicians.

While working at the Skin Centre with Dr Khoo Oon Teik in 1971, Tay discovered a congenital illness that would later carry his name. He saw a young patient with rough and brittle hair, red and dry skin, abnormal finger and toe-nails, and initially thought that it might be a variation of Melatine syndrome. On closer examination of the hair sample, Tay concluded that this was something different altogether. He wrote it up and sent it to the American skin journal, Archives of Dermatology and it was published. Thereafter, Tay noted that similar instances were reported in a lot of other publications and journals, all variations of the disease he discovered. It was a German friend of his that suggested that it should simply be referred to as Tay's Syndrome since he was the first to discover it. The name stuck and was subsequently noted up and referred to in textbooks and journals. Since 1994, all major dermatological textbooks uniformly use the name 'Tay's Syndrome' to describe the disease technically known as trichothiodystrophy.

In 1971, Tay was promoted to Consultant Physician and a year later, he identified the first outbreak of hand, foot and mouth disease (HFMD) among children in Singapore. He was alerted to the epidemic by his general practitioner wife who was seeing a lot of babies with sores in their mouths. That year, he also discovered the presence of arsenic in some traditional Chinese pills and this made national headlines when the Ministry of Health issued a warning to the public not to buy Sin Lak pills for asthma.

In 1972, Tay became one of the 12 founder-members of the Dermatological Society of Singapore. Originally called the Singapore Dermatological Society, it functioned under the auspices of the Singapore Medical Association. The name was changed after it became independent. In 1975, Tay was promoted to Head and Senior Physician of Changi Hospital. He remained in government only till 1978 when he left to establish a private practice.

As a private practitioner, Tay specialized in dermatology and rheumatology. His work on rheumatoid arthritis has earned him the epithet of "Father of Rheumatology". In 1984, Tay established the National Arthritis Foundation and served as its chairman for the next 14 years. Following his retirement from the Foundation's chairmanship, an annual lecture organized by the Foundation was named after him.

In 1999, Tay discovered yet another condition known as eosinophilic arthritis. The symptoms of this form of arthritis are similar to those of common arthritis except that the usual anti-inflammatory drugs have no effect on the patient. Tay discovered that patients suffering from this form of arthritis had unusually high count of eosinophil — a type of white blood cells — and the count rises further in cases of allergies or infections. Tay discovered that 5 out of 8 patients responded well to steroid pills.

Despite his advanced years, Tay remains in active practice and is determined to encourage younger generations of physicians to do more research into diseases. At the 185th anniversary celebration of SGH, he donated $100,000 to establish a Nobel-prize type fund to encourage greater research. To keep fit, he plays golf. He is married to another physician and has two children, one of whom is also a doctor, and the other, Guan Hin, a famous creative advertising personality. In his spare time, Tay indulges in his love of writing poetry. In 1977, he published a collection of his original poems entitled, The Birth of a New Day. In 2005, Tay received a special Lifetime Award from President S.R. Nathan.

Tay Kheng Soon

(郑庆顺, Zheng Qingshun, 1940–)
Architect, educator, Singapore

Tay Kheng Soon was born in 1940, one year before the Japanese occupation of Singapore. He is the younger brother of politician Tay Eng Soon.

He enrolled at the Singapore Polytechnic as one of its first students in 1959. During his formative years as young architecture student, he was strongly influenced by Lim Chong Keat, a dynamic young graduate of the Manchester University and MIT who formed the Malayan Architects Co-Partnership (MAC) with William Lim Siew Wai and Chen Voon Fee in 1962. Lim Chong Keat taught for two years at the polytechnic and Tay worked for him on a house in Binjai Park. Another lecturer who greatly stimulated Tay was Lee Kip Lin. Tay's "Malayanism" was strongly influenced by both of them.

In 1964 he was one of the first five students to graduate with a Diploma in Architecture from the polytechnic and was filled with a strong desire to create a modern tropical Malayan architecture. He joined the Malayan Architects Co-Partnership and was an associate a year later when he became a registered architect. The year 1965 was also when Singapore seceded from Malaysia and became an independent nation. In 1966, he embarked on a world study tour to gain further understanding of architecture and be inspired and went as far as the Haifa University in Israel.

Tay, with William Lim and Koh Seow Chuan, next founded a new firm called Design Partnership (DP) in 1967, but left this firm in 1973. He had worked on the design of the Tanglin Shopping Centre, Katong Shopping Centre, and People's Park Complex from 1967 to 1970. It was the era of the Brutalist style, when architecture expressed the determination and confidence of the new nation of Singapore.

In 1970 Tay became chairman of the Singapore Planning and Urban Research Group (SPUR), an independent group set up in 1965, critically examining urban environment and active in proposing innovative solutions for Singapore. He had expressed his criticisms on the housing policies in Singapore in Rumah (journal of the Singapore Institute of Architects) entitled "Public Housing in Singapore" in 1966, and also in a paper, "Environment and Nation Building", delivered to the Democratic Socialist Club at the University of Singapore in September 1967. He advocated the idea of giving people opportunities to participate in building their own homes in the form of cooperative-housing, and compact, high-density, medium-rise housing for communities. SPUR proposed many ideas, some of which were accepted by the government, but most of the critical ones were drawn into controversy that the group was dissolved in 1971. Tay continued to voice his criticisms in various forums. In view of his public activities, in 1974, the partners in Design Partnership decided to dissolve the company and to re-establish it as DP Architects without him.

He then left Singapore and played with the idea of giving up architecture, but finally decided to set up an architectural practice in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. His passion to explore alternative low-rise and high-density housing forms became possible in Malaysia. He designed groundbreaking low-rise, high-density, low-income housing projects in Cheras (completed in 1976), and Setapak Jaya in Kuala Lumpur (completed in 1978).

He returned from Malaysia to Singapore in March 1976 from to form Akitek Tenggara with Chung Meng Ker and Woo Tchi Poung (d. 1982). The first project was the Ming Arcade (designed in 1977, completed in 1983), and it was awarded the Singapore Institute of Architects Design Merit Award as an endorsement to good architecture on tight budgets. In 1980 Akitek Tenggara was commissioned to design the 447-unit Dairy Farm Condominium (completed 1985) for the Kuok Brothers, one of the largest developers in the region. Through these and other projects, Tay embarked fully into developing the new tropical design language of line, edge, and shade in an urban context.

In 1982, he delivered a paper at the Australian Institute of Architects Conference in Singapore entitled, "The Architecture of Rapid Development". The following year, he contributed another paper entitled, "Cultural Identity in Architecture as Perceived from a Singapore Viewpoint", at a seminar organized by the Aga Khan Award for Architecture and the Malaysian Institute of Architects (PAM) in Kuala Lumpur. In 1984 through a paper entitled, "Innovative Technology: Implications on the Search for a Relevant Approach to Architecture", delivered at the Asian Congress of Architects, Tay drew attention to the intellectual debate on Asian architecture and the need to question Western thoughts. He elaborated further on Asian tropical urbanism and the need for "decolonizing the mind" in his paper, "The Tropical City", presented at an international conference organized by the Malaysian Institute of Architects (PAM) and the Aga Khan Program for Islamic Studies at Harvard University and MIT, in Kuala Lumpur, 1985.

Akitek Tenggara produced several important modern tropical architecture buildings in Singapore, such as: Parkway Builders' Centre (1985), Cecil Court office tower (1986), Serangoon Gardens Country Club (1986), and Chancery Lodge Townhouses (1986). In 1987 Tay completed the Chee Tong Temple in Hougang, another important development for a design language for the tropics addressing issues of tradition. In 1988 he won a competition for the redevelopment plan of Kandang Kerbau Hospital in Singapore. The new hospital project was completed in March 1997 and he won in the competition of the Nanyang Technological University Hall of Residence No.V with his energy efficient design (1989).

In October 1988 Tay was invited by the School of Architecture of the National University of Singapore to conduct a student workshop on the Intelligent Tropical City. He was appointed research associate at the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies (ISEAS) from 1988 to 1989, and visiting scholar for the Aga Khan Program at MIT, in the United States in 1986 and 1989 respectively. The results from the workshops and research fellowships were helpful to him in his publication of Mega-Cities in the Tropics by (ISEAS) in 1989. The publication of this book led to an invitation by the Singapore minister of National Development to prepare a Development Guide Plan (DGP) for a 76-hectare site on the fringe of the central area of Singapore known as Kampong Bugis (1990), but at the end of the day, the government selected the Urban Redevelopment Authority (URA) version.

In 1990 Tay wrote his seminal essay on "The Architectural Aesthetics of Tropicality", which summarized the progress to date in developing a design language for tropical Asia. The same year he produced the Victoria Street Concept Plan, an urban study which developed upon his Kampong Bugis DGP proposal. In 1989 Akitek Tenggara won a competition for the design of an Institute of Technical Education (ITE) in Bishan (completed in 1993). The design language of line, edge, and shade had arrived at a new level of refinement.

Tay was appointed as president of the Singapore Institute of Architects from 1991 to 1993. He was invited to be a judge, along with Sir Norman Foster, Sir Richard Rogers, and Philip Cox, of the prestigious Quaternario Awards the same year. In 1995 he took on a major role in organizing the 8th Congress of the Architects Regional Council of Asia (ARCASIA) "Asian Cities in Asia's Century", and presented a paper on urbanization patterns in the region. In November 1996 he delivered a paper in Kumamoto, Japan, entitled, "Architecture of the Future: the Challenge to Asia and the West", which acknowledged the interconnectedness of the global economy and global ecology.

In 1995 and 1996 Akitek Tenggara completed work on three school projects: Elias Park Primary School, Clementi Town Secondary School, and Beatty Secondary School. It is a continuation of the process of developing an architectural language for the tropics and emphasizes the interaction of children with the natural environment. Tay is also a Forrest Ecology expert, and former Singapore Scout Commissioner for four years. He designed and owned the Mawai Eco Camp in Malaysia, which is operated by EDU Outdoor Activities Pte. Ltd. The camp provides professional corporate training and development, training venues and logistics, ecotours and adventure, and outdoor education for schools.

As a radical and critical intellectual, Tay continues to court controversy. However his standing as an architect and educator is recognized internationally. In 2005 he was the principal awardee of "The Golden Award for Excellence in Architecture — Singapore" by a+d (the only national design magazine in India), and Spectrum Foundation (India) and he received this at a presentation ceremony in Kuala Lumpur, in April 2006. He was presented with the PLEA 2007 award in recognition of his pioneering efforts in promoting good design and sustainable architecture in Singapore at the 24th International Conference on Passive and Low Energy Architecture organized by PLEA and NUS in November 2007. In 2008 Tay promoted the ground breaking idea of Rubanisation on an attempt to solve the current most pressing issue of rural-urban dichotomy.

Tay was appointed adjunct professor at the RMIT School of Architecture in Australia in 1996, and in 1998, adjunct associate professor of the MA(UD) programme at National University of Singapore (NUS). He was then adjunct professor of Architecture at the same university in 2000, while continuing to practise as principal partner at Akitek Tenggara (Singapore/Malaysia).

Tay Kheng Soon was one of 100 distinguished individuals to be conferred the Singapore Scout Association Centenary Gold Medal (2010) for his substantial contributions to the development and growth of Scouting in Singapore. He was also awarded SIA Gold Medal 2010 by the Singapore Institute of Architects.This Award is given to a senior architect who has attained a respected standing in society, to recognise his lifetime of sustained and substantial contribution to architecture and his distinguished service to the architectural profession.

Tay Lian Soo

(郑良树, Zheng Liangshu, 1940–)
Academic, Malaysia

Tay Lian Soo was also known as Zheng Bai Nian (郑百年). His ancestral hometown is Chao'an city of Guangdong, China. He was born in 1940, Johor Baru in Johor, Malaysia and went to Taiwan University to further his studies in 1960. He completed his first and master's degrees here and after a short half-year teaching stint at Foon Yew High School, he went back to Taiwan for his Ph.D. In 1971, with his thesis on A Study of Zhan Guo Ce (战国策研究) (Tactics of the Warring States), he graduated with a doctorate degree and was the first overseas Chinese to be conferred such a title.The eleven years of study in Taiwan University was a very important period for him as it enabled him to establish the groundwork of his academic quest there. An avid Chinese literature enthusiast, he had personally learned from many renowned scholars in Taiwan University such as Wang Shumin (王叔岷), Qu Wanli (屈万里), and Tai Jingnong (台静农), etc. From them he learned precious methodologies in scholarly research, which formed the solid foundation of his unique research techniques.

After returning to Malaysia with a Ph.D. qualification, Tay served as a Chinese Studies lecturer at the University of Malaya, then as an associate professor and a department head, as well as other designations for seventeen years. During his attachment with University of Malaya as a Chinese Studies lecturer, he also started his education and community work,such as getting involved in improving the Chinese textbooks of primary schools, conducting research on the history of the Malaysian Chinese, initiating the culture of organizing academic conferences, etc. During this period, his two most significant achievements were completing two colossal historical fiction works on Chinese history, Qing Yun Chuan Qi (青云传奇) (The Legend of QingYun) and Shi Le Feng Yun (石叻风云) (Shi Le Crisis), as well as creating a unique "Three-Dimensional" research method. The latter helped him establish his academic standing as a scholar in the study of the pre-Qin era. One of his representative works, Shang Yang Ji Qi Xue Pai (商鞅及其学派) (Shang Yang and His School of Thought) was completed using this method and it proved the effectiveness and significance of his method. Thanks to the reputation of this book in academia, Tay was invited by the Chinese Thinker Research Centre of Nanjing University to author Shang Yang Ping Zhuan (商鞅评传) (A Critical Biography of Shang Yang) as part of the Zhong Guo Si Xiang Jia Ping Zhuan Cong Shu (中国思想家评传丛书) (Collected Critical Biographies of Chinese Thinkers). Tay was also the first overseas scholar invited by the biographies' chief editor to contribute to the collection. In 1982 and 1983, Tay was invited by his alma mater, Taiwan University, to be the guest professor for the course on "Ancient Text Discrimination Studies" (古籍辨伪学), which was the first literature discrimination course in Taiwan. Till today, Tay is the only Malaysian Chinese who is a world renowned scholar in sinology and also the only Malaysian ever invited to be a guest Chinese Studies professor in Taiwan University due to his academic achievements and this feat indeed brought pride and honour to the Malaysian Chinese community.

In August 1988, Tay flew to Hong Kong to embark on another phase of his academic quest to do more research on sinology and gather more precious academic materials. He held the posts of Chinese Studies senior lecturer, professor, etc. at the Hong Kong University. During his attachment in Hong Kong, his academic research matured and his achievement was even more outstanding as he was immersed in an environment of Chinese culture. Other than attending international conferences on invitation, he also completed his third historical fiction on Chinese history, entitled Rou Fo De Xin Shu Guang (柔佛的新曙光) (The New Dawn of Johor). Though residing in Hong Kong, he still cared very much about the development of culture and education in Malaysia. Since 1998, he has successively published four volumes of The History of Malaysian Chinese Education (马来西亚华文教育发展史) in Malaysia, systematically discussing the historical development of Malaysian Chinese education from its infancy till early twenty-first century. After retiring from the Hong Kong Chinese University in 2002, he accepted the invitation of Shue Yan College of Hong Kong to become its guest professor and department head for a short period of time. After that, he returned to Malaysia to be the guest professor of Chinese Studies at Southern College, Johor. From May 2003 to the present, he has been holding the post of director of the Research Institute of Chinese Ethnicity and Culture at Southern College. In 2006, he became a guest professor of Malayan University.

Tay Lian Soo frequently attends international academic conferences and presents research papers. He has also become the adviser and research fellow for many academic societies in China, and is, for example, the senior adviser of Beijing China Research Society of Sun Tzu's 'Art of War' (北京中国孙子兵法学会), honorary adviser of Henan Laozi Society (河南老子学会), senior adviser of Tianjin Research Society of Sun Tzu's 'Art of War' (天津孙子兵法研究会), special research fellow of the Academy Overseas Chinese Studies of Guangzhou Jinan University (广州暨南大学华侨华人研究所), guest research fellow of Tianjin Academy of Social Sciences (天津社会科学院), special research fellow of the Overseas Chinese Research Centre of Zhejiang Normal University (浙江师范大学华侨华人研究中心), etc. Tay's expertise is in writing prose and Nanyang historical fiction. He also loves calligraphy and traditional Chinese painting. In 1984, he co-organized his first art and calligraphy exhibition with his wife Li Shihua (李石华) in Kuala Lumpur. Later in 1991 and again in 1997, he organized his art exhibitions in Hong Kong. He has a wide range of published works and research areas, including more than thirty published books, as well as many papers, short articles, and satirical essays published in books and periodicals.

Tee Han Kee

(郑汉淇, Zheng Hanqi, 1879–1943)
Doctor, supporter of Sun Yat-Sen, Philippines

The Tee Han Kee (later known as Teehankee in the Philippines) family has a special position in Philippine history. Tee Han Kee, who was a doctor, served as public health officer in the Philippines, one of his sons, Claudio Teehankee, served as justice secretary and later Chief Justice in the Supreme Court; and one of his grandsons, Manuel Teehankee, was justice undersecretary. It is rare in the Chinese-Filipino community to have three generations of a family fulfilling a life of service to the Philippines.

The Teehankee family tradition of service started with its patriarch, Tee Han Kee. He was the first ethnic Chinese doctor to be appointed in government service in the Philippines. As public health officer, he was assigned to attend especially to the issues of health, sanitation, and hygiene in the Chinese community, and he carried his position for twenty years.

Tee's family was originally from Xiamen, Fujian. Tee himself was born in Manila in 1879, but in 1891 at the age of twelve, was sent back to China to study and graduated from Fuzhou Anglo Chinese School. Upon graduation, he studied medicine at the Hong Kong Medical College from which he obtained his medical degree in 1902, after which he returned to the Philippines. He immediately took the Philippine medical board examinations, passed them and was thus allowed to practise on these islands. He was first Chinese appointed assistant surgeon in the Philippine Health Service.

Tee was the first director of the Chinese General Hospital during the hospital's inauguration in 1921. The same year, he also founded the Chinese General Hospital School of Nursing. With the help of three other physicians, he set up the training school and requested the Sisters of the Immaculate Concepcion in Hong Kong and Canton, through the archbishop of Manila, to assist in the early stages of the operations of both the hospital and the school of nursing. The sisters, understanding the great need, readily agreed to render their services, as they were impressed with Tee and his team. The hospital served mainly the Chinese community which, at the time, numbered about 40,000.

At the same medical school in Hong Kong, Tee was classmate to Dr Sun Yat Sen, Chinese revolutionary, political leader, foremost pioneer of Nationalist China, and referred to as the founding father of Republican China. They served together as doctors at the St Elizabeth Hospital in Hong Kong and, as a result, he greatly supported Dr Sun's aspiration for China to be emancipated from the shackles of misrule and oppression by the imperial Qing Dynasty. He followed closely the course of Sun Yat Sen's revolution, established the Pu Ji Shu Bao She (普济书报社) to promote revolutionary causes, and served as head of the organization for twenty-one years. In 1911 Tee helped establish the Tongmenghui Branch in Manila and, in October the same year, co-founded the Kong Li Po (公理报) as the official organ of the revolution. He served as managing editor of the newspaper, helped in the translation of news and, through the paper, helped organize fund-raising activities to support the revolution. Subsequently he was elected president of the Philippine Branch of the Kuomintang (Chinese Nationalist Party) in the Philippines.

Tee was a co-founder of the Manila Chinese Chamber of Commerce in 1904, became the first president of the Filipino-Chinese Medical Society, and was chairman of the Chinese General Hospital. He was an acknowledged expert on bubonic and cholera plagues that afflicted the Chinese community above all because of its lack of hygiene and sanitation. He enforced strict sanitation rules such as burning all the belongings of patients who died of the infectious diseases and disinfecting the households where these patients stayed. With this expertise, he was appointed medical supervisor of the Infectious Diseases Department of the Chinese General Hospital and served as a consultant on infectious diseases for the Philippine Health Service.

Besides being a co-founder of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, Tee was also a director of the Chinese Charitable Association and the Huaqiao Educational Association. He established the Chinese Protestant Youth Association as well.

During the Japanese Occupation of the Philippines, he was appointed vice chairman of the Japanese-sponsored Chinese Association and tasked to administer the affairs of the Chinese community and raise funds from them in support of the Japanese. He was therefore branded a collaborator and, in 1943, was assassinated by anti-Japanese guerrillas. It was only during the war crimes trial after World War II that it was proven that Tee, instead of being a collaborator, in fact secretly supported war efforts against the Japanese. His clinic had a hidden chamber where he would secretly treat guerrillas and other casualties of Japanese atrocities. His clinic also served as a front for the distribution of propaganda materials.

Tee was married to Julia Ong Sangroniz and they had several children. His seventh child, Claudio Teehankee (郑建祥), was associate justice in the Supreme Court (during the Marcos era) who upheld the rule of law and defended citizens' rights. He supported the People Power Revolution and was made chief justice after Cory Aquino assumed the presidency. Claudio Teehankee's son, Manuel Teehankee is also a lawyer and economist and has followed in his father's and grandfather's footsteps in joining the Philippine public service. He first served as justice undersecretary (2000–04) and then in May 2004, as Philippine special envoy for international trade, as well as permanent representative to the World Trade Organization in Geneva, Switzerland. He is now the country's ambassador in Switzerland.

Teehankee, Claudio M.

(郑建祥, Zheng Jianxiang, 1918–89)
Chief Justice, defender of citizen's rights, Philippines

As a member of the Philippine Judiciary, Claudio Teehankee was one of the few noteworthy justices, who was an indefatigable defender of citizens' rights against repressive authoritarianism. During his active years in the judiciary, Teehankee was known as the "dissenting activist justice" due to his opposition to policies that curtailed people's liberty. He was called the "conscience of the Supreme Court." His son, Manuel Teehankee, who was trained in international law, has also followed in his footsteps to serve in the Philippine Government.

Claudio Teehankee was born in Manila on 18 April 1918, the seventh child of Dr Tee Han Kee (郑汉淇) and Julia Ong Sangroniz. He attended the Ateneo de Manila University where he completed a bachelor of arts degree summa cum laude in 1938. He then took law at the same university and likewise graduated summa cum laude in 1940. He topped the law bar exams that year, setting the record as the very first bar top-notcher of Ateneo Law School with an excellent average of 94.35 per cent.

In 1941 he entered private practice with a firm of prominent attorneys, Araneta, Zaragosa and Bautista. One partner in the law firm was a founding member of the Philippine Civil Liberties Union (CLU), an organization that combined activism in support of civil liberties with nationalist and progressive politics. Teehankee later joined the CLU and frequently chaired its meetings. He actively took on pro bono cases for the CLU and for detainees held by the military due to alleged participation in underground movement against the government. In 1946 he joined the law partnership of Lorenzo Tañada — who was to become a senator a year later — and Emmanuel Pelaez — who would be elected Philippine vice president in 1961. These two partners were among the country's most important post-war nationalist politicians. In 1957 he co-founded the Nationalist Citizen's Party along with Senators Claro M. Recto and Tañada.

Teehankee's career took a drastic turn when he switched from private practice to government service when he defended the movie, Iginuhit ng Tadhana: The Ferdinand E. Marcos Story against censorship. Then President Diosdado Macapagal sought the banning of the movie, which was deemed a propaganda film favouring the career of Marcos. Teehankee, however, brought the case to the Supreme Court which ruled in favour of Marcos.

When Marcos became president, Claudio Teehankee was appointed justice undersecretary on 15 January 1966, and justice secretary a year later. In the latter role, he introduced institutional changes to improve the delivery of justice, such as conceptualizing the formation of circuit criminal courts, thereby paving the way for the holding of court sessions in safe and accessible venues for those involved in the proceedings. He also reduced to six days the period for pre-trial investigations and issued a directive stopping the wholesale granting of search warrants. As justice secretary, Teehankee was also duty bound to advise the president especially on matters of national interest. These included the issue of economic exchange with communist and socialist countries, and the Retail Trade Nationalization Law, whose implementation by the ppresident he advised.

Although Teehankee's stint with the Justice Department was brief and despite his lack of substantial judicial experience, Marcos appointed him associate justice of the Supreme Court in December 1968. He distinguished himself when he upheld the rights of the people especially during the martial law period. He often dissented from the majority opinion of his colleagues in court and accused Marcos and the military of human right abuses. He also authored the opinion questioning the jurisdiction of military commissions over civilians, such as the one that tried former Senator Benigno S. Aquino Jr.

When he became a senior member of the Supreme Court, Teehankee moved for the overturning of the acquittal of generals allegedly involved in the assassination of Senator Benigno S. Aquino Jr. The Teehankee Court also declared invalid Marcos's secret decrees and reversed a martial-law ruling that allowed military tribunals to try civilians. This turned his relationship with President Marcos sour so he was bypassed twice for the position of chief justice — violation of the protocol that the senior associate justice succeeds the retiring chief justice.

Teehankee's political opponents often cited his father's Chinese citizenship (thereby putting his own citizenship in supposedly murky waters) in efforts to oust him from government positions. He had to fend off rumours and accusations that were intended to bring to an end his rising career as a public servant. Besides this, as most justices were graduates of the University of the Philippines College of Law who were mostly supporters of President Marcos, who sees himself an alumnus of the University of the Philippines, Teehankee, being the first Ateneo law graduate to be appointed to the Supreme Court, was often alone in defending what he believed was right.

During the People Power Revolution, in his capacity as associate justice, he swore Corazon Cojuangco Aquino in as president of the Philippines at Club Filipino, San Juan, at 10:00 am in 1986, two hours before Ferdinand Marcos' similar oath-taking at Malacañang on 25 February at noon. In April 1986 Teehankee was named chief justice. His integrity, his opposition to tyranny in favour of the rule of law, and his courage in risking his life and liberty, eventually won the recognition of the institutions of higher learning in the Philippines. For example, in 1986, his alma mater, Ateneo de Manila University, conferred an honorary doctorate of humane letters upon him, and the following year, the University of the Philippines conferred on him an honorary doctorate of laws.

After his retirement, he was appointed to the United Nations as Philippine ambassador and died on 27 November 1989 in Manhattan, New York. He was interred at the Libingan ng mga Bayani (Memorial for Heroes) in Fort Bonifacio, Taguig City. Teehankee was married to Pilar Javier Angeles Duldulao, with whom he raised nine children, namely Claudio Teehankee Jr., Roberto Teehankee, Evelyn Teehankee Zulueta, Priscilla Teehankee Gamboa, Ramon Teehankee, Gonzalo Teehankee, Jose Raul Teehankee, Manuel Teehankee, and Ricardo Teehankee.

Following in his footsteps into government service is one of his sons, Manuel Antonio Javier Teehankee, the eighth child. He presently chairs the Working Group on Trade and Transfer of Technology in the World Trade Organization, and serves as coordinator of the Core Group of Developing Countries in the Negotiating Group on Trade Facilitation. He was recently nominated for the associate justice post at the Supreme Court and will soon be retained by President Benigno Aquino III as ambassador.

Manuel Teehankee studied at the Ateneo de Manila and completed degrees in economics and law. He was the top law graduate in his batch and ranked first in the bar exams of 1993, following in the footsteps of his father. In 1986 he went to Michigan Law School in Ann Arbor to complete a master of laws degree, specializing in GATT Law (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade). A year later, he studied at the London School of Economics and Political Science, earning a master's degree in law for the second time on a scholarship grant.

In 1987 Manuel obtained the necessary licence to practise law in New York. He spent ten years doing international litigation at Baker & McKenzie and LeBoeuf Lamb Greene & MacRae. As a private practitioner, he represented clients before the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal at The Hague, the International Court of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce in Paris, and the WTO in Geneva. In 1998 he returned to Manila as the international counsel of the Romulo Law Office and at the same time rejoined the Ateneo Law Faculty.

While Manuel Teehankee was actively serving as justice undersecretary (2001–04), he concurrently headed the Office of the Government Corporate Counsel, with special responsibilities for the privatization efforts with the energy sector. Importantly, he represented the government in the case over a disputed contract awarded to the Philippine International Air Terminals Co. Inc. (PIATCO) consortium which built and originally owned the US$650-million-Ninoy Aquino International Airport's (NAIA) Terminal 3. He moved towards the nullification of government contracts awarding NAIA 3 operations to PIATCO, which sought international arbitration afterwards when the Philippine Government voided its contract in 2002 for being illegal, a decision which the Supreme Court upheld in 2004. PIATCO's German-based principal investor, Frankfurt Airport Services, then filed a suit at the World Bank's International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID) in Washington D.C. to recover its $424-million investment. PIATCO also brought a separate case for compensation to the Singapore-based International Chamber of Commerce Arbitration Tribunal. Both cases were resolved in favour of the Philippines, with the Singapore tribunal clearing the way for the NAIA to complete its facilities at Terminal 3.

Teehankee also took responsibility for the government's 2004 debt-to-equity deal between the Metropolitan Waterworks and Sewerage Systems and the Lopez-owned Maynilad Water Services, Inc. Under this setup, 8 billion pesos in unpaid concession fees were converted into a 61-per cent government stake in Maynilad. He has also led government efforts in important pursuits involving, among others, UNCITRAL (United Nations Commission on International Trade Law) and ICSID-based arbitration and litigation.

In May 2004, he was appointed Philippine special envoy for international trade as well as permanent representative to the World Trade Organization in Geneva, Switzerland, and has been a distinguished permanent representative. He is now the country's ambassador in Switzerland.

Teh Hong Piow

(郑鸿标, Zheng Hongbiao, 1930–)
Banker, Malaysia

Teh Hong Piow was born on 14 March 1930 in Singapore and attended the Anglo-Chinese School there. He obtained three degrees in all: one at the Pacific Western University, and two honorary PhDs, one each from Clayton University and the University of Malaya. He has been married to Tay Sock Noy since 1956 and they have four children. He joined the 3rd Singapore Company of the Boys' Brigade and was active from 1947 to 1951, rising from rank and file to sergeant, before being appointed second lieutenant (now known as warrant officer). The Boys Brigade of Malaysia has been around for 124 years and Teh has attributed the moulding of his character and personality partly to the discipline training of the Boys' Brigade.

Teh's career in banking took off in 1950 when he was a bank officer at Singapore's Overseas-Chinese Banking Corp. Ltd. Ten years later he moved on to Malayan Banking Bhd. where he was made a manager. Later in 1964, he was promoted to the position of general manager at the young age of thirty-four. He left Malayan Banking in 1966 to set up Public Bank, which currently has 241 domestic and three overseas branches. Public Bank is currently the country's second largest lender and is setting its sights on regional markets. Teh was awarded the "Tan Sri" title in 1983, and numerous other titles of recognition including "Dato Sri" and "Dato". His net worth is estimated by Forbes to be US$3 billion, making him the fourth richest in Malaysia and 287th in the world in 2008.

Teh has received numerous lists of awards and recognition in his own name and his institution's for his outstanding achievements. In July 2007, Public Bank received the "Best Company in Malaysia for Corporate Governance 2007" award from Asset Magazine. Tan Sri Teh was also named "Best CEO in Malaysia 2004", "Malaysia's CEO of the Year 1998", "Malaysia's Business Achiever of the Year 1997", "Asean's Most Astute Banker 1994", etc. In August, Public Bank was named Alpha South East Asia's "Best Bank in Malaysia" and also received the same award and "The Best Managed Company in Malaysia" awards for 2007 from FinanceAsia. It was also named for the ninth time by Euromoney to be the "Best Bank in Malaysia 2007". In 2008, Teh received the Honorable Medal for National Contribution in appreciation of his contribution of one unit of five rooms at Hun Sen Prasat Secondary School in Khum Prasat, Srok Sontok, Thom Province, Cambodia. Prior to that, he was also awarded the Medal "For the Course of Vietnamese Banking" by the State Bank of Vietnam in 2002 for his contributions to the Vietnamese banking industry over the past years.

Teh is a fellow of several institutes such as the Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrator, Australia; Institute of Bankers, Malaysia; the Chartered Institute of Bankers, the United Kingdom; the Institute of Administrative Management, the United Kingdom; and the Malaysian Institute of Management. He also served in various capacities in public service bodies in Malaysia, such as member of the Malaysian Business Council from 1991–93 and a panel member of the National Trust Fund from 1988 to 2001, a founder member of the Advisory Business Council since 2003, and a member of the IPRM Accreditation Privy Council of Malaysia. He was conferred the Doctorate of Laws (Honorary) from the University of Malaya.

Teh has long been respected for his prudent management of Public Bank, being chairman of both Public Bank and Public Bank Group, which is reputable for being the most efficient domestic bank with asset quality and returns on equity. He holds directorships in several other companies in the Public Bank Group. He has also been chairman of LPI Capital Bhd since September 1971 and Lonpac Insurance Bhd. since its operation on 1 May 1999. Teh also heads several finance and investment related companies in Malaysia and the Asian region. A banker with an astute sense of timing, he expects Public Bank Bhd. to continue with its high organic growth strategy. The Public Bank Group's acquisitions of former Hock Hua Bank (completed in March 2001) and former Asia Commercial Bank (completed in May 2006) had proceeded very smoothly. Recently, Public Bank signed a ten-year strategic regional alliance with the ING Group to distribute ING's life, health, and personal accident products in Malaysia and other countries in which Public Bank has a business presence. The strategic alliance opens the door for Public Bank to develop jointly with the ING Group the bancassurance and takaful businesses, wealth management and co-branded credit card services. Meanwhile Public Mutual has been targeting investments in the Southeast Asian and Asian markets aggressively. It's wholly owned subsidiary, Cambodian Public Bank, opened its ninth branch in December 2007 and is targeting to be the largest lender in Cambodia, having more than doubled its loans portfolio by 2008.

Public Financial Holdings Limited (formerly known as JCG Holdings Limited) is an investment holding company incorporated in Bermuda under the Companies Act 1981 on 16 August 1991. It is a 73.5 per cent owned subsidiary of Public Bank Berhad. Its shares are listed on the The Stock Exchange of Hong Kong Limited and the Hang Seng HK Small Cap Index. The major subsidiaries of Public Financial are Public Finance Ltd., Winton Ltd. and Public Bank (Hong Kong) Limited (formerly Asia Commercial Bank Ltd).

Teh has set up several awards and fellowships. In line with the corporate social responsibility goals of aiding nation building, a "Tan Sri Teh Hong Piow Resident Fellowship Programme" allows scholars to pursue research interests using resources available at the Perdana Leadership Foundation to develop a deeper understanding and appreciation of Malaysia's history and rich intellectual heritage that will eventually lead to the promotion of global understanding and achievement of peaceful resolutions. He also donated a total of RM3.5 million to Universiti Tunku Abdul Rahman and Tunku Abdul Rahman College for the setting up of two student loan funds to provide financial assistance to needy and deserving students in tertiary education. Other recipients include the National Heart Institute Foundation, the Girl Guides Association of Malaysia, and the Kuala Lumpur Traffic Police Club.

Continuous improvement in productivity and efficiency has always been the cornerstone of Teh's philosophy and strategies to leverage capability in expanding their multidelivery channels, and to remain the top Chinese-controlled anchor bank in Malaysia. He has demonstrated his personal and professional development of exceptionally high standards of growth, performance, and premiums.

Teo Bak Kim

(张木钦, Zhang Muqin, 1937–)
Leader writer, Malaysia

Zhang Mu Qin, originally from Raoping, Guangdong (广东饶平), is one of the most prominent and prolific Chinese writers in Malaysia. Born on 31 October 1937 in Kota Tinggi, Johor, Zhang Mu Qin later migrated to another town in Johor, Skudai.

During the Japanese Occupation, he and his family settled in the nearby area of Tangkak, Johor. After the Second World War, Zhang's father and uncle formed a joint venture to start a retail shop. However, the retail business was short-lived when Zhang's father and a group of residents were suspected of being Communist supporters and arrested under the Emergency Ordinance.

Zhang's father was imprisoned in Kluang Camp and was on the waiting list of detainees to be shipped to Chaozhou (潮州), China. However after three years, he was released and exiled to the city of Muar. The outcome of the sentencing resulted in, yet again, the uprooting of the entire Zhang family to Muar.

Zhang was an extremely hardworking and intense student. Being an ardent admirer of the famous poet, Li Bing Ren (李冰人), he immersed himself in Li's collection by reading a roomful of Li's books. Aware of his diligence, his teacher, Xie Qing Sheng (谢庆生), saw his potential and urged him to acquire the Malaysian Cambridge Education (MCE) certificate. After finishing secondary school, he spent two years preparing for the MCE exams. During this time, he polished his English reading and writing skills which proved to be valuable in his career later.

Zhang completed his primary and secondary education in Zhong Hua School, Muar (麻坡中化中学), in the 1950s. In one of his articles, he reminisced about his student activist days which were greatly influenced by the Chinese education leader, Lim Lian Geok (Lin Lian Yu, 林连玉). In 1957 in his final year at high school, Zhang was actively involved in the student movement at the time. During this period, student movements were regarded as improper and quite unacceptable. Consequently, Zhang was nearly dismissed from high school. Fortunately with the intervention and goodwill of the board of directors, Zhang was let off with a stern warning.

Armed with the MCE certification, Zhang stepped into the working world as a temporary teacher for a short period of time. When Nanyang Siang Pau conducted interviews in Muar, he was one of the many who turned up for the openings. He was offered employment and decided to join the paper as a reporter from 1961. This marked the beginning of a thirty-year long service with the Chinese media. Starting as a reporter, he was promoted and steadily rose through the ranks to the positions of an editor, leader writer, chief leader writer and finally, editor-in-chief.

When he joined the paper, Zhang's first posting was to Kluang, Johor, where he met and interviewed the brilliant Opposition leader, Dr Wei Li Huang (魏利煌). In 1962, he was transferred to Johor Bahru where he crossed paths with another well known figure, the Labour Party chief, Tan Kai Hee (Chen Kaixi, 陈凯希).

In the highly charged political scene at the time, Zhang did not receive a warm welcome from the left-wing party. At one time, Tan Kai Hee politely but firmly, barred him for entering the office of the Party building.

In 1969 Zhang was posted to Malacca to take charge of editing the paper's southern edition. He was later promoted to editorial chief (编辑主任) in 1975. When Chua Chee Chuan (朱自存) retired from office in 1984, Zhang assumed the position of editor-in-chief on 1 January 1985.

In 1990, the Nanyang editorial board underwent a drastic restructuring, which included the abolishment of the editor-in-chief post. In another extreme move, the out-of-favour general manager, Guo Long Sheng (郭隆生), named himself the lead editor. Zhang was appointed chief leader writer. These new changes did not sit well with some employees and there was a general sense of discontent. In October 1991, Guo, faced with a vote of no-confidence in the union, was forced to resign.

Also in 1991, Zhang won the Wong Kee Tat Media long-service award. He left Nanyang Siang Pau and was offered the chief position in Xin Tong Bao (《新通报》) in 1993. He was appointed editorial director and editor-in-chief. But things were not going very well for the press company. Poor circulation and weak financial performance left a RM10-million debt which led to the shutting down of Xin Tong Bao on 3 August 1994. With the closure of the company, Zhang retired from the media industry at the age of fifty-seven.

Zhang Mu Qin is well known for his razor-sharp observations and ingenious flair in presentation techniques. He published numerous books, including Minzu Xianfeng Zhige (《民族先锋之歌》 National Pioneer, first edition in 1984, reprint in 2002), Tianshang RenJian (《天上人间》 Heaven on Earth 1995), Tan Hua Ting (《探花亭》 Chamber for Seeing Flowers, 1997), Jianhu ShaoXiang (《见虎烧香》 To Pray for Safety 1999), Heeren Street in Setting Sun (《荷兰街口夕阳斜》, 2000), LiuHuaTing (《流花亭》 Another Chamber for Flowers, 2004), Congpang shachu (《从旁杀出》 Unexpected, 2005), and also Liulian Dangtou (《榴梿当头》 Durian Season, 2007).

Teo Eng Hock

(张永福, Zhang Yongfu, 1871–1957)
Businessman, revolutionist, Singapore

Teo Eng Hock was a prominent Straits Chinese Teochew businessman, Chinese patriot, and revolutionary activist.

He was born in 1871 in Singapore, the son of the well-known Teochew merchant, Teo Lee, and his wife, Tan Poh Neo. The elder Teo had been a humble cloth peddler when he first started out in the east coast of Malaya. His excellent business acumen allowed him to build up a network of trading companies in Trengganu, Kelantan, and also Bali. He then moved into real estate and had a knack for picking choice properties, thus making a fortune. His wife also came from a well known family. Her grandfather, Tan Hong Khuay, was mayor of Muntok in Sumatra.

Teo was bilingually educated at home. His work career began with him helping his father run his various trading companies and he clearly inherited his father's excellent business sense. He focused on the textile division of his father's business and, together with his brother, Bah Tan, started investing in rubber plantations and dealing in rubber. Before long, it was the rubber division in Teo's stable of businesses that reaped him the best profits. Not satisfied with merely growing rubber or trading it as a commodity, Teo decided to go into manufacturing, specializing in rubber shoes. His foray into shoe manufacturing brought him into direct competition with Malaya's rubber pioneer, Tan Kah Kee. By the beginning of the twentieth century, the entire rubber shoe manufacturing industry was dominated by Teo and Tan.

Teo's inherited wealth, coupled with his hard work and instinct for business, made him and his brother very wealthy. Like his father, Teo Eng Hock had a natural affinity with the property market. A scan through old newspapers will reveal numerous purchases by Tan of property in choice locations. The most famous of all his many properties is Wan Qing Yuan Villa (晚晴园), later known as Boon Ching Villa, which he bought in 1905 for his mother. Today, this building has been transformed into the Sun Yat Sen Nanyang Memorial Hall.

Beyond business, Teo was socially and politically engaged. An intellectual, whose circle included men such as Tan Chor Nam (陈楚南) and Lim Nee Soon (林义顺), Teo became involved in revolutionary activities to overthrow the Qing Government in China. As many of the meetings with his like-minded business friends often took place at the Xiao Tao Yuan Club (小桃园俱乐部, literally, "Little Peach Garden"), they were known as the Xiao Tao Yuan revolutionaries. To further the republican cause, Teo and Tan Chor Nam established the newspaper, Thoe Lam Jit Poh (图南日报), in 1904, with Teo himself as editor. The newspaper received a lukewarm response from Singapore readers, was a commercial failure, and closed down after just two years of operation. Even so, the paper, which promoted Dr Sun Yat Sen's republican ideas and revolution, caught the attention of Dr Sun when he was in Hawaii. Impressed by its contents, he got in touch with the Singapore group through an intermediary and eventually established a branch of the Tong Meng Hui (同盟会) in Singapore.

The Tong Meng Hui (Chinese United League or Chinese Revolutionary Alliance) was an underground movement which Sun organized together with Song Jiaoren in Tokyo in 1905. The Nanyang branch of the Tong Meng Hui was established in Singapore in February 1906, following Sun's visit to the island the year before. Teo became the deputy head of the Tong Meng Hui, and Wan Qing Yuan served as the headquarters for Chinese republicans in Southeast Asia. Following the establishment of the Chinese Republic in 1911, the Tong Meng Hui became the Kuomintang (National People's Party) in 1912, with Teo as its leader.

In June 1906, when Sun returned to Singapore and reorganized the Tong Meng Hui, Teo was officially elected its head. To promote the revamped Tong Meng Hui's activities, Tan Chor Nam, Lim Nee Soon, and Teo established the Chong Shing Press (中兴印刷局) in July 1907, which published the Chong Sing Yit Pao (中兴日报), with the view to promoting Sun's republican ideas. Teo also publicized Sun's revolutionary cause through public speeches and the Sin Chew Reading Room Mass Media Publishing Company. His revolutionary base was Wan Qing Yuan villa. Teo eventually donated the villa to Dr Sun for his use as a revolution headquarters.

The establishment of the Chinese Republic in 1911 strengthened Teo's commitment to politics. He shifted his attention to China where he was on the board of several banks, most notably, the Central Bank of China in Swatow (Shantou). By 1914 the Kuomintang organization in Singapore was riven by factionalism. In disgust, Sun formed the Chinese Revolutionary Party (CRP) to replace the Kuomintang. Teo was president of the CRP till it shut down in 1919. The Kuomintang made a spectacular comeback in 1920 and Teo rejoined the organization. In 1926, the colonial government dissolved all branches of the Kuomintang in Malaya.

Teo then felt that he could play a more meaningful role in China's future by going there and participating directly in Chinese politics. He therefore went to China in 1932 and became the Mayor of Swatow and head of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Bureau. He decided to return to Singapore in 1937 and became a member of the conservative faction of the Kuomintang, but disagreement with local rulers led him to leave the party and join the pro-Japanese Wang Ching-wei puppet government. After World War II, Teo was captured and classified as a traitor by the Kuomintang. He later retired to Hong Kong where he died on 5 April 1957, aged eighty-eight.

Teo's burning revolutionary involvement in politics led him to neglect his businesses and this, coupled with the collapse of rubber prices in 1920, caused him to lose most of his fortune. His daughter Teo Soon Kim, was the first woman lawyer to be called to the Singapore Bar. Teo's contribution to Sun Yat Sen's revolution is now immortalized in a painting in the Sun Yat Sen Nanyang Memorial Hall (Wan Qing Yuan), showing Sun standing together with Teo and his mother. Wang Qing Yuan was purchased by admirers of Sun and transformed into a memorial hall in 1940. His great-grandnephew, Teo Chee Hean, became deputy prime minister of Singapore in 2009.

Teo Soo Cheng

(张泗清, Zhang Siqing, 1925–)
Entrepreneur, business and community leader, Malaysia

Teo Soo Cheng was a prominent corporate figure and successful businessman. In addition to having a successful business empire, he was actively involved in association, community, and education work. His efforts in creating a conducive and excellent living environment in Petaling Jaya, Selangor, are highly praised. Teo came to Kuala Lumpur in 1936 to help his father and brothers in the eggs and groceries business. He gradually ventured into a variety of businesses and is one of the most successful top business tycoons in the country. Initially he was called the "Rice King", but was later transformed into a famous entrepreneur in land property development. He is also committed to developing higher education. He claims that family education and strong family bondage play key roles in all his achievements.

Teo Soo Cheng was born in Chao Yang, Guangdong, in 1925, the second child among ten siblings. His father, Zhang Han San (张汉三), came to Kuala Lumpur alone in 1922 to start a business to retail ducks and chicken eggs. Teo received two years of education in China and then studied for two months at an evening school in Malaya. He stopped schooling at the age of twelve. On 15 January 1943, he married Zhong Yu Feng (钟玉凤). They have three sons and four daughters. His father had emphasized the principles of "hard work" and "thriftiness" and Teo also forbids his children from involved in "immoral activities" and "gambling". He values highly the importance of a good relationship with his children and he treats them equally.

Although not highly educated, Teo was hard-working, thrifty, down-to-earth, and careful in his businesses. He always demands of himself "to be better than others". He thinks that "if other can sell, I can too" and has the confidence to think "if others are successful, I can be successful too". In the 1960s, he ventured into the land and property business. His first major land development project was Taman Paramount. Although he faced many obstacles initially, with his perseverance, he managed to overcome all difficulties and created a conducive and comfortable living environment. He subsequently developed Taman Berkeley in Klang; Damansara Jaya, Damansara Utama, and Bandar Utama in Petaling Jaya. These developments have successfully transformed Petaling Jaya into a well developed area. The Bandar Utama project resulted in the winning of many awards. It is a highly valued and much sought after housing area in Malaysia. This township includes shopping malls, hypermarkets, a cineplex, offices, a five-star hotel, schools, and a central garden. In future, there will be medical facilities, high-end nursing homes, condominiums, and so on. To date Teo has built more than 30,000 houses and developed more than 3,000 acres of land. He has transformed Petaling Jaya into a modern city and his projects will run well into 2017.

Despite his age, Teo is still very actively running his business. He is the executive chairman of See Hoi Chan Holdings Group, Bandar Utama Development Sdn. Bhd., First Nationwide Landbank Sdn. Bhd., and Bandar Utama City Centre Sdn. Bhd. Although he is now assisted by his three sons, he still goes to work and is attending meetings and the planning of his companies. He has managed to ensure the continuity of his business empire by training his children into successful businessman in their own right and stature. Now, his eldest son, Zhang Chang Guo (张昌国), is managing the One Utama shopping mall which is the country's premier shopping mall. His second son, Zhang Chang Liang (张昌梁), is in education and running the Utama College (KBU) which is also one of the country's leading private institutions of higher learning. The third son, Zhang Chang Hung (张昌鸿), manages One World Hotel and several plantation properties. Teo has high regards for family bonding and relationship and he practises what he preaches to set a good example to his children. According to his daughter, Zhang Qi Zhen (张崎珍), "my father keeps a very low profile. What he sees [as] very important are two things, our education and whether we are polite to others. He wants us to be honest, sincere and highly respected by others."

Teo was also active in the associations and his contributions were invaluable. Some of his involvements were as vice-president of The Chinese Chambers of Commerce & Industry of Kuala Lumpur and Selangor, founder of Selangor Importers & Exporters Association, founding president of the Malaysian Housing Developers Association (1973), president and honorary president of The Selangor and Kuala Lumpur Teo Chew Association, president and honorary president of the Malaysian Teo Chew Association, president of Kuala Lumpur Tung Shin Hospital (since 1982), director of Petaling Jaya Puay Chai Chinese Primary School (since 1962), director of Kuala Lumpur Kuen Cheng High School (since 1972), director of Chong Hwa Independent High School Kuala Lumpur, honorary president of The Kuala Lumpur and Selangor Che Huan Khor Moral Uplifting Society and the Singapore Che Sen Khor Moral Lifting Society, Teo is also the founder of KDU College and he set up the Teo SiQing Foundation to aid students from poor backgrounds.

In recognition of Teo's achievements and contributions are acknowledged. He was conferred the Johan Setia Mahkota (JSM) honorific in 1969 and the Panglima Setia Mahkota (PSM) honorific with the title of "Tan Sri" in 1999 by the Yang di-Petuan Agong. The Sultan of Selangor awarded him the Setia Mahkota Selangor (SMS) in 1978 and Dato' Paduka Mahkota Selangor (DPMS) gave the title of "Dato" in 1979. Besides these, he was awarded honorary doctorates by the University of Nottingham Trent in 1996 and the University of Anglia Ruskin in 1997. In 1999, he was named Property Man of the Year by the International Real Estate Federation.

Teo is a well known philanthropist. During the 1969 May 13 incident, he offered rice and other food to help 3,000 people who were stranded at the Merdeka Stadium. In 1970, when Kuala Lumpur was flooded, many rice stores were affected. More than 150,000 packets of rice were damaged and Malaysia was in the midst of a rice shortage, Teo stood up to help the country import rice from Singapore to overcome solve the crisis. According to Teo, doing good deeds for others is a must, "I believe, in order to receive, we must give first. When I was young, we were poor. We had no money to go to school. No money to see the doctor when we were sick. Therefore, now when I have money, I must help the poor. My father came from China to start a business here. It was hard work. Therefore it is my responsibility to develop and expand it and not to spend recklessly."

"I didn't study much. But I remember my father's teaching: [I] must do everything by myself (亲力亲为), [be] down to earth (脚踏实地), hardworking and thrifty, [and] must learn even until I am old." Therefore, hard work, thriftiness, the insistence on going to work every day, and doing everything himself, have become Teo's life motto. In work, Teo emphasizes diversification and innovation. He takes good care of his workers and understands his clients' needs.

He is ambitious and was very meticulous in planning every single detail. He emphasizes creativity, pointing out that: "When others are building single storey houses, I go for double storey. When others build offices, I build high class finance mall[s]". He sets endless objectives and targets and all these contribute to his business empire. He is indeed another shining example of a Malaysian Chinese businessman who has made it in the business world and also in the Chinese community.

Thái Thạch

(Thái Trấn Thạch, 蔡陈石, Cai Chenshi, 1901–67)

Business and community leader, Vietnam

Thái Thạch was a leader of the Fujian Congregation (西贡福建中华理事会) in Saigon (present Ho Chi Minh City) from the 1930s to the 1950s. His grocery business, which catered reliably to the quotidian needs of the French, was a successful enterprise. His contributions to education and health care of the Chinese community were well known. He was one of ten directors of the Phúc Thiện Hospital (越南福善医院董事), chairman of Chengzhi School (诚志中学), established by the Fujianese congregation of Saigon, as well as vice-chairman of the Sino-French School (中法学院), which nurtured French speakers. He further played a political role in facilitating negotiations between the Kuomintang (KMT) soldiers (国军) who retreated to Vietnam with French officials at the end of the civil war in China. His mediation resulted in the safe settlement of the stranded soldiers on Phu Quoc Island, Vietnam, for about three years from March 1950 to June 1953.

The Vietnamese name of Cai Chenshi (Thái Trấn Thạch) was Thái Thạch. Originating from Tong An county of Fujian province (福建省同安县), China, he began his early schooling at a village school. At the age of sixteen, he followed other villagers who left his hometown in hordes for Southeast Asia. His destination was Saigon in French Cochinchina, where his father's younger brother operated a grocery store. He secured a job assisting his paternal uncle in the day; at night, he learnt French, which he recognized as an important commercial lingua franca in an economy monopolized by French enterprises, except for the import-export trade, that was one of the niches of the Chinese. Nurturing his desire to gain access to the French network, he made efforts to acquire competence in the French language and soon became a fluent speaker.

Thạch was married in 1923, after which he was given more responsibilities in the management of his uncle's business. He enjoyed amicable relations with the French and thus was often able to obtain first-hand information on the arrival of new cargoes at the waterfront of the Saigon River.

At the age of twenty-seven, he established an import and export business called Tân Chấn Phát (新振发) in Rue Catinat in downtown Saigon, which is today's Dong Khoi Street (Đường Đồng Khởi). It was common in those days to find bilingual individuals, especially those who acted as "middlemen" between the French and the locals, showing an air of haughtiness. However, Thạch was said to have a humble, "down-to-earth" attitude and was also frugal. His sound reputation of being reliable propelled his business to success.

His parents and kin from his lineage in Tong An county joined him in Saigon after he became financially independent. Several male relatives from his lineage later aided him in his business expansion; for example, Thái Thục Thương (蔡淑鎗) managed the wine section of the enterprise (新振发洋酒行), and Thái Thục Thiết (蔡淑铁), an inn. His shop named Alimentation Générale "Thai-Thach" (Thai-Thach Grocery) in Rue Catinat (renamed Đường Tự Do, or Liberation Street between 1954 and 1975) was a prominent landmark. The spacious European-styled shop boasted a wide array of food items, ranging from dairy products such as cheese, to seafood flown in regularly from Phan Thiết, a fishing area in the south-eastern region of Vietnam. The shop, complete with wines and a cheese counter, was often thronged with French housewives and chefs working in French households, who would drop off their lists of groceries at the shop and return to pick up their packed orders.

Thạch did not ensconce himself in his office armchair after attaining economic success. He actively advocated education and became involved in social projects. He was vice-chairman of the Sino-French School which offered French and Mandarin classes and was established in 1907 by the Fujianese, Xie Mayan (see entry on Tạ Mã Viễn 谢妈延), with prominent French businessmen.

Thạch was also chairman of Chengzhi School, the secondary and high school school established in February 1925 by the Fujian bang (clan) of Saigon at No. 5 Boulevard Kitchener (renamed Nguyễn Thái Học Road in 1955). At the Chinese Congregation of Saigon (西贡中华理事总会) in 1954, he was elected chairman of the congregation, but chose to serve as vice-chairman. He was head of the Fujian Congregation in Saigon which owned the Phúc Thiện Hospital (福善医院), the third hospital to be built with Chinese funds. It was opened in 1909 and directed by a fifteen-member board of management; Thạch served as one of ten directors. Originally dispensing only traditional medicine, the hospital expanded to incorporate a department administering western medicine from 1946. On average, this spacious hospital had eighty warded patients daily. It rendered its services free of charge.

The initiative to use western medicine in the hospital was a response to the urgent need for dealing with rampant cases of cholera and beriberi that erupted immediately after World War II. Vitamin-B1 tablets brought into Vietnam by British soldiers were the catalyst in the treatment of beriberi. A devastated infrastructure, disrupted traffic, galloping inflation, and a rapidly increasing population in Cholon (Chợ Lớn) were dire conditions urgently pressing for a quick supply of medicine and medical care. The death toll was soaring in the densely populated Chinese enclave where impromptu medical facilities were built to cope with these ailments while undertakers thrived on the swiftest influx of business.

The owner of the traditional Chinese medical hall, Nhị Thiên Đường (二天堂药行), came forward and donated two large tents, hoping to shelter over a hundred patients on an empty plot of land at the Guangzhao Hospital (Bệnh Viện Quảng Triệu 广肇医院). Western medicine was administered in these tents, which were managed by the five Chinese congregations (bang or "clan") comprising the Cantonese, Chaozhou (Teochew), Fujianese, Hainanese, and Hakka. They marked the birth of a new hospital, the Trung Hoa Western Hospital (Bệnh Viện Trung Hoa 中华西医院). Medical facilities soon became limited, prompting Thạch and the consul general of the Republic of China in the Republic of Vietnam, Yin Fengzao (尹凤藻), to propose leasing the premises of the Phúc Thiện Hospital. The hospital generously donated its warehouses that were located within its compound instead. The Trung Hoa Western Hospital then relocated to these warehouses and was renamed the Trung Chính Western Hospital (Bệnh Viện Trung Chính 中正西医院), in honour of President Chiang Kai-shek (蒋介石), or Jiang Zhongzheng (蒋中正), leader of the Chinese nationalists.

Thạch served as a committee member at the Kuomintang Main Branch in Annam, led by secretary general, Lin Zechen (林泽臣) (see entry on Diệp Truyền Anh). In 1950, at the end of the civil war between the Chinese Nationalist Party (KMT) and the Communist Party of China, several troops of the national army of the Republic of China retreated southward to Vietnam, led by General Huang Jie (黄杰). Yin Fengzao, the consul general, solicited the help of Thạch in negotiating a safe stay for the Chinese nationalist army that was stranded in Vietnam with the French Government. The negotiations resulted in the settlement of the Chinese national army on Phu Quoc Island for three years.

Thạch was also the driving force behind the establishment of the first fabric factory that tapped into Chinese capital in the Republic of Vietnam. He successfully pooled funds for the investment within the Chinese community in 1956, in response to the incentives offered by the Vietnamese Government to encourage ethnic Chinese to venture into large-scale industrial production at a time when most Chinese community leaders were engaged in the distribution and wholesale business. The factory yielded handsome revenue for its investors, but Thạch, despite having favourably evaluated the lucrative prospects of the investment, had only invested a small capital in it himself and had also rejected director posts.

Thạch passed on in 1967, leaving six sons and three daughters. His eldest son, Phúc Lại (福来), continued his father's community role as vice-head of the Fujian Congregation in Saigon before migrating to the United States with his brother, Phúc Căn (福根). The other sons, Phúc Minh (福明), Phúc Sơn (福山), Phúc Tài (福财), and Phúc Thắng (福胜), left for Canada. His eldest daughter, Minh Lý (明理), and the youngest, Minh Gia (明嘉), resided in Taiwan, while the second daughter, Minh Đào (明淘), settled in Sweden with her husband.

Thaksin Shinawatra

(丘达新, Qiu Daxin, 1949–)

Telecommunications magnate, former Prime Minister, Thailand

Police Lieutenant Colonel Dr Thaksin Shinawatra was Thailand's twenty-third Prime Minister. His premiership of 9 February 2001 to 19 September 2006 ended with a bloodless military coup d'état led by Army commander General Sonthi Bunyaratkalin.

Remaining in exile for most of the period since that coup, Thaksin returned to Thailand only for a brief period in 2008.

Thaksin was born in Chiang Mai Province, Northern Thailand, on 26 July 1949 to Loet Shinawatra and Yindi Ramingwong. The Shinawatra family was descended from Khoo Soon Seng (丘春盛), a Hakka merchant who emigrated from Meizhou, Guandong Province, to Siam in the 1860s and made a fortune as a tax collector in Chanthaburi Province before moving to Chiangmai to undertake a range of businesses. Thaksin's mother's family belonged to the house of Thipphachakkrathiwong, which ruled the Chiangmai kingdom from the eighteenth century until its annexation by Siam and the discontinuation of the title of "King of Chiangmai" after the death of chao Kaew Nawarat in 1939.

Thaksin began school in Chiang Mai's Sankamphaeng District and moved to Montfort College in Chiangmai town as a third-year primary-school student. He was admitted to the Thai military's Pre-Cadet School as a member of Class 10 in 1969 and entered the Thai Police Academy as a member of Class 26 in 1973. At the latter institution, he was the top student in his class. In 1974, he received a Thai government scholarship to study criminal justice in the United States, where he earned a master's degree from Eastern Kentucky University in 1975 and a doctorate from Sam Houston State University in 1978. Returning to Thailand, he started his police career as head of Section 6, Research and Planning Division, Bangkok Metropolitan Police Command. He was later promoted to deputy superintendent of the same command's intelligence centre and staff lecturer at the Police Academy. He married Photchaman Damaphong, the daughter of a police general, in 1980. They have one son, Phanthongthae, and two daughters, Phinthongtha and Phaethongthan.

Thaksin ventured into various businesses in the early 1980s, including the silk trade, film distribution, cinemas, and condominiums. These initial ventures failed, leaving him near insolvency. In 1983, he founded Shinawatra Computer Co., Ltd. (originally ICSI Limited Partnership), which focused on corporate computer leasing and expanded into profitable services like pagers and mobile phone operations, as well as fully integrated satellite and telecommunications services. Thaksin resigned from the Police Department in 1987. His company was listed on the Securities Exchange of Thailand (SET) in 1990 and later renamed "Shin Corp. Plc."

In 1994, Thaksin stepped down as chairman of Shin Corp and transferred his equity stakes to family members and other trusted proxies so that he could plunge into politics. He joined the Phalang Dharma Party (PDP) with the support of Major General Chamlong Srimuang. His first ministerial post was foreign minister in the government of Chuan Likphai in 1995. He assumed the leadership of the PDP from Chamlong and subsequently served as deputy prime minister in the governments of Banharn Silpa-archa in 1996 and of General Chawalit Yongchaiyut in 1997. On 14 July 1998, Thaksin launched the Thai Rak Thai Party (TRT) and became party leader, a position that catapulted him to the premiership on 9 February 2001.

Cultivating the image of a brash, no-nonsense prime minister in a hurry, Thaksin was credited with many new projects targeting low-income groups, but these initiatives were criticized by others as populism. His social and economic policies, dubbed "Thaksinomics", focused on stimulating domestic consumption as a parallel track to export promotion and on introducing various social welfare programmes. Major programmes included the OTOP (One Tambon, One Product) scheme and the Village Fund Project to provide rural communities with access to financial resources for investment in income generation; a three-year debt moratorium for small-scale farmers; a programme to provide rural families with a million water buffaloes; a housing programme for low-income families; and the 30-baht universal health-care plan.

During his premiership, Thaksin attempted to raise Thailand's international profile by promoting his version of regional cooperation as well as bilateral free trade arrangements with trading partners. Thailand's cooperation in America's "war on terror" also saw Thailand achieve the status of a "major non-NATO ally" of the United States. However, Thaksin's reputation was tarnished by his hard-line approach to many issues and resultant human right abuses. Extra-judicial killings on the part of the Thai police during the Thaksin government's war on drugs resulted in the deaths of 2,500 people suspected of being involved in the drugs trade. By the end of his premiership, renewed insurgency in Thailand's southernmost provinces had resulted in the death of some 1,400 people. Thaksin's policies toward the far South were blamed by many for leading to the escalation of violence there.

The Thaksin government was also notorious for conflicts of interests and for corruption scandals. Public disappointment culminated in a campaign aiming to drive him from office after Thaksin and members of his immediate family and of the Damapong family sold their stakes in Shin Corp to the Singapore sovereign wealth fund Temasek Holdings on 23 January 2006.The still poorly understood 73.3-billion-baht deal involved transfers of 1.49 billion Shin Corp shares, or 49.59 per cent of the firm's total equity, at 49.25 baht per share. It was the single biggest share transaction in the history of the SET. Amendments made to stock-trading regulations a few days prior to this transaction were seen by many as an attempt to exempt Thaksin and his family from the capital gains taxes that other Thais paid.

The anti-Thaksin movement grew exponentially in subsequent months under the mantle of the People's Alliance for Democracy. Thaksin decided on 24 February 2006, to dissolve parliament and to call a snap general election for 2 April 2006. Opposition parties, led by the Democrat Party of Abhisit Vejjajiva, boycotted the election. TRT's victory at the polls was declared invalid by the Constitutional Court on the grounds that the lay-out of polling places violated voters' right to a secret ballot. A new election was set for 15 October 2006 but never took place, as the Thai military staged a coup on 19 September 2006 while Thaksin was attending the UN General Assembly meeting in New York. Thaksin's TRT Party was also dissolved in May 2007 for violation of electoral laws. His family's assets in Thailand were frozen on the junta's orders.

After the coup Thaksin did not return from self-imposed exile until 28 February 2008, when he flew back to face charges of corruption. He left Thailand again to attend the 2008 Summer Olympics in Beijing and did not return to Thailand to hear the final sentence of the Thai Supreme Court. He applied for asylum in the United Kingdom but was refused. He moved from one country to another and eventually settled down in Dubai. In October of 2008, the Supreme Court found him guilty of a conflict of interest and sentenced him in absentia to two years' imprisonment. At present, Thaksin mainly relies on his overseas financial assets of around US$100 million, which he has invested in gold mines, diamond polishing, and lottery licences in a number of countries. In June 2007, he bought Manchester City Football Club but sold it to investors from Abu Dhabi United Group in September 2008. In November 2009, he was appointed an economic adviser to the Cambodian government, a position that he held only until August of the following year.

Despite his exile, Thaksin has maintained his involvement in Thai politics from afar mainly through his family and pre-existing networks. Former TRT members formed a new party, the People's Power Party (PPP) in 2007, and Thaksin was reported to have called veteran politician and former Bangkok governor Samak Suntharawet to offer him leadership of the party. The PPP won the Thai parliamentary elections of December 2007. Becoming prime minister, Samak admitted that he was a "nominee" of Thaksin. The PPP government continued the TRT government's populist socio-economic policies. But Samak was disqualified from holding office by the Constitutional Court in September 2008. Somchai Wongsawat, Thaksin's brother-in-law, succeeded Samak as premier. However, the Somchai government lasted only until December 2008, when the Constitutional Court dissolved the PPP for vote buying. The Democrat Party assumed leadership of the government with the support of the military and conservative political forces. Abhisit Vejjajiva became Thailand's prime minister.

Thaksin continued to play a crucial role in Thai politics from overseas. He became the icon of the Red Shirts (largely members of the National United Front for Democracy Against Dictatorship) during the political crises of 2008–10, broadcasting his views to Red Shirt rallies against the military and the conservative elite then in power. Following the dissolution of the PPP in 2008, Thaksin supported his former TRT members as they formed the Phuea Thai Party (PTP). The PTP contested Thailand's July 2011 election under the leadership of Thaksin's youngest sister, Yingluck Shinawatra. Winning 265 out of the 500 seats contested, her party joined with five smaller parties to form a 300-seat coalition government. Prime Minister Yingluck has been criticised for trying to grant amnesty to her brother so as to allow him to return to Thailand. Thaksin remains influential both in the Yingluck government's policy formulation and in its selection of cabinet members. In just over a decade, he has thoroughly transformed his country's politics, though the ultimate consequences of that transformation must remain unclear for now.

Thaw Kaung

(1937–)

Historian, chief librarian, Myanmar

U Thaw Kaung is a scholar who pioneered historical research in Myanmar, and was a leader in librarianship in Myanmar. He has written academic papers and published books on library science, bibliographies, and culture and has been duly recognized in his field of work and research, being the first Southeast Asian librarian to have obtained the Honorary Fellow Award of the Library Association (Hons. F. L. A.).

A second-generation, Myanmar-born Hokkien, U Thaw Kaung was born on 17 December 1937 in Yangon and has no Chinese name. His father, Sithu U Kaung, whose surname was Saw (苏 Su), was director for education during the British colonial administration (1945–55). His mother, Daw Thein, had the maiden surname of Teoh (张 Zhang). Their ancestors had migrated from Quanzhou (泉州), China. U Thaw Kaung is the eldest son.

In 1947, his father was sent by the General Aung San Interim Government to England to manage Burmese scholars there. The young Thaw Kaung accompanied his parent there and through an arrangement made by his father, was taught by a female tutor from Cambridge University while he was in England. In 1950 he returned to Yangon with his parents, but could not go to school because he had suffered from poliomyelitis since young. His parents did not subject him to strenuous work, and had devoted much care to him to ensure that he would be well taken care of later in life.

From 1952–54, Thaw Kaung attended the Methodist English High School (now No. 1 State High School, Dagon township, Yangon), and passed with distinctions in English and geography. He started his career in 1959 when he obtained the bachelors of Arts (First Class Honours) degree in English at Rangoon University, and won the U Po Hnit Gold Prize. From 1960–62, he was in England on a state scholarship a diploma course in library science at the School of Oriental and African Studies. He specialized in Oriental Bibliography and graduated with distinction.

Between 1966 and 1984, U Thaw Kaung concurrently led the Department of Library and Information Studies and the Myanmar Language Commission where he was chairman. He was also vice-chairman of the National Literary Awards Committee. He devoted his studies to librarianship and attended the postgraduate diploma course at the University of London from 1960 to 1962. In 1963, following his graduation, he was elected chartered librarian and appointed an associate of the Library Association of the United Kingdom. Then in 1971 he founded the Department of Library Studies at the University of Rangoon (now Yangon) and established a postgraduate curriculum in Library and Information Studies. Five years later, he obtained a Certificate of Library Studies awarded by the Associate of Australian Library and Information Association (A.L.I.A.) from the Western Australian Institute of Technology (currently known as the Curtin University). In 1984, he became, as mentioned above, the first Southeast Asian librarian during the post-war period to have obtained the Hons. F. L. A.

For two terms, 1984–85 and 1991–92, U Thaw Kaung was consultant for the British library in Yangon, Oriental and India Office Collections. From 1995 until the present, he has been a member of the Pakkoku U Ohn Pe Literary Awards Selection Committee, responsible for the selection and promotion of literary and cultural materials in Myanmar.

In the years following 1993 until 2000, he was a sought after speaker and presenter on Chinese culture and heritage in Myanmar, and represented Myanmar in several conferences in India, Japan, London, Malaysia, and Thailand. In 1999, he was conferred a doctor of letters, degree, an honorary degree, by the University of Western Sydney. These days, he would occasionally present talks on his experience in preserving and assessing old texts from palm leaves and Parabike manuscripts. His most recent presentation was at a workshop organized at the Asia Research Institute, National University of Singapore, on 23 October 2008.

In January 2002, U Thaw Kaung was visiting professor to the National Museum of Ethnology in Osaka, Japan. Concurrently, he was selected as a permanent member of the Myanmar Historical Commission, which is involved in the keeping of records and developments in Myanmar. In 2005, he was awarded the 16th Fukuoka Asia Culture Prize by the Secretariat of the Fukuoka Asian Culture in Japan for his work on the preservation of traditional Pali texts. In particular, he was credited with the preservation of various 1,000-year-old palm leaf and paper Parabike manuscripts. In the citation on his award, U Thaw Kaung was acknowledged as having pioneered historical research in Myanmar. A year later, he was appointed a member for the National Convention, which was tasked to draft the National Constitution of Myanmar.

U Thaw Kaung has written several articles and published books; among them, "Preservation and Conservation Work in the Universities Central Library" (1997); "Bibliographies Compiled in Myanmar" (1998); "Post-Colonial Society and Culture: Reflections in Myanmar Novels in the last 50 Years" (1999), and "The Ramayana Drama in Myanmar" (2001). His earlier works include the Library Handbooks and Manuals, published by Sarpay Beikman (Institute of Literature) in Yangon in 1973, and a chapter on Cataloguing and Cataloguing Rules for Myanmar writers. He has also co-authored works to his credit, such as the Bibliography of Works on Myanmar Literature, published by Sarpay Beikman (Institute of Literature) in 1983, and co-written with U Than Htut and Daw San San May.

U Thaw Kaung married Daw Khin Than (nicknamed Su Su) in 1964. They have three sons: Min Thaw Kaung, Thant Thaw Kaung, and Myat Thaw Kaung, all of whom are married. U Thaw Kaung and his wife currently live in Bahan Township, Yangon, with their two elder sons and their families. The youngest son is a chartered accountant, who having obtained Singapore citizenship, now lives in Singapore with his family.

The Teng Chun

(Tahyar Ederis, 郑登俊, Zheng Dengjun, 1902–77)

Movie producer, film director, Indonesia

The Teng Chun was known as a pioneer film-maker in Indonesia before World War II and was a major figure in the Indonesian film industry.

He was born in Batavia (Jakarta) on 18 June 1902 into a rich businessman's family. His father was a merchant engaged in the agricultural business and The went to the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan School (THHK) in Batavia for his primary school education. In 1920 he was sent to the United States to study commerce, but he learned scenario writing instead at the Palmer Play Theatre in New York, where he met Fred Young, another Peranakan Chinese from Indonesia. Between 1925 and 1930, The was in Shanghai, the pre-World War II centre of Mandarin movies, and got involved in the movie business, learning more about film-making and the movie industry. He also successfully persuaded his father to change his business from selling agricultural products to importing Chinese movies in Indonesia.

In 1930 The returned to Jakarta and made plans to start a movie production company. His father, however, believed that it would be wiser to stick to importing, rather than producing, movies. Without the support of his father, The established a company called Cino Motion Picture and produced his first movie, Boenga Roos dari Tjikembang (The beauty from Tjikembang, 1931), which was also one of the first Indonesian motion pictures with sound. The movie was based on the novel by a well known Peranakan writer, Kwee Tek Hoay, and tells the story of a mixed marriage between a Chinese man and an indigenous Indonesian woman. However, this first movie by The was not appreciated by either the press or the audience.

The then changed his strategy and he started to make Indonesian movies based on Chinese stories such as Sam Pek Eng Tay (Sam Pek and Eng Tay, also known as Liang Shanbo yu Zhu Yingtai, in Mandarin, 1931); Pat Bie Tu (or Delapan Wanita Djelita, Eight Beauties, also known as Ba Mei Tu, in Mandarin 1932), Delapan Djago Pedang (Eight Heroic Swordsmen, 1933), and Ouw Phe Tjoa (Black and White Snakes, or Hei Bai She, in Mandarin, 1934), all of which turned out to be commercial successes. The then changed the name of his company to Java Industrial Film (JIF) and went on to produce more movies with a Chinese background, for example, Lima Siloeman Tikoes (Five Mice, 1935), Ouw Phe Tjoa II (Black and White Snakes II, 1936), and Hong Lian Si (Red Lotus Temple, 1937). Initially The was in charge of all aspects of film-making but gradually he discovered the importance of division of work, and began delegating responsibilities to others. His brothers, The Teng Hoei and The Teng Liong, were respectively trained in the use of the camera and sound production. The quality of The's movies improved with these professionals joining his company.

However, the taste of the audience in Indonesia began to change with the import of movies from Hollywood. Movies about Tarzan and Zorro were very popular and so The changed his strategy again. He started producing action movies with local backgrounds. He also began to use local actors and actresses, many of whom were from travelling drama troupes, such as Andjar Asmara, Raden Ismail, Tan Tjeng Bok, Fifi Young, and others. He produced many movies, including Gadis jang Terdjoeal (A Girl who was Sold, 1937), O, Iboe (O, Mother, 1938), Alang-Alang (Long Grass, 1940), Rentjong Atjeh (The Dagger of Aceh, 1940), and Poetri Rimba (Jungle Girl, 1941). The's Java Industrial Film Company was the largest and most modern studio in Indonesia.

The early movie industry in Indonesia was dominated by the Europeans and Chinese Peranakans. It is also worth noting that before World War II, the film industry tended to bring together Chinese and non-Chinese film workers in the production of movies. For instance, Terang Boelan (Moon Light, 1937), one of the best pre-war Indonesian movies, was a product of Chinese (Wong), indigenous Indonesian (Saeroen) and European (Balink) efforts. Up to 1939, there were only two motion picture companies in Indonesia. However, the Sino-Japanese War in China resulted in the migration of many Chinese in the movie business to the south, including Indonesia. By 1940 there had been a jump of motion picture companies in colonial Indonesia; there were ten film companies in that year alone. Meanwhile, the close cooperation between various ethnic groups continued, as reflected in the cast and production team of the movies. The inflow of this new capital and new technology helped improve the Indonesian movie industry.

However the Japanese Occupation of Indonesia (1942–45) changed the landscape of its movie industry. All film companies, including Java Industrial Film Company, ceased production. Their revival began only after the end of World War II. In fact, The only managed to return to the movie industry after the transfer of power from the Dutch to the Indonesians. In 1950 he and Fred Young, his friend and well known movie director, co-founded a new company called Bintang Surabaja, which produced a number of movies, many of which were based on stories in The Arabian Nights. In 1962 the studio was closed down in the midst of a movie industry crisis. The, who contributed significantly to the founding of the Indonesian film industry, resorted to giving tuition in the English language for a living and, in 1967, changed his name to Tahyer Ederis (often spelled as Idris). In 1976 his contributions to Indonesian movies were eventually recognized by the Jakarta Municipal Government, which gave him an honorary award. He died in Jakarta on 26 February 1977.

Thee Kian Wie

(戴建伟, Dai Jianwei, 1935–)

Economist, economic historian, Indonesia

The significance of Thee Kian Wie as an economist is indicated by the 121 titles to his name. Among them are 8 books, 10 edited books, 17 occasional, working and discussion papers, 47 chapters in books and journal articles published in English, 39 articles in English in scientific journals, not counting his papers published in Indonesian. He has received the Yayasan Buku Utama Award in 1994 for the book Industrialisasi Indonesia — Beberapa Kajian (second printing in 1997). His edited book Recollections — The Indonesian Economy, 1950s–1990s (2003) was translated into Indonesian in 2005. He is undoubtedly one of the most prolific authors in his field and perhaps one of the most prolific Indonesian authors published in English.

Another indicator of the significance of his work and career is the number of important scientific awards that Thee Kian Wie has received starting in 1994. These awards, from national as well as international institutions, shows that he is an internationally recognized economist. He has received a total of 9 awards (5 national and 4 international), among them: the Award given by the Yayasan Buku Utama, mentioned earlier; he is a recipient of the Allen Sewell Fellowship Award from Griffith University, Brisbane, Australia (2003); the Degree of Doctor of Letters Honoris Causa, from The Australian National University, Canberra (2004); the Habibie Award (2006); one of five recipients of the KOMPAS Daily Award to Dedicated Intellectuals (2008); one of two recipients of the Sarwono Prawirohardja VII Award (2008). In 2008, he was also appointed Honorary Member of the KITLV (Royal Institute of Southeast Asian and Caribbean Studies), Leiden, The Netherlands.

Thee Kian Wie (Thee as he is usually called by his colleagues or Kian Wie by his family and close friends) was born in Jakarta on 20 April 1935. His parents were highly educated in their time. His father, Thee Tjoen Giap, born 1902, was the youngest son of a shopkeeper in Buitenzorg. He studied at the Hollandsch Chineese Kweekschool, known as HCK, and in the last years of Dutch colonial rule, was principal of a Dutch Chinese primary school (HCS) in Batavia. After independence he became principal of a public junior high school and then a public senior high school, retiring in 1957 at age 55. He moved on to a private institution and became principal of a junior high school for another ten years.

His mother, Sylvia Oey Hwee Nio, born 1901, was the oldest daughter of Oey Peng Lin, a businessman and landowner in Kapuk, West Batavia, who founded the Chinese language school system Tiong Hoa Lie Hak Hauw. Sylvia first went to that school and later taught there. But then she switched to Dutch education and graduated from the Dutch Three-Year Hogere Burger School (HBS), the prestigious high school in colonial times. Subsequently in the mid 1920s she went to the Netherlands and studied but not completed a teacher training course. Still, at that time it was unusual for an ethnic Chinese young woman to go and study abroad.

Thee is the oldest child of three children. His sister Lilian Himawan has a law degree from the University of Indonesia (UI) and is currently working in a law firm, and his brother, Sutisna Himawan studied medicine at UI and is now Professor in anatomic pathology at that university. It is worth noting, that in his immediate family there is no one in business. The family belongs to the "class" of highly educated peranakan Chinese. Besides Indonesian, Thee is fluent in English and Dutch and has a fair command of German.

Thee is married to Cecilia Martina Tandean (born Tan Tjoe Nio in Samarinda), who works as an office manager to the Jakarta correspondent of the newspaper The Australian and the Southeast Asian correspondent of The Los Angeles Times. They have one child, a son, Marcel, who has graduated from the London School of Public Relations, Jakarta, and is a musician, the leader of his own band.

Another interesting note is that Thee Kian Wie has not changed his name into an Indonesian-sounding name. In fact, almost all the ethnic Chinese researchers at LIPI, who became well-known in their respective field, have not changed their name. Besides Thee, the names that can be mentioned are Lie Tek Tjeng, Mely G. Tan, and Thung Ju Lan.

With the educational background of his parents, Thee went to the Europese Lagere School (the Dutch Primary School non-Dutch families could sent their children to after fulfilling certain qualifications) in 1941, but this schooling was interrupted in 1942 with the Japanese occupation. During that period, he was taught by his father at home. After the Japanese left, Thee finished his primary school education at the Christian Primary School (1946). From 1947–49 he was at the Hogere Burger School (HBS), that after the transfer of sovereignty in December 1949 was changed to Special Senior High School, graduating in 1952.

After he received his Drs degree at the Faculty of Economics of the University of Indonesia in 1959, Thee became an administrative officer at the Indonesian Council for Sciences (MIPI) until 1962. That year MIPI established the National Institute of Economic and Social Research (Leknas) which Thee joined as a junior researcher. In 1963 he received a study assignment from MIPI (with funding from the Ford Foundation), to study for a Ph.D. in economics at the University of Wisconsin in Madison, Wisconsin, USA. In 1969 he finished his studies and returned to continue to work at LIPI (changed from MIPI in 1967). In 1976 he was promoted to Senior Research Associate (Ahli Peneliti Utama or APU). He remained in this position until his official retirement in 2000. From 1974 to 1978, Thee was Assistant Director of the Leknas-LIPI. Subsequently, from 1986 to 1990 he was Head of the Centre for Economic and Development Studies (PEP-LIPI).

Starting in 1982 until 2007, Thee was invited and held positions such as Visiting Fellow, Fellow-in-Residence, Visiting Researcher, Senior Visiting Research Fellow, Sir Allen Sewell Fellow, in 11 academic and/or research institutions, in Australia, The Netherlands, Japan, and Singapore.

There are 11 other positions he is still holding until the present, both in Indonesia as well as abroad. Most of these positions are on the editorial board or as corresponding editor of scientific journals, on the advisory board of research institutions, and membership in scientific institutions.

In the area of research Thee became involved in a multiyear project from 1974–78. He was Project Officer of the National Study on Indonesia's Long-term Growth Perspectives, a study initiated and supervised by the late Prof. Sumitro Djojohadikusumo, then Minister of State for Research.

From June 1986 to July 1990, he was Head of the Centre for Economic and Development Studies (PEP-LIPI). As head he has done collaborative research, and has assisted younger colleagues in research and in writing up the results. The appreciation of the leadership of P2E-LIPI (Pusat Penelitian Ekonomi-LIPI, changed from PEP-LIPI in 2001) and his colleagues is shown in the fact that after his retirement in 2000, he was asked to stay on as a researcher and continue to occupy the office space he has been using all these years.

Interview with Thee Kian Wie.

Thio Thiam Tjong

(张添聪, Zhang Tiancong, 1896–1969)
Businessman, community leader, Indonesia

Owner of a prominent import-export firm in Semarang, Thio was also a political leader of the community. He supported China in its struggle against Japan. A member of the Chung Hua Hui in pre-World War II times, he became personal adviser to Lieutenant Governor-General van Mook during the Indonesian revolution and in 1948 established Persatuan Tionghoa (later Partai Demokrasi Tionghoa Indonesia) to represent the political interests of Chinese Indonesians and to encourage greater understanding of Indonesian citizenship. Later he served as Vice-Chairman of Baperki.

Thio Thiam Tjong was born on 4 April 1896 (one source says 1897) into a wealthy peranakan family of Semarang, whose father, Thio Sing Liong, was owner of the import-export firm Seng Liong (Thio Sing Liong Handel Mij.) there. He attended the European secondary school (HBS) in Leiden and studied for three years at the engineering college in Delft, leaving before graduating in 1922 to join his father's firm. He took over the firm in 1933 after his father retired, expanding its interests. A board member of a number of other businesses, he was Chairman of the Siang Hwee (Chinese Chamber of Commerce) in Semarang from 1930–1934 and on the board of a Chinese-English school, later chairman of the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan Chinese school association there, also of the Pasar Malam, a fair organized to collect funds for charity. He was a leader and major contributor to relief funds for China during the Sino-Japanese War and he visited China a number of times, both before and after World War II, being received by Chiang Kai-shek in 1947.

After his return from the Netherlands to Java, he joined other Dutch-educated peranakans, including H. H. Kan, in the Chung Hwa Congress in 1927, helping to form the Chung Hua Hui, which aspired to represent the interests of the minority in the Dutch-organized councils, especially the Volksraad (People's Council), and above all to obtain recognition of the Chinese as having the legal status of Europeans. A member of the Provincial Council for Central Java, he was on the Central Board of the Chung Hua Hui, becoming president of its Semarang Branch in the 1930s.

When the Japanese invaded Java, Thio was head of a militia hastily formed to defend Java. Given his anti-Japanese activities, he was in danger and he fled to Ambarawa when the Japanese took Semarang. In the end, he was interned with several hundred other peranakan and totok leaders who were thought to be anti-Japanese in the Cimahi prison camp for the duration of the Japanese Occupation.

In prison camp, Thio became the informal leader of the Chinese prisoners and took time to learn Mandarin. After the Dutch returned to Java, in March 1946, Lieutenant-Governor-General H. van Mook chose him as an informal adviser for Chinese affairs.

The Chinese were important to the Dutch for two reasons. First, their cooperation was necessary to restore the economy of the Indies, devastated by war and the ongoing revolution. Second, van Mook's vision of a federal Indonesia, independent but closely tied to the Netherlands, required special attention to the interests of the minorities and to the Outer Islands in order to balance the influence of the Indonesian Republic. Thio is said to have accepted the position reluctantly, hoping to be able to speak up for the Chinese minority wherever he could. Whatever his association with the Dutch authorities, Thio avoided negative comments about the Indonesian Republic, concentrating on the future instead.

The Sin Ming Hui (New Light Association), a peranakan social organization, convened a meeting of prominent Chinese from various groups in May 1948 to found the Persatuan Tionghoa (Chinese Association) to encourage especially the local-born ethnic Chinese to become politically involved. By this time, it was clear that the Indies would enjoy some kind of independence, although the exact form it would take was still unclear. Above all the local-born and locally-oriented Chinese must recognize that their future was as citizens in an Indonesian state. The Persatuan Tionghoa intended to represent their interests. Thio, widely respected for his role as community leader, was its chairman. Curiously, as Thio later pointed out, Persatuan Tionghoa was a translation of "Chung Hua Hui." Perhaps the association consciously wanted to continue the attitude of the CHH that the Chinese of the Indies should be oriented first to Indonesia as their homeland, not simply to hope for help from China to defend their interests. Persatuan Tionghoa attracted some attention from peranakans but had little echo among the more China-oriented populations of, for example, West Kalimantan, where enthusiasm for China had reached a peak and the idea of Indonesia that PT propagated had little meaning. It urged that all citizens be equal, irrespective of national origin or religion, and the minorities should be able to promote their own cultures. Its leadership included many who had previously opposed the CHH. Leaders like Thio increasingly realized that an independent Indonesia would seek to reduce the influence of the Chinese, along with that of foreigners, in economic life, and might threaten legitimate Chinese interests. Politically, the party was open to cooperation with all political groups.

After Indonesian sovereignty was recognized, in early 1950, the organization changed its name to Partai Demokrat Tionghoa Indonesia, while Thio continued as chairman. Not surprisingly, in view of the two-year period alloted persons of Chinese descent born in the Indies for choosing or rejecting Indonesian citizenship, it emphasized the importance of an Indonesian orientation for the Chinese — all members had to be citizens — and the need to see Indonesia as homeland. Although the organization had some forty branches and several thousand members (according to Thio), Thio himself felt he lacked the political talent to lead a successful organization and the party threatened to become just a name. In addition, he himself was disadvantaged by his past connection with Van Mook. The first all-Indonesian elections were approaching. Already some Indonesian politicians were proposing steps to limit the economic influence and freedom of the ethnic Chinese, and there was talk of a new regulation of the citizenship of the Chinese minority, which might further disadvantage them. A different organization, one that could defend the rights and livelihoods of the Chinese in the political constellation of the Indonesian Republic, was necessary.

In March 1954, the founding meeting of Baperki (Badan Permusyawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia, Consultative Body for Indonesian Citizenship) convened at the the Sin Ming Hui Building in Jakarta. The PDTI and some other peranakan interest groups dissolved themselves into the new association; while Siauw Giok Tjhan assumed the chairmanship. This new organization was open to all Indonesian citizens and did not call itself "Chinese", nor did it represent itself as a political party. Nevertheless, it participated in the national elections of 1955, winning most of the votes of the Chinese voters. Thio Thiam Tjong remained as a vice-chairman. In the 1960s, he privately expressed the opinion that in the long run most of Indonesia's Chinese would retain only a "sentimental" attachment to China, as did migrants to the USA to their ancestral lands.

A Baperki official later described him as the "sesepuh Baperki," the "elder." By the 1960s, at the latest, Thio had withdrawn from an active role in the organization. In spite of that, he was arrested and imprisoned in the aftermath of the alleged coup of October 1965, along with others associated with Baperki. He left Indonesia for the Netherlands in 1967, where he died on 22 September 1969.

Interview, Thio Thiam Tjong, 9 January 1963.

Thio Tiauw Siat

(张肇燮, Zhang Zhaoxie alias 张弼士, Zhang Bishi, 1841–1916)

Merchant, planter, industrialist, revenue farmer, consul of Chinese Government, Malaysia

Thio Tiauw Siat, as most Malaysian and Indonesian Chinese called Zhang Zhaoxie, was also known as Cheong Fatt Tze or Zhang Zhenxun (张振勋). But in Chinese history books, he was better known as Zhang Bishi (also spelled as Chang Pi Shih). Born in 1841 into a poor family in Dapu district, Guangdong, he immigrated in 1858, to Batavia (now Jakarta) of the Dutch East Indies to earn a living. Initially, he worked in a rice shop owned by an overseas Chinese and spent his spare time observing the local economic circumstance and learning the local languages. Thio's studious bent and diligence were highly commended by a neighbouring Hakka shop owner, Wen, who married his daughter to Thio and financially supported him to open a new rice shop.

When Wen passed away Thio inherited his father-in-law's assets after and expanded his existing business and opened a wine shop. Through his good rapport with the Dutch colonial officials, he also managed to win some tax farming contracts. Around 1866, with the endorsement and financial support from the Dutch Colonial Government, Thio undertook the project of clearing and developing the wastelands adjacent to Batavia. His work drove the development and prosperity of the surrounding areas. He also diversified into the plantation industry.

Around 1875, Thio was again authorized by the Dutch Colonial Government to develop Aceh and Deli (now Medan) in Sumatra. In Deli he set up a new company to open up coconut, rubber, and tea plantations. This not only enabled him to expand his existing businesses into these areas, but also accelerated his involvement in a wide range of new business activities, including crossing over the Malacca Strait and establishing a new business base in Penang. Thio also jointly established the Deli Bank with his ex-staff members, Zhang Yunan (Chang Yu Nan 张煜南) and Zhang Hongnan (Chang Hung Nan 张鸿南) to monitor the monetary condition, as well as facilitate the cash remittance of overseas Chinese to their homeland.

In order to solve the transport problems arising from his ever expanding business, Thio also solely established the renowned Ban Yoo Hin (万裕兴) Company in Penang to handle the shipbuilding and navigation between Aceh and Penang. He also extended and intensified his business network by operating trading markets and a tin mining business in Bentong of British Pahang, and in Selangor, and Klang.

Apart from the above investments in Southeast Asia, he also made huge investments in China, for example, the famous Zhang Yu Pioneer Wine Company (张裕酿酒公司) at Yantai (烟台) in Shandong province, and investments in textile & fabric factories, a gold-mining company, and brickfields. He was also involved in setting up the first Chinese-owned bank, i.e the Imperial Bank of China (later known as Commercial Bank of China 中国通商银行). He was the largest private shareholder in the Imperial Bank of China and sat on the board of directors of several financial institutions as well.

In May 1893, Thio Tiauw Siat was appointed as the first Chinese vice-consul of China in Penang. The next year, he was promoted to acting general consul in Singapore and held the post until early 1898. In return for his support and adherence to the economic policy of the late Qing Dynasty, he was granted audiences by the Empress Dowager Cixi and Emperor Guangxu as well as conferred the titles of "First Rank Dingdai" (头品顶戴) and "Taipusi Zhengqing" (太仆寺正卿). It was unprecedented for the Qing Government to give such eminent honours to an emigrant. Thio was also appointed as the commissioner investigating commerce in foreign ports and concurrently as a superintendant of agriculture, industry, railroads and mining for Fujian and Guangdong (考察商务大臣兼督办闽广路矿大臣) tasked with visiting major ports and cities in Southeast Asia, to encourage overseas Chinese to invest in their China homeland. From 1905 to 1906, Thio also initiated the founding of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce (中华商务总会) in both Penang and Singapore. His tremendous achievements and contributions to commercial activities laid the groundwork for his being elected president of the Associated China Chambers of Commerce later.

Apart from his notable accomplishment in politics and business, Thio also significantly contributed to the educational and cultural development in Southeast Asia from 1904. For instance, he established Penang Chung Hwa School (槟榔屿中华学堂), that year and also Singapore Yin Sin School (新加坡应新学堂) and others later. The Penang Chung Hwa School was the pioneer for modern Chinese education in Malaya and also the first school to adopt Mandarin as a medium of instruction, establishing the foundation for the development of Chinese education in Malaysia. For religious and cultural causes, Thio had made generous donation to Kek Lok Si (极乐寺) Temple. This had enabled him, together with Zhang Yunan, Zhang Hongnan, Xie Rongguang (谢荣光), Tye Choon Yoon (戴春荣 Dai Chunrong), and Chung Keng Kwee (郑景贵 Zheng Jinggui) to be elected as the six councillors for the asset management council of the temple. Thio also played a significant role in the revival movement of Confucianism in Malaya during the early twentieth century.

After the founding of the Republic of China, Thio became the adviser for President Yun Sikai (袁世凯), adviser for the Ministry of Commerce & Industry, etc. He was also appointed as honorary president for the Association of Overseas Chinese. He died of an illness on 12 September 1916 in Batavia and his remains were brought back to China for burial.

Five factors drove Thio Tiauw Siat's success in rising from an obscure emigrant to a wealthy businessman: first, personal character traits such as diligence, assiduousness, and perseverance; second, extraordinary fortune (such as his father-in-law's financial supports); third, courage to embark on new ventures; forth, tact, and skill in dealing with people; fifth, willingness to promote and nurture talented people to assist him in business affairs.

Thung Sin Nio, Betsy

(汤新娘, Tang Xinniang, 1902–96)
Community leader, feminist, freelance journalist, physician, social worker, Indonesia

Thung Sin Nio was born in 1902 in Batavia (present-day Jakarta) into a Peranakan landowning family. Her father, Thung Bouw Kiat (1863–1916), was a prominent businessman and a member of the Gemeenteraad (City Council) of Batavia. He owned a house in the Salemba district of the capital. His wife, Tan Toan Nio (1863–1920), and children lived mainly in town, while he himself spent a considerable amount of time overseeing his estates. Having received a Dutch education, Thung could attend the Prins Hendrikschool, a secondary school providing a commercial course where she was a classmate of Myra Sidharta's father, Auwyong Boen Sen (欧阳文星). After graduating in 1920 she was not permitted to do office work and had to stay at the home of an aunt in Cianjur (West Java). In 1922 she was admitted to the Hollandsch Chineesche Kweekschool (Dutch-Chinese Teachers' College) in Jatinegara district, where she received her degree in mid-1924. She then taught for one year at a private Hollandsch Chineesche School (Dutch Elementary School for the Chinese) in Bogor (West Java).

In 1925 Thung succeeded in going to Holland where she studied economics at the Handels Hoge School in Rotterdam (1925–32). It was during this period that she read the Herinneringen (Memories) of Aletta Jacobs (1854–1929), the first Dutch woman to attain a university degree, Holland's first woman physician and also an active feminist. Thung was fascinated, and in 1926 wrote a letter to A. Jacobs (the reply of the latter is kept in the International Information Centre and Archives for the Women's Movement IIAV — archives). She subsequently met her, was introduced to various feminist circles, and became a member of the Vereeniging voor Vrouwenbelangen en Gelijk Staatsburgerschap (Union for Women's Interests and Equal Citizenship). She became active in the issues which had to do with employment and matrimonial laws and was also a member of the Chung Hwa Hui (中华会) from 1926 to 1933, and was on the board of directors twice (March–October 1926 and October 1926–October 1927), first as second commissaris, and then as first commissaris. She managed to give a lecture for the Chung Hwa Hui in 1926 on: "Het een en ander over de Chinese meisjes in Indonesie" (Some notes on Chinese girls' education in Indonesia), and in 1928 on: "Het Montessori Onderwijs" (The Montessori education — Maria Montessori, [1870–1952] who was the first Italian woman physician and a famous educational reformer). Thung continued with her economics studies until 1932, but she interrupted this from February 1928 to March 1932 when returned to Indonesia to attend family celebrations. During her thirteen month stay in Batavia she did social work at the Yang Seng Ie (养生院) hospital (founded by Dr Kwa Tjoan Siu 柯全寿), and established a boarding school (meisjesinternaat) for rich Chinese girls from outside Batavia, in order to facilitate their schooling. It was run entirely by women, and she acted as its director until her return to Holland where she completed her studies in economics she then decided to study medicine in Amsterdam (1932–38). In 1933 Thung Sin Nio headed the Studieclub van Chineesche Studenten in Amsterdam (founded in 1931), which had split with other student associations in Holland. She also became interested in the vain attempts of Cataharina van Tussenbroek (another woman physician, 1852–1925) to found a women's party, although she was convinced that such a party could not exist as long as women had not obtained their economic independence. Thung kept an eye on women's movements in Indonesia and became a contributor to the Chinese women's monthly Fu Nu Tsa Chih (妇女杂志) founded in Malang (East Java) in 1932 by Liem Sam Tjiang 林三昌 (née Ong Bok An, Manado 1907 – Jakarta 2007), which had a circulation of 7,500 copies.

After she received her degree, Thung returned to Batavia, and on 13 September 1938, opened her practice in the family house in Salemba. According to the advertisement published in the press (weekly Sin Po 新报, 28 January 1939) she specialized in women and children, as well as in the regular health control of infants. She also opened a weekly course for mothers, which was modelled after those given in Amsterdam by Dutch doctors. At the same time she also fought for the right of Indonesian and Chinese women to vote. Thung also contributed numerous articles in Dutch and in Malay, especially to local women's magazines, such as Fu Nu Tsa Chih, Maandblad Istri (founded in 1935 by Mrs Tjoa Hin Hoei, née Kwee Yat Nio 郭悦娘, 1907–1993), and Fu Len 妇人 (founded 1938 by Mrs Ong Pik Hwa 王碧华, 1906–1972), as well as to the daily, Sin Po. During the Japanese Occupation, she continued her private practice and worked as a volunteer at a local hospital.

From about 1945 to 1951, in addition to her private practice, she also was employed as a school doctor by the Ministry of Education, and monitored children's health in the city of Jakarta. All these activities did not keep her from resuming her political struggle. In 1948 or 1949 she became the first woman member of the Jakarta Council to represent the Persatuan Tionghoa (PT) or Chinese Union (founded in May 1948 by Thio Thiam Tjong 张添聪, the forerunner of the Partai Demokrat Tionghoa Indonesia (PDTI) or Indonesian Chinese Democratic Party founded in 1950, and Badan Permusyawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia (Baperki) or Consultative Body for Indonesian Citizenship). According to Siauw Tiong Djin (萧忠仁) (Siauw Giok Tjhan, Jakarta, Hasta Mitra 1999, pp. 200–01) Thung attended the meeting for the foundation of the Baperki in 1954. Perhaps her strong personality, as well as her own political expectations, did not suit the goals of the association executives. The following year she decided to carry out her political activities on her own and presented herself as an independent candidate for the 1955 national elections.

Between 1949 and 1952, Thung was invited by the Indonesian Government to accompany several official trade delegations to Moscow and Helsinki as an English-speaking interpreter. The first of her seven trips to China (in September 1951) was arranged by an Indonesian Chinese organization. The delegates were sent on a fact finding mission, "to find out about the new China". Amongst them were several [Dutch-trained] economists and doctors.

In 1968, in relation with the implementation of an assimilationist policy, she decided to leave Indonesia for good and settled in Eindhoven, Holland, where she worked for several years as part-time physician in a health public centre, and in a children's home, and where she died in 1996 at the age of ninety-four.

Thung received her knighthood (Ridder in de orde van Oranje Nassau) on the 29 April 1983, as a reward for "her efforts to emancipate women".

She has a biography in the genealogy of the Thung (Tang) family published in Fujian province in 2000 (漳州青阳云岭中山汤氏族, p. 738) where it is said that she contributed money for the Soong Ching Ling 宋庆龄 Foundation, as well as for the repair of the primary school of her ancestral village,Yunshan (云山), in Hua'an (华安) district.

Ting Pek Khiing

(陈伯勤, Chen Boqin, 1941–)

Businessman, dubbed "King of Construction", Malaysia

Ting Pek Khiing's hallmark is his speed in construction, using wood-based techniques for fast and economical civil engineering. Ting controls Ekran Bhd. and undertakes many large-scale development projects, such as the industrial park in Bintulu Sarawak; factories, petrochemical facilities and infrastructure in Iran; casinos and shops on Samal Island, the Philippines; and leisure ventures on China's Hainan island.

Born in 1941 in Bintangor, Sarawak, Ting comes from a simple background of twelve siblings, his father was a farmer and trader in oranges. After completing his Cambridge School diploma, Ting assisted his father selling oranges and then worked as a salesman supplying sundries and soft drinks to households and retail outlets. In 1967, he ventured into property development and, in 1977, established Woodhouse Sdn. Bhd., a fully integrated timber factory, and succeeded in the use of prefabricated wood-based technology for fast and economic construction. His speed in construction works soon gained him fame, especially by building low-cost wood-houses in the fastest time. He completed the Bintulu Port within a year in December 1982 when the normal construction period at that time was about seven years. When the economic recession of 1985–86 affected Ting's business, he then went to Australia with his wife. He later returned and injected Woodhouse into a newly established investment holding company, Ekran Berhad in 1992. The same year Ekran won an intense tussle with two well established public listed companies to take over Federal Cables, Wires & Metal Manufacturing Berhad, a profitable publicly listed telephone and electric cable manufacturer in Malaysia.

Ting's exploits in construction caught the attention of the former prime minister, Dr Mahathir Mohamad, who needed someone to build a convention resort within a short time to kick off his inaugural international air show on Langkawi. Ting took up the challenge and made his most prominent and impressive achievements — the completion of the 1,500-room Delima Resort in a record fifty-three days. A week later, he completed the 300-room Sheraton Langkawi Resort Hotel on Pulau Langkawi for the Langkawi International Maritime and Aerospace Exhibition in 1991 and shot to fame in the early 1990s. His achievements pleased Dr Mahathir and consequently in 1993 Ekran was awarded the US$5.56 billion, 2,400-megawatts Bakun hydroelectric dam and transmission project in Sarawak — the largest dam ever to be built in Southeast Asia and in Asia, outside of China. Several scholars argued that it is his connection to high powered politicians that won him the contract without there being open tenders and also gave him access to financial deals. Yet some see him as a local son, born and bred in Sarawak, with a reputation so well known that it enabled him to clinch the project and emerge as a legendary figure in Sarawak. However, luck did not stay with him all the time and not long after he secured the Bakun project, the 1997/98 Asian Financial Crisis struck. At the height of the crisis, the project was suspended, leaving Ting's empire choking in debt. Ekran was still facing many problems despite the Bakun deal being off. Ting's other mega project, the RM1.3-billion Plaza Rakyat commercial complex, a prestigious integrated city centre development project in Kuala Lumpur, was put on hold after the financial crisis. Ting, who is also chairman of Wembley Industries Bhd., fully owns Plaza Rakyat. In 2000, the Bakun project was fully revived, but the size of the project has since been scaled down. The Plaza Rakyat started moving again in late 2007. However, Ekran Berhad was delisted in January 2010. According to analysts, Ting's personal debts totalled more than US$1 billion in the aftermath of the crisis. It has been plain sailing for Ting after the financial crisis and he has also found solace in agriculture work.

Ting is chairman of Ekran Berhad in Malaysia, the largest property and land development company in Malaysia. He has more than twenty-five years of experience in construction and specializes in the technology of using wood-based prefabricated standardized components. Under his leadership, Ekran Berhad has successfully completed numerous housing and infrastructure projects for the Sarawak state government and resort hotels in Sarawak. Ting is also chairman of Pacific Chemicals Berhad, Wembley Industries Holdings Berhad, Granite Industries Berhad, PWE Industries Berhad, and Bakun Hydro-Electric Corporation Berhad. In the post Asian Financial Crisis period, Ting rose again in the corporate world, but he tried to keep a relatively low profile by establishing Global Upline (GU), a private limited company, to take advantage of the federal government's countercyclical spending, especially on infrastructure projects to boost the waning economy. The establishment of GU in 1999 however again saw his legendary figure reappearing quite prominently in Malaysia, especially in Sarawak, as evidenced by the impressive infrastructure projects he completed in less than a decade, most of them being airports, dams, roads, and flyovers. His completed and current projects in Sarawak include the Bakun Hydroelectric Auxiliary Cofferdam project; New Bintulu Airport; the Miri Airport upgrading project; the redevelopment of Kuching International Airport; the upgrading of Labuan Airport; the upgrading of Kenyalang Interchange & Jalan Lapangan Terbang, and the proposed New KIA/Jalan Stutong Link Road, Kuching; the upgrading of Pujut and Puchong interchange, Miri; Miri Airport — ASEAN Bridge Trunk Road, Miri-Brunei; Four Points Hotel by Sheraton and Office Tower; Chung Hua Primary School No. 2; and Mukah Airport & Lahad Datu Airport. In Sabah, Ting is also responsible for the redevelopment of Kota Kinabalu International Airport, Package 2.

Additionally, Ting's GU prides itself in having garnered with numerous interesting international and domestic awards to endorse its claim of being one of the leading construction companies in Malaysia. Among its international and domestic awards are the 17th, 18th, and 19th International Construction Award Certificates (New Millenium Award) (2005–07) in recognition of its trajectory and business excellence from the Trade Leader's Club and Editorial OFICE; Frankfurt "Arch of Europe" Certificate, 2007, for "Quality and Technology" from Business Initiatives Directions; Century International Platinum Quality Era Award 2008; Project Safety Award 2002, for the Bakun Hydroelectric Project, from Sarawak Hidro Sdn. Bhd.; Project Safety Milestone Award 2002, for the New Bintulu Airport, from KLIA Consult; Project Safety Award 2006, for the Redevelopment of Kuching International Airport Project, from KLIA Consult.

In recognition of his contributions to the country, Ting received many honours and awards, including the titles of "Dato Paduka Seri Setia Sultan Abdul Halim Muadzam" from the sultan of Kedah; "Dato Paduka Mahkota Selangor" from the sultan of Selangor; "Panglima Setia Mahkota" from the King of Malaysia, and "Panglima Gemilang Bintang Kenyalang" from the governor of Sarawak.

Tio Ie Soei

(赵雨水, Zhao Yushui, 1890–1974)

Journalist, writer, community leader, Indonesia

Tio Ie Soei was a leading peranakan journalist, translator, writer of fiction and essays and community leader who was active before and after World War II. His pseudonym was Tjoa Pie(e)t Bak 纸笔墨. Known also by his initial T.I.S. Journalist, translator, writer of fiction and essays, and community leader.

Born in Pasar Baru, Batavia, present Jakarta, on 22 June 1890 and died in Tanah Abang, Jakarta on 29 August 1974. His mother was Peranakan but his father, a Hakka, was born in South Fujian province, China. He received his education in a Dutch private school; apart from Dutch he also studied German, French, English and Chinese. In 1905, after having worked a short time for the daily Sinar Betawi (The Gleam of Betawi), he joined the Perniagaan (Trade), a daily founded in 1903 (which at that time expressed the views of the rich Chinese of Batavia) and of which later he became editor, retaining his position until 1920 when he was obliged to leave Batavia to settle in the mountainous area of Pengalengan near Bandung.

He spent five years there growing vegetables to support his family; in the meantime he had married a daughter of Tjoe Siauw Hoei (1871–1948), a major shareholder of the Hoa Siang In Kiok 华商印局, the firm that printed the Perniagaan. During this period, he contributed articles to various papers such as the dailies Bintang Soerabaja (The Star of Surabaya, founded in 1861), the Warna Warta (Various News) founded in 1907 in Semarang, Central Java), the Kong Po (founded in 1921 in Batavia) and the Perniagaan. He also worked for the weekly Lay Po 来报 in Bandung which in 1925 became a daily named Sin Bin 新民 under the editorship of Kwee Tek Hoay 郭德怀. In 1924 Tio Ie Soei founded in Bandung the rather short-lived literary monthly Tjerita Pilian (Selected Stories) printed on the Sin Bin press, which gave pride of place to translations of European detective novels.

After a short stay first in Cirebon (West Java) and then in Banjarmasin (Kalimantan) he settled in Surabaya in 1927 and became editor of the daily Pewarta Soerabaja (News of Surabaya) until 1942. During the Japanese occupation he went into hiding in a small village close to Kediri (East Java). In 1948 he resumed his work for the Pewarta Soerabaja. In 1952–54 he served as the first secretary of the Association of Indonesian Citizens of Chinese Origin (Persatuan Warga Negara Indonesia Turunan Tionghoa) formed in Surabaya in 1952. From 1953 to 1956 he worked for the weekly Liberal also in Surabaya. Mention should be made of the fact that in 1953 he was elected as president of the Persatuan Wartawan Surabaya (Journalist's Association of Surabaya). Besides his journalistic activities, he was involved in social life and became a member of various associations including the Ay Kok Hwee 爱国会 (Association for the Love of the Country), Khong Kauw Tjong Hwee 孔教总会 (General Association of Confucianism Societies established in Bandung in 1923), Tiong Hwa Im Gak Hwee 中华音乐会 (Association for Chinese Music), Tiong Hwa Oen Tong Hwee 中华运动会 (Chinese Sport Association).

While still very young he was influenced by the most famous journalists of that time who were also known for their numerous translations of Western literature as well as for their literary production. Among them should be mentioned the names of Lie Kim Hok 李锦福 (1853–1912), W. Wieggers, F.D.J. Pangemanan (1870–c.1910), Gouw Peng Liang 吴炳亮 (1868–1928), and Lauw Giok Lan 刘玉兰 (1882–1953) — the three latter being for a time editor in chief or editor the Perniagaan.

The first fictional work by Tio Ie Soei, Tjerita Sie Po Giok, which appeared in 1911, was a children's novel, a genre, pedagogy, which at that time was still a novelty for Sino-Indonesian parents. Tio was also interested in history and in 1924 published an account of the famous Eurasian hero Pieter Erberfelt who was accused of conspiracy against the Dutch in 1721, and who was quartered the following year and his acolytes were executed (the novel was reprinted at least twice — the first time in serial form in the Bintang Timur of 1964 and the second in 1982 in an anthology of "pre-Indonesia literature", and it was used as groundwork when the Indonesian Television decided to put P.E.'s story on the stage in 1981); he also wrote a story set in Batavia in 1629 during the time of of Governor General Jan Peterszoon Coen, entitled Sara Specx (1926).

Tio was also one of the first Sino-Indonesian writers to develop an interest in biographies. After having translated a biographical essay about Li Hongzhang 李鸿章, famous statesman of the Qing Dynasty (1920) he wrote two biographical works, the first presenting the famous Sino-Indonesian boxer Tan Siet Tiat (1928), and the second the life of Lie Kim Hok (1959) whom he had known personally and this remains until now the only attempt in that field. Tio Ie Soei was also a prolific translator. He anonymously published a complete translation of "The Thousand and One Night" (Hikajat 1001 Malem, 1924) He developed an interest in Western detective novels and translated a few works of Conan Doyle. He also contributed some plays including one entitled Yan Tio (1923) written at the request of a Chinese organisation of Bandung in which he criticizes the over-westernized Chinese.

In brief Tio Ie Soei was an autodidact who aside from his journalistic and literary activities had along with Nio Joe Lan 梁友兰 (1904–73) the great merit of having initiated the first studies of the Sino-Malay literary life, by writing the biography of one of the pioneers of this literature, Lie Kim Hok, without which his name would have fallen into oblivion.

Tiong Hiew King

(张晓卿, Zhang Xiaoqing, 1935–)
Timber and media tycoon, Malaysia

Tiong Hiew King is the founder and executive chairman of the Rimbunan Hijau Group, a timber conglomerate that comprises diverse industries such as media, agriculture, property, tourism, and information technology.

The self-made billionaire was born in Sibu, Sarawak. He received his primary and secondary education in his birthplace, beginning with Chung Cheng Primary School and later Methodist High School and Sacred Heart High School. He began his career as a timber grader for a company, WTK, owned by his uncle, Wong Tuong Kwong. The breakthrough came in 1975 when he obtained a timber logging licence, based on which he started his company, Rimbunan Hijau (RH). In less than two decades, RH became one of the largest timber companies in Malaysia involved in both logging and downstream activities such as plywood, veneer, and particle board manufacturing. RH and its companies, including the two public listed companies, Subur Tiasa and Jaya Tiasa, are predominantly owned and controlled by Tiong and his family.

In 1989 Tiong ventured abroad to Papua New Guinea to operate one of the largest timber companies in the country. In 1993, RH started PNG's English language newspaper, The National, which is managed by his nephew. From PNG, RH extended its timber and forestry operations to several countries such as Vanuatu, Cameroon, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Solomon Islands, Brazil, and Russia. It also operates in New Zealand, where apart from timber, it is involved in salmon rearing.

In Australia, its business interests included cattle rearing, agriculture, and property development. In various parts of China, it is involved in plywood manufacturing and property development. The RH empire now spans many countries in Asia, Africa, the Asia Pacific, Russia, and North America.

Tiong's worldwide involvement in logging has attracted criticisms from environmental and human rights groups. A report released by the Swiss Bruno Manser Fund states that "Right up to the present, the system of political patronage is still fueling the destruction of the rainforest in Sarawak, and local indigenous groups like the Penan are still fighting for nothing more than their legitimate rights to their land. The outcome of these past decades of timber industry development is huge timber tycoons." Greenpeace also reported protests from villagers in PNG against RH against their customary land from being leased and their forest destroyed. As a result, the environment protection groups protested against the alleged knighthood given to Tiong in 2009, claiming that "his fortune has been built on the systematic destruction of tropical rainforests". Apparently, as a result of clarification sought by the Bruno Manser Fund, the United Kingdom Cabinet office has stated that the award is in a honorary capacity that does not carry the title "Sir", but the initials that carry the award can be placed after his name.

Tiong comes from a family that is closely aligned with the Sarawak United People's Party (SUPP), a constituent party of the ruling Barisan National. Tiong served as a senator in the Malaysian parliament from 1985–91 during the premiership of Mahathir Mohamad. His younger brother, Tiong Thai King, is the chairperson of the Sibu Municipal Council and a Member of Parliament for the Lanang constituency since 1995. A look at the list of RH company directors suggests that the company finds it expedient to establish close relationships with key political elites for business purpose. Mohamed Arip Mahmud, the late brother of Sarawak's chief minister, was a board member of Jaya Tiasa. Its current board includes Malaysia's former defence chief and former Sarawak police chief. RH, in Mandarin, means forever green, but given the linkage between logging contracts and politics, the rainforest in Sarawak may not remain green for long.

In 1988, Tiong's inroad into the Malaysian media industry began with the purchase of the highest circulation Chinese newspaper, Sin Chew Jit Poh. The newspaper suffered financial hardship in 1987 after it was suspended by then Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad during the nationwide clampdown, known as "Operasi Lalang", which resulted in the arrest of 119 political critics and activists, as well as the suspension of three newspapers. In 1992, another loss-making Chinese newspaper, Guang Ming, was acquired. Three years later, Tiong purchased controlling shares of Ming Pao Enterprise which publishes newspapers in Hong Kong, Vancouver, Toronto, and New York.

Further business forays into the Malaysian media scene was facilitated through Tiong's strategic alliance with Ling Liong Sik, then president of the Malaysia Chinese Association (MCA), a dominant Chinese component party within the ruling Barisan Nasional. In 2006 Tiong bought Nanyang Press, which publishes Nanyang Siang Pau and China Press, from Huaren Holdings, the business arm of MCA. The sale sparked vigorous protests and criticisms from the Chinese community, which claimed that the monopoly of the Chinese-language newspapers was part of a ploy by the ruling state to tame the critical and vocal Chinese press. The Nanyang takeover led to a mass boycott of more than ninety columnists and writers from all the four newspapers and fuelled internal factionalism within the MCA. Some fear that the near stranglehold of Chinese newspapers in Malaysia would compromise press integrity. "Without market competition, the Chinese papers in Malaysia will lose its [sic] independence", said Wong Chin Huat, chairperson of the Writer Alliance for Media Independence.

In 2007 Tiong merged Sin Chew Media Corporation and Nanyang Press Holdings with the Ming Pao Enterprise under an umbella company called Media Chinese International (MCI). On April 2008, MCI was dual listed on both the Kuala Lumpur and Hong Kong stock exchanges. The merger, which earns Tiong the nickname, "Rupert Murdoch of the Chinese media", comprises five daily newspapers with a total circulation of over a million copies a day, and thirty magazines in Southeast Asia, Hong Kong, China, Taiwan, and North America. Apart from print journalism, MCI is moving into mobile and broadcast media as its subsidiary, One Media Group, has a foothold in the area of providing media content to mobile phones in China.

The reticent Tiong claims that his media conglomerate is not purely for profit, but is a vehicle to fulfil his personal philosophy of "linking Chinese communities around the world".

Tjan Tjoe Siem

(曾祖沁, Zeng Zuqin, 1909–78)

Expert of the Javanese language and culture, Indonesia

Tjan Tjoe Siem was known as the leading expert on Javanese language and culture as well as Javanese Islam in Indonesia.

Tjan Tjoe Siem, the younger brother of Tjan Tjoe Som, was born on 3 April 1909, in Solo (Surakarta) Central Java, into a well established Muslim Chinese family. The family became famous after one of its members, Tjan Kong Sing (Siem's uncle), participated in the Diponegoro War (1825–30) against the Dutch in Java. Kong Sing later changed his name to Prawirasetja and married into the Diponegoro's family.

The young Siem went to the Netherlands and studied at Leiden University. In the 1930s there were only two Indonesian Chinese who studied at Leiden: the brothers, Tjan Tjoe Som and Tjan Tjoe Siem. Siem was known as a Javanologist and Islamologist, and his elder brother, a sinologist and scholar of Islamic law.

Tjan Tjoe Siem graduated from Leiden after successfully defending his dissertation, "Hoe Koeroepati zich zijn vrouw verwerf" or "Lakon sang Kurupati Rabi" in 1938 and received his doctorate in Oriental Studies. In writing his dissertation, he used six Old Javanese manuscripts as sources. The manuscripts are about the marriage of Suyudana, the king of Kurawas from Mahabharata.

After returning from the Netherlands, he became a taalambtenar (a civil service position in the field of language) in Yogyakarta, while at the same time a teacher at the local Algemeine Middelbare School (AMS — comparable to present-day high school), also in Yogyakarta. One of his former students was senior Indonesian journalist, Rosihan Anwar. In 1954–58 he was professor of modern Javanese language in the Department of Nusantara Studies, Faculty of Letters, University of Indonesia, in Jakarta. He was later elected dean of the faculty from 1960 to 1965.

Tjan was very popular with his former students. He was very well known for his humble and "down to earth" personality. His students gave him the title of sarjana yang sujana (a scholar with very high character), because of his humility, kindness, and helpfulness to everybody, and because he had a very wide range of knowledge not only in his field, but also in other cultural matters. He was the only non-native Indonesian/Javanese who was very knowledgeable in Javanese language and culture. His knowledge of Islam and the al Qur'an was inherited from his mother, who was also an expert in Javanese literature and Islamic law. As an expert of Javanese literature, he was also expert in nembang (singing) Javanese old poems and kekawin (music of the Majapahit empire). He sometimes showed this talent in front of his students and always invited his students to see wayang kulit (leather puppet show) performances, which were sometimes attended by President Sukarno and some of his ministers.

The years between 1959 and 1965 are known in Indonesia as the Guided Democracy period. Soekarno was moving towards the left and many Indonesian intellectuals were divided: some moved towards the left, while others moved to the right. The struggle between the left-wing forces (represented by Soekarno and supported by the Indonesian Communist Party, PKI) and the right-wing forces (represented by the army and Islamic groups) eventually came to a head in the 1965 coup which resulted in the dissolution of the PKI, the fall of Soekarno, and the rise of the army represented by Soeharto.

Left-wing social and cultural organizations were then banned and dissolved. Tjan Tjoe Siem and elder brother Tjan Tjoe Som were also seriously affected as they were members of the Himpunan Sarjana Indonesia (HSI), the left-leaning scholar organization associated with the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI). Tjan Tjoe Siem was forced to resign from his position as dean of the Faculty of Letters, as professor, and as a civil servant. His fate was "better" than his elder brother's, who was dismissed from all his positions in the university and barred from going overseas until his untimely death in 1969. The different treatment of the two brothers could be due to the fact that Tjan Tjoe Som was a sinologist, more active, and perceived by the new authorities as more "political", while Tjan Tjoe Siem was an Islamist and less active in the organization, and perceived as less or "non political" by the new authorities.

The New Order Government gave permission for Tjan Tjoe Siem to teach at Nanyang University in Singapore as professor of Malay Studies (1968–72). In 1969 he married Soelastri Soerowardojo, a Javanese lady who was his secretary while he was dean of the Faculty of Letters, University of Indonesia. He had waited a long time to marry Soelastri as initially her family did not give her permission to marry a Chinese, even though he was a Muslim. He did not come personally to Indonesia for the wedding ceremony and only sent his kris (Javanese dagger) to represent him. This is a common practice in the Javanese tradition. Because of his long wait to marry Soelastri, he was given the nickname eeuwige de bruidegom (the long lasting bridegroom) by his friends.

He returned to Indonesia after the end of his tenure at Nanyang University in 1973 and continued his dedication to education by teaching at the Institute of Islamic Studies (IAIN) in Yogyakarta. He also served as a supervisor of a few Ph.D. candidates. But on 30 December 1978, while taking his wudhu (cleaning self with water before praying), he suddenly collapsed and passed away. He was later buried beside his brother, Tjan Tjoe Som, who died in 1969.

His important works are: Hoe Koeroepati zich zijn vrouw verwert, Leiden: Luctor et Emergo (1938); Javaansche kaarspellen: Bijdrage tot de Beschrijving van Land en Volk, Bandung, Nix (1941); Asas-asas Hukum Islam (The Foundations of Islamic Law), written together with the famous writer, Amir Hamzah (1963); and Studies of Islam: Collections of Lectures, IAIN Sunan Kalijaga, Jogyakarta, written in collaboration with Zaini Muchtarom (1965). In fact, Tjan also completed a manuscript that was probably his last and best work — on Javanese masks. According to one report, the manuscript was ready for printing and the publishers asked him to pay for the production of the illustrations in colour. He was unable to pay and hence the book was not published. It is not known where the manuscript is but he managed to publish a paper on the topic in a French journal, Art Asiatiques (1969).

Tjan Tjoe Som

(曾祖森, Zeng Zusen, 1903–69)
Leading sinologist, Indonesia

Tjan Tjoe Som was known as the "Father of Chinese Studies in Indonesia" for introducing the study of modern China despite his basic training and expertise in the classical studies of China. He established the Lembaga Sinologi (Sinologische Instituut—Hanxue Yanjiuyuan) of the Fakulteit Sastra (Faculty of Letters), Universiteit van Indonesia (University of Indonesia), in 1952 and led the institute from 1953 to 1958. The institute now has a new name, Program Studi Cina (Chinese Studies Programme). (Note: Lembaga Sinologi was the continuation of Sinologische Instituut, established by the Dutch.)

Tjan was born in Solo (Surakarta), Central Java, on 15 February 1903, and grew up in a devout Chinese Muslim family who ran a batik printing factory, De Bliksem (according to other source De Bliksem was a printing factory), in town. His family lived very close to the Kraton Mangkunegara (Mangkunegara Court) as one of the family members participated in the Diponegoro War (1825–30) against the Dutch Colonial Government. The young Tjan entered Hollandsch-Chineeshe School (HCS), a special grade school for Chinese children before the First World War in Surakarta, and continued his education in Algemeene Mildebaare School (AMS), comparable to the present-day high school in Yogyakarta. Before finishing his studies at AMS, however, the young Tjan returned to Solo to help his family in the management of its batik factory, which almost went bankrupt at the end of the World War I. After returning to Surakarta, he started to learn sinology and Islamology as an autodidact; he was also interested in philosophy and anthropology. It was then that he met Dr H. Kraemer, the writer of a book called, A Christian Message in a Non Christian World and it was Kraemer who urged him to study sinology in the Netherlands under the guidance of Professor Duyvendak.

Tjan went to the Netherlands in 1935 and one year later was admitted as a student of the Department of Sinology of Leiden University. He was a very dilligent and serious student who also worked for the library of the Sinological Institute at the same university. In 1947 Leiden University proposed the establishment of an association for Chinese Studies and the idea was welcomed by several universities which offer China programmes in Europe. Following up on that idea, students and scholars of Chinese Studies met at Cambridge University, England, for a dialogue called Conference of Junior Sinologists, Cambridge and Oxford. Tjan Tjoe Som, A.F.H Hulsewe, R.P. Kramers, P. Swann, and a lady by the name of Mrs. H. Wink represented Leiden University. At the end of the gathering, the young scholars representing their universities in Leiden, Cambridge, Oxford, Stockholm, Paris, and London established the European Assocation for Chinese Studies (EACS or Ouzhou Hanxue Xuehui). The organization is still active today and it has reached its sixty-first year.

Tjan got his doctorate in 1949 after successfully defending his dissertation on Pariku's "Po Hu T'ung: The Comprehensive Discussion in the White Tiger Hall" with a cum-laude, the highest honour for a candidate who has passed a difficult examination in a scientific discipline. The first volume of this classic work translated by Tjan was published in 1949. His career rose with his appointment as special professor in Chinese philosophy at Leiden. His deep understanding about Chinese and Islamic philosophies and his sensitivity and wisdom made him a famous scholar. He did many translations on Classical Chinese philosophical works which can still be found in the old archives at the Chinese Studies Program, University of Indonesia, in Jakarta. The translations are handwritten and he placed them neatly in small envelopes, possibly for his own reference. Soon after graduation, the university appointed him chairman of the Department of Chinese Philosophy.

In 1952 the second volume of his translation of Po Hu T'ung was published and it was in this year that he returned to Indonesia at the invitation of the newly independent Indonesian Government to develop Chinese Studies in Indonesia. This was a turnaround in his life and career. He left all the fame and luxury that he enjoyed in the Netherlands and in Europe just to devote his expertise to his home country. His colleagues tried to prevent him from leaving the Netherlands, arguing that Indonesia at the time was still full of uncertainties, especially for a Chinese philosophy scholar such as him, but he had made up his mind to serve his young nation.

During his first years in Indonesia he was busy with the management of the Sinology Institute. The organization was later incorporated into the University of Indonesia under a new name, Jurusan Sastra Tionghoa (Department Chinese Language and Literature). Towards the end of the 1960s, the department changed its name again to Program Studi Cina (Chinese Studies Program) and is still so named today. In his job, Tjan was asssisted by other dedicated staff members of the institute such as the late Drs Sie Ing Djiang, the late Dra Oey Soan Nio, the late Koh Chung Chuen, and Drs Aman Kombali. Tjan bought many books and subscribed to various journals, newspapers, and other publications. As the result, the library of the institute has one of the best collections of works published on Southeast Asia from the late nineteenth century to the mid-1960s.

Although Tjan's expertise is on classical Chinese, he also started studies on modern and contemporary China. The department trained many first-generation scholars on China and the Chinese. It admitted officials from the army, the Department of Foreign Affairs, and the Office of the attorney general, some of whom played important roles in the Indonesian Government later. In 1959 President Soekarno appointed Tjan a member of the Provisional People's Consultative Assembly (MPR) and National Planning Commission. He was representing scientists in both organizations. In 1960 he attended the 13th International Conference on the Problem of China in Moskow. He also visited the Peoples' Republic of China (PRC) several times. During the period of Guided Democracy (1959–67), he joined Himpunan Sarjana Indonesia (HSI or Indonesian Scholars Association), a leftist organization associated with the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI). The Guided Democracy period refers to the time when Indonesian politics and foreign policy were leaning towards the left as a result of Soekarno's NASAKOM programme, which was more or less similar to a united front consisting of nationalists, the religious elements of the Indonesian society, and the communists. Tjan was also a consultant for Zhong Zheng Bao, the Chinese version of the left leaning Indonesian language newspaper, Warta Bakti.

The September 30 movement of 1965 had a major impact on the Indonesian political, social, and cultural landscape that led to the dissolution of the PKI, the fall of Soekarno, and the rise of General Soeharto. All left-wing parties and personalities were purged. Because of Tjan's membership in the HSI, he was first released from his duties and later fired from his position by the Ministry of Education due to his "direct and indirect involvement in the 30 September 1965/PKI movement to overthrow the Indonesian government", an accusation which he denied.

Some of Tjan's former students believe that Tjan was impressed by the progress of the People's Republic of China under Chairman Mao Zedong and had naively believed that Indonesia should take a similar path. In fact, Soekarno was equally impressed by China's socialism. Under the leadership of Soekarno, Indonesia moved towards the left and when there was a coup in 1965 which led to the downfall of Soekarno, Tjan was also affected.

Several months before he passed away, he wrote a very moving single sentence in his notebook: "After all I have had a curious life that my present experiences should not astonish me. Who knows what all this is good for me." He died in 1969, six weeks before his sixty-sixth birthday, due to heart failure, and was buried in Solo, his city of birth. In 1976, his younger brother, Professor Tjan Tjoe Siem, died and was buried beside his brother.

Tjan Tjoe Som's publications include his translation masterpiece, Po Hu T'ung, published by Leiden University. His other works include De Plaats van de Studie der Kanonieke Boeken in de Chinese Filosofie (Leiden: Brill, 1950, 1952); "On the Rendering of the Word "Ti" as "Emperor"" (Journal of American Oriental Society, 71 no. 2/April–June, 1951); "Sarjana Sastra dan Pembangunan Kebudayaan Nasional; Sebuah Prasaran" (Scholars of Humanities and the Development of National Culture; A Paper [Jakarta, 1961]); Tao Te Tjing (Jakarta, 1962); and "Chinese Historical Sources and Historiography".

Tjan is one of the tragic victims of Indonesia's political confrontation during the 1960s. The years from 1963 to 1965 were when prominent people like him were forced to take sides in the confrontation among political powers. However, regardless of the "mistake" that Tjan had made, his contribution to the development of Chinese Studies in Indonesia should be recognized.

Tjiok San Fang, Elsie

(Mrs Elsie Tjiok-Lim, 石圣芳, Shi Shengfang, 1936–)
Ballerina, pianist, Indonesia

Elsie Tjiok was a leading ballerina. She was the first Indonesian who started the ballet school in post-independence Indonesia but subsequently left the country for China with her violinist and conductor husband.

In official records, Elsie Tjiok was born in Magelang, Java, in September 1935. In her autobiography she states that she was born in Shanghai in 1936. Her father was a political science professor at one of the universities in Shanghai. He married his Malaya-born student who gave birth to Elsie, their daughter. When the Japanese invaded Shanghai, Elsie Tjiok was one year old. Her parents migrated to the Dutch East Indies (Indonesia) where her father opened a school. When the Japanese occupied Indonesia, her father was put in the concentration camp. After the Japanese surrender, he became a rich businessman dealing in timber.

Elsie studied in a Chinese-English primary school where she learned both Chinese and English, but her knowledge of Chinese was limited as she felt then that she had little use for the language. When she was a child, her parents hired a Dutch teacher to give her lessons in the piano and ballet. After studying at the Puck Meijer Dancing School in Jakarta for three years, her parents sent her, at the age of 14, to study at the Legat School, a Russian school teaching music and ballet in England.

Nicolai Legat was a well-known Russian ballet choreographer. He had long passed away when Elsie entered the school but she received quite good training there, graduating after three years. Prior to her graduation, the school had formed the Legat Dancing Group, travelling in England, France, Belgium, and the Netherlands. As there were not many Asian girls among the dancers, the group used her to draw the audience.

In 1953 Elsie returned to Indonesia, giving a few performances. She later received an Indonesian scholarship and went to London again. She wanted to study at the Royal Academy of Ballet but the academy did not accept foreign students. She therefore took lessons from George Goncharov, a well known Russian dancer, with a view to becoming a professional ballet dancer. At the same time Elsie was accepted as a second year student at the Royal Academy of Music. She learned ballet during the day and the piano at night. Chu Hui, a well-known conductor in Singapore, was a classmate in the Royal Academy. After two years Elsie's mother asked her to choose between ballet and the piano, thinking that it was too heavy a burden for Elsie to go to two schools. Elsie chose ballet. But because the Goncharov school diploma was not recognised in Indonesia, she had to take the examination at the Royal Academy of Ballet in London which included a solo dance. She passed with flying colours.

Elsie returned to Indonesia in 1956 and was immediately asked by the government to start a ballet school. In post-independence Indonesia, there were neither ballet schools nor ballet dancing groups run by Indonesians. Elsie had no choice but to establish one school named Djakarta Ballet School. To her surprise, hundreds of students enrolled in the new school. That was the beginning of her teaching career. In 1957 she came to know Lim Kek Beng and they became friends. Kek Beng took her to see his eldest brother, Lim Kek Tjiang, who was then in the hospital recuperating from a liver infection. She had heard of Lim Kek Tjiang when she was still in Europe and although she knew that he was prone to showing off as a violinist, they got along well. Elsie often followed the Lim brothers to perform at the PRC embassy. Elsie and Kek Tjiang fell in love and got married in 1958. Kek Tjiang wanted to go to the PRC to develop his career and she wanted to follow him. However, Elsie's parents who believed that Elsie and Kek Tjiang would not be able to adjust to life in mainland China, strongly opposed their plan. The young couple ignored their objection and departed for China, Elsie was already expecting her first child at that time.

Elsie arrived in Beijing in May 1959 and began to feel very unwell. The condition in Beijing then was not what she had envisaged and she cried every day. In June she delivered a baby boy, Lin Hai. Fortunately her parents sent food and vitamin supplements which helped her to recover soon. In October she began to work as a ballet teacher in the Ballet Academy in Beijing, at that time under the directorship of Dai Ailian, a leading ballerina in China. Initially, China relied heavily on the Russians. During the Sino-Soviet split, China invited the Westerners to come and teach. In 1962 Elsie gave birth to a second son, Lin Shan, which adversely affected her health.

In 1963 Zhou Enlai gave the instruction that protagonists in ballet should no longer be princes and princesses but workers and peasants. Elsie and the other ballerinas were sent to factories to "experience" the life of the working classes. Whenever some very important visitors from abroad came to China, Zhou Enlai would ask the ballet dancers to perform. The performance would be scheduled after dinner and the dancers often had to wait until after 10 p.m. to perform. During the Cultural Revolution, Elsie was involved in training ballerinas for the performance of "The Red Detachment of Women", one of the few ballet pieces that were allowed to be staged.

Elsie was not well due to the pressure and long working hours. She suffered from thyroid disorder.Her neck was swollen but she refused to have an operation in Beijing. Lim Kek Tjiang, her husband, told the authorities that he wanted to take her to the Netherlands for treatment. The Lim family eventually got the permit to leave China. However, they did not go to the Netherlands but Macau. From Macau Elsie went to Hong Kong to join the newly established ballet dancing troupe. Her husband also found a position in the Hong Kong Orchestra. When Kek Tjiang lost his job, Elsie wanted to migrate to Australia for their sons' education. Her husband then got a position in the Sydney Orchestra and she found a job selling organs in Melbourne. She later joined her husband in Sydney and worked as a secretary at the music firm, Musica Viva Australia, as a secretary. When the Australian Ballet was established, she was invited to be a teacher there. When the Victorian College of the Arts was set up, she found a job teaching at the college. Kek Tjiang who was unhappy with the working environment in Sydney eventually moved to Melbourne.

In 1984, Elsie was invited to teach ballet in Hong Kong and Kek Tjiang followed her there. According to Elsie, Kek Tjiang followed her after realizing that he had made a mistake in going to Beijing in 1959. Elsie in turn, was very concerned about Kek Tjiang's career. She strongly believed that her husband was talented but was unable to get the job he liked owing to his extremely poor human relations. She had hopes for her husband to make a comeback in Hong Kong but it was not to be as his rivals were still in control of the music world; the music circle did not open the doors for him. However, Kek Tjiang was able to make records both in Japan and Hong Kong with foreign companies. In 1989 Elsie was invited back to Melbourne to teach and Kek Tjiang followed her again. It seemed that they were destined to live the "life of a gypsy". When Elsie was in Hong Kong, she met the founder of a ballet school in Taiwan, Lin Huaimin, who invited her to go to Taiwan to teach at his school, Yunmen Wuji. Again, Kek Tjiang went with her. The couple lived for seven years in Taiwan where their talents in Ballet and music were greatly appreciated. Kek Tjiang was even given the accolade of "Karajan of the East" by his fans. In 1998, both returned to Australia. Kek Tjiang dedicated his memoir to Elsie for her sacrifice, advice and support for his pursuit of music without which he would not have been able to achieve much.

Tjoa Hin Hoeij, Mrs

(née Kwee Yat Nio, 郭悦娘, Guo Yueniang, 1907–90)

Writer, Buddhist organization leader, Indonesia

Mrs Tjoa Hin Hoeij, née Kwee Yat Nio (郭悦娘 Guo Yueniang), was born in Bogor in 1907. She was the eldest child and only daughter of the eminent Peranakan Chinese writer and social critic, Kwee Tek Hoay. She received her education from the local Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (THHK) (Chinese Association) junior middle school and the Methodist Girls' School. She stayed on at the latter as a teacher after her graduation.

In 1922, Kwee Yat Nio founded Chie Mey Hwee (CMH) (Sisters' Association) in Bogor, for young, single Peranakan Chinese women. She was the chairperson of the CMH for a number of years. The objective of the CMH was to promote the social position and education of women, so that they became intelligent and competent wives and mothers. Qualified teachers were invited to give lessons in sewing and cookery. Other activities included traditional (Chinese) dance, music and drama; public speaking; a "Ladies Jazz Band"; relief work and fund-raising.

The CMH members were mainly students from the Hollandsch-Chineesch School (HCS) (Dutch-Chinese School) and Methodist Girls' School in Bogor. There were also branches in Batavia (Jakarta), Sukabumi, Bandung and several other places in Central Java. The original membership did not last long, as more and more members left after getting married. However, the CMH continued to exist as a ladies' social welfare organisation until the Japanese invasion in March 1942.

In 1925, Kwee Yat Nio married Tjoa Hin Hoeij of Tanjung Karang, Lampung, Sumatra. He was a graduate of the THHK senior middle school in Bogor and Fudan University in Shanghai. The couple had three daughters (Lenny Tjoa Keng Yin, Effie Tjoa Keng Loan, Yenny Tjoa Keng Lan) and two sons (Tjoa Keng Pin, Tjoa Keng Hok).

From 1928 until 1932, Mrs Tjoa taught at the English School in Batavia. Nevertheless, her forte was in writing. While still a schoolgirl, Mrs Tjoa had been encouraged by her father to translate stories and articles from English-language publications such as the British Ladies' Home Journal and the Guardian into Malay, as "foreign news" for Sin Po and other Sino-Malay newspapers. In spite of her young age, she was paid for the published translations.

By the 1930s, Mrs Tjoa was well-established as a freelance writer. She wrote for two of her father's magazines. Moestika Romans (formerly Moestika Panorama; this was a monthly publication, as distinct from his weekly magazine, Panorama) dealt with religious topics, women's and family issues, as well as politics and other topics of social interest. Moestika Dharma was a religious weekly. Mrs Tjoa also contributed articles to the women's supplements of several leading Sino-Malay dailies, and edited the Dames Rubriek (Ladies' Column) in Sin Tit Po, Mata Hari and Keng Po.

In 1935, encouraged by her father, husband and readers, Mrs Tjoa founded Maandblad Istri (Wives' Monthly). Her primary goal for creating such a magazine was to teach Peranakan Chinese women to advance themselves, lest they be left behind by progressive women of other races. The monthly was published in Malay instead of Dutch, so that less-educated Peranakan women with a working knowledge of Malay could read it.

Mrs Tjoa herself wrote most of the contents of Maandblad Istri. A typical issue contained stories; recipes; reviews of English and American films that were being screened in Batavia at the time; health and beauty tips; illustrations of the latest fashions from the West and China; and reams of advice on how best to nourish, educate and manage one's children. The main articles covered a wide range of social and political issues, for example: domestic discord and its causes, the declining morals of the younger generation, female employment in the public sphere, the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War.

The editorial board of Maandblad Istri consisted of women and men who shared Mrs Tjoa's ideas. There were two or three doctors, a midwife, a lawyer, a beautician and a social worker. Their own professions enabled them to provide specialist advice. One of the doctors was a woman, Betsy Thung Sin Nio, who had obtained her medical degree from the University of Amsterdam.

In its time, Maandblad Istri became the organ of the Chung-Hua Fu Nü Hwee (CHFNH) (Chinese Ladies' Association) which was founded in 1938 with Mrs Tjoa herself as president. The CHFNH was an active champion of relief work, while the monthly itself sponsored a number of local charities.

The publication of Maandblad Istri was temporarily halted by the Japanese Occupation and Indonesian Revolution. It continued during the early years of the new Indonesian Republic, but finally ceased operations due to a combination of factors: the passing of Tjoa Hin Hoeij in 1956 (which deprived his wife of her most valuable ally in this publishing venture), as well as financial difficulties and paper shortages.

Apart from her family commitments, social work activities and prolific writing, Mrs Tjoa was also actively involved in Buddhist organisations. From 1934 to 1938, she was the secretary of the Batavia Buddhist Association. She also chaired the Sam Kauw Hwee (Tridharma) in Batavia from the mid-1930s to the 1950s. (Her father, Kwee Tek Hoay, was a founding member of the Sam Kauw Hwee.) She was also the deputy chairperson of the Gabungan Sam Kauw Hwee (Gabungan Tridharma) (Federation of Three Religions) in Indonesia, and editor-in-chief of its magazine — Tribudaja — from 1952 to 1965. On the political front, she was a member of the Badan Permusjawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia (Baperki) (Indonesian Citizens Consultative Body), and chaired its women's division from 1956 to 1964.

In her later years, Mrs Tjoa persevered with her writing, undeterred by poor health and increasing infirmities. She continued to be active in local Buddhist organisations, particularly the Women's Buddhist Association of Jakarta. She even adopted a Buddhist name, Visakha Gunadharma. On 17 December 1989, the wedding day of her granddaughter, Sabina Susie (younger daughter of Lenny Tjoa Keng Yin), Mrs Tjoa was honoured by the Women's Buddhist Association for her dedication and hard work on behalf of Buddhism.

Mrs Tjoa passed away on 26 September 1990. Her life's work should be considered as a major contribution towards the enlightenment of her gender and the wider Peranakan Chinese community, while marking a significant milestone in the history of the women's movement in Indonesia.

Two of Mrs Tjoa's children were also active in public life. Lenny Tjoa Keng Yin (b.1927) and Effie (Euphemia) Tjoa Keng Loan (1931–2007) received their classical music training in Europe after the Second World War. Their studies began at the Conservatory in The Hague. The sisters then transferred to the Amsterdam Conservatory where Lenny studied pedagogy (to prepare for a teaching career), as well as singing and piano, while Effie majored in singing. Their advanced operatic training was completed in Italy: Lenny in Rome, Effie in both Rome and Milan.

After returning to Indonesia, Lenny taught at the Institut Keguruan Ilmu Pendidikan (IKIP) (Teachers' Training College) in Jakarta. She was also the founder of that IKIP's music department. In mid-1965, her husband Kho Kek Soen, a medical doctor and a professor, moved to Medan. She followed him and found work at the local IKIP as an instructor, and eventually became the head of its music department, a position which she held from 1969 to 1992. In addition to Lenny's professional career, she was, for many years, until her retirement in the late 1990s, actively involved in various organisations which promoted social welfare, health and the performing arts.

Effie became a concert performer upon returning to Indonesia in the mid-1950s. Her homecoming was met with much acclamation, because in Indonesia at the time, there were very few performers of her calibre, let alone with European credentials. Effie was very much in demand, and travelled extensively to give concerts. She was even asked to join governmental delegations that toured China, Japan and the United States. And, like her mother, Effie was also a member of Baperki.

Effie's musical career in Indonesia only lasted a number of years, due to the social and political conditions of the late 1950s and early 1960s. She was gradually reduced to giving private lessons at home. After the abortive coup of 1965, the government-sponsored overseas trips also ceased, and there was hardly any demand for public performances in the crisis-ridden country. By then, imported American popular culture had permeated almost every level of urban Indonesian society, particularly in Jakarta, and many a young aspirant of Western sophistication were rocking to a different beat, much to the detriment of Western classical music.

After fifteen years in Indonesia, Effie finally decided to move back to Amsterdam. She obtained a Dutch nursing scholarship, and initially worked as a nurse to support herself, before undertaking a variety of other jobs. Although she no longer worked professionally as a singer, she did give performances at charity events. Effie passed away in Amsterdam on 12 March 2007.

Tjoe Bou San

(朱茂山, Zhu Maoshan, 1891–1925)
Chinese nationalist, journalist, novelist, Indonesia

Tjoe Bou San was born in 1891, the son of a textile merchant, and he had two brothers and a sister. He probably went to private Dutch school for a few years, or enrolled in a Hokkien school and learned Dutch, English, and Malay on his own. He was fluent in Batavian Malay and knew a little dutch, English, and Chinese.

At the age of eighteen, he was editor-in-chief of the Malay edition of a weekly magazine, Hoa Tok Po. It was the official periodical of the Soe Po Sia, a Chinese nationalist Totok organization. From February to June 1917, he was editor-in-chief of the newspaper, Tjhoen Tjhioe, in Surabaya. He reportedly moved back to Jakarta after he left the paper. Soon afterwards, he visited China and worked as a correspondent there for the Malay edition of the daily, Sin Po, under editor-in-chief, Kwee Hing Tjiat (1916–18).

A year later, he returned to Jakarta and was appointed editor-in-chief of Sin Po, replacing Kwee Hing Tjiat, who wanted to leave for Europe. In 1919, Tjoe also held the position of director of Sin Po. While Tjoe was its leader, the newspaper became an influential mouthpiece for Chinese nationalism. It was Tjoe who developed the concept of Chinese nationalism in the Netherlands Indies and led the campaign to abolish Dutch nationality (onderdaanschap) after World War I.

Chinese nationalism was at the time a cultural rather than political nationalism. However, as the influence of Totoks who sympathized with the revolutionary movement on the Chinese mainland grew, the Chinese movement in Java gradually assumed political colour. Chinese political organizations such as the Tong Meng Hui (which later became Guomindang) were introduced to the Netherlands Indies around 1907. The Soe Po Sia (Readers Associations) that spread the revolutionary idea was formed in major cities. National awareness rose among Chinese youths. Tjoe was one of the youths who had been influenced by this wave of political nationalism. It became increasingly stronger after the Manchu empire was overthrown and the Republic of China was founded in 1912. Sin Po, originally a weekly, was transformed into a daily not long after the birth of the Chinese republic. The newspaper was the main rival of a big Peranakan newspaper, Kabar Perniagaan, which was dominated by Peranakan Chinese officers (also known as Chinese captains), and took a conservative stand.

Under the leadership of Kwee Hing Tjiat, Sin Po began a movement to guide the Chinese community in political matters. For example, in 1917, the Dutch were planning to create a Volksraad (People's Council) and wanted to include Peranakan Chinese and indigenous representatives in the new political institution. The same year, a conference of Chinese residents was held in Semarang to discuss the issue. Kwee Hing Tjiat, supported by other Peranakan organizations, rejected the proposal of H.H. Kan, a pro-Dutch Peranakan, to participate in local politics, arguing that the Chinese were Chinese citizens. The rejection was related to the Dutch Government's plan to carry out Indie Weerbaar, the defence of the Indies, under which Dutch subjects were obliged to join a militia. Sin Po, under Tjoe's leadership, launched a campaign to abolish the Dutch Nationality Law. According to Sin Po, it succeeded in collecting approximately 30,000 signatures. The campaign did not achieve its goals because China proceeded to sign the consular treaty that recognized the jurisdictional rights of the Dutch Government over the Peranakan. Besides, Tjoe's campaign lost its momentum because the Dutch Government did not push the Indie Weerbaar proposal through. Tjoe identified with the Chinese nationalists in China and felt that both the Peranakan and Totok Chinese had to consider themselves Chinese. Tjoe's nationalist views clashed with those of P.H. Fromberg Sr., a Dutch lawyer who had held a post in the Netherlands Indies as an officer of the Bureau of Chinese Affairs and was close to the Peranakan Chinese society. Fromberg a wrote a booklet, De Chineesche Beweging op Java (The Chinese Movement in Java), in defence of the Chinese. Fromberg was very different from other Dutch officials who were considered hostile to the Chinese.

Tjoe argued that Fromberg, being a Dutch, failed to understand the Chinese movement in the Netherlands Indies. Tjoe was right when he said that before the campaign, the Chinese movement was the result of discriminatory laws, and aimed at raising the status of the Chinese of the Netherlands Indies to equal that of Europeans. However the other movement, known as the campaign against the Dutch Nationality Law, was aimed at acquiring Chinese citizenship. Tjoe wrote that the Chinese of the Netherlands Indies, as a separate group, did not mean anything in the world due to their small numbers, but they would be important if they joined with the Chinese of China. Tjoe said that even if the advisory body, Volkraad, developed into a parliament, the interests of the Chinese could not be protected because they were a minority. For Tjoe, the only solution was for the Chinese in the Netherlands Indies was to assimilate fully with other groups, but there were difficulties. Tjoe also thought that Indië Weerbaar (the defence of the Indies) was not a matter of common interest, but in the interest of Dutch capitalists. He held his Chinese nationalist viewpoint so firmly that he clashed with Hauw Tek Kong, former director of Sin

Po. Hauw accepted Dutch nationality and started a Malay (Indonesian) newspaper called Keng Po to compete with Sin Po.

Under the leadership of Tjoe, Sin Po grew. In 1921, it succeeded in publishing its Chinese edition and in 1922, it also published an East Java edition in Surabaya. Tjoe employed many indigenous journalists and published news about the Indonesian nationalist movement written by indigenous writers. It seemed that Indonesian nationalists liked to work with Sin Po because they lacked a mass medium to spread their nationalistic ideas. In Bandung, for example, when Soekarno was still studying at the Bandung Institute of Technology, he frequently socialized closely with some Peranakan Chinese who supported Chinese nationalism, such as Tan Tek Ho, a contributor to Sin Po, and Liem Soey Tjoan, a printer and staunch supporter of Sin Po. Through them, Soekarno came to know Tjoe and even visited him at his office in Jakarta. What was on the mind of Indonesian nationalists then was how to expel the Dutch.

The Malay edition of Sin Po continued to make progress, but the Chinese edition and the East Java Malay edition suffered losses. Many of Sin Po's high-ranking employees then voluntarily took salary cuts to enable the paper to survive. Tjoe promised that the salary difference would be considered the company's debt and would be paid back when profits were made. However, Tjoe's health was failing; he seldom wrote about politics. Instead, he read philosophy books and translated Chinese classics such as Loen Gie (Lunyu [The Analects]) and Beng Tjoe (Mengzi [The Book of Mencius]), which he published under the pseudonym, Hauw San Liang. Later he learned about Kitab Chuangtze (Zhuangzi) and admired the views of the ancient Chinese philosopher.

Tjoe was a fairly accomplished novelist. In 1917, he published Satoe Djodo Jang Terhalang (An Obstructed Match) about the tragic love of a couple in Bogor. In 1918, Binasa Lantaran Harta (Destroyed by Wealth) was published, followed by its sequel, Badjingan Besar (Big Crook), the same year. Tjoe was skilful in the colloquial language. His work of 1922, The Loan Eng, was one of the most beautiful novels by a Peranakan writer before World War II. It was followed by Lima Tahoen Kemoedian (Five Years After), also the same year. His novel, Salah Mengerti (Misunderstanding), was still being serialized in the weekly, edition of Sin Po, in 1925. Hoen-Tjeng-Lao (Fenzhuang lou or A Woman's Dressing Room), another novel, was not completely serialized until after his death on 3 November 1925 at the age of thirty-four. Tjoe did not write on Chinese politics and society in Sin Po before his death. He is survived by his wife, two daughters, and his Chinese nationalist ideas.

Tjong A Fie

(Tjong Yiauw Hian, 张耀轩, Zhang Yaoxuan; alias 张鸿南, Zhang Hongnan, 1859–1921)
Businessman, official and community leader, Indonesia

Tjong A Fie and his brother Tjong Yong Hian (张榕轩) were the most prominent Chinese businessmen in what was then called Sumatra's East Coast. His financial interests included plantations and related businesses, factories, banking, steamships, railroads, and real estate. He served the colonial government of the Netherlands Indies as Chinese officer and revenue farmer. Tjong's investments extended to China, Malaya and Singapore, while his philanthropic activities benefited the peoples of Sumatra, Malaya, Hong Kong and China.

Stories tell that Zhang Hongnan, who was born in 1859 (some sources say 1860) in Songkou, Meixian, Guangdong, or Tjong A Fie, as he was known in the Indies, arrived in East Sumatra in 1875 with only ten silver dollars sewn into his belt. In reality, however, he had a much greater starting capital in the person of his older brother, Zhang Yunan (张煜南 alias Tjong Yong Hian), already a Dutch-appointed lieutenant of the Chinese there, and his uncle, Zhang Bishi (Thio Thiau Siat). The latter had settled in the Nanyang in about 1857, first in Batavia (Jakarta), soon becoming one of Java's most prominent businessmen and moving his base to Sumatra in 1875 and finally to Penang. Within the triangle Sumatra-Straits Settlements-China, Tjong A Fie also made his mark. A Dutch official described him as having "clear intelligence, a broad vision, and an almost unbelievable ability to work."

Tjong A Fie settled first in the port of Labuhan, but soon moved to the city of Medan, which became the administrative and commercial capital of the rapidly developing plantation area of Deli and all eastern Sumatra. Thanks to their business sense and their relations with the colonial administration, the Tjong brothers were able to seize the opportunities that the booming economy offered. Following in their uncle's footsteps they became provisioners to the Dutch and to the thousands of coolie laborers in the tobacco and other plantations. Uncle Thio Thiau Siat's financial interests in Penang and elsewhere gave valuable support to their operations. Although it was Western capital that opened the famous tobacco plantations of Deli, beginning in the 1860s, the Western planters depended on Chinese coolie labor. They needed middlemen to recruit workers, to transport them to Sumatra, to oversee them, and to provision them with food, clothing, and, perhaps most important, opium. Tjong A Fie, who outlived his brother by almost ten years, was the better-known, more "charismatic" of the two.

Tjong A Fie had worked for a small shop owner in Labuhan, but Medan offered better opportunities. There, the colonial administration governed the Chinese population through appointed Chinese officers, and the burgeoning Chinese population of the district required men of special talent and resources. The Dutch appointed Tjong A Fie first as Lieutenant of the Chinese, then Captain, while his brother was Captain and then Major.

Public office opened doors. Being an officer meant having a good chance to obtain the monopoly revenue farms for opium and gambling, two vices that were rampant among the coolies, or for slaughtering of pigs. As officers, the Tjongs had access to these lucrative monopolies that were auctioned off by the government to the highest bidder. With his brother and with some participation of his uncle, Tjong A Fie held the profitable opium farm for the region; in one year, before the government finally took over the sale of opium, the farm may have taken in as much as six million guilders, delivering some two million of that as rent to the government.

Revenue farms were the Tjongs' first source of wealth but not the only one. The Tjongs held contracts to deliver rice and sugar, imported from Java or elsewhere in Southeast Asia, to the government for its military campaigns in nearby Aceh and to the plantations to feed the labourers. They also helped deliver coolies recruited from China via Singapore to the Deli plantations. The brothers were involved in the salt farm, and with that the entire fishing operations of the important Chinese fishing harbor of Bagan Siapiapi, if not as revenue farmer, then as financial guarantor for the monopoly farm. In that coastal Sumatran harbour, salt was the main ingredient for its salted fish and shrimp products that were a major part of the diet of peoples of the Indies and Malaya, including, of course, the coolie laborers of East Sumatra.

In 1908 Tjong A Fie became the first Chinese to own a plantation. In addition to his rubber plantation, called Si Bulan, he acquired additional plantations for coconuts, coffee, and tea. The plantation system had been intended for European, not Chinese, investment, but by 1919 he owned about twenty plantations. Although a plantation owner, he spoke out against the "penal sanction," the law that kept the coolies unfree and bound to their plantations. He owned factories for palm oil and sugar and did not hesitate to employ European personnel. Some ten thousand employees worked for him at the peak of his power.

With Thio Tiau Siat and his brother, Tjong A Fie invested in the merchant-managed Chao Chow and Swatow Railway Co., a novelty in China's rail-building scheme that used private capital and opened in 1906. Unfortunately, for a number of reasons, this enterprise was not successful but it remained a significant political gesture. In 1907, Tjong A. Fie was one of the founders of the Deli Bank and later of the Batavia Bank. His interests also extended to shipping.

After the death of his brother in 1911, Tjong A Fie became Major of the Chinese and undisputed leader of the Chinese community of Medan. With the growth of the city, Tjong had extended his investments to landownership. His office gave him access to the city planning for Medan, which opened opportunities in business and real estate. It is said that he owned half the land in the city, three-fourths of the houses, and virtually all of the property in the new development of Tebing Tinggi. Small wonder that he was unofficially called the "King of Medan."

Finally, Tjong used his wealth for a variety of philanthropic activities. For example, the Tjongs had built markets in the city, but they donated the income to found a hospital, Tjie On Djie Jan, for the indigent and for lepers, with an adjacent home for the old and destitute. Among his most important endeavors was support for education, which included donations to a missionary school in Penang, to Chinese-language education in Sumatra and elsewhere, to schools in his home area of China. He donated the clock to the tower of Medan's City Hall and erected a bridge, the "Virtuous Bridge (Chen Tek)," in memory of his brother that was recently restored. He supported Chinese temples in Medan and elsewhere and was a major donor to building the central mosque in Medan, to other mosques and even to Hindu temples and Christian churches. Repeatedly, he was a prominent contributor to disaster relief funds for his Chinese homeland. In 1916, Tjong A Fie celebrated thirty years of service to the administration with a feast that lasted three days, involving all ethnic groups of the city. In that year the University of Hong Kong gave him an honorary doctorate for his support for education.

Tjong was an integrative figure who was a close associate of the Sultan of Deli, respected by the Dutch authorities, and revered by the multic-ethnic population of Medan, Malay, Chinese, Indian, Arab, and Dutch. When he died in 1921 in Medan, large crowds attended the funeral ceremonies. Tjong A Fie placed part of his assets into foundations to continue his work, but his plantations later had to be sold; the Chinese railway declined and was finally demolished. His memorial image however stands, with that of his brother and uncle, in the Kek Lok Si Buddhist temple in Ayer Itam, Penang. He left an indelible mark on the city of Medan, where, in addition to the bridge, his great mansion, which combines Chinese and European architectural elements and was recently renovated, is a heritage site and important tourist attraction.

Toh Chin Chye

(杜进才, Du Jincai, 1921–2012)
Doctor, politician, Singapore

Lauded as the man who helped create the People's Action Party (PAP), Dr Toh Chin Chye was a fairly unassuming man at first glance. However, this quiet-looking gentleman was dubbed by Singapore's first prime minister (former minister mentor) as the man holding the fort for the PAP and thereby holding the party together in its early years. He is also remembered for being very passionate about shaping his country's future, a bit of an idealist, and very forthright, as he tended to "tell it like it is". His passion for serving the community, his idealism in wanting the best for everyone in society, and his forthright nature sprang from his very humble beginnings.

Born in 1921 in Perak, Malaysia, he was educated at St George's School. Then, like the brightest and best of his generation, he went to Raffles College in Singapore. However, the outbreak of World War II meant he was unable to pursue his education abroad. During the period of the Japanese Occupation of Singapore, Toh became a hawker's assistant, and grew potatoes and tapioca for his own subsistence. As with most members of his generation, his views on life and his political outlook, helped shape his budding interest in politics. Once awakened to the injustices of the colonial society, Toh took the next logical step forward by forming the Malayan Forum when the war was over and he was able to go overseas for his further education. In London, between 1949 and 1953, he led the nationalist Malayan Forum and conducted debates and discussions with fellow students from Singapore and Malaya on the future of Malaya. Through the Malayan Forum, Toh became friends with Goh Keng Swee and together they took up the political cause. The Malayan Forum succeeded in bringing together the various players who would figure prominently in Singapore politics, and was instrumental in involving Lee Kuan Yew in union politics and the formation of the Council for Joint Action. Although Toh was still studying in Britain at the time, he kept in touch with the Malayan Forum members who had returned to Singapore and met in the "basement" of Lee Kuan Yew's house. Knowing very well that his friends were under the constant surveillance of the "Special Branch" (the precursor to the modern Internal Security Department) and at risk of being detained without trial, Toh suggested (on his return to Singapore) the formation of an open and legal political party so as to throw their nationalistic fervour into action. Thus, the People's Action Party (PAP) was formed with Toh as the party chairman.

In his role, he steered the PAP through its internal struggles between the leftist supporters and the rightist supporters. However, he was unable to prevent the so-called communists from taking over the Central Executive Committee (CEC). So, for a short while, Toh, Goh Keng Swee and Lee Kuan Yew lost control over the party. It was at the party's Annual Congress that the sight of the motley crew of assembled people led Toh to propose to Lee that the party adopt a cadre system to minimize the opportunities for ordinary members to overthrow the CEC. The chance to implement the cadre system within the party presented itself when then Chief Minister Lim Yew Hock detained so-called communist sympathizers. This freed the way for Goh and Lee to take over the party and implement the cadre system which the PAP still helms today.

Now that he and Lee were in control of the party, they were able to oversee the PAP's organization and policymaking. Under Toh's and Lee's joint leadership, the PAP did fairly well in the 1959 general election, with the former successfully elected as the legislative assemblyman for the Rochore constituency. However, the PAP electoral victory in 1959 did not automatically mean the ascendancy of the PAP secretary general Lee Kuan Yew as prime minister. The PAP's CEC voted between Lee Kuan Yew and Ong Eng Guan as prime minister, but reached a deadlock from an even vote. It was up to Toh to cast the tiebreaking vote and he came out in favour of Lee. This then marked the beginning of the new Lee Kuan Yew era of Singapore politics. Under Lee, Toh led a committee to design the state crest, state anthem, and state flag, all of which were unveiled on 3 December 1959 at the City Hall and became the national flag and national anthem when Singapore gained independence in 1965. Toh was then appointed the deputy prime minister. He relinquished the post in 1968 and became the minister for science and technology till 1975 when he was appointed the minister of health. He stepped down from the post in 1981 and became a backbencher famed for his outspoken criticisms on various government policies, such as the Medisave Scheme and the age limit on CPF withdrawal. In appreciation of his twenty-nine years of service as Member of Parliament for Rochore, the Toh Chin Chye Benevolent Fund for the elderly was set up by the Rochore Citizens Consultative Committee.

As an extension of his interests in shaping and developing Singapore, Toh served as chairman of Singapore Polytechnic and vice-chancellor of the University of Singapore where he established the faculties of Engineering and Architecture and introduced professional courses, such as business administration and accountancy to bolster Singapore's industrialization efforts. He prompted the move of the university from Bukit Timah to Kent Ridge, and initiated the setting up of the National University Hospital. However, there were claims that Toh was an autocrat with his clampdown on student protests and his single-minded focus on using the university to further the national goals of economic development. Still, he achieved the goals of reforming the university and it cannot be denied that Toh contributed significantly to tertiary education by ensuring that universities in Singapore would be geared towards enhancing Singapore's economic growth.

He retired from politics in 1988 to pave the way for the younger generation to lead Singapore. At his retirement, he issued a strangely prophetic parting shot at the youth of Singapore whom he accurately claimed lacked "soul", "spirit", creativity, and idealism, and reflected on what this would bode for Singapore. In a 1997 Radio Corporation of Singapore address to youth in the country, Toh said:

> I would say the generation of the '50s and '60s took the plunge into politics without ever calculating the costs of the risk and the benefits to be gained. They were driven by ideology. Today's generation has no culture and [is] averse to taking political risk. Really, an interest in politics is very necessary for the future. But I cannot blame the present generations, because they see the heavy-handed response by the government to dissenting views, even though they know that these matters involve their daily lives.
> So the result is that we have produced a younger generation who are meek and therefore very calculating. They are less independent-thinking and lack in initiative. It does not bode well for the emergence of future leaders in politics and business. Robots and computers can be programmed or if you like, can be trained. But the trouble, of course, is that computers lack soul and what we need in Singapore is soul. Because it is soul that makes society.

This radio address neatly sums up both Toh's character and his contributions to Singapore. Beyond speaking of his subtle fears of young Singaporeans who want their future given to them rather than achieving it for themselves, it establishes Dr Toh Chin Chye as a passionate man who was driven to develop and build Singapore to that which it is today.

Toh died on 3 February 2012 in Singapore.

Tong Djoe

(唐裕, Tang Yu, 1926–)

Entrepreneur, Chinese community leader, art collector, Indonesia and Singapore

As a citizen of Indonesia and a permanent resident of Singapore, Tong Djoe's long and colorful career has spanned three nations (Indonesia, China, and Singapore) for more than half a century. These three countries have witnessed the coming and going of three foreign masters (Dutch, Japanese, and British). Since its independences, the new Indonesian nation-state has seen six presidents, with all of whom Tong has been personally acquainted. Tong can thus be regarded as a prototype of Chinese transnationalist whose experience has been fundamentally shaped by various cultural, political, and socio-economic currents in different geographical locations. He has also contributed importantly to the development of ethnic Chinese communities in Southeast Asia and of Sino-Indonesian relations.

Tong Djoe was born in September 1926 in Medan, Sumatra, into an immigrant family originating in the village of Penglai, Anxi County, Fujian (Hokkien) Province. His father was a small shopkeeper who had four children, Tong Djoe being the youngest. Tong Djoe went to a Chinese school in Singapore, enrolling in one of the schools catering primarily for pupils of the Fujianese dialect group. In 1943 he joined a small shipping firm (Chuan Ann) owned by his elder brother, Tong Lian Liang (1911–1967). During the anti-Dutch war, the Tongs supplied rice, military equipment, and medicines to the Indonesian Republican army and shipped rubber and coffee back from Sumatra to Singapore. In this process, Tong became acquainted with a number of key military and political leaders in Sumatra, among them A.K. Gani (1905–1968, Minister of Economic Affairs and Vice Prime Minister, 1946–1948) and Ibnu Sutowo (1914–2001) who would play a significant role in the evolution of Tong's business.

After Indonesia attained formal independence in 1949, the Tong brothers participated in the development of PELNI (the Indonesian National Shipping Company), at the invitation of Gani (who was one of the top leaders of the Indonesian Nationalist Party during the 1950s), Tong Djoe helped with the inter-island shipping and his brother took charge of shipping between Indonesia and Singapore. In 1953 Tong Djoe formed his own shipping firm, Naga Laut. After the late 1950s, through his long-time relationship with Sutowo who was developing the Indonesian State Oil Company (Pertamina), Tong Djoe served as Pertamina's overseas representative and agent in Singapore and Hong Kong, taking charge of the shipping of crude oil from Indonesia to Singapore for refining and selling in the overseas market. According to Richard Robison's Indonesia: The Rise of Capital (1986), Sutowo built the "largest private indigenous business group in Indonesia" between 1967 and 1976 when he was President-Director of Pertamina, and Tong was one of his two key Chinese partners. In 1961, Tong Djoe established the Tunas Company with its headquarters in Singapore. His 28-story office tower, the highest in Singapore at the time, was the first office building outside of Indonesia which was privately owned by an Indonesian national. It also represented a high point for the Tunas Group, which had business spread over Indonesia, Singapore, and Hong Kong, in such areas as shipping, import-export, and tourism. According to the Indonesian magazine Matahari, together with Liem Sioe Liong, Ciputra, Bob Hassan, and Sofyan Wanandi, Tong Djoe was named as one of the 17 Chinese business leaders in Indonesia.

Apart from being economically successful, Tong Djoe was a key individual who worked behind the scene in an attempt to reestablish Sino-Indonesian direct trade and diplomatic relations in the 1980s. In recognition of his endeavor and extensive involvement in the nation's socio-economic development, the Indonesian government awarded him the prestigious Bintang Jasa Pratama Medal in August 1998.

Tong Djoe has been actively participating in Chinese community activities in Singapore and elsewhere. He was the Chairman of Anxi Clan Association between 1977 and 1998. Founded in 1926, the Association represents those Chinese originating from the county of Anxi. Tong was the Chairman of two prominent trade associations: the Singapore Overseas Chinese Importer-Exporter Association, the most important business association for merchants concerned with Singapore-Indonesian trade, and the Singapore Shipping Association, which was founded in 1953 representing the interests of ship owners in Singapore. He was also a key member for an extended period of time in a number of major Chinese associations such as the Fujian (Hokkien) Association and the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry (SCCCI).

Tong Djoe has been an art collector and a patron for a number of educational institutions, such as Singapore Maris Stella High School, the Chinese Industrial and Commercial Supplementary School, and the Thong Chai Medical Institution. His support for education won him a Medal of Long-term Service to Education awarded by the Singapore government in 1997. Tong has been chairman of Goh Loo Club (founded in 1909), executive member of the Lu Tiok Culk (founded in 1938), Singapore Chinese Weekly Entertainment Club (founded early 20th century), and the Eo Hoe Hean Club (founded in 1895).

After China's reform and opening in the late 1970s, Tong Djoe had entered the Chinese market. Through his Hong Kong-based Solid Resource Company, he invested heavily in China, especially Xiamen, a booming coastal city close to his hometown Anxi. According to Indonesian and Japanese journalist accounts, the China projects in which Tong Djoe participated were worth billions of dollars and his net assets were estimated at more than US$500 million.

Because of his extensive involvement in the process leading to the resumption of Sino-Indonesian trade and diplomatic ties throughout the 1980s, and his business investment in China, Tong Djoe has built up an impressive array of personal ties with the PRC national leaders. In May 1998 Tong was invited to serve on the China National Association for Overseas Liaisons, whose members include prominent national and international social and economic players. He was the Director-in-General of the International Confucian Society between 1999 and 2009, which was established by some senior and retired Chinese politicians in Beijing in 1994 with the aim of studying and promoting Confucianism.

Tong Djoe has attributed his success to his upbringing (growing up in an extended Chinese family and attending Chinese schools which placed a great deal of emphasis on the moral teachings of Chinese traditional values) and his capacity for working closely with various types of people from a variety of ethnic, national, and cultural backgrounds. Central to his perceptions has been the fundamental importance of human relations (guanxi). In his view, "money can run out one day, but human relations will not. Therefore, we have to treasure relationship (guanxi)." Speaking in the First Asian Economic Experts Conference held in Tokyo in 1996, he declared, "Asians are particularly concerned about the promotion of cordial relationship between people." In a letter to a former vice prime minister of China (dated 10 October 1997), Tong states, "Because of the advance of science and technology, the world has shrunk and human interactions have significantly increased, we should rely more on Confucianism to maintain harmonious and friendly relations."

It would be misleading to attribute Tong's success solely to culture which, nevertheless, provides a foundation for his transnational networking practices that mobilized resources effectively in family, kinship, social, business and political connections. It is through this process of transnational linkages that Tong Djoe has made important contributions to the social, economic and cultural developments of the Chinese communities in Southeast Asia and to the improvement in Sino-Indonesian relation.

Tong, Stephen

(唐崇荣, Tang Chongrong, 1940–)
Reformed evangelist, Indonesia

Stephen Tong is one of the most influential figures among the Chinese-speaking ethnic Chinese Christian communities in Indonesia. His Gereja Reformed Injili Indonesia (GRII, or Reformed Evangelical Church of Indonesia) churches are found in a number of predominantly Chinese neighbourhoods in Jakarta and other big cities in Java and Sumatra. In some de facto "ethnic Chinese only" residential areas, the sermons are often conducted in Mandarin and translated into Bahasa Indonesia. In fact his GRII church branches even extend beyond major cities in Indonesia — there are GRII churches in Singapore, Germany, Australia, America, Malaysia, Taiwan, China and Switzerland, mainly serving the Indonesian diaspora and students.

Tong was born in 1940 on Gulangyu (鼓浪屿) island of Fujian, China, to a Chinese-Indonesian mother and a Chinese father. Gulangyu had been a foreign (western) enclave since 1842, and was therefore heavily influenced by aspects of western cultures, including Christianity.

When Tong's mother was widowed at the age of thirty-two, she had seven siblings to raise besides her son and encountered a lot of hardships. In 1947, she went back to Indonesia with her siblings and son. The family continued to experience great economic hardships in the following years. Following the 1949 revolution in China, evangelism — regarded as a form of foreign (western) intervention in China's domestic affairs — was prohibited. A number of prominent Chinese evangelists fled China and focused instead on preaching evangelism among ethnic Chinese in the world outside, especially to the Chinese in newly independent and turmoil-stricken Southeast Asian countries, and the newly arrived Chinese migrants in North America. Both groups belonged to a generation of ethnic Chinese caught in a dilemma resulting from socio-cultural marginalization and were therefore in need of spiritual and cultural strength. They found the answer to this, among other things, in ethnic Chinese Christian churches founded and led by Chinese evangelists. A prominent protégé of these ethnic-Chinese-focused and transnational evangelists is Stephen Tong.

By his own confession, Tong decided to dedicate his life to evangelism in 1957 at the age of seventeen, after listening to a sermon by Andrew Gih (计志文) at a youth conference.

What followed during the 1960s and early 1970s is little known. Internationally, those were the years of ideological confrontations and cultural radicalism, which also witnessed a revolt against traditions and authorities. In 1974 the International Congress on World Evangelization was held in Lausanne, Switzerland, organized by a committee headed by Reverend Billy Graham of the United States. Responding to the theme, "Let The Earth Hear His Voice", Christian leaders participated in plenary sessions, bible studies, as well as discussions and debates over the theology, strategies, and methods of evangelism. The gathering produced The Lausanne Covenant, a declaration that was "intended to define the necessity, responsibilities, and goals of spreading the Gospel". Since 1974 the Lausanne Covenant has challenged Christians to work together to make Jesus Christ known throughout the world.

According to Tong, about sixty ethnic Chinese evangelists all over the world attended the Lausanne Congress and were greatly inspired. Two years later in 1976, the first Chinese Congress on World Evangelization (世界华人福音会议) was held in Hong Kong. Consequently an organization to promote evangelism among ethnic Chinese worldwide, the Chinese Coordination Centre of World Evangelism (CCCOWE; 世界华人福音事工联络中心), was established with its headquarters in Hong Kong. According to the statement posted on the organization's website, "ethnic Chinese churches are facing a historical challenge today; it is our obligation to spread God's message to Chinese brethren worldwide, especially our 800 million brethren in China Mainland…". The statement thus marked the beginning of a new era for a worldwide evangelical movement for ethnic Chinese.

According to testimonies posted on the church's website, Tong served as guest lecturer at the China Graduate School of Theology in Hong Kong in 1975 and 1979; at the China Evangelical Seminary in Taiwan (1976); and at the Trinity College in Singapore (1980). It is safe, therefore, to assume that he had been involved in the establishment of this Hong Kong-based worldwide ethnic Chinese evangelical group mentioned. In 1979 he started his own worldwide evangelistic ministry — Stephen Tong Evangelistic Ministry International (STEMI). Since then he has been constantly involved in evangelical activities which are easily traceable on a number of websites related to ethnic Chinese churches. His national and international activities include serving as keynote speaker at the International Prayer Assembly in Seoul (1985); setting up the Indonesian Evangelical Reformed Foundation (1986); founding the Evangelical Reformed Seminary (STRI) in Surabaya (1986); and two other branches (Jakarta 1987 and Malang 1990); establishing the Indonesian Evangelical Reformed Church (GRII or Gereja Injili Indonesia, 1991) and the Evangelical Reformed Theological Seminary in Indonesia (1996), and setting up the Reformed Institute for Christianity in 21st Century in Washington D.C. (1996) to equip Christians for global evangelization.

In September 2008 the construction of a massive church called the Reformed Millennium Cathedral that seats 8,000 and houses a seminary (Reformed Institute), a museum and a school, was completed by Tong and opened in the ethnic Chinese-dominated residential area in Central Jakarta. The "megachurch" phenomenon has been growing in the United States and South Korea since the 1980s. To judge from Tong's activities and interactions with Christian groups in these two countries since the 1980s, his idea of building a church in Indonesia may have been borrowed from foreign church authorities, in accordance with the mainstream evangelistic trend in contemporary international Christian communities. Tong reportedly conceived the idea of constructing his church in 1992 and it took him sixteen years to see it to fruition.

Tong stresses the idea of being "Reformed" in Christian theology. Historically the term "Reformed" in the Christian world refers to the protest movement against the Roman Catholic Church in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Tong's Reformed Evangelical Church is the antithesis to two phenomena in Christian churches since the late twentieth century, namely, the charismatic movement and the rise of secularism. The former, blended with the prosperity theology, helps to expand its share in the global religious market and is enthusiastically welcomed by the mass of merrymaking church attendees, while the latter saw the rise of communities with higher educational background taking a critical stance on religious matters. Both groups share the trait of neglecting the Bible.

These two groups have been the focus of Tong's "Reformed theology": One is blamed for not taking an intellectual approach to understanding the Bible, while the other is being chastised for regarding the Bible as obsolete. Secularism in the form of religious pragmatism and rationalism may be regarded as the consequence of developments in the twentieth century, which Tong is still fiercely trying to counteract by means of the Bible.

In recognition to Tong's life work in Christian ministries, the Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia — a prestigious bulwark of the Reformed faith — awarded him an Honorary Doctorate of Divinity in 2008 and established the Stephen Tong Chair of Reformed Theology in 2011.

Too Joon Hing

(朱运兴, Zhu Yunxing, 1911–2002)

Politician, community leader, Malaysia

Too Joon Hing was a key leader of the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) and the Alliance party in the early years. He was also Tunku Abdul Rahman's first assistant education minister. He later left MCA due to disagreement with party leader and was considered a man driven by principles and not personal interest.

Too was a second-generation immigrant of Hainanese origin, whose father, Too Jee Lim, had come to Malaya to work as a tailor apprentice and eventually made himself a mining tycoon. Too Joon Hing was born in Ipoh, the capital of the sultanate of Perak on 17 September 1911. He was bilingually educated, having been given traditional Chinese tuition at a tender age and later attending the Meng Teck (明德) Primary School for four years. After that, he went to the Anglo-Chinese School to complete his primary and secondary education before continuing his education in business management at the Hong Kong University in 1932. He returned to Malaya without completing his degree.

After his father's demise in 1944, Too soon became a renowned community leader in Perak. During the Emergency Rule from 1949 to 1954, he was appointed by the British colonial government as the auxiliary police inspector overseeing the auxiliary police units in Ipoh, Taiping, and Telok Anson. After joining the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA), Too represented the Alliance Party — a coalition of the United Malays National Organisation (UMNO), the MCA, and the Malayan Indian Congress (MIC) — to win the councillor seat for the Silibin ward in Ipoh, his first elected office in August 1954. By September he was appointed a member of the Alliance National Council and one of the leaders drafting the election platform, "The Road to Independence". In 1955 he went on to win the Kinta Selatan Parliamentary seat with an 83 per cent landslide victory and was appointed assistant education minister in the Tunku Abdul Rahman's home rule government that would lead Malaya to independence two years later.

In his capacity as a cabinet member, Too, accompanied by acting Police Commissioner, I.S. Wylie, was the Tunku's messenger in the preliminary discussions with Malayan Communist Party (MCP) representative Chen Tien, which paved way for the Baling Meeting between the Tunku and CPM leader Chin Peng in December 1955. The meeting broke down as the Tunku refused to recognize the legality of MCP, and MCP refused to surrender, which prolonged the communist insurgency that was to end officially only forty-four years later.

While the Alliance government gained ground in containing the communist insurgency, the power struggles within the MCA and between the MCA and UMNO also got more intense, and Too played a key role in these also. He was elected the party's secretary general in 1956 and in the 1958 party elections, his ally, Lim Chong Eu, defeated party founder Tan Cheng Lock while Too retained his secretary general position. The "Young Turks", under the leadership of Lim, wanted to align the MCA closer to the Chinese-speaking grass roots, which were being wooed by a few newly emerged opposition parties. The new leadership was, however, sidelined by Prime Minister cum Alliance President Tunku Abdul Rahman and deprived political resources to maintain their following. Neither Lim nor any of his other allies was made a minister while Too had already lost his assistant ministership in the cabinet reshuffle in late 1957. In contrast, despite losing party elections, Lim's opponents such as Tan Siew Sin (son of Tan Cheng Lock) and T.H. Tan were respectively retained as minister of commerce and industry, and appointed the secretary general of the Alliance Party.

The showdown of UMNO and the MCA came in July 1959 when the MCA demanded to contest for a minimum of thirty-five seats in the 104-seat parliament to have a veto over constitutional amendments, and also explicit protection of Chinese education in the Alliance's manifesto. The Tunku rejected both demands and threatened to break up with the MCA. With a 89 to 80 vote, the MCA General Committee decided to back down and accept an allocation of thirty-one seats, with candidates being chosen by the Tunku and not the party. While the disempowered Lim resigned soon after the 1959 elections and left the party in 1960, Too and another Young Turk, Yong Pung How, immediately quit the party in protest.

Too contested for the Sitiawan parliamentary seat in Perak as an independent candidate in the 1959 elections, but lost. Two years later, again as an independent, he returned to the parliament after winning the by-election in Telok Anson, Perak. His main campaign issue was the Abdul Rahman Talib Report 1960, tabled by Education Minister Abdul Rahman Talib, which took an approach of gradual assimilation to Malaysia's multistream education system. Too was supported by Lim Chong Eu as well as an opposition party, the People's Progressive Party (PPP). In 1962 Lim and Too formed the United Democratic Party (UDP), principally to challenge the Alliance's education policy and speak for the non-Malays. The party, however, did not gain much traction and Too himself failed to win the by-election of a state seat within his parliamentary constituency in 1963.

Lim formed a new multi-ethnic party, GERAKAN, in 1968, but Too, who had moved apart ideologically, did not join this. By 1974, UMNO officially expanded the Alliance into the Barisan Nasional/National Front (BN) to include most opposition parties, including GERAKAN. According to Too, Lim invited him to join GERAKAN and run in the 1974 elections. Claiming dissatisfaction with Lim's efforts in fighting for Chinese education and the rights of the non-Malays in the later years, Too turned down the offer. Instead, he contested the Sungai Besi parliamentary seat in Kuala Lumpur as an independent candidate. He retired from public life after losing this last electoral battle of his life.

In 1990, when Lim Chong Eu lost his parliamentary seat to parliamentary opposition leader Lim Kit Siang, Too urged his former comrade to retire and did not mince his words in criticizing him for being hypocritical and inconsistent. This speaks volume of what defined Too's politics.

Often upheld as the only principled frontbencher the MCA has ever had, Too was well respected in the Chinese education movement and by the Chinese community at large. As assistant education minister, he truly helped the Chinese schools and won the trust and support of Lim Lian Geok, the then revered chairman of United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia (UCSTAM). He strongly condemned the Rahman Talib Report 1960 and the subsequent Education Act 1961. Section 21(2) of the act allowed the minister to convert Chinese- and Tamil-media national-type schools to Malay-medium national schools when he sees fit.

In the Telok Anson by-election in May 1961, Too's former MCA colleagues accused him of hypocrisy as he had supported the Razak Report 1956, tabled by Talib's predecessor and later second Prime Minister Abdul Razak. His detractors argued that the Razak Report too had the ultimate objective of "bringing together the children of all races under a national educational system in which the national language is the main medium of instruction". Lim Lian Geok came to his defence, explaining the difference between the two reports, and pointing out the Razak Report did affirm the maintenance of, and assistance to, the linguistic and cultural developments of non-Malays. Lim Lian Geok, a naturalized citizen born in China, had his citizenship revoked in August 1961 for maliciously distorting the government's education policy. Too who believed Lim's defence of him in the by-election was what triggered the revocation of Lim's citizenship testified for Lim's loyalty to the country in the latter's suit against the government's action, but Lim eventually lost. In 2004, Too was conferred posthumously the Lim Lian Geok Spirit Award by the LLG Cultural Development Centre (林连玉基金), a body established in commemoration of Lim.

Following in his father's footsteps, Too was active as a Hainanese community leader. From 1946 to 1974, he chaired the Persatuan Keng Chew Perak (now Persatuan Hainan Perak), which his father had helped found in 1911. He went on to lead the Federation of Hainan Association Malaysia from 1957 to 1963, and from 1969 to 1973. Under his leadership, the federation offered scholarships to support Hainanese students pursuing university education, the first of its kind for the dialect and clan associations in Malaysia. He also chaired the Perak Coffee Shop Keepers Association from 1946 to 1974.

Too was married to Foo Yoke Ying (1912–2007), and they had three sons and a daughter. He took Loh Wai Lan (born in 1920) as his second wife in 1941 (without divorcing Foo) and with her he had a daughter.

He died on 26 May 2002.

Trần Chí Kiên

(Ba Sưỡi, 陈志坚, Chen Zhijian, 1951–)
Political leader, Vietnam

Trần Chí Kiên was chairman of the People's Committee of the then district of Hà Tiên (河仙县) in the south-western Kiên Giang province (坚江省) of Vietnam, from 1988 to 1994. His career has spanned approximately four decades: he first worked for the revolution, the military, and finally, for the administration and development of Hà Tiên. While working in the People's Committee of Hà Tiên district, he contributed to the infrastructural development of Hà Tiên. Administratively, Hà Tiên became a town in 1998. It has approximately 40, 000 inhabitants living on its land area of 88.51 square kilometres. Its western side borders Cambodia and a border crossing connects it to Kampot in Cambodia.

Kiên used to be widely called by his nickname, Ba Sụi, in his community. Ba is the central and southern Vietnamese address for "father", or the affectionate and deferential term for an elderly man; and sụi means "to be limping in the legs". However, Kiên replaced the second syllable in his nickname sụi with sưỡi, a word which is adopted merely for its phonetic harmony.

Ba Sưỡi's great-grandfather of Chaozhou origins first migrated to Cambodia from China and married a Khmer woman. Ba Sưỡi's grandfather had two wives: the first was a Vietnamese born in Hà Tiên, and the second, a Khmer, born on the Cambodia-Vietnamese border. Ba Sưỡi's father was born in Lộc Sơn in the Cambodia-Vietnamese border region. His mother is an offspring of a Sino (Chaozhou)-Khmer and Vietnamese mixed marriage. She was born in Thạch Động hamlet (Ấp Thạch Động), Xã Mỹ Đức, located in the rural town of Hà Tiên, where she later gave birth to Ba Sưới. Mỹ Đức village lies three kilometers from the centre of Hà Tiên, on the route leading to the south-western Cambodian-Vietnamese border.

Ba Sưới grew up in a multilingual environment which was favourable for him to acquire the Chinese Chaozhou (Teochew) dialect, Vietnamese, and Khmer. He is still fluent in Teochew despite being a fourth-generation descendant. His wife, Trương Thị Nữ (张氏女), also of Chaozhou ancestral origins, is a proficient Chaozhou-speaker like him. She was born in Lộc Sơn, the same birthplace of Ba Sưới's father, in Cambodia at the time.

Ba Sưới began his primary education at the Chinese school, Trường Hữu Đức (有得学校), which existed then in Hà Tiên. The school was operated by the Chaozhou (Teochew) bang, which was and still is the dominant Hoa dialect-group congregation in Hà Tiên. After his first year of school, he went to Cambodia with his aunt, where he studied for two more years at a Chinese school before continuing his education at a Cambodian school. At the age of fifteen, he started working as a waiter, but in 1970, fled Cambodia during the coup led by General Lon Nol against the then head of state, Prince Norodom Sihanouk. One of the causes of the coup was Sihanouk's tolerance of the activities of northern Vietnamese within Cambodia's borders, which the general opposed. It then became risky for people of Vietnamese descent — of whom Ba Sưới is one — to stay on; he then decided to flee to Vietnam.

When Ba Sưới returned to settle down in a hamlet in Kiên Lương, he was surrounded by revolutionaries since the Vietnamese communists (Việt Cộng) were particularly strong in infiltrating the rural areas of Vietnam. He joined them and successfully recruited young villagers, many of whom ended up joining the provincial military. He recalled begging for rice and not having a salary. Such circumstances explain why his first son was born after peace finally arrived in 1977, after the unification of his country when he earned the means to raise a family.

Ba Sưới first entered the provincial army in 1970 and stayed there till 1979. In 1971, while fighting the Americans, his right foot stepped on a mine in a mountain called Núi Tà Pang in Mũi Nai district. The following year, he failed to escape a bomb that was thrown in the direction of the cave where he had been hiding for three days. That accident injured his left leg. All in all, he spent five years in the war, trying to drive out the Americans.

In 1982 he began working at a trading cooperative which dealt in material supplies called Công ty Vật tư Nhà nước. One year later, he was with the General Supplies Company of Hà Tiên, Công ty Vật tư Tổng hợp, also a state company. He was promoted to chief of the Chamber of Commerce of Hà Tiên in 1984, and the following year, had another promotion to deputy-chairman of the People's Committee of Hà Tiên — a post which he assumed until 1988. From 1988 to 1994, he served as chairman of the People's Committee of the district of Hà Tiên. During his incumbency, he proposed and saw to completion the extension works of the electricity transmission line that runs from Ba Hòn hamlet in Bình An ward, Kiên Lương district, to Hà Tiên. He also proposed similar extension works for land accessibility that would connect Hà Tiên to its outer areas.

Ba Sưới's role gave him the chance to work with the current prime minister of Vietnam, Nguyễn Tấn Dũng, who from late 1981 became involved in the political activities of the Vietnam Communist Party. Nguyễn Tấn Dũng was secretary of the District Party Committee of Hà Tiên from 1985–88. He held a pragmatic vision to develop Hà Tiên in trade and commerce as a way to increase its municipal revenue when investment interest there was absent.

Ba Sưới retired from the People's Committee in August 2010 owing to his kidney problem. He currently plays an informal advisory role and joins the monthly meetings of veteran soldiers in Hà Tiên, as well as the meetings of the Society for the Elderly. He further serves at the party branch of the settlement area (Chi Bộ Ấp), where he now resides, and participates in the economic, social, and security activities of the organization.

Ba Sưới has two sons and two daughters, all of whom are professionals, working variouly in the tax department, investment bank, hospital, and water supply department of Hà Tiên. He also has two paternal grandchildren and one maternal grandchild.

Trần Đông Sanh

(陈东生, Chen Dongsheng, 1920–)
Community leader, Vietnam

Trần Đông Sanh has, over the years, managed and organized charity programmes, temple rituals and cultural activities, renovation projects, and miscellaneous matters of the Guangzhao Native-Place Association (广肇会馆) in the city of Can Tho (Cần Thơ 芹苴市) in southern Vietnam. Can Tho is located on the southern bank of the Hậu River, the largest distributary of the Mekong River. As chief of the association, Sanh was further responsible for the maintenance and management of the burial ground of the association. His role as community leader expanded after the late 1980s when Chinese shrines and native-place associations were reopened after nearly a decade of closure.

Like all native-place associations in Vietnam, the Guangzhao Native-Place Association of Can Tho strives to achieve financial independence as a religious and cultural entity. It also plays key roles in continuing and preserving the learning of Mandarin, and ensuring harmonious relations among its members. Although the association is Cantonese in origin, the Hoa (ethnic Chinese) of other such ancestral origins as Fujian (Hokkien), Teochew, and Hakka, and ethnic Vietnamese, also worship at the shrine of Tianhou (天后) — the goddess of heaven — which is the principal deity enshrined at the association.

In 1988, the Guangzhao Native-Place Association of Can Tho was given official recognition as a historical vestige of Vietnam. Its shrine was reopened and worshippers began to trickle in to pray to Tianhou and Guandi, the secondary deity. In 1992, the native-place association was revived and the clan committee leaders were elected to manage traditional rituals and festive celebrations such as the ritual of Yulan (盂兰节 Yulan Jie) — organized in the seventh month of the lunar calendar, "the festival of the ninth lunar month" simply called the Double-Nine Festival (重九 Chongjiu), and the birthday of Tianhou (天后诞 Tianhou Dan) — on the twenty-third day of the third lunar month.

When the area behind the association was nationalized after the country's unification in 1975, incense offerings from worshippers were saved over the years to purchase the space from the municipal government. In 2001, this was achieved and the association repossessed the area. It was Sanh's idea that the association became self-supporting and so suggested that the newly acquired space behind the shrine of the association be productively used to churn in revenue to support the operations of the association. The idea of a childcare centre (博爱幼儿园) was conceived as a result. In 2003, the childcare facility which had enrolled 100 ethnic Vietnamese and ethnic Chinese children was inaugurated, bringing in sufficient revenue for the association, and reducing its reliance on fluctuating incense offerings.

Sanh is currently one of thirteen administrative advisers who hold a seat in the thirteenth-term Committee of the Association for the Sponsorship of Chinese-Language Education of Can Tho (芹苴市华文补助会), commonly known as the "Chinese Language Centre". Such associations, which are managed by their individual committees, are found in cities and towns in the central and southern regions of Vietnam where ethnic Chinese reside. The committee decides on teaching schedules, fees, and matters relating to Chinese language classes. In the case of Can Tho City, the Chinese-language classes have, since November 2010, been incorporated into the school curriculum of Viet-Hoa Private School (see entry on Ngô Quốc Tuấn).

Sanh has been one of the key decision makers for the affairs of Guangzhao Association for a considerable period. For example, he supports the decision to elevate the building of the association by slightly over one metre from the current ground level. The building, which houses the shrine of Tianhou and Guandi, currently faces the Mekong River in the Ninh Kiều district of Can Tho and is vulnerable to floods caused by the high tides of the Mekong River during the monsoons. At the point of writing, elevation works of the shrine are already in progress. The construction work required meticulous planning and its hefty cost of 20 billion dong has to be funded by donors in the community of Can Tho and overseas. The flow of ritual offerings stopped for a period of time as the entire building had to be closed for the works.

Sanh was born in 1920 in Tianmen district (湖北天门县) of Hubei Province, China. He came to Can Tho at the age of three, after what he recalled as a long journey which required several transits via Hankou, Shanghai, and Hong Kong. Being a native of Hubei, he was a "minority" among the Chinese in Can Tho who mostly emigrated from Guangdong province in the southern region of China. A school which taught his vernacular did not exist so applying to a private school established by the Cantonese clan was his only avenue to get a formal education. His parents therefore sent him to Trường Mộ Hiền (慕贤学校), one of the schools operated by the Cantonese clan. The medium of instruction at the school was also Cantonese, thus, it was at school that Sanh acquired fluency in Cantonese — a skill which he has managed to preserve until now.

He has witnessed the economic, political, and social changes in Can Tho since he has lived there for the most part of his life, returning to China only once in 1947–48 for a year. His paternal uncle, his father's elder brother, was the first in his family to migrate to Can Tho. This uncle was a dentist and Sanh became his apprentice and later practised dentistry for sixty years at his family's private dental clinic. The clinic, Đức Sinh (德生牙医), was located at the corner of the street, only two houses away from the Guangzhao Association. It was one of the few dental clinics existing at the time in Can Tho. His father, Trần Bình An (陈平安), used to serve at the Guangzhao Association while also operating a shop selling daily provisions from a space adjacent to the clinic.

Sanh was elected for six consecutive terms from 1992 to 2009 as leader of the Guangzhao Native-Place Association. It was only in December 2009, after he relinquished his post on retirement, that the association re-elected a new chief, Quan Hằng Cao (关恒高), with ancestral origins in Nan Hai district (南海) of Guangdong province. The association has served as an informal meeting venue for the older generation of Hoa, regardless of their ancestral dialect groups. It further functions as a community place of worship which cuts across ethnic boundaries. Less significantly, it is also a community childcare centre. Good community relations have been forged by Sanh, as well as the leaders of the association — a role typically expected of leaders of ethnic communities in Vietnam.

Sanh has a son who lives in Vietnam, and a daughter who has migrated to Australia with her ethnic Vietnamese (kinh) husband. His wife, who has passed away, used to live in Australia with their daughter. He has since remarried a Vietnamese woman.

Triệu Quốc Hưng

(赵国兴, Zhao Guoxing, 1958–)
Business and community leader, Vietnam

Triệu Quốc Hưng has been called the entrepreneur with the most number of hotels in Hoi'an by the media. He owns four hotels and the construction of his fifth hotel in Hoi'an will begin in 2011. By offering a variety of choices in modern accommodation to tourists visiting the UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) landmark, he has made a mark in the hospitality and tourism sector of Vietnam. Undoubtedly he has contributed to supporting employment and the economic sustainability of Hoi'an through his investments. His total business provides stable jobs to more than 170 employees, of whom more than fifty are university graduates. His manager for guest relations is a Dutch who married a local woman in Hoi'an. Besides being an adventurous investor, Hưng gives back to society by making annual monetary contributions for the construction of homes for the homeless elderly of Hoi'an. Such charity homes are called căn nhà tình nghĩa (roughly corresponding to "homes of friendship"). Hưng also sits on the board of directors of his former school in Hoi'an, Trường Lễ Nghĩa (礼义学校), which currently functions as the Chinese Language Tuition Centre.

Triệu Quốc Hưng was born in 1958 in Phượng Minh Hương, now Phượng Minh An, of Hoi'an. His grandfather, Triệu Đức Tư (赵德思), had migrated to Hoi'an from Swatow (汕头), Guangdong province, China. He is a fourth-generation ethnic Chinese, the eldest son of a Teochew retailer in Chinese herbal medicine, Triệu Minh Hòa (赵明和) and his Cantonese wife, Lý Thế Phi (李世飞), both born in Hoi'an in 1834. The couple used to manage Hòa Sanh Đường (和生堂), the name of the Chinese medical herbal shop. The business has been passed down to Hưng's five siblings who reside in Hoi'an. He has another two younger brothers now living in Danang, the city just next to Hoi'an, and in Denver, in the United States. Being the eldest son, Hưng initially thought that he would take over his father's business. However an opportunity which emerged following the turnaround of the economy of Hoi'an in the early 1990s changed his career path.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth century, vessels plying between Japan, China and the Indian and European continents used to stop at Hoi'an, then a flourishing port. The port lost its competitive edge in berthing large steamships in the nineteenth century, but by then, it had already become a unique repository of local and foreign influences brought by traders. One of the legacies of trade with China are the classical Chinese houses of Chinese business families.

In 1992, Hưng bought one such ancient-styled houses which lined the street currently named Trần Phú from a Chinese family who left Hoi'an. He made the purchase decision after noticing a trickle of foreign tourists visiting Hoi'an and foresaw tourism potential in the sleepy town. Renovation works on the house were carried out and by December 1994, it was a motel exuding an ancient Chinese atmosphere and offering twelve rooms, called Vĩnh Hưng 1 (永兴客栈). The motel serves tourists who want to experience reposing in a Chinese-styled home, replete with an old well in its open rectangular court yard.

When Hoi'an was officially inscribed as an UNESCO heritage site in 1999, Hưng opened his second hotel on 23 November 1999. The two-star hotel occupies 1,000 square metres and has thirty-one rooms. Another two-star hotel with twenty-four rooms, Vĩnh Hưng 3, opened in December 1999. By 2003, when Hoi'an already had approximately fifty hotels catering to the different needs of tourists, he inaugurated his first resort hotel, Vĩnh Hưng Riverside Resort, in An Hội (Hoi'an). The hotel took fifteen months to complete, including substantial initial clearance of wild coniferous trees and taro proliferating on the site. The modern resort hotel is believed to have facilitated the construction of tarred streets and improved infrastructure in its vicinity in 2006. The customers of the Vĩnh Hưng's hotels come mainly from Australia and France, followed by Taiwan and Japan.

Hưng's wife, Nguyễn Thị Mỹ Lộc, is a year younger than him. He has designed a management succession plan relatively early in his life and given his hotel, Vĩnh Hưng 3, to his daughter, Triệu Hoàng Vy, currently thirty-two years old. She runs the hotel with her husband, Phạm Vũ Dũng, an ethnic Vietnamese, under their tourist services enterprise, Rose Travel. Hưng intends to present his son, Triệu Tăng Quang, with his fifth hotel at Ngọc Thành, Cẩm Phô, which will be built on a piece of leased land measuring 5,000 square metres. The hotel will be three-star, offering sixty rooms. Triệu Tăng Quang, has taken courses in hospitality and tourism in Australia, Switzerland, and Singapore. He currently manages his own firm, Phú Khang, which organizes wedding banquets. Hưng's youngest daughter, Triệu Hoàng Ngân, is fifteen years of age and is currently studying in a secondary school in Melbourne, where her mother's sister lives. Ngân learns English and Japanese. Unlike Hưng, his wife and children do not speak Mandarin. Being a former student of Trường Lễ Nghĩa (礼义学校) in the old days, he supports the school in his role as its deputy director. He also contributes to the finances of the Chaozhou Native-Place Association in Hoi'an, where he is currently vice-headman.

Hưng enjoys innovating his hotel services. He has renovated his first hotel, Vĩnh Hưng 1, by installing traditional yet modern amenities in the rooms and toilets. For example, he has added a traditional wooden bath tub with marble inlay and has adopted the spa-concept in beautifying the atmospheric Vĩnh Hưng 1. Hưng has also added the "local market" bazaar as a programme for his guests at his Riverside Resort so they can experience the flavours of traditional Vietnamese food which is currently only available in local markets in Hoi'an.

Hưng does not seem to run out of ideas, but the principles which remain with him all these years in business are delivering services with trustworthiness of excellent quality, and with courtesy, at a competitive price. These principles have seen his business morph together with Hoi'an, from a small unknown place into a global tourist destination. He has no plans to cast his dreams overseas in business. He wants to see Hoi'an prosper further, and hopes that his children will remain in Hoi'an and grow their businesses there.

Trịnh Thủy Diêu

(郑水渺, Zheng Shuimiao, 1919–77)
Entrepreneur, community leader, philanthropist, Vietnam

Trịnh Thủy Diêu was a prominent businessman, industrialist, community leader, as well as philanthropist in South Vietnam. He was well known in Saigon (present-day Ho Chi Minh City) for his business achievements in steel production, and trade in hardware accessories, as well as his generosity in social contributions. While he worked diligently and enjoyed the fruit of his labour under the Government of South Vietnam, he met his fate after the fall of Saigon in 1975.

Diêu originally came from Jinmen county of Fujian province, China, where his family had lived for generations in Dadeng town. He was born in 1919 to a family who ran a grocery shop. They enjoyed a prosperous business and also a sound reputation for their kindness to others in their neighbourhood. Diêu was the third of five brothers in terms of age. His father and eldest and youngest brothers died while he was still young, leaving behind only his mother, his second brother, Trịnh Thủy Tuyền (郑水泉), and his fourth brother, Trịnh Côn Diệu (郑鲲躍).

He went to Saigon on his own at the age of eighteen in 1937, following the trend at the time when young men were encouraged to try their luck in Nanyang, the old common term — which literally means "the southern seas" — for Southeast Asia. When he reached Saigon, he found a job helping out in a countryman's shop. While working there, he seized the opportunity to learn how to manage a small business. After working for some time there, he started his own business.

His hometown in Dadeng was devastated soon after his arrival because of the political turmoil which eventually led to the Japanese occupation of China. His family then decided to flee Dadeng later in 1937 and migrated to Vietnam. When his two brothers arrived, he collaborated with them to start two new enterprises named "Hằng Thành" (恒成号) and "Hiệp Thành" (协成号) respectively. Their core business was trading in hardware and car accessories, which successfully expanded to other parts of Vietnam and Cambodia.

A misfortune struck in 1945 when his second elder brother, Trịnh Thủy Tuyền, was robbed and then murdered on a trip to collect business debt in the central region of Vietnam. His sudden death left Diêu with no choice, but to take over his managerial role quickly to lead and then develop the enterprise. He gradually managed to expand the company into a leading hardware company in Saigon and even became one of the rising stars in Saigon's Chinese community. Through diligence, he built a spectacular business and reputation.

After learning how to operate and manage a plant in 1968, Diêu established a steel melting plant named Việt Thành Steelworks (越城炼钢厂) to collect the heaps of scrap metal from the battlefields scattered around the southern region of Vietnam after the outbreak of the Vietnam War in 1959. The scrap metal collected was recycled to produce steel for construction sites. This steel then replaced imported steel, and helped to preserve foreign exchange for the Government of the Republic of Vietnam.

However Diêu had foreseen that scrap metal collected from battle grounds would eventually run out; therefore, to ensure a continuous supply, he decided to establish another steel production plant, Hoàn Thành Steelworks (环城炼钢厂). He hired the best technicians he could find and started importing iron ore from Malaysia for refining. He further planned simultaneous explorations of iron ore in the laterite soil zone of the central part of Vietnam and discovered a large deposit of high-quality iron ore and other rare metals, including a reserve of mica. What he set out to accomplish first was to refine the rare metals and then export them to the United States and Japan. Secondly, he developed his steelmaking equipment and began to mine the mica.

When Diêu started making his mark as a successful businessman in Saigon, he supported the Saigon Chinese community by pouring his wealth into education and other philanthropic works. His generous contributions to significant social projects were highly recognized by his community who regarded him as one of its key leaders. He managed his high-profile roles well in serving as director of Thành Chí Secondary School (城志中学), Phượng Sơn Temple (凤山寺), Biên Hòa Cemetery (边和公墓义地), the Fujian Congregation of Saigon (西贡福建中华理事会), and the Central Association of Zheng (Trịnh) Lineage (郑氏宗亲总会). He was one of the founders of the Phúc Thiện Hospital (福善医院), and thus also held its chairman post.

The fighting following the beginning of the Vietnam War climaxed during the Tết Offensive of 1968. When Saigon was attacked, refugees swarmed the hospitals in Saigon. The Phúc Thiện Hospital took in as many as 5,000 to 6,000 refugees, and food supply became the most important issue. Amidst the chaos, Diêu, then deputy chairman, ignored the risk of being hit by enemy gunfire and bombing and rushed to the hospital on learning that the food supply was almost running out. Together with then chairman Thái Chương (蔡章), Diêu appealed to rice traders to continue their supply of rice to the hospital as before, and managed to receive their positive cooperation. His reputation rose after his successful handling of the crisis, and in the hospital board election following the end of this critical period, he was elected its chairman.

Around the time of the Vietnam War, Diêu had already succeeded as a pioneer entrepreneur dealing with hardware and steelmaking. However, after the peace treaty was signed in 1973 to create a peaceful resolution for the conflict, the situation in South Vietnam began to deteriorate. As Diêu and his brother were prominent businessmen and the de facto leaders of the Saigon Chinese community, they risked being persecuted by the communists who overran Saigon in April 1975 and rolled out their socialist transformation policies that adversely affected ethnic Chinese businessmen. The newly united Vietnam Government accused Diêu and his younger brother of being "reactionary capitalists who exploited the labour", then took over their steel melting plants and hardware enterprises and nationalized them. Not only did this immediately end the brothers' livelihood, but they were also put under harsh interrogation during which they were alleged by the authorities to have hidden their other properties.

Diêu and his brother began to plan an escape on 4 August 1975, but they eventually failed. They were arrested and sent to the re-education camp to be "reformed". There, however, they were tortured. Due to malnutrition, Diêu's health suffered.

After being detained for almost a year, Diêu was given a conditional release through the help of his family and friends, but the release seemed too late. He died on 4 October 1977 from poor health at the age of fifty-eight.

Trương Hán Minh

(张汉明, Zhang Hanming, 1951–)
Artist, Vietnam

Trương Hán Minh is one of the best known Hoa artists in Chinese painting in the southern region of Vietnam using the Lingnan (Lĩnh Nam 岭南) style of painting — a style which originated in the Guangdong area and gained national visibility in the early twentieth century. The influence of Lương Thiếu Hàng (Liang Shaohang 梁少航), the artist's mentor, as well as those of the Lĩnh Nam (Lingnan) School, is very deep and significant in the learning journey of Minh. However, through an incorporation of styles from western landscape painting into traditional Chinese watercolour painting later in his career, he created a new style within the Lĩnh Nam School. The well-travelled and well-exhibited artist is active in the international art scene on Chinese watercolour painting and calligraphy. His works are often a symphony of the east and the west.

Minh was born on 11 December 1951 in Chợ Lớn, Saigon, which is now Ho Chi Minh City. His family initially lived in the region of Vườn Cải, literally meaning "cabbage garden", which is a rural area where the land was repossessed by the state and turned into the Dam Sen Cultural Park (Công viên Văn hóa Đầm Sen), an amusement park in District 11. The father of Minh was Trương Minh Bao, who came from Chaozhou (Triều Châu 潮州) in Guangdong province, China. Trương's mother, Vương Tú Liên, also came from Chaozhou. Both migrated to Vietnam in 1945.

The family depended on agriculture and husbandry for a living. Like in many ethnic Hoa (ethnic Chinese) families, Minh was taught how to do petty trading early in his life. While the mainstay of the family was in agriculture, engaging in petty trading supplemented the family's finances. Furthermore Minh was the only child just as his father was. As such, the burden of keeping the family's finances going fell squarely on his shoulders.

From young, Minh liked to draw and paint and appeared to have the talent for painting, contrary to qualities that his father had expected him to possess. Whenever Minh had free time, he would find pens or whatever he could use as a drawing instrument to draw. The subjects of his drawing were objects around the home and in the fields. He drew in secret and his passion has never died from the time he was a child. He attended Lao Động Primary School and often won prizes in art competitions organized at school. Despite his talent, his parents strongly objected to his spending effort and time in painting. To them, he had first to fulfil his academic duties, in particular, learning arithmetic, which they considered essential in business.

At seventeen, Minh stepped boldly into the art arena by gaining admission into the Oriental Fine Arts School of Chợ Lớn, but he never neglected his family responsibilities. He once described his situation as "holding a pen in one hand, and plants in another". Simultaneous to learning formal art, he took up a job weaving handicrafts.

Before 1975 the Oriental Fine Arts School of Chợ Lớn was a brewing pot of Chinese traditional arts and the school cultivated many talents in that field. In Ho Chi Minh City's world of art, famous names such as Lý Tùng Niên, Lương Trung Đạo, and Lý Trung Lương, were all graduates of the Oriental Fine Arts School.

After he joined this school, Minh went under the tutelage of Lương Thiếu Hàng. In Vietnam there remain only two other artists who are peers of Minh and who also studied under Lương Thiếu Hàng; the others have all migrated overseas. After four years at the Oriental Fine Arts School, an opportunity came for Minh to participate in an art exhibition in Malaysia where he received a letter of commendation for the exhibition.

Minh held his first solo exhibition in 1973 at the Nghĩa An Clan Association (Hội Quán Nghĩa An 义安会馆), Chợ Lớn. After graduating from school, he continued to spend time at the Vietnamese-American Association, where he learned about oil paintings and calligraphy, and also did research on light and colours in portraits. Thus, while the influences of the Lĩnh Nam School and of his teacher were apparent in his works, his artistic interests traverse traditional boundaries by incorporating western art techniques. He rapidly matured in his art to become his own teacher, but with the mantra from his mentor edged in his mind. His mentor had told him: "You'll survive if you learn from me, but you'll vanish if you follow me."

At nineteen, he was married according to the wishes of his parents and later had eight children — seven girls and one boy. Ironically, his big family helped him and his wife to overcome the economic difficulties that most encountered after North and South Vietnam unified in 1975. He then involved his family in the production of nylon bags, among other things. Thanks to his ability to conceive and draw, he was able to design machines for the production of the bags. Between 1979 and 1982, his family business located in District 11 was bustling with orders. Thus while other artists met with extreme economic difficulties, he was able to continue painting. As the economy and his business gradually improved, he left the business to his family, and moved the production facility out of their home in Minh Phụng Road to Tân Tạo Industrial Zone. Art finally found its place in the family home.

Minh's works have won wide popularity owing to their themes which reflect the daily lives of ordinary people. He once said: "Our work must win the hearts of the masses; if we are too abstract, the ordinary people will not appreciate that." The subjects of his painting are elements of traditional paintings such as chamomile, and cherry blossoms and orchids, but they are not limited by traditional painting techniques. His refusal to follow traditional techniques led him to innovate in his use of colours, and his style of presentation has also become reminiscent of the Impressionist School of the West. He enjoys the portrayal of real scenes and sets them in an optimistic mood that is usually identified with the aspirations of Easterners. Watercolour painting, which requires the interdependence of the different elements of brush, paint, colours, and shapes, has attained a sense of spirituality under his steady strokes.

From the 1980s, western arts such as the traditional oil painting of Vietnam, became the focus of his research. In 1989 he held a solo exhibition at the Association for the Arts of Ho Chi Minh City. It was an earth-shaking event in the municipal arts scene owing to the spectacular innovations of techniques and the attractive thematic blend of East and West that spoke of tradition and contemporariness. Since then, he has held at least two exhibitions every year with works that feature the scenery of the various regions of Vietnam, including a calligraphic piece in 2010, based on the historical edict to move the capital of King Lý Thái Tổ from Hoa Lư to Thăng Long (the present Hanoi) during the Lý dynasty. This work commemorated the 1,000th anniversary of the founding of Hanoi.

From the 1990s, he was able to make a living purely from his art. For the last few decades, he has been teaching in many schools, both domestically and overseas, besides working on his creations. He has been a visiting instructor in Australia, China, France, and the United States, in addition to visiting almost all the schools of fine arts in Vietnam, sometimes working as an examiner. In 1990 he opened his atelier called Trương Hán Minh Arts Garden (Trương Hán Minh Nghệ Uyển 张汉明艺苑), located at 422 Minh Phung Street, District 11, Ho Chi Minh City. He hopes to pass on his skills and his understanding of watercolour painting at his atelier.

Up to now, he has participated in fifty exhibitions, of which nineteen solo exhibitions were held in Vietnam and in such countries as Australia, China, Japan, Malaysia, South Korea, Taiwan, and the United States. His name, his work, and his career have travelled with him.

Tsai Ming-liang

(蔡明亮, Cai Mingliang, 1957–)

Playwright, television and film screenwriter, director, film producer, Malaysia

Heralded as one of the most important directors in the contemporary world films, Tsai Ming-liang has attained worldwide notoriety and won numerous festival awards, including Golden Lion at the 1994 Venice Film Festival. Although he has achieved a high reputation in Taiwan since the 1990s, he often claims he is still Malaysian despite belonging to neither Taiwan nor Malaysia.

Born in 1957 in Kuching, Tsai was the third child in his family. At the age of three, he was fostered by his maternal grandparents who took turns to bring him to the cinema every day. In 1972, Tsai studied in Kuching Chung Hua Middle School and started to contribute his literary works to newspapers. In addition, he established a modern drama troupe in 1974 and joined the Drama and Cinema Department of the Chinese Cultural University at Taiwan in 1978. In 1982, he directed his first modern play, Instant Bean Sauce Noodles as his graduation work. He continued to direct excellent modern plays with A Sealed Door in the Dark (1983) and A Wardrobe in the Room (1984). In these works, Tsai displayed his humourous skills in showcasing the themes of modern society; loneliness and craziness in urban life. In 1984, he was introduced by director Shau-Di Wang (王小棣) to write the scenarios for Windmill and Train and Little Fugitive, after that, he finished the scenario for Run Away (1984) with Hsiau Yeh (小野), Spring Daddy and Kung Fu Kids III (1985) with Julian Yu (于光中), the first part of Yellow Story (1987). Besides, he also directed children's play Pinocchio.

Afterwards Tsai was invited by producer Tang Wei (唐威) to finish the scenario for the twenty-five-part television serial Endless Love within two years and he then directed his famous telefilm All Corners of the World in 1989. In this period, he also directed a part of the television serial, The Happy Weaver. In 1990, Tsai planned the thirteen-telefilm series The Sky of Philistine, which he wrote and directed. Among the thirteen-telefilms are: My Name is Mary, Li Hsiang's Love Line, Ah-Hsiung's First Love, and Give Me a Home. Tsai won the "Best Director of Golden Melody" awards in 1991 for his Li Hsiang's Love Line, and Give Me a Home in 1992.

In 1991, While Tsai was directing the telefilm Youngsters, he met his on-screen alter ego Kang-sheng Lee (Hsiao-kang) at a video game arcade. After that, he never directed a feature film that did not feature Lee. In 1992, Hsu Li-Kong (徐立功) from Taiwan Central Motion Picture Corporation invited him to make films, and Tsai, using Lee's teenage experience, successfully directed Rebels of the Neon God in 1992. His good direction, which relied on long takes with silent scenes of the protagonist in contemplation, won him the Bronze Sakura Award at the Tokyo International Film Festival. Subsequently, Tsai started to train and teach actors in Central Motion Picture Corporation and directed the play, Apartment Romance. From the experience, Tsai directed his outstanding second film Vive L'Amour, and was awarded the Golden Lion and Fipresci Award at the 1994 Venice Film Festival, Best Director at the Nantes Film Festival, and Best Director and Best Film in the Golden Horse Awards. Tsai often annotates his style with static long takes, minimizing the characters, dialogue, and acted-out scenes.

In 1995, Tsai was a member of the jury at the Berlin International Film Festival and was involved in directing a documentary about Gay AIDS issue titled, My New Friend. He finished The River regarding a gay father searching for lovers in a darkened bathhouse, which inadvertently made overtures to his son, in 1997, and was honoured with the Silver Berlin Bear, Special Jury Prize, at the Berlin International Film Festival, and the Silver Hugo prize at the Chicago Film Festival. In 1998, with funding from Taiwan and France, he directed a Tsai-style musical film, The Hole in a 95-minute film version and a 60-minute televison version for France, using several 1930s Mandarin pop songs. The Hole was awarded the FIPRESCI Prize at the Cannes Film Festival. Furthermore, Tsai directed the play, Xiaokang and Desk and the choreographic adaptation of Betolt Brecht's The Good Women of Sezuan in Hong Kong. In November 1998, he withdrew from the Taipei Golden Horse Film Festival and went back to Malaysia to write the screenplays: The Wayward Cloud and I Don't Want to Sleep Alone.

In August 1999, Tsai established the Zen Theatrical Troupe in Kuching and acted as its art director. As a result,the troupe contributed plays such as That Night, The Story of Kuching, Who Has to Borrow The Palm-leaf Fan, Concern AIDS, and Red Egg Boy in Kuching.

In 2000, Tsai set up the Homegreen Film Company in Taipei. While Tsai was directing What Time Is It There? in 2001, he presented fragments of Quatre cents coups, Les (1959), in the film and invited the actor, Jean-Pierre Léaud, to make a cameo appearance in the film. He became the in school artist in one of France's universities and directed the children's programme of Taiwan Public Television, The Disappearance of Moon. Later, Tsai was invited to the Korean Film Festival to direct the DVD short film, A Conversation with God. In 2002, Tsai finished his outstanding short film, The Skywalk Is Gone.

Goodbye, Dragon Inn is Tsai's feature-length ode to cinema. It was selected to be the Taipei Golden Horse Film Festival's opening film in 2003. In addition, Tsai also directed the short film, Moonlight on the River. A film reviewer from the U.K. newspaper, The Guardian, voted Tsai the "Champion of Chinese Directors" and ranked him 18th among of the 40 Best Directors in the World". In 2004, Tsai finished The Wayward Cloud, which is a bizarre mix of alienation, pornography, and campy musical numbers. The film was given the Alfred Bauer Award and the Silver Bear for Outstanding Artistic Achievement at the 2005 Berlin International Film Festival. He was also honoured with "le Commandeur dans l'Ordre" of France. Tsai also directed a segment of the documentary Aquarium of Welcome to São Paulo, and the short film, My Stinking Kid with Kang-sheng Lee. The 42nd Gijón International Film Festival organized his Retrospective in Spain and he was invited to be a member of the jury of the International Locarno Film Festival in Switzerland.

Tsai returned to his native country in 2006 to shoot I Don't Want to Sleep Alone. The film is a beautifully reflective portrait of multicultural relationships and contemporary times. It was also his entry in the wonderful New Crowned Hope series of films, commissioned around the world in honour of Mozart's 250th anniversary. However, The Malaysian Censorship Board in March 2007 decided to ban I Don't Want to Sleep Alone, based on eighteen counts of incidents in the film deemed to depict the country "in a bad light" for cultural, ethical, and racial reasons. Later though, they allowed his film to be officially screened for the first time in Malaysia after he agreed to censor parts of the film.

After the Munich Film Muzium held a Tsai Ming-Liang Retrospective and screened twelve of his films in 2006, London also held a Tsai's Retrospective at the Taiwan Film Festival 2007. In his short film, It's a Dream to commemorate the sixtieth anniversary of the Cannes Film Festival, with thirty-three well known international directors in 2007, he invited his mother to eat some durian in a theatre in Kuala Lumpur for a wordless moment of contact between strangers. In 2009, Tsai directed part of the New Crowned Hope project titled, Salome, which was shot inside the Louvre in Paris. Besides that, the 15th Pusan International Film Festival awarded him the Asian Filmmaker of the Year award in 2009. He also directed short film Madame Butterfly which screened in University of Leeds, UK on a special event focusing on him. Leeds International Film Festival presented the Golden Owl Lifetime Achievement Award to Tsai. Last three years, Tsai branched out into the art world and reflects the relationship between memory, old furniture and space through video installations and arts. He had his installation art show "Moonlight on the river" exhibited at the Xue Xue Institute, Taipei. He also turned a boiler room in the Songshan Cultural and Creative Park in Taipei into a theater which titled "The Theater in the Boiler Room: Art Installation" in 2011.

The creative works of Tsai are a combination of literature, drama, art, and film artifices, which repeatedly use and create the same symbols and imagery. He subverts traditions continuously, combines real, the imaginary and the surreal, deconstructs external trueness, explores the darkness of inner life and origin, not only challenging his predecessors, but exceeding himself. At last, he has won the applause from the world.

Ty Eng Liong

(郑荣亮, Zheng Rongliang, 1934–2001)
Educator, Philippines

Ty Eng Liong believed that all children were capable of being trained and made into somebody worthwhile. Whenever students fell short of their teachers' expectations, Ty would remind the teachers to examine where they had been remiss in their responsibilities. He was the reason Iloilo City, particularly Iloilo Central Commercial High School, became very popular nationwide, with over 300 dormitory residents at its peak.

"If only every man could offer a little love, this world would become a beautiful dwelling place for mankind." This line, from a favourite song of Ty's says much about the man who lived a life for others, a life fulfilled because of those he touched. Ty may have died poor materially, but he was rich spiritually.

Born to Ty Ho Lim on 6 December 1934 in Manila, Ty Eng Liong was eighth in a family of nine boys. When World War II ended, he went back to China with his parents and had his education first at Feng Shan Elementary School and then at Hui An High School, both in Fujian, China.

He returned to the Philippines at age fifteen and lived with his seventh brother, Cheng Eng Kheng, who worked during the daytime to keep Eng Liong in school, while he himself went to night school. Eng Liong attended Chinese classes at the Philippine Chinese High School PCHS, (now Philippine Cultural College), and had his English classes at Hong Kuang School (now Philippine Jin Nan Institute). It was his student years at PCHS that his principles and uncompromising stance for truth and reason were formed.

Ty Eng Liong's ideals in life were also greatly influenced by his good friend, Marcos Chua, who advocated service to education. It was due to Chua's influence that right after his graduation in 1955, Ty volunteered to work as a teacher in far and remote places such as Daet and Legazpi in Southern Philippines. There he met and married Benita Chiu, the woman who shared his life's dreams and interests.

In 1958, Ty and Benita decided to render their service to Iloilo Chinese Commercial High School (now Iloilo Central Commercial High School). Aside from teaching biology and physics, he was also the dorm master and, later, the disciplinarian of the school, "There is never a problem student, only a problem teacher." Ty believed that all children were capable of being trained and made into somebody worthwhile. The school's dormitory was well recognized throughout the archipelago as a home to all who aspire to become useful individuals. Whenever students fell short of their teachers' expectations, Ty would remind the teachers to examine themselves, to see where they had been remiss in their responsibilities. He emphasized to them "to do everything for all the children".

Guided by love, Ty was an indulgent father to all dormitory students, yet strict and firm in his teachings. There were instances when he was physically hit by some wayward students. But he always embraced them back unconditionally with open arms, offering them another chance He showered his children — his students and boarders, with all the love he could give.

When Ty was diagnosed with cancer in 1991, he was unwilling to succumb to this dreadful monster and so started a marathon fight against this dreaded disease. Sensing that he did not have much time left, he insisted on continuing to work, so as to serve more people. According to him, "My life does not belong to me anymore. It belongs to everybody." This attitude helped prolong his life until he finally succumbed to the disease in 2001.

In the more than four decades of unwavering service to the Chinese-Filipino community, Ty received much recognition and many awards. In 1990 he was named one of the outstanding Chinese-language teachers by Cebu Anonymous "Intsik" Foundation. He was named an outstanding teacher by the Metrobank Foundation in 1993; and in 1999, was chosen by the Overseas Chinese Affairs Office of the State Council of the People's Republic of China as one of the outstanding overseas Chinese educators. In instances where cash prizes were given, he donated the proceeds to the Iloilo Central Commercial High School Faculty Welfare Fund.

Ty Eng Liong's impact on the Chinese-Filipino education sector was strong and varied. He served at the frontlines of education and did not step down even when he was seriously ill. Students, current and former, young and old, could approach him any time they needed help.

He led student summer camps to Beijing on several occasions to help expose children to the culture of their forefathers. He provided a Chinese-language environment to young people, making them aware of their rich cultural heritage. He advocated the love of both the Philippines and China, thus doing his share in promoting friendly relations between Filipinos and Chinese-Filipinos.

Most importantly, he encouraged his students to work as educators — a number of his students have followed in his footsteps and have served as Chinese-language teachers all over the Philippines. Even those who did not enter the teaching profession were encouraged to teach their fellow men in any way they can — be it through sharing their expertise in their fields, or passing on to their children what they had learned from their days with Ty.

Ty had no biological offspring, but the thousands of students whom he mentored were all his children — the primary source of his strength, especially in his struggle against illness. On his sixtieth birthday in 1994, the alumni of Iloilo Central Commercial High School prepared a grand celebration for him and launched a fund-raising activity to set up the Ty Eng Liong Educational Foundation.

Alumni from all over the country surged to Iloilo to witness the event. The sheer number of those present was unprecedented in the Chinese-Filipino community, especially when the person concerned was "just a humble teacher" and not a business tycoon. Ty was overwhelmed by the magnitude of response from his students. He took pride in having lived a life of a teacher even if it was less financially rewarding. The Ty Eng Liong Educational Foundation is now handled by his ever supportive students. Its mission is to continue the work of serving the Chinese-Filipino education sector.

On 4 February 2001, Ty died at the age of sixty-seven after ten years of struggling with cancer. His life was an exemplary one — and one laden with love. He loved his life, he loved his ideals, his vocation, his students, his children, his people, his country.

Ty, George S.K.

(郑少坚, Zheng Shaojian, 1933–)

Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Philippines

George Ty is the founder of Metropolitan Bank and Trust Company, the Philippine's premier universal bank and one of the country's foremost financial institutions. He is also a member of the board of trustees of Metrobank Foundation, one of the Philippines' most respected charitable institutions that is focused on social development activities. Ty is number nine in the Forbes forty richest men in the Philippines 2010 list, with a networth of US$805 million. He has donated a significant portion of his wealth to sociocivic works through his foundation.

Born on 5 September 1933, George Ty accompanied his father, Ty Chong Yong (郑崇仰), and mother, Ang Kha Chian (洪巧倩), to the Philippines. The former was from Yongchun and the latter from Nan'an in China. As soon as the small family arrived in the Philippines, Ty Chong Yong established the Wellington Flour Mills, a small-scale business with only a small capital. After much hard work and perseverance, the flour mill grew and, after a few years, became one of the biggest flour factories in the country. The young George was moulded from such a typical Chinese family — starting almost from scratch and gradually growing big.

Ty first studied in China, then at the Chiang Kai Shek High School (中正中学) in the Philippines, and eventually went to the University of Santo Tomas. Through the years, he helped his father in the flour mills, and learned hard work, perseverance, and struggles first hand. Mixing westernized management, which he learned at university, and traditional experiences, Ty helped increase the production of better quality flour. He was instrumental in the expansion of this business enterprise.

When Ty wanted to move on to other businesses, his father agreed to support him. He studied the market and quietly analysed needs and opportunities. In the 1960s the Philippines was still recovering from the devastation of war and starting to develop. Ty saw that the Philippine finance sector, especially the financial foundations for economic development, was still weak. As the country obtained soft financial packages with the support of the U.S. Government to stimulate economic activities, such as liberal importation and no restrictions on foreign exchange, Ty shrewdly saw an opportunity and used the new policy to get into the still undeveloped financial market. He began preparing to develop and establish his own bank to fill the gap for urgently needed capital and finance. With his father's support, Ty embarked on this remarkable endeavour. The elder Ty invested capital accumulated through his profits in the Wellington Flour Mills while the son borrowed money from friends and relatives until he accumulated several tens of millions of pesos, enough to open a bank. He then went to each alley and street of Manila to look for the best address for the bank to carry out his new enterprise and plans. He continued to self-learn about banking and the financial market in the Philippines while awaiting the government's permit to open the bank. In 1962 the twenty-nine year old Ty, with the support of his father, inaugurated the Metropolitan Bank and Trust Company in Manila, thus realizing his vision finally.

After not even ten years in the business, Metrobank established its first foreign branch in Taipei in 1970, making it one of the earliest foreign banks in Taiwan. In 1992 the Kaoshiung branch was opened. After the branch opening in Taipei, branches in Hong Kong, Japan, and Guam soon opened. In 1975, Ty bought the California International Bank and made it a branch of Metrobank in Los Angeles in 1977. A branch in Canada soon followed. Fifteen years after the first bank in Manila opened, Metrobank had one hundred branches.

By the 1980s, Ty had begun to diversify his holdings and went into textile, flour, plastic, electronics, real estate, tourism, and insurance. Partnering businessman Henry Sy, he developed upscale real estate and condominium buildings. Ty also established, The First Metro Investment Company in Hong Kong and, in 1985, the Unibankcard Corp. Other subsidiaries of the Metrobank Group followed — Thomas Cook Phil Inc., a travel agency, Philippine Life Insurance, Philippine Chartered Insurance, Philippine Savings Bank. In 1988 Ty partnered Toyota Japan to produce cars in the Philippines. In the 1990s, Metrobank outpaced its rival biggest private bank to become the country's biggest in terms of capital, assets, and deposits.

The opening of Metrobank China in April 2010 marked the start of its venture in China. It was the first wholly owned foreign enterprise bank, headquartered in Jiangsu. At the inauguration ceremony, Ty donated RMB 1 million to the earthquake-stricken area of Yushu in Qinghai province and asked the City Commission of Nanjing to pass on the donations on his behalf.

There is more to this banker than the drive to succeed in his field. Ty believes that making money, and spending money in the community are two sides of a coin that are inseparable. Sixteen years after the establishment of Metrobank, its social development arm, Metrobank Foundation, was born. Since its inception on 8 January 1979, it has served as the fruition of Ty's aim of giving back to society. As Metrobank expands, so do the projects of Metrobank Foundation — in the number of its projects and outreach. Ty had felt that the medical needs of many Filipinos were inadequately answered by existing institutions. Thus, the first project of the foundation was the control and management of the Manila Doctors Hospital. Through the funding and supervision of the foundation, the hospital facilities were enhanced and expanded. Programmes such as charity wards and outreach missions were added to the regular operations of the institution. Eventually an education arm, the Manila Doctor's College, was established, providing scholarships in medical and other health-related courses. In honour of Ty's late father, an eleven-storey medical facility called Norberto Ty Medical Tower was constructed.

In 1984 Metrobank Foundation began the National Painting Competition to foster young talented Filipino painters by highlighting their works and, at the same time, to encourage Filipino society to respect and appreciate artists and their work. This project proved to be very successful because a year later, the competition itself was given the prestigious Anvil Award for being an Outstanding Special Events Program. Since then many generations of young artists have vied for the Metrobank National Painting Competition award and have found their rightful place in society's art scene.

Another of Ty's major concerns was the disheartening state of Philippine education. Many good teachers opted to work in other fields because of the lack of acknowledgment and inspiration. Aimed at giving incentives and recognition to worthy educators, the foundation set up the "Search for Outstanding Teachers" project. This search represents the foundation's commitment to promoting a culture of excellence in education by recognizing the country's best mentors who can be upheld as models not only for educators, but also for other community members. More than 200 exemplary primary, secondary, and university teachers from all over the country have been awarded since its launch in 1985.

The foundation also searches for and awards "The Outstanding Philippine Soldiers" to recognize excellence among the men and women in the military and express the civilian sector's appreciation and gratitude for their selfless acts of gallantry in preserving the nation's sovereignty. Additionally it has introduced the "Country's Outstanding Policemen in Service" (COPS) project to identify gallant men and women in the police force who are able to work with the community to prevent and solve crime.

True to Ty's vision, the Metrobank Foundation has since become one of the largest and most respected charitable organizations in Asia as it continues to "excel, engage, empower". With an annual budget of well over 100 million pesos, its projects have since become benchmarks in corporate social responsibility and philanthropy.

Ty has five children, and has passed on the reins of Metropolitan Bank and Trust and Company and its subsidiaries to them.

U

U E

(余巴挨, Yu Ba'ai, 1910–73)
Leading physician, Myanmar

Professor U E's meritorious career as a physician spanned a good thirty-five years from 1939 to 1973 and he was credited with specializing in the research of tropical diseases. While his early interest was on heart and kidney diseases, in his later life he did much work on liver disorders and he was awarded the title of "Thiri Pyan Chi", a civilian honour bestowed by the government for contributions to Burma. Also, in March 1947, when he was Assistant Surgeon at the Rangoon General Hospital for the period 1939 to 1942, he was awarded the Crown's Commendation from the last British governor of Burma, Major General Sir Hubert Rance.

U E, also known as "Maung Ba Aye", alias "Maung Aye", alias "Maung E", was born in 1910 in Sagaing, a town in Rangoon across the Irrawaddy River from Mandalay. U E's grandfather, went to Burma with his brother from Wuxi Taishan (武溪台山), Guangdong, by the overland route through Yunnan (云南). He settled in Sagaing and became a well known lumber merchant and builder. He married a Burmese lady, Daw Lay Khin, from the nearby village of Pekadoe. U E was the second of three sons of U Htwe alias Yee Htwe Park (余才). The youngest son was Ba Gale, and the eldest, U Ba Htay. His four other children were girls. U Ba Htay (ICS, Indian Civil Service) became a very senior civil servant in the British Colonial Government and later, the Burmese Government. He was to become the election commissioner (chairman, Multiparty Democracy General Elections 1998–2000) in 1990 when Aung San Suu Kyi was elected.

In 1926 U E went to a government high school in Maymyo and obtained his M.B., B. S. degree from the Medical College in Rangoon (Yangon) in 1933. After graduation, he worked as a physician for the Burma Oil Company in Yenangyaung, an oil field in Upper Burma. In 1936, he won a state scholarship for further studies in Britain. After passing his conjoint examinations (LRCP & MRCS), he trained for and became a Member of the Royal College of Physicians (MRCP) and also received his diploma in tropical medicine and hygiene (DTMH) from Edinburgh in 1938. After returning to Rangoon, he was appointed assistant civil surgeon at the Rangoon General Hospital where he worked until the evacuation of Rangoon in January/February 1942. In 1958, he was made a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh.

U E's first love was for medical education. He was one of three doctors who built the foundation for a thriving Department of Medicine and the Medical School in Rangoon, one of the best of its kind, in South East Asia then. At the time, it was recognized by the General Medical Council of England as a certified medical school with a British-recognized medical degree. Many generations of highly qualified physicians went through its doors for almost two decades after the war. U E first worked as professor of physiology, and later as professor of clinical medicine at the Rangoon General Hospital before becoming professor of medicine and rector of the Institute of Medicine (II). In the early 50s, soon after the war, he went to the United States and the United Kingdom for further training. He trained with Dr Paul Woods, learning about the new technology of electrocardiogram (ECG), and also brought back to Rangoon a popular diagnostic tool at the time called the "Basal Metabolic Rate (BMR) Machine". His devotion to the quality of education led him to institute a rule in the Medical College called the "3F Rule". This was carried out in the second M.B., B.S. examinations. The rule stated that if a student failed these exams three times, he or she would be expelled from the Medical College. There were many students who protested and rioted, and U E's life was even threatened, so he had to engage a military bodyguard for a few months until the violence died down.

Besides being responsible for the Physiology Department, and the teaching in the first two years as well, U E was also one of three medical consultants at the Rangoon General Hospital. U E taught clinical medicine there to students in their last three years of training. He was also the teacher and mentor for those who were assigned to him as assistants or house physicians. U E's meritorious career also included being professor of physiology for about fifteen years at the Faculty of Medicine, University of Rangoon, followed by a professorship in clinical medicine for the next eight years, before being finally appointed to the post of professor of medicine. He held this post for four years and was later appointed rector of the Institute of Medicine (II).

U E published a number of papers that provided some insight into his interests at the time, in various medical journals of Burma such as the Burma Medical Journal and the Union of Burma Journal of Life Science. Some examples are: "Chloramphenicol therapy in typhoid" (1955), "Role of quinidine in the treatment of cardiac arrhythmias" (1956), "Incidence of liver diseases in 500 autopsies done in the Rangoon General Hospital" (1968), "The clinical and epidemiological observations on viral hepatitis in the Rangoon General Hospital" (1969), and "Post-transfusion hepatitis in surgical patients of the Rangoon General Hospital" (1970).

Besides his work, U E was also concerned about the well-being and health of the Chinese in Rangoon. While his teaching responsibilities kept him occupied in the mornings, he ran a private clinic in the afternoon in Chinatown, in Latter Street and Maung Khine Street in Rangoon. His wife, Daw San Kyi, alias Khoo Po Syo (邱宝秀), spoke fluent Hokkien and was able to help the patients at the clinic. Those were the days when patients would bring some food over or some other gifts, regardless of whether they could afford to pay the bills.

U E had married Khoo Po Syo after his return from Britain. She was the daughter of Khoo Soo Ee, granddaughter of Khoo Swee Hean (邱瑞轩), and great-granddaughter of Khoo Kin, alias Khoo Tai Kin (邱台根), who was the founder of the three oldest Hokkien Chinese temples in Rangoon: Kheng Hock Keong (庆福宫, 1861), Fu Shan Si Temple (福山寺, 1874), and Leong San Tong (龙山堂, 1878).

U E had three children. His eldest son, Dr Bertie Aye, alias Maung Tin Aye, was born in Rangoon in August 1941, a few months before the Japanese invasion. He graduated in medicine from Cambridge University and St Thomas Hospital in London, and went on to obtain a PhD from the University of Toronto, doing research on stem cells, under the supervision of Dr E. A. McCulloch, who was the discoverer of the stem cell. Dr Bertie Aye then went to the University of Ottawa where he promoted stem cell studies, both in the laboratory and in the treatment of leukemia. He went on to become head of the Division of Hematology at the University of Ottawa, and later national director of Blood Services in the Canadian Red Cross. In 1988 he was awarded the Centennial Medal by the Royal Society of Canada, and in 1992, for his significant contributions to Canada, he was awarded the Commemorative Medal for the 125th anniversary of the Conferation of Canada, a civilian Canadian honour.

U E's daughter, Dr Shirley Aye, alias Mya Sann Aye, was trained as an obstetrician/gynecologist in Rangoon, and in Queen's in Belfast, Northern Ireland. She taught at the Rangoon Medical College (now University of Medicine [1], Yangon), and later worked in Brunei and Saudi Arabia. She taught in the University of Malaysia in Kota Kinabalu after that.

U E's youngest daughter, Thynn Wynn Aye, graduated with a master's in education, and later married Alan Khoo, alias U Than Win, son of notable Hokkien lawyer, C.C. Khoo. alias Khoo Cheng Chuan, a leader at the Khoo Clan Temple, Leong San Tong, in Rangoon.

U E passed away on 18 April 1973, and was buried with Chinese rites in a Cantonese cemetery in Rangoon, according to his wishes. The writing on his tombstone was recorded in Burmese, English, and Chinese languages. However, along with many cemeteries, U E's tombstone was removed by the military government in the 1990s.

Uray, Burhan

(Bong Swan An; Bong Sun On, 黄双安, Huang Shuang'an, 1931–)
Timber king, community leader, Indonesia

Burhan Uray, better known as Huang Shuang An (Bong Swan An) among the Chinese-speaking community, is a timber tycoon who made his name during the New Order. His timber-based Djajanti Group also went into fishery, tin mining, and other businesses.

Uray is a first-generation Chinese Indonesian from an obscure background. He was born on 13 November 1931, but there was a number of versions regarding his birthplace. According to Taiwan's Guanghua Zazhi (光华杂志, also known as Sinorama Magazine), he was born into a very poor family in southern China and came to Indonesia in his teens. A mainland Chinese source noted that he was born in Minqing (闽清), Fujian, and came to Indonesia at the age of six. But according to a book entitled, List of World Ethnic Chinese Tycoons (世界华人富豪榜), published by Zibenjia (资本家, Chinese edition of Forbes), he was born into a poor farmer's family in Kuching, Sarawak, and went to Indonesia in his teens. Recently published biography (in Chinese) of Burhan Uray by his Taiwanese wife Bai Jiali (白嘉莉) has resolved the issue. Burhan was born in Minqing (Fujian) of a poor family and went to Sibu (Sarawak) at the age of six with his parents. He moved to Indonesia at a later date.

Uray has received little formal education. After working with a local timber company in Sarawak, he went to Indonesia in 1956 and entered the timber business. Owing to his good relations with the government, he was given concessions in running his business which began to expand in the 1960s. In the next thirty years he went on to become the timber king of Indonesia. Currently his Djajanti Timber Group is the second largest timber company in Indonesia.

In 1976 President Soeharto officiated at the opening of the PT Nusantara Integrated Woodworking Industry in Gresik near Surabaya, an affiliated company of the Djajanti Timber Group of which Uray was the boss. Prajogo Pangestu, who later emerged as another Indonesian timber king, worked for the Djajanti Group under Uray the first half of the 1970s. The group engaged in activities ranging from forest exploration to manufacturing semi- and finished timber products, supplying not only Asian countries such as Japan, Korea, Taiwan, and Singapore, but also other continents. According to a Singapore newspaper report, in 1976 the group had a total disposable capital of S$73 million, half of which was in the form of credit from Indonesian banks, and the other half its own capital.

The group also obtained concessions of four million hectares to explore timber in Central and East Kalimantan and Irian Jaya (Indonesia's Papua), and established a number of affiliated companies in the timber supply and processing business. In 1992 it was reorganized and one of its affiliated companies, PT Artike Optima Inti, was scheduled to go public. But this did not materialize. In 1994 Burhan Uray sold 31.5 per cent of the company's shares to the Karamat Tin Dredging Company of Malaysia and in return obtained 25 per cent of the shares of the Karamat Tin Dredging Company. It was also reported that the Djajanti Group came up with another megaproject in 1994, this time in fishery. Worth 1.5 trillion rupiah, this fishery project was implemented under the integrated PIR (Smallholders-Nucleus) scheme. To carry out this megaproject, the Djajanti Group established PT Siberut Minasamudra in cooperation with Soejono Varinata (30 per cent) and Claresta Varinata (30 per cent). PT Siberut Minasamudra was approved under the domestic investment (PMDN) scheme by the Investment Coordinating Board (BKPM) in February 1994.

Uray married twice. With his first wife he has four sons, all of whom were sent overseas for education and later succeeded his businesses. In early September 1977 he married a Taiwanese TV celebrity, Bai Jiali (Betty), whom he first met seven years earlier. Bai Jiali used to stop over in Jakarta on her way to Australia to visit her sister. After their marriage, Uray became known in Taiwan which he visited quite often and where he had some investments. He promoted co-operation between the fishery industries in Fuzhou (China) and in Indonesia. Like many totok businessmen in Indonesia, Burhan donated money to his hometown (China) development, but at the same time he provided the developments in Indonesia including building houses for the Tsunami victims and establishing an electric plant in Aceh.

He has received various medals and been honoured with a number of positions overseas. In 1990, he was awarded a Dato' Seri title by the sultan of Terengganu, Malaysia. In 2005 he was awarded the Panglima Gemilang Bintang Kenyalang (Honorary, PGBK-H) by the Sarawak head of state. He was also the honorary chairman of China's Wildlife Protection Foundation, honorary chairman of the Fuzhou Overseas Association, and member of the board of trustees of the Huaqiao University in Quanzhou, Fujian. Uray has also been active in the Fuzhou Clan Association (福州同乡会) in Indonesia. He is the permanent honorary chairman of the Muara Karang Foundation (吉祥山基金会), which was established by the Jakarta Fuzhou Clan Association in 1986.

He is also interested in promoting Chinese language and culture in Indonesia. In 2010 the Universitas Al Azhar Indonesia (UAI) in Jakarta was appointed by the Indonesian Ministry of Education and China's Hanban (汉办) to establish the Kongzi Xueyuan (孔子学院 Confucius Institute) in Jakarta. As UAI needed funds to build the institute, Uray offered three to four storeys of his Djajanti building in the centre of Jakarta for the venue of the institute, which is called Pusat Bahasa Mandarin (Chinese Language Centre) in Indonesian. The institute is well equipped with modern facilities for studying the Chinese language. He also provided UAI students with twenty scholarships to study the Chinese language in the Fujian Normal University (福建师范大学) in mainland China.

Uthen Taechaphaibun

(Tae Ngow Low, 郑午楼, Zheng Wulou, 1913–2007)

Community leader, businessman, philanthropist, Thailand

Uthen Taechaphaibun was a well known businessman and philanthropist in Thailand. His first major success in business was the establishment of the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank (also known as Srinakhon Bank) in 1950. With the success of this bank, he further expanded his business from the financial sector to distilleries and breweries, real estate, and others. He was also famous for his generosity and support for charities, education, and cultural activities. He was an active member of the Poh Teck Tung Foundation and among the leading founders of the Huachiaw Chalermphrakiat University.

Uthen was born on 6 February 1913 in Bangkok, the eldest son of Tae Tsu Ping, a well established Teochew Chinese entrepreneur and community leader in Thailand. He was first educated at Peiing School (培英学校), but later transferred to Xinmin School (新民学校). On completing his primary education, like many of his classmates, he wished to further his studies in China. However, as his family was making a living in Thailand, his father thought it would be better for him to enroll at Assumption College in Thailand. He continued his studies at Assumption College at his father's suggestion and, because of his educational background, he was well versed in Chinese, English, and Thai.

He started helping out in his father's businesses after he graduated from Assumption College and expanded his father's liquor trading business by brewing and selling their own tonic liquor, which became very popular in Thailand. In 1936, as a representative of his father's pawn-broking business, Yong Hiap Heng, he was involved in the restructuring of the Poh Teck Tung Association. After this association was officially registered as a charity organization under the name of Poh Teck Tung Foundation in 1937, Uthen was elected vice-chairman of the board of directors of the foundation. Under his leadership, various changes were implemented, including the expansion of the foundation's free medical services and the establishment of its midwifery school. The medical services of the Poh Teck Tung foundation later developed into Huachiaw Hospital, which he continued to support in various ways.

During the Second World War, when Japanese military forces gained access to Thailand, Uthen relinquished all his duties in various associations and concentrated on managing his businesses and taking care of his sick father. As the older man's illness worsened, he stayed by his side round the clock and did not leave the house unless necessary.

After the war, his business began to flourish. In 1950 he established the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank with U Chu-liang, So Khun Kiam, Liao Kongpo, and others. Within a few years' time, he set up many branches in both Bangkok and other parts of Thailand. Eventually the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank expanded overseas and had several offices in the United States and Hong Kong. With the success of the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank, he was able to venture into various other industries, including insurance, real estate, and others.

Uthen was also noted for his success in the distillery and brewery industries. In 1959 he established the Mahakhun Distillery Co. Ltd. with Sahat Mahakhun after the latter successfully obtained the licence to brew Maekhong whisky. As the general manager of the distillery, Uthen successfully turned the failing Maekhong distillery into a profitable business. Maekhong whisky also came to enjoy the largest share of the liquor market in Thailand for most of the latter half of the twentieth century.

His business ventures reached another height when he set up a development company to develop Bang Pu Industrial Estate, which covered an area of 8,000 rai (12.8 million sq. m.), with the Thai government. In 1983 he started another development project in Pathum Wan District, which included the building of a sixty-two-storey office tower, a thirty-two-storey hotel, and an eight-storey shopping mall (now Central World). The total amount invested in the project was estimated to be 10 billion baht. However, this development project was not completed, and the Taechaphaibun family suffered serious financial problems during the Asian Financial Crisis of 1997.

Uthen was also known for his involvement in the Chinese community in Thailand, especially after the Second World War. China was suffering from famine in the aftermath of the war. In view of this, he, together with other leaders of the Chinese community in Thailand, founded the Committee of Chinese in Thailand for Famine Relief in China and was elected its chairperson. As this was a large-scale fund-raising project, they faced several difficulties, including gaining permission from the relevant authorities and arranging for the necessary logistics to transport donations to China. Those difficulties were eventually overcome when Uthen negotiated with various associations for help. He also went to China personally to oversee the first relief efforts made by the committee.

Aside from his duties in the relief committee, he also held posts in the Combined Thai-Chinese Security Team, the Association for Sports, the Teochew Association of Thailand, and others. He was so heavily involved in these community activities in the late 1940s that he did not have time to manage his own businesses.

Additionally, Uthen was known for his support for educational and cultural activities. He helped in the reopening of Peiing School after the war and also encouraged the founding of the Huachiaw Midwifery School under the Poh Teck Tong Foundation in 1941, to provide nursing and midwifery training. The Huachiaw Midwifery School later became Huachiaw College in 1981 and further expanded into the Huachiaw Chalermphrakiat University in 1992. In 1977 he established a charity foundation in memory of his father to provide scholarships to students at all levels.

In recognition of his success in business and involvement in the community, Uthen was awarded the Grand Companion (Third Class, Higher Grade) of the Illustrious Order of Chulachomklao in 1984 and other medals by King Bhumibol of Thailand. He also received an honorary doctoral degree in business management from the Sinakharinwirot University in 1980.

During the Asian Financial Crisis, the Taechaphaibun family suffered tremendous setbacks partly due to poor management practices. Bangkok Metropolitan Bank ran into financial difficulties as bad debts accumulated. Eventually, the Bank of Thailand took over the bank and Uthen had to step down from his position as chairperson of the bank.

He passed away on 24 November 2007 at the age of ninety-four.

Uy, Alfonso A.

(黃祯谭, Huang Zhentan, 1939–)

Entrepreneur, community leader, Philippines

Alfonso Uy is an accomplished businessman and engineer who made a name for himself as a philanthropist, and a civic and community leader. He was the past president of the Federation of Filipino Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, Inc. (FFCCCI) (2008–10) and is the president of the Iloilo Economic Development Foundation, an umbrella organization of Iloilo's top business groups and NGOs, supported by both the city and provincial councils.

A businessman with great vision for the growth and development of the country, Uy launched his most recent project, the Reina Mercedes Corn Processing Center (RMCC), in Isabela, Northern Luzon. The centre, which is vital for agricultural development, was built by Mindanao Grain Processing Co. (MGPC), a unit of the conglomerate, La Filipina Uycongco Corporation. The Isabela facility has five times the capacity of two other MGPC corn processing plants in Bukidnon, Mindanao. Philippine President Benigno C. Aquino III ceremonially switched on the equipment that started RMCC operations on 8 October 2010 and lauded Uy for his efforts and thanked him and the MGPC for building the corn-processing centre in Isabela as it benefits the corn farmers tremendously. The RMCC is currently the biggest post-harvest facility in Southeast Asia. Local corn farmers get better yields from the corn harvest due to modernized infrastructure that facilitates the drying and processing of corn. The plant also provides higher incomes for farmers as it purchases produce from them directly. This move clearly shows how much Uy wishes to spur social and economic development.

As president of the FFCCCI, he actively promoted the "BUY PINOY, BUY LOCAL" movement to support local products and services, create more jobs and opportunities for Filipinos, encourage investments, support local industries, and combat smuggling. Uy also encouraged Filipino producers, especially those involved in food production, to take advantage of zero tariffs under the ASEAN-China Free Trade Agreement, which took effect in January 2010. Also, during his term, the highest number of schoolrooms was donated to the government under the Operation Barrio Schools project. He continues to support Chinese-language education and other cultural work, particularly the efforts of Bahay Tsinoy, Museum of the Chinese in Philippine Life, in its vital role as a bridge between the Chinese-Filipino community and mainstream society. The FFCCCI, under Uy's leadership, organized and hosted the 10th World Chinese Entrepreneurs Convention — the biggest and most important gathering of entrepreneurs, investors, and stakeholders from China and all over the world — with the theme, "World Prosperity through Chinese Entrepreneurship", in Manila from 19–22 November 2009. The convention opened its doors to both Filipino and Chinese entrepreneurs and leaders from around the world to explore topics on strengthening mutual collaboration.

Uy's father, Julian Uygongco (Uy Yan Gong 黄衍赣), an immigrant from Nan-An (南安), Fujian, had started a bakeshop and grocery store called La Filipina Uy Gongco (捷隆发商行) in 1901 in Iloilo City, which laid the foundation for the Uy family's economic base. The small store expanded into general merchandising and enjoyed rapid growth when it started to import and distribute flour, feeds, sugar, and fertilizer from the United States, China, Thailand, and Europe. It quickly rose to become an important trading house on Panay and Negros Islands in the Visayas region.

When Uygongco refused to cooperate with the Japanese during the war and was imprisoned, his business was disrupted and everything he built was lost. He died soon after being released. After liberation in 1946, Uy's elder brother, Jose (Uy Chiong 黄祯墙), restarted the business with the help of a cousin, Tan Chin Eng (Tan Si Hok 陈赐福), and named it La Filipina Uy Gongco de Uy Chiong.

Alfonso was born on 9 June 1939. After finishing secondary school at age fifteen, he started to work in the company. On graduating with a degree in chemical engineering magna cum laude from the Central Philippine University in 1963, he took over the helm of the company and immersed himself fully in the family business. In 1971 the company became the La Filipina Uygongco Corporation (LFUC).

Uy then ventured into other businesses, spurring LFUC's growth in the process. In the 1980s, he bought Capiz Sugar Central in the Visayas and started sugar production. At the same time, he developed residential property and started a hog farm in Bulacan province. In Iloilo, he built a hotel and a shopping centre. In 1987, he set up the Philippine Foremost Milling Corporation (PFMC), situated within a three-hectare complex in Lapuz, Iloilo City. It is the only flour milling facility in Western Visayas up to 2011. In 1994, PFMC expanded into feed milling and is the most modernized feed mill plant in Western Visayas as well. In 1998, Uy opened the second mill, a state-of-the-art feed plant, in Tondo, Manila and in June 2010, the Iloilo Technical Training Center was inaugurated in Lapuz to complement the PFMC. It was established to enhance customers' baking expertise and ensure profitability as they had become partners and not merely recipients of a product. PFMC has become a leading player in the wheat flour and animal feed milling industry, a reliable and sought-after supplier of best quality flour. It now ranks as the second flour mill in the Philippines based on flour sales volume and is the first flour milling company in the Philippines to be ISO22000:2005 accredited.

Uy's success is evident from his achievements in business as well as from the respect he commands in the ethnic Chinese community. His life has not always been easy though. At a young age, he helped his father manage the family business, and at times sacrificed going to school. He was a working student throughout his undergraduate days at the Central Philippine University (CPU), a private Christian liberal arts school in Iloilo. His mother, Uy Ang Jun Teng (洪云珍), teachers, and classmates had encouraged him to succeed despite his absences from class while continuing to work. At the same time, he managed to be an active campus leader at the College of Engineering and the CPU Students Republic. Upon graduation, in gratitude to his alma mater, he served as faculty member (1963–64) and as a member of the university's board of trustees for thirty years, ten of them as chairman of the board for several terms. In 1966 he obtained his Filipino citizenship.

On 19 March 2000, Uy was conferred an honorary doctor of humanities degree by the Central Philippine University in recognition of his being a shining model of the university's Vision of Exemplary Christian Education for Life. Uy had also donated 15 million pesos to the institution and spearheaded the construction of a building known as Dr Alfonso A. Uy Student Union which houses the director of student affairs office, student publications, and campus organizations, the Student Service Enterprise, and other services catering to students' needs. Prior to this, he also donated the Excel Center, which serves as the Resource Generation Center of the university. For this and other outstanding and exemplary performance as a student and service as an alumnus, the CPU conferred on him the title, Centralian of the Century, the highest title accorded to an alumnus, during its centennial celebration on 6 August 2005.

As well, he was given an award for excellence in the field of business and entrepreneurship in the 2005 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran.

Alfonso Uy is married to Supeng O. Uy (王素苹) and raised five children with her, namely Aileen Christel, Cheryl May,

Ian Kenneth, Gerald Jone, and Ethel Joy. His eldest child, Aileen Christel Ongkauko is the mother of the company, La Filipina Uygongco Corporation, and also the president of the PFMC. The youngest child, Ethel Joy, was placed ninth in the National Board Examinations for Certified Public Accountants and serves now as auditor of the La Filipina Uygongco Group of Companies.

Visonnavong, Vithoune and Visonnavong, Vouavansy

(刘光明, Liu Guangming, 1945–)
Founding President of Laos Society of Ophthalmology, Laos
(张玉梅, Zhang Yumei, 1944–)
Specialist in Obstetrics and Gynaecology, Laos

Vithoune Visonnavong and his wife, Vouavansy Visonnavong (张玉梅), are both leading medical doctors in Laos. Vithoune is the founding director of the Ophthalmology Centre of Laos while his wife is a specialist in obstetrics and gynaecology.

Vithoune was born on 1 October 1945 into a middle-class family in Phalane Village, Savannakhet District, Laos. His father, Liu Fa Ji (刘发基), was a resident of Luoqunpu Village, Qingxi Town in Dongguan County, Guangdong. Fa Ji had migrated to Laos in the late 1920s and married a Laotian. The couple had nine children and Vithoune is the eldest son but second child in the family.

Vithoune Visonnavong is by profession an ophthalmologist, eye microsurgeon, and university professor. He is well known as the founding director of the Ophthalmology Centre, Ministry of Health, Laos, and founding president of the Laos Society of Ophthalmology. He is also the co-chairman of the International Agency for the Prevention of Blindness (IAPB) and the first ophthalmologist in Laos.

After graduating from high school in 1964, Vithoune won a Soviet Union Government scholarship to study medicine in the Soviet Union. In 1965 he obtained a diploma in medicine from the renowned Institute d'état de Medicina de Volgograd prior to his admission to the Patrice Lumumba People's Friendship University. In March 1986 he obtained his Ph.D. in ophthalmology and went on to receive specialized training in public health ophthalmology in Thailand in 1992, and in community eye health in London in 1999.

In April 2007, Vithoune introduced the idea of training a medical rescue team that would operate round the clock. He drew up a duty roster for his team to make sure that at any time of the day it was ready to respond to the needs of victims of traffic accidents. This enhanced the ambulance service in Laos. He also set up the first ever mobile eye clinic in Laos to conduct free-of-charge eye surgery in villages where people knew little about the danger of cataracts, and did not see the need to seek treatment in a hospital. Due to the lack of manpower, he took on multiple roles as driver of the mobile eye clinic truck, first-aid giver, and surgeon. He received a national award, "Lean Xay Hengan III", from the president of Laos and an international award, the Honor Certificate from the Korat Institute of Public Health Ophthalmology, Thailand, in November 2006, in recognition of his contributions to the prevention of blindness in the Western Pacific and Southeast Asian regions.

His wife, Vouavansy Visonnavong, was born on 15 January 1944 in Luangphabang, Laos. Her father was a migrant from Haikou, the capital and most populous city in Hainan province in China in the early 1930s. He married a Laotian and settled down in Laos. He traded in various daily necessities for a living, but was earning just enough to feed his family of six.

Vouavansy has two elder brothers and one younger brother. Because her father passed away when she was only two years old, the burden of supporting four children fell on her mother, and life for the family became even more difficult than before. When the young girl's paternal uncle in Haikou learnt of the situation, he obtained the consent of her mother to let her elder son, who was then twelve years old, live with his family in Hainan.

Vouavansy was adopted by a middle-class family in Luangphabang and has since lost contact with her brothers in Laos. She has two adoptive brothers in the new family who are more than twenty years older than her, and were studying overseas when she arrived at the family. Although she was taken into the family as an adopted daughter, she was brought up by the servants and was, more often than not, treated like one of the servants. However she was fortunate enough to be given the opportunity to go to school. In 1953, the whole family migrated to Vientiane because her new father, who was a graduate in mechanical engineering from a Vietnam university, found a new job teaching engineering at a local college there. The young Vouavansy was then nine years old and was able to continue her education after the family settled down in Vientiane.

Vouavansy was a bright student and during her second grade in high school, she was offered a French Government scholarship to study a degree course in France. However what was supposedly the happiest event in her life since childhood never took place: her family refused to let her go for further studies in France. At the time, Laotians put much stress on the importance of hierarchy within the family. The notion of men's superiority and women's inferiority was deeply rooted in their tradition and was reflected in many aspects of their lives. Hence, her parents perceived that it was unnecessary for her to study beyond high school. Instead of giving their consent for her to study in France, they made her quit her studies and start working at the post office.

The infamous Laotian civil war (1953–75) between the Communist Pathet Lao (North Vietnamese of Lao ancestry) and the Royal Lao Government resulted in huge numbers of commoners seeking from time to time safe places to live in. Vouavansy used this as a pretext to leave her family quietly in order to start a new life somewhere. She saw this escape from her family as the only way out of feudalism and embarked on a torturous three-month walk to reach Xiang Khouang, a city 435 kilometres north-east of Vientiane. At Xiang Khouang, she worked for a newspaper, translating French news into Laotian. And that was how she found in the newspaper an advertisement for a scholarship offered by the Government of the Soviet Union. She applied through the Soviet embassy and was successful. She did not inform her family in Vientiane about the good news. As her high school course was previously interrupted by her family, she attended her third-grade high school course in the Soviet Union in 1962.

When Vouavansy was admitted to university in1963 she became the first Laotian to be awarded a Soviet Union Government scholarship to do a medical degree at Patrice Lumumba People's Friendship University. In 1969, she became the first Laotian to graduate with first class honors from the university. In October 1970, she took up her postgraduate training in obstetrics and gynaecology.

Between 1972 and 1980, Vouavansy practised medicine at Mahosot hospital in Laos. Here her patients came from all walks of life and were of various races and ethnicities. In late 1980, she was appointed by the Laotian Government to head the Gynaecology Department at Number One Hospital, a hospital fully funded by the Soviet Union Government to provide medical services exclusively to top ranking government officials such as ministers and officers of the Lao Central Government. In 1990, she made a request for early retirement for health reasons. Although she was only forty-seven years old, she was given a full pension on the basis of her outstanding performance at the hospital.

Vouavansy met Vithoune Visonnavong in the Soviet Union in 1964 and the two got married on 28 January 1969. They have two sons and one daughter: Their elder son was also a holder of the Soviet Union Government scholarship and studied international relations at the same university as his parents did between 1987 and 1992. Their second son was also awarded the same scholarship to study in the Soviet Union in 1990. Unfortunately his studies was interrupted when the Soviet Union was dissolved on 29 May 1991. In 1997, he managed to obtain another scholarship to study international relations at Chulalongkorn University in Thailand. After graduation, he joined the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and was appointed the third secretary to New York between 2007 and 2011. The couple's youngest daughter received her high school education in the United States. After her return to Laos in 1997, she was awarded a scholarship to do a degree in commerce in Australia. She worked at the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) between 2002 and 2003 and then pursued her master's degree in international development in England between 2003 and 2005. She has since returned to her position at UNDP in Laos.

Vương Bái Xuyên

(王沛川, Wang Peichuan, 1940–)
Educator, Vietnam

Vương Bái Xuyên has taught the Chinese language in Vietnam for the most part of his life. Even when most of his peers have retired, he remains actively involved in the Chinese-language education scene of Ho Chi Minh City. Pedagogical interest runs deep in his family; he, his father, and the eldest and youngest among his four brothers have all been school principals once. His second youngest brother and his wife were also teachers. They are known as a "family of pedagogues" in the southern part of Vietnam.

Xuyên is a third-generation Hoa (ethnic Chinese of Vietnam) of Chenghai (澄海) ancestry. He was the second child in his family of five sons and was born in 1940 in Thành Trị (盛治) in Sóc Trăng, where his parents settled in. At the age of nine, he joined his father who was participating in anti-French resistence activities in Cà Mau, a resistance base. Cà Mau is the southern-most province of Vietnam. Xuyên explained that his father's action at the time was inspired by the revolutionary thinking of the Chinese, but driven by the desire to do something for Vietnam — meaning his father applied revolutionary aspirations to local conditions. At the time the Hoa had formed a revolutionary group called Hội Giải Liên Hoa Kiều (华侨解放联合会) in which his father actively participated. Xuyên senior was initially a teaching supervisor at Xing Zhong Xuexiao (兴中学校), a Chinese-medium school established by the Chaozhou clan in 1933 in Can Tho (Cần Thơ) province, neighbouring the province of Sóc Trăng. He was disseminating anti-French materials with the principal that he worked with until their arrest by the French. The principal was expelled to China, while he was blacklisted and his activities curbed. He then moved to Cà Mau and resumed his political activities.

In 1950–54, Xuyên senior landed a principal post at a Chinese school called Trường Hoa Kiều (华侨学校) in Bạc Liêu province, managed by the Cantonese (Guangdong) clan. In the year the French withdrew in 1954, Xuyên was sent to Hanoi with his brother, Vương Hồng Xuyên (王鸿川), the third son in the family. The two were among 200 Hoa (ethnic Chinese) students who left for Hanoi to receive pedagogical training. Xuyên was trained at Huaqiao Shifan Xuexiao (华侨师范学校), a teachers' training college for the Hoa. The northern Vietnamese Government at the time had invited Chinese language teachers from China to train local teachers at the college, which occupied the same premises as Zhonghua School (Zhonghua Xuexiao 中华学校), a Chinese-medium school, with its former address at No. 17 Hàng Buồm in Hanoi. Students of Huaqiao Shifan Xuexiao, on graduation, were dispersed to cities and districts such as Nam Định, Hải Dương, Hải Phòng, and Lạng Sơn in the north to teach at Chinese schools. Xuyên, however, remained in Hanoi after he graduated in 1960.

In 1964 he became vice-principal at Zhonghua Primary School in Hanoi. The school was then located in the vicinity of ethnic Chinese institutions such as Zhonghua School; it was the earliest Chinese-medium school to be founded in Hanoi and was the result of a merger of Fujian School (福建学校), Zhongxi School (中西学校) and Guomin School (国民学校), around the turn of the twentieth century. Zhonghua School gradually expanded, adding kindergarten and secondary school facilities, all managed by the Cantonese clan association, Guang Yue Huiguan (广粤会馆). The association used to stand at 22 Hàng Buồm, Hoàn Kiếm District; it is currently a kindergarten called Trường Mẫu giáo Tuổi Thơ.

In 1970, Xuyên was involved in curriculum design as textbooks imported from China were gradually being abandoned. He was also teaching and overseeing the management of Vietnamese, English, and Chinese programmes. After 1975, the year when northern and southern divisions of Vietnam were unified, Zhonghua Primary and Secondary Schools became nationalized and were called Trường Thống Nhất — literally meaning "Unification School". Mandarin became one of the subjects taught in the school while the other subjects were and are taught in Vietnamese. Xuyên then returned to the southern part of Vietnam and settled in Ho Chi Minh City. From 1984 to 2000, he was principal of Trường Tiểu học Phạm Văn Hai in District 11, one of the three districts in Ho Chi Minh City with populous Hoa residents.

When Xuyên turned sixty in 2000, the official retirement age for Vietnamese men, an offer came for him to continue working at a school. It was the post of administrating and supervising the Chinese-language centre housed at Trường Trung học Nam Kỳ Khởi Nghĩa (Nam Ky Khoi Nghia Secondary School), more widely known among the Hoa by its pre-unification name, Qixiu Huawen Zhongxin (启秀华文中心). The pre-unification prototype of the Chinese school was established by the Guangdong (Cantonese) clan. It was shut down after the unification of the country until 1987. In 1988, the school reopened as a Chinese-language centre and continues to be supported by the Guangdong clan. Three Chinese language classes are conducted daily at the school. These classes form a part of the formal curriculum at primary and secondary levels. Hàng Vay Chi (see entry on Hàng Vay Chi) has been supporting the language centre as its chairman for eighteen years.

Xuyên's eldest brother, Hoàng Văn Huy (黄文辉), lives in Can Tho city, the capital of Can Tho province. He and his youngest brother, Hoàng Vĩnh Xuyên (黄永川), have registered their family name as "Hoàng" instead of "Vương"; the remaining family members retain their original family name of "Vương". The two surnames are phonetically close in Mandarin.

Like Xuyên, Hoàng continues to teach actively despite having passed the official retirement age. Currently eighty years old, he teaches at the former school, Lê Quý Đôn School, where he used to teach Mandarin before 1975. The school was at the time named Shuren School (树人学校). Even prior to teaching at Shuren School, Hoàng had gained experience as the supervisor of teaching at a secondary school established by the Chaozhou (Teochew) clan. He was vice-principal of Lê Quý Đôn School from 1975 to 1992.

Xuyên's family has had other educators: his wife, Lâm Cẩm Tú, born in 1944 in Hanoi, retired from teaching Mandarin in 1989, and his son, Vương Xuân Dương, born in 1972, now teaches computer science at Trần Bội Cơ School in District 5, Ho Chi Minh City. His daughter, Vương Xuân Yến, born in 1968, however, has chosen pharmacy as her profession and works at the state pharmaceutical company, Công ty Cổ phần Thế Dược OPC, Ho Chi Minh City.

Vương Hồng Sển

(王鸿盛, Wang Hongsheng, 1902–96)
Memoirist, antique collector, scholar, Vietnam

Vương Hồng Sển is best known as a memoirist, collector of Chinese antiques, self-taught scholar, and author of the most popular history of Saigon published in the twentieth century. Born in the Deep South of Vietnam and raised in the town of Sóc Trăng, he was the only survivor of eight children (all boys) of a Khmer-Chinese mother and a Chinese-Vietnamese father. His name, Sển, was transcribed from the Chinese-dialect pronunciation of the word Thạnh or Thịnh (盛) rather than from Vietnamese. His paternal ancestors came from Fujian, and moved first to Cambodia, then to Vietnam. By the generation of his grandfather, the family had been involved in the leadership of the local chapter of the Heaven-and-Earth Society (Thiên Địa Hội 天地会). Sển attended the local primary school, and then went to Saigon's oldest high school, the Collège Chasseloup-Laubat, which was later renamed Lycée Jean-Jacques Rousseau and, subsequently, Lê Quý Đôn High School.

While at school and elsewhere in Saigon, he came to know the journalist and revolutionary, Nguyễn An Ninh, and several subsequently prominent political figures, including the non-communist, Hồ Văn Ngà, and the Trotskyists, Phan Văn Hùm and Trần Văn Thạch. He was not interested in revolution, however, but in reading, antiques, and classical theatre. In fact, he later blamed his love of reading as a contributing factor to the dissolution of his short-lived first marriage. His second marriage lasted nineteen years, but also ended in divorce and with no children. Even though Sển was never legally wedded again, he lived for most of the remainder of his life with Nguyễn Kim Chung (stage name, Năm Sa Đéc), a performer of cải lương, the southern classical folk musical theatre that is commonly translated as "reformed theatre" in English.

After graduating from Chasseloup-Laubat, Sển joined the colonial bureaucracy at the secretarial rank in the Deep South. He worked in payroll and tax collection, but aspired to higher positions. Working towards this goal, he passed the "general knowledge" section of the colonial examination, then attempted the "specialization" section eight times, but failed each one. In addition to his divorces, these academic setbacks led him to name one of his memoirs, More Than Half of a Failed Life (Hơn Nửa Đời Hư) self-deprecatingly. Yet these failures also led him to concentrate on writing and collecting Chinese antique porcelain. Sển's various recollections suggested that he was a smart collector, who managed to acquire rare Ming porcelain with a small amount of money during the economic downturn of the early 1930s. The hobby helped land him the directorship at the National Museum in Saigon in 1948. He was forced into early retirement in 1964, probably for political reasons associated with the death of the first president of the Republic of Vietnam, Ngô Đình Diệm, the year earlier. However Sển remained very active in the cultural life of Saigon, and continued to collect his antiques and write on the subject well into the last decade of his life.

Besides being well known as a collector, Sển's reputation has been synonymous with the book, Saigon in the Old Days (Sài Gòn Năm Xưa), first published in 1960 and still the single, best known title about the city. (A less consequential sequel was published in Vietnam and the United States in the 1990s.) Reflecting the nationalist sensibilities among non-communist intellectuals at the time, the book began unapologetically with the "Southward Movement" (Nam tiến) conducted by the Vietnamese state in the early modern era that eventually overtook land from the Champa and Khmer kingdoms. Sển's interpretation, however, was anything, but narrowly nationalistic. The book focused on the early Nguyễn Dynasty (1802–1945) and the colonial era, and described Saigon as the result of multiple transnational influences: Khmer, Vietnamese, Chinese, and French. It paid attention, for example, to the various linguistic origins of important sites in the area.

It also highlighted the cultural and economic contributions from a variety of sources: Vietnamese mandarins and men of letters, French missionaries, ethnic Chinese merchants, and Vietnamese women.

Besides the transnational outlook, Saigon in the Old Days reflected strong contemporary interest in the local history of the southern half of Vietnam. The 1960s in particular saw a number of lasting works in this genre from the Saigon presses. They include The Land of Binh Dinh (Non Nước Bình Định) by the poet Quách Tấn, The Old Capitol Hue (Cố Đô Huế) by government official Thái Văn Kiểm, the series, The Vietnamese Country (Giang Sơn Việt Nam), on the central provinces, by Nguyễn Đình Tư, and the series Past and Present (Xưa và Nay), on the southern cities, by Huỳnh Minh. Similar to these works, Sển's book concentrated on geography and cultural developments. Like them, it aimed to persuade readers that the ties of the southern cities and provinces to the Vietnamese nation were just as deep as those of the north.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Sển revised Saigon in the Old Days and published several other important books. Besides producing a son, his union with Nguyễn Kim Chung helped bring about Memoir of Fifty Years of Loving Music (1968) on the subject of reformed theatre. Similar to most of Sển's books, this memoir-cum-history is somewhat clumsily organized. Its sources, however, are rich: his recollections of performances seen in Saigon and other southern cities and towns; lyrics and programme descriptions of a number of cải lương plays, and writings by others that are usually quoted at length. This combination and the characteristically intimate style of his writing helped make the book one of the most popular on the subject.

The memoir was followed by the series, Special Journal on Admiration for the Past (Hiếu Cổ Đặc San). The series consisted of nine volumes, but three were lost to flooding, and only the first six were published between 1970 and 1972. The first two volumes discuss, respectively, countryside hobbies and various entertainment such as, falconry and cockfighting, and reading classical Chinese fiction. The remaining volumes are concerned with the subject of Chinese antiques. Two of them collected Sển's published and new essays that characteristically combine scholarship with personal experience to convey, among other things, the rich influence of Chinese arts on Vietnamese culture. The books are also richly sourced in French and Chinese materials.

The other two volumes are translations of a guide on Chinese antiques by the French author, Daisy Lion-Goldschmidt; and the eighteenth-century Chinese classic, Pottery Records of Jingdezhen, respectively. The first translation provides a useful introduction to the variety of Chinese porcelain and pottery, and the second explains the production process and important terminology related to the most famous pottery-producing region in Chinese history. In some ways, Sển's translations reflect twentieth-century western interest in Chinese antiques. Although fluent in Chinese, for instance, he translated the latter from the French version rather than the Chinese original. Similar to his other major publications, they were not circulated in the decade following the Vietnam War, but have appeared in reprints since the early 1990s. Before his death, he donated his antique collection to the Vietnamese state for the purpose of preservation and public enjoyment.

Major publications by Vương Hồng Sển include Hội Ký 50 Năm Mê Hát (Memoir of Fifty Years of Loving Music) (Saigon: Pham Quang Khai, 1968); Hơn Nửa Đời Hư (More than Half of a Failed life) (Ho Chi Minh City: Thanh Pho Ho Chi Minh Publisher, 1992); Nửa Đời Còn Lại (The Remaining Half of a Life) (Westminster, CA: Van Nghe, 1996); Sài Gòn Năm Xưa (Saigon in the Old Days) (Saigon: Tu Do, 1960; 2nd ed., Saigon: Khai Tri, 1968); and Hiếu Cổ Đặc San (Special Journal on Admiration for the Past), 6 vols. (Saigon: Vuong Hong Sen, 1970–72).

Vưu Khải Thành

(尤凯成, You Kaicheng, 1950–)

Business and community leader, promoter of education, Vietnam

Vưu Khải Thành's multinational enterprise, Biti's, is one of the largest in Vietnam. Several years ago, it was already known as a company with at least a turnover of 5,000 billion dong (US$250 millions). Today it has moved up even more notches to become a socially responsible corporation. The man behind its growth is a man with a vision and guts to cast his dreams overseas, without neglecting social responsibilities at home.

Thành's ancestors were from Da Pu county of Guangdong province, China (广东省大埔县). Thành is a second-generation Hakka born in 1950 in Mỹ Tho, the capital city of Tiền Giang province, located in the Mekong Delta of the southern region of Vietnam. His parents depended on selling traditional medical herbs for a living and lived thriftily. He attended a Chinese school for his early education, and although he did not have much education, he was reportedly an inquisitive student and was good at solving the practical problems of life. As a child, he also received early lessons in entrepreneurship while assisting his father in business.

At the age of twenty-eight in 1978, he married Lái Khiêm (Lai Qian 赖谦), who also has origins in Da Pu county. She is two years younger than him, and came from a family who ran a shoe business. As a leading manufacturer, Thành has, since a long time ago, regarded China as a "world factory, and also the world's largest market", and thus made preparations for that initial passage of "discovery and exchange" into China. Biti's (Bình Tiên 平仙) began working on developing its market in China in the early 1990s. Since then, it has seen its sales revenue in the Chinese market growing at an annual average of 30 per cent. It was pleased to know that in the trade and development plan of Vietnam 2007–15 focusing on the China market, shoes was listed as one of the key products. After twenty years in business, Biti's has won the national brand award of Vietnam and has also established a foothold in the country's market and gained a reputation in China. It overcame numerous obstacles strewn on its road to success. At first, Biti's was almost a one-man business for Thành, who was personally engaged in every process, from material procurement, market development, to delivery of goods. The earlier predecessors of Biti's were two production units of the pre-reform era, Bình Tiên (平仙) and Vạn Thành (万成), which employed a total of twenty workmen, producing slippers of simple designs. The two production units later merged to form Hợp Tác Xã Cao su Bình Tiên (平仙橡胶合作社), a cooperative located in District 6 of Ho Chi Minh City, which had 100 employees in 1986 when the economic reform of Vietnam (Đổi Mới) was ratified. In 1989 the enterprise was the first private enterprise to be granted permission to import and export. The following year in 1990, Thành visited Taiwan and invested in machinery to produce the signature product of Biti's — slippers made from ethylene vinyl acetate (EVA), a material that is competitive with rubber and vinyl, but is odourless, tough in low temperature, yet light and soft. The slippers became a hit in the market and in the following year, Biti's entered into a joint venture with a Taiwan-based footwear production company to form Công ty Liên doanh Sơn Quán (山冠联营公司). This partnership with Công ty Sun Kuan Đài Loan (台湾山冠公司) lasted eighteen years.

After more than a decade of market expansion — which also saw Biti's response and adaptation to the changes in the country's law supporting private enterprises — the company's business has rapidly expanded. In 1992, it was renamed Binh Tien Imex Corp Pte Ltd. (Công ty Sản xuất Hàng tiêu dùng Bình Tiên (Biti's) 平仙日用品制作有限公司); three years later, a new company, Binh Tien Dong Nai Imex Corp Pte Ltd. (Công ty TNHH Bình Tiên Đồng Nai [Dona Biti's] 同奈平仙有限责任公司) was incorporated. In 2000, Biti's established its first representative office in Yunnan province, China. Today, it also owns a company in the United States (美国平仙公司), managed by the brother of Thành.

Footwear business aside, the company currently owns three trade, and one business, centres in the various parts of Vietnam: Biti's Lao Cai Trade Centre in Lào Cai, Biti's Northern Trade Centre in the northern part of Vietnam, Biti's Trade Centre in Tây Nguyên, and Biti's Da Nang Business Centre in Danang (Đà Nẵng). Two more branches in the western and southern parts of Vietnam were established in 2008 and 2009 respectively.

Biti's business has diversified into construction, tourism, and trade since its inauguration in 1982. It now exports to more than forty countries, and has offices in Nanning, Guangzhou, and Kunming. Its business achievements are as impressive as its social contributions, which grew in concomitant with the company's expansion in twenty-nine years. It has also received numerous accolades along its path of development: in 1997, it was conferred the "22nd International Award" after being elected by customers in the Prestige and Quality Brand issued by the Trade Leaders' Club in Spain; it also obtained the Certificate for Vietnam High Quality Products the same year. In 2001 it was certified ISO 9001: 2000, issued by BVQI and QUACERT. Three years later, it received "The 3rd Labour Medal" from the state for its contributions to the development of the Vietnamese economy. From 2005 to 2007, it continuously won the Gold Prize for "Vietnamese Prestige and Quality Brand", organized by the Association of Science and Technology. The Vietnam Chamber of Commerce and Industry (VCCI) has further conferred on the company the "All for Business Development" medal and "Visibility 2006" certificate for its development in various aspects. Biti's was one of the forty-eight companies that received "The Excellent Brand of Vietnam's High Quality Products" in 2007.

In response to the objectives established by the Vietnam Society for the Promotion of Education in 2006, Biti's offered 1 billion dong, approximately equivalent to US$50,000, to support the society's initiative to develop the talents of Vietnam. The contribution was used as awards for excellent students in the provinces of Can Tho (Cần Thơ) and Danang, as well as those in Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City. In 2007, the value of the scholarship was increased to 1.5 billion dong; in 2008, it was increased to 2 billion, and in 2009, to 2.5 billion. Biti's has been recognized as a socially responsible enterprise among the leather, footwear and textile industries of Vietnam. It has also been noted by the media as one of the big enterprises of Vietnam which conduct the flag-raising ceremony on Monday mornings as an expression of respect to its fatherland, Vietnam.

Besides Biti's frequent support for social development initiatives, its chief executive officer, Thành, has continued to keep an overall balance with contributions to his ethnic community. Generous support for projects of Hội Quán Sùng Chính (the Hakka clan of Saigon), is still expected from this honorary adviser of the clan. His contributions included sponsorship for the purchase or construction of accoutrements for clan properties, such as the construction of the statue of the Goddess of Mercy within the compound of the charity association of the Hakka; patronage for social projects, and support in education matters relating to the Hakka clan and those of the larger ethnic Chinese community. He has also been honorary adviser to the Ho Chi Minh City's Association for the Sponsorship of Chinese-Language Education (华文教育辅助会). Despite the numerous positions he holds, he finds time for all. In his absence at meetings organized by the clan, he sends a representative to record and report the proceedings of the meetings.

W

Wanandi, (Albertus) Sofjan

(Liem Bian Khoen, 林绵昆, Lin Miankun, 1941–)

Student leader, socio-political activist, tycoon, Indonesia

Sofjan Wanandi, better known as Liem Bian Khoen to those of his generation, was an influential figure before and after the fall of Soekarno. He was a student leader in Jakarta who became a successful tycoon, known in Indonesian as konglomerat. Together with his elder brother, Jusuf Wanandi (Liem Bian Kie), he was also involved in the establishment of the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS).

Liem Bian Khoen was born in Sawahlunto (West Sumatra) on 3 March 1941 into a petty trader family. His father, Lim Gim To, and mother, Kartina Tjoa Gim Jong Nio, were locally born ethnic Chinese. Liem Bian Khoen or Sofjan has seven siblings and is the third son in the family. He received his primary and junior high school education in Padang (1948–57) and moved to Jakarta in 1957 to attend senior high school at Kanisius, graduating in 1960. He studied at Pajajaran University in Bandung for a year (1960–61) and was then transferred to the Faculty of Economics, the University of Indonesia (FEUI), where he remained as a student until 1968 without, however, finishing his studies.

Liem was active in the Catholic student movement and was an executive member in the Perhimpunan Mahasiswa Katholik Republik Indonesia (PMKRI). During the open struggle between the communist and anti-communist forces in Indonesia in 1965, Soekarno sided with the communists, while PMKRI joined hands with the anti-communist forces and the Indonesian army. After 30 September 1965 the anti-communists and anti-Soekarno student groups formed a united front known as KAMI. As an executive member of KAMI, Jakarta branch, Liem demanded the dissolution of the PKI (Partai Komunis Indonesia) and the stepping down of Soekarno. He and other university students demonstrated in the streets wearing yellow jackets to witness the end of Soekarno's "Old Order" and the ushering in of Soeharto's "New Order". From February 1967 to October 1971 he represented student groups in the new Indonesian parliament (DPR) and Provisional People's Consultative Assembly (MPRS). From 1967 to 1974 he served as assistant to Major General Soedjono Hoemardani who was personal assistant to President Soeharto for economic affairs.

Liem had always wanted to be a businessman and his wish materialized when he was given the opportunity to manage various companies that were linked to the Indonesian military. From 1974 he was made vice-president of P.T. Dharma Kencana Sakti, which was established by the Kostrad (Army Strategic Reserve Command) Foundation. There were three companies under him: P.T. Garuda Mataram (car assembly), P.T. Mandala Airways, and P.T. Dharma Putera Film. He also went on to lead P.T. Tri Usaha Bakti which operated shipping, insurance, and construction businesses. In 1974 he established the P.T.

Pakarti Yoga and served as managing director; this would later develop into the Gemala group.

In 1985, when he was asked by reporters about the companies he was managing, Liem bluntly admitted that not all the companies were doing well, but none had gone bankrupt. When asked which companies were doing better, he named those which produced batteries, petrochemicals, car batteries, and glue. As for the sale of cars, he said that it was impossible to compete with the Japanese when cars assembled in Indonesia were sold at the same price as those made in Japan. However Sofjan did overcome the difficulties and became a leading businessman in Indonesia. His Gemala Group conducts business within the country and beyond.

It was reported that in the 1980s Chinese Indonesian tycoons were invited by President Soeharto to his home at Tapos ranch in Bogor, where he teased Liem in front of the tycoons, "Yes, this is Sofjan who has become the owner of a conglomerate through the yellow jacket" ("yellow jacket" being the uniform worn by students of the University of Indonesia). Liem apparently responded calmly: "Yes, sir, one can become the president wearing the military uniform." He then smiled as if nothing had happened.

In the late 1980s the relationship between the CSIS and Soeharto became tense as Soeharto's sons and daughters were moving into business in a big way with the connivance of Soeharto. In 1995 the president summoned Chinese Indonesian businessmen to "sell" some of their shares to the co-operative. At the same time, Soeharto appointed Professor B.J. Habibie to be his deputy and this was openly opposed by Liem who supported General Try Soetrisno instead. Not surprisingly after Soeharto stepped down and Habibie became president, Liem had to leave Indonesia and live in the United States for a while, returning only when Gus Dur became president. Liem was appointed (in 2000) by Gus Dur as chairman of the Komite Pemulihan Ekonomi Nasional (National Economic Rehabilitation Committee) during the era of Reform. After that he became active again not only in business, but also in politics. In 2003 he was elected the general chairman (ketua umum) of the Indonesian Entrepreneurs' Association (Asosiasi Pengusaha Indonesia or Apindo). In that capacity he was able to reorganize the association to include both indigenous and Chinese entrepreneurs.

During the 2004 presidential election, Liem supported Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono-Jusuf Kalla (SBY-JK) while his elder brother, Jusuf Wanandi, supported Megawati-Hasyim Muzadi. It was reported that Liem and his brother did not talk to each other for a period of time due to their differences. Apparently Liem felt that the SBY-J.K. partnership was an ideal combination, but in the 2009 presidential election, SBY and J.K. fell out with each other and Liem supported J.K. in the belief that J.K. was the stronger candidate and would be a more effective president.

Liem has very cordial relationships with his brothers and sister and invited them to live with him. He even established a Sofjanto foundation for the education of his relatives' children. At the same time he was active in the Prasetiya Mulya Foundation, which provided scholarships to needy students and was also involved in building schools and helping victims of natural disasters.

Liem married The Gim Kiao (Riantini Suteja) in 1968 and has three sons who are now taking over his business. One of his sons married the daughter of Usman Admadjaja, another tycoon who was the former boss of Bank Danamon.

Wanandi, Jusuf

(Liem Bian Kie, 林绵基, Lin Mianji, 1937–)

Politician, political analyst, Indonesia

Jusuf Wanandi is an influential Peranakan Chinese politician during the Soeharto era. He was one of the founders of the Centre of International and Strategic Studies (CSIS), now a leading Indonesian and ASEAN policy institution.

Originally named Liem Bian Kie, Jusuf Wanandi was born in Sawahlunto (in West Sumatra) on 15 November 1937. He is the eldest son of Lim Gim To, a businessman who ran a pharmacy in Padang, and Katrina Tjoa Gim Jong Nio. Both his parents were also locally born. Jusuf has seven siblings and one of his younger brothers, Sofjan Wanandi (Liem Bian Khoen), was also an anti-Communist student leader in the 1960s and later became a wealthy businessman.

When Jusuf Wanandi was a child, his father sent him to a Dutch primary school in Padang rather than a Chinese school in the same town as his home languages were Dutch and Indonesian, not Chinese. He was brought up as a Catholic and received his secondary school education at a Catholic high school (Kanisius) in Jakarta. He studied law at the University of Indonesia (UI) in Jakarta from which he obtained an Indonesian law degree (SH) in 1960, and went on to become assistant lecturer (asisten dosen) at the same establishment. In 1964 he became executive secretary of the Faculty of Law at UI at the time when Professor Soejono Hadinoto was dean of the faculty. When Soejono was appointed by Soekarno as a cabinet minister and deputy chairman of the Supreme Advisory Council (DPA), he wanted to make Wanandi his secretary. The young man hesitated for a while as he wanted to go to Harvard to do a Ph.D., but eventually accepted the position after consulting a few friends, including Harry Tjan Silalahi, then secretary general of Partai Katolik (Catholic Party) of Indonesia, who advised him to accept the offer as the Catholic community would like to have its own men to keep an eye on Soekarno. At that time, Wanandi was already deputy chairman of the Indonesian Catholic University Students Association (PMKRI). His office was in the palace and he was therefore able to take part in all Soekarno's activities.

After the so-called 30 September Movement (G-30-S), all anti-communist forces joined hands to overthrow Soekarno, including Catholics and Muslims students who collaborated at the university to attain the same goal. Wanandi was the most prominent leader in PMKRI and under his leadership the PMKRI was able to play a major role in the Indonesian University Students Action Front (KAMI) that was formed before the downfall of Soekarno, who eventually surrendered his power to Soeharto on 11 March 1966. During this period, Soeharto's personal staff, especially Major General Ali Moertopo, reached out to Wanandi and his Partai Katolik colleagues for support against the PKI (Partai Komunis Indonesia). When Soeharto became president, Moertopo was appointed personal assistant to President Soeharto for Special Affairs. Wanandi and his colleagues such as Harry Tjan joined Ali Moertopo's staff.

Between 1967 and 1971 Wanandi was appointed a member of the Indonesian Parliament (DPR) and the People's Consultative Assembly (MPRS). When the government party, GOLKAR (Functional Groups), was organized prior to the 1971 general elections, Wanandi played a notable role in helping to organize GOLKAR and its election strategies, and became deputy secretary general of its central board. In September 1971 he and other pro-Army intellectuals established the CSIS. The organization, supported by Moertopo, has been engaged in research for the Indonesian Government. In May 1973 Wanandi and other prominent members of the centre made a controversial tour of the United States defending Soeharto's various policies. Wanandi was also a member of the MPR (1972–87) and a member of the foreign affairs section of the DPP GOLKAR (1982–87).

The influence of CSIS was closely connected with Major General Ali Moertopo, whose political power began to decline after 1982 as he lost his position as minister of information. With his death in 1984, CSIS found a new patron in Armed Forces Chief General Benny Murdani. But CSIS's political influence in the domestic politics of Indonesia declined with Murdani's death. The break with Soeharto came in 1988 when Wanandi became critical of Soeharto and his family. He revealed that in 1987, after another GOLKAR victory in the election, he had sent a note to Soeharto appealing to the latter to prepare a new team for the coming years to deal with the complex situation. Soeharto interpreted this as an appeal to him to step down and the relationship between Soeharto and CSIS became estranged. It seems that Wanandi's relations with the Soeharto group deteriorated until 1997, when he and his brother were accused of supporting radicals in bombing the Tanah Abang market (Jakarta) and were detained for questioning, but the accusation proved to be unfounded.

In fact, Wanandi is better known for his role in foreign affairs, representing not only the CSIS, but often Indonesia. He has been writing widely in foreign newspapers and periodicals, expressing his views on Indonesian foreign policies and issues of regional cooperation and security. He is noted as a contributor to the concept of ASEAN regional cooperation and especially to the Indonesian view of the ASEAN security community. His columns in the Jakarta Post have been compiled into a volume: Global, Regional and National: Strategic Issues & Linkages, published in 2006.

As a Peranakan Chinese, Wanandi favoured the policy of assimilation for the Chinese in Indonesia. However, almost forty years after the implementation of the assimilation policy, the May 1998 riots erupted victimizing Chinese Indonesians because the indigenous Indonesians had still not accepted Chinese Indonesians as an integral part of the Indonesian nation. Wanandi took the view that the assimilation movement had failed because Soeharto did not implement the policy consistently, and the government did not seriously tackle the economic gaps between different ethnic groups. However, Wanandi and his CSIS colleagues did not address the assimilation policy per se.

Wanandi is currently senior fellow at CSIS and vice-chairman of the board of trustees of the CSIS Foundation. He is also on the Indonesian national committee for the "Pacific Economic Co-operation Council" (PECC) Standing Committee, and chairman of the Indonesian "Council for Security Cooperation in Asia Pacific" (CSCAP). He is president-director of the Jakarta Post, an English daily, as well as chairman of the Graduate School of Management Prasetya Mulya. Additionally, he is a member of various international advisory councils of the Asia Society (New York), the East-West Centre (Hawaii), and Babson College (Wellesley, Massachusetts). Besides, he is also a leading collector of Indonesian, especially Balinese, art, which he has been active in promoting. His collected pieces have been included in several international exhibitions on Indonesian art.

Wang Gungwu

(王賡武, Wang Gengwu, 1930–)
Scholar, educator, university administrator, public intellectual, Singapore and Malaysia

Wang Gungwu grew up in a multicultural and migrant setting which was to influence his later life as a scholar, educator, university administrator, and public intellectual. He was born in Dutch Indonesia, brought up in British Malaya, and had his tertiary education in China, Singapore, and the United Kingdom. As a distinguished historian, he has pioneered research and defined the new fields of study on the Chinese diaspora and China-Southeast Asian relations, even though mainstream Chinese history is said to be his first love. Embracing the long duration, multidisciplinary, and comparative approach, he writes about the ancient past, analyses the contemporary present, and occasionally offers insight into the near future. Through his academic writing, undergraduate, and graduate instruction, as well as informal mentoring, he has moulded a new generation of scholars scattered across the world, particularly in the Asia-Pacific region.

Wang Gungwu was born in Surabaya, Indonesia, but was raised in Ipoh, Malaysia, from the age of two. For his early schooling, he went through the English-medium education system, but acquired a strong grounding in Chinese classics and history under the watchful eyes of his father, Wang Fo Wen, who was a federal inspector of Chinese schools in Kuala Lumpur before he retired to become principal of a Chinese high school in Johor Bahru. The family decided in 1947 that he should go to China to pursue his undergraduate studies at the National Central University in Nanjing, but he was forced to return by December 1948 as the Chinese civil war between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communist Party escalated in intensity. He went on to complete his Bachelor of Arts (Honours) in 1953 at the University of Malaya, then located in Singapore, writing a history thesis on Chinese reformist and Revolutionaries in the Straits Settlement. He stayed on and obtained his Master of Arts in 1955 through a study on early Chinese trade in the South China Sea. He then went over to the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London and secured in 1957 his Doctor of Philosophy degree in Chinese history. His doctorate was based on the topic of power structure in North China during the era of Five Dynasties, contesting the traditional interpretation that Song represented a clean break from the Tang dynasty, and arguing that most political innovations had in fact emerged during the pre-Song interregnum.

That sojourner background and broad educational experience have shaped his general research direction. Apart from his heightened sensitivity towards Southeast Asian people and culture, he acquired a firm command of the English and Chinese languages, together with a degree of fluency in Malay, Hakka, and Cantonese. Although his home discipline is history, he is receptive towards interdisciplinary and comparative approaches. His avowedly first love is mainstream Chinese history, but his research and teaching interest have steadily propelled him beyond the Chinese territorial border into the "external" history of Chinese overseas communities. He has come to be regarded as the most comprehensive historian of the Chinese overseas, but one who is also simultaneously most firmly grounded in the history of China itself. This two-legged and interconnected approach has enabled him to become the doyen of the fields of study on the Chinese diaspora and China-Southeast Asian interactions, leading the scholarly world into probing the intriguing dynamics of maritime commerce, migratory flows, power relations, cultural make-up, and identity politics. Along the way he has also shared views on controversial issues such as the use of history as a tool for nation building, Confucianism's political role, size and wealth of the Chinese overseas, implications of a resurgent China, rise of nationalism among Chinese youth, patience in waiting for democracy in Hong Kong, as well as danger of new empire building in Southeast Asia by larger state entities.

His career path in university teaching, research, and academic administration began with a lecturing post at the University of Malaya in Singapore in 1957. He opted to go over to the Kuala Lumpur campus when that was launched in 1959, serving as dean of the Arts Faculty from 1962–63 and head of the History Department from 1963–68. He then left for Australia to head the Department of Far Eastern History at the Research School of Pacific Studies, Australian National University, from 1968–75 and 1980–86, and to serve as the director of the research school from 1975–80. Wang took up the challenge of being the vice-chancellor/president of the University of Hong Kong from 1986–95, a turbulent period when the British colony was in a high state of anxiety, preparing for the return of its sovereignty to the People's Republic of China. After having spent a decade in Hong Kong, he opted to return to Singapore in 1996 to lead and transform the Institute of East Asian Political Economy into the East Asian Institute. It was not an easy decision as he was then flooded with many job invitations from all over the world. His Singapore-Malaysian roots and the Southeast Asian region as a historic focal point for the Chinese diaspora weighed in on the matter. So did the preference of his wife, Margaret, to stay within Asia and the persuasive power of Goh Keng Swee, a friend from his days as a postgraduate student in London. Many of his university administrative roles had been time-consuming, but they demonstrate how he has always cherished the principle of academic institutions being administered by scholars themselves.

His high profile as a public intellectual who is firmly embedded within the larger society, rather than isolated within the ivory tower, has followed the intellectual tradition of Chinese classical literati and new intelligentsia, particularly those of the post-May Fourth era. As an undergraduate, he participated in student politics of the 1950s, being the first president of the University Socialist Club and writer of poetry and fiction for student publications. Later as an academic, he edited journals and promoted public discussion on Southeast Asian issues for the South Seas Society, Malayan Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, and Singapore Society of Asian Studies. Subscribing to the cause of nation building and to the notion of a Malayan identity, he led a major curriculum review of the Nanyang University in 1965 that proved controversial partly because of its language recommendations, and briefly entered the Malaysian political fray by lending support to the founding in 1968 of a new Malaysian multi-ethnic political party, the Gerakan Ra'ayat (People's Movement). When in Australia, he promoted Asian studies across the country, marched in the anti-Vietnam War protests, and helped government agencies to forge a new relationship with communist China when the Chinese nation decided to reform and open up from the late 1970s. In Hong Kong he was also an important public intellectual voice in the sensitive process of the colony being returned to China. After his "home-coming" to Singapore and Southeast Asia from the second half of 1990s, he helped shape the character of several new public institutions, such as the Sun Yat Sen Nanyang Memorial Hall, Chinese Heritage Centre, and Hua-Song Museum within the Haw Par Villa, by serving either as a member of the Board of Governors or as a key adviser.

In terms of general personality, he is warm and approachable. Many students and scholars have benefited from his influence. Although the world is his oyster, it is fortuitous for Southeast Asia in general, and Singapore, in particular, to have him to decide to "return home" in the final stretch of his academic life. In appreciation of his contributions, the National University of Singapore conferred on him the Outstanding Service Award in 2005, and the highest honour of a University Professor in 2007. Soon after the latter, he stepped down from directorship of the East Asian Institute, but has remained active on campus and continued to partake in many of its academic activities.

Wang Gungwu is married to Margaret Lim Ping-ting and they have one son and two daughters.

Wee Boon Ping

(黄文彬, Huang Wenbin, 1936–98)

Entrepreneur, community leader, business figure, Malaysia

Tan Sri Datuk Amar Wee Boon Ping, a business tycoon and an activist in association and cultural education works, was a well known Chinese entrepreneur both in Malaysia and the international business world. He was blessed with knowledge of many businesses in addition to his own. During his lifetime he was a famous philanthropist, who was generous and sponsored numerous local community charity, educational, cultural, and sports activities.

A Hokkien from the clan of Jin Jiang (晋江), he was born in 1936 in Kuching, Sarawak. Wee was called the "Timber King" and at one time owned 540,000 acres of timber concessions in Sabah — equivalent to approximately three times the area of Singapore. He passed away on 20 October 1998, aged sixty-two.

His humble beginnings dated back to 1960, when he ventured into construction and then lumbering in 1963. He had also diverse business interests, including newspapers and publishing (Borneo Publishing Pte. Ltd., Wee Boon Ping News Corporation, International Times Kuching, International Times Miri, and Berita Petang Sarawak), land and property and housing development, etc. Despite his heavy workload due to his vast business interests, he was never reluctant to give a helping hand to local cultural and educational projects.

Wee Boon Ping was the youngest in a family of twelve children, including six sons. His father was Kapitan Wee Cheng En (黄承恩) who came to Sarawak from China in 1921 as a labourer. The family was poor, especially during the Japanese Occupation. Wee was an intelligent child and soon after secondary education he joined his brother's business. Not long afterwards he ventured into business on his own. He was married to Liu Xun Qin (刘训卿) and they had three sons and seven daughters.

He was widely recognized by the public as an "ambassador" to China due to his good working relationship with the Chinese authorities. Throughout his life, he played many important roles in the country. He was a member of the Malaysia National Economic Consultative Council, an honorary member of the China Council for the Promotion of International Trade (CCPIT) (1989), an honorary adviser for the Malaysia-China Friendship Association (PPMC), president (1978–98) and honorary president of The Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Malaysia (ACCCIM), president of The Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Sarawak (ACCCIS) (1978–98), chairman of UNICO Holding Ltd., vice-president of the Confederation of Chinese Associations Malaysia, president of the Confederation of Chinese Associations, Sarawak, president of The Federation of Kuching And Samarahan Division Chinese Association Sarawak (1977–98), and of many other associations.

At the same time, Wee was also a director of Wee Boon Ping Enterprises Sdn. Bhd., chief executive officer of Kim Chuan Seng Holdings Sdn. Bhd., president of Wee Boon Ping Newspaper Corporation Sdn. Bhd., and a general manager of Wee Hood Teck Development Corporation Sdn. Bhd. In addition to his power base in Sarawak, Wee also owned businesses in many other places locally and globally. His investments overseas included petroleum retail in China, textile and shipping in Malacca, and a timber and construction business in Sabah.

His excellent achievements earned him numerous awards from the royalty in Malaysia. In 1978, he was given the "PGDK" honorific with the title "Dato" by the Yang di-Pertua Negeri of Sabah, and he received the "PSM" honorific with the title "Tan Sri" from the Yang di-Pertuan Agong in 1984, and the "DA" honorific with the title "Datuk Amar" from the Yang di-Pertua Negeri of Sarawak in 1993.

Wee was a hard-working and thrifty person. He was meticulous in everything he did, especially his business, and was recognized as a Chinese businessman with a very sharp vision and charisma. He was strict with himself, energetic, practical, and sincere and was praised both within the country and internationally.

He used to say, "In business, you need not be rivals with foreigners", "In an unstable situation, although many professionals are scared, a real entrepreneur must strike to continue his business, with a twist of your brain, the situation will become better and better." He also said, "There is a strong strength with me, it is stronger than any other advice. You must prepare to face any type of emergency and then be patient to overcome every obstacle. At the same time, you must always have a hungry stomach."

Wee played an important role in bridging any gap between Malaysian Chinese businessmen, Chinese associations and the government. He also actively developed the commercial relationship between China and Malaysia and was often vocal and critical of government policies if they had any negative effects on Chinese businesses. He was actively involved in improving the welfare of the Chinese community. During the implementation of the New Economy Policy, he sent five representatives to the National Economic Consultative Council to express the voice of the Chinese businessmen through the proper channel.

Wee also gave a lot of thought to developing the Chinese community. He made every effort to establish a strong foundation for the Malaysia-China trade relationship. Through his efforts, the Malaysian Chinese are now playing an important business role in Asia and the international business arena.

When Wee Boon Ping passed away in 1998, the then China ambassador to Malaysia, Qian Jin Chang (钱锦昌) praised him as a generous, sincere, and well respected person. He said, "I am sad to lose a good friend. What he did was for the benefit of China and Malaysia. I wish that his spirit of good works would be continued."

Wee's close friend, Tan Kai Hee (陈凯希), recognized him as a capable leader, especially during his twenty years of leadership in the Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Malaysia (ACCCIM). According to Tan, Wee's charisma as a leader was undeniable. He was the only person trusted by both China and Malaysia. "Tan Sri Wee was a strategist, he practises what he preaches. His leadership style was practical, just, and without prejudice. He trusted his fellow workers. He was open to new ideas and worked with people who opposed him. That is why in his twenty years of leadership, there was no internal conflict in ACCCIM."

Former Malaysia Chinese Association (MCA) president Ling Liong Sik (林良实) said, "He was an excellent leader in [the] Chinese business world. He has contributed to the country's economic growth in the past 10 years." This was but one of the many praises heaped on this truly successful and well respected Chinese business tycoon who left an indelible mark on the Malaysian corporate scene.

Wee Cho Yaw

(黄祖耀, Huang Zuyao, 1929–)
Banker, Singapore

Wee Cho Yaw, one of the best known veterans of the Singapore banking industry, is not just a banker but also a well respected figure and prominent leader of the Chinese community in Singapore.

Wee was born in 1929 in Quemoy (Jinmen) in Fujian. He was the fourth son of Datuk Wee Kheng Chiang who began as an employee of a British trading house, moved on to work for Ong Tiang Swee, the wealthiest and most prominent Hokkien leader in Sarawak, before setting up his own company, Wee Kheng Chiang & Co, which dealt in gambier and rubber. The elder Wee perhaps also paved the way for his son's future career in 1920 when he set up the Bian Chiang Bank in Sarawak and later became one of the founding directors and the first chairman of the United Chinese Bank (UCB), the forerunner of United Overseas Bank (UOB) in 1935.

Wee spent his early childhood in China until 1937 when his father moved the entire family to Kuching, where he lived briefly before moving on to Singapore, where he attended primary school. His education was interrupted by the Japanese Occupation during which his family had moved to the Dutch East Indies (present-day Indonesia) for safety reasons. After the surrender of the Japanese in 1945, the Wees returned to Singapore again where he resumed schooling at Chinese High School for about one year before transferring to Chung Cheng High School for the rest of his education.

In 1949, at the age of twenty, he left school to start work in the family trading firm, Kheng Leong, which was established as an international commodity and spice trading firm. Having honed his business acumen in Kheng Leong, Wee then joined the UCB as the youngest member of the board of directors in 1958. Two years later, at the age of thirty-one, he was appointed managing director of the bank, and went on to succeed his father as chairman of the bank when the elder Wee retired in 1974. It would be under his leadership that the UCB, which changed its name to United Overseas Bank in 1965, grew from its roots as one of many banks in Singapore to become the largest local bank with widespread interests in Southeast Asia and China.

The expansion of UOB in Singapore and Asia began in 1965 with the opening of the first overseas branch in Hong Kong. From then on, the bank grew quickly through a series of acquisitions of interests in smaller Singapore and foreign banks such as Chung Khiaw Bank in 1971, Lee Wah Bank in 1973, Far Eastern Bank in 1984, Industrial & Commercial Bank in 1987, Westmont Bank in the Philippines and Thailand's Radanasin Bank in 1999, and Thailand's Bank of Asia and Indonesia's Bank Buana in 2004. In 2006, UOB became the first Singapore bank to operate a full branch in China with the upgrading of its Chengdu representative office, thus marking another milestone in the growth of the bank.

In June 2001, Wee pulled off the greatest coup of his career when he snatched local rival Overseas Union Bank (OUB) from the unsolicited takeover attempt of government-backed Development Bank of Singapore (DBS). His counteroffer of $10 billion for OUB, his largest to date, topped DBS's offer of $9.4 billion. His personal approach to the acquisition, through a visit to Lien Ying Chow, founder of OUB, with his argument that a "merger" between the two Chinese banks would not only ensure the survival of the OUB heritage but also greater competitive edge in the consolidated banking industry in Singapore, won him the deal. It also won him the admiration of market observers who regarded it as a victory of private enterprise over a government-linked institution. However, the resultant subsuming of OUB into the UOB group, and the extinction of the OUB name and heritage, was seen as somewhat unorthodox for a "merger", and attracted some criticisms following the move.

The OUB coup was neither the first nor last time that Wee was to go head-to-head against a government-linked institution. The next clash came in May 2004 when he had to defend his interests in and control of UOB from yet another government-linked institution, Temasek Holdings, which launched an unsolicited takeover bid for UOB's stake in United Overseas Land (UOL), the property group with a 4 per cent interest in the bank. The tussle over UOL ended with Wee in an even stronger position within UOB, strengthened by other strategic moves that he made such as putting his youngest son, Wee Ee Lim, in charge of Haw Par Corp, which holds a 4 per cent stake in the bank, his second son, Wee Ee Chao, as head of UOB-Kay Hian Holdings, UOB's brokerage arm, and his eldest son, Wee Ee Cheong, as his heir apparent at UOB. It was a clear indication of his strong attachment to the bank which he once described as his second family.

The strong sense of attachment to his second family would be seen again in 2006 when Wee made a case for family-run businesses at the Asian Chinese Entrepreneurs Summit organized by the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry, expressing his reservations about leaving a company totally in the hands of professional managers. In a speech that seemed to be paving the way for his son, Wee Ee Cheong, to succeed him as the third-generation Wee to helm the bank, Wee Cho Yaw suggested that the advantage of family entrepreneurs over professional managers is that family entrepreneurs place more importance on long-term interests than short-term gains. Disputing the commonly held notion that family wealth does not last more than three generations, he further suggested that a balance between family control providing direction, and professional management providing expertise, would be the ideal situation. In 2007, in line with the new corporate governance regulations for banks and life insurers announced by the Monetary Authority of Singapore (MAS) in 2005, which required the separation of the roles of chairman and chief executive officer, Wee stepped down as chief executive of the UOB group in favour of his son. He, however, continues to retain the title of group chairman, stating his intention to continue serving as chairman and overseeing the strategic growth of the bank as long as his health permits.

Widely acknowledged as the moving force behind the expansion of the banking group which had also branched into other financial services and property development, Wee saw his business acumen and contribution to Singapore's banking industry acknowledged by Singapore's business community when he was named "Businessman of the Year" at the Singapore Business Award in 1990, an award he would win again in 2001. In 1995, on the sixtieth anniversary of UOB, he was also given the "ASEAN Businessman of the Year" Award by the ASEAN Business Forum.

In addition to his business activities, Wee Cho Yaw is also well known for his community work, especially within the Chinese community in Singapore, and for his contributions to the development of Singapore in the early years of independence. In 1969, he was appointed a member of the Economic Development Board and the Singapore Currency Board, and a year later, in 1970, he was made chair of the Singapore Science Centre Board. That same year, he was also made chair of the Nanyang University Council, a position he held till 1980. It was during his chairmanship of the Nanyang University Council that changes were implemented by the PAP government to merge Nanyang University with the University of Singapore to form the National University of Singapore. For his contributions, he was awarded the Public Service Star Award (Bintang Bakti Masyarakat) in 1974.

Within the Chinese business community, Wee Cho Yaw has also played a very active role in the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry (SCCCI). He served as president of the SCCCI from 1969–73, and took up a second term from 1977–79. His second term as president of the SCCCI was held concurrently with his presidency of the Singapore Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry (1978–82), as well as his presidency of the ASEAN-Chambers of Commerce and Industry, from 1979–81. For his contributions to the SCCCI, he is honoured as its honorary president.

Within the Hokkien community in Singapore, Wee Cho Yaw is also active in promoting the culture of his dialect group. He has served as chairman of the Singapore Hokkien Huay Kuan (SHHK) for sixteen consecutive terms from 1972 to 2010. Under his leadership, the SHHK not only maintained temples and other cultural heritage sites, but also saw to the preservation of Hokkien culture and education through the establishment of the Hokkien Foundation in 1977, which provides financial support for scholarships and study loans, and which funded the SHHK Arts and Cultural Troupe in 1986 so it could conduct traditional arts and cultural classes for the younger generation of Hokkiens in Singapore.

In the larger Chinese community, he served as president of the Singapore Federation of Chinese Clan Associations that was established in 1986 by the major Chinese clan associations in Singapore to work together to preserve and uphold Chinese culture and traditions. His interest in the preservation of the Chinese heritage can be further seen in his chairmanship of the board of the Chinese Heritage Centre, a research centre established to expand interest and research on the overseas Chinese in Singapore and beyond. He is also chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Chinese Development Assistance Council, a self-help group set up by the SCCCI and various Chinese clan associations to help the lower-income group and academically weak Chinese students in Singapore through various welfare schemes.

Wee Cho Yaw is married with three sons and two daughters.

Wee Chong Jin

(黄宗仁, Huang Zongren, 1917–2005)
Lawyer, Singapore

Wee Chong Jin was the first Asian chief justice of Singapore. He was born in Georgetown, Penang, on 28 September 1917, the eldest child of Wee Gim Puay and Lim Paik Yew. He had a brother and four sisters. The elder Wee was a prominent businessman in the rubber trade. Although Wee Gim Puay and his wife were both Chinese-educated, they determined that all their children should have an English education. Wee Chong Jin was educated at the Penang Free School from which he graduated in 1934. He successfully applied for a place to read law at St Johns College, Cambridge, but was unable to take up the place immediately as he was only seventeen years old. He then spent a year travelling with his father before going to Cambridge in October 1935.

At Cambridge Wee found himself fully immersed in sports: badminton, tennis, hockey, and cricket. He was a natural sportsman and had a lifelong passion for sports. Wee won a half-blue for badminton and captained the St John's College team. He was also a member of its lawn tennis team and represented the university's Crusaders Club in cricket. He excelled at his studies, securing upper second-class honours in Parts I and II of the Law Tripos. In 1938 he graduated with a B.A. degree and won a four-year McMahon law studentship worth £200 a year. Wee had initially thought that he would have to spend a year preparing for the Bar examinations as several subjects were not covered at Cambridge. But on his return from a Parisian holiday, he signed up for the Bar Finals. He then proceeded to cram for the examinations, not expecting to clear it the first time around. To his amazement, he passed his Bar finals (third class) and was not even twenty-one years old yet. He was called to the Bar in November 1938 at the Middle Temple.

Through the Council of Legal Education, he found pupillage in London at the chambers of John Galway Foster, QC. He was to have read in chambers for twelve months, but felt the urge to return to Penang after less than six months of pupillage. Foster agreed to let him go and he arrived back in Penang in September 1939. His timing could not have been better for had he served out his full pupillage term in London, he would have been stuck there throughout the war years. On his return, his father told him that C.D.D. Hogan of the well-known Penang law firm of Adams, Hogan and Allan, wanted Wee to read in chambers with him. Wee was called to the Bar of the Straits Settlements on 11 March 1940. Just as he was settling into practice in Penang, his friend from London, John Po Guan Hock, wrote to him asking if he would be interested in working for the firm of Allen & Gledhill in Singapore. Wee decided to leave Penang for Singapore, quite possibly because he also wanted to avoid matchmaking efforts by friends and relatives in Penang. His paternal grandfather was in Singapore, as were several other relatives. Wee rented a flat in Tiong Bahru and joined Allen & Gledhill on 1 January 1941, the first Chinese lawyer to do so. There he worked primarily for David Keri Walters (D.K. Walters), its leading partner.

In less than a year, Wee's career came to a standstill as the Japanese invaded Malaya. He was stuck in Singapore with his mother and two sisters and was unable to contact the rest of his family in Penang until the family chauffeur turned up to bring him news that everyone was safe. He managed to secure train tickets back to Penang and, with the rest of the family, sat out the war. In the last days of the Japanese Occupation, Wee was arrested by the Japanese secret police, the Kempeitai, on some trumped up charge. They tortured him for four or five days before placing him in solitary confinement. He was released on the fifth day. After the war, Wee returned to Singapore in 1946 and recommenced his legal career at Allen & Gledhill.

Walters, who was most impressed by Wee's work and abilities, proposed in 1948 to make him a partner in the firm. His European partners were appalled as they could not imagine having an Asian partner. Walters resigned from the firm in disgust and established his own law firm, D.K. Walters & Co, and took Wee along with him. Wee practised alongside Walters till 1950 when Walters died, leaving him his entire library. Wee then joined his old Cambridge friend, Wee Eng Lock, in the firm of Wee Swee Teow & Company, as a partner.

On 14 August 1957 he was appointed puisne judge, replacing retiring Justice C.H. Whitton. He was only thirty-nine years old and was the second local person to be appointed to the bench (the first being Tan Ah Tah). He was also the youngest member of the Bench. Wee, an innately shy person, carried out his judicial duties with great efficiency and a minimum of fuss. He was sharp and his knowledge of all areas of law was considerable. As Singapore moved towards independence, Wee was sworn in as Singapore's first Asian chief justice on 5 January 1963. He was only forty-four at the time.

Wee was to serve as Singapore's chief justice for an amazing twenty-seven years. His service was extended three times after he reached the retirment age of sixty-five in 1982. He retired from the Bench in September 1990. During his tenure as chief justice, he presided over independent Singapore's only Constitutional Commission (1966) and was the first chief justice to act as president in the head of state's absence (1985). At the time of his retirement, he was the longest serving chief justice of the Commonwealth. During his twenty-seven years in office, he wrote 326 reported judgments. In 1992, together with his old friend, David Marshall, he was made honorary life member and fellow of the Singapore Academy of Law, the highest honour in the legal profession. Shortly before his retirement, Wee was conferred an honorary DCL (Doctor of Civil Law) by Oxford University. In August 1991, he was awarded the Distinguished Service Order. He died on 5 June 2005 from lung cancer. He was survived by his wife, Cecilia Henderson, his three sons, Laurence, John, and Patrick, and daughter, Vernoica.

Wee Kim Wee

(黄金辉, Huang Jinhui, 1915–2005)
Singapore's fourth president, journalist, diplomat

Wee Kim Wee was Singapore's fourth president. A man from humble beginnings, he started life as a clerk. He later became a journalist, a diplomat, and eventually rose to Singapore's highest office. An avuncular, friendly, and humble man, Wee was one of Singapore's most loved presidents.

Wee was born in Singapore on 4 November 1915, the son of Wee Choon Lay and Chua Lay Huan. The family lived in a rented house in Holland Road and he first studied at Pearl's Hill School and then Raffles Institution. Wee was an avid sportsman who played soccer, basketball, table-tennis, badminton, cricket, and golf, but it was in badminton that he truly excelled. In 1932, he got together with twelve other friends in Kampong Bahru to form the Useful Badminton Party. Six years later, he won the Singapore Junior Men's Championship singles title, beating some eighty other competitors from fifty badminton clubs affiliated to the Singapore Badminton Association. He was to maintain a lifelong connection with the badminton fraternity, even serving as the association's treasurer, honorary secretary, vice-president, and president.

In his youth, Wee had to leave school immediately after completing his Standard VII examinations as his father had become blind and he needed to help supplement the family income. His uncle, Tan Kok Tiong, recommended him for a position at The Straits Times where he was employed as a clerk in the circulation department at the age of fifteen. Later, he worked in the advertising department and while in his twenties, got his first break as a reporter when he was allowed to cover sports events after his regular work hours. In 1941, he resigned from The Straits Times and joined the American news agency, United Press Association (UPA), as office manager. During the Japanese Occupation, he worked briefly as a hawker selling tapioca cakes his wife baked and then later in the Naval Base. After the war, he resumed his work with UPA where he rose from sub-editor to be chief correspondent and office manager for Singapore, Malaya, Borneo, and Brunei. He remained there till 1959 when he rejoined The Straits Times as deputy editor for Singapore (there being two offices, one in Singapore and another in Kuala Lumpur, Malaya).

Wee developed a talent for political and foreign affairs and diplomatic reporting and his bylines filed from far-flung locales became a regular feature in the newspaper. One of his most outstanding "scoops" was his 1966 interview in Jakarta with Lieutenant General Soeharto who told Wee that he intended to end Konfrontasi or "Confrontation". Wee was promoted to editorial manager in 1970 and in 1973, at the age of fifty-eight, retired from journalism and was appointed Singapore's high commissioner to Malaysia, a post he held till 1980. In Kuala Lumpur, Wee was dean of the Diplomatic Corps from 1978 to 1980. In 1980, at the conclusion of his tour of duty, he was appointed Singapore's ambassador to Japan and he remained on till 1984. From 1981 to 1984, Wee served concurrently as Singapore's ambassador to Korea. He retired from the Foreign Service in 1984 and was appointed chairman of the Singapore Broadcasting Corporation. On 30 August 1985, Parliament elected him Singapore's fourth president.

Wee was an extremely popular president. His avuncular manner and easy smile made him many friends and admirers. During his presidency, the powers of the president were substantially enlarged and the office transformed into a popular-elected one by amendments to the Constitution. Under the transitional provisions in the Constitution, he became Singapore's "first elected president". In 1989, he underwent two major operations for cancer of the rectum and a prostrate problem, but recovered sufficiently to resume his presidential duties. When he retired from office in 1993, numerous accolades were heaped on him.

During his long career, Wee also served as: president, Singapore Press Club; chairman, Singapore Anti-Tuberculosis Association; president, Singapore Badminton Association; deputy chairman, Cathay Organisation Holdings; and director, Somerset Holdings Ltd. and The Ascott Ltd. He was also a member of: Rent Control Board; Films Appeal Committee; Land Acquisition Board; Board of Visiting Justices; National Theatre Trust; and patron of the Chinese Swimming Club; Singapore Cancer Society; Singapore Turf Club; Singapore Repertory Theatre; and the Singapore National Olympic Council. In 1966, he was made a justice of the peace.

For his public services, Wee was honoured with a Public Service Medal in 1963; a Public Service Star in 1979; and a Meritorious Service Medal in 1979. In 1993, he was conferred the "Darjah Utama Temasek" or "Order of Temasek" (First Class), Singapore's highest honour. The following year, the National University of Singapore, of which he had been chancellor, honoured him with an honorary Doctor of Letters degree. Other decorations he received include: the Laila Utama (Most Esteemed Family Order), Brunei (1990); Distinguished Service Award, Asia-Pacific Region Scout Committee (1998); Knight of the Grand Cross, Order of Bath (1989); and Special Inaugural Award for Distinguished Service to Journalism (1996). The Nanyang Technological University (NTU) also established the Wee Kim Wee Professorship in Communication Studies in Wee's honour on 4 November 1995. In 2006, the School of Communication and Information at the NTU was officially named the Wee Kim Wee School of Communication and Information after more than S$27 million was raised for the Wee Kim Wee Legacy Fund.

In 2004, Wee published Glimpses and Reflections, an autobiographical pastiche. Royalties and funds raised from the book, totalling some $500,000, were donated to eight charities. Wee died on 2 May 2005 of prostrate cancer. He was given a state funeral and was mourned by hundreds of thousands of ordinary Singaporeans. He was survived by his wife, Koh Sok Hiong (whom he married in 1936), one son and six daughters.

Wee Swee Teow

(黃瑞朝, Huang Ruizhao, 1880–1954)
Lawyer, community leader, Singapore

Wee Swee Teow was born on 26 March 1880 in Singapore, the eldest son of Wee Kim Chuan. The elder Wee was at one time, senior dispenser in The Dispensary, located on Battery Road. After working at The Dispensary for a time, Wee Kim Chuan established his own dispensary in collaboration with a Dr Moore. Swee Teow had a brother, Swee Cheng and two younger sisters. He was educated at the Kampong Glam Government Branch School and then at Raffles Institution where he proved himself an able scholar. He even attempted the Queen's Scholarship examination in 1898, coming in 5th overall. He won the Institution Scholarship and completed his secondary education in 1899.

He went to work for a commercial firm for a few months but was invited back to Raffles Institution as an Assistant Master by the Headmaster, R.W. Hullett. Wee was assigned to teach Standard V where he covered English, Arithmetic and Geography. He resigned from his teaching post in 1908 to read law. Sometime between 1899 and 1908, Wee married Tan Kim Neo, great-granddaughter of Tan Oo Long, older brother of millionaire philanthropist Tan Tock Seng. By the time he departed for England, Wee had three daughters: Geok Imm, Geok Poon and Geok Hay.

Armed with recommendations from two English barristers, Swee Teow headed for Gray's Inn where he did well, winning prizes in criminal law and procedure. He was called to the Bar at Gray's Inn in 1911, and in Singapore on 2 January 1912. As the profession was dominated by European lawyers, it was difficult for locals to gain entry into these firms. Wee teamed up with another brilliant lawyer he met in London — Chan Sze Jin (better known as S.J. Chan) — to establish Chan and Swee Teow at Change Alley. The two young lawyers were well connected with the Chinese business community and especially to the Peranakan families and this provided them with a steady stream of clients. Chan and Swee Teow went their separate ways at the end of 1920 with Chan setting up Chan and Eber with R.L. Eber, and Wee establishing Wee Swee Teow & Company.

Wee took on as partner, his old friend from Raffles Institution and the Bar, Mohamed Ismail bin Mohamed Sahib, who became in 1911, the first Muslim called to the Straits Settlements Bar. Ismail had been practising in Johor when Wee invited him to join him. Within a very short time, Swee Teow and Ismail established a profitable and satisfying practice. For the first 8 years, Swee Teow and Ismail practised as a two-man team, with Swee Teow handling most of the conveyancing and chancery practice and Ismail doing the litigation. In 1929, the partnership welcomed a new assistant, Toh Gim Hann (better known as G.H. Toh). Toh was the third son of Dato Toh Ah Boon, a well-known businessman, community leader and philanthropist in Johore. Toh Gim Hann was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford and had been called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1928. He was called to the local Bar on 13 May 1929, where upon he joined Wee Swee Teow & Company. Toh's tenure at the firm was short-lived. Sometime in 1931, he decided to return to Johor and establish his own practice. Toh disappeared during the Japanese Occupation and was presumed killed. When Toh Gim Hann left the firm, Swee Teow and Ismail continued in partnership without the help of any other legal assistant.

At about the time of Toh's departure, the firm listed as one of its partners, Yong Shook Lin, a senior lawyer who had been called to the Federated Malay States Bar in 1919. It remains a mystery why Shook Lin was listed as a partner of the firm since he already had a flourishing practice in Kuala Lumpur. Quite possibly, he affiliated himself with Wee Swee Teow & Company to work on some Singapore matters or to get called to the Straits Settlements Bar. Whatever the reasons, he clearly found it an enriching experience and told his only son, Pung How (later to become Chief Justice of Singapore) that if he needed a place to read in chambers in Singapore, he should consider no other firm. There is no record of Shook Lin being a member of the firm after 1931.

When Ismail left the partnership in 1935 to return to practice in Johor, Wee took on Ooi Khye Thuan (K.T. Ooi), another Queen Scholar from Penang, as his assistant. Three years later, Wee's only son, Eng Lock returned from his law studies in the United Kingdom. A graduate of Cambridge University, Eng Lock was called to the Singapore Bar in 1938 and joined his father's firm as an assistant that same year. Ooi left Wee's firm to practice in Braddell Brothers, leaving only the father and son team in the firm.

Between 1942 and 1945, the firm ceased practice and the Wee family retreated to a relative's home in Geylang. Practice resumed shortly after Liberation with Wee and his son rebuilding the firm, this time as partners. In 1951, they were joined by Eng Lock's friend from Cambridge, Wee Chong Jin, who had joined them from the firm of D.K. Walters & Co. Wee Chong Jin remained a partner in the firm until 1957 when he became the first Asian member of the Bar to be elevated to the Supreme Court bench.

Wee Swee Teow was involved in numerous local organisations, such as the Amateur Drawing Association in which he served as a committee member from 1913. That year, he was also elected Vice-President of the Board of Trustees of the Anglo-Chinese Free School, and in 1915 he was appointed Honorary Secretary of the Straits Chinese British Association (SCBA), succeeding Kow Soon Kim. Wee joined the SCBA sometime around 1915 and was first elected onto its Committee in 1921 and remained on the Committee in various capacities between 1921 and 1936: Vice-President in 1923; and President in 1925–27; and then again in 1929–30. He was also active in the Old Rafflesians' Association (ORA), the old boys' association of his alma mater, Raffles Institution.

By the mid 1920s, Wee had come to the attention of the colonial authorities who saw in him, the next generation of Chinese leaders who would succeed stalwarts like Song Ong Siang and Lim Boon Keng. In 1927, he was appointed as a member of the Municipal Commission where he remained till the end of 1930 when stepped down to replace his former partner Chan Sze Jin, who had just resigned from the Legislative Council. His appointment on the Legislative Council was made official on 19 February 1931. He remained on the Council till October 1933 when he resigned to serve on the Executive Council but served only till 1935. For his public service, Wee was conferred the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire (OBE) in 1935. Such involvement in community affairs made Wee a well-known pubic figure, especially among the Straits-born Chinese and it is from this community that much of the firm's business came. After the War, Wee also served on the Public Service Commission from 1951 to 1952.

Wee died on 3 June 1954 after a short illness. He was survived by his wife, Tan Kim Neo, his son Eng Lock, and his daughter Geok Imm. His two daughters, Geok Poon and Geok Hay predeceased him.

Wen Zichuan

(温梓川, 1911–86)
Chinese writer, Malaysia

Wen Zichuan, originally named as Wen Yushu (温玉书), was a Malaysian Chinese writer who had been active since the 1930s. He wrote mainly in verse and prose, but had also produced some short stories. Up to the early 1980s, he was still writing for the local newspapers. Wen was born in Penang on 3 May 1911 and his ancestors hailed from Huiyang (惠阳) in Guangdong (广东). In autumn 1926 he went to Guangzhou (广州) and gained entrance into the matriculation class in the Faculty of Arts at Zhongshan University (中山大学). The following year, he was accepted by Jinang University (暨南大学) in Shanghai to study Western Literature.

From the 1930s, Wen started having his literary works published in newspapers and magazines in China, as well as Malaysia, using pen names such as Shu Di (舒弟), Yu Cang (于苍), Qiu Shan (丘山), Wu Shu (五舒), CC, Qiu Lang (秋朗), Shan Ye (山叶), Gao Han (高汉), Pin Jun (蘋君), Nanyang Bo (南洋伯), Ban Baba (半峇峇), etc. On graduation he returned to Penang and served as head of the academic section of a secondary school from 1934 to 1942. During this period, he wrote for the five major Chinese newspapers in Penang. After the war he served as editor of the supplement section of Kwong Wah Yit Poh (光华日报) in Penang and was later promoted to the post of chief editor of the newspaper. Later on he taught at a primary school while editing the supplement section of Kwong Wah Jit Poh on a part-time basis. In 1971, he decided to retire from teaching and newspaper editing to concentrate fully on writing and translation of literary works, as well as producing and directing drama.

Wen was one of the few students from Malaya who went for further studies in Shanghai in 1930s. In his seven years as a student in Shanghai, he had his poems, prose, and short stories published in newspapers and magazines in Shanghai such as Shen Pau of Fine Art (申报 · 艺术界), Good Friends Pictorial (良友画报), Youth Monthly (青春月刊), Yu Si (语丝), Oriental Magazine (东方杂志), Da Jiang Monthly (大江月刊), Ben Liu (奔流), Tao Sheng (涛声), Lun Yu (论语), Student Magazine (学生杂志), Lady Monthly (女子月刊), etc. After his return to Malaya, he was even more active in writing and his works were published in Nanyang Siang Pau (南洋商报), Chao Foon Monthly (蕉风月刊), etc. The decade from the 1950s to the 1960s could be regarded as the peak period of his creative writing.

Wen's first collection of poems, Waitress at the Coffee Shop (咖啡店的侍女), was published by World Literature Bookstore (世界文艺书社) in Shanghai in April 1930. He was then still a young and immature poet, but was able to have the preface written by Cao Juren (曹聚仁), a well known scholar-writer in China at the time. From his other book, The Other Side of Writers (文人的另一面), published later by World Bookstore (世界书局) in Singapore, and Morning Bell Publisher (晨钟出版社) in Taipei (1960), it can be seen that during his student days, Wen had made the acquaintance of many famous writers in China who later became his mentors or friends. They included Xia Mianzun (夏丏尊), Fu Sinian (傅斯年), Ye Chongzhi (Ye Gongchao) (叶崇智) (叶公超), Liang Shiqiu (梁实秋), Liang Yuchun (梁遇春), Wang Jingzhi (汪静之), Shen Congwen (沈从文), Zhang Ziping (张资平), Zhang Yiping (章衣萍), Zhang Tiemin (章铁民), Lin Yutang (林语堂), Yu Dafu (郁达夫), Lu Xun (鲁迅), Dai Wangshu (戴望舒), Shao Xunmei (邵洵美), etc. They had tremendous influence on the creative works of Wen.

In December 1938, Yu Dafu went to Singapore to serve as editor of Morning Star (晨星), a supplement section of Sin Chew Jit Poh (星洲日报), and had high praise for Wen's works published in the newspaper. In May 1941, Wen sent a copy of his first collection of short stories, Beautiful Lies (美丽的谎) to Yu Dafu who then wrote a review of the book as an encouragement. Yu was thus very much a mentor as well as a friend to Wen who cherished this relationship dearly. In 1956, Wen was able to collate the unpublished works of Yu Dafu written after the war and compile them into a book entitled, Yu Dafu's Journey to the South (郁达夫南游记), which was published by World Bookstore in Singapore. In 1959, in appreciation of Yu Dafu's encouragement and assistance given to him, Wen wrote an essay entitled, The Twilight Years of Yu Dafu (郁达夫的晚年) for inclusion in the volume, Commemorative Anthology for Yu Dafu (郁达夫纪念集), which was co-edited by Li Bingren (李冰人) and Xie Yunsheng (谢云生). Subsequently, Wen wrote An Anecdotal Biography of Yu Dafu (郁达夫别传), based on the voluminous information that he had managed to gather. This biography was published in instalments from September 1964 to May 1966 in twenty-one issues of Chao Foon Monthly, then edited by Huang Ya (黄崖) in Malaysia (starting from issue no. 143). It attracted much attention from within Malaysia and abroad. In 1984, Wen made revisions and amendments to the biography, but unfortunately it was not published before his demise. It was not until 2007 that a scholar in China, Qin Hong (钦鸿), noted the importance of this biography and undertook to compile again Wen's manuscripts into a book published by Ning Xia People's Publisher (宁夏人民出版社) in China. Qin Hong is perhaps the only scholar among contemporary Chinese academicians who has done comprehensive compilation and review of the works by Wen. In 2004, Qin Hong re-edited Wen's book, The Other Sides of Writers, and had it published by Guangxi Normal University Publishing (广西师范大学出版社) under the new title The Other Sides of Writers: A Scenario of the Minguo Era (文人的另一面 — 民国风景之一种). He has also edited a book entitled, London in Winter (冬天的伦敦), comprising Wen's articles about his stay in London that were first published in Kwong Wah Yit Poh in Penang in the 1970s.

Wen had published two books of poetry: apart from Waitress at the Coffee Shop, there was Beautiful Portraits (美丽的肖像, 1953) which was published by Malaya Publishing Sdn. Bhd. (马来亚出版社有限公司). He also produced five books of short stories: A Teenage Boy (某少男, 1934), Beautiful Lies (美丽的谎, 1941), Night Talks between Husband and Wife (夫妻夜话, 1952), Shedding Blood on Yellow Sand (血洒黄沙, 1953), and Diary of a Teenage Boy (某少男的日记). He also wrote four books of prose: Essays by Zichuan (梓川小品, 1933), The Other Sides of Writers (1960), London in Winter (2004), and The Other Sides of Writers: A Scenario of the Minguo Era (2004). In addition, he had edited many books, including 200 Love Songs (恋歌二百首, 1929), A Selection of Mountain Songs (山歌选, 1930), Modern Mountain Songs (现代山歌, 1933), Nanyang Love Songs (南洋恋歌, 1935), Yu Dafu's Journey to the South (郁达夫 南游记, 1956), A Selection of Short Stories and Proses by Shen Congwen (沈从文小说散文选, 1957), The Student Years of the Writers (作家的学生时代, 1957), Writers' Experiences in Creative Writing (作家的创作经验, 1958), and Chinese in Penang (华人在槟城, 1958). He had also translated an anthology of short stories by Leo Tolstoy (1933) and British writer H. E. Bates' anthology of short stories entitled, The Woman Walking to the Side of the Bridge (1955).

It can be said that Wen Zichuan had been a prolific writer since the 1950s. He continued writing and publishing until he breathed his last breath and even today, there are still some of his works that have not been compiled for publication. Having served as a newspaper editor, he had made unparalleled contributions to newspaper editing, translation, and the introduction of western literature, as well as the promotion of Chinese literature in Malaysia and Singapore. His literary works, especially poetry, did not follow the trend of the then mainstream realist literature but demonstrated a style of his own which was unique at that time. At the same time, his writings about his acquaintances with many modern writers in China are important information sources for research on modern Chinese literature. In particular, his book, An Anecdotal Biography of Yu Dafu, has become an indispensable reference for modern research on Yu Dafu. His writings about modern writers of China can also provide relevant information for exploring the relationship between Malaysian Chinese literature and modern literature in China.

Widjaja, Eka Tjipta

(Oei Ek Tjhong, 黃奕聰, Huang Yicong, 1923–)

Leading tycoon, Indonesia

Eka Tjipta Widjaja is the founder of the Sinar Mas group, which came to be one of the largest conglomerates in Indonesia in the 1990s, often ranked as the largest (along with the major kretek companies) after the dismantling of the Salim group in 1998. By 2008–09 Eka Tjipta was listed as number five among Indonesia's wealthiest towkay with a net worth of around US$2,400 million, one of only seven with wealth above US$2,400 million. His career has in many ways been typical of the spectacular growth patterns of Soeharto-era totok tycoons, although he was less obviously a cukong beholden to the president than was Liem Sioe Liong and some others — and a more enduring one because he was less reliant on the palace. He has been involved in many offshore joint ventures in the paper, food, and financial services industries, especially in Singapore, China, Cambodia, and even India. Another striking feature of his business career is the wide range of activities he and his sons have been involved in, alongside their predominant reliance on lavish revenues from paper and pulp and cooking oil.

Born in Quanzhou in Fujian, China on 29 October 1923, Widjaja came to Indonesia at the age of nine and started out in a small way as a trader in agricultural products in Sulawesi in the 1940s, focusing especially on copra and becoming well known after the establishment of Bitung-Menado Oil Indonesia in 1969, which specialized in cooking oil. The company soon came to dominate roughly half of the domestic market for such oil and later expanded under the name, Sinar Mas, into pulp and paper manufacturing (through palm oil plantations), real estate, and banking. The Bank Indonesia International (BII), in which he held a controlling share, was the nation's seventh largest private bank in the 1980s. Sinar Mas has since become a dominant player in the pulp and paper manufacturing industry of North Sumatra (and later other provinces) through his Singapore-based company, Asia Pulp and Paper (APP), run by his son, Oei Hong Leong, which became the largest such company in Southeast Asia in the 1990s and one of the world's major paper manufacturers.

Widjaja entered early into a joint-venture arrangement with Liem Sioe Liong for expansion of their cooking-oil interests, but that relationship broke down in the early 1990s. Sinar Mas was then restructured to consist of four distinct holding companies, each in separate lines of business and each under one of his children. But the management of Sinar Mas as a whole was reported to be largely in the hands of Western-trained professionals. Widjaja himself became less actively involved in the business in the later years of his life, overseeing the group from a distance and meeting with family members only once a week. In addition to his son, Oei Hong Leong, who ran the Asia Pulp & Paper from Singapore (see below), he relied increasingly on his sons, Teguh Gandra Widjaja for the pulp and paper segment, Franky Osman Widjaja for the agribusiness firms, Muchtar Widjaja for real estate, and Indra Widjaja for financial services — and on his grandson, Eric Oei Kang, who became head of the Hong Kong-listed Creator Holdings. Widjaja is said to have had many wives, as well as unofficial relationships with numerous women, and to have sired more than forty children, although only a few of them are actively involved in the management of his empire.

The Sinar Mas corporation's methods of financing became more sophisticated than previously in the 1990s (for example APP raised nearly a million dollars in the bond market early in the decade), although the revenues from palm oil plantations in Sumatra and Kalimantan remained the major source of funds. Some of its companies were listed on the Jakarta Stock Exchange, which was by then emerging from its pre-1990 torpor.

Widjaja was also heavily involved in investments outside Indonesia. In addition to APP in Singapore, he invested in the property sector in Shanghai through Shanghai Golden Bund Real Estate Corporation. His financial business was under APP and agribusiness under SMART (Sinar Mas Multiartha). Prominent subsidiaries of APP included PT Indah Kiat Pulp and Paper. Indah Kiat aroused a storm of controversy in 1992 when it imported 700 Chinese labourers to work on three construction companies, building power plants using Chinese machinery. The uproar was so vehement that Sinar Mas was forced to send the workers back to China.

Sinar Mas suffered a severe blow from the East Asian financial crisis of 1997–98, especially in its pulp and paper dealings. It defaulted on huge debts in 2001 and several of its subsidiaries were badly hit and took several years to become restructured. On the other hand, it recovered from that crisis with spectacular speed and success, far more so than most of the other big conglomerates. In 2008 the Group recorded exports of US$4.8 billion from pulp and paper and cooking oil (which amounted to 11.5 per cent of Indonesia's non-oil export earnings) and provided employment to 300,000 workers, as well as opportunities for 2,000 suppliers. It had acquired a coal mine in south Sumatra to ensure its future energy supplies and was planning to expand its operations in the oil-and-gas sector.

Another branch of the Sinar Mas business empire has been established by Oei Hong Leong, his eldest son, who had spent his teenage years in China, and was for many years based in Singapore in charge of APP, but later moved to Hong Kong where he runs China Strategic Holdings. This reportedly has a controlling share in more than thirty state enterprises in China, including beer and tyre making. In 1995 it acquired a stake in a leading Hong Kong newspaper, Ming Pao Daily News, of which Oei Hong Leong has become chairman.

In 2010 Sinar Mas became involved in a damaging controversy with Greenpeace over its alleged destruction of large rainforest areas in Indonesia (and Cambodia), some of which are said to be breeding habitat for the orang-utan, an endangered species. Greenpeace changed the company with breaching an agreement they had made to avoid the destruction of forests rich in carbon and wildlife, claiming that it had discovered that a Sinar Mas subsidiary was continuing to clear rainforest near a habitat for the orang-utan. This was denied by the company and the issue remains a matter of dispute. But several of its major customers for cooking oil have dropped Sinar Mas as a supplier in response to the charges, most notably the giants Cargill, Nestle, and Unilever.

Widjaja, Mira

(1950–)

Writer, physician, lecturer, Indonesia

Mira Widjaja, best known as Mira W., is a prolific novel writer. Many of her works have been made into movies and sinetron (short movies for television). She was trained as a physician and works as a physician for the Moestopo University (Jakarta) in the clinic for students and staff.

Born in 1950, she is the youngest of five children of Othniel Wong (黃氏, 1908–86) and Oey Pit Nio (1913). Her father and his two older brothers established Wong Brothers Movie Productions in the 1930s, which remained in business until the 1950s.

Her grandfather was a protestant missionary from Shanghai who was based in Indonesia, but had to travel by boat from island to island in the archipelago. Othniel Wong was born in Batavia and the family lived there for some time, but returned to Shanghai for the education of the three boys. They were later sent to California for further education. The Wong brothers had chosen to work in Indonesia because they were familiar with the country. Two of their famous movies were Terang Bulan (Moonlight Night, 1936) and Bengawan Solo (1949).

Mira Widjaja was born in Jakarta and was known at the time as Mira Wong. In 1967 her father adopted the name, Widjaja, and she has since been known as Mira Widjaja. As a child, she attended Catholic schools although her family was Protestant. After her graduation from Marsudirini Senior Middle School in 1969, she enrolled at the Trisakti University, also in Jakarta, to study medicine. After her graduation in 1979, she worked for the Dental Faculty of the Moestopo University in Jakarta, teaching parasitology. She retired as lecturer in 2002, but continued working as a physician at the university clinic.

Her career as a writer started in 1975 with a short story entitled, Benteng Kasih (Fortress of Love), which appeared in the weekly, Femina. Her first novel, Sepolos Cinta Dini (As Pure as Dini's Love), was serialized in Kompas (1978) and published as a book the same year by Gramedia. Her second novel, Dokter Nona Friska, was serialized in Dewi magazine in 1977, earlier than her first novel was and was made into a movie in 1981 with the title Kemilau Kemuning Senja (The Yellow Sheen of Twilight). It was from then that she used Mira W. as her name for all her writings. All in all, she has written seventy-five novels, forty of which have been made into movies, and others into sinetron. One of the first movies was Arini, Masih ada Kereta akan Lewat (Arini, There Will Still Be a Train Passing By) starring Widyawati, one of the top movie stars then, who had special designer's clothes made for her. The producer was Nustrawan. Widyawati won the Citra prize, the highest award for movies, at the Indonesian Film Festival 1987. In 1988, a sequel to this story was written entitled, Biarkan Kereta itu Lewat (Let the Train Pass By), which was also turned into a movie.

Creativity comes naturally for Widjaja, who may get her inspiration from her patients, from her own experience, or perhaps from a story that she has heard from friends. She works the ideas out in the evenings after seeing her patients in the clinic, dramatizes the story, and puts it in the sharp dialogues of young people. She usually needs three months to finish a story and a few days for a short story. The editor usually does not have to change much, except for some spelling mistakes or mistakes on dates or months. She seldom allows the editors to change her language because she wants the story to reflect her own writing style. The title of the book is usually the most difficult: she wants it to reflect the contents of the story and at the same time, be poetic.

Lately, Widjaja has been travelling widely with her friends, who are as adventurous as she is. Her experiences in foreign countries very often become the setting for her stories. She has even made trips to Africa and the Amazon River in Brazil, South America. Her experience and impressions of her last trip became part of her new book, Cinta Sepanjang Amazon (Love along the Amazon). This story will soon be made into a wide-screen movie as the scenes in it are very suitable for the big screen.

Being a physician, she has often written about hospital scenes or illnesses, and she has a few books even about mental illness, which she can describe in detail. In Deviasi (Deviation), she describes a man with multiple personalities. He might be charming and helpful, but in some situations, he becomes cruel and beast-like, capable of murdering even the person he loves most. Widjaja has characterized this person with a consistency that only an expert can because she is familiar with the illness. Sometimes she describes scenes in an operation theatre, and, in one story, the sudden birth of a child, after the mother has met with an accident. All these scenes, she has described confidently and knowledgeably, thanks to her professional background.

Widjaja thinks that because she was brought up in Jakarta, she has not felt herself to be different from her friends from other ethnic groups. That is probably the reason she has not written about the Chinese society. Only one of her books was about the relation of a Chinese girl and a Batak boy entitled, Bukan Cinta Sesaat (Not a Love of a Moment). It is her fiftieth book in her twenty years of writing. The main theme of the story was the investigation of a murder, in which Nina (short for Fenina) was allegedly involved. Cleverly interwoven into the story is the prejudice prevalent among different ethnic groups and the impact of PP10, the Presidential Regulation No. 10 of 1959 that prohibited Chinese retail traders to do business in the villages. This regulation caused Nina's family in the story to move to Bandung, where it experienced another anti-Chinese riot in 1963. Having lost its whole shop, the family relocated to Jakarta. In the capital, the family led a relatively quiet life and Nina eventually went to university to study medicine. She was actively involved in the students' movement of 1966, and her love with Rio, an ethnic Batak boy, blossomed during that time although her father was very much against the relationship between his daughter and a native young man. When Nina lost her Japanese made car in the so-called Malari riot to boycott Japanese products on the January 1974, she decided to move to Belgium to finish her studies. When she returned, she found that Rio was still in love with her in spite of his marriage to a soft-spoken Javanese girl. They continued their relationship by having a love affair and the intrigues that followed ended in a murder case.

Interwoven in all of Widjaja's stories is the love between two persons, a love that is eternal and enduring, and that withstands all the bad experiences of the two parties. According to her, this is what love should be. She likes to write about love because she knows that the love she pens is pure, never vulgar, and does not offend. The women in her stories are usually strong, independent, and have integrity because that is what she thinks women should be. The time when women are portrayed as weak creatures who need men to support them is over, according to her. Of course, there are also mean women in her stories, but she writes about such women to contrast them with good women.

After a story is finished, the movie right is bought by a company, but the time needed to produce a movie may be long, or sometimes it may not be produced at all. When a movie script is written, she is usually consulted for comments or corrections. She has no objections if the title is to be changed, but the original title should be mentioned, as stipulated in the contracts.

Many of her novels have been reprinted: Di Sini Cinta Pertama Kali Bersemi (Love has blossomed here for the first time) has been reprinted thirteen times, and Seandainya Aku Boleh Memilih (Supposing that I Could Choose), ten times. Most of them have an average print run of 10,000, although the publishers may print more if they think the book will sell well. Widjaja thinks that it all depends on the readers. For the cover, she chooses flowers with a colourful background, and that has been her trademark for several years now, but her publisher has suggested changing them to attractive sceneries to reflect the contents of the stories. This change will be effective for books published from now on.

Winarta, Frans Hendra

(Tan Hian Wie, 陈贤伟, Chen Xianwei, 1943–)
Human rights lawyer, Indonesia

Frans Hendra Winarta is known as a human rights lawyer who often speaks on the issue of discrimination against Chinese Indonesians as well as civil rights and crimes against humanity. He is one of those Chinese Indonesians who are truly nationalists.

Winarta was born on 17 September 1943 in Bandung, the first son of a well-to-do Chinese (Hokkien) family who could trace its wealth to its first generation who migrated to Indonesia. His grandfather, the owner of a shop selling textile and batik produced in Pekalongan, Tegal, and Solo, as well as the owner of a tobacco shop, was one of the biggest merchants in Bandung. Winarta is a third-generation Chinese descendant on the paternal line, but he is a sixth-generation Chinese descendant in his mother's lineage. His father graduated from an American Chinese School in Xiamen, while his mother only had primary Dutch school education in Bandung.

Except for his early years at Pei Hwa elementary school (1950–52) and at Helmers Elementary School (1952–57), both in Bandung, Winarta spent most of his junior to senior high school years in Christian schools, SMPK and SMAK Paulus (1957–63), all in Bandung. He continued his studies at the Law Faculty of Parahyangan Catholic University in Bandung and graduated in 1970. Before he returning to school for a notary course in 1979 at the University of Indonesia, he worked as a manager in several multi-national companies, such as American Home Products (Now Wyeth Laboratory), Singer Company, and Procter & Gamble (Richardson Merrell). In 1981, he started to work as an attorney at law and set up his own office, Frans Winata and Partners, in Jakarta. He also founded Winarta IP Practice in 2005. It was in his post as an attorney that he became close with Yap Thiam Hien, an outspoken human rights lawyer, and started to broaden his knowledge of human rights. According to him, since young, he was an admirer of Chinese Indonesian nationalists such as Yap Tjwan Bing, Sim Kie Ay (from Sin Ming Hui), Yap Thiam Hien, and Oey Tjoe Tat, and was influenced by their thoughts. In 1985, he joined IKADIN (Ikatan Advokat Indonesia — the Indonesian Bar Association), and in 1990, was appointed as chairman of international relations in the Central Board of IKADIN. He started to become a human rights activist in 1988 by joining Lembaga Pembela Hak Asasi Manusia or, the Institute for the Defense of Human Rights, led by H.J.C. Prinsen and Yap Thiam Hien. It was through this institute that he knew other human rights activists, such as Hadeli Hasibuan, Aisyah Amini, and H.J.C. Prinsen.

Since 1989, he has also been actively involved in Yayasan Lembaga Bantuan Hukum Indonesia (YLBHI — the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation) as a member of the Board of Trustees. Later he decided to obtain a Master's degree and successfully obtained one in criminal law from the University of Indonesia in 1999. He continued his legal career and as a human rights activist by contributing to various organizations, such as BPHN (Badan Pembinaan Hukum Nasional — the National Board of Legal Development) (1997–now, as a member of the team of legal experts), KHN (Komisi Hukum Nasional — the National Law Commission) (February 2000–now, as a member of the governing board), BANI (Badan Arbitrase Nasional Indonesia — the Indonesian National Board of Arbitration) (January 2001–now, as an arbitrator), the Chartered Institute of Arbitrators (CIArb) (2006, as the founder of the Indonesian Chapter), LAPPK (Lembaga Advokasi Pengawasan Pemberantasan Korupsi– the Institute for Advocacy and Supervision of Corruption Eradication Campaign) (2005–now, as a member of the advisory board), and many others. He is also one of the founders of GANDI (Gerakan Perjuangan Anti Diskriminasi — the Indonesian Anti Discrimination Movement), established in Jakarta in 1998. Winarta also established the Institute of Anti Discrimination in Indonesia, known as LADI (or YADI) in 2003, and two years later, set up YPHI (Yayasan Pengkajian Hukum Indonesia — the Indonesian Legal Studies Foundation). Its board members include J.E Sahetapy, a vocal government critic and law professor, and Ester Indahyani Jusuf, a leading human rights defender.

Besides being included as a resource person for the Amnesty International and the International Commission of Jurists (Geneva), Winarta is also involved in various international associations and organizations, such as the International Bar Association (IBA) in London (1985–now, as a member), the American Bar Association (ABA) (1987–now, as an associate member), Law Asia in Perth (1992–95, as a council member), the Inter-Pacific Bar Association (IPBA) in Tokyo (1991–93, as a council member), the American Chamber of Commerce (1997–now, as an associate member), the International Court of Arbitration under the auspices of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) in Paris (2006–08, as an arbitrator), and the East Asia Branch of the Chartered Institute of Arbitration in London (2007–now, as an associate member).

Besides practising law, Winarta also lectures at various institutions of higher learning such as Pelita Harapan University (Karawaci-Tanggerang), Atmajaya University (Jakarta), the Legal Integrated Training Institute (Jakarta), and the Lembaga Studi Hukum Lanjutan (Continuous Legal Studies Institution), University of Indonesia. Generally, he works in criminal, civil, and business laws, commercial arbitration, and human rights issues. He was involved, for example, in defending Bonar Tigor Naipospos, a pro-democracy student activist of Gadjah Mada University, who was accused of subversive activities in 1989; Virgilio Da Silva, an East Timorese freedom fighter who was charged with the unacceptable action of insulting Soeharto in 1992; and Dita Indah Sari and Coen Husein Pontoh, who were accused of instigating hatred against the government in 1996 for demanding national minimum wages. In his opinion, there is not much progress made in the implementation of human rights in the nation although Indonesia has ratified the U.N. conventions. There are still many human rights violations such as police attacks on university campuses, the closing down of churches, and interreligious violence, which are ignored with impunity.

On 29 September 2007, Winarta obtained a Ph.D. from Padjadjaran University and graduated with cum laude. His dissertation is entitled, "Hak Konstitusional Fakir Miskin Memperoleh Bantuan Hukum dalam Rangka Pembangunan Hukum Nasional" (The Constitutional Right of the Poor to Obtain Legal Aid in the National Legal Development Program). The result of his study shows that the implementation of the constitutional right of the poor to obtain legal aid up to then had not been satisfactory as legal aid had not reached most of the poor in the urban and rural areas of Indonesia. He therefore proposed to incorporate the right to obtain free legal aid for the poor in the Indonesian 1945 Constitution. The mechanism and technicalities of providing legal aid will be authorized through the establishment of an independent federation of legal aid in the country.

That same year, he was highly recommended as an Asia-Pacific focused lawyer in the Dispute Resolution by Asia Law Leading Lawyers (INTI, 8 Oct. 2007). On the issue of Chinese Indonesians, Winarta believes that the political rights of the ethnic Chinese have been denied to them for the last thirty years, and since the 1977 election, they have been forced by a certain regime to choose their political party. They were mostly treated only as vote getters. He advocates that ethnic Chinese be given the opportunity to use their rights to vote freely. He criticizes the implementation of the Citizenship Law which imposed the possession of SBKRI (Surat Bukti Kewarganegaraan Indonesia or the proof of Indonesian citizenship) on Chinese Indonesians. To him, such an imposition is against the basic principle of the 1945 Constitution which states that all citizens are equal before the law (Tempo, 12 November 2003). When Vice-President Jusuf Kalla made a racist remark on whether the Chinese Indonesians want to be discriminated against or to be looted, Winarta was furious and called for the government's attention to racial remarks. A similar incident occurred when President Habibie stated that Chinese businessmen who fled the country had better return to avoid their roles being replaced by cooperatives. He demanded that President Habibie say that Chinese Indonesians are an integral part of the nation.

Personal Interview with Frans Winata, August 2008.

Wong Hie King, Ruth

(王惠卿, Wang Huiqing, 1918–82)
Educator, Singapore

Through hard work and dedication to her profession, Ruth Wong Hie King became a very well known and respected educator in both Singapore and Malaysia, as well as in the West. As a key strategist in reconceptualizing educational research and teacher education in the local setting, she went to Kuala Lumpur in 1963, after her training at Harvard University, to set up the School of Education (later Faculty of Education) in the then new University of Malaya and was its first dean. In the late 1960s, she returned to Singapore to be director of research at the Ministry of Education and concurrently to head the Teachers' Training College (TTC). In 1973, she transformed the TTC into the Institute of Education. Ruth Wong was its first director until her retirement in 1976.

In a career that spanned over thirty-seven years, Ruth Wong was honoured with a number of academic awards (with attendant responsibilities) from around the world which acknowledged her contributions. Among them were an elected fellowship of the College of Preceptors (London) and a fellowship of the World Academy of Arts and Sciences. She also served as a consultant to the Regional Centre for Science and Mathematics (RECSAM), based in Penang in Malaysia (1968), on the Governing Board of the UNESCO Institute of Education, based in Hamburg (1972–75), and on the Research Review Advisory Committee of the International Development and Research Council of Canada.

Born in Singapore in 1918, she was the eldest of ten children of Wong Kai Seng, a highly respected lay preacher, who came to Singapore from Fuzhou in China in 1916. Ruth Wong started her working life in Singapore as a humble schoolteacher in the British colonial days and later trained teachers at two universities (the University of Singapore and the University of Malaya), reaching the peak of her career at a relatively young age. She retired from the Institute of Education (IE) in 1976. Sometime in 1981, Wong became very ill and eventually succumbed to her illness in 1982. Her untimely demise at the age of sixty-four brought to an end a career noted for its brilliance and a self-assurance born out of scholarship and a complete trust in God. Reflecting, for the benefit of young teachers-to-be on her career, she wrote in an essay in 1982 that:

> I became a teacher and was willing to remain one. In my whole career, I left no post by deliberate choice to further my own ambitions, more particularly because I had no personal resources. With each step upward, God had to equip me first with the wherewithal to cope and His provision was always just where and when it was needed to anticipate His next move (Wong 1982, p. 10).

It was this attempt to define her position in the scheme of things, particularly in relation to the vocation of teaching and to God, which makes the personal testimony in the essay mentioned above (written just a few weeks before her demise) most pertinent and poignant for young prospective teachers. In that essay, she also said:

> In my case, if I had not been directed by the Lord into teaching, I would never have imagined I could teach. I was a rather introverted type of person, not always at ease in the presence of others. I was frequently tongue-tied…(Wong 1982, p. 8).

Tongue-tied she was not, but Ruth Wong frankly admitted that teaching was not her first choice for a career when she was young. It was medicine. Nonetheless, eventually it was in education that she chose to serve. As she put it, "after a manner of speaking, then, I was shunted into education. But over the years I have seen God's guiding hand and have learnt some valuable lessons". …(Wong 1982, p. 8).

From all accounts, Wong was a remarkably innovative teacher, with a great compassion for the weak and disadvantaged. A colleague of hers (at the Faculty of Education in the University of Malaya) recalled that she > was well-known in Kuala Lumpur as a dynamic leader in education….She had the courage of her convictions and started a school to experiment with multilingual programmes at a time [in Malaysia] when nationalism and the national language [Malay] were being intensely promoted. Her idealism, enthusiasm and dedication to the cause of education inspired me and other staff members to support her efforts (Lim, personal communication 1995).

Besides being very articulate at the lectern, Ruth Wong was also a skilled and prolific writer with an elegant command of the English language. She wrote engagingly on a wide range of topics. In particular, her writings, in the form of conference papers, speeches, journal articles, monographs, and chapters in books, drew on a sophisticated, intellectual tradition that she had experienced at Harvard University (1960–62) where she studied for her doctorate in education (see Courtney Cazden 2005).

Briefly, the changes Wong introduced at the then new Institute of Education (IE) in Singapore resulted in a new curriculum for teacher education, new ways of assessing coursework, a tighter linkage between theory and practice through the establishment of a number of so-called "experimental and demonstration" schools, the introduction of educational research, and the setting up of a mechanism for teaching postgraduate students to attain higher degrees that were awarded by the former University of Singapore. It was largely under Ruth Wong's leadership that the concept of teacher training gradually evolved into teacher education.

However by October 1976, for very personal reasons, Dr Wong decided not to renew her contract with IE. After leaving the institute, Dr Wong continued to participate in research projects in education on a voluntary basis (for example, in 1980 serving as an adviser to an important survey conducted by the Singapore Teachers' Union (STU), and, in 1981, leading a project on the improvement of mathematics achievement in schools). She also worked as a part-time student counsellor at the University of Singapore and continued to be actively involved in community and church work. On the final stage of Ruth Wong's life, a former student of hers, in a moving tribute, said this:

> [Ruth Wong] never retired from education. Some friends of mine who were working with her in the last few years speak highly of her interest and total commitment to education. Indeed, to the very end, even when she was ill and was in pain, she did not hold back her advice on educational matters. She was actually writing lesson plans and teaching three monolingual [academically weak] classes while undergoing radiotherapy. She stopped being a school teacher only when she was confined to bed… She was non-partisan in the cause of education, a real beacon to all and sundry" (Lau 1982, p. 1).

A beacon she was. What Wong achieved in her career, in demonstrating a professional commitment to improving the learning experience and education of children, was part of a vision she had. The power of that vision, the courage to confront the "sacred cows of education" in whatever form, her development of a rational framework for curriculum planning and development, her ideas in curriculum innovation for the training and education of teachers, the strength of her belief in developing a high level of indigenous manpower in educational research and teacher education constitute her legacy to education and teacher education, in Singapore.

Above all, those who knew her either as colleague or her students were equally impressed by the strength of her character, modesty, compassion, and sense of fairness. The colleague who succeeded her as dean in the Faculty of Education at the University of Malaya (in Malaysia) recalled Wong's "unique admixture of exemplary qualities that are hard to emulate, for she was simultaneously firm, fair, flexible, friendly and far-sighted" (Sim 1990). These attributes, combined with great erudition, made her much in demand as a speaker in Malaysia in the early days, and later, in Singapore. At the lectern, Wong was invariably eloquent, sincere, graceful, demonstrating a powerful charisma. A role model she certainly was for the teaching profession, but truly Ruth Wong Hie King would be a difficult model to emulate.

Wong Hock Boon

(黄学文, Huang Xuewen, 1923–2008)
Physician, Singapore

Wong Hock Boon was a pioneer paediatrician, physician, and educationist, and was generally acknowledged as the "Father of Paediatrics" in Singapore.

Wong was born in Singapore on 25 March 1923 and educated at the Anglo-Chinese School where he proved to be an outstanding student, topping his Junior Cambridge class in 1940. In 1941 he joined Raffles College to study engineering, but his studies were interrupted by the outbreak of World War II. When he returned to school in 1946, he changed his mind and opted to study medicine instead. Once again he proved himself an able student, scoring distinctions in many of his subjects and winning the College Scholarship. He graduated in 1952 from the King Edward VII College of Medicine and embarked on an academic medical career, specializing in paediatrics.

He joined the Singapore General Hospital as a medical officer in 1952, and in 1956 was awarded a government fellowship to proceed to the United Kingdom for his postgraduate studies. Wong obtained his membership of the Royal College of Physicians (MRCP) in child life in Edinburgh; became a fellow of the Royal Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons (FRFPS) in Glasgow; and received his diploma in child health (DCH) in 1957. In 1961 he was awarded the Heinz Fellowship by the British Paediatric Association and furthered his studies in paediatric medicine in the United Kingdom. He was admitted as Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians (Edinburgh) in 1964; fellow of the Australasian College of Physicians in 1967; and Fellow of the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health (FRCPCH) in 1996.

In 1962 a new chair in paediatrics was established at the University of Singapore's Faculty of Medicine and it was offered to Wong. He held this post till his retirement in 1988. He was a superb administrator, physician, researcher, and teacher. In 1970 he was awarded the Public Administration Medal (Gold). He had initiated the establishment of the Paediatric Ward at the Singapore General Hospital and later, at the National University Hospital. In his long tenure at the university, he trained many generations of paediatricians and doctors. In 1965, anxious that local doctors wishing to further their studies in their medical specialties should not be required to go overseas to do so, he and Professor Seah Cheng Siang established the School of Postgraduate Medical Studies (now the Division of Graduate Medical Studies, Yong Loo Lin School of Medicine). Wong was its first director and Seah its deputy director. He established the annual Master of Medicine course, in which four or five eminent overseas experts would be invited to teach local students. This led to the final master of medicine degree examination. He remained director of the School till his retirement in 1988.

Wong was internationally-renowned and recognized as an outstanding paediatrician. His pioneering work on a defective enzyme (G6PD) in newborns resulted in a significant reduction in cases of kernicterus (brain damage in infants caused by jaundice) in Singapore and the region. For his achievements he was awarded the Meritorious Service Medal in 1975, and the Guinness Award for Scientific Achievement in 1980. In 1985, he was named the "most outstanding paediatrician in Asia" by the Association of Paediatric Societies of the Southeast Asian Region (APPSEAR). His research and writings can be found in hundreds of scientific papers published in prestigious medical journals. His scientific achievements include the discovery of three previously unknown haemoglobinopathies, which were aptly named Hb Singapore, Hb J Singapore, and Hb J Meerut. In 1987 he won the inaugural National Science and Technology Award.

Wong was a strong advocate of breastfeeding and his vigorous campaigns to get mothers to breastfeed their infants gave him the epithet, "Mr Breastfeeding". His research led him to believe that childhood malnutrition and infantile diarrhoea diseases could be averted through breastfeeding. He also pioneered the use of ice water for oral rehydration in the management of acute gastroenteritis. This led to a new and highly cost-effective approach to diarrhoeal diseases in the developing world.

Many practitioners consider Wong's greatest contribution to be the training and mentoring of a whole generation of paediatricians for Singapore. Many of his former students are now leading paediatricians in Singapore, and in many Southeast Asian countries. His devotion to clinical work and teaching was legendary. Starting at 7.30 each morning, Wong would do his daily ward rounds to solve clinical problems for all patients. His weekly clinical conferences for postgraduate students and his weekly professorial tutorials for undergraduates were major learning opportunities for those who worked with him.

Immediately after the round Wong would record difficult problems encountered before hitting the medical library to check the Index Medicus for the latest advances. During his weekly clinical conferences (either on Saturday mornings or Wednesday afternoons), Wong would conduct teaching on four clinical cases. The trainees would then take turns to present the clinical history and he would review the literature and write his personal comments. He wrote four reviews each week and over the years, fifty-one volumes of Paediatric Conference Notes were published. These volumes remain the main source of information for candidates taking paediatric examinations. Indeed, many doctors in other Southeast Asian countries also subscribed to these valuable notes when he was writing them.

On his retirement from the university in 1988, he was made emeritus professor and senior fellow of the Department of Paediatrics, a position he held till 2003. In April 2005, he donated S$1.5 million as an endowment to establish a professorship in paediatrics at the National University of Singapore. Two years later, seven of his former students, all leading practitioners, got together and donated $250,000 towards the professorship fund to finance a visiting professorship for him as a birthday present for their former teacher. The Yong Loo Lin School of Medicine also has two prizes named after Wong — the Wong Hock Boon Prize for Clinical Immunology and Allergy (established in 2007); and the Wong Hock Boon Gold Medal (1992).

Wong's list of achievements and accolades fills many pages. He scored numerous firsts: introducing the teaching of human genetics to students and doctors; introducing bone marrow transplants; introducing prenatal diagnosis of genetic diseases; being a founding member of the Singapore Paediatric Society; being a founder member and chairman of the Singapore Children's Society; and establishing the Singapore Spastics Association, and the Haemophilia Society of Singapore.

He passed away in his home on 28 December 2008 after a period of illness. He was survived by his wife, Lily, and his daughter, Julia (also a paediatrician), and son-in-law, Tom. In October 2010 the National University of Singapore honoured Wong by establishing an undergraduate research society named the Wong Hock Boon Society.

Wong Hong Kwok, Alfred

(黄匡国, Huang Kuangguo, 1930–)
Architect, Singapore

Alfred Wong belongs to the first generation of post-war overseas educated local architects, alongside contemporaries such as Lim Chong Keat and C.A.V. Chew. His practice, Alfred Wong Partnership (later incorporated as AWP Pte. Ltd.), spans five decades, traversing Singapore's key political milestones from the late colonial period to merger with Malaysia to post-independence. Producing wide-ranging works that include residences, schools, institutional buildings, churches, and hotels, his firm is responsible for a number of significant buildings such as the National Theatre (1963), Hotel Malaysia (1974, later Marco Polo Hotel), and the Singapore Polytechnic (1979). Meticulous planning, elegant spatial proportions, thoughtful use of materials, and sensitive detailing are hallmarks of his most successful works. Wong continues to practise and plays an active role as chairman of AWP Pte. Ltd.

Wong, who was born in Hong Kong, is the grandson of Wong Ah Fook, the prominent entrepreneur and banker from Canton, China, who made his fortune in Singapore and Malaya in the building and plantation industries in the nineteenth century. The young boy came to Singapore at a young age, and enrolled at St Anthony's Catholic School in Queen Street. Though his education was interrupted by the Japanese Occupation, he completed his secondary schooling immediately after the war in 1946.

Wong pursued his architectural education at the University of Melbourne, graduating with honours in 1953. He was part of the pioneer cohorts of the Faculty of Architecture, staffed by luminaries of Australia's Modern Movement such as the founding chairman, Brian Lewis, and lecturers Roy B. Grounds and Robin G.P. Boyd. Here Wong imbibed fundamental tenets of modernist design, such as rational planning, climatic responsiveness, expressive construction design, and human scale — principles that would underscore his architectural repertoire.

On his return to Singapore, Wong joined the largest architectural firm here, Swan & Maclaren, where he stayed for four years. He was involved in the design of the Prince Edward Road campus of the Singapore Polytechnic and the University of Malaya in Kuala Lumpur. Working in the sprawling drafting room of the expatriate-dominated firm, Wong was acutely aware of his career limitations, and the inequalities implicit in the colonial milieu. After obtaining his architect's qualification as an associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects (RIBA) in 1956, Wong left the following year to set up his own firm, Alfred Wong Partnership.

The next few years saw a tumultuous period in Singapore's history as the city geared up for internal self-government and decolonization. Wong, charged with the prevailing sense of national pride and idealism, joined others in the search for a new architectural identity. The firm's early works were mainly private houses for an emerging local professional class that included civil servants, doctors, and engineers — people not unlike Wong himself. He explored designs responsive to the tropical climate and which also suited modern life. His major breakthrough came when he won the first prize in an invited design competition for the National Theatre in 1960 (since demolished), triumphing over established large practices such as Van Sitteren & Partners, and Ng Keng Siang. This was an ambitious and politically significant cultural project to commemorate Singapore's internal self-government. The distinctive five-pointed façade anchored a daring cantilevered roof that soared over the tropical, open-sided performance venue. A significant national icon, it hosted "people's concerts" (aneka ragam rak'yat), international performances, university convocations, and National Day rallies up till the mid-1980s.

Concurrently, Wong designed a number of churches, exquisitely realized in the modernist idiom. He developed and refined central ideas about the new architecture that was relevant to the local context and its times. Funded by donations, the shoestring budgets for these buildings — such as St Ignatius Church in King's Road (since demolished), and Church of St Francis Xavier in Serangoon Gardens — did not deter the architect from creating attractive and dignified spaces. In his Church of St Bernadette in Zion Road, precast ventilation screens, proprietary aluminium sun-breakers, and pivoted metal and glass windows form a permeable building envelope for natural illumination and cross ventilation. Wong's innovative use of mass-produced building components greatly reduced cost and improved efficiency of construction. An awe-inspiring place of worship, the church received conservation status in 2009.

Following independence, Singapore embarked on an ambitious urban renewal, housing, and industrialization programme. Wong dubbed these heady nation building years a "heroic period" that presented opportunities for local architects to prove their mettle. His firm took on commissions to design several pioneer factory complexes in the fledgling Jurong industrial area, including the Singapore Mint complex. A major work of the late sixties was Hotel Malaysia (later renamed Marco Polo Hotel and since demolished) at the junction of Tanglin and Holland Roads. This was the first modern hotel of an international standard in Singapore, built in anticipation of the development of her tourism industry. The imageable urban landmark was distinguished by the graceful sweep of its curved blocks, housing 300 guest rooms and the largest banquet hall then in Singapore. Its lush ethnic-themed interiors projected a sophisticated image of rich regional cultures, modern living, and urbane sensibilities.

Wong's works from the late 1970s onwards took on an increasingly "internationalist" outlook that mirrored Singapore's aspirations to become a "global city". His younger sibling, Edward Wong, became a co-director of the firm, which completed large-scale projects that included Peninsula Plaza (1981), PSA Keppel Distripark (1995), and Samsung Hub office tower in Church Street (2001). Departing from the prevailing trend among contemporary corporate practices, these large-scale commercial projects were designed without the involvement of foreign design consultants. Wong's practice has expanded regionally since the late 1990s, with overseas branch offices in other Southeast Asian countries, China, and the Middle East.

Wong also played an active role in the development of the architectural profession, especially in accreditation and education issues. He was one of the founding members of the Singapore Institute of Architects (SIA) in 1961, subsequently serving four terms as its president from 1963–66, through the crucial period of Singapore's political transition, and remaining a council member till 1972. As a representative on the Board of the Singapore Polytechnic and, later, the Board of Governors in the University of Singapore, he was party to the conversion of the local architecture course from a diploma to a full-fledged degree course in the early 1970s. In addition, Wong has served in numerous advisory roles with statutory boards and government ministries since the early days of his career. Most recently, he was chairman of the Preservation of Monuments Board for six years, from 2003–09, overseeing the setting up of the Monuments Inspectorate. For his lifelong contribution to the local architectural profession and public service, Wong became the inaugural recipient of the Singapore Institute of Architects Gold Medal in 1998, and was conferred the Public Service Star (BBM) by the Government of Singapore in 2005.

Wong I Ek

(黄怡益, Huang Yiyi, date of birth/death unknown)

Medical doctor, landlord, staunch supporter of Sun Yat-Sen, Malaysia

Dr Wong I Ek was one of the earliest Chinese doctors in Malaysia. He was one of two students who enrolled in the College of Medicine for Chinese in Hong Kong in 1890 and graduated five years later. The College of Medicine for Chinese (now the Hong Kong University) was established in 1887 and one of its pioneering students was Dr Sun Yat Sen, who became the first president of China in 1911. On qualifying with a LMS (Licentiate in Medicine and Surgery), Dr Wong I Ek worked for a time at the Alice Memorial Hospital in Hong Kong, which was built by Sir Kai Ho Kai, a British-trained doctor and barrister, in memory of his wife, Alice Walkden. He returned to Malaya in 1895 and was posted as apothecary to the Taiping Jail, in the State of Perak.

The first doctors employed by the state following British intervention in Perak in 1874 were designated apothecaries. They were graduates of colonial medical colleges. At the start, there was only one apothecary in the entire State Medical Service, stationed at the Taiping Jail. In the late 1870s, the British Resident of Perak was Sir Hugh Low. At the time, beri-beri was rife among the miners in Larut, the district Taiping was in. The doctors at the time did not know its cause (it was due to a deficiency of vitamin B1 or thiamine in the miners' diet, which consisted mainly of polished white rice and salted fish) and the Chinese sinsehs (physicians) could do nothing about beri-beri either. Hugh Low recognized the gravity of the situation and imposed a tax of $1 per head on every Chinese in the state, in return for which they were entitled to free medical treatment. With the help of the mining *towkay*s, he established small hospitals in the mines and sent his apothecary to treat the stricken miners. However, the poll tax on Chinese was unpopular and was abolished in 1885. By then, the state's coffers were quite healthy with revenue from tin. Hugh Low established the first modern hospital in Taiping to treat beri-beri, the Yeng Wah Hospital. He also employed a European doctor, designated a surgeon, to head the hospital.

As the Medical Department grew, more European doctors were employed as district surgeons, while Asian apothecaries were also recruited for the smaller hospitals, and to work under the European surgeons. There were thus two categories of doctors in the state hospitals; surgeons trained in British universities and apothecaries trained in colonial medical colleges. The apothecaries were not accorded the honorific title of "doctor" and were on a different salary scale from the European doctors although they did essentially the same work. The colonial medical colleges (including the College of Medicine for Chinese in Hong Kong) were not fully recognized by the Federated Malay States Government, and their graduates were considered not on par with the British-trained doctors.

In 1896, Dr Wong I Ek was transferred to the district hospital, Taiping, to a more senior post with heavy responsibilities. There was a need for more Chinese doctors in the hospitals, in view of the fast growing Chinese population. In the Perak Administrative Report 1897, the acting British Resident, J.P. Rodger, wrote "All Surgeons are engaged from England, and possess English diplomas. Most of the Apothecaries have been trained in Ceylon or India. Having regard to the great preponderance of Chinese patients treated in the hospitals, I think it would be advisable to increase the number of Chinese Apothecaries, of whom there is at present only one (Dr Wong I Ek), and send some students to be trained at the Medical School in Hongkong."

In 1906 both the Straits Settlements (comprising Singapore, Penang, and Malacca) and the Federated Malay States drew up the uniform Medical Registration Regulations, defining the qualifications of doctors in a move to weed out unqualified persons, and also established a Medical Council with disciplinary powers. The apothecaries had to sit for a special examination held in Singapore, the first of which was in 1905. If they passed, they were considered fully qualified and designated assistant medical officers if they remained in government service, or could opt to be private medical practitioners. Dr Wong I Ek sat for the first examination and passed. This qualifying examination was a stiff one. In 1907 there were only nine qualified Asian doctors in Perak.

After nearly ten years in government service, Dr Wong opted to do private medical practice, opening his dispensary in the tin-mining town of Ipoh. He was the first qualified Chinese doctor to practise medicine in Ipoh. His dispensary was at 46, Market Street. Later, he established two other branches in the town, placing the following advertisement in the newspaper:

Dr Wong I Ek
Lee Chai Dispensary,
No. 51, Treacher Street, Ipoh.
Consulting hours; 8 am – 12 noon;
1 pm – 5 pm daily.

Urgent cases will be treated at any hour. Lee Chai Dispensary is left open till 9 pm every night. Thus, it is very convenient to patients who cannot otherwise procure medicines after the usual office hours.

The other private medical practitioners in town were British doctors. Dr Wong also established a private hospital for Chinese prostitutes jointly with the district surgeon, Dr Duncan Cooper.

Being a former college mate of Dr Sun Yat Sen, Wong was a staunch supporter of Sun's revolutionary cause. Together with his wife, Madam Ko, he made substantial financial contributions to Sun's cause. In 1907, together with a few other townsmen, he helped Dr Sun to set up a branch of the T'ung Meng Hui in Ipoh. He was also a social activist, helping to raise funds for charitable purposes, for example, to relieve the hardships caused by flooding in China. He became a wealthy landowner and an influential member of the community. During the First World War, together with some friends, he contributed a fighter plane, named Chinese Loyalty, to the British Government.

Wong Kee Tat

(黄纪达, Huang Jida, 1927–2004)
Businessman, Malaysia

Huang Ji Da's roots go back to the district of JieXi, village of MaTou, in Hepo, Guangdong (揭西县河婆马头村). He was born on 10 December 1927 in Belitung (吻里洞), Indonesia. Huang is the fourth amongst his eight brothers.

Earlier documentations show that Huang's father, Guo Zheng (黄国政), journeyed from China to the shores of Palembang, Indonesia, at the age of twenty. Guo found work there as a tin miner and being very industrious, was quickly promoted to the rank of the group leader. With his experience in the mining industry, he became a subcontractor. As Guo Zheng gained some measure of economic stability, he was convinced of the bright prospects in Malaysia. Guo Zheng's conviction led him to send for his entire family to Kulai, Johor. From the mining industry, Guo Zheng ventured into rubber plantations. At the time, Guo Zheng had already started a grocery shop with his earnings from the mining industry. He persevered at his businesses and found success with his ventures. After ten years of hard work, he finally made enough to purchase a couple hundred acres of rubber estate land and also became one of the important local leaders in Kulai.

During the Second World War (1939–45), the Japanese invaded Malaya and Guo Zheng was among the many who were arrested. Men, young and old, faced either death or imprisonment at the hands of the invaders. Left with no choice, Huang, who was then fourteen, and two of his brothers, ran away to the Riau Islands. The journey was perilous and Huang later recalled several episodes that almost took his life. But luck was on his side and he managed to survive to tell the tales. Huang and his brothers made their way back to their place of birth and continued their primary education there. After the Second World War, Huang returned to Peninsular Malaysia. In another lucky stroke of fate, his father, Guo Zheng also survived the war and the Japanese invasion.

Huang began his career in Singapore in 1947. He first worked in a hotel, then set up a trading company in 1947, dealing with goods imported from Indonesia. With this business, he began accumulating his capital. A determined young man with a thirst for knowledge, Huang took night classes in English and accounting. Combined with his intelligence and natural aptitude for business, education further strengthened his skills and capability.

He met and married Yew Sow Wah (游秀华) in 1959 and they had a son and four daughters.

In 1960, Huang returned to Kuala Lumpur to establish a construction company, Lian Seng Construction Sdn. Bhd. with his younger brother. He had also dabbled in property development where he partnered the former MCA secretary, Tan Tiong Hoi, to build a row of shophouses located next to Assunta Hospital, Petaling Jaya. Four years later, he acquired an A-class contractor licence and founded his sole ownership development firm, Lian Seng Properties Sdn. Bhd.

From then, and especially between 1960–70, Huang was actively involved in housing developments in Kuala Lumpur and soon rose to become one of the tycoons in the building industry. Famous landmark buildings he had a hand in included the Regent Hotel, Kuala Lumpur Plaza, Pertama Shopping Complex, Kota Raya Complex, Wisma KLI, and Wisma Lian Seng, located right in the heart of the city.

Clinching immense success in this sector, Huang began diversifying through investments in various industries ranging from finance, commerce, insurance, hotel to retail. His projects expanded to include Kuala Lumpur Finance, People's Insurance, Hotel Oriental (now Regent Hotel). With his considerable experience and accomplishments, Huang was awarded numerous joint venture projects with Syed Kechik, including the development of the Pan Pacific Hotel, situated on the land owned by UMNO.

Huang also made forays into other states in Malaysia. He joined forces with Tengku Osman, brother-in-law of the sultan of Johor, to develop New Kulai Garden, a project involving 774 acres of land and more than 10,000 unit of houses. As Huang recalled fondly, Tengku Osman was a man who was very influential and well respected. Tengku Osman had not been just a shareholder in name, but had offered to raise personal cash to fund the Kulai project.

A person who was well liked by his peers, Huang also had connections that proved advantageous in his line of work. With help of (then MCA president) Lee San Choo, political secretary of Finance Minister Tun Tan Siew Sin, Huang secured a much needed loan to finance the housing project in Kluang. The project was a huge hit and earned him more than a million ringgit.

In recognization of his outstanding contributions, Huang was one of the handfuls who received the title of "DPMJ Datukship" from the Sultan of Johor in 1975, in addition to the honour received from the Justice of Peace (JP) in 1969.

At the peak of his career, Huang, also known as "King of Developers", controlled three top, public listed companies namely, Kuala Lumpur Industries Bhd. (KLI), Universal Cable (M) Bhd. and Sri Hartamas Corporation. He was also the managing director of more than thirty companies.

Not surprisingly, Huang also played an active role in the Chinese community. He held chairmanship and advisory positions in more than thirty Chinese associations.

When the Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA) acquired the press corporation, Tong Bao, in the 80s, Huang was appointed the chairman. Huang considered buying over Sin Chew Jit Poh from the Oh family members although this plan did not materialize. The media held Huang's keen interest as he willingly funded the Wong Kee Tat Journalism Awards and the Editor's Association of Chinese Media Malaysia (EACM) which was introduced in 1983.

However, he was badly affected by the economic recession in mid-1980s when his share prices dropped by more than 50 per cent in the market. To repay the loans, Huang had to sell off his companies. Dealt with such a blow to his businesses, Huang stoically faced the setback. However, he suffered serious health problems.

Huang passed away peacefully on 16 January 2004 at the age of seventy-seven.

Wong Meng Voon

(黄孟文, Huang Mengwen, 1937–)
Writer, Singapore

Wong Meng Voon has been one of the leading figures in Chinese language literature in Singapore since the 1960s. He is renowned for his novels and also for pioneering and fostering the writing of mini-fiction, or the micro-novel. He researches and teaches modern literature in China, as well as Chinese literature in Singapore and Malaysia, and is remarkably active in literary clubs, holding many important positions in these organizations.

"Wong Meng Voon" is his original name. Although he uses the pen name of Meng Yi (孟毅) as well, he is well known by his original name. He was born in Kampar, Perak, when it was under the British colonial administration, on 27 July 1937. His family traces its ancestral roots to Meixian (梅县), a Hakka county in Guangdong province, China. During the Japanese Occupation from 1941 to 1945, his family fled to the Pahang state. It was not until 1946 that he started elementary education in Malaya. He began reading classical Chinese texts at the age of ten and English books at seventeen. After graduating from Penang's Han Chiang High School in 1956, he taught at Chung Hwa Lipis secondary school for a year.

Wong came to Singapore in the late 1950s and settled down over the years as a Singapore citizen. He was admitted in 1958 to the Department of Chinese Studies, Nanyang University, from which he obtained his bachelor of arts degree in 1962. He enrolled at the University of Singapore in 1964 on a government scholarship, and completed his studies with a B.A. honours degree from the Department of Chinese Studies in 1966. He went to the United States in 1970 to pursue his Ph.D. degree at the University of Washington and received his doctorate in 1975.

After graduating from his doctoral studies in the United States, he returned to Singapore and worked in the civil service for a few years before joining the private sector in 1983. In addition, he was also an adjunct teaching staff with the local universities. He is currently past Singapore's retirement age, but is still offering courses on modern Chinese literature and Chinese literature in Singapore and Malaysia at the National University of Singapore and the Singapore Institute of Management.

Fiction is the genre that Wong works mainly on and for which he is famous and he writes essays as well. His writing of short stories started as early as when he was sixteen and he then expanded into mini-fiction as well. Two of his early anthologies of short stories, Zaijian Huilan de shihou (再见惠兰的时候, When I Meet Huilan Again, 1968) and Wo yao huo xia qu (我要活下去, I Want to Live, 1970), enjoyed enormous acclaim. Literary critics commented that these two anthologies reflect Wong's early style and concern — which showed sympathy for the underprivileged in local society — before he went to the United States.

Wong's literary techniques and contents became more sophisticated and diverse on his return from the United States. Rather than simply focusing on the local scene, his works reflect situations and changes in the global setting, with styles that are more satirical. The major works of this new period include, An le wo (安乐窝, The Happy Nest, 1991), Xuefu xiadong (学府夏冬, The Ups and Downs of an Institute, 1994), Huang Mengwen wenji (黄孟文文集, A Collection of Wong Meng Voon's Writings, 1995), Huang Mengwen weixing xiaoshuo (黄孟文微型小说, A Collection of Micro Novels by Wong Meng Voon, 2004), and Huang Mengwen zhongpian xiaoshuo zixuanji (黄孟文中篇小说自选集, A Self-Collection of Short Stories by Wong Meng Voon, 2007).

A number of his works have been translated into various languages. Zaijian Huilan de shihou was translated into Japanese. Zouri de shanxian (昨日的闪现) was translated by himself into English and titled Glimpses of the Past: Stories from Singapore and Malaysia, and subsequently into Tagalog, the title, Suylap Sa Lumipas. The Official Chair was translated into Malay.

Wong has played a key role in fostering Chinese-language literature in Singapore. Even before furthering his studies in the United States in 1970, he founded the Singapore Association of Writers, a joint effort he made with his fellow writers, including Miao Xiu (苗秀), Yao Zi (姚紫), Liu Bei'an (柳北岸), and Li Tinghui (李廷辉). His return to Singapore in 1971 marked the beginning of his deeper engagement with the Singapore Association of Writers; he became its president, a position he was to hold for the following two decades. In addition, he assumed various positions with other organizations, including being vice-president of the Asian Chinese Writers Association and president of the World Chinese Writers Association (Singapore branch). Since 2002 he has been a member of the Arts Advisory Panel, Singapore's National Arts Council. Currently, he is honorary president of the Singapore Association of Writers, and the charter president of the World Chinese Mini Fiction Research Association.

Another of Wong's significant contribution has been through his role as a researcher and teacher in the field of Chinese-language literature in Singapore. He has come up with many academic articles and books on the topic. Of these, the most important is the volume he co-edited with Xu Naixiang (徐乃翔), titled, Xinjiapo huawen wenxueshi chugao (新加坡华文文学史初稿, A Preliminary Study the History of Singapore Chinese literature, 2002). Not as simple as its title suggests, the volume is so far the most comprehensive account of how Chinese literature has evolved in Singapore.

Wong won literary awards as early as the 1950s. He received the literary award (novel) from a Penang magazine, Mayi (蚂蚁, Ant) in 1951, and the literary award (novel) from the Nanyang University Chinese Society in 1958. In 1978, he received a translation prize from the National Book Development Council of Singapore. 1981 saw a double success for him: he was awarded the Cultural Medallion (literature) from Singapore, and the Southeast Asia Writer Award from Thailand. In 1994, he received the special literary award (prose), from Beijing Radio, China, and in 1996, the literary award (prose) from the magazine, Zhonghua Yingcai (中华英才, Top China) magazine in China. In 2008, he was given the Whole-life Accomplishment on World Chinese Mini-Fiction Award from the World Chinese Mini-fiction Research Association.

Wong Peng Soon

(黄秉璇, Wang Bingxuan, 1918–96)
Badminton champion, Singapore

Undoubtedly one of the world's greatest shuttlers of all time, Wong Peng Soon was born in 1918 in Johor Baru, Peninsular Malaysia, the grandson of Wong Ah Fook, a prominent Chinese immigrant. He grew up in Johor Baru and made his mark in his sport as a nine-time Malayan champion from 1940 to 1953. But it was his success at the international level which earned him legendary status.

He won his first All-England title in 1950, defended his crown in 1951 and 1952, and came back to win it again in 1955. His All-England success was a big breakthrough for Asia, bringing Malaya instant recognition as a world badminton power. Significantly, he was already thirty-seven years old when he won his fourth All-England title in 1955. His dramatic 15-7, 14-17, 15-10 victory over Eddy Choong earned him much praise.

Besides earning personal glory through his All-England exploits, he also contributed much as a team member in his country's Thomas Cup success. On 26 February 1949, in Preston, England, a small British colony named Malaya became the first country to win badminton's Thomas Cup after beating Denmark 8-1 in the finals. Suddenly, "a place known only for its rubber and tin" came into the international spotlight. This inspiring win showed how a small group of valiant athletes from a backwater British colony in the Far East could, with determination and sacrifice, defy the odds.

There was further success as Malaya defended the Thomas Cup for the next two championships, beating the Unites States 7-2 in 1952, and Denmark 8-1 in 1955. Wong's contribution was beyond dispute. For example, in the 1955 campaign, he won both his matches, defeating first, J. Skaarup 15-5, 16-18, 15-4, and then Finn Kobbero, 12-15, 15-0, 15-7. Skaarup and Kobbero were great players in their own right and Wong's triumphs were a testament not only of his skills, but also his fighting spirit.

It was little wonder that he became a household name, admired for "the grace and speed of his movement and his ability to make his every stroke a work of art". He was also highly regarded by his contemporaries for his commitment and self sacrifice. For example, stories were told about how he used to cycle from Johor to Singapore just to attend training. There was no such thing as a transport allowance then, even for great champions. As Wong himself said in an interview in 1984: "In our time, we had to fend for ourselves. There was no sponsorship or financial aid to compete around the world. We even had to pay our passage and other expenses to play in the All-England."

If anything, recognition came only later. Apart from being made a Member of the British Empire (MBE), Wong earned the Certificate of Honour (Sijil Kemuliaan) bestowed on him by the Singapore Government in 1962. In December 1985, he was awarded the International Badminton Federation (IBF) Long & Distinguished Service Award for his services to his sport. On 22 May 1996, however, the seventy-eight-year-old badminton maestro died after a long illness triggered by a stroke in 1981. He passed away in the quiet setting at the Toa Payoh Hospital in Singapore. Reflective of his iconic status, he was posthumously inducted into the International Badminton Federation's Hall of Fame in May 1999. In 2004, he, along several other top sports personalities, was inducted into the Olympic Council of Malaysia (OCM) Hall of Fame.

Over the years, many have spoken fondly of him both as a player and as a person. Former President of Singapore Wee Kim Wee once recalled how he had played against Wong in the opening round of the Singapore Open in 1938. In less than fifteen minutes, the great shuttler had taken a 14-0 lead before sending the shuttle way out of court to give Wee the service and a consolation point. The humbling experience was repeated in the second game. Looking back on the day he took on a future world beater Wee likened himself to "a cow who (did) not recognize the tiger" and said: "I learned all too quickly that it was my ego or my inability to identify the tiger that ended with me swallowing humble pie, a big chunk of it too, that fateful day".

Speaking about Wong's death, former Thomas Cup teammate Ong Poh Lim used epic language which no one would find exaggerated: "It's the passing of a great, great player. There's no comparison, not even by today's standards." Wong, he said, "gave a lifetime to the sport". Giving a glimpse of the badminton star as a person, Ong added: "He was an outspoken man and had a real temper. But once you knew how to tackle him, he was a nice guy to know. He never played the fool — no girls, no night shows."

Even some of the world's greatest players who came after him would speak of him with much reverence. Eight-time All-England champion Rudy Hartono of Indonesia is himself an icon in the world of badminton. Yet he grew up idolizing Wong. "My wildest dream then was to see him play," he said, adding that Wong, a brilliant stroke player who was famously deceptive with his fine touch, was "the supreme model of consistency".

Paying a glowing tribute to the great champion when he was named an immortal of the past, former IBF secretary Herbert Scheels noted: "The opportunity of seeing Wong in action has done so much to raise the standard (of badminton) in many places. Only because of his perfect footwork and incredibly easy and wristy style of play was it possible for this remarkable player to remain so long at the top and win the All-England at the unusual age of 37."

Wong Peng Soon married with Doreen Poi Chim Neo in 1947. They had three children: Patricia, Audrey, and Dennis.

Wong Pow Nee

(王保尼, Wang Baoni, 1911–2002)
School teacher, Chief Minister of Penang, Malaysia

Wong Pow Nee was an English-educated Chinese school teacher in the former British Straits Settlement of Penang appointed by the British colonial administration to serve as town councillor in his hometown of Bukit Mertajam in the 1950s. He was a humble man who could get along well with the people he interacted with and was involved in much social work. Later when Penang became a state in the independent Federation of Malaya in 1957, he joined the Malayan (later Malaysian) Chinese Association (MCA) and was appointed chief minister of Penang, a position he held for twelve years (1957–69).

Wong was a member of the dialect group Hakka, a minority group among the Chinese who formed the majority community in Penang, which was the first British colony in Malaya and was founded in 1786 by Francis Light. He was born on 7 October 1911 in Bukit Mertajam, Province Wellesley, the mainland part of Penang, which later became one of the Straits Settlements, the other two being Malacca and Singapore. He was educated, first at Anglo-Chinese School, and then St Xavier's Institution in Penang. He passed his Senior Cambridge Examination in 1932 at the age of twenty-one. Little is known of his career in the next four years (1933–36), but he became a teacher from 1937 until the outbreak of the Japanese invasion of Malaya in 1941. He was then attached to St Mary's Primary School in Permatang Tinggi, Simpang Ampat, Province Wellesley.

Like all government servants, Wong's career as a teacher was disrupted during the Japanese Occupation of Malaya from 1941–45. When World War II ended in 1945, Wong taught at another school, Kim Sen School in Bukit Mertajam, for the next twelve years until he was appointed Penang's first chief minister when Malaya became independent in 1957.

It was common for the British colonial administration to recruit educated local people to serve in town councils, where in most cases, the councillors were later inducted into local politics when the country became independent. Wong was first elected as a member of the Bukit Mertajam Town Council in 1953 for two years and was re-elected in 1955 for a further two years. He was also an elected member of the Straits Settlement Council and appointed chairman of the Committee for Commerce and Industry.

Wong's other appointments were as Chinese representative of the Bukit Mertajam District War Executive Committee and member of the Penang Psychological Warfare Advisory Committee. This was some seven years after the communist insurgency began in Malaya in 1948 and did not end until 1960. Certain areas of Province Wellesley, such as Sungei Lembu, were considered "black areas", in which Chinese farmers tilling their crops were killed by the terrorists to intimidate them into opposing the British and supplying them with food. Wong was involved in the colonial administration's measures to resettle the Chinese farmers into "new villages" surrounded by barbed wire to defeat the terrorists. This concept of barbed wire enclosing houses, community halls, and other amenities was borrowed from the successful British tactic of denying the Mau Mau terrorists in Kenya food and other supplies. The British relied on local councillors such as Wong to liaise with the local people to explain their policies to them and discourage them from supporting the communist cause.

With the British departing Penang as Malaya moved towards independence, it was quite logical for Wong to be inducted into local politics through joining the MCA, which together with the United Malays National Organization (UMNO) and the Malayan Indian Congress (MIC), formed the Alliance government to win the first legislative elections in 1955.

When Malaya become independent in 1957, then Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman, appointed Wong the first chief minister of Penang. Wong had to resign from his job as a teacher to take up the appointment. He had reached the peak of his political career by being the chief executive of Malaya's only Chinese-majority state.

In 1959 when independent Malaya held its first general election, Wong represented the MCA as a candidate for the state seat of Bukit Mertajam, his hometown, and won. He represented his constituency for the next five years and was re-elected in the general elections in 1964.

As chief minister, Wong was actively involved in Penang's economic development. Infrastructural projects and industrial parks were set up in Province Wellesley in areas such as Mak Mandin. Deep water wharves in Butterworth across the strait from George Town were constructed. So was a railway line across the Prai River to Butterworth. All these projects were possible because of the good ties between the Penang state government and the federal government, both of which were from the Alliance Party. Wong's excellent ties with the Tunku also facilitated the disbursement of federal funds for Penang's projects.

Wong's contributions to the country were not only confined to Penang though. He accompanied the Tunku as a member of the Malayan delegation which visited the Philippines in June 1959. The Tunku also appointed him a member of the Rahman Talib committee in 1961 to review the then educational policy of the country. The following year, Wong was selected as a member of the Cobbold Commission to ascertain the wishes of the various peoples of the Borneo territories in joining the new federation of Malaysia in 1963. He was credited, along with Ghazalie Shafie, for indicating to the commission that Malaysia was to be a secular nation, but with Islam as its official religion, and freedom of religious worship for the non-Malay communities.

Wong was also a devout Roman Catholic who did much to secure a valuable piece of land with spacious grounds for the construction of St Anne's Church. This is adjacent to the historical chapel of the same name built in 1846 on a hill that has become a shrine for annual pilgrimages on 26 July every year.

But in a Chinese-majority state such as Penang, where opposition to the Alliance government's pro-Malay policies was strong, Wong as chief minister found it difficult to explain his party's support for policies seen as disadvantaging the Chinese. He was often ridiculed by his political opponents as not having the guts to defend the Chinese in Penang. It was not in Wong's nature to be combative and aggressive and his affable nature was interpreted, rightly or wrongly, by his opponents as weakness.

Wong took all the criticisms levelled against him, the MCA, and the Alliance government in his stride. In fact he had privately conceded that the combativeness of politics was not in his blood and offered to resign as chief minister twice — in 1959 and 1964 — but was persuaded to stay on by the Tunku who was satisfied with his leadership in Penang.

But Wong eventually met his political Waterloo in the Malaysian general elections of 1969, where he lost his Bukit Mertajam state seat to his good friend, Ooh Chooi Cheng, of the then new Gerakan party, which took over the Penang state government from the Alliance. Wong was in a way relieved and commented then that he was "humbly submitting to the will of God". Following his defeat and his retirement from politics after 1969, Wong was appointed the Malaysian ambassador to the Vatican in the early 1970s. After his tenure as ambassador expired, he returned home to lead a quiet life in Penang.

He died at the age of ninety-one on 31 August 2002 in his home in Penang.

Wong Yoon Wah

(王润华, Wang Runhua, 1941–)

Poet, prose writer, scholar, Singapore and Malaysia

Wong Yoon Wah has been playing three particular roles that generate impacts on Chinese literature in Singapore and Malaysia, and also in a larger Chinese writing circle that includes Taiwan and mainland China. The first of his roles is as a writer, whose poetry and prose are well known and received. The second has to do with his leadership in literary organizations in Singapore, through which he helps foster literary writings and activities, as well as nurture younger generations of writers. The third concerns his scholarship in modern literature in China and also in Chinese-language literature in the Chinese diaspora.

Wong was born in the state of Perak, Malaya, in 1941, not long before the Japanese occupied the British colony and remained there for about four years until 1945. His ancestral roots can be traced to the county of Conghua, Guangdong. He received his primary and secondary education amidst the profound political changes that turned Malaysia from a colony into a new nation state. In 1966, he left for Taiwan where he pursued his B.A. and M.A. degrees in the National Chengchi University. Subsequently he moved to the United States of America where he obtained a doctorate in literature from the University of Wisconsin-Madison in 1972 and became a researcher at the University of Iowa for a year.

In 1972 he took up the offer from the Nanyang University in Singapore to teach courses on Chinese literature and language. At the Nanyang University, he was designated the director of the Institute of Humanities and Social Sciences. In 1981, he became a senior lecturer at the Department of Chinese Studies, National University of Singapore, which was formed with the merger of the Nanyang University and the University of Singapore. In 1990, he was promoted to associate professor and, in 2000, a professor and head of the Department of Chinese Studies. In 2002 he was appointed dean of the College of Humanities and Social Sciences at Taiwan's Yuan Ze University, and later the faculty professor of Chinese Language and Literature, as well as the director of the International Language and Culture Centre.

Wong Yoon Wah has been producing creative writing since the 1960s, mainly in the genres of prose and poetry, and has more than twenty collections published in Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, and mainland China. His major works include The Sick Sun (患病的太阳, 1966), High Tide (高潮, 1970), Anthology from Inside and Outside (内外集, 1978), Rubber Tree (橡胶树, 1980), Anthology of the Land of Nanyang (南洋乡土集, 1981), Self-Selection of Wong Yoon Wah's Works (王润华自选集, 1986), and Poetry of Mountains and Rivers (山水诗, 1988). His wife, Dan Ying (淡莹), is a poet from Malaysia.

Wong's outstanding literary performance has won him the Epoch Poetry Award (Taiwan, 1975), China Times Literary Award (Taiwan, 1981), and Zhong Xing Literary Award from the Taiwan Writers and Artists Association (1981). For his commitment to promoting literature, he was awarded the Southeast Asia Write Award (Bangkok, 1984), the Cultural Medallion (Literature) by Singapore's National Arts Council (1986), and the ASEAN Cultural Award (Literature, 1993). He was named Honorary Fellow, International Writing Program, University of Iowa, in 1985 and again in 1996.

His dedication to fostering literary activities is no less significant than his creative writing. In the 1960s he and his peers founded the Xingzuo Poetry Society (星座诗社) and the poetry magazine, Xingzuo. He was president of Singapore Association of Writers from 1984 to 1989, and from 1998 to 2003. He was also a member of Arts Advisory Panel, National Arts Council, Singapore, from 1986 to 2002. Between 1986 and 2003, he served as the vice-chairman, Singapore National Selection Committee, Southeast Asian Write Award (Bangkok). He was an editorial adviser for Chinese Culture (Beijing) from 1989 to 2002 and has been vice-president of the Asian Chinese Writers Association since 1997. He was also an adjudicator for the 7th Malaysia Chinese Literary Award. From 2002 to 2004, he was an adviser for the World Chinese Mini-Fiction Research Association.

In addition, Wong is a prolific scholar in the field of modern Chinese literature and diasporic Chinese literature. He has published many monographs and articles and presented numerous papers at international conferences in Chinese and English. His important academic works include Ssu-K'ung Tu: A Poet-Critic of the T'ang (1977), A Study on Relationship between Chinese and Western Literatures (中西文学关系研究, 1978), Essays on Chinese Literature: A Comparative Approach (1988), A New Study of Lu Xun's Novels (鲁迅小说新论, 1992), From Singapore Chinese Literature to World Chinese Literature (从新华文学到世界华文文学, 1994), A New Study of Lao She's Novels (老舍小说新论, 1995), and A New Study of Shen Congwen's Theory of Novels and His Works (沈从文小说理论与作品新论, 1998).

Wu An

(吴岸; 丘立基, Qiu Liji, 1937–)
Chinese poet, Malaysia

Wu An (吴岸), a Chinese poet in Malaysia, has used other pen names such as Ye Li (叶藜), Ye Cao (叶草), Wen Ge (温戈), etc. to publish his earlier poems. Apart from writing poetry, he has also produced several critical essays on Malaysian Chinese literature. His poems have been translated into Malay and English and his anthologies of poems have been published in Taiwan and China besides Malaysia and have won high regard. Several of his poems were included in Selected Fine Works by International Chinese Poets (国际华文诗人精品集) and Collection of Manuscripts of 100 International Chinese Poet (国际华文诗人百家手稿集), published by the International Chinese Poets Society (国际华文诗人笔会). In 1995, Wu An received the Chinese Literary Award presented by the state government of Sarawak. The same year, he was presented with the "Prominent Years" literary achievement award (峥嵘岁月文学成就奖) by the Writers' Association of Chinese Medium of Malaysia (马来西亚华文作家协会). For many years, he has been involved in writing poetry as well as promoting Chinese literary and cultural activities. In 1997, he received the KMN award from the king of Malaysia. He is one of the few Malaysian Chinese poets who have won official awards from the country. In 2000, he received the Malaysian Chinese Literary Award (大马华文文学奖) in recognition of his hard work and contributions. However, Wu has lived a life of much hardship, having gone through the political turbulence during the British colonial years and ten years of imprisonment from 1966 for his involvement in the Sarawak Communist Party to fight for the independence of Sarawak. He has also suffered from illnesses for many years and was diagnosed with cancer in 1998. Nevertheless, he has continued with his writing against all odds.

Wu's original name was Qiu Liji (丘立基) and his family hailed from Chenghai (澄海) in Guangdong (广东). He was born in Kuching, Sarawak on 24 July 1937. His father Qiu Shixun (丘士勋) came from China to settle in Sarawak in 1921 and was a committee member of the local Chinese Chamber of Commerce. When Sarawak was occupied by the Japanese in 1941, his father and several other patriotic Chinese leaders were arrested by the Japanese army. Wu was only four years old at the time. The war robbed him of his chance to go to school and he had his early education from his father. He was only admitted to Primary Two in 1946.

In 1951, Wu entered the junior secondary class in Kuching Chung Hua Secondary School (古晋中华中学). During his school days, he took part in the anti-imperialist student strike movement. In 1935, his house was raided by the special branch of the British colonial government and he was detained and charged with possession of communist books. In such circumstances and in view of his poor health, he then stayed home and did self-study. Wu is a poet who had shown his talent at an early age. His first poem entitled, Bau (石隆门) was published using the pen name, Ye Li, in "The Century Road" (世纪路), a literary page of Nanyang Siang Pau (南洋商报) in 1953 when he was only sixteen. The editor, Yao Zi (姚紫), had high regards for his poetic talent and listed the poem as one of the best poems of the year. Young Wu An had shown a deep concern for society and this first poem of his was about the 1857 rebellion of the Chinese gold-miners in Bau against the rule of James Brooke, the White Rajah of Sarawak. The poem was later included in Anthology of Poems of Love (爱诗集), edited by well known writer Lou Wenmu (楼文牧) (Lu Baiye 鲁白野).

In June 1954, Wu completed his lower secondary education, but was unable to advance to senior secondary class because of his kidney problem. On 29 November, the day he underwent an operation in Singapore, he wrote a poem entitled Mail (寄), which he sent to his classmates in Kuching. This poem was later included as the first poem in Poems on the Shield (盾上的诗篇), his first collection of poems published. In 1955, after staying home for one year to recuperate from his illness, he went to study at an English mission school as he could not proceed to the senior secondary class in his former school. In 1958, he published two short stories entitled, In the Hospital Ward (在病房里) and The Joys of Lao Lai (老赖的欢乐) in Sarawak News (新闻报).

In 1960, Wu was editor of "Rejang Literature" (拉让文艺), a literary page of the Chinese newspaper, Sarawak News. However, the newspaper was banned by the British colonial government in 1962 and he thus lost his job. The same year, his first book, Poems on the Shield, was published by New Moon Publishing (新月出版社) in Hong Kong. This collection comprised twenty-five poems which he wrote between 1954 and 1959. Xing Ying (杏影) wrote this the preface to this book of poems: "This collection of poems by Wu An exudes the poetic freshness; … the poem[s] contained herein have employed a poetic language which is outstanding and refreshing but not a bit difficult, and thus the emotion expressed is overwhelming and close to our hearts." With the publication of this collection of poems, the poetic talents of Wu were thus recognized and in no time he was fondly regarded as the "Poet by the Rejang River". This book of poems was later published again by South Wind Publishing (南风出版社) in Kuala Lumpur in 1988.

Soon after his release from the detention camp where he was kept for ten years in the 1960s, Wu An was engaged as the personal assistant to Wee Boon Ping (黄文彬), then president of The Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Malaysia. He served in that capacity for twenty years. During this period, Wu did not stop writing despite his busy work schedule, but instead had several books of poems published.

He has so far published six books of poems: Poems on the Shield (1962), A Tribute to the Tapang Tree (达邦树礼赞, 1982), I Have Not Fallen Asleep (我何曾睡着, 1985), The Traveler (旅者, 1987), Poems of Durian (榴连赋, 1991), Files of Life (生命存档, 1998), and Daybreak (破晓时分, 2004). He has also produced four collections of critical essays: In Search of Muse in Life (到生活中寻找缪斯) (1987), Malaysian Chinese Literature: A New Beginning (马华文学的再出发) (1991), Outlooks of Malaysian Chinese Literature in the 1990s (九十年代马华文学展望, 1995), and Perseverance and Exploration (坚持与探索, 2004). Furthermore, an anthology of his poems was published in China: Anthology of Poems by Wu An (吴岸诗选, 1996). There are also three books of his translated poems: Gelombang Rejang (Translation in Bahasa Malaysia, 1986), A Tribute to the Tapang Tree (English translation, 1980), and Selected Poems of Wu An (English translation). He has also authored a book of prose entitled, The Bougainvillea (九重葛) and two books of history: The History of Sarawak (砂拉越史话, 2002) and Biography of Wee Boon Ping (黄文彬传). Poems by Wu An have also been included in several important literary anthologies and collections. For example, A Comprehensive Anthology of Chinese Literature in Singapore and Malaysia (新马华文文学大系), edited by Zhou Can (周粲), has five poems by Wu An, namely Four Fountains (四个喷泉), Growing Up (成长), Friends (朋友), Prestige (荣誉) and A Night on the River (夜宿江中); A Comprehensive Anthology of New Chinese Literature in Malaysia (马华新文学大系), edited by Fang Xiu, has his poems A Night Party (晚会) and Flying for the First Time (第一次飞); Three Hundred New Poems (新诗三百首), published by Chiu Ko Publishing (九歌出版社) in Taipei in 1995, also includes three poems by Wu An.

In 1985, Wu An formed the Writers' Association of Chinese Medium of Sarawak (砂拉越华文作家协会) and became its president. He personally edited the association's literary quarterly, Rejang River (拉让江), and published more than forty books of the works of association members under the Hornbill Literature Series (犀鸟丛书). He has also served as chairman of the Writers' Association of Chinese Medium of Malaysia and has spared no efforts in promoting Malaysian Chinese literature and culture.

Wu had gone through turbulent times under the British colonial rule and was actively involved in the struggle for Sarawak's independence in the 1960s. As his life is rooted in the multiracial society of Malaysia, most of his poems reflect a deep sense of concern for this society and the country. In addition, they are focused on the local characteristics of this tropical land, very much in line with the principles of realistic literature, which have always been emphasized by Wu himself. It can be concluded that Wu An has dedicated his poems and life to this land called Malaysia.

Wu Jiyue

(吴继岳, 1905–92)

Leading Thai-Chinese journalist, writer, Thailand

Wu Jiyue is considered by the Thai-Chinese community as a major journalist and important writer.

His ancestral home was in Meizhou City, Guangdong Province, and he entered a traditional Chinese private school when he was seven years old. In 1917, he and his mother relocated to live with family members in Batavia, in the Netherlands East Indies. At first, he served as an apprentice in a trading company. After the First World War, the company he worked for went bankrupt, and he lost his job as a result.

In 1923, Wu returned to China with his mother to marry his child bride. He stayed home without employment for two years and then went abroad again in 1925. His father-in-law was a shareholder in a tapioca flour factory in which he worked as a secretary for five years.

Later he sent for his wife, but she died soon afterwards from hysterocarcinoma. It was a severe blow to him. He resigned from his job soon after this and went to Batavia, where he helped his third brother run a grocery store called Ya Nong Shop (亚弄店).

He always read Chinese newspapers, and contributed articles to them occasionally, some of which were published. It was during the time he spent working in Batavia that he began his writing career. Wu travelled to Thailand to join the staff of the Bangkok Chinese Daily in 1930. Soon afterwards the paper's ownership was transferred and Wu moved to the Chinese People's Daily (《华侨日报》), where he worked for six or seven years.

In 1936 he visited his hometown with a newly married wife and published an article called "Northward Trip Communications" (〈北返通讯〉) in the Chinese Daily.

In 1938, when the Siam Quanhei basketball team paid visits to Singapore and Malaysia, he went along with the team as an accompanying journalist.

A year later, he was invited by Hu Changyao, the proprieter of Malaya's Sin Chew Daily (《星洲日报》), to be editor and sports journalist for the newspaper. He worked there for two years. At the end of 1941, to escape the Japanese army, Wu's family moved to the countryside where they farmed, planting and selling sweet potatoes and vegetables to support themselves.

When Japan surrendered in August 1945, Wu and his family moved back to the urban area. With the support of some friends and business colleagues, he then set up another newspaper, the Fuxing Daily.

In 1946, he was invited by Li Qixiong (李其雄) to go back to Thailand with his five children. He became a journalist with the Chinese Daily News (《中原报》) as well as a Bangkok correspondent for the Southern Ocean Business Daily.

Wu devoted himself to the journalism industry after he came back to Thailand. The Thai Chinese Journalists' Association (暹华记 者联谊社) was set up in July of 1946, and he was elected its director general for two terms and later elected chairman of its board.

In the winter of 1946, he participated in the establishment of the Siam Athletics Federation (暹华体育总会), which was set up in the spring of 1947. Wu was elected director of public relations. He attended the seventh National Games in Shanghai in May 1948 as a special correspondent for the New Chinese Daily News (《新中原报》).

In 1952, Wu set up the Sports News Weekly (《体育周报》) with friends and initiated the Southeast Asia Basketball Fund-raising Tournament (东南亚篮球慈善赛) in 1953. The Thai police sponsored the tournament in November, while Wu Jiyue was the director and secretary of the preparatory committee.

In 1958, Wu Jiyue was imprisoned on charges of being a communist for five years, four months, and eighteen days. He wrote novels, essays, prose, and poems when he was in prison, including his first novel, titled The Husband Sings and the Wife Follows (《夫唱妇随》). He wrote about 200 or 300 special columns and thirty or forty novels. To take part in writing competitions, he secretly sent his articles from prison and won the first prize award from Bangkok News (《曼谷新闻》) in 1962 and the outstanding award in the Golden Pen Novella Competition held by Hua Feng Weekly (《华风》) in 1963.

After leaving prison, he worked for the Hua Feng Weekly. However, the weekly was closed down not so long afterwards. He then got a job at the Bangkok Metropolitan Bank as an ordinary clerk to support his family. However, he still worked on his writing during his leisure hours. Together with a writing team, he worked on a sequential novel called, Yaowarat in Rainstorm (《风雨耀华力》).

In the 1970s, the Southeast Daily (《东南日报》) was set up, and Wu returned to journalism, taking the position its editor. In 1973, the Chinese Daily News, which had been closed for sixteen years, came into circulation again with the help of Li Qixiong. Wu became its executive editor. The newspaper was renamed the New Chinese Daily News.

In 1989, Wu published his seventh and last book, called The Collection of Wu Jiyue (《吴继岳文集》). Fifty Years Abroad (《海外五十年》) and Records of Sixty Years Abroad (《六十年海外见闻录》) were autobiographies, which recorded his vicissitudinous career. Wu died on 3 April 1992 in Bangkok.

Wu Lien-Teh,

(Gnoh Lean Tuck, 伍连德, Wu Liande, 1879–1960)

Physician, author, medical scientist, plague fighter, social reformer, Malaysia

Wu Lien-Teh was internationally acclaimed for his role as a plague fighter in 1910–11 when a plague hit Manchuria. He also helped in modernizing China's medical services and made a radical improvement to the medical education of China by including post-mortem examination in the curriculum. During his tumultuous thirty years in China, he helped build some twenty hospitals, laboratories, and research institutions, including the Beijing General Hospital. Wu's contribution to China went beyond epidemic control and representing China at various international medical conferences or other medical related events. While in Malaya, he was involved in social reform works for various causes, and actively ran anti-opium smoking campaigns. He contributed to the publication of a few medical books, journals, and articles and wrote an autobiography in his later years. He was also honoured as the "Pioneer of Modern Chinese Medicine" and was one of the three "Outstanding Straits Chinese" along with Lim Boon Keng (林文庆) and Song Ong Siang (宋旺相).

Wu Lien-Teh was born the fourth son and eighth child to a family of eleven offspring to a goldsmith father Ng Kee Hok (伍祺学) and mother Lam Choy Fan (林彩繁) on 10 March 1879 in Penang. At age twenty-six in 1905, he married Ruth Huang Shu-Chiung (黄淑琼), the younger sister of Margaret Huang (黄端琼, wife of Lim Boon Keng) and had three sons by her. Unfortunately Ruth died in 1937 and Wu Lien-Teh and his second wife had five children in China. The eldest daughter, Wu Yu-lin (伍玉玲), is the author of the book entitled Memories of Dr. Wu Lien-Teh, Plague Fighter.

Wu Lien-Teh received his earlier education in English in Penang, where he was born, and he was a graduate of the Penang Free School. In 1896, he won the much coveted Queen's scholarship in the Straits Settlements to study medicine at Emmanuel College, Cambridge University, and from 1899–1902, continued his medical studies as an intern at St Mary's Hospital in London. Throughout his studies, he was always a top student and won many awards, including a research studentship to undertake postgraduate work in research. He decided on research on malaria in Liverpool, then bacteriology at Halle in Germany, and at the Institute Pastuer in Paris.

From 1903–04, he joined the newly established Institute for Medical Research (IMR) in Kuala Lumpur as research staff on renewal of his second-year Emmanuel College internship. Prior to his internship at IMR, Dr Lim Boon Keng initiated him into social service work. He advocated liberation for women by education, the removal of queues, and set up the Selangor Literary and Debating Society. The aim of the debating society was to improve on the use of the English language and speech, and thus the cultural exchanges between the east and west. He also campaigned for anti-gambling and anti-opium causes. In 1904 at age twenty-five, Wu became the president and the physician-in-charge of the Penang Anti-Opium Association, which he founded. In 1906 he organized the first Anti-Opium Conference in Malaya. The conference in Ipoh was a great success and subsequent campaigns were supported by representatives from various trades and professions. However, the success of the campaigns agitated powerful forces involved in the lucrative opium trade, and subsequently and ironically, in 1907, he was prosecuted for possessing an ounce of tincture of opium in his clinic.

After this unfortunate episode, he received two invitations, both of which he accepted. One was an invitation to travel to London for the anti-opium conference at the Queen's Hall, and the other was an offer by Grand Councillor Yuan Shikai of the Chinese Government in Beijing to be vice-director of the Imperial Army Medical College in Tientsin, which was established to train Chinese doctors for the army.

His first three years in China, from 1908–11, coincided with the last three years of the Qing Dynasty and Wu faced tremendous challenges in his work there because of the political changes taking place in this traumatic period. On 19 December 1910, he was sent to Harbin to investigate a mysterious disease that was killing people by the thousands. The disease was then found to be the terrifying, continental pneumonic plague epidemic extending from the north-west of Manchuria to as far south as Nanking and Shanghai. The suppression and eradication of the disease required much initiative and bold actions, and he appealed for imperial sanction of the cremation of 3,000 patients who had died of the epidemic disease, and to set up quarantine stations to separate the patients from the public. Transportation between cities was also strictly curtailed so as to suppress the spread of the disease. Wu succeeded in his mission and the disease was eradicated.

In Apri1 1911, he organized and chaired an International Plague Conference, the first ever international scientific conference held in China, in the Manchurian capital of Mukden (the present day Shenyang). The conference was attended by prominent figures from eleven nations and it showed off China's capability in dealing with her medical and social problems. Recognition for him followed and he was conferred the rank of major in the Imperial Army of China and appointed medical officer of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The Northern Manchurian Plague Prevention Service was set up in 1912 with Wu as its director at the Harbin headquarters. In 1915 the Chinese Medical Association was established and Wu became its honorary secretary cum editor of the Chinese Medical Association Journal. In 1916 University of Hong Kong conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws (LLD). He was also appointed physician extraordinary to President Li Yuanhung and chief physician of the four railways, namely Jinghan, Jingzhang, Jingfeng, and Jingpu.

When cholera broke out in Harbin in 1919,Wu was appointed the executive chairman of the Cholera Bureau and was responsible for the control of the disease.The Central Epidemic Bureau in Beijing was then set up. By making use of the experience gained and facilities set up by the Plague Prevention Service, Wu and his team managed to combat the disease. In 1926, he established the Harbin Professional Medical School and was its principal. A 500-page scientific work entitled, A Treatise on Pneumonic Plague, by Wu Lien-Teh was published, and for this work, he was conferred the rare honour of being made "Doctor of Medical Sciences" by the Imperial University of Tokyo, the first such honour to be given to a non-Japanese. In 1927, the international League of Nations elected him fellow of the health organization and recognized him as an expert on plagues. The year 1930 saw him appointed as chief technical expert of the Ministry of Health to advise the government on important public health matters. By this time, his research work and publications had made him a world authority on plagues. In 1932, the 900-page volume, A History of Chinese Medicine, which Wu co-authored, was published. From 1930 to 1937, Wu was involved in the organization of the National Quarantine Service of Chinese, as its director general.

At the age of fifty-eight in 1937, due to the Japanese invasion in China, Wu returned to Malaya and set up a medical practice in Ipoh. Although he was only involved in general practice, he continued to encourage cremation as opposed to burial as the best method for handling the deceased. After the Second World War, Wu sought to lead a peaceful and quiet life. Besides his medical practice, he remained active and contributed to setting up the Perak Public Library and participated in organizations such as the Perak Medical Practitioners' Society and the Rotary Club. He also began collecting books from various sources on Chinese, Indian and European Art, philosophy, the sciences, history, and culture. In the early 1950s, Wu started to write his own autobiography, which took six years to complete. It was a 600-page book of memoirs entitled, Plague Fighter: The Autobiography of a Modern Chinese Physician and was published in 1959. By 1957, he had accumulated a collection of curios and art pieces and donated his "Wu Lien-Teh collections" to Nanyang University in Singapore and gave his scientific papers and specimens of plagues to University of Hong Kong.

He continued his practice in medicine until he retired at the age of eighty. He died at the age of eighty-one on 21 January 1960.

Wu Teh Yao

(吴德耀, Wu Deyao, 1916–94)
Scholar, educator, Singapore

Dr Wu Teh Yao (or Goh Teik Jhow) was a well known scholar and university administrator in Taiwan and Singapore, who had served as president of the Tunghai University (东海大学) in Taiwan, acting vice-chancellor of the Nanyang University (南洋大学), and director of the Institute of East Asian Philosophies in Singapore.

Wu was a native of Wenchang county (文昌) in the Hainan province (海南) of China. When his father passed away while he was at the tender age of nine, he moved to Penang, Malaya, and lived with his uncle. He started schooling at a local missionary school, the Anglo-Chinese School, and later at the Chung Ling High School (钟灵中学). In 1936 Wu went back to China and received his undergraduate education at the University of Nanking, or Jinling daxue (金陵大学), a private university in Nanjing (南京) founded by the American missionaries of the Methodist Church. When Wu graduated four years later with a bachelor of arts degree in English and History, he was sent by the university to the United States of America for further studies. He was at the Hamilton College in New York State for a year before going for graduate training at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University. He received his master of arts degree in 1942 and then went on to Harvard University, from which he received his doctor of philosophy degree in government in 1946.

Wu Teh Yao started his career by joining the Political Science Department at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) as a research fellow from 1946 to 1947. At the same time, he was also associated with the Chinese studies division of the Hartford Seminary Foundation. But from 1947 to 1954 Wu appeared to have moved from academia to diplomacy. He left MIT in 1947 to join the staff of the delegation, and subsequently, the secretariat, of the Republic of China at United Nations, and stayed until 1949. During his tenure with the Chinese diplomatic corps — then working at the interim headquarters of the United Nations in New York — he served on various committees, including the Commission on Human Rights, under the chairmanship of Eleanor Roosevelt. As such, he was involved with the drafting of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and had been attached to the war-torn areas of East Asia. In January 1951, Wu was invited by the Government of the Federation of Malaya to join Dr William Fenn on a mission to "survey the entire field of the education of Chinese in Malaya" in order to make recommendations which would enable the Chinese schools of that country to make "the greatest contribution to the future welfare and happiness of the people of Malaya". Against the context of preparing for the birth of a new nation, Fenn and Wu were, in essence, tasked to offer suggestions which would help to integrate the system of Chinese education — which had in the past developed independently in this British colony — into a "Malayan" national education system that was in the making. They conducted their study in various parts of Malaya from February to April, and submitted their report, "Chinese Schools and the Education of Chinese Malayans" (more commonly known as the "Fenn-Wu Report") in June that year. The report contained concrete suggestions but, unfortunately, had never been adopted by the Malayan Government.

In 1954, Wu Teh Yao went to Taiwan and took up the appointment of professor of political science and dean of the College of Arts at the newly established Tunghai University. The university, founded in 1953 by the United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia, a Methodist missionary organization, was the first Christian university established in Taiwan. Wu became the president of Tunghai University in 1957 and served in that position until 1971. Although Wu was the second president in the history of the university, he is remembered as having made vital contributions to the institution during its founding period through his substantial fourteen years of service there. It appears that he had also assisted the missionary body to which he was affiliated in its endeavour to expand their venture outside Taiwan. In 1959, on the initiative of the board of trustees of the Tunghai University, Wu made a special trip to Penang to explore the possibility of setting up a Christian university, either in Singapore or in the Federation of Malaya. He was reported to have said that there was a "definite need" for a third university "in this country", while having an "exploratory" meeting with local community leaders and educators in Penang. Wu was awarded an honorary doctorate degree by the Hamilton College in 1966.

He went to Singapore and started a new chapter of his academic career after retiring from the Tunghai University. In January 1972, he was appointed by the University of Singapore (SU) as professor and head of its Political Science Department, a position he served only until 1975, after which, he joined the Nanyang University (or Nantah). In fact, Wu's professional association with Nantah started even before he came to Singapore, as he had served as an external examiner in the discipline of government and public administration for the university. Wu first served as dean of the College of Graduate Studies and later became acting vice-chancellor of the Nanyang University on 16 August 1976. However he served in this capacity for less than a year and resigned from the post on 13 August 1977. Wu's career at Nantah lasted only for five years (1975 to 1980), mainly because the university had merged with the University of Singapore on 8 August 1980 to form the National University of Singapore (NUS). After the merger of the two universities, Wu served as professor of political science at NUS. However he retired from the university the following year at the age of sixty-five.

Wu had openly expressed his disapproval of the idea of merging Nantah with SU. When the "Report on University Education in Singapore" — submitted to the government in December 1979 by a committee led by Sir Frederick Dainton recommending that Singapore should have only "a single, strong university" — was released, Wu's comments, in his capacity as a dean of Nantah, were that Dainton "did not understand Nantah's history and the enthusiasm of the supporters instrumental in setting up the university". He instead believed that having two separate universities, where one "concentrate[s] on meeting Western-style development needs", and the other one "imparts oriental requirements in education" would better serve the interests of Singapore. He also foresaw that the continued existence of Nantah would contribute to nurturing a class of native intellectual elite, essential for the development of the Chinese cultural heritage in the society, and helping the nation to cope with the "possible" rise of China as "a political-economic power at the end of the century".

Nevertheless, Wu did not withdraw from public service after leaving the university. During the early 1980s, the Singapore government planned on systematically teaching Confucianism as a curriculum of moral education in schools. Accordingly, it set up a Committee on Confucian Ethics (CCE) responsible for writing the textbooks to be used in schools. Moreover the government in 1983 set up an Institute of East Asian Philosophies (IEAP) aimed at promoting research on East Asian philosophies in general, and Confucianism in particular. The institute has since hosted well known international scholars to present lectures or conduct research on a regular basis, in addition to organizing large-scale conferences on Confucian studies in Singapore or with overseas partners. These concerted efforts testify that the Singapore authorities were then keen to promote Confucian learning at home and abroad. Wu had been an enthusiastic supporter of this project. He was chairman of the CCE and a board member of the IEAP since its inception. From November 1986 to December 1989, he was also the director of IEAP.

Although laden with burdensome official duties, Wu, being a devoted Christian, also committed much of his time in church affairs. He was an elder of the Mandarin congregation in the Orchard Road Presbyterian Church in Singapore from November 1973, and served the church till his very last days. Wu passed away on 17 April 1994 at a hospital in Taipei. He and his wife, Hsueh Ying (薛瑛), were at the time visiting their children who lived in Taiwan. Unfortunately, he suffered from a stroke and died at the age of seventy-eight. To commemorate his contributions as a scholar and educator, his friends and former colleagues set up a "Wu Teh Yao Memorial Fund". Since March 1995, the fund has been used to sponsor an annual public lecture presented by distinguished scholars on themes related to Chinese culture and Confucianism.

Xiao Yao Tian

(萧遥天, 1912–90)

Educationist, scholar, writer, Malaysia

Xiao Yao Tian is best known for saying that the Teochew people in Southeast Asia are like the blossoms on a branch (东南亚潮人一枝花), constantly renewing themselves as they bloomed. He is best remembered as an author, a sometime poet, a teacher and an educationist. He was one of the committee members of the Curriculum Committee of the Ministry of Education in Malaysia. He also served as a lecturer in the Teachers' Training College in Penang. As an earnest educationist, he founded the Bing Guang College in Penang where he also served as a teacher. He made extensive contributions to Chinese language education in Malaysia by writing and edited Chinese textbooks for schools. He also wrote over thirty reference books for students of the Chinese language, and edited the journal, Teaching and Learning Monthly (教与学月刊) for thirteen years. Xiao was also a notable Malaysian Chinese writer, for he has published many novels, short stories and poems. His contributions to Chinese literature encompassed his post of researcher at the United Association of Poetry in Malaysia.

Little is known about his early life in China except that he was born 1912 and was originally named Xiao Gongwei (萧公畏). As a young man, he had a voracious appetite for books. This eventually moulded him into a well educated man. He spent most of his formative years studying in China and graduated from the Shanghai University of Art in the 1930s. After graduation, he spent six years as a secondary school teacher in the Chao Yang District of Guangdong Province. He must have had been a teacher and writer of some notice, for he was Professor Rao Zongyu invited him to write a book on Teochew Drama and Music in Shantou in 1946. Although Xiao completed the book, neither he nor Rao could publish it due to the political upheaval in China at the time. However, Xiao was not disheartened. Armed with extensive knowledge of Teochew culture and arts, he subsequently became the editor of books on Teochew history. He also edited books titled "On Language" and "A Record of Teochew Drama and Music".

Due to continued political instability in China curtailed Xiao's literary career, he migrated from China to Penang in Malaysia. His reputation as a writer and educationist must have preceded him, for he soon accepted an appointment to teach at Chung Ling High School in Penang in 1953. He must have been an exceptional teacher, for he was appointed the head of the Chinese language department after teaching at the school for seven years.

As evinced from the books he edited and wrote, as well as the dedicated way in which he sought to impart Chinese culture to his students throughout his teaching career, Xiao was very interested in traditional Chinese culture, arts and literature. He continued writing in Malaysia, churning out numerous essays, novels and poems. He also continued his research on specific topics in Chinese culture, especially Teochew culture and the way in which it had evolved in Malaysia. Amongst his essays, the most famous collections are: Random Thoughts《东西谈》, Writings done in Wind Eating Chamber《食风楼随笔》, Essays in the Tropics《热带散墨》, Footprints at Painting Exhibitions《展画行脚》, and Writings during the Festive Season《佳节散墨》. Juggling his teaching duties and his responsibilities as head of the Chinese language department in Chung Ling High School, Xiao remained a prolific writer and researcher. During this time, he also produced several novels including: Chinese Herb《冬虫夏草》, The Changing Leopard《豹变》, The Changing Tiger《虎变》, The Changing Dragon《龙变》, The Nightingale's Song《夜莺曲》, and The Thunder of Spring《春雷》. Xiao was an innovative writer who had a way with words. Not only did he write publish collections of his essays and copies of his novels, he also wrote volumes of poetry. Some of the poetry collections he published are: Poems of Yao Tian《遥天诗草》, Ordinary Poems《不惊人草》, and Some Poems from the Wind Eating Chamber《食风楼诗存》.

As Xiao was very keen to educate the Chinese community in Malaysia about the history and culture of their ancestors, he undertook a great deal of research which he subsequently published. In so doing, he hoped to educate Malaysian Chinese as to Chinese folklore, the different Chinese festivals and how they were celebrated, the evolution of different Chinese surnames, as well as the differences between the traditions practiced by Malaysian Chinese and their ancestors in China. Some of the books he penned for this educative purpose include: Research on Chinese Surnames《中国姓氏研究》, A Study of People with the 'Xiao' Surname《萧氏源流世系人物考》, A Study of People with the 'Zheng' Surname《郑氏源流世系人物考》, A Study of People with the 'Zhang' Surname《张氏世系源流人物考》, A Study of Chinese Surnames《中国人名的研究》, A Guide to the Simple Interpretation of Divinatory Symbols of Yi Jing《易卦通俗解释》, On Rhetoric《修辞说例》, On reading 'Yi Lu'《读艺录》, On Chinese Painting《写画一得》, On Teaching and Learning Chinese《华文教与学》, and On the Worship of the Nian Beast and the Totem《年兽与图腾崇拜》. Xiao was also extremely active in researching and publishing books on Teochew culture, art, language, folk tradition and histories. Through these books, Xiao hoped to educate future generations of Malaysian Chinese and future generations of Teochew people as to their language and cultural heritage. Books he wrote and published on this subject include: A Study on the Phonetics of the Teochew Language《潮州语言声韵之研究》, A Record of Teochew Drama and Music《潮州戏剧音乐志》, On Teochew Culture《潮州文化丛谈》, Teochew Sages from Folk Legend and the Historic Past《潮州先贤与民间传说》.

In addition to the aforementioned books, he also edited two books, namely, The Special Edition Compilation Volume of the National Novel Writing Contest《全国短篇小说比赛精品特辑》, and The Special Edition Compilation Volume of the Second National Novel Writing Contest《第二次全国短篇小说比赛精品特辑》.

Xiao spent thirty years dedicated to teaching. Through his job as a teacher and the books he published on Chinese culture, literature and history, Xiao has contributed significantly to the state of Chinese education in Malaysia. The journal, Teaching and Learning Monthly (教与学月刊), which Xiao edited for thirteen years, greatly influenced young teachers as well as the direction of Chinese education in Malaysia. His research and publications on Teochew culture has likewise enriched the study of Chinese culture in Malaysia.

Xing Ying

(杏影, 1911–67)

Prose writer, literary editor, Singapore

Xing Ying is fondly remembered in Chinese literary circles in Singapore and Malaysia as an editor of literary supplements of the Nanyang Siang Pau, one of the local major Chinese-language newspapers. His editorial effort in the 1950s and 1960s significantly fostered a new breed of younger writers for local Chinese literature. In addition, the style of the prose (sanwen) he wrote left imprints on a certain cohort of local writers, particularly those who began their literary careers by submitting works to the literary supplements he was taking care of.

Xing Ying is the most widely known pen name for the person originally named Yang Fangjie (杨芳洁), alias Yang Shoumo (杨守默). His other pen names include Gongsun Zhe (公孙哲), Li Qi (里奇), Yang Jie (杨杰), Ai Yusheng (爱欲生), Qian Xingying (钱杏影), and Shao Hong (芍红). He was born in the county of Jianyang (简阳) in Sichuan province, with ancestral roots traceable to the Daxian (达县) county. In 1925, at the age of fourteen, he was brought by his father, Yang Caoxian (杨草仙), to Japan to enrol for his secondary school education there. Subsequently, he was admitted to the Waseda University, where he pursued studies in English. In 1936, he ended his ten-year stay in Japan and returned to Chongqing, in Sichuan province. In 1941, he fled the Japanese encroachment in China went came to New Delhi, where he worked at the Alliance Headquarters.

It was during the years in New Delhi that he started writing prose and had his works published in the newspaper, Zhongguo Shibao (中国时报), based in Calcutta. It was, however, after he came to British Malaya in 1946 that he began making a greater impact on making Chinese literature in the local scene in Singapore and the Malayan Peninsula. His arrival in British Malaya was on the heels of the end of the Second World War. In 1947, he worked for Nanyang Siang Pau as a translator for telegraphs, while teaching at the Chinese High School (华侨中学). He churned out a large number of prose in the literary supplements in Nanyang Siang Pau as well as literary magazines such as Xingqi liu (星期六) and Wenyi hanglie (文艺行列). These works were grouped into a number of collections, such as Dushu yu xiezuo (读书与写作, 1954), Chen nianqing de shihou (趁年轻的时候, 1958), Shu yu ren (书与人, Books and People, 1958), Yuren de shijie (愚人的世界, 1960), and Xiangxiang xiexie (想想写写, 1961). He advocated and practised simplicity, rather than exaggeration and pretence, for writing prose. His writing style was followed by a bunch of young writers at the time.

Although Xing Ying was famous for his prose, he also wrote in other genres such as poetry and comment essays. His prior studies in Japan and in English literature made him well versed in the Japanese and English languages, on top of his mother tongue, Chinese. With his multiple language skills, he did many translating works and also wrote many essays introducing literary works by Japanese and British writers. Thus he helped connect the local Chinese literary circle with what happened in Japan and Britain.

In 1954, when he was forty-three years old, Xing Ying took up the position of editor with Nanyang Siang Pau, where he oversaw a number of literary supplements such as Wenfeng (文风), Xinmiao (新苗), Nanyang Gongyuan (南洋公园), Wenhua (文化), and Qingnian wenyi (青年文艺), for an estimated two thousand issues. In the Chinese literature of Singapore and Malaysia, literary supplements have been important platforms for local writers to make their works known and recognized. Xing's literary supplements witnessed many young writers making their forays into the literary scene.

The editorial principle that Xing Ying adopted was to open up to all writers, regardless of their ideologies and standings, as long as their works had substance and did not pose any personal attack on others. In many articles gratefully remembering Xing as an editor, it was said that his receptive and supportive attitude was particularly evident in Wenfeng, which Xing edited for a period of four years and eight months.

Xing Ying also added much personal touch to the literary circle by advising writers on how to improve their writing skills, encouraging them to submit their works, and even helping out with their personal lives financially. He was regarded as a caring mentor by many writers who had their works published in the literary supplements that he edited. It is no surprise that, long after his death in 1967, a considerable number of the writers who had emerged in the 1950s and 1960s still feel a strong bond to him. Around 2008, many activities were organized by these writers in commemoration of Xing's contributions, including forums and the publication of the indexes and collections of his works.

Y

Yan Weizhen

(严唯真; 林志强, Lin Zhiqiang, 1933–2008)
Writer, promoter of Chinese literature, Indonesia

Yan Weizhen, whose real name was Lin Zhiqiang (林志强), was active for half of a century in the Indonesian Chinese literary scene and famous in the Chinese-speaking community for his beautiful poems. He was born in Indonesia, probably in Bandung, in 1933 and received only a secondary school education. He was a full-time Chinese school teacher in Bandung (West Java) and a part-time journalist writing for Chinese-language newspapers published in Jakarta prior to Soeharto's coming to power.

Yan was a talented writer and had begun writing when he was fifteen years old, using a number of pen names such as Xiu Nong (秀农), Han Lu (寒露), Li Fu (犁夫), Fang Ming (方鸣), Xiao Mei (笑梅), Xia Xue (夏雪), and He Dannian (贺丹年), etc. He was already active in the literary world when he was in high school. In the mid-1950s, he and another well known writer, Li Qing (犁青), collaborated in editing a literary page called "Coconut Island Literature" (椰岛文艺) in Xin Bao (新报), a major Chinese newspaper in Jakarta which was closed down in the late 1950s. Yan also served as a "special writer" for three Chinese magazines in Jakarta: Shenghuo Zhoubao (生活周报), Ren Yan Xunkan (人言旬刊) and Xinqiao Yuekan (新侨月刊). At the same time he was also a special correspondent for Shenghuo Bao (生活报), a left-wing newspaper in Jakarta.

Yan was particularly good at writing poems and he and Li Qing dominated the Indonesian Chinese poetry world in the 1950s and early 1960s. Some of Yan's better known poems include "Bandung — Beautiful City in the Bright and Glorious Days" (秀丽的山城—万隆，在光辉灿烂的时日里), "Fatherland, You are so far away yet you are with me" (祖国，你是那么遥远，但又在我身旁), "O Good, the Other Side of Mount Tangkuban Perahu" (好呵，覆舟山的那一边), etc. During this period, he wrote as a huaqiao or overseas Chinese, not as an Indonesian citizen, and his writings were oriented towards China. He also wrote about Indonesia, but as a Chinese national. In fact, this was common among the Chinese-educated Chinese in Indonesia as most of them held Chinese citizenship. However in 1963, when Chinese papers were only allowed to be run by Indonesian citizens, many writers began to identify themselves with Indonesia. That year, when the Huoju Bao (火炬报) was published, Yan revived the literary page called "Coconut Island Literature" and started to write from the Indonesian perspective as the Huoju Bao was linked to the Indonesian Nationalist Party.

The 1965 coup was a watershed in Indonesian political history and for the Chinese community as the "three pillars" of Chinese culture were eradicated. Like all Chinese schoolteachers and Chinese newspapermen and women, Yan lost his job. In order to make a living he moved to unfamiliar territories, even working as a taxi driver at one time. Later he became a businessman. However his love of Chinese writing and culture eventually took him back to teaching Chinese. This was during the latter part of the Soeharto era when restrictions on teaching the Chinese language were relaxed and many Chinese-language institutions were allowed to be established. During the New Order period many Chinese Indonesian writers began to publish their works only in the half-Chinese and half-Indonesian Harian Indonesia (Yindunixiya Ribao), but more mature writers published their works overseas, especially in Singapore, Malaysia, and Hong Kong. Yan continued to produce his poems and other forms of writing. In 1988 he wrote a poem, revised in 1995, entitled, "I want to live a life of poetry in my old age" (愿有个诗的晚年):

"Write for another twenty years",
And then, I want to fully enjoy
The wonderful mountain and water of these emerald islands,
Fill up my stomach with the tropical fruit and coconut milk,
Wear the colourful garland and
Dedicate my beautiful poems to this beautiful brown earth.

In the past
I sang for the Yellow river and the Long River,
At the present
I stand on the peak of "Bandung Spirit",
Witnessing the rapidly changing landscape,
Reading the human world which is full of spring:
Foreign land and Homeland have become the same.
The Love that you dedicated to all mankind,
More? or Less? This should be the criteria for judging human characters,
Poem and the Truth are fire.
Oh, Goddess Muse!
I want to be cremated under the foot of Tangguban Perahu!
(English translation done by Leo Suryadinata)

The above poem shows the change in Yan's ideology from being China-oriented to being Indonesia-oriented, and his attempt to reconcile with his past.

During the Soeharto era Chinese Indonesian writers faced a lot of difficulties, but many continued to write and publish their works overseas. A series of books by Chinese Indonesians was published in Hong Kong even before the fall of Soeharto. Yan himself was the editor of the "Green Island (绿岛) Series", published by the Huoyi Publishing Company (获益出版社), owned by an ex-Chinese Indonesian writer, Dong Rui (东瑞).

Yan's collection of poems, short stories, translations, and essays has been published in this series. This nearly 500-page book, which includes his early and latest works, is not his complete works, but here the reader will be able to read many of his best works, especially poems related to the beautiful mountain city of Bandung where he was brought up and spent most of his life. His love of Indonesia finds full expression in these works. Also, as he was someone of Chinese descent who is also an admirer of Chinese culture, his essays on the history of Chinese literature in Indonesia, especially his Chinese Indonesian poems, are detailed and informative. His short stories may be few, but very poetic. The best works in his collection are still his poems. He and Li Qing were considered to be two of the best Indonesian Chinese poets in their era. Li Qing later moved to Hong Kong while Yan continued to live in Indonesia until he suddenly passed away on 25 August 2008 in Bandung, the mountain city he loved most!

Yang Quee Yee

(杨贵谊, Yang Guiyi, 1931–)

Lexicographer, translator, Malaysia

Yang Quee Yee is a lexicographer and translator, well known for mastering the technicalities of the English, Malay, and Chinese languages. Due to his ability to capture the nuances in these different languages, he is well respected amongst Malay and Chinese language lexicographers and translators. His most famous publication is the Kamus Umum Bahasa Melayu (Melayu-Tionghua) or General Dictionary of the Malay Language (Malay-Chinese) that he co-compiled with his wife, Chan Maw Woh.

Although he is well versed in the technicalities, semantic, and syntagmatic nuances in Malay, Chinese and English, Yang remains modest about his abilities. He has consistently brushed aside all praise of his linguistic expertise by modestly explaining that his proficiency in these different languages had their roots in his childhood, "In those days and at that age, it was common for children of different races to play together in the kampong. Through our interaction and play, it was inevitable that we acquired a smattering of Malay or English."

Humble though this explanation may be, it is largely truthful because Yang did grow up in a kampong or small village alongside other Chinese and Malay children. He was born to a family in humble circumstances in 1931 in Pontian, Johor. He spent his boyhood years in this village, playing and communicating with children of different races. In this environment, he learnt to be respectful of those whose cultures and first language were different from his own. It is also likely that he picked up the importance of communicating with others in their own language so as to minimize misunderstandings that would invariably happen when words and phrases were lost in translation.

In Pontian Yang attended a primary school where Chinese was the main medium of instruction. When he had completed his primary school education, he attended Hua Qiao Secondary School in Singapore in 1950. He dedicated himself to self-study and was largely successful in this endeavour for he was admitted to Nanyang University in Singapore in 1955, where he studied in the Department of Economics and Politics and came to play an important role in promoting the learning of the Malay language amongst the university's students. During that time, he was editor-in-chief for the Malay edition of the University Tribune (Mimbar Universiti). He eventually graduated from Nanyang University with a bachelor degree in economics.

Never once forgetting the colloquial Malay he picked up as a boy, he found that his interest in the language was piqued as he learnt more about it. This soon became a lifelong quest in learning and mastering it which slowly developed into a genuine wish to research the Malay language so that others might also learn it by themselves. This quest is rendered all the more remarkable by the fact that Yang had picked up all the intricacies of the Malay language even though he had no formal education in the language. However his lack of formal education in Malay did not deter him from wanting to learn more about it. If anything, it appeared that Yang dedicated more effort towards learning it. This could well explain the reason behind his lifelong passion for the language. Due to his earnest desire to refine his knowledge on the language, he furthered his studies in Malay language and literature at the University of Indonesia (UI) in 1961 and 1962. When he returned from Indonesia, Yang joined the Malay department at Nanyang University as a lecturer. After two years in his post as lecturer, political pressure necessitated his departure from the university. To minimize any future allegations of this nature, Yang henceforth dedicated himself to the field of Malay lexicography.

Yang's decision to devote himself to the study of the Malay language following his departure from Nanyang University turned out to be a blessing for it led to his establishing a long career in editing and compiling dictionaries. To date, Yang and his wife have compiled thirteen dictionaries, including a Malay-language-only dictionary, several Malay-Chinese dictionaries, and a trilingual Malay-Chinese-English dictionary. The Malay-Chinese-English dictionary in particular has been much lauded as a valuable educational tool, enabling people in Singapore and Malaysia to understand and pick up all three languages better.

As he grew up in an environment with both Malay and Chinese children, and lived through the racial tensions of the 1960s, Yang undoubtedly saw the growing need for people who spoke different languages to communicate with and understand one another. All his research and the dictionaries he published attest to his endeavours to enable the Chinese and Malays to communicate with each other. His efforts have indeed paid off, and many Chinese and Malays in both Singapore and Malaysia have developed better understanding of each other's language. Unsurprisingly, Yang commands great respect from the Malay and Chinese communities for his linguistic expertise and notable contributions to language learning.

One of the best instances of Yang's contributions to improving communication between the Malay and Chinese communities may be seen in his General Malay Dictionary (马来语大词典), which is regarded as one of the largest and best Malay dictionaries compiled for the Malaysian Chinese community. Yang's Unified Standard Malay Dictionary (统一标准马来语词典) is similarly praised for its usefulness by Malaysian students who wished to learn Malay, but had backgrounds in Chinese education. Yang's latest contribution is the publication of Kamus Sarjana — Bahasa Cina-Melayu Terkini (新编华马大词典).

Yang has been honoured for his numerous contributions to Malay and Chinese language learning. He was the first Chinese writer-in-residence at the Institute of Malay World and Civilisation (ATMA) at the National University of Malaysia. He also spent three years completing his autobiography titled, Memoir Yang Quee Yee: Penyusun Kamus Anak Penoreh (Memoir of Yang Quee Yee: From Rubber Plantation Boy to Dictionary Compiler), which was published in 2005. The Chinese-language edition of this memoir was published by the Nantah Education and Research Foundation in Malaysia in 2006. The autobiography chronicles his study of the Malay language and provides insights into a Chinese person's experiences in the turbulent post-independence period in Malaysian and Singaporean history.

Yang's publications and promotion of cultural and language learning between the Malay and Chinese communities also resulted in his appointment in 1996 to the post of visiting professor in the Department of Malay Language at Beijing Foreign Studies University. In 1998, he was appointed visiting professor of the Indonesian and Malay Language Section of the Department of Oriental Studies at Peking University.

In acknowledgement of his contributions to the promotion of the study of the Malay language to the Chinese community, the Singapore Literary Association conferred the Literary Award on him in 1993. The National University of Malaysia also awarded Yang with an honorary doctorate in letters on 12 August 2007. The Malaysian Chinese Cultural Association honoured him by presenting him with the Cultural Award. The Johor State government and the Heritage Foundation likewise recognized his achievements by awarding him the Malay Literary Prize in the non-ethnic Malay author category. The Nanyang Technological University (formerly Nanyang University) in Singapore has similarly honoured Yang by presenting him with the Nanyang Distinguished Alumni Award in 2008.

Yao, Alfredo Macam

(蔡其仁, Cai Qiren, 1943–)

Entrepreneur, business leader, Philippines

Alfredo M. Yao, owner and creator of a popular juice drink, is simply known as "Mr. Zest-O". Zest-O is now the country's number one juice drink in the ready-to-drink category and accounts for 80 per cent of the local market. He is currently holding key positions in a host of diversified business enterprises and corporations, and also a leader of the Chinese-Filipino community, in both business and social welfare.

All of Yao's siblings are professionals except him, but being a college dropout did not prevent him from succeeding, although the path to success was not an easy one either. Born on 26 November 1943, Yao lost his father when he was twelve years old. He then began helping his mother at her sidewalk stall to help raise five younger siblings. The stall alone could not support the family's needs, so Yao also did various janitorial chores and run messengerial errands in the Chua Family Association headquarters in his younger days. He was a working student and finished high school at the Northern Rizal Yorklin School in Caloocan through the help of some Chinese benefactors. He dreamed of becoming a lawyer, but poverty prevented him from pursuing a legal career. In fact, he was too poor to complete even a four-year college course, and had to give up his tertiary education as a chemical engineering major at the Mapua Institute of Technology in Manila. At seventeen, he started working full-time. He returned to Mapua to finish his engineering course when the family's finances allowed him to do so.

While running errands, Yao was struck by an inspiration at a printing press. The said printing press was engaged into making cellophane wrappers for biscuits and candies and had been in business for twenty years. He saw the potential market in the packaging business and decided to invest in it, which resulted in the establishment of the Solemar Commercial Press, named after his mother. Then in 1979, while touring around Europe, Yao came across a technology in packaging called "doy packs" — sealed, flexible plastic and foil packaging designed to stand upright. He bought the machine and tried to pitch his new packaging to multinational companies producing juice drinks, but nobody seemed interested. Not wanting to leave the machine unused, Yao needed products to be packaged and thus started preparing fruit juice in his own kitchen. As a result, in 1980, Zest-O was launched. The company eventually expanded further in scale and also its range of flavours, from its first and original Zest-O orange, to new ones such as apple, mango, mango-orange and guyabano (soursop), etc. Zest-O is now the highest grossing packed drink in the Philippines.

Mary Grace, Yao's daughter, a chemist by training, discovered the perfect formula for citrus fruit flavoured soda — dalandan (native variety of orange) and calamansi (native variety of lime). Not only has it drawn soda drinkers who prefer fruit juice to accept the new products, but this move into using local fruits also helped revitalize the local citrus growing industry, particularly for dalandan and calamansi. The company now produces mango purees for export as well, mainly to China, Australia, New Zealand, Korea, Singapore, and Europe. It has also expanded and diversified to fourteen enterprises that span several industries, including chemicals. There are juice brands such as Sun-glo Juice Drink, Big 250 Juice Drink, and Plus!, which are exported to other neighbouring countries in Asia such as China, Korea, and Singapore; and to some parts of America and Europe, Tita Frita Tomato and Banana Catsup, Beam Toothpaste, One IcedTea, and instant noodles Tekki Yaki Udon, are exported.

Yao is a leader in many different areas. He is currently president and CEO of Zest-O-Corp. (juice and beverage manufacturer), Solmac Marketing, Inc. (printing and packaging business), Harman Foods (fruit juice, purees and ketchup exporter), Amchem Marketing Inc., American Brand (personal care and beauty products), SMI Development Corp. (middle-class housing), Philippine Business Bank (thrift bank with twenty-seven branches), Export and Industry Bank (commercial bank), Asiawide Refreshments Inc. (Royal Crown/RC Cola local franchise and China licensee), and AMY Holdings Inc. He is also vice-chairman of the Chamber of Thrift Banks, and holds key positions in various organizations including the American Chamber of Commerce, Purchasing Association of the Philippines, Philfoodex, Manila Polo Club, Wack Wack Golf Club, and the Caloocan Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industries. Yao was also formerly a board director of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, Inc. and headed its Trade and Industry Committee. As committee head, he earnestly invited foreign journalists to visit the Philippines, hoping that they would portray his country in a positive light when they returned to their lands. This was also a strategy to entice foreign investments into the country. Yao's latest venture in 2008 was the acquisition of Asian Spirit Airline, which has since been renamed Zest Airways. It currently serves a network of twenty destinations across the Philippines.

Yao is not just a successful entrepreneur concerned only with profit, but is also well known for his social consciousness and empathy for the less privileged. His own background and experience of not being able to finish school prod him to help poor and deserving students to pursue educational advancement and youth development. He has contributed funds for the construction of public schools and gymnasiums in Northern Samar, Pampanga, Batangas Negros Occidental, and Rizal. As the former president of the Alumni Association of the Northern Rizal Yorklin School, he has also helped in rebuilding his high school alma mater. In 2003, he established the AMY (an acronym which stands for "Alfredo Macam Yao") Foundation to provide scholarships to students from poor families. At any given time, the AMY Foundation puts about 100 scholars through school. He has also donated funding for fifty low-cost houses for informal settlers in Bagong Silang, Caloocan, through A Living for Christ Foundation. These houses benefit the poor, so that they might live more dignified lives and strive to lift themselves out of poverty. Yao's own life experiences serve to inspire many struggling youths with whom he never tires of sharing during their engagements in schools. Yao's interest and commitment to education also include supporting the Kaisa Heritage Foundation in helping to maintain and manage the Bahay Tsinoy — Museum of the Chinese in Philippine Life. He finds it a worthwhile endeavour to preserve and promote the legacy of the Chinese in all aspects of Philippine life. Yao also supports development projects of countless non-government organizations such as Kaisa Para Sa Kaunlaran, Living Christ Foundation and Charity First, among others.

In 2009, he was designated the special envoy to China for tourism and cooperation. He has been given the most coveted ASEA Enterprise Award in the Innovation Category for his Zest-O Corporation, and in 2005, was conferred the Master Entrepreneur Award by Ernst and Young.

Besides Mary Grace, Yao's other children are now his able partners in his undertakings. His eldest daughter, Carolyn, is the chief finance officer of Yao's group of companies, while his son, Jeffrey, helps with marketing and managing the banks. Yao believes in the discipline of hard work, perseverance, and integrity, and has instilled these values in his children as well.

Yao Tuo

(姚拓; 姚天平, Yao Tianping, 1922–2009)
Prolific writer, Malaysia

Yao Tuo was an outstanding first-generation Malaysian Chinese writer who achieved fame among readers throughout the Chinese world including Mainland China, Taiwan and Southeast Asia. Yao Tuo's literary works have left an enduring legacy and continued to win a wide readership.

Yao Tuo whose original name was Yao Tianping was also known as Yao Kuang (姚匡). He was born on 9 November 1922 into a prosperous farmer family in Gongxian, Henan province in North China. In 1936, he studied in the County Teachers' School, but only for half a year. He got married in 1939, but was called to service in 1940 by the Central Army Military Academy in Hanzhong, Shanxi province during the Sino-Japanese War. Two years later, immediately upon graduation, he was commissioned as a second lieutenant and sent to the West Yunnan Anti-Japanese warfront.

Yao Tuo left the army at the end of the war. Poverty forced him to seek help from a cousin in Hebei province, but he soon rejoined the Nationalist Army in Shandong and fell back on the only "profession" for which he had been trained. When the civil war between the Kuomintang and Communists broke out in 1947, he moved with the Nationalist Army to Henan. The following year, Yao, now a major and deputy regimental commander, was sent to the Northeast (Manchuria), the battlefront between the two rivaling parties in China. He was captured shortly, but was released soon after. His years of wartime engagements had led him to many provinces in China such as Henan and Shandong in the North, Liaoning in the Northeast, and Yunnan in the Southwest. These places would be used as the locations of many of his literary creations.

After his release, he returned home for a brief stay before leaving again, this time for Nanjing where he worked in a tobacco factory. In 1950 the factory went into bankruptcy and he lost his job. He made his way to Hong Kong and did odd jobs. In 1952, he changed his name to Yao Tuo, "Tuo" (拓) indicating the opening of new areas of endeavors. He soon secured an appointment as proofreader with a magazine-publishing house which published the Chinese Students Weekly (中国学生周报) in 1953 and went on to become general editor. By 1954 he was able to claim credit to a succession of short titles based on famous historical events. In 1955, he remarried in Hong Kong. In the same year, he and twenty other well-known writers and scholars in Hong Kong established the China Pen Club (中国笔会).

In February 1957 Yao Tuo went to Singapore to take up the chief editorship of Student Weekly (学生周刊), a popular students' magazine, and editorship of Jiaofeng Monthly Magazine (蕉风月刊), an influential literary magazine in Malaysia. His lifelong association with Jiaofeng helped him to launch a serious literary career. In 1959, Yao Tuo moved to Malaya (Malaysia) when Jiaofeng Press shifted to Kuala Lumpur, where he settled permanently until his death in 2009. His engagement with Jiaofeng had become an important part of his life as he was later known as "the Father of Jiaofeng" (蕉风之父). He became known as a Malaysian-Chinese writer in the Chinese world. His works depict in great depths the process of change from a Mainland Chinese to a Malaysian Chinese. However, he remains as one of around 200,000 Malaysian Chinese who carried a "red identity card" that certifies their status as a permanent resident which is, strictly speaking, a "stateless person" as their passports were issued by the "Republic of China", a status which they have refused to change.

From the mid-1950s to the early 1990s, Yao Tuo published many literary works in Hong Kong, Malaysia and Mainland China. In early 1956, he brought out his inaugural collection of short stories, My Cousin (二表哥), in Hong Kong. In 1958, he published the Meandering River Bank (弯弯的岸壁).

Yao's literary creativity reached its apogee in the 1960s as he brought out in quick succession the following: Stories of Four Marriages (四个结婚的故事) in 1961, Fond Memories of My Childhood (美丽的童年) in 1962, and Flowers Blossomed in Wuliwa (五里凹之花) in 1965. It was not until 1981 that his next title appeared as Selected Short Stories of Yao Tuo (姚拓小说选集). The 1990s was a decade of literary dormancy when several titles were issued. The first was Pink-Flowers on the Wall (墙头上的小红花) in 1992, followed by Collection of Yao Tuo's Plays (姚拓戏剧集) in two volumes in 1993, and a third entitled Croaking of Frogs (蛙鸣) in 1997. His last book was an autobiography entitled A Bird's Passage with Footprints on Sand (雪泥鸿爪) published in 2005. Apart from the above titles, he published in all several hundred short stories, essays, sketches, folklores, memoirs, criticisms, etc. Yao Tuo also occupied the post of general-editor of Jiaofeng Magazine and various others including the editor of textbooks for local Chinese primary schools and high schools. He was also a founding member of The Writers' Association of Chinese Medium of Malaysia.

Yao's short stories were primarily inspired by his own experiences and those of persons whom he was personally acquainted with. The first category consists of a selection of the themes and messages in the short stories about the horror and repugnance that people felt about wars from the Northern Warlords period in 1920s to the end of Chinese Civil War in 1949, celebrating the human spirit in embracing peace and love. Such stories are mostly included in Stories of Four Marriages, Meandering River Bank and Flowers and Blossomed in Wuliwa. The second category illustrates the author's delightful and mischievous boyhood which are reflected in the stories in Fond Memories of My Childhood and Small Pink-Flowers Blossoming on the Wall. The third category consists of short stories depicting life in Malaysian-Chinese society in Selected Short Stories of Yao Tuo and Collection of Yao Tuo's Plays, which are considered outstanding contributions to Malaysian-Chinese literature.

Yao Tuo's literary works feature many characteristics of the first-generation Malaysian Chinese writers. These are not only limited to the shifts in mindset and political orientation. One may discern several distinctive features in Yao Tuo's creations. The first concerns the language. Yao Tuo's narration employs "plain description" inherited from the great tradition in modern Chinese literature; additionally, he has an advantage over contemporary Malaysian-Chinese writers in his skillful use of the Northern Chinese dialect and its rich vocabulary and distinctive nuances of meaning. The second feature is the different backgrounds on which Yao Tuo's works are based, mainly divided into China and Malaysia. His style is essentially realistic; he adopts an approach that describes life without idealization or romantic subjectivity. However, the short stories with Malaysia as the background are imbued with a rich romantic tint. Here, exoticism is one of the most prominent characteristics of romanticism, along with another characteristic that is associated with the supernatural. The third feature refers to the different themes of his literary works. The China-background works possess two basic themes: war-torn tragedy and nostalgia. In his Malaysian-Chinese literary creations, he narrates his stories from the perspective of a "spectator" without being influenced by political or ideological dogmas outside of China across the Taiwan Straits. His works with Malaysia background deal with "alien" themes. The caricature of the ordinary is the embodiment of his observations and thoughtful reflections through a skillful display of his craft. In such victim-themed stories, the victimization never goes too far as to lead to tragic endings, and wit and humour are injected to maintain a comic streak. His descriptions of lyrical romanticism are never over-used but employed in a practical manner.

Yao Tuo's contributions earned him many awards. In 1994 he was given the third Malaysian Chinese Culture Award (马来西亚第三届华文文学奖) and the 35th Chinese Literary Association Award in Kuala Lumpur; in 1996 and 1997, he won the Asian Chinese Writers Association Foundation Award and the Ministry of Education's Cultural Award respectively, both in Taiwan. Yao Tuo died on 7 October 2009 in Kuala Lumpur at the age of 88.

Yap Chioh Hiong, Arthur

(叶纬雄, Ye Weixiong, 1943–2006)

Poet, painter, educator, editor, Singapore

Arthur Yap is one of the most important Singaporean poets in English. He is best known for writing poetry with an international, universal appeal. His poems deal with subject matters that transcend national themes, and have been recognized as such by eminent writers such as D.J. Enright and Anthony Burgess. He originally had ambitions to be a painter before he took up education as a career and poetry as his main creative interest. But his paintings belie his self-taught technique, and were widely exhibited and collected.

Arthur Yap was born on 11 January 1943 in Singapore. His father was a carpenter and his mother, a housewife. The family lived in Kim Seng Road, and the young boy grew up with three siblings, surrounded by the pleasance of kampung (village) life. He recalled, in a newspaper interview, a childhood of playfulness, riding about on his bicycle, fishing, and using a catapult. These early experiences perhaps account for some aspects of his poetic style which, though often introspective, nonetheless deals in large part with the individual's solicitude about open space — in relation to the modern, urban experience. But it is really his formative interest in books that is the source of his literary and linguistic sensibilities. For instance, by the time he was sixteen, Yap had read all of D.H. Lawrence's novels — quite unusual for someone this age.

Yap attended St Andrew's School, where his earliest attempts at creative writing resulted in poems published in the school magazine. He went on to attend the University of Singapore, graduating with honours in English Literature. A career in education followed, beginning in Serangoon Gardens English School, where he taught English literature at pre-university level. He also had a short teaching stint at the Institute of Education before he won a British Council scholarship and obtained his Master's degree in linguistics and English language teaching at the University of Leeds in England. On his return, he taught at the then SEMEO (Southeast Asian Ministers of Education Organization) Regional English Language Centre in Singapore after which he joined the Department of English Language and Literature at the then University of Singapore (SU) in 1979. He also began his doctoral candidature there, but was awarded his Ph.D. for his thesis, "Thematic Structure in Poetic Discourse", in 1982 by the National University of Singapore (NUS), which had succeeded SU. He remained a faculty member at NUS until his retirement in 1998.

Yap is considered a second-generation poet along with his contemporaries of the 1960s who include Robert Yeo and Lee Tzu Pheng. Yap's first collection of poetry, only lines, was published in 1971. It set the precedence for what would come to be identified as his distinctive, even idiosyncratic style: the simultaneously unassuming and yet conspicuous use of lower case spelling in all his poems and titles. This seems to have been influenced by the poetry of e.e. cummings, which Yap has professed a youthful inclination towards. The collection also contains one other signature: his tendency to begin poems in medias res, in a way indicative of the poet's treatment of every subject as part of a larger, all-embracing continuity. only lines contains the by now canonical "old house at ann siang hill", a poem that resonates with a tempered mix of hope and anxiety in a rapidly developing urban landscape. Throughout, Yap maintains an even-handed ambivalence that is consistent with his own famously reticent personality. only lines won the National Book Development Council of Singapore (NBDCS) Book Award in 1976.

Yap's second collection, commonplace, published in 1977, confirmed his status as a writer with a keen ear for the nuances of speech and sounds. Significantly, this collection also reinforced the sense that his poetry is constantly engaging with ideas of intellectual, even philosophical, import: "there is no future in nostalgia", he observes, "& certainly no nostalgia in the future of the past". This is no mere word play — although that, too, characterizes many of his poems — but a considered world view that demonstrates a kind of stoic acceptance of inevitabilities. His next two collections, down the line (1980) and man snake apple & other poems (1986), further cemented Yap's reputation as a poet of exceptional standing, winning him two more NBDCS Book Awards, in 1982 and 1988 respectively.

In 1983, Yap won the S.E.A Write (Southeast Asian Writers) Award, given to outstanding literary talents from ASEAN countries, for their contributions to regional and national literary culture. This was also the same year he was awarded the Cultural Medallion, Singapore's highest honour for contributions to the arts and culture. In 1998, he won the Montblanc–National University of Singapore Centre for the Arts Literary Award for Poetry in English.

Unlike many Singaporean writers, Yap very seldom addresses issues that are directly about Singapore. While many often demonstrate a proclivity for dealing with such touchstones as questions of identity — what it means to be Singaporean and what it means to write as a Singaporean — these seldom emerge as such in Yap's poems. Instead, his subject matter goes directly to the depth, complexity, and profundity of the human experience, underlined all the time by the tensions that arise when experiences of individuals overlap and, sometimes, clash.

At the heart of Yap's exploration of these microcosmic dramas is his recognition that language is central to the way that these are played out. Stylistically, then, language is a distinctive trait in Yap's poetry. He deploys language in ways that exceed the expressive quality of lyrical poetry. Language, in the hands of Arthur Yap, is not merely a functional aspect of his craft, but its defining attribute. It humanizes his poetic creations even as his personas humanize the world. The resulting overall effect on the poetry is a world enriched by the auditory possibilities that emanate from these linguistic implements.

Apart from his poetry, Yap was also a painter of some renown, and his paintings are found in both corporate and national collections. From his first solo exhibition in 1969, he was to hold six more in Singapore. He also participated in group exhibitions from Malaysia to Thailand and Australia, and had a painting of his selected to represent Singapore at the Adelaide Festival of Arts. Manifesting an austere and minimalist style, he displays an aesthetic sensibility that is consistent in both his paintings and his poems. This direct relationship between the two crafts is especially noticeable in his final collection, man snake apple, and best exemplified by the Zen-like repose of the poem, "paired stills" in that volume. Such is the relationship between his poetry and painting that some of the covers of his own volumes of poems are illustrated with his own paintings and even contain reproductions of his paintings within their pages.

While Yap's main legacy is his body of poetry known for its linguistic sophistication, rare insight, and wit, he has also contributed significantly to Singapore's literary culture. Among his cultural contributions is his editorship, when still an undergraduate in the 1960s, of Focus, a pioneering literary magazine published by the University of Singapore Literary Society, to which he also contributed both poems and short stories, as well as the cover designs. He also edited for many years the journal, SINGA: Literature and the Arts in Singapore, initiated in 1980 by the then Ministry of Culture. Several among the current young generation of poets, such as Toh Hsien Min and Cyril Wong, have acknowledged his mentorship both under the Ministry of Education and NUS Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences Creative Arts Programme for gifted school pupils, and in his personal capacity.

His poems have also been widely anthologized and studied as part of both the national school curriculum, and the literature curricula of universities abroad.

In 1996, after two long periods of illness, Yap was diagnosed with cancer of the larynx. It went into remission after treatment, but in 2004, he suffered a relapse and his voice box had to be removed. However, his health declined and he died on 20 June 2006. Arthur Yap never married.

Yap Chong Teck

(叶宗德, Ye Zongde, 1912–2006)

Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Yap Chong Teck was a leading community leader, holding significant posts which include Member of Legislative Council, Town Board, Panel of Jury, and also the Government Audit Committee. He also founded the Chinese Association in 1946 which was changed to the Chinese Chamber of Commerce a year later.

Born in 1912, in Heshan Village (禾山乡), Xiamen City (厦门市), Fujian Province (福建省), China, Yap Chong Teck finished his secondary education in a local school. His father Yap Chin Chai (叶进财) was a doctor, and his mother Chai Ming Choo (蔡明珠) was also in the medical field, specialized in obstetrics (maternity). Yap Chong Teck continued his tertiary studies in Xiamen University (厦门大学), studying Physics and Chemistry. However, before he was able to graduate, due to the Japanese invasion in the south, the coastal areas of China slowly falling apart, and all schools were affected. Yap Chong Teck had no choice but to quit school, and moved to Brunei to earn a living.

Yap Chong Teck went to Brunei alone in 1936, and worked at a prominent Chinese leader, Pehin Kapitan Ong Boon Pang's (王文邦) company. Due to the reason that Yap Chong Teck was highly educated and fluent in both Chinese and English, honest and hard working, Ong Boon Pang had high regard of him, and assigned him to manage his business and other important tasks. The following year, Yap Chong Teck was married to Ong Boon Pang's second daughter Ong Siew Kheng @ Ong Gim Tee (王秀卿), and they have five sons and one daughter.

When Pehin Kapitan Ong Boon Pang was called to the lord in January 1940, his son Mr Ong Kim Kee (王金纪) was only nine years old. Then a trusteeship, consisting of four trusted members of the family was formed to help administer Pehin's estate. Yap Chong Teck being the second brother-in-law of Ong Kim Kee was appointed to be one of the trustees.

During the period of Japanese invasion, Japanese troops used Chung Hwa Middle School as a temporary office. It was, however, completely destroyed and razed to the ground in the war. Yap Chong Teck and a group of hot-blooded young men jointly initiated fundraising activities for the reconstruction of the school project. They brought together all the people who came to Brunei to do business at that period, and contributed both money and efforts to rebuild the new school, in order to let the students to continue their studies.

Yap Chong Teck had been involved in various businesses since 1945, including rubber plantation, brick factory, timber industry and hotel business, where he was once the managing director of Brunei Hotel (汶莱大酒店) in the capital. His very first business was a joint venture with George Ah Foott, who was the founder of St George's School in the capital. Their business was harvesting mangrove root, which was used as firewood or charcoal, and selling mostly to Hong Kong. Yap Chong Teck formed his own business in the 1960's, known as 'Aik Soon' Cold Storage (益顺冷藏), located at No.64, Jalan McArthur, Bandar Seri Begawan, selling groceries and frozen foods. His good reputation brought him a profitable business. The business was, however, closed down a few years just before his death, as all of his children have their own careers to pursuit. Before he passed away at the age of 93, Yap Chong Teck was actively involved in community, associations, education, charity activities and so forth.

In 1946, Yap Chong Teck and some good friends initiated the establishment of The Chinese Association, which was changed to the Chinese Chamber of Commerce (中华商会) a year later. He was the founder of the association, and also the founding chairman. In addition, he was a former director of Saint Andrew's School and Chung Hwa Middle School. Other posts which he held also include the honourary consultant of Hokkien Association Brunei Darussalam (福建会馆), Chung Hwa Middle School Alumni Association (汶中校友会) and Taiwan Graduate Association Brunei (汶莱留台同学会), plus permanent honourary chairman of Pertubuhan Kerjasama Kuang Hui (广惠互助社 Kuang Hui Cooperative).

The government had very high regard of Yap Chong Teck because he was proficient in both English and Chinese. In 1964, he was appointed as a Member of Legislative Council, Town Board, Panel of Jury, and also the Government Audit Committee, until he retired in 1970. He was awarded The Most Blessed Order of Setia Negara Brunei, P.S.B. medal by the late Sultan of Brunei, Al-Marhum Sultan Haji Omar Ali Saifuddien, in 1968. Yap Chong Teck was also a keen sportsman especially basketball, a sport he played regularly when he was not working.

During an interview with his third son Dato Yap Kai San (叶介山), who is working as a surgeon at the country's main hospital, Raja Isteri Pengiran Anak Saleha (RIPAS) Hospital in the capital, he pointed out that after his father's death in 2006, the family donated a new block to Saint Andrew's School in his parents' names. The four-storey block, which is currently used as the combined staff room and library, was completed in 2008 in conjunction with the Silver Jubilee of the school.

Dato Yap also revealed that coming from a Christian family, the legacy that his father passed down to the children are hard work, integrity, honesty, discipline and also live in love and harmony.

Yap, Daza Jullie

(Yeh Mei Min, 叶美敏, Ye Meimin, 1942–)
Journalist, TV personality, writer, Philippines

Jullie Yap Daza is an award-winning Philippine journalist who made a name in print and television at a time when the field was too narrow to include girls born to Chinese parents. The Chinese-Filipino community is particularly proud of Jullie Yap Daza for breaking out of the mould and pioneering in the pursuit of a career, which, to many, is not suitable for Chinese Filipinos, not to mention to a female at that. Yap Daza proved that just like fellow Filipinos, the Chinese Filipinos can achieve excellently in fields outside of business and can wield an even greater influence on Philippine society through print and broadcast journalism in mainstream media.

Jullie Yap Daza's television show, "Tell the People", which ran for more than a quarter of a century until she retired in 2004, broke the curse of low-rating talk shows that were all talk and hardly entertaining. Her easy style of hosting and engaging her guests in the hottest issues of the day not only enlarged her audience and increased her popularity, it made her a winner in the Catholic Mass Media Awards, Star Awards and KBP Golden Dove Awards, the major award-giving bodies of the television industry. "Tell the People" discussed not only the hot topics of the times but it also tackled many relevant social concerns. It aimed to inform, educate, but at the same time entertain by adding humour to otherwise quite contentious issues. Among the topics she had bravely tackled include problems of police brutality, pre-marital sex and teenage pregnancy, domestic violence, rice and sugar crisis, oil price hikes, and other pressing problems confronting the Filipinos' daily lives. The Filipino audience can relate more easily to her talk show because of the lighthearted treatment even of serious topics. Through this forum, the masses were better informed and better able to discern the significance of burning issues of the day to come up with their own judgment.

Yap Daza was born on 15 June 1942 to Thomas Yap Sui Tek (叶瑞德) of Fujian, China and Lolita Veloso Ngkaion (Chinese name unavailable). Thomas, born in 1910, never knew the name of his father, but his mother wanted him to find his future in the Philippines, and so entrusted him to the care of a family friend who took him on the long journey by boat from Xiamen to the Philippines in November 1918, when he was barely 8 years old. In Cebu and later in Manila, Thomas worked his way up from scratch, landing scholarships and winning academic competitions until he was old enough to earn a living by teaching. A math wizard who had practically taught himself how to speak and write in nearly flawless English, he then opened a night school in Manila's Chinatown for Chinese merchants who were eager to learn English as the lingua franca of commerce.

Yap Daza's mother, Lolita, is a daughter of Ng Kai On, a rice trader in Nueva Ecija, and Ng Siao Nyu. Lolita juggled teaching and housework, and was her daughter, Jullie's, first teacher. In the world of liberated women, Lolita was a pioneer, an original. As Yap Daza wrote in the dedication to her parents in one of her books, her father taught her how to write, but it was her mother who taught her how to read. Her abilities to read and write at a very young age worked fully to her advantage in her academic pursuits. Yap Daza graduated top of her class in primary and secondary school, and summa cum laude from the University of Santo Tomas with Bachelor of Arts degree in Literature, major in journalism (1961). She pursued post graduate studies as a grantee of the British Council and Thomson Editorial Center of The Times of London in Cardiff, United Kingdom in 1970.

Breaking the race barrier by excelling in her chosen field, journalism, Jullie Yap Daza at the very young age of 17 was the first journalist in Manila's low-profile Chinese community to prominently land in the mainstream Philippine press from which she eventfully sprang into television and book publishing. The first paper she worked with in 1960 was The Evening News, published by veteran journalist Max Soliven. Four years later, Joaquin Chino Roces hired Yap Daza for the Daily Mirror, an afternoon edition of The Manila Times. Martial law shut it down in 1972.

Yap Daza's columns and other published works, including fiction, gained her a wide following that grew even wider when she became a television talk-show host and producer ("Tell the People"). The talk show lasted for more than 25 years. Her column, "Medium Rare", is also the longest-running column to be carried by an English-language newspaper in the Philippines. It started in 1964 at the Daily Mirror, and has moved from a pre-Martial Law address to different publications, but the substance and style — and author — remain the same. Today it's carried in Manila Bulletin four times a week, including the Sunday magazine, Panorama. "Medium Rare" is popular because it tackles a wide-range of topics — from hot issues like investigation of corruption cases, to informative and provocative issues like why the Philippines has to import rice, to lighthearted fun articles on favorite food and restaurants, exporting Philippine fruits and the like.

In January 2008, Yap Daza was appointed associate editor of Manila Bulletin, where she writes her "Medium Rare" column, a Sunday essay in Panorama Magazine, and a back-of-the-book piece for Sense and Style, a monthly glossy magazine.

Yap Daza is also a well-known writer. Her most recent publication Mistresses Play, Men Stray, Wives Stay (2012) is the much awaited sequel to her first publication Etiquette for Mistresses, What Wives Can Learn from Them? (1993) Along with another publication, Manners for Moving Up (1996), these three of six books have undergone innumerable reprints. The research that went into the real-life anecdotes could be done only through Yap-Daza's audacity, charm and access to the right people.

This "Outstanding Citizen of Manila", the capital city where she works, is also an "Outstanding Citizen of Quezon City", where she resides. Named one of "The Outstanding Women in the Nation's Service" (1983), she has received various other accolades, including "Journalist of the Year" (Rotary Club of Manila), "Gawad Pambansang Alagad ni Balagtas" (2002, for English Essay) a prestigious award given by the Unyon ng mga Manunulat sa Pilipinas. The award is given to literary works of different genres), "Outstanding Alumna of Immaculate Conception Academy and University of Sto. Tomas", the First PopDev Media Awards for best in editorial and opinion writing, and an Award for Excellence in Journalism in the 2002 Dr. Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran. Bahay Tsinoy, museum of Chinese in Philippine life has also chosen Yap Daza as one of the 12 personalities included in the Tsinoys in Nation Building Hall in recognition of her pioneering work and her influence and impact on Philippine society.

Yap Thiam Hien

(叶添兴, Ye Tianxing, 1913–89)

Community leader, prominent human rights lawyer, activist, Indonesia

Yap Thiam Hien was a Chinese community leader and human rights activist who established the Organization in Defence of Human Rights (Lembaga Pembela Hak Asasi Manusia) in Indonesia. Respected by both friends and rivals, he stood up for people — "right" and "left" wingers, Christians and non-Christians, rich and poor, and become a symbol of law and human rights for the people of Indonesia.

Yap was born on 25 May 1913 in Banda Aceh, the eldest of the three grandsons of a Chinese kapitan, who was a Chinese community leader appointed by the Dutch in their colony. His childhood experience in Aceh had influenced him as he once told Kompas, a widely read daily: "I was brought up on a feudalistic plantation… this childhood experience has caused me to hate tyranny and oppression." Yap attended the Europeesche Lagere School (ELS), an elementary school for Dutch children, where he became aware of racial discrimination when he was made fun of by Dutch children.

In 1926, after graduating from ELS, he studied at MULO (Meer Uitgebreid Lager Onderwijs or Middle School), in Banda

Aceh. In 1929, he graduated and went to AMS (Algemeene Middelbare School) A-II in Yogyakarta where he completed his high school education in 1933 in its western literature department. There he was trained to read Dutch, German, French, and English. He then went to the Chinese Kweekschool (Dutch Teacher's College for the Chinese) in Jakarta. After graduating in 1934, he taught in various schools, generally those which were mainly attended by Chinese. His first job was at Hollandsche Chinese Zending School, Cirebon, before moving on to Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan-HCS. Following that, he joined the office of Lloyd's Insurance Company in Jakarta. He also registered in a newly opened law school in Jakarta, but before he could graduate, Japanese soldiers landed on Java. Yap had to return to work, and this time, at the Inheritance Office (Balai Harta Peninggalan), Jakarta. In 1946 he studied Law in Leiden (Holland) and obtained his degree, MR (Meester in de Rechten), in 1947. From 1949 until the end of his life, law was his profession. Besides law, Yap was active in the Tionghoa Kie Tok Kauw Hwee (Chinese Christian Organization) in West Java. In 1950, he helped found the Indonesian Foundation for Church Education (Yayasan Pendidikan Gereja Indonesia) and was active there until 1957. Being interested in the issues of the Chinese, he was involved in establishing Baperki (Indonesian Citizens Consultative Body), an organization for Indonesians of Chinese descent, in Jakarta on 13 March 1954.

The Chinese were divided in their views on the subject of Indonesia's independence. When Indonesia proclaimed independence in 1945, those who lived in areas controlled by the republic supported Indonesian independence, but those in areas still controlled by the Dutch supported the colonial government, or were neutral. The Chinese Union (Persatuan Tionghoa) in Jakarta was large and enjoyed the support of many important Peranakans, but, because many of its leaders were close to the Dutch, the organization was seen to be pro-Dutch. The union changed its name to the Chinese Democratic Party of Indonesia (PDTI) when Indonesia became independent. There was little agreement, however, within PDTI concerning the position of the Chinese in Indonesia. One group represented by Yap Tjwan Bing, a pharmacist, and Tan Boen An, an engineer, was against the Chinese isolating themselves. They believed that, if the Peranakan Chinese formed their own ethnicity-based minority party, they would be isolated, and the likelihood of discrimination against them would increase. Many who held this view chose to join Indonesian political parties while maintaining their Chinese identity. Another position was represented by Thio Thiam Tjong (a businessman who had been an adviser to Hubertus van Mook) and Khoe Woen Sioe (a journalist and publisher). They believed that the presence of minorities in Indonesia was a reality; it would thus not be good for the Peranakan Chinese to join other political parties because they would still be a minority. Those who held other opinions besides these two stances gradually left PDTI. A desire arose among the Chinese for an effective party which would be able to wrestle with the ideas embodied in the nation's new citizenship laws that would take effect at the end of 1955. PDTI and several small organizations merged at the end of 1953 and became Citizens of Chinese Descent Consultative Body (Baperwati). Its statutes were similar to those of PDTI.

Before these statutes were ratified, they were discussed by representatives of the Peranakan Chinese on 13 March 1954. There were those who wanted to retain the name, Citizens of Chinese Descent Consultative Body. Yap, who approved of it, felt that the phrase "of Chinese descent" must be retained as it represented reality. Another group, represented by politician Siauw Giok Tjhan, disagreed, based on the reason that the new organization was not limited to only Chinese participation. Finally, a decision was made that the organization name would not incorporate the phrase and would be called the "Indonesian Citizens Consultative Body", or Baperki. Four people, excluding Yap, were chosen as vice-chairmen. Among them were Oei Tjoe Tat and Khoe Woen Sioe. Yap, however, continued to contribute ideas and labour to Baperki. In 1955, he was finally chosen as the fourth chairman of the central committee of Baperki. He was also its first vice-chairman from 1956 to 1960.

Siauw Giok Tjhan's influence within Baperki was strong. Under his leadership, Baperki turned pro-communist and pro-President Soekarno due to the protection given by the president to the organization. Siauw saw racial exclusivity as a colonial legacy which could be abolished in a socialist society, whereas Yap saw the root of the problem in intergroup relations, occurring between a dominant group and a minority one. This problem of the Chinese was a legacy of the Dutch colonial rule. Yap's Christian-centred view was that a "purification of the heart" was needed to solve the problem. In December 1960, he accused Siauw of leading Baperki from its neutral stance into the midst of the Communist movement. He further criticized a clause in the 1945 Constitution which stated that the president of Indonesia had to be "a native Indonesian". He found it discriminatory, whereas Siauw thought that the reality was most important; Baperki needed Soekarno's support and the 1945 Constitution strengthened the president's position. Yap was from then marginalized in Baperki.

Yap made waves again when he opposed the name changing regulation for the Chinese Indonesians in 1967. Yap invited "all Indonesians who love the people and nation, particularly Christian Indonesians, to understand and respect the feelings and culture of other races". Yap was seen as holding on to Chinese culture, as disliking the local culture, and being against mixed marriages. Actually, he was culturally Indonesian as he did not speak and read Chinese; he was standing up for human rights.

During the Old Order Period, Yap called for the release of political internees such as Moh. Natsir, Moh. Roem, Mochtar Lubis, Soebadio, Sutan Syahrir, and H.J.C. Princen. He also defended Liem Koe Nio, an alleged Kuomintang member, who was accused of economic subversion. During the New Order Period, Yap was appointed by the Mahmillub (Extraodinary Military Court) to defend Dr Subandrio, who had been involved in the failed G-30-S/PKI coup of 1965. Many were surprised by Yap's daring defence of the political opponent. In 1967, he represented the director of an automobile importer and repair service company, P.T. Quick, who was said to have been extorted by the authorities. In court, Yap accused a police chief of the extortion; when the case was over, Yap was arrested for his alleged involvement in the G-30-S/PKI coup, and for being a pro-Communist member of Baperki. Strong public reaction resulted in his release.

Yap had held the view that when authority became conceited and controlled, the lowest layer of society — the powerless and voiceless — would not be able to defend themselves. Hence, he established the Organization in Defense of Human Rights (1966) with his friends at the beginning of the New Order Period. With Adnan Buyung Nasution and others in 1970, Yap also pioneered the founding of the Legal Aid Organization (LBH), which has since formed branches throughout Indonesia. In 1980 he became one of the founders of the Regional Council of Human Rights in Asia, Manila. He was a member of the International Commission of Jurists and received a plaque for being an ideal servant of law from the Indonesian Centre to Aid and Serve the Law (Pusbadhi) in 1981. A year earlier, he had received an honourary doctorate from Vrije Universiteit (Netherlands) for his work in the law.

On 24 April 1989, Yap passed away in Belgium while attending an international meeting.

Yap Tjwan Bing

(叶全明, Ye Quanming, 1910–88)
Politician, Indonesia

Yap Tjwan Bing was one of the four Chinese members in the Indonesian Independence Preparatory Committee and one of the first Chinese Indonesians who joined the Indonesian Nationalist Party (PNI). He was active promoting Indonesian nationalism, but eventually left Indonesia after the 1963 anti-Chinese riots and died overseas.

Yap Tjwan Bing's father, Yap Yoe Dhiam, was a businessman. Born on 26 January 1988 in Surakarta, Yap Tjwan Bing had two brothers and two sisters, all of whom lived in Indonesia. When he was seven years old, he lived with a Dutch family to learn Dutch and attended a Dutch Christian school in Solo. Yap's family moved to Madiun and he was transferred to a Dutch school there. After finishing his secondary education (MULO) or Meer Uitgebreid Lager Onderwijs in Madiun, he went to Malang to continue his high school education. Later, Yap's family moved again to Garut, but he attended a Dutch high school (AMS) or Algemeene Middelbare School in Jakarta. After graduation he obtained a scholarship to study pharmacy at Amsterdam University. Before going to Amsterdam, he married Tan Tien Nio, but his new wife stayed behind in Indonesia. Yap noted in his memoirs that this was a real test of their marriage because she had to wait for him for six and a half years.

Yap performed well in his studies and was elected class monitor, the only Chinese who got that position at Amsterdam University. It was during his stay in Amsterdam that he started to mix with many young Indonesian nationalists. He attended their meetings, but was not yet active in politics at the time. In 1939, Yap obtained a Drs Degree in pharmacy and returned to Indonesia.

He then worked in a pharmacy, Apotek Suniaraja, in Bandung. Within a few months, the business of the pharmacy improved drastically and Yap became the majority shareholder of the pharmacy. Not long after this, the proprietors of another pharmacy, Apotek Cikakak, proposed to merge with Suniaraja. They formed a new company where Yap was elected director. Besides being successful in his pharmacy business, it was reported that he also held the post of director at Cativo (Centraal Textiel In-En Verkoop Kantoor).

Yap mingled with both Peranakan Chinese and indigenous Indonesian communities and was well known among Indonesian professionals. In August 1945, he was one of the four Chinese members of the Indonesian Independence Preparatory Committee to represent the Chinese minority; the chairman of the committee was Soekarno. On 18 August, together with other Indonesian nationalists, he attended and signed the 1945 Indonesian Constitution. After the declaration of independence, Yap was in Yogyakarta, working closely with Indonesian nationalists such as Sartono and Sidik Djojosukarto. He formed the Chung Hwa Chung Hwee (CHCH) to mobilize the Chinese community to support Indonesia's independence. In 1948, he dissolved the CHCH to merge it with the Persatuan Tionghoa (Chinese Association). In early 1950, an ethnic Sundanese State, known as Negeri Pasundan, was established in West Java, and Yap was offered the post of minister of state, but he declined. Apparently he was closer to the Indonesian nationalists rather than the regionalists. Before World War II, he came to know Ali Sastroamidjojo, a PNI leader and a well known lawyer who attended Yap's wedding ceremony after his return from Holland. It was Sastroamidjojo who introduced him to the ideology of the PNI. But his closest Indonesian nationalist friend was Sartono, another lawyer who was also a PNI leader. Through Sartono, Yap met Soekarno and Mohammad Hatta. After independence, Yap officially joined the PNI. However, from February to August 1950, Yap still represented the Chinese minority group in the Federation Parliament. In August 1950, during the Provisional Parliament, he represented the PNI. From then on, he was known as a "PNI man". According to the book compiled by the Secretariat of DPR (Indonesian Parliament), Yap resigned as a member of parliament and was replaced by Tony Wen, another PNI member of Chinese descent. In Yap's autobiography, however, he continued to refer to himself as a member of parliament in the early 1963 when the anti-Chinese riot occurred in Bandung.

It appears that the 13 May 1963 riot in Bandung had a tremendous impact on Yap: it was a turning point in his life. On that day, his new car was burned down and his villa was destroyed by young rioters; his wife was so shaken that she became paranoid.

Yap himself attempted to rationalize the behaviour of the rioters. In his memoirs, he noted that the May 1963 riot was an anti-Chinese riot and the rioters did not ask who the owner of the car and villa was, as long as they were the properties of a Chinese. Yap wrote that had these young men known that the car and villa belonged to Yap Tjwan Bing, they would have not destroyed them as "he was well known among the [indigenous] youth in Bandung". Yap also said, "At that time I was an MP, a member of the PNI Central Leadership Council, a Trustee of the Institute of Technology Bandung, and a member of [the] examination committee of the Pajajaran University." Yap noted that the governor of West Java, Mashudi, condemned the rioters who burned down the car and destroyed the villa "which belonged to an Indonesian patriot". However, Yap's wife continued to live in fear. She was afraid that their son, Siong Hoei, who had suffered from polio since 1958, would be burnt to death if the riot recurred. Apart from such fear, she felt that there was no doctor who was able to cure their son. She decided then that she would emigrate to the United States of America, with or without her husband, to look for a doctor who could cure their son.

Yap eventually gave in to his wife's request. He left for the United States first, and his wife and children (a son and daughter) followed after she sold their pharmacy and house. They began their new life in Los Angeles in 1963. Yap, who was already fifty-three years of age, had to adapt to a new life in a foreign land. He was unable to retire and had to make a living, but he was only able to work after he attained permanent resident status in 1967. Yap worked as an employee in a bank and later, as an assistant to a pharmacist in a pharmacy as his Dutch degree was not recognized in the United States. He worked hard and his son, Siong Hoei, after receiving proper medical treatment, was able to work with crutches, which was a relief to the family. At the age of sixty, Yap decided to get a degree in Pharmaceutical Science again, this time from the University of Southern California, but he gave up after a month as he had to work for a living. In 1973 he and his wife decided to move to the Netherlands to try their luck. Yap was able to work as a pharmacist again in The Hague where he lived for more than two years, but they had to return to Los Angeles when Siong Hoei was ill again. Yap then worked as a realtor in a real estate company, but suffered a stroke in 1976 and became paralyzed. Before that, he had planned to return to Indonesia, but his dream was shattered by his sudden illness.

Towards the end of his life, he began to write a memoir. He insisted that he was an Indonesian nationalist and an admirer of Soekarno. He continued to praise Soekarno and argued that due to the contributions of Soekarno, the Indonesian Government should declare Soekarno's birthday a national holiday. Yap died on 26 January 1988 and his memoir, entitled Meratas Jalan Kemerdekaan: Otobiografi seorang Pejuang Kemerdekaan, was published in 1988, soon after his death.

Yeap Chor Ee

(叶祖意, Ye Zuyi, 1867–1952)

Business tycoon, banker, philanthropist, Malaysia

Yeap Chor Ee is a well known personality in Penang, fondly referred to as Towkay Yeap. He was a highly successful sugar, rubber and tin merchant in the northern region of the Malay Peninsular. His business empire withstood the trials and tribulations of the First World War, the Great Depression, and the Second World War. He became Penang's richest man immediately after the Great Depression, as he held huge stock of tin ingots that enabled him to influence the world market. He was the founder of the Ban Hin Lee Bank, which began as a money lending business in 1918. The Penang-based financial enterprise, which was incorporated as a bank in 1935, was among the earliest locally owned and controlled commercial banks in the Federation of Malaya. Yeap Chor Ee also ranked among the greatest philanthropists in Penang, especially for education purposes. He was the single largest donor to the University of Malaya when it was established in 1949, and gave substantial sums of donations to various schools in the state of Penang. His legacy extended well past his demise in 1952. Through his will and estates, he provided the land and buildings to set up the main campus of the Wawasan Open University in 2006.

Yeap Chor Ee's life history represents another of the rags to riches legends so familiar among early Chinese migrants in Malaya. He was born in the village of Nam Aun in Fujian province, China in 1867. He was an orphan at an early age, and did not receive much formal education. He left his village for Penang at the age of 17, and started his own trading firm, Ban Hin Lee in the year 1890 when he was 23 years old. As early as 1895, he dealt in brown sugar which was then being produced in various estates in Province Wellesley. When rubber was introduced in these estates and sugar production declined, Mr. Yeap began to import Java sugar and dealt exclusively in this commodity for more than 40 years. At the same time, he also started to handle rubber trading, and prospered when rubber grew to become a major commodity at the beginning of the twentieth century. His sharp business acumen, hardwork and integrity impressed those who dealt with him. As opportunities arose, he further expanded his business and ventured into rice, oil milling, property and tin trading. He also used part of his capital to start a money lending business in 1918, which was formally incorporated into a limited company as the Ban Hin Lee Bank in 1935. The bank became a member of the Malayan Exchange Banks Association.

He developed extensive business networking with Chinese merchants in other parts of the country and neighbouring countries. Inter marriage took place between his sons and the daughters of Oei Tiong Ham, the successful sugar producer and trader of Indonesia. Such networks helped to expand his business empire of rubber, tin, sugar and rice trading. His business acumen, foresight and guts led him to stockpile large quantities of tin ingots when primary commodity prices plunged during the Great Depression. He became one of the richest tycoons in Penang when tin prices soared upon international and Malayan economic recovery after the depression. His attempts to create employment for his workers during the Great Depression of the 1930s altered the landscape of downtown Georgetown. He engaged them to embark on a large scale development of commercial properties near the main jetty of Penang Island. The properties later provided the necessary space for his huge conglomerate of trading activities and financial services, including office, huge warehouses and bank headquarters. Yeap bought the Homestead, a seaside bungalow designed by the British architect firm Stark & McNeil from another tycoon, Lim Chin Guan whose fortunes were hit by the Great Depression.

Yeap was a generous philanthropist. In the mid 1930s he gave a donation of $10,000 to the Penang and Province Wellesley Silver Jubilee Fund which provided assistance to the less fortunate. In 1949, Yeap donated a sum of $100,000 to the University of Malaya, which was being set up in Singapore, so that "the boys and girls here will not have to go to England or elsewhere for higher studies but will do so in Malaya." He was one of the earliest large donors to contribute to the University of Malaya Endowment Fund. He gave two further donations within the next 12 months. In August 1950, he donated $50,000 for the founding of a Chinese Library in the university, and another $100,000 shortly after, bringing his total contribution to University of Malaya to $250,000 during its first two years of establishment. Yeap's passion for and contribution to education also manifested in other donations. For example, he provided a gift of $2,200 donation to the Phor Tay Institution (a Buddhist education institution) and gave a piece of land to construct the Chung Shan Chinese School in Bayan Lepas, Penang.

Yeap Chor Ee passed away on 26 May1952 in Penang at the age of 85. The control of his business empire passed first to his widow, Lee Cheng Kin and later to his sons. Yeap's benevolence to education, however, continues long after his passing away. Complying with his wish which was enshrined in the terms of the Yeap Chor Ee Endowment Trust, his grandson, Dato Seri Yeap Leong Huat and other trustees donated, in 2006, their family residence, the Homestead (which the Yeap family has occupied for over 80 years) and other properties in Penang to the Wawasan Education Foundation to establish the main campus of the Wawasan Open University.

Yen Ching-hwang

(颜清湟,Yan Qinghuang, 1937–)
Academic, historian, researcher, Malaysia

Yen Ching-hwang is currently an adjunct professor and a reader at the University of Adelaide, Australia. His lifelong passion for history, particularly the history of China, Malaya (later Malaysia), and Singapore for the past fifty years has been inspirational for young historians in that field of study.

Born in 1937 in Yongchun county, Fujian province, Yen's interest in the study of Chinese overseas immigrants may be attributed to his childhood experience as a migrant. In 1947, 10-year-old Yen travelled from Southern China to Peninsular Malaya, accompanied by his mother and an elder sister to reunite with his father who had earlier settled down in Mentakab, Pahang.

Yen attended a Chinese school in Mentakab from 1947–51. Upon completion of his primary education, his parents sent him to the reputable Confucian Private Secondary School, in the capital city of Kuala Lumpur, with the intention to provide him with high quality education.

During his junior high school years in this prestigious secondary school, Yen struggled to cope with subjects such as English and mathematics. However, he scored very well in Chinese language and history. In his leisure, he read extensively on Chinese literature, classics in literary style, historical novels and modern martial art fiction. Such passion and interest would have sown the seed for the teenage Yen to become a historian in his adulthood.

Yen studied very hard in senior high school and completed his secondary education in 1956. His father who emphasized on the importance of excellent education, willingly spent half of his monthly salary to enrol Yen in the Nanyang University in Singapore. In 1960, Yen Ching-hwang graduated with a Bachelor of Arts (History) degree with flying colours. Given his excellent academic results, he was recruited as a tutor at the Department of History, Nanyang University in August 1963. As young academic, Yen managed to complete two well-researched historical documents on two states in the Peninsular, i.e. "Senmeilan Shi" (森美兰史, History of Negeri Sembilan) (1962) and "Xuelan'e Shi" (雪兰莪史, History of Selangor) (1963).

In 1965, he was offered a Ph.D. scholarship by the Australian National University (ANU) in Canberra. He conducted comprehensive research and completed a thesis entitled, "Chinese Revolutionary Movement in Malaya" (1900–11) in 1969. His thesis was later translated into the Chinese language and has since become a classic in this field of study. Upon completion of his Ph.D., Yen served as a lecturer at the University of Adelaide in South Australia. He was also visiting professor and head at the Department of History, Hong Kong University, from 1989 to 1990.

Yen returned to the University of Adelaide in 1991 and is currently lecturing on Chinese Business in Asia, and Modern and Contemporary History of Southeast Asia. His masterpieces and impressive research works on the history of Chinese overseas include The Overseas Chinese and the 1911 Revolution with special reference to Singapore and Malaya (1976); The Role of the Overseas Chinese in the 1911 Revolution (1978); Class Structure and Social Mobility in the Chinese Community in Singapore and Malaya, 1800–1911 (1983); Coolies and Mandarins: China's Protection of Overseas Chinese During the Late Ching Period (1851–1911) (1985); A Social History of the Chinese in Singapore and Malaya, 1800–1911 (1986); Special Issues on Ethnic Chinese Abroad (1990) which he edited; Community and Politics: The Chinese in Colonial Singapore and Malaysia (1995); and Studies in Modern Overseas Chinese History (1995).

Being a prominent historian, Yen is greatly interested in documenting the history and transformation of Chinese overseas. His experience in the history of the Chinese in China and Southeast Asia leads him to contend that many Chinese immigrants have contributed towards the nation building of Southeast Asian countries. It is only fair that their contribution towards the country and the local community is documented as an integral part of the country's history, and more importantly, be regarded as part of modern world history.

Yen is concerned about the documentation of history of 200 million Chinese overseas in their respective home countries. To him, documentation of data and research are essential elements for any society to advance and to become a highly developed nation. To keep track of what happened in history, we must document data systematically. To him, history strengthens the ties and bonds of people, giving them a sense of belonging to the country.

Yen strongly suggests that history must be supported by properly documented data. Nevertheless, majority of the overseas Chinese do not have systematic documentation of historical data pertaining to their experience in the country. This becomes a major setback for advancement. Without proper documentation, the history of a society in a nation state becomes incomprehensible. The unfortunate experience of Chinese in Vietnam who have lost important historical data of their time should be seen as a lesson for all other overseas Chinese.

Yen perceived that no country should ignore the history of its people. For example, despite the separation of Singapore from Malaysia in 1965, the two countries share many things in common. Hence, the history of Malaysia and Singapore should be seen and written in a holistic manner to provide a more comprehensive historical perspective.

Yen's scholarly work on Southeast Asian history, history of China and Chinese business in Asia have become major reference for researchers and scholars interested in this region. Throughout his academic pursuit over the past 50 years, Yen has tirelessly devoted himself to history, via documentation of the overseas Chinese.

Yen, Y.C. James

(晏阳初, Yan Yangchu, 1890–1990)

Rural reconstruction worker, Philippines

James Yen, known as "the Father of the Rural Reconstruction Movement in the Philippines", devoted his life and energy to educating the common people. He founded the International Institute of Rural Reconstruction in Los Banos, Laguna, Philippines — a network that coordinates his programme to promote self-help to the poor in dozens of countries.

Yen was born in 1890 in Sichuan Province, China, the seventh child in his family. His father, Yen Yuequan, was an instructor and herbalist. James was very intelligent even as a child. He started studying at the age of four, had a very good memory, and could memorize an article after having read it only once or twice. His parents played a very important role in shaping him. His father realized that the traditional method of education through rote memorization without understanding was obsolete, and thus decided to send him to a western school in Baoling, Sichuan. At the time, there was no road, and Yen, accompanied by his eldest brother, had to climb mountains and cross valleys to reach the school 400 miles away. They often walked alongside salt vendors, who had to carry one to 200 catties of salt on their back, falling every now and then, and more than a dozen of them would share a single room to rest. These observations gave Yen the very first education of life's hardships. The school in Baoling was managed by Christian missionaries and he finished 4 years of schooling there. Later in life, he would say that he was very much affected by three persons in his life: Confucius, Jesus and the labourers. In 1916, he left China and continued his studies at Yale University in the United States as a working student. When the First World War broke out in 1918, he graduated from Yale University and went to France.

During his speech at the alumni homecoming in Chengdu, Sichuan, in 1985, he recalled the hardships of more than a hundred thousand overseas Chinese labourers working in France at that time. They were looked down on by the English, French, and Americans. Most of them were illiterate and, because of their homesickness, requested him to help them write letters to China. There, he saw the need to educate them, and so opened Chinese classes at their camps using his own funds. Due to this great impact from the labourers in France, he decided that when he returned to China, he would not seek any government position, and would not try to get rich or work for any high officials. He decided to devote his work to educate the poor and alleviate their poverty. For Yen, the best teacher is a hard-working person. To understand the poor, he has to live and mingle with them. So, in 1922, when Mao Zedong (毛泽东) opened a school in Changsha Village, Yen and several volunteer teachers taught at that school for free. They all supported Mao's slogan: "Fight illiteracy to become a new and better citizen".

In 1923, Yen was appointed secretary general of the newly founded Chinese Mass Education Movement in Beijing. His first project in this capacity was to eliminate illiteracy throughout China. Over the next few years — until the 1930s, Yen went around small villages in China to lead volunteer teachers and promote education. This programme brought the most modern techniques of agriculture and animal husbandry to the hinterlands by educating a chosen few and then having them educate the masses. His efforts helped lessen poverty and hardship in villagers' lives.

In 1928, Yen was invited to give a lecture at Yale University, and was awarded a doctorate degree on that occasion. After ten months, he was able to raise US$500,000 from across the United States for the development of the villages, and the education of the common people back in China.

At the height of the war against the Japanese in 1940, Yen established the China Villagers Construction Institute. It was a very difficult time as students from the cities would come to the villages to study. This gained the sympathy and support of concerned citizens across China and other parts of the world. In 1947, he was appointed a special adviser of the United Nation Fundamental Education. His project of promoting education to the common masses is not only known throughout China, but internationally as well.

His foray into the Philippines began when President Ramon Magsaysay wrote to him saying that he was representing the entire Filipino people in inviting him to help the Philippines. Yen was so touched by the sincerity that he agreed to it.

Considering that the Philippines is an agricultural country with more than 70 per cent of the population living below the poverty line, Yen adapted the educational methods he utilized in China in the 1920s, mainly through school, society, and family. He also emphasized the four categories of education: arts and literature, livelihood, health, and good citizenship. For the first eight years alone, Yen was able to help develop more than 200 villages.

In 1960, Yen won the Ramon Magsaysay Award for International Understanding for contributing enormously to humanity and dedicating his lifetime to realize his lifelong dream that one day, "men everywhere may freely enjoy security, equal opportunity and a sense of international brotherhood". The award came with US$10,000, which he used to support his work.

His work in the Philippines aroused the attention of other countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America and many countries wrote to him, requesting his assistance in their countries. Since he could not personally attend to all these requests, he founded the International Institute of Rural Reconstruction in 1960, a network that coordinated his programme to promote self-help to the poor in dozens of countries. In 1967, he invited competent leaders from several nations to attend a seminar on the principles and methods of rural reform. He also set up demonstration centres in different countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

Many non-governmental organizations in the Philippines, and around the world, continue to be inspired by the work of Yen, including the National Rural Reconstruction Movements in the Philippines (PRRM), India, Thailand, Colombia, Ghana, Guatemala, and Honduras. Rural Reconstruction Nepal (RRN) and Rural Reconstruction Alumni and Friends Association (RRAFA) are two other national organizations that follow the rural reconstruction philosophy and principles. With them, Yen emphasized his belief that poor, self-respecting, hard-working peasants need "not relief, but release". To people at all levels — from chiefs-of-state to legislators, government administrators, businessmen, field workers, and village folk in Asian countries — James Yen had spread the seeds of his mass education ideas, believing that local self-governance was a natural extension of people taking responsibility for their own development.

Yen received numerous honours and awards in his lifetime from various institutions all over the world. Among these was the [U.S. President Dwight] Eisenhower Medallion of People to People International, recognizing his more than sixty years of work with the world's destitute (1986). On receiving the award, he said, "We do not offer relief to the poor, but release." Additionally, a distinguished body of scholars and scientists, when asked to pick "the ten greatest revolutionaries of our time" to receive Copernican Citations in 1943 to mark the 400th anniversary of the death of Copernicus, listed him along with Albert Einstein, Henry Ford, Orville Wright, Harvey Firestone, and Thomas Edison. A 1987 Presidential "End Hunger Award" for lifetime achievement cited him for "developing and disseminating a sustained, integrated program to overcome the root causes of hunger and poverty in the Third World".

Yen passed away on 18 January 1990. Two decades have gone by and yet, his legacy continues to involve and affect tens of thousands. To date, the now eighty-year-old Institution he founded has enhanced the capacity and professional confidence of more than 100,000 development managers, practitioners, and community leaders across Asia, Africa, and Latin America. He was naturalized as a Filipino citizen and returned to China only twice in 1985 and 1987.

Yen Yuan Chang

(严元章, Yan Yuanzhang, 1909–96)

Educationist, professor, Malaysia

Yen Yuan Chang, a renowned scholar and educationist in Malaysia and Singapore, was noted for his profound knowledge of educational theories and his ability to put such knowledge into practice. He was a man of honest and frank character and was courageous in fighting against unfair policies, much to the displeasure of the government then.

Yen was born in Sihui (四会) district in Guangdong (广东) province in 1909 and obtained his Bachelor Degree in Arts from Jinling University (金陵大学), Masters Degree in Education from Zhongshan University (中山大学), and Ph.D. Degree in Education from University of London. He served in various capacities in the educational institutions in China, including principal of Sihui Secondary School (四会中学), head of academic affairs at Guoguang Secondary School (国光中学) in Guangzhou, administrative head at the Institute of Educational Research in Zhongshan University, associate professor and head of discipline at a teachers training college, professor and academics director at Nanning Teachers Training College (南宁师范学院), etc.

On his return from England in 1951 after completing his Ph.D., he continued his involvement in the field of education, but this time in Malaya and Singapore. In the fifteen years that followed, he served as head of academic affairs at Han Chiang High School (韩江中学) in Penang, vice-principal at Chung Hwa High School (中化中学) in Muar, Johor, principal of Huaqiao High School (华侨中学) (now known as Chinese High School 华仁中学) in Batu Pahat, Johor, and dean of the Faculty of Arts and head of the School of Education at Nanyang University in Singapore (now Nanyang Technological University). In 1965 he went to Hong Kong to teach at the School of Educational Studies in the Chinese University of Hong Kong. He retired in 1970, but continued his research work on educational studies. From 1956 to 1963, he was educational adviser to the United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia (UCSTAM). However, due to his strong stand in fighting for the right to have Chinese education in Malaysia, he was permanently banned from entering the country by the Malaysian Government.

His entire life had been closely associated with education. Before he completed his Ph.D. in education, he had studied and served in various secondary and tertiary educational institutions in China. This was a period when he was able to acquire knowledge and accumulated experiences in teaching and educational management, which served to provide a strong foundation for his subsequent career in Chinese education in Malaysia and Singapore. In his fifteen years of service in Malaysia and Singapore from 1951 to 1965, his significant contributions were seen mainly in two aspects: teaching and educational management, as well as involvement in the struggle for the right to Chinese education.

In respect of teaching and educational management, he first served as head of academic affairs at Han Chiang High School in Penang for a year. When the school wanted to sack the principal, Dr Zhuang Zexuan, and engage Yen as the new principal, Yen felt this was not fair to Dr Zhuang and thus rejected the offer. Eventually he chose to leave the school. In 1953, he became the vice-principal of Chung Hwa High School in Muar. Two years later, he was engaged as principal of Huaqiao High School in Batu Pahat. While he was in Chung Hwa High School in Muar, he implemented a strict entrance examination and students who failed the examination had to go through a preparatory class for one year. Students applying to enter the senior classes had to take an oral test that he himself conducted. This measure was later withdrawn due to objections from certain quarters after he left the school. During his five-year service (1955–59) at Huaqiao High School, he was able to implement his education philosophy by introducing a series of effective measures, including a teacher specialization system, streaming of students based on results, honour-based examination system (with no teachers to supervise the examination), a results grading system, a student loan and bursary system, a working students system, etc. Under his administration, Huaqiao High School emerged from obscurity to become one of the top schools in the southern states of Malaya.

In 1960 Yen started teaching at Nanyang University in Singapore and began to publish many essays criticizing several reports that had adversely affected the development of Nanyang University, such as the Prescott Report (Report of the Nanyang University Commission) and the Wang Gungwu Report. At the same time, he also presented his views on the future of Nanyang University. As the problems of this university were left unresolved, he resigned from the post of dean of the Faculty of Arts which he had held for four years, with the hope of attracting public concern for such problems. Subsequently he also resigned from the post of head of the School of Education and remained there only as a professor. In 1965, the Wang Gungwu Report proposed the conversion of Nanyang University by adopting the British system of university. Yen voiced his strong objections and fought hard to retain Nanyang University as an institution of tertiary Chinese education. However, his efforts were not successful and with deep disappointment he finally left Nanyang University for Hong Kong, thus ending his fifteen years' stay in Malaysia and Singapore.

His involvement in the Chinese education movement in fact began before he was invited to become the educational adviser to UCSTAM in 1956. By 1952, he had already represented UCSTAM to work on the revision of Chinese school textbooks. He was then the most prominent among the representatives from UCSTAM and was the first to propose the idea of revising school textbooks based on generally accepted vocabulary. While he was the educational adviser to the association, his most significant contribution was helping Lim Lian Geok, then chairman of the association, to establish the strong stand of UCSTAM in the struggle for the development of mother tongue education as a basic right. He had put his knowledge of education to good use and provided the theoretical support in the fight against suppression of mother-tongue education. He expounded his ideas about mother-tongue education in newspapers and magazines, as well as in whatever forums that were available. By arguing that the mother tongue was the best language medium for education, he had helped to establish a broad theoretical framework in support of mother-tongue education. When the conversion of Chinese secondary schools was proposed in 1961, he strongly voiced out his objections and argued for the continuation of Chinese secondary schools. He criticized the so called Chinese schools with only one third of its subjects taught in Chinese as "fake Chinese schools". When Lim Lian Geok was stripped of his citizenship and teaching permit by the government for opposing the Chinese school conversion, Yen went to Singapore to attend a gathering organized by USCTAM and spoke in defence of Lim. He had to pay a high price for his strong stand as he was thereafter permanently banned from entering Malaysia. It was not until 1993 that the ban was lifted. Yen died in Hong Kong in 1996.

Yen began teaching at Chinese University of Hong Kong in 1965. After his retirement, he continued with his study and research on education and completed two important books: Discourses on Education (教育论) and Origins of Chinese Educational Thoughts (中国教育思想源流). The former reflects his ideals and convictions about education, while the latter incorporates his own education philosophy in his discussion of Chinese educational thoughts to provide some guiding principles for educational reform.

Yen's entire life had been inextricably associated with education and it is not inappropriate to regard him as a major educationist. He had comprehensive experience in education work and this was complemented by his profound knowledge of education. More importantly, he was a man of noble character and unwavering determination. He was dedicated in working for Chinese education and refused to have any close dealings with political parties. Despite a difficult life and a tough time, he persevered without grumbling. He had put into practice his educational ideas when he was managing several schools and these efforts had brought remarkable results. He had also substantiated his thoughts on education with practical experience to avoid indulging in mere unrealistic theories. His ideals about education have been aptly reflected in the lyrics he wrote for the school song of Huaqiao High School: "Learn to stay calm and know when to act; Aspire to become a holistic man and acquire competent skills; Strive for achievement and be accommodating." He is certainly an outstanding icon in the history of Chinese education in Malaysia and Singapore.

Yeng Pway Ngon

(英培安, Ying Pei'an, 1947–)
Poet, playwright, critic, Singapore

Yeng Pway Ngon is one of the leading literary figures in Singapore Chinese literature, with works in the genres of poetry, play, and essays. He is arguably one of the representative writers pioneering modernism in Chinese literature in Singapore and Malaysia. His works show a stunning concern for people from all walks of life in Singapore — with particular care about the group educated in the Chinese language — and are fraught with criticism and satire about political partiality and social imbalances. He is a home-grown writer who embarked on his literary career in the 1960s, with ascending capacity in churning out heavy works that have received international accolades.

Yeng Pway Ngon, or Ying Peian as spelt in Hanyu Pinyin, was born in 1947 in Singapore. By any measures and in terms of literary representation, he can be regarded as a genuine Singapore writer with a local orientation. Although his ancestral roots are traceable to the county of Xinhui, Guangdong, he has spent almost his entire life in Singapore. He received his primary and secondary education in Singapore and graduated from the Department of Chinese Studies, Ngee Ann Polytechnic. He started his creative writing in the 1960s, adopting styles and techniques of literary modernism derived from Taiwan, Hong Kong, and western countries. In the early stage of his literary career, he ran a number of literary magazines, including Tea Table (茶座) and Contact (接触).

In 1978 Yeng Pway Ngon was arrested and detained under the Internal Security Act. As no evidence was found about his subversive action against the government, he was released on terms and conditions that prohibited his travelling abroad, attending political activities, and expressing political comments, and that required him to inform the Ministry of Home Affairs should he relocate his home. These conditions and restrictions were removed two years later.

His dedication as a full writer began in 1990 when he wrote for columns in newspapers in Singapore and Hong Kong, including Lianhe Zaobao (联合早报), Lianhe Wanbao (联合晚报), Wen Wei Po (文汇报), and Sing Tao Daily (星岛日报). In 1994, he sojourned in Hong Kong, where he published literary works and wrote column essays for the local newspapers, including Lianhebao (联合报), Ming Pao (明报), Sing Tao Daily, and Sing Tao Nightly (星岛晚报). He returned to Singapore in 1995 and opened the Grassroots Book Room, selling books on culture, history, philosophy, and also magazines of modern literature. His creative writings continued.

Yeng was featured in the Singapore Arts Festival many times, along with many other internationally acclaimed writers from other countries who wrote in Chinese as well as other languages. In 2002 he was invited by Taipei's Department of Culture Affairs to be an international writer stationed in the city for the year.

He is a prolific writer, with more than twenty published works of poetry, prose, novels, dramas, essays, and literary commentaries. Some of his works have been translated into English, Malay, and Dutch. In addition, he has been studied as one of the prominent Singapore Chinese writers by scholars and students. He received Singapore's Cultural Medallion in 2003 in recognition of his artistic excellence in literature.

His best received genre is fiction. His novel, A Man Like Me (一个像我这样的男人), was published in 1987 and won him the 1987/88 Book Award by the National Book Development Council of Singapore. The novel went for second printing in 2004 by one of the presses in Taiwan. His 2002 novel, Turmoil (骚动), won the 2004 Singapore Literature Prize. His Me and My Affairs (我与我的二三事) was voted by the magazine Yazhou Zhoukan （亚洲周刊）as one of the top ten Chinese novels of 2006, with the other nine being works by writers from mainland China and Taiwan.

Yeng Pway Ngon has been highly credited for his effort in breaking literary conventions and experimenting with new techniques in literature. While his sophisticated skills make him outstanding, his works focus predominantly on the subject of Chinese education and language, which is a seemingly perennial topic for most of the writers in the Chinese language in Singapore, as well as Malaysia. Most of Yeng's works, particularly his novels, depict in great detail how Chinese-educated individuals are marginalized by government policies and market mechanism in favour of English. This has inexorably positioned Yeng as an ethnic writer who speaks out from a certain standing with the Chinese diaspora, which upholds the Chinese language and education.

Yeo Keng Lian

(杨景连, Yang Jinglian, 1864–1927)
Businessman, Singapore

Today, Yeo Keng Lian is still remembered as the patriarch and founder of the Yeo Hiap Seng (杨协成) food and beverage manufacturer and distributor. This remains so even though the company is no longer in the hands of the Yeo family. The Yeo Hiap Seng story is a remarkable one of hard work, determination and ambition. Ambition and political stability had been the impetus leading to the immigration of Yeo Keng Lian's family to Singapore in the late 1930s, and ambition had been the result of the collapse of the company and its eventual sale into the hands of the property tycoon, Ng Teng Fong (黄廷芳).

From humble beginnings in China, Yeo Keng Lian managed to start a small soy sauce factory in Amoy near Changchow (now called Zhangzhou 漳州) in Fujian, China some time in 1900 or 1901. While this enterprise was mildly successful, it was not until 1935 that the factory became more successful. Yeo had eight children, five boys and three girls. Due to his ill health, Yeo handed the factory to his eldest son, Yeo Thian In (杨天恩). As Yeo Thian In was only aged twenty-two at the time, he worked under his father's wing and managed the business very carefully. He did so by undertaking the work of a travelling salesman, selling and inadvertently advertising the products from their sauce factory. This hard work and perseverance paid off and the sauce factory's product became very popular in Zhangzhou. This also enabled Yeo Thian In to send his younger siblings to colleges in China and Japan.

A few years after handing the factory to his eldest son in 1920, Yeo Keng Lian died. This meant that Yeo Thian In was left to helm the Yeo Hiap Seng factory and support the family. Owing to the turbulent political climate in China, the Yeo family soon left China and relocated to Singapore. The Yeo Hiap Seng factory in Singapore was started by Yeo's sons in 1935. His two sons, Yeo Thian In and Yeo Thian Kiew (杨天球), set up the factory at Havelock Road. The factory, in reality, a family controlled business partnership with a starting capital Singapore $51,000 proved itself to be very successful and was making profits by 1937. Naming the company, Yeo Hiap Seng Sauce Factory or Yeos United to Succeed, the Yeos appeared to high hopes for this new family venture. The large ethnic Chinese immigrant community took quickly to Yeo Hiap Seng's soy sauce. The Singapore success also marked the company's development and expansion in nearby Malaysia by the early 1940s, formally selling its products to people in Malaysia by 1942.

With the onset and the aftermath of the Second World War, the economy experienced many changes and the head of the factory jumped at the opportunity to expand and diversify Yeo Hiap Seng's product range by launching its first new product — canned chicken curry — which was considered an innovation in its time. When the canned chicken curry proved popular, the company relocated to a new and larger production facility in 1951, thereby becoming the first company became the first in the region to market a canned chicken curry product.

That successful launch was soon followed by the company's expansion into the production and bottling of beverages, as well as the launch of a wider range of canned foods. When the company's success in the bottle drinks, Yeo ventured to tap into public demand for soy milk by experimenting with methods for bottling soy milk. Prior to the invention of bottled soy milk, consumers made their own soy milk. By 1955, Yeo Hiap Seng had pioneered a method for producing and bottling soy milk. The launch of that product sparked a revolution of sorts in the Southeast Asia beverage market. The success in bottled soy milk sales led to company to attempt bottling chrysanthemum tea as well.

The success of Yeo Hiap Seng resulted in the conversion of the company from a family partnership to that of a limited liability company in 1955. This in turn led to Yeo Hiap Seng's continued expansion of its product range throughout the 1950s and 1960s. The cornering of the beverage market in Singapore and Malaysia as well as the success of its canned foods, spurred the company on. It was around this time that the company expanded its product range to include instant noodles, chilli, tomato and oyster sauces as well as its flagship soy sauce.

Well ahead of its time with bottled drinks and canned foods, the Yeo Hiap Seng company produce yet another innovation — long-life UHT soy milk in disposable paper-based containers in 1967. The popularity of the new type of packaging type resulted in similar packaging for its chrysanthemum tea. In 1974, Yeo Hiap Seng adopted the Tetrabrik, which was then considered the latest paper-based packaging method. In support of its packaging conversion, the company acquired its own tetrabrik packaging machine in 1974. At the same time, the company sought to try its hand at the global market by launching exports of its canned curry in 1967.

By the time the company came under the control of Yeo Keng Lian's grandson, Alan Yeo Chee Yeow (杨至耀), the company went public on the Singapore Stock Exchange in 1969, at which time Alan Yeo, son of Yeo Thian In, took over as CEO. The company by then also had gained the bottling franchise for Pepsi Cola in Singapore and Malaysia, boosting the company among the region's top beverage groups. During the 1970s, Yeo Hiap Seng launched a variety of new tetrapak beverages. In 1976, the company became the first to introduce herbal teas in tetrapaks. The company continued to expand its drink range in the 1980s to include soft drinks.

However, the family business that Yeo Keng Lian had started in China was beginning to fall apart in the mid 1980s. The many members of the Yeo family were fighting among themselves for control of the company. Tensions further rose when Alan Yeo attempted to break into the US market in the 1980s by purchasing the Chun King brand of Chinese food from Nabisco. The purchase proved to be a big mistake, and was to prove Yeo Hiap Seng's and Alan Yeo's downfall. Lacking the experience, adequate funds, and necessary ability to market Chun King in the American market, the problems of marketing Chun King soon spilled over to Yeo Hiap Seng proper and resulted in a schism within the family, so much so that the company had to be sold to the property tycoon Ng Teng Fong.

Under the new management, Yeo Hiap Seng has limited its economic ambitions to Asia and continues to supply people in Singapore and Malaysia with its soft drinks, herbal teas and canned foods.

Yeo Kuei Pin

(杨圭斌, Yang Guibin, 1954–)

Pianist, professor of music, Indonesia

Kuei Pin Yeo is a world-class pianist and professor of music. She is the first Indonesian to receive a doctorate in piano performance. She is also the pioneer of the Jakarta School of Music and the International Music Conservatory of Indonesia.

Yeo is the first Indonesian to achieve a Master of Music Education and a doctorate in piano performance from the Manhattan School of Music in New York in the United States. Born in 1954 in Jakarta, she was awarded full scholarship from the John D. Rockefeller 3rd Fund/Asian Cultural Council and the Helena Rubinstein Foundation to pursue her degrees.

She is also a dedicated educator whose unceasing efforts to bring world-class music education to Indonesia culminated in the establishment of the Jakarta Music School (Sekolah Musik Yayasan Musik Jakarta) in 1983 and the International Music Conservatory of Indonesia (Sekolah Tinggi Internasional Konservatori Musik Indonesia), in 2008.

Yeo is committed to producing high quality young musicians who are well prepared in music performance and equipped with skills. The Jakarta Music School was set up as an institution for the appreciation and education of music, with special emphasis on the cultivation of young musical talents in Indonesia. Under the leadership of Yeo, the Jakarta Music School has promoted a modern education system that is highly successful in nurturing and directing musical talents from the age of two and a half years onwards.

The school is also among the first in Indonesia to adapt the latest music education from the United States. Integrating practical and theoretical curricula, the Jakarta Music School trains its students' mental preparations and discipline optimally. Participating in concerts is a routine requirement for the students, with ensemble recitals emphasized as training for their future orchestral performances.

Yeo is acutely aware that an excellent music school must have outstanding teachers. In order to provide a music education that is recognized internationally at the Jakarta Music School, Yeo has succeeded in recruiting and retaining teachers who graduated from music schools that are based in countries such as the Netherlands, France, Germany, and the United States. The teachers' understanding of an effective music education is acquired through their dedication, skills, and experiences from abroad. Besides teaching, these teachers are also active performers in the international music circuit.

For the International Music Conservatory of Indonesia, Indonesia's first international school of higher education in music, Yeo has moved a step further by putting together an impressive list of musical luminaries to serve on its advisory board. One of these luminaries is Gary Graffman, the recipient of an honorary doctorate in music from the University of Pennsylvania and the Juilliard School. He is the former head of the Curtis Institute of Music at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the United States. Dr Paul Pollei, Professor of piano from Brigham Young University at Provo, Utah, the United States, also serves as an adviser. Dr Pollei is the founder and music director for the Gina Bachauer International Piano Competition.

Apart from the advisory council, the conservatory is supported by talented teaching staff. Dr Artem Konstantinov, a Russian cellist who attained his doctorate in music from the Guildhall School of Music, and is the winner of the national cellist competition in Russia, is one of the teachers. Other teachers at the conservatory include: Leanne Nicholls, oboist at The Adelaide Chamber Orchestra and The State Opera Orchestra of South Australia, and Jap Tji Kien, FRSM. Jap Tji Kien, Yeo's husband, is the first Indonesian recipient of the FRSM (Fellow of the Royal School of Music), the highest degree from the Royal School of Music in London. He is the only Indonesian who has studied under the tutelage of renowned American violinist, Dorothy DeLay. In 1971, he became the youngest member of the Jakarta Symphony Orchestra (or the Orkes Simfoni Jakarta/OSJ). He currently serves as the conductor of the OSJ and teaches violin at the Jakarta Music School and the International Music Conservatory of Indonesia.

Like her peers who teach at the Jakarta Music School and the International Music Conservatory of Indonesia, Yeo's academic accomplishments in music education and piano performance are complemented by international recognition of her achievements as a musician. She has won various international piano competitions and received many international awards in music, such as the Harold Bauer Award. She is also included in the books, International Women Who's Who, and Asian Who's Who.

Her concerts have drawn praise in Europe, America, and Asia. The New York Times, on the occasion of her Carnegie Hall recital debut, hailed her as "both a polished technician and responsive musician", and praised for her "elegantly detailed, immaculate and musically direct interpretation".

Yeo's success in her career is built on her belief in "always striving for the better". She attributed her conviction in maximizing her potential to her own parents, who encouraged her to achieve the highest possible degree. The only girl in a family of four children, she had supportive parents who backed her in her love for music and her decision to use music as a platform to realize her visions and duties as a musician and educator.

Her parents also encouraged Yeo to use Mandarin throughout her life, even though she only had formal education in the language during her elementary school years. Up to this day, her parents converse with her in Mandarin and her father encourages her to write letters in Chinese during her sojourns aboard. As a result, Yeo speaks fluent Mandarin and is able to read and write Chinese characters.

She is also active in the Jakarta Fuqing Association, which brings together Chinese-Indonesians whose ancestral hometown is located in Fuqing, China. Her piano performance has become one of the most anticipated highlights at the Jakarta Fuqing Association's annual function.

A firm believer of equality who is keenly aware of the social tensions facing ethnic Chinese in Indonesia, Yeo asserts that, "We should encourage the breakdown of segregation in Indonesian society. It is only when the walls of segregation have fallen that we can better contribute to our country." Through the universal language of music, Yeo plays a significant part in penetrating the walls of segregation and lifting Indonesia's name up in the realm of international music.

Yeo Liat Kok, Philip

(杨烈国, Yang Lieguo, 1947–)
Civil servant, Singapore

Since joining the Singapore civil service in June 1970, Philip Yeo, who was born in 1947, has garnered two seemingly contradictory reputations. On the one hand, he is well known for encouraging Singaporean study efforts in engineering, information technology, molecular biology, biochemistry, medicine, scientific research and development, as well as technological advancement. This he did through the distribution of government funded scholarships, closely watching the academic performance of these scholars, and developing a friendly relationship with them. Conversely, he is also widely criticized for spending billions in taxpayers' money to develop the biomedical industry in Singapore, as well as his trenchant outspokenness against recipients of government scholarships who choose to disregard the scholarships' attendant bonds, duties, and obligations. Indeed, it is difficult for the observer and analyst to decide what to make of Philip Yeo in light of the Singapore media coverage over both the projected efficacy of his biotechnology/biomedical development strategy, and the issue of bond-breaking, government funded scholars. The observer and analyst may be too overwhelmed by the public fracas engendered by his fervent emphasis on pushing Singapore to compete with Western countries in cutting edge biotechnology/biomedical research, as well as his strongly worded criticisms against the Singapore government funded bond-breaking students, to see the man behind the remarks.

On closer examination, the man behind the controversies has, at his heart, an energetic character dedicated to promoting scientific research and development of all kinds. This trait may be traced back to his education history of having studied engineering and business administration. Within a span of ten years, his educational endeavours culminated in his receiving a degree in applied science in industrial engineering from the University of Toronto in 1970, a Master of Science in systems engineering from the University of Singapore in 1974, and a master's in business administration from Harvard University in 1976. His tertiary educational background shows that his main areas of interest lay in developing new infrastructural projects in new areas of business, as well as in conceptualizing innovations in the fields of science and technology. His awareness of the need for constant improvement in science, technology, and business can most clearly be seen between 1970 and 1987 when he contributed to the development of the infrastructural landscape in Singapore during his tenure as permanent secretary for logistics technology research and development and defence industries in the Ministry of Defence (MINDEF); first chairman of the National Computer Board; and chairman of the Economic Development Board (EDB). Under his leadership, the EDB changed its focus from investment in traditional areas of business to internationally exportable services, developing high-tech industries such as biomedical science, developing the production of semiconductors, aerospace, and specialty chemicals, nurturing local small and medium-sized enterprises, and encouraging Singapore companies to make direct investments abroad. He is touted to have pioneered Singapore's participation in overseas infrastructure development projects in China. Similarly, Yeo was instrumental in bringing Singapore to the information age through the National Computer Board (now known as the Infocomm Development Authority of Singapore) between 1980 and 1987 by conceptualizing and promoting a national computerization plan for the country so as to provide it with a competitive and infrastructural edge in business, science, and technology. His quest to modernize and reinvent Singapore's technological, scientific, and business capabilities continued unabated when he was made chairman of the Agency for Science Technology and Research (A*STAR), a government statutory board created for the development of science and technology in Singapore. At A*STAR, he continued to oversee public sector research activities in the biomedical sciences through the Biomedical Research Council (BMRC), oversee public sector research activities in the physical sciences and engineering through the Science and Engineering Research Council (SERC), as well as manage the intellectual property of research institutes in Singapore, and facilitate technology transfer to the industry.

His successes in developing Singapore technologically, scientifically, and infrastructurally have been honoured several times in his long career. For instance, he was twice awarded the Public Administration Medal. He was also awarded the Meritorious Service Medal in 1991, and the Order of Nila Utama (First Class) in 2006. His achievements in the Singapore science and technology arenas have also been honoured by other nations and various internationally renowned education institutions.

Many detractors lament and criticize his tenures as chairman of the EDB and A*STAR as one marked by his harsh words against government scholarship bond-breakers and the resultant disturbance it caused in parliament in 1998 when he came to points with Member of Parliament (MP) Chng Hee Kok. This, in turn, sparked off a debate as to whether a government-funded scholarship is merely a contractual agreement that could be broken so long as the stated penalties are repaid. The debate continued until MP Chng questioned Yeo for publicly humiliating the scholars. Chng's apparent opposition to his view and methods led Yeo to call for Chng to resign his seat in parliament, thereby sparking another fracas over Yeo's temerity in directly challenging a Member of Parliament. The matter was only resolved when then Deputy Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong informed Yeo that he should not have called for Chng's resignation, and told Chng that it was not right of him to suggest that scholarship bonds were mere legal contracts and that scholars could break their scholarship bonds if they chose to precisely because they were mere legal contracts. Yeo's outburst against bond-breakers is in line with his energetic character and his education history. Two of his academic degrees (his bachelor's in applied science and his master's in business administration) were funded by the Colombo Plan scholarship and the Fulbright Plan scholarship respectively. His understanding of the terms of the scholarship may have contributed to his vociferous attacks on Singapore government-funded scholarship bond-breakers. It is clear from Yeo's reaction that he regards recipients of scholarships as morally obliged to serve society, and that recipients of government scholarships were morally obliged to serve the government for six years, according to its stipulations. Thus, when the issue of these government-funded scholars breaking their bond arose, Yeo chose to name them publicly as a means to shame them.

Philip Yeo's energetic character and strong attachment to the issues he felt strongly for were once again responsible for the criticisms against his strategy to develop the biotechnological/biomedical industry in Singapore through A*STAR. Both he and his policy of investing taxpayers' money heavily in biomedical manufacturing and research incurred the public disapproval of critics who expressed fears that the investment of public money in a broad range of biotechnological/biomedical research at the cost of other kinds of research would not be sustainable in the long term. This, however, was refuted by both Yeo and Minister Mentor (MM) Lee Kuan Yew who defended the investments. MM Lee has also spoken of Yeo as a rare breed of civil servant with the verve, clarity of vision, and ability to get things done.

While it is admirable that Yeo is a man of strong feelings and vigour who would stand up for his belief system, he could have chosen to defend his principles with more finesse and tact. While it cannot be denied that his trenchant remarks as chairman of the EDB and A*STAR placed both government statutory boards under a great deal of public scrutiny, it must be acknowledged that his energetic and enthusiastic personality has greatly benefited the development of science, technology, and biotechnological/biomedical research in Singapore. Indeed, since the implementation of his biotech strategy, Singapore's biomedical manufacturing output had quadrupled from S$6 billion in 2000 to S$23 billion in 2005, and the biomedical industry grew to account for over 5 per cent of Singapore's GDP, and 10,600 high value added jobs within the same period. This could account for MM Lee's defence of A*STAR's investment.

Yeo looks set to continue using his energy, verve, and experience to develop scientific and technological research and development in his new positions as chairman of the Standards, Productivity and Innovation Board (Spring Singapore); senior adviser on science and technology to the minister for trade and industry; and special adviser for economic development in the Prime Minister's Office. In coming into these positions on 1 April 2007 on leaving his chairmanship of A*STAR, it was expected that the colourful Philip Yeo will continue to encourage scientific and technological research, and through that, foster new economic ties and strategic partnerships between Singapore and other nations.

Yeo Weiling, Joscelin

(杨玮玲, Yang Weiling, 1979–)

Sportswoman, swimmer, Olympian, Singapore

Joscelin Yeo is Singapore's foremost present day foremost competitive swimmer. She has won accolades from both the Singapore Government as well as international bodies for her contributions and efforts in swimming. She is currently a non-elected Nominated Member of Parliament (NMP) in Singapore, and is most famous for her total medal haul of forty gold medals at the Southeast Asian Games in which she competed.

Born on 2 May 1979, she is the middle child of her family and the only daughter. Due to her mother's influence, Yeo and her siblings all excelled in sports and music. Yeo credits her mother, Yeo Lee Choo, as the person who nurtured her swimming talent. As she always encouraged her children to play outdoors, it was soon discovered that the young girl had an aptitude for swimming. By the age of seven, Yeo was a natural in the water and winning at swimming meets. As a result, her parents nurtured her natural talent in the sport by encouraging her interest in swimming rather than pushing her to excel in it. While Yeo's parents were delighted with her talent, they did not want to push her into competitive swimming if she did not wish to take it up.

Due to the love, understanding, and encouragement she received from her parents, Yeo decided to take up swimming as a competitive sport. Having made the decision herself at a young age, Yeo constantly strove to improve her techniques in the sport. Her coach at the time, Kee Soon Bee, fondly recalls that the young Yeo was a joy to train because she was highly disciplined. Consequently, Yeo began competing seriously at swimming meets at the age of nine. Her training sessions were tough for they began at 4.30 am, and she also had ten two-hour sessions weekly. After some time at Methodist Girls' School, she moved to Australia in 1995 where she studied at the Melbourne Girls' Grammar School and the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology. While a student at the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology, she continued swimming. She also trained with Bill Nelson. Thereafter, she pursued her studies at the University of California, Berkeley, from 1999 to 2000, where she trained with Michael Walker, who was, at the time, acting in his secondary capacity as coach for the Singapore Olympic Team. Under Walker's guidance, Yeo was rigorously trained for competition at the 2000 Sydney Olympic Games. When Walker transferred to the University of Texas at Austin in 2001, Yeo followed him there so as not to interrupt her training in competitive swimming. Whilst at the University of Texas, Yeo majored in education and graduated with a grade point average of 3.68 in 2003. This was no small achievement, for Yeo made it to the Dean's List in the College of Education's Department of Kinesiology and Health Education. Owing to her fine academic performance and her status as an ethnic minority athlete, she was the recipient of the 2002-03 Arthur Ashe Jr. Sports Scholar Award.

Since deciding to swim competitively, Yeo has trained very hard. Her craft was so well honed that by the age of eleven, she was able to make her debut at the Beijing Asian Games. After doing moderately well there, she continued to develop her craft and participated in every major international meet. To be precise, she participated eight times in the Southeast Asian Games, four times in the Asian Games, four times in the Olympics, and three times in the Commonwealth Games. After seventeen long years of competitive swimming, she finally retired in early 2007 to establish a swim school called Yeo's Aquatics, with her elder brother.

She is best remembered for her winning streak in the Southeast Asian (SEA) Games between 1991 and 2005. From her first SEA Games in 1991 in Manila to her last in 2005, also in Manila, she did exceptionally well. In fact, her first SEA Games foray was the only one in which she did not win a gold medal, clinching instead several silvers and bronzes. In the 1993 SEA Games, she managed to bag a total of nine gold medals, seven of which were for individual events, and two for relay races.

Her second foray into the SEA Games was remarkable for the fact that she only ever lost one race, the 400 metre, to fellow Singaporean May Yufen Ooi. By 1995, Yeo was beginning to feel the stress of being the only swimmer on the Singapore team who could deliver golds — so much so that she only won three golds in the 1997 SEA Games after being besieged by threats of witchcraft and personal illness. Despite the fact that Yeo managed to regain her footing and her form in the 1999 SEA Games when she won six gold medals, the strain of the competition, as well as the strain of shouldering the responsibility to win gold medals for the country, was beginning to show.

Thus, it was no surprise that she did not perform up to expectations at the Olympics. She may have actively competed in the 1992 Barcelona Olympics, the 1996 Atlanta Olympics, the 2000 Sydney Olympics, and the 2004 Athens Olympics, but her performances there were lacklustre. She and the Singapore team were derided by the Singapore media and even by their coaches for their poor performances in the 2000 Sydney Olympics and the 2004 Athens Olympics.

By 2001, the pressure on Yeo for winning all the golds had passed and she began to pass events on to fellow Singaporean swimmers. This more relaxed pace allowed Yeo to regain her self-confidence and her previous excellent form when she entered the 2005 SEA Games and won six gold medals, as well as completing the 100-metre butterfly event in under one minute at 59.91 seconds. This led the press to dub her the queen of Southeast Asian swimming for the first time since 1993.

Yeo was also given the Singapore's Sportsgirl of the Year award in 1994, and the Sportswoman of the Year awards in 1993, 1995, and 1999. She was prevented from winning thereafter due to a rule preventing athletes from winning more than three times. This rule has since been lifted. If the rule never existed in Yeo's time as a competitive swimmer, she most likely would have won the 2003 and 2005 Sportswoman of the Year awards too.

Her swimming talents have brought her to the attention of several international sporting and educational bodies. During her seventeen-year career in competitive swimming, she was also the recipient of the Anne Broussard Spirit Award in 2002. In 2004, she also a won a Rhodes Scholarship (valued at USD$30,000 per annum) to study at Oxford University. However, she elected not to take up the offer.

At present, Yeo holds the record for the most medals won by a female Singaporean swimmer, surpassing even Pat Chan's total medal haul of thirty-nine golds. Yeo continues to hold national records in six individual events — the 50-metre freestyle, 50-metre butterfly, 100-metre freestyle, 100-metre butterfly, 200-metre individual medley, and the 400-metre individual medley. She also published a candid autobiography in 2004 titled, On the Move: My Career, My Story, about the milestones in her life, her swimming career, as well as the reasons she is perceived as media-unfriendly.

Yeo is presently active in running the swimming school, Yeo's Aquatics. She is particularly active in church work and serves the youth ministry at New Creation Church as a counsellor and programme coordinator. In 2009, she also received the honour of becoming an NMP.

Yeo Yong-Boon, George

(杨荣文, Yang Rongwen, 1954–)
Civil servant, politician, Singapore

George Yeo, Singapore's minister for foreign affairs (2004–11), is known as the first Singaporean minister to blog, albeit in a guest capacity, at <http://ephraim.blogspot.com> and on "Beyond SG". Commonly perceived by the public as affable and approachable, Yeo seems to have acquired quite a following among younger Singaporeans. While this may be due in part to the society-centric tone of his public speeches and addresses such as the one he made at the Raffles Institution lecture on 16 August 2007, it is likely that this has more to do with his writings online. In all his public speeches and addresses, Yeo advocates cooperation, humility, and a spirit of inquiry, instead of following leader figures blindly. As evidenced from his blog entries, he does seem to have the common touch. The fact that he is willing and able to blog indicates his desire to be seen as just an ordinary Singaporean, like his constituents and the average Singaporean voters. It also reflects his personal style, which is open, consultative, and informal.

Yeo's personal style is indicative of the new third-generation Singaporean leaders, and has its roots in his education experience, as well as his stint as a serviceman in the Singapore Armed Forces. George Yeo was primarily educated at Saint Patrick's School, Saint Stephen's School, and St Joseph's Institution. In these Catholic mission schools, he learnt the importance of hard work, humility, a spirit of inquiry, and the meaning of public service. It is with those principles in mind that Yeo strove to achieve the best he could, and he did so by being the top student in the "O" level examinations in 1970, and becoming both a President's scholar, as well as a Singapore Armed Forces (SAF) scholar in 1973. He later studied engineering at Cambridge University and was awarded a double first in 1976. He then served the SAF as a signals officer before attending the Singapore Command and Staff College and graduating at the top of his class. His dedication to hard work paid off when he was transferred to the Air Force and made head of the Air Plans Department. While with the SAF, Yeo attained the rank of brigadier general.

In 1988 Yeo resigned from the SAF to pursue a career in politics. It is plausible that given his sense of public spiritedness, he wanted to do more for the people at the grassroots level. His desire to serve and his earnest manners ensured his successful election to parliament as one of the three Members of Parliament (MPs) for the Aljunied Group Representation Constituency (GRC). It was a seat that he retained in the 1991 general election, following which, he became minister of state for finance, and minister of state for foreign affairs from 1988 to 1990.

Out of the belief that a vibrant arts scene is central to the economic and social development of Singapore, George Yeo is a strong patron of the arts. Accordingly, he was appointed acting minister for information and the arts, and senior minister of state for foreign affairs in November 1990, and then minister for information and the arts, and second minister for foreign affairs in 1991. He was reappointed to these posts on 7 September 1991. It was during his term as minister for information and the arts that a Singapore performing arts centre, the Esplanade, often known as "Durian" because of its shape, was eventually built. The idea of building the Esplanade was mooted in 1989 in the Ong Teng Cheong (then deputy prime minister) report but it was carried out by George Yeo. The project was almost killed as the budget was too large, but George Yeo succeeded in convincing the Ministry of Finance that it was a worthwile project and the capital would be recovered. The Esplanade proved to be a resounding success. It has now become the icon of performing arts in Singapore, attracting both national and international leading artists to perform there. In 1999, Yeo relinquished his portfolio of information and the arts to become minister for trade and industry. Following the 2001 election, he was returned as one of the five MPs for Aljunied GRC and was reappointed minister for trade and industry. In 2004, he was appointed minister for foreign affairs. It was a position to which he returned after the 2006 elections.

Throughout his political career, he has served the public in many capacities such as minister for health (1994–97), second minister for trade and industry (1997–2004) and continues to remain a patron of the arts. This patronage could perhaps be tied to Yeo's strong belief in young Singaporeans. Indeed, his emphasis on reaching out to the Singaporean youths is most telling. As young Singaporeans are the future leaders of the country, Yeo firmly advocates giving them every opportunity to prove themselves artistically, academically, and politically. This not only accounts for his patronage of the arts, but for his being a patron of LASALLE-SIA College of the Arts since 1988, as well as chairman of the Young PAP from 1991 to 2000. As evidenced by his many public speeches and addresses, his chairmanship of the Young PAP, and his patronage of the arts, Yeo believes in nurturing young Singaporeans to take their future responsibilities seriously so as to make the world a better place and prepare themselves for the future. Yeo lost his GRC seat to the Workers' Party in the 2011 general elections.

Yeoh Chu-Kheng, Michelle

(杨紫琼, Yang Ziqiong, 1962–)
Actress, producer, Malaysia

Leading Malaysian-born actress Michelle Yeoh, as "Bond Girl" Wai Lin in Tomorrow Never Dies (1997), achived great success at Western stardom. She also acted in the extraordinarily successful Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon 《卧虎藏龙》(2000), which was directed by Ang Lee (李安), and was nominated Best Actress in the BAFTA Film Awards 2000. Her impressive performing talents and abilities, showcased in Hollywood and other international films include Asian martial arts. American producer-director, Oliver Stone, called her his all-time favourite actress.

Born Yeoh Chu-Kheng in Ipoh in 1962, she spoke English and Malay well before she learned Cantonese. She was a ballet dancer from the age of four. Inspired by the movie, Fame (1980), she moved to London at the age of fifteen to enrol in a boarding school there. Afterwards she attended the London Royal Academy of Dance, majoring in ballet. After a spinal injury, she switched to choreography and other arts, earned her Bachelor degree in Creative Arts, with a minor in drama. She returned to her home country to be crowned Miss Malaysia 1983, and also won the Miss Moomba title in Melbourne, Australia.

From there, Yeoh moved to Hong Kong and appeared in a television watch commercial with Jackie Chan in 1984 which caught the attention of Hong Kong's D&B Films. At first she only played small parts in action comedies such as The Owl vs. Dumbo《猫头鹰与小飞象》(1984), Twinkle, Twinkle Lucky Stars《夏日福星》(1985). Her breakthrough came playing the character of the fearless policewomen in the action-comedy Yes Madam!《皇家师姐》(1985), directed by Correy Yuen (元奎) with Jackie Chan. After that, she made Easy Money《通天大盗》, directed by Stephen Shin (冼杞然) and Magnificent Warriors《中华战士》, directed by David Chung (钟志文), both in 1987. Never having been trained in martial arts, she relied on her on-set trainers and her earlier dance discipline for the preparation of action scenes.

Yeoh took the traditional route of retiring from marrying movie mogul, D & B Films executive Dickson Poon. After their marriage was dissolved in 1992, she returned to stardom with her surname changed from Kahn to Yeoh. As the mainland policewoman in Supercop — Police Story III《警察故事 3：超级警察》(directed by Stanley Tong 唐季礼, 1992), she was involved in both acting and impossible stunts. She appeared as the "Invisible Woman" in The Heroic Trio《东方三侠》(directed by Johnny To 杜琪峰, 1993) with two other Hong Kong cinematic divas, Anita Mui and Maggie Cheung. She then took part in the dark sequel, The Executioner《现代豪侠传》(directed by Joony To, 1993) and also repeated her mainland law enforcer role from Supercop in Project S《超级计划》(directed by Stanley Tong, 1993). In 1993, under the direction of Yuen Woo-Ping (袁和平), Michelle matched Jet Li's performance in The Tai-chi Master《太极张三丰》and in Wing Chun《咏春》revealed her delicate acting talent as a martial arts innovator wearing a male costume, a character based on a legendary figure. Additionally, she was involved in Butterfly and Sword《新流星蝴蝶剑》(1993), which was directed by Michael Mak Dong (麦当杰) and released a single CD, Love Quite Like a Comet from this film.

Before she left for the United States, two of Hong Kong's talented female directors invited Michelle to star in their films. In Stunt Woman《阿金》(1996), Ann Hui (许鞍华) gave her the opportunity to play a more naturalistic, drama-flavoured role and show off her athletic skills. Mabel Cheung (张婉婷) featured her as Soong Ai Ling in The Soong Sisters《宋家皇朝》(1997), set during the fall of Qing dynasty. She was nominated in the 1997 Hong Kong Film Festival as "Best Supporting Actress" for her remarkable performance in this film. In 1997, she was named by People magazine as one of the "50 Most Beautiful People in the World".

Yeoh next moved into international film productions, becoming known to western audiences through the James Bond film, Tomorrow Never Dies (1997), and as the action heroine, Yu Shu Lien, in Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon. She turned down the role of Seraph in the two sequels to The Matrix and accepted a guest starring in the Hong Kong action romance, Moonlight Express《星月童话》. She was a member of the jury at the Berlin International Film Festival in 1999.

In 2001, Yeoh was awarded the "Darjah Datuk Paduka Mahkota Perak" (DPMP) honour by Sultan Azlan Shah, in recognition of the fame she had brought to the state of Perak. She was honoured as one of The Outstanding Young Persons of the World (Cultural Achievement) by the Junior Chamber International in 2002. The same year, she headed her own production company, Mythical Films, and produced her first English-language film, The Touch《天脉传奇》(2002). Yeoh starred as an acrobatic circus performer in the romantic action adventure. The Touch represented Hong Kong as the official entry in the Academy Award category for the Best Foreign Language Film in 2002. The film was named the "Best Co-Production Film" at China's Huabiao Awards, and she received the Producers of the Year award at the CineAsia Awards 2002. In January 2004, Michelle starred as a comic-book style heroine in her second film from Mythical, Silver Hawk, which won the "Best Co-Production Film" again at the Huabiao Awards.

In 2005, Yeoh acted as Mameha who taught Zhang Ziyi mysterious ways to become a geisha in the Hollywood-produced drama, Memoirs of a Geisha, and appeared in the director's cut version of Jet Li's film Fearless《霍元甲》in 2006. She continued her English-language work, Sunshine, with British director Danny Boyle in 2007, as the character Carazon, giving a powerful feminist performance as an astronaut-biologist on a mission to save our planet. She was awarded the "Knight of the Legion of Honour of France" by President Jacques Chirac in April 2007. In Far North, a psychological dark romance set in the Arctic, directed by Asif Kapadia, Yeoh played. This premiered at the Venice Film Festival in August 2007. After that, she acted in The Children of Huang Shi《黄石的孩子》, as a proprietress who helped an English journalist rescue sixty orphaned children in war-torn China with Brenda Fraser and Jet Li. She played in Babylon AD with French director Mathieu Kassovitz who filmed in the Czech Republic for five months at the beginning of 2007. Another film she starred in which hit the big screen is The Mummy: The Tomb of the Dragon Emperor, was filmed in Canada and China. In April 2008, Jelly Bean Films & Distribution, of which Yeoh is a partner, sold its first production Remembering History, a five-reel high-definition documentary about aspects of Chinese history at Hong Kong's FilMart. Michelle ranked by the film critic website Rotten Tomatoes as the greatest action heroine of all time. In 2009, People magazine listed her as one of the "35 All-Time Screen Beauties" and she is the only Asian actress. Michelle also featured in 48 minutes documentary film Turning Point — A Journey on the World's Killer Roads after she travelled around the world about a year with the road safety project. Turning Point premiered in Rome on May 2009 when lauched the "Call for a Decade of Action for Road Safety" and it broadcasted on BBC under the title "Dying To Go To School". She also took part in National Geographic documentary Among the Great Apes with Michelle Yeoh and starred Sister Yu in Yuen Woo-ping's film True Legend《苏乞儿》.

In 2010, she starred as Drizzle in Reign of Assassins《剑雨》which directed by Su Chao-pin and co-directed by John Woo. With this film, Michelle was nominated Best Actress in 5th Asian Film Awards. In 2011, she lent her voice for the goat character known as Soothsayer in Kung Fu Panda 2: The Kaboom of Doom and portrayed Aung San Suu Kyi, Burmese Prodemocracy leader in French Director Luc Besson's film The Lady. Michelle combined skills like talents in languages, both in Suu Kyi delivered thrilling speeches and stayed calm under fire to fight for the Myanmar freedom from the Myanmar's authoritarian military regime. In October 2011, French cosmetics company Guerlain chose her as the new skincare ambassador for playing a role in enhancing their relationship with Asia.

Yeoh is currently engaged to Jean Todt, the previous French CEO of Scuderia Ferrari. She has been the cover girl and cover story of the American magazines such as Time, Premier, Vogue, Metropolitan, etc. several times. In addition to her acting career, Yeoh vigorously supports organization such as AIDS Concern Hong Kong, the American Foundation for AIDS Research, the Brain Centre Foundation, the Force of Nature Foundation, the Hong Kong Cancer Fund, the Institute of Cerebral and Medullary Disorders, Save China's Tigers, the Active Conservation Awareness Program, and WildAid. She has been known for years as the "queen of martial arts". Up until recently, she still maintains her status as the hightest paid Chinese-language star in the world and the highest paid actress in Asia. She has cemented her status as a commercial superstar and a remarkable, elegant action star with her unusual ability to give mature, dramatic performances.

Yeoh Ghim Seng

(杨锦成, Yang Jincheng, 1918–93)
Surgeon, politician, longest-serving Speaker of Singapore's Parliament, Singapore

Yeoh Ghim Seng was born on 22 June 1918 in Ipoh, Perak. He was educated at St Michael's Institution in Ipoh and then at the Penang Free School before leaving for London where he pursued medicine at the University College, University of London. He then went on to do a natural science tripos at Trinity College, Cambridge before returning to London where, in 1944, he completed his examinations for the Licentiate of the Royal College of Physician (LRCP), Member of the Royal College of Surgeons (MRCS), and MBBChir (Bachelor of Medicine, Bachelor of Surgery) (Cambridge). When he completed his studies in 1944, Britain was in the throes of war and London was constantly being bombed by the Germans. Working in London in those conditions, Yeoh decided to become a surgeon.

Between 1944 and 1949, he served as house surgeon to a Mr Robinson, senior surgeon at St Thomas' Hospital and was later placed in charge of the Emergency Medical Service Hospital at Cobham. Yeoh then went on to serve as resident orthopaedic officer at the Sedgefield General Hospital and then as resident surgical Officer at the Victoria Hospital in Accington, Lancashire. Armed with these experiences, he completed the finals of the fellowship examination of the Royal College of Surgeons (FRCS) of England in May 1950, becoming one of the first Asians to obtain this qualification.

Yeoh came to Singapore in 1950 and joined the colonial service as surgical registrar, Government Medical Service, and was posted to the Singapore General Hospital under Professor D.E.C. Mekie. Mekie was so impressed by Yeoh's skill and learning that within a year, the young man was promoted to Consultant Surgical Specialist and remained in this post till he became professor of surgery in 1955. His promotion raised many eyebrows, especially among the European staff, who did not think any Asian could possibly be that good.

Yeoh was an outstanding surgeon. Quick, extremely skilful, and leaving very little scars on the patient, he was much sought after and served as a major inspiration to younger Asian doctors. In the early 1950s, most institutions in Singapore were still run by Europeans, some of whom lorded their perceived superiority over the locals. Dr C.G. Thevathasan remembered how Yeoh Ghim Seng inspired them all by performing the complicated Whittle's procedure on a patient suffering from pancreatic cancer, astounding his boss, Professor Mekie, and all his other European colleagues. He was famous for being able to extract an appendix in under fifteen minutes, leaving a scar measuring just 2.5 cm. On 12 December 1961, together with Dr Choo Jim Eng, he successfully performed the first separation of Siamese twins (Karen and Kate).

Yeoh was much respected by the junior doctors, but found the pervasive colonial attitude very stifling and demeaning. He was on the verge of leaving for Hong Kong to join one of the private hospitals already established there, but was persuaded by a number of influential locals to remain while they worked something out. In 1955, when D.E.C. Mekie retired as professor of surgery, the chair was offered to Yeoh, who became the first Asian to occupy this post. One of the first things Yeoh did was to commence discussions with Sir Douglas Miller, vice-president of the Royal Australasian College of Surgeons to consider the possibility of holding the examination for its fellowships in Singapore. Yeoh preferred the Australian mode of qualification and training and was able to persuade the college to hold its primary FRACS examinations in Singapore in 1957, the first time such an event was held outside Australasia. In 1958, Yeoh became the first Asian to be elected as fellow of the college.

In 1957, together with Professors Gordon Arthur Ransome and Benjamin Henry Sheares, Yeoh founded the Academy of Medicine. That year, Yeoh was also appointed honorary consultant in surgery at the British Military Hospital. In 1962, he resigned the chair to establish a lucrative private practice with Earl Lu. Nonetheless, he continued to train medical graduates at the university. At 1.8m, Yeoh was a tall man and was dubbed "the biggest but fastest Asian surgeon".

Yeoh's political career began in 1966, when the People's Action Party (PAP) recruited him to stand in the Joo Chiat by-election. He was returned unopposed. He continued to practise and teach actively and in 1968 was made deputy Speaker of Parliament. Two years later, in 1970, he was elected Speaker of Parliament, and took over the chair from Punch Coomaraswamy, who became Singapore's high commissioner to India, Sri Lanka, and Pakistan. In 1977 he was elected the first president of the ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Organization (AIPO).

Yeoh was to serve almost two decades as Speaker — the longest term of any single Speaker in Singapore's history — before retiring in 1989. As a Speaker, Yeoh was gentlemanly in his handling of parliamentary debates and was generally acknowledged to have "infinite patience", even though he was not beyond being tough on members for unparliamentary language or behaviour. In 1979 he oversaw the renovation of Parliament which saw better facilities put in place for members. This was the first time Parliament was renovated since 1954, when it was transformed to accommodate Singapore's first-ever Legislative Assembly.

Outside politics and medical practice, Yeoh was an active Rotarian, a justice of the peace, and served as chairman of several boards, including the Detainees' Aftercare Association (DAC) and the University of Singapore Council. As the first chairman of the DAC, he made many impassioned pleas to employers not to penalize former political detainees. In 1971, when the Warren Golf Club became the first British service golf club to throw its doors open to Singaporeans, Yeoh was elected president.

Yeoh was made honorary fellow of the Academy of Medicine in 1977 and, in 1981, was conferred the honorary degree of doctor of letters at the first convocation of the National University of Singapore (NUS), for his public service and contribution to the former University of Singapore where he served for twelve years as chairman of the University Council. He was made pro-chancellor of NUS in 1986.

He died on 3 June 1993 after a long battle with lung cancer. He was seventy-four years old. He was survived by his wife, five daughters, and fifteen grandchildren. Shortly before his death, the National University of Singapore had created the Yeoh Ghim Seng Professorship in surgery in his honour.

Yeoh Sock Ping, Francis

(杨肃斌, Yang Subin, 1954–)
Leading businessman, Malaysia

Yeoh Sock Ping is a prominent, second-generation Malaysian Chinese businessman. Reputed to have close relationships with influential Malay politicians, he significantly benefited from the government's privatization policy. Under his stewardship in 1988, his family's construction company was turned into one of the biggest conglomerate in Malaysia, with major interests in utilities, retailing and office, property development, hotel and resorts, and transportation.

Born on 23 August 1954 in Kuala Lumpur to a prosperous businessman family, Francis Yeoh Sock Ping is the eldest of seven children. A Hokkien from Fujian, China, his father, Yeoh Tiong Lay, founded Yeoh Tiong Lay Corporation (YTL Corp.), a medium-size construction and property development company, in 1955. Although his father was Chinese-educated, typical of many urban Chinese families in the 60s, he enrolled his children in English-medium schools in order to increase their career and economic opportunities. Yeoh had his secondary school education at Victoria Institution in Kuala Lumpur, one of the premier secondary schools in Malaysia, where he was school captain. Subsequently, he obtained a degree in civil engineering from Kingston University, United Kingdom, in 1978.

Yeoh is one of a handful of Malaysian Chinese businessmen who linked their business successes to their Christian faith. He claims that he converted to Christianity in his teens in the 70s when it helped him to overcome a major personal crisis. It was during this time that his father's construction business was on the verge of closing down and Yeoh was considering dropping out of school to help him, but his father's business was "miraculously" saved when the company's employees pitched in financially to help the elder Yeoh out. Initially Yeoh's siblings strongly objected to his conversion, but eventually they also embraced Christianity; his parents however remain Buddhist. The close-knit family even built a chapel in the family's 3,000 sq.m. residence in Damansara Heights.

When he returned to Malaysia after completing his university education, Yeoh started work with his father's company and, at the latter's insistence, had to work under the hot sun at construction sites. For his father this was a necessary experience to help the young Yeoh understand the business. Indeed all his other brothers too had to go through this as well. In the mid-80s, when the Malaysian economy was in depression, Yeoh's father decided to pass the stewardship of the company to his eldest son. Yeoh became the managing director of YTL Corporation in 1988 and gradually turned it into one of the biggest conglomerates in Malaysia.

Yeoh is reputed to have close relationships with influential politicians, especially Mahathir Mohammed (prime minister from 1981–2004) and thus benefited from the privatization policy pursued by the government. In the early 90s, the company was awarded a series of government projects; designed and developed twelve hospitals nationwide, built a low- and medium-cost housing project and light industrial park in Perak, and built an airport in Sibu, Sarawak. But it was his being awarded the first independent power plant concession that brought him prominence, notoriety, and lucrative profit. In 1997 the Malaysian Government granted YTL and partner companies a thirty-year concession to build, maintain, and control an express railway form Sentul, Kuala Lumpur, to the new Kuala Lumpur International Airport. Taking five years to complete, the project had its funding badly hit by the 1997 Asian Financial Crisis, but was nevertheless completed in 2002. In part because of the lucrative concession terms, the express railway was already profitable in 2003 after only a year of operations.

By the early 90s, the surging need for power as a result of rapid economic expansion was severely taxing the limits of the nation's electricity supply capacity. In 1992, when Malaysia experienced a massive blackout which shut down much of the country for up to forty-eight hours, the government quickly acted to grant concessions to companies to build independent power plants to supply power to Tenaga, the national electricity company. YTL was one of five companies awarded concessions with very favourable, guaranteed long-term supply contracts with Tenaga. Also, PETRONAS, the national petroleum company, was obliged to sell oil to YTL at heavy discounted prices. On the financing aspect, YTL received soft loans from local institutions, thus protecting it from foreign currency fluctuations, and its bond was bought by the Employee Provident Fund under favourable terms for the company. As such, Yeoh's power generation business was extremely profitable and became the main cash cow which enabled YTL to grow into one of the biggest conglomerates in the country.

In the utilities sector, Yeoh has transformed the company into a global player. Its first two international projects were: a contract to supply electricity to Singapore in 1994 and a deal in Zimbabwe to acquire and expand a power plant in 1996. In 2000, the company entered the Australian utilities sector through its acquisition of ElectraNet Pty. Ltd., which owns and operates the power transmission network in South Australia. Four years later YTL acquired P.T. Jawa Power, the second largest independent power producer in Indonesia, and in 2008, it bought PowerSeraya, the second largest power generation company in Singapore. Back in 2004, YTL had also bought Wessex Water, which is a regional water and sewerage operator in the United Kingdom.

The 1997 Asian Financial Crisis presented Yeoh's cash-rich YTL with opportunities to expand and diversify its business in Malaysia. In 1997 the company took control of financially strapped Taiping Consolidated, a move that was loudly criticized by some segments of the Malay community precisely because Taiping Consolidated was regarded as a Malay company. But the deal went through because Yeoh had the support of influential Malay politicians, especially then Prime Minister Mahathir. Through this move, YTL acquired the five-star J. W. Marriot Kuala Lumpur, the Lot 10, and Starhill shopping centres located in central Kuala Lumpur's shopping and entertainment district, and the 294-acre piece of land in Sentul, which YTL turned into its largest residential and commercial development project. This acquisition essentially launched YTL into the property development, hotel and resort, and retail and office businesses.

Through Starhill Global REIT, Yeoh and YTL have expanded their property development and retail and office businesses globally. In Singapore YTL has interests in Wisma Atria and Ngee Ann City, which are located in Orchard Road. In Australia it acquired the David Jones Building which is located in the central business district of Perth, and in Japan YTL owns seven properties in the prime areas of Tokyo. In the hotel and resort sector, YTL owns seven hotels in Malaysia, one each in Shanghai, China, and Saint-Tropez, France, as well as resorts in Malaysia (three), Indonesia (one), Thailand (one), and Japan (one).

Thus since becoming managing director in 1998 Yeoh has developed the YTL Group from a single, medium-size construction company into a conglomerate with interests in several business sectors. Like in the case of the majority of Malaysian Chinese-founded corporations, Yeoh's siblings and relatives are actively involved in the group's businesses.

Yip Cheong Fun

(叶畅芬, Ye Changfen, 1903–89)
Photographer, Singapore

Much may be learned about Singapore's long gone days from the photographic studies of Yip Cheong Fun. Touted as Singapore's foremost documentary photographer, Yip Cheong Fun, or Old Man Yip as he was called in his fifties, used the medium of photography as a form of social commentary. A unifying theme in all his photographs was the unflagging adaptability of the human spirit. His studies sought to juxtapose life and its changes with the manner in which people negotiated their personal identities. Indeed, his photographs depicted the changing times and lives of Singaporeans. In so doing, he highlight of the simple beauties of commonplace events and experiences. The overarching theme of the adaptability of the human spirit in his photographic studies may have stemmed from the trials and tribulations of his early life.

Born in 1903 in Hong Kong, Yip arrived in Singapore with his migrant parents when he was seven months old and the city state was still a British colonial outpost. Times were hard then and his father passed away when he was four. As his mother was unable to support both her son and herself, she sent the six-year old Yip to Dongguan in China where relatives could care for him. Unfortunately, his relatives neglected him. He languished for a while until neighbours contacted his mother and brought his plight to her attention. Soon afterwards, he rejoined his mother in Singapore and lived with her in Sago Lane in Chinatown. These experiences must have imbued him with the idea of how he must necessarily adapt to his different situations in order to survive. He would also have been in a position to observe other migrants around him who adapted to the new environment and situations in different ways, and that such changes and adaptability for them were ongoing. Therefore, it would not be too absurd to suggest that Yip's later photographic studies sought to capture this same theme.

However, he did not start out as a photographer. On completing his education in a private school in Singapore's Chinatown, he became a mechanic and eventually worked for United Engineers as a technician and engineering supervisor. While working with United Engineers, he developed an interest in photography as a hobby. This was in the mid-1930s and he was in his twenties. Accordingly, he saved money to buy a Rolleiflex camera to take photos for his family album. His acute observations of life and the changes in it meant that he kept many pictorial records of Singapore's landscape and scenery prior to the post-war urbanization of the country. In those early years, he took many photographs of harbours, plantations, and kampung or villages. He even took weekend trips to Johor in neighbouring Malaysia (Malaya at the time) to take pictures of the scenery there. However, the onset of the Second World War in the Pacific heralded a disruption to his hobby. Not only did he discover that United Engineers manufactured arms for the Japanese military, but he also had his camera confiscated by the Japanese occupational forces. Because of that which he discovered about United Engineers, he resigned in 1943 and started his own engineering workshops in Kreta Ayer Road and Kallang. During this period, he concentrated on keeping himself and his family solvent. In his later years, he was an engineering supervisor for Tien Wah Press.

It was not until the war was over that he armed himself with a new camera and took up photography again. This time, Yip had to overcome a new set of problems, specifically, an unsympathetic environment, scantiness of reference material, inadequate equipment, and a lack of guidance and direction. However, these problems did not deter him and he chose to adapt through experimentation and playing around with a picture's content, composition, light, and timing. His modus operandi was to avoid sophisticated darkroom techniques and rely solely on his own judgment, experience, and intuition. Thus, his style became one associated with cropping and enlarging rather than making photograph through the photo manipulation techniques.

Despite finding his personal style, Yip did not pursue photography seriously until 1954 when he became a member of the Photographic Society of Singapore at the age of fifty. At this point, he started sending his photographic studies abroad for competitions and exhibitions in overseas salons. His work won much praise, and he collected many awards. Yip's seascapes became one of his trademarks, most notably, his "Rowing at Dawn" (1955). It was his first entry for a salon competition, and subsequently became his most locally and internationally awarded photo. It has won six gold medals and awards since it was first entered for competition. In 1957, he became an associate of the Royal Photographic Society in the United Kingdom. By 1969, he was listed in "Who's Who" of international photography by the Photographic Society of America. Singapore too acknowledged his prowess and keen photographic eye when it awarded him the Merlion pewter award for "Fishermen's Hurry" in 1971 for the 29th Singapore International Salon of Photography. He was honoured that year with the "Honorary Excellence Distinction" conferred by the Federation Internationale de l'art Photographique; an honour that was given to him again in 1983. Three years later, in 1974, the Photographic Society of Singapore conferred on him an honorary fellowship. His seascape studies resulted in him winning the internationally acclaimed title of "Outstanding Photographer of the Century" (Seascapes) from the Photographic Society of New York in 1980. That same year, he was elected as honorary outstanding photographer of the Century by the Photographic Society of New York. In Singapore, he was awarded the Cultural Medallion for his outstanding achievements and contributions to photography in 1984. This honour was in acknowledgement of his photographs recording a present reality for future generations. In all, Yip won more than fifty international awards since entering his photos for competitions in the 1950s. The Photographic Society of Singapore even named a memorial award after him. However, he remained unswayed by these awards and stayed an amateur all through his life.

After retiring from his job as an engineering supervisor at the age of seventy, Yip worked at a sundry shop with his wife in Chinatown. In his later years, his skill as a photographer came to interest not only photography enthusiasts, but also those interested in the preservation of Singapore's memory of the past. To this end, he taught his craft at both the Photographic Society and the Kreta Ayer Camera Club for decades. Amongst his students are former Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister

S. Rajaretnam, and former Chief Architect of the Housing and Development Board Tony Tan. Even after his death in 1989, his style and the emphasis on the theme of the adaptability of the human spirit and personal identities continue to influence Singaporean photographers such as Tan Yik Yee and Low Soon Leong.

Yong Chee Shan

(杨志善, Yang Zhishan, 1895–1970)
Community leader, Brunei

In the oil town of Seria, Brunei, Yong Chee Shan was a Chinese leader, well respected by the population in the area, and the unofficial "kapitan". He willingly bore the responsibility of leading the Chinese community in the managing of associations, education, and charities; dealing with marriages, funerals, official document verification and registration, settling local disputes, and also acted as a channel between the government and the community by conveying information relating to Chinese rights and interests to the people. He was later appointed by the government as a member to the Consultative Committee of Chinese Community.

Yong was born in Jieyang (揭阳) of Guangdong Province, China, in 1895. Due to poverty, he went to Malaya and started working in a rubber plantation at the age of nineteen. A year later, he went to Singapore, then to Kuching, the capital of Sarawak. A few years later, he went to Miri, the fourth division of Sarawak.

Oil was discovered in Miri in 1911, and Yong worked diligently in this oil city until 1930, when he journeyed to Seria, an area located in the Belait Dsitrict of Brunei. Oil was discovered in Seria in 1929, and when Yong arrived in Seria, he became a contractor for British Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd.

Yong was very conscientious in his work, and also a man of his word. He soon gained the trust of the company and his business flourished. Several years later, he went back to his hometown in China and got married. One year after this, the couple returned to Miri. After the birth of his eldest daughter, he then relocated his family to Seria again, and continued his work as a contractor for Shell. He also started his lifelong service to Seria's Chinese community.

The number of Chinese in Seria was increasing consistently, and in 1937, Yong initiated a motion to build a school in Seria. Despite not being very highly educated himself, Yong was well aware of the importance of education for the people, and he started contacting the local Chinese and launching a fund-raising campaign. In 1938, Chung Ching School was built in today's western Seria. At the time, the school consisted of three wooden classrooms with attap roofs, one meeting room, and one staff hostel. Yong was elected chairman of the twenty-one-men board of directors.

In December 1941, Japan invaded Southeast Asia and occupied Brunei. Chung

Ching School was bombed and destroyed in the process, and had to close down. Yong then had to move his family into hiding, 18 kilometres away, in the woods of Sungai Liang.

Born into a farming family, Yong had a farming instinct and had already bought a piece of land in this area before the war begun. The area was full of forestry and was still undeveloped at that time. He and his wife cultivated a small piece of land for growing fruits and vegetables. During that chaotic era, Yong also learned to produce salt from seawater, and he used the salt in exchange for rice from the natives. As there were always wild boars scouring the area, Yong was able to hunt quite often, and even though life was difficult, his family was able to enjoy wild boar meat and not starve.

In 1945, after the Allies liberated Brunei, Yong returned to Seria and resumed his work as a contractor for Shell. In 1950, he started a business dealing in food and groceries named, Kong Fatt Seng. At the same time, he started growing pepper and green oranges on his Sungai Liang farmland. After the Korean War, the prices of pepper kept falling, and he switched to running a hennery and growing bananas. Yong's purchasing of this piece of land in Sungai Liang enabled his descendants to develop farms and farmlands in the later years.

After the war, Yong again started contacting the local Chinese on rebuilding Chung Ching School, and the directorate was reinstated, with Yong reappointed as chairman. Due to the joint efforts of Chinese leaders who provided both money and resources, the school was rebuilt in 1946.

Brunei's British Shell Petroleum Company developed quickly after the Second World War and Seria's population also grew rapidly, thus increasing the student intake of Chung Ching School. In 1953, Yong started another fund-raising campaign to build more classrooms. Two years later, he went one step further and started a junior high school section, and the school was renamed Chung Ching Middle School. In 1957, Chung Ching started its senior high school section.

Due to the sharp increase in the number of students, Yong applied to the government for a piece of land to expand Chung Ching, and the government allocated 4 acres of land for the planned expansion. Yong took up the post of head of committee for the School Building Design Committee.

On 4 September 1960, a grand and solemn completion ceremony was held for the brand new school building, and Sultan Omar Ali Saiffuddin was present on that day for the ribbon-cutting ceremony. For Yong, who had more than twenty years of outstanding contributions to Chinese education in Brunei — organizing kindergarten classes to a complete high school, which grew from having a mere twenty-seven students to having more than a thousand that moment was testimony to his remarkable achievements towards, and his unreserved dedication to, Chinese education.

For more than thirty years, Yong was always appointed chairman of the school directorate. In the mid-1960s, he became deputy chairman, and in 1968, he withdrew from the Chung Ching Middle School directorate due to health reasons.

In the mid-1950s, there was a Consultative Committee of Chinese Community managed by the deputy British resident in the Belait District. This committee represented the Chinese population in Belait by submitting suggestions and recommendations on Chinese matters, and replaced the duties previously held by a "kapitan". Yong was appointed its deputy head.

In 1955, Yong and the committee's head initiated a move to form the Chinese Chamber of Commerce for Kuala Belait, and in 1957, this was officially established. Yong, as the representative of Seria's Chinese businessmen, took the position of deputy chairman. Even though there were several changes to the leadership of the chamber, Yong remained the symbolic person for representing Seria's Chinese businessmen, and in the course of his service, helped lay a strong foundation for the chamber. In 1970, Yong died at the age of seventy-five.

Yong Pung How

(杨邦孝, Yang Bangxiao, 1926–)

Lawyer, banker, chief justice, Singapore

Yong Pung How has led a distinguished career in law, banking, and public service in Malaysia and Singapore. Probably his most outstanding contribution was as Singapore's chief justice in which he succeeded in rejuvenating the judiciary and legal system at a critical time in Singapore's development. In driving change, Yong appreciated the need for Singapore's legal system to remain relevant, responsive, and adaptable — qualities important in Singapore's quest to be a key economic node.

Yong was born on 11 April 1926 in Kuala Lumpur, the only son among the six children of Yong Shook Lin, a prominent Malayan lawyer. After an early childhood in Hong Kong, he completed his Cambridge School Certificate in 1940 at Victoria Institution in Kuala Lumpur when he was merely fourteen. The fact that he was underaged for university admission, coupled with the Second World War, resulted in his starting his tertiary education only in 1946. Yong read law at Downing College, Cambridge University, between 1946 and 1950. He qualified as a barrister-at-law of the Inner Temple in 1951 and was admitted as an advocate and solicitor of the Federation of Malaya, and of Singapore in 1952 and 1964 respectively. Between 1952 and 1970, he practised law at Shook Lin & Bok, the law firm his father had co-founded in 1918.

While building his legal career, Yong participated in Malayan politics under the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) banner. A prominent member within the MCA between 1956 and 1959, he was part of the multiracial coalition Alliance Party's National Executive Committee in 1957. However, Yong abruptly ended his political involvement in 1959 when strong communal attitudes and emotions began to crop up between the MCA and the Alliance's anchor member, the United Malays National Organization.

During this period and following his withdrawing from politics, Yong maintained an active public life. He chaired the Malayan Public Services Arbitration Tribunal (1955–60) and the Malaysian Industrial Court (1961–67). Between 1964 and 1969, he was chairman of Malayan Airways (later the Malaysian-Singapore Airlines). He was also the deputy chairman of the Malayan Banking Berhad from 1966 to 1971. Yong also expanded the legal practice of Shook Lin & Bok, and established a Singapore branch in 1964.

In 1970 Yong left legal practice, and attended the Harvard Business School's Advanced Management Programme. This marked his transition from law to banking and finance. During this time he and his family relocated to Singapore, where he founded the Singapore International Merchant Bankers Ltd. and the Malaysian International Merchant Bankers Berhad in 1971. He served as chairman and managing director of both companies until 1976 and 1974 respectively and in 1976, joined the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC Bank).

In 1981, Yong was seconded by OCBC Bank to the Singapore Government to form and head the Government of Singapore Investment Corporation (GIC), Singapore's soverign wealth fund tasked with managing Singapore's foreign reserves. In 1982, he was concurrently appointed managing director of the Monetary Authority of Singapore, Singapore's de facto central bank, as well as deputy chairman of the Currency Commissioners, and Singapore's alternate governor at the International Monetary Fund. Yong then returned to OCBC Bank as its chairman and chief executive officer from 1983 to 1989. Besides these high-profile public appointments, Yong served in various leadership capacities in the Mass Rapid Transit Corporation, the Securities Industry Council, the Singapore Press Holdings, the Singapore Broadcasting Corporation, the Institute of Policy Studies, the Singapore Symphony Orchestra, and Temasek Holdings.

In July 1989, Yong returned to the field of law as a High Court judge. According to former Singapore Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, Yong agreed to serve "out of a sense of duty; Singapore had given him his second home". Since he had been away from this field for a long while, this initial appointment was but a necessary way station for Yong before his elevation as chief justice. During his fifteen years (September 1990–April 2006) at the helm, he was instrumental in shaping and transforming the Singapore judiciary into an institution, "with a world class reputation for efficiency, integrity and competence" in Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong's words.

Yong effected needed changes swiftly and decisively, bringing to bear in the judicial reform process the system building, managerial and administrative acumen, and adroit problem solving ability that he was known for in the private sector. He appreciated the intimate interaction and workings of the judiciary as an integral part of the legal system and paid particular attention to the Subordinate Courts, which handle more than 90 per cent of the cases within the legal system.

The wide-ranging, holistic reforms involved hardware, software, and personnel. Information technology was rigorously harnessed to enhance efficiency. A no-nonsense, innovative case management system not only cleared the significant five-to-six-year backlog of cases, but also reduced the waiting time for the disposal of cases at all levels of the court system. Court processes were constantly reviewed and changes made to rationalize proceedings, reduce delay and costs. Alternative dispute resolution was promoted aggressively to reduce the courts' case load and to discourage litigiousness.

Yong worked closely with the government to raise the quality of the judiciary through regular revisions of judicial salaries and a conscious effort to attract lawyers and academics of the highest level of competence and temperament. He established the Senior Counsel scheme to recognize and promote excellence in the Singapore Bar. During his tenure, Singapore's Supreme Court decisions have been cited and adopted in major common law jurisdictions such as England and Australia, marking its growth from a parochial, common law legal jurisdiction to one that has acquired international standing and respect. As president of the Legal Service Commission, Yong focused on attracting, and retaining legal talent within the government legal service. He introduced the Justices' Law Clerk scheme which inducts the best legal minds at the formative stage of their careers.

For Yong, outmoded practices and procedures were an impediment to a progressive judiciary. He did not hesitate to scrap inherited custom and practices that stood in the way of progress and the forging of a unique legal identity. During his tenure, the forms of address used for judges, and the dress code for both judges and lawyers (men and women) saw significant departures. More importantly, this helped to generate a mindset shift within the legal fraternity and demonstrated an abiding commitment to progressive and rational practices that were not unduly constrained by tradition. Yong was deeply conscious that the development of Singapore law needed to be sensitively attuned to changing socio-economic, political and cultural norms, and the fundamental values of Singaporean society.

By the time Singapore completely abolished appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London in 1994, the country was well on its way to developing an autochthonous legal system and jurisprudence. Yong noted in 1995 that, "Our approaches to the law must reflect our own Asian values, such as consensus and respect for authority and the group. . . . we cannot be Luddites, forever fearful of the new."

The development of an autochthonous legal system requires the development of local case law and the growth of local legal literature and scholarship, and these were accorded importance by Yong. He introduced the "Singapore Law Reports" to facilitate legal reporting of local cases and saw to the large-scale expansion of LawNet, the electronic legal database and portal of legal information and research in Singapore. As president of the Singapore Academy of Law, he oversaw its expansion of services offered to the legal community and promoted continual legal education.

Yong believes that the law functions not only for the public good, but can also promote Singapore's economy ambition and standing. He sought to develop and disseminate Singapore law, and actively promote its use as a governing law of choice in regional commercial transactions by Singaporean and non-Singaporean parties. The increasing confidence in Singapore's dispute resolution system has prompted the government to promote Singapore as a major dispute resolution hub.

On his retirement in April 2006, Yong had written 882 judgments, the biggest number of judgments in the history of the Singapore judiciary. Many of them are now landmark judgments in areas ranging from commercial to constitutional to criminal law.

Since the mid-1990s, Singapore's judicial system has won numerous international accolades for its wide-ranging reforms, including being recognized by the World Bank as a viable model for other countries facing similar challenges. Probably the most significant contribution as chief justice was the attitudinal and mindset changes unleashed by his judicial reforms, which have resulted in the quiet confidence that Singapore can be the leading legal hub in Asia. Today, Singapore's judicial system is a revitalized and forward-looking institution, alive to the demands of globalization.

In recognition of his services and achievements, he was decorated with the "Darjah Utama Bakti Cemerlang" (Distinguished Service Order) in 1989 and the Darjah Utama Temasek (Order of Temasek, First Class) in 1999. The Inner Temple made him an honorary bencher in 1997. He was awarded honorary Doctor of Law degrees by the National University of Singapore in 2001 and the Singapore Management University in 2007. The La Salle University of the Philippines awarded him an honorary PhD in the Management of Financial Institutions in 2003.

In retirement, Yong continues to be involved in public service and philanthropy. He is a member of the Council of Presidential Advisers. He also maintains an active interest in the corporate world and holds directorships in Unicorn Holdings Pte. Ltd., and k1 Ventures Limited. He is also Chancellor of the Singapore Management University. Yong is actively involved in the Yong Loo Lin and the Yong Shook Lin Trusts, which have donated generously to the cause of higher education in Singapore.

Yong is married to Cheang Wei Woo and they have a daughter, Ying-I.

Yong Shook Lin

(杨旭龄, Yang Xuling, 1896–1955)

Lawyer, politician, businessman, Malaysia

Yong Shook Lin was a founding member of the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA), and its founding secretary general from 1949 to 1952. He also played a key role in the short-lived experiment with multiracial politics in the Independence of Malaya Party (IMP), of which Yong was a member of its central liaison committee. A well known Cambridge-trained lawyer, Yong was a successful businessman as well.

Yong founded the law firm, Messrs. Yong Shook Lin (later Shook Lin and Bok) soon after he was called to the Bar of the Federated Malay States in 1918, the first Malayan Chinese lawyer to be admitted to the local Bar there. In 1919 he was admitted to the Bar of the Straits Settlements. The law firm was the oldest, locally incorporated legal practice, with "the distinction of being first established by a local advocate and solicitor". In 1938, Tan Teow Bok, a Queen's scholar, joined the firm which then became Shook Lin and Bok. When Yong died in 1955, Tan and his only son, Yong Pung How, managed the firm.

Yong, a Hakka, was born to Yong Ngee Chai, a prominent Chinese leader on 7 December 1896 in Kuala Lumpur. His mother was Hong Kong-born Yu Tak Fong and he had four sisters. His son Yong Pung How became the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Singapore from 1990–2006. The junior Yong had practised law in his father's firm in Kuala Lumpur from 1952 to 1970, and was also actively involved in the MCA. Yong had a de facto second wife, Loke Wai Sang, with whom he lived since 1949, and had a daughter.

Yong studied at the Victoria Institution (VI) in Kuala Lumpur, before he pursued his law degree at the Cambridge University's Emmanuel College in 1910 on a Nugent-Walsh scholarship, which was "founded at the VI in 1909 as a memorial to a prominent Kuala Lumpur 'citizen' to be awarded annually to the boy who stood second in the Junior Cambridge Examination". Yong was the first recipient. He also won the Rodger Medal "founded in 1895 in honour of Sir J. P. Rodger, British Resident I Selangor and President of the VI Board of Trustees from 1896 to 1901", and "awarded to the boy who had the best School Certificate results". He obtained a Bachelor of Arts (B.A.) degree and a Bachelor of Law (LL.B.) degree in June 1914, after which he qualified for a Masters degree. The English Bar admitted him in December 1919. He was chairman of the Federated Malay States Bar Council Committee from the 1930s to 1954.

Aside from his lucrative legal practice begun in 1919, Yong, a millionaire rubber magnate, was an active business leader, having been the president of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce from 1935 to 1937. He was the vice-president of the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall; chairman of the Rubber Producers' Council; council member of the United Planting Association; and council member of the Estate Owners' Association from 1939 to 1941.

Yong gave his time to various voluntary social and educational services: as president of the Selangor Discharged Prisoners Aid Society; as council member of the Federal Housing Trust; and of Raffles College, Singapore.

Yong also played a significant part in public service: he was a member of the Mines Department Commission of Enquiry from 1940 to 1941; a member of the Selangor Chinese Advisory Board; an unofficial member of the Federal Council from 1939 to 1941; an unofficial member of the Selangor State Council from 1934 to 1955; Federal Legislative Council from 1950 to 1952; and Federal Executive Council from 1953 to 1955.

For his public service, Yong was awarded the CBE (Commander of the British Empire) honour in 1950; the Selangor Meritorious Medal (Pingat Jasa Kebaktian [PJK]) by the sultan of Selangor in 1954. He was also appointed a Selangor Justice of the Peace (JP). A road in Petaling Jaya, Selangor is named after him: Jalan Yong Shook Lin.

By the time the Japanese invaded Malaya and Singapore in early 1942, a few thousand Malayans, especially the Chinese, had fled the country to India, Australia, China, and elsewhere. Yong and his family stayed behind. The Japanese identified prominent Chinese leaders and professionals who had played important community roles during the pre-war colonial period and Yong, being one of their unfortunate victims was coerced into cooperating with the Japanese military administration by, for example, raising and contributing funds to support their military campaigns to purchase air planes and related equipment, for instance. Yong had to help top up $10 million from the state of Selangor to the sum of $50 million demanded by the Japanese from all the states, through a massive fund-raising effort led by other Malayan Chinese leaders such as Tan Kah Kee, Lee Kong Chian, and Dr Lim Boon Keng.

The Japanese also appointed Yong to the Selangor Advisory Council, an advisory council they had set up in every state. The Chinese leaders were compelled to make flattering statements and gestures, about them as most had little choice, especially after the Japanese had indiscriminately slaughtered a few thousand Chinese in Singapore on 15 February 1942 in the so-called Sook Ching massacre. This was extended to the rest of the peninsula from 18 February to 4 March 1942. In all more than 40,000 Chinese were estimated to have been killed. The Japanese were at war with China, and treated the Chinese everywhere they occupied with contempt, as they deemed them to be anti-Japanese.

News of the "cooperation" of the Chinese in Malaya (including Singapore) with the Japanese alarmed the Malayan Chinese in exile in India. Members of the Malayan Association, Bombay, India, passed a resolution on 16 November 1942 to banish these Chinese from Malaya whenever the British took Malaya back — labelling them Quislings, after Norwegian politician Vidkun Quisling, who had "assisted Nazi Germany to conquer his own country". However another Malayan Chinese leader, Tan Cheng Lock — who later became the founding president of the MCA — objected strongly to the unjust accusation and penalty in a memorandum to the honorary secretary of the association. Tan in exile in Bangalore, India, at the time, argued that the reign of terror perpetrated by the Japanese had forced the submission of those living under its tyranny. He admitted that had he and his family not evacuated in time by sheer luck and providence, they would have been subjected to the same fate, as would all the others who had escaped the Japanese tyranny. He postulated that "half, if not all, of the population of Malaya, including the Sultan[s] and their families, would have to be banished forever; for every one there must be compelled somehow to work in order to live and thereby assist the Japanese whether directly or indirectly in the governance of the country".

No such exercise of vendetta was initiated by the British after they returned to resume their colonial administration at the end of 1945; in fact many of the Chinese leaders were coopted into, or resumed, their public services, as can be seen in the case of Yong. However, although they returned to mainstream society, for some time the negative image somehow did taint these Chinese leaders, who were perceived to have acquiesced to Japanese coercion. This prejudice though was never shown to Malay "collaborators", even overt ones such as the Malay sultans, many of whom saw the Japanese as liberators from the yoke of British imperialism.

In post-war politics, Yong who had already established firm ties with the British colonialists previously, played a prominent role in galvanizing the Malayan Chinese away from Chinese nationalism and Malayan Communist propaganda, towards Malayan independence. He was coopted by Malcolm MacDonald, commissioner general for Southeast Asia, into the informal, elite multiracial group of leaders to discuss and diffuse rising ethnic tensions in 1949. There, through the Communities Liaison Committee (CLC), he became firm friends with Onn Jaafar, the founding president of the United Malays National Organization (UMNO). Onn, who subsequently resigned from UMNO after it had rejected his call for it to be transformed into a multiracial party, went on to found the Independence of Malaya Party (IMP), of which Yong was a staunch supporter.

Yong, who resigned as MCA secretary general (but remained an ordinary member) in 1952 due to differences with MCA president Tan Cheng Lock, became deeply involved with the IMP, espousing a multiracial platform. After it was severely trounced in the 1952 Kuala Lumpur municipal elections, Yong, with Onn, contemplated the formation of a new multiracial political party. This did not materialize and Onn went on to found the Malay-based Party Negara (National Party) to rival UMNO. Yong's interest in politics waned after this and he was no longer involved by 1954. He died soon afterwards at the age of fifty-nine.

Yong Sooi Nghean, Gregory

(杨瑞元,Yang Ruiyuan, 1925–2008)
D.D., D.C.L., the Roman Catholic archbishop emeritus of Singapore, Singapore

Archbishop Gregory Yong was the first Asian-born clergy to head the archdiocese of Singapore. In the twenty-three years of his tenure, he became the well respected and widely known public face of the Roman Catholic Church. He was born on 20 May 1925 in Taiping, Penang. With a reputation for wit and friendliness, he received his early education at St George's Institution and St Michael's Institution in Ipoh. He entered the seminary when he was sixteen and was ordained in 1951.

His first significant association with Singapore was his posting to the Church of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary following his ordination. He did not stay there for long — just two years later he was sent for further studies in Rome. There, he achieved the distinction of being the first local clergy from Malaya to obtain a doctorate in Canon Law. At a time when the Church sought to train and promote locals to leadership positions in its dioceses around the world, it is not surprising that after his training in Rome he would play a significant role back in his home diocese.

On his return to Singapore, he took up the position of assistant parish priest at the Church of the Sacred Heart. His impressive intellectual ability and academic qualifications led him to take up a teaching position at the St Francis Xavier Minor Seminary. His further rise in the church hierarchy happened in 1968 when he was consecrated as the new bishop of Penang. He returned to Singapore again in 1977 to succeed the archbishop of Singapore, following the death of the previous incumbent, Archbishop Michel Olçomendy. Those were the early days of Singapore as an independent nation, when the government pursued rapid industrial development and modernization as intensely as its effort to socially engineer a sense of nationhood out of a diverse ethnic and religious mix in the young country. In this context, the challenges Archbishop Yong had to face as the head of the Catholic community included not only pastoral matters of the church, but also the negotiation of complex political and social terrains in the wider Singaporean society.

One of the first important tasks for the archbishop was to put the relationship between the Holy See and Singapore on a more secure footing. This he did by facilitating the eventual establishment of diplomatic ties between the two sides in 1981. Among other early tasks was the setting up of the Archdiocesan Catechetical Commission as well as the Singapore Pastoral Institute for the strengthening of faith among the Catholics. He also oversaw the implementation of recommendations of the Second Vatican Council in the structuring of the local church organizational structure. In addition, Archbishop Yong supported and pushed for the founding of the St Francis Xavier Major Seminary in Singapore so that local aspirants to the priesthood could receive their advanced training in the country without having to relocate to the College General in Penang, which had been the previous arrangement before Singapore's separation from Malaysia. This would also ensure that Singaporean seminarians could continue to receive close support from the local congregation. In time, the major seminary has itself become an important centre for religious studies in the region, offering courses such as theology and philosophy for clergymen and lay people alike. Another significant legacy of Archbishop Yong is the Family Life Society. Sensing that the family unit was coming under threat from modernization and secularization, he hoped this society would help strengthen the family unit in Singapore by providing services such as information on family planning, conflict resolution, and counselling. The mission of the Family Life Society thus dovetailed with the Singapore Government's ideological focus on emphasizing the family as the "building block" of society.

In conjunction with the social doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church, the Singaporean Catholic community has a long history of providing a wide range of social services to the underprivileged and needy. In 1987, the government alleged that a number of lay Catholic organizations, through their social activism, were plotting to subvert the Singapore political system. It was one of the most serious crises faced by Archbishop Yong as the Catholic Church in Singapore and his leadership came under intense media and political scrutiny over the affair. In May 1987, the Internal Security Department, under the codename, "Operation Spectrum", arrested a number of Catholic priests and volunteers in church groups, active in providing social assistance to workers and championing their rights. The government's allegations were that these individuals and groups, inspired by "liberation theology", were closely associated with Filipino left-wings groups. They were accused of involvement in a "Marxist plot" to turn Singapore into a communist state. The government did not have to prove their case in the courts, as the Internal Security Act allows for the indefinitely detention without trial of suspects deemed to threaten national security.

After a tense meeting with then Prime Minister Mr Lee Kuan Yew, the archbishop — in a nationally televised press conference with Lee at his side — expressed his satisfaction with the government's evidence against the accused. Most of those arrested were subsequently released. However, the matter continued to plague the Catholic Church when some of those released later said their original confessions of the alleged plot had been obtained under duress, and retracted them. This resulted in the re-arrest of some of people involved. Throughout the matter, Archbishop Yong came under intense political pressure to control the activities of his priests and church organizations. He and some of his priests unwittingly became embroiled in a court case as witnesses in a libel suit brought by Lee Kuan Yew against the journal, Far East Economic Review, which Lee accused of suggesting in an article that he was against the Roman Catholic Church.

The "Operation Spectrum" affair highlighted the intricate political negotiations that Archbishop Yong had to contend with in Singapore, particularly with regard to issues involving religion and politics. Partly as a result of the affair, the government proposed the Maintenance of Religious Harmony Bill, aimed at curbing the involvement of religions in politics, and preventing interreligious conflicts. After the Bill was first proposed, Archbishop Yong got actively involved in the consultation process. Together with the leader of the Muslim community, he called for clearer clarifications of the terms "religious" and "politics", as these were considered rather vague in the Bill's original formulations. The archbishop's two further recommendations — one relating to the way restrictions were to be imposed, the other to the composition of the Presidential Council for Religious Harmony — were accepted by the government. Due to his suggestions, at least two thirds of the council would comprise representatives from the major religious groups, and there would be greater transparency in the council's decision making process. Archbishop Yong was one of the members appointed to the first council. The Maintenance of Religious Harmony Act is today an important law that draws the boundary between religion and politics, and ensures the continuing cordial relations among the different religions in Singapore.

Under the leadership of Archbishop Yong, the Catholic community in Singapore continued to grow, and sought to incorporate new arrivals to the archdiocese as Singapore welcomes more foreigners to the country. These days, weekend masses are conducted in a number of languages such as English, Mandarin, Tagalog, Bahasa Indonesia, French, Burmese, and German, reflecting the diversity of ethnic and linguistic groups in contemporary Singapore. After heading the Catholic Church in Singapore for almost a quarter of a century, Archbishop Yong retired in October 2000, on his seventy-fifth birthday. He had been suffering from heart problems at the time of his retirement, and died of heart failure on 28 June 2008, aged eighty-three.

Yong Yin Fatt, Roderick

(杨仁发,Yang Renfa, 1932–)
Educator, diplomat, Brunei

Dato Yong Yin Fatt has made considerable contributions to the development of education in Brunei, and also as a diplomat in ASEAN countries.

Unlike the ancestors of most Chinese Bruneians who came from Southern China's Fujian and Guandong provinces, Yong's ancestors were from Ruijin city of Jiangxi province located in the Yangtze River valley in Eastern China, which is best known as the "Red Capital", the holy land of the Chinese Communist Revolution that is highly significant in the development of modern Chinese history.

Yong's father, the youngest in a family of four boys, was brought to Brunei in 1927 by a cousin, who had prospered in Brunei, to look after his rubber estates. He worked hard and after some years was able to buy a rubber holding and some land in Kampong Subok, about three miles from Brunei Town (present-day Bandar Seri Begawan), to start making a living on his own as a rubber and vegetable farmer. He later married a Hakka girl from Labuan who bore him ten children, four boys and six girls. Yong, who was born on 6 November 1932, is the eldest.

Yong attended the Chung Hwa Primary School, a Chinese medium school, for a year and later joined a cousin to study at the Chi Wen Chinese Primary School in Labuan in East Malaysia. With the impending approach of the invading Japanese Armed Forces in 1941, Yong had to return to his family in Brunei. He stopped going to school for the whole period that Brunei was under Japanese occupation.

It was not until 1947 that he joined the St George's School in Brunei Town, an English-medium primary school run by the Catholic Mission. He completed his primary education after three years and had to continue his secondary education in Jesselton, British North Borneo (present-day Kota Kinabalu, Sabah, Malaysia) as there was no secondary school in Brunei then. He managed to acquire his Cambridge Senior School Certificate after three years there. He started working after this and his subsequent college and university education was all achieved through the government's in-service training scheme.

Yong benefited greatly from the political developments that were taking place at this point in Brunei's history. The country was on the road to achieving internal self-government and eventual full independence. It had been a British Protectorate since 1888. Since 1906, Brunei was administered by a British official called the "British resident", who ran the country on behalf of the Brunei ruler. In 1951, Sultan Omar Ali Saiffudin, father of the present sultan, ascended the Brunei throne. He was the catalyst that propelled the march towards full self-government in 1959, and independence as a sovereign state in 1984. One of his top priorities was to educate his people so that they were able to run a country when the time came. This policy has been continued and intensified by the present sultan.

On completion of his secondary school education, Dato Yong joined the government service. After six months of work as a clerk he joined the education service as a trainee teacher. This involved teaching full-time under the supervision of the school principal and officers from the Education Department.

The first school he was posted to was the Government English School, the only English-medium government school in Brunei Town at the time. As a small-scale school, there were only five teachers of whom Yong was the only local teacher. Apparently, Yong was the first and only local English-medium teacher with a secondary school education.

After a year as trainee teacher, Yong was sent by the Brunei Government to the Singapore Teacher Training College to pursue a two-year full-time course and was awarded the Certificate in Education at the end of the course. This was at the time the highest, non-graduate teacher qualification in Singapore.

On his return to Brunei, he was posted back to his old school and found that the school had now moved into a new modern school complex and its name had been changed to Sultan Omar Ali Saiffuddin College. It is still in operation today, but the building complex has been greatly expanded to accommodate for a library, science laboratories, a sports hall, and even a hostel annex for out-of-town students.

In 1958 he was transferred to the Anthony Abell College in Seria to continue teaching English Preparatory classes. Another objective of the transfer was for hims to understudy the chief Chinese schools supervisor stationed at the Education Office in Kuala Belait, so that he could take the job when the supervisor retired.

In 1960, the Australian Government offered Yong a scholarship under the Colombo Plan for Brunei for a trained teacher to go to the University of Sydney to do a specialized course on the Teaching of English as a Foreign Language, an area Australia was very strong in because of its special programmes for teaching English to its large intake of immigrants from various parts of the world. Yong was selected to go and he successfully completed the course, returning to Brunei in 1961.

Soon after this, he was transferred to the Chinese Schools section in the Education Department to assist the chief supervisor to oversee the running of Chinese schools. He remained in this position until his departure for Canada to pursue a full-time degree course on East Asian Studies, specializing in Chinese History and Civilization.

On his return from Canada in 1969, he was promoted to head of the Chinese School Division in the Education Department. In this position, Yong was responsible for all affairs related to Chinese schools, such as the registration of teachers and school management boards, the choice of curricula and textbooks, and the compliance by Chinese schools to regulations and rules set by the government. He also served as chairman of the board for the National Junior and Senior Middle Common Examinations. This examination was recognized by most Chinese-medium universities in Singapore and Taiwan since many students who passed it gained entry into these universities and a good number of them managed to graduate and go on to graduate studies in other countries, and to successful careers in various fields.

In the reorganization of the education service in 1983, a new entity, named the independent Inspectorate of Schools, was established to be the sole authority to inspect, report on, advise, and guide all teachers and schools in their work. Yong was initially posted to this division as a specialist inspector. He was promoted to director after the existing holder was promoted to head another government department.

In 1985 Yong was transferred to the ASEAN Division in the Ministry of Foreign Service. He spent a year here familiarizing himself with the workings of ASEAN, chiefly by attending the many meetings as a member of the Brunei delegation, and in the process, meeting all the officers from other member countries involved in ASEAN operations. He also attended the United Nations Annual General Assembly as a Brunei delegate in 1985 for three months.

When it came to Brunei's turn to nominate a candidate to fill the post of secretary-general of the ASEAN Secretariat located in Jakarta, Yong was nominated by the Brunei Government. He was formally appointed in 1986 and moved to live in Jakarta for the next three years.

The functions of the ASEAN Secretariat has been increasing and evolving over time. During the three years (1986–89) Yong was the secretary general, his work included servicing the many meetings in ASEAN, such as the annual foreign ministers meeting, the bi-annual meetings of the sectorial ministers, such as ministers for the economy, agriculture, labour, energy, law, and others. In addition to the Intra-ASEAN meetings, the secretary general was also required to attend the meetings with the dialogue partners. There were six at the time, namely the United States, the European Union, Japan, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. These efforts enabled the ASEAN countries to get trade concessions and assistance in many other areas, such as help in improving human resources in the form of training, acceptance of students into universities, and so on. The intangible benefits included enabling Brunei, a new and small country, to develop and emerge in a relatively short span of time as a country whose voice and influence in the international community can be heard and felt.

For his thirty-six-year of service, Yong was presented with a number of awards, including the Darjah Seri Paduka Makhota Brunei Yang Mulia Darjah Ketiga (SMB), the Darjah Seri Paduka Makhota Brunei Yang Mulia Darjah Kedua (DPMB) (this carries the title of Dato Paduka).

Yong still leads an active life, keeps himself fit, plays golf, and travels regularly with friends. He reads avidly on a wide range of subjects and follows current affairs in the print and electronic media. He still serves on the board of directors of Telekom Brunei Berhad of which he has been a member since this government owned company was first corporatized in 2002. At home, though his marriage has not produced any children, he is often surrounded by his siblings, their children, and grandchildren.

You Jin

(尤今, 1950–)
Writer, Singapore

You Jin can claim to be one of the most prolific writers in Singapore. Her literary works, particularly travelogues and essays, are not only well received in Singapore, but also enjoy wide popularity among readers in mainland China. Her works are included in school textbooks in Singapore. In addition, she herself as a writer, and her literary works have been studied as an academic subject at both local and foreign universities.

You Jin is a famous pseudonym name for Tham Yew Jin (谭幼今), who was born in Ipoh, the capital of the state of Perak in Malaysia, in 1950. Her ancestral roots can be traced to Taishan, a Cantonese-speaking county in Guangdong, China. At the age of eight, she moved with her family to Singapore, where she has since settled as a citizen. In 1973, she graduated from the Department of Chinese Studies, Nanyang University, with first-class honours for a bachelor of arts degree.

After graduation, she worked at the Singapore National Library doing indexing for three years. In 1976, she landed a job in one of the major local Chinese newspapers, Nanyang Siang Pau, where she worked as a journalist, and also an editor of supplements. In 1981, she left the newspaper to pursue a career in education. One of the schools in which she taught is the Pioneer Junior College. She is currently a freelance writer.

Basically her literary works are in four genres — short essays (xiaopinwen, 小品文), novel, travelogue, and prose. As one of the most prolific writers in Singapore, she has some 140 books to her name, published in Singapore, Malaysia, mainland China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Scholars and readers comment that while her prose and short essays are filled with inspiration to overcome difficulties in life, her novels shows her social responsibility, and her travelogues are exotically appealing.

The major novels You Jin has published are Mo (模, Mode, 1979), Shamo li de emeng (沙漠里的噩梦, A Nightmare in the Desert, 1987), Fengzheng zai yun li xiao (风筝在云里 笑, A Kite Smiling in Clouds, 1989), Ranshao de shizi (燃烧的狮子, The Burning Lion, 1990), Jinse de weixiao (金色的微笑, A Golden Smile, 1991), Tiaowu de xiangrikui (跳舞的向日葵, A Dancing Sunflower, 1992), Guili de xuanwo (瑰丽的旋涡, A Pretty Spiral, 1996), diesui de caihong (跌碎的彩虹, Rainbow that Fell Apart, 1996), Nage xiang bao de nüzi (那个像豹的女子, A Girl Who Looks Like a Leopard), Yangguang bijing shi tian de (阳光毕竟是甜的, The Sunlight is After All Sweet, 2000), and Yixiang qingyuan (异乡情缘, Exotic Connections, 2001).

You Jin's collections of prose include Shehui linzhao (社会鳞爪, Social Snapshots, 1978), Yi he shoushi (一盒首饰, A Box of Jewellery, 1988), Nangua qing (南瓜情, The Pumpkin Love, 1997), and Xiaosheng man taoyuan (笑声满桃园, A Peach Garden Filled with Laughs, 2003). Anthologies of her short essays include Linglong rensheng (玲珑人生, A Lovely Life, 1987), Niren shijie (泥人世界, The World of Clay Figurines, 1988), Xiangyata wai (象牙塔外, Outside the Ivory Tower, 1990), Chenshi fudiao (尘世浮雕, Embossing the World, 1990), Shan wai you shan (山外有山, There Are Mountains beyond these Mountains, 1991), Dadi de zhubao (大地的珠宝, Jewellery of the Earth, 1997), Rensheng zhi lü (人生之旅, The Journey of Life, 1998), Yueliang zai weixiao (月亮在微笑, The Moon is Smiling, 2001), and Shangxin de shui (伤心的水, The Sad Water, 2002).

The collections of her travelogues include Shamo li de xiaobaiwu (沙漠里的小白屋, A Small White House in the Desert, 1981), Yuan (缘, Reasons that Bind, 1982), Nanmeizhouzhilü (南美洲之旅, Travels in South America, 1985), Shitoucheng (石头城, The Stone City, 1992), Huo zai yangqun li de ren (活在羊群里的人, People Who Live in Lambs, 1993), Yihu cha xi xiangfeng (一壶茶喜相逢, A Happy Encounter over Tea, 1995), Meili de taiji (美丽的胎记, Beautiful Birthmark, 1996), Huanggu (荒谷, A Deserted Valley, 1997), Heise de daomi (黑色的稻米, The Black Paddy, 2000), and Qiangying nei de wenqing (枪影内的温情, Love in the Shadow of Guns, 2003).

You Jin's literary works have won her many prestigious awards and acclaims. In 1982, her travelogue, Shamo li de xiaobaiwu, won a Book Award from the National Book Development Council of Singapore. In 1991, with her novel, Ranshao de shizi, winning the same Book Award, she became the first writer to receive the inaugural Singapore Chinese Literary Award from the Singapore Literature Society. In 1996, she clinched the first Montblanc-NUS Centre for the Arts Literary Award.

You Jin's foreign reputation was embodied in 2000 by the establishment of You Jin Research Centre by the Chongqing University, China. Seven years later, she was invited to the city of Chongqing for its inaugural writer-in-residence project, which resulted in the publication of her book, Binfen chengshi (缤纷城事, The Colorful City), in 2008 in China and Singapore. Also in 2008, her book, You Jin xiaoshuoxuan (尤今小说选, Short Stories by You Jin) was picked up as one the titles for Read! Singapore, an annual reading campaign organized by the National Library Board. In 2009, she was honoured with Singapore's Cultural Medallion.

Young, Fifi

(Tan Kiem Nio, 陈金娘, Chen Jinniang, 1912–75)

Pioneer actress, Indonesia

Fifi Young was a well known actress who lived through four eras: before World War II, the Japanese Occupation period, the Soekarno period, and the Soeharto period.

She was born Tan Kiem Nio (陈金娘), nicknamed Nonie Tan, on 12 January 1912 (variously given in two other sources as 1914 and 1915) in Sungai Liput, Aceh, North Sumatra, to a French father and a Peranakan Chinese mother. As her father left her mother before she was born, it was not surprising that she took her mother's surname. She grew up in a single-parent family and received only four years of formal education at the Dutch School for the Chinese (HCS) in Batavia (Jakarta). In 1927 she married a well-known Peranakan writer and drama director, Nyoo Cheong Seng (杨众生, Yang Zhongsheng). This was the first marriage for Tan, but the second for Nyoo.

Tan studied Indonesian dances under Abdulhadi. In the late 1920s she followed her director-husband, who led "Miss Riboet Orion", a travelling drama troupe, on tour in West Malaysia (Malaya) and Singapore. When her husband led the "Moonlight Crystal Follies" troupe in Penang, she began appearing on stage and became a lead dancer. By 1933 she had emerged as a leading actress in the plays directed by her husband. She then started to use Fifi Young as her stage name. "Fifi" was chosen after a leading French actress at that time, "Fifi D'Orsay", while "Young" came from her husband's surname, pronounced "Yang" in Mandarin. However it was Anglicized to "Young" as she had a Eurasian face. Fifi Young was a great success with the audience who always wanted her in the performances. She followed the travelling troupe in the Dutch East Indies and British Malaya. One of the performances that made her a star was in R.A. Morhia, written and directed by her husband. Young played a Javanese girl who married a European man who then forsook her for a Dutch girl. It is believed that as the story was similar to that of her own mother's encounter, she was able to portray the character with feeling.

In 1934 she and her husband joined Dardanella, a well known travelling drama troupe in which Miss Dja, a legendary figure from Java, was one of the actresses. Young herself became one of the leading stars in the drama troupe which travelled widely in Indonesia, Singapore, and India. The group eventually formed their own travelling drama troupe called Fifi Young's Pagoda. In the 1930s, however, the movie industry began to develop in colonial Indonesia, and many actors and actresses gradually moved away from travelling drama troupes to the silver screen. Young's husband was asked to write screenplays while she acted in movies as the leading star. In 1940 alone, she starred in three movies: Kris Mataram (The Dagger of Mataram), Zoebaida (A Woman called Zoebaida) and Pantjawarna (Colourful). The following year, she starred in a movie entitled,

Air Mata Iboe (Tears of a Mother), which was directed by Fred Young, a leading movie director then.

During the Japanese Occupation, all the film companies were closed down so Young and her husband returned to the stage. They, together with Dahlia, an Indonesian movie queen before World War II, founded Sandiwara Surabaya (Surabaya Drama).

After World War II, Fifi Young and her husband formed another drama group called Sandiwara Pantjawarna (Colourful Drama). Her husband recruited a beautiful young actress, Mipi Malenka, to strengthen the drama group. He then fell in love with the young actress who eventually became his third wife. It is interesting to note that the marriage had the consent of Young who even allowed her to live under the same roof. But Nyoo and Malenka eventually split up. As for Fifi Young's relationship with Nyoo, there were two reports. One said that she also left Nyoo, but another noted that she remained Nyoo's wife until he passed away.

After Indonesia gained independence, the Indonesian film industry started to recover, especially in the 1950s. Young then returned to the silver screen and remained very popular despite her age. By 1973 she had made at least fifty-five movies. Her most successful role on screen was as a mother, first played in 1940. In 1954, she again played the role of a mother in Tarmina (produced by an Indonesian film company, Persari), and won the best actress award in the first Festival of Indonesian Films (FFI, 1955). In 1957 Fred Young remade his 1941 movie, Air Mata Ibu (Tears of a Mother), and invited Young to play the lead role again. From then on Young became the symbol of the Indonesian mother on screen. Her last movie, Ranjang Pengantin (The Bride's Bed), made in 1973, still portrayed her as a mother. She also played a leading role in the movie, Wajah Seorang Pembunuh (The Face of a Murderer, 1972) and received good reviews.

Some of her other successful movies include Djembatan Merah (Red Bridge, 1950), Tiga Dara (Three Girls, 1956), and Mei Lan, Aku Cinta Padamu (Mei Lan I Love You, 1974).

Young first learned to act from her director-husband, Nyoo Cheong Seng. A drama actor and movie star of the same generation, Tan Tjeng Bok, said that he taught her acting for two years. Tan noted that she had a special charm that made her different from other actresses; besides, she was able to get along with people easily. This eventually brought her success. Tan did not say much about her acting skills.

In 1971, during an interview with Tempo, a well known news weekly in Jakarta, Young was asked about "bed scenes", which were popular in Indonesian movies at the time. She criticized the censors for allowing the sex scenes and commented: "Would the movie not be popular if there were no such scenes?" She also admitted that if she were young and were asked to play these scenes, she would have refused.

On 5 March 1975, Young died in Jakarta and her body was cremated.

Young, Grace

(杨慕恩, Yang Mu'en, 1962–)
Bowling champion, Singapore

Best known as an international champion at ten-pin bowling, Grace Young has also created a reputation for working selflessly in promoting important social initiatives.

A relative latecomer to the world of bowling, Young was to become known as one of the most committed and elegant of Singapore's sportswomen. After retiring from sporting competition, she focused her attention on media work, and assisting a range of groups concerned with human and social welfare.

Born on 19 December 1962 in Singapore, Young was the sixth child in a family of seven. Her father, Young Kim Kai, a general manager of a car company, came from Xinghua (兴化) in Fujian Province, China. He had been brought up by a Japanese family. Young's mother, known as Mary Choo or Mary Chu, was an Indonesian Chinese of Hakka descent who was born in Malaya and lived in Johor.

Young developed a strong interest in sport, notably as a pupil at Raffles Girls' School. She played badminton and represented Singapore Combined Schools at softball, but was also a committed tennis player and swimmer. She worked for Singapore Airlines for a period, and then in early 1984, a visit to a bowling alley stimulated a new interest. She met the national coach, Victor Tham, who was working with a squad of young bowlers. After she was provided with a few quick guidelines, Young was invited to join in the regular training sessions. Such was her rapid progress that before the end of the year she had become the graded champion at the Singapore National Championships.

A meteoric rise is difficult to sustain, but Young maintained high standards during a fifteen-year career of high-level performances. She achieved national and international sport celebrity status and remains an icon of Singapore sports. She was a three-time "Sportswoman of the Year" (1990, 1992, and 1993) and might have won more often, but three titles were the maximum number permitted at the time. In the history of the award there have only been five other Singaporean women who have achieved that level of elite performance. Pat Chan (swimming) and Li Jiawei (table tennis), both active when multiple victories were permitted, both won five awards. Joscelin Yeo and Junie Sng (both swimming), and Jing Jun Hong (table tennis) are the others who achieved the accolade three times. In 1999, when about to retire, Young earned a coveted place on the Straits Times 50 Greatest Athletes list.

During her first two years of international representation, she was a frequent prize-winner. However she had to wait until 1987 to make her mark in the SEA Games. During the next eight years she became one of the most prolific medal winners for Singapore. In Jakarta (1987) she won one gold (in the women's fives team event) and one bronze medal (in the Trios). In Kuala Lumpur (1989) she added two golds, one silver, and two bronzes. This success came after suffering a back injury. She won the masters title and also took the gold in the women's fives event. Grace went on to win the Taipei International (masters) several weeks later.

In 1989 Young scored a "hat-trick" of wins at the Singapore Open. She dominated the field in the singles, all-events and the grand masters. She followed this up with further wins in 1992, and two firsts in 1993. Her achievements in the Asian Fédération Internationale des Quilleurs (FIQ) competitions were impressive.

In 1990 she clinched the gold medal. Two years later there were two bronze medals and, in 1994, she won a silver and a bronze medal. Young also achieved major success in the Taiwan Open Championship where she took first place.

When Singapore hosted the SEA Games in 1993, expectations were running high. Young won a single gold in the doubles, partnering Adelene Wee. And finally in Rayong, Thailand (1995), she compiled a complete collection — one gold, one silver, and one bronze. Between 1987 and 1995, she won a total of seven golds, two silvers and four bronze medals at the SEA Games.

In 1991 Young was a member of the five ladies team that set a one-game world record at the FIQ Tournament in Singapore. There were many other successes within the region. In the wider Asian context, Young was also a top performer. She won an Asian Games bronze medal on two occasions. The first came in the women's singles in Hiroshima (1994) and the second in Bangkok (1998) in the women's trios. This later success was all the more notable as it followed a protracted period of tendonitis.

On the world stage, Young again proved her mettle. The nature of the competition demands sustained concentration through the preliminary rounds, round robin, and position rounds, which lead to the stepladder finals. In 1989, in her debut performance in the World Cup, she was placed eleventh in the competition held in Dublin, Ireland. Three years later Young fought her way through to the stepladder finals in Le Mans, France, before taking fifth place. And in 1994, when the AMF World Cup was held in Hermasillo, Mexico, she improved further and took fourth place. In the exhibition games which preceded this competition, Young teamed up with countryman Chan Shen to win an "unofficial mixed pairs title". She outscored all her male and female contemporaries on that day with a total of 264 pins.

Young received a National Day Award for her contribution to sport in 1995. She became an increasingly well known television personality, reading the sports news as well as hosting a leisure entertainment programme. In 1996, she reported on the Singapore performances at the Olympic Games in Atlanta. She also found time to represent Singapore in bowling as a demonstration sport at the games. The following year the SEA Games were held in Jakarta and she again played an important role in presenting sports news on television.

Outside the world of sports, Young has also spent time working with organizations such as the National Council of Social Services, the Singapore Red Cross Society, and the sports advisory subcommittee of the Singapore Broadcasting Authority. She is also a volunteer at the Assisi Home, Hospice and Children's Centre. In 1999 she became a strong advocate for the new Women and Sport movement, leading the Sports Excellence group and producing support material for young athletes.

In 2002, she was nominated for the Asian "Women Inspire Award".

Most recently Young participated in a fund-raising venture in Thailand. In 2009 she joined a group concerned with providing underprivileged women in Thailand with pap-smear tests. The Tour of Hope group of twenty-five riders cycled nearly 700km through Thailand in eight days, and managed to raise US$20,000 riding from Isan (in north-eastern Thailand) to the capital, Bangkok. The following year, with a larger contingent of thirty-five cyclists, the focus of the fund-raising venture was on helping midwives to administer screening tests in the most isolated rural areas of Thailand. The Tour of Hope rode from Kanchanaburi to Bangkok.

Young has been a member of various sporting committees in recent years. She has served on the board of management of the Singapore Sports School and the First Tee Golf Foundation. Her talents also extend to public musical performances. She is a member of Celebration Chorus, which is an Ecumenical Community Chorus, and has performed Handel's Messiah amongst other works. In June 2010 Young again revealed her virtuosity by singing The Lady is a Tramp with squash player Belinda Foo, at the Esplanade Concert Hall during the Association for Women of Action and Research (AWARE)'s superwomen gala.

Young is married to Roy Diao Wei-Chien, and they have one son, Kenneth Diao Yun-Kai, who was born in 2004.

Yu Chin Chai

(俞庆在, Yu Qingzai, 1943–)
Lawyer, calligrapher, Brunei

Yu Chin Chai is a well known lawyer, as well as one of the best Chinese calligraphers in Brunei. He established a calligraphy school to indulge in his desire to teach calligraphy to interested learners. He is also an ardent participant of the activities in the Chinese community. As a lawyer, he has always been a legal adviser to Chinese organizations. He served several terms as chairman of the Taiwan Graduates Association of Brunei Darussalam, and has concurrently been on the directorial board of Chung Hwa Middle School in Brunei for over twenty years.

Yu was born in Sarawak, and educated at Chung Hwa Middle School in Kuala Belait and subsequently, at Chung Ching Middle School in Seria for his college education. He enrolled at the National Taiwan Normal University, Department of Education, for his degree in education in the autumn of 1963. After graduating in 1967 he returned to Brunei to serve his alma mater in Kuala Belait. In 1971, he studied law in England and received the barrister-at-law of Gray's Inn qualification in 1974. The following year, he became a professional lawyer in Brunei, and opened a law firm in the capital of Brunei that is still operating today.

Yu was not from a well-to-do family. From his primary school days to his university years in England, he took up part-time jobs, such as working as a gardener, and as a fisherman, as well as working full-time in a restaurant to pay for his studies. The self-reliant and assiduous spirit is exemplary for the young generation.

As a lawyer, Yu specializes in criminal law, especially on major cases, such as murder, firearms, major drug trafficking (all three of which carry the death sentence), as well as rape cases etc. He was well known for the successful appeal against the death sentence of someone convicted for illegal possession of firearms. This was the famous "Madtassan bin Lamat v Public Prosecutor" case in 1993, which was a major case at the highest judiciary level in Brunei, namely, the Court of Appeal. For this case he presented many defence arguments entirely backed by the points of law, with which the Court of Appeal agreed, and therefore allowed the appeal.

In this case, he won on four points of law, at the Court of Appeal level. It was an example of success against overwhelming odds. The facts left no room for debate, and the only thing he could do was to find loopholes in the law to argue about — on points of law, and points in the construction of statutes. These two areas of advocacy were clearly demonstrated in this leading case fought by Yu.

As a calligrapher, his forte lies in the kaishu (楷书, regular script), xingcao (行草, semi-cursive script), and caoshu (草书, cursive script) style of Chinese calligraphy. He has been invited to represent Brunei at international calligraphy exhibitions on over eighty occasions in countries such as China, Korea, Canada, America, Singapore, Malaysia, and Taiwan. Some of his works are collected and preserved in the form of carving to be kept in China and he had won numerous prizes for his calligraphy art.

Yu has been vigorously promoting the learning of calligraphy and his enthusiasm has never waned over the decades. He created and established the Han Tang Calligraphy Society in the 1980s and later set up the Association of Writers, Calligraphers, and Artists. He was appointed instructor and put in charge of the Hua Ho Cultural Fund Calligraphy Centre. He also set up a training programme which provides regular weekly calligraphy classes taught by professional calligraphers. Every year, before the Spring Festival, members would write spring couplets on the spot in many places, and give them away free of charge. This is very welcomed by the people and his initiative demonstrates how important he is in the revitalizing and promoting the art of calligraphy in Brunei.

In 2003 Yu was invited to the "Majlis Ramah Mesra" event to demonstrate his calligraphy skills at the Tutong Park in the presence of His Majesty who was pleased and signed on the calligraphy. The government photographer captured this particular moment and the photo was then printed on the poster of the event and distributed all over the country.

Since the 1970s, Yu has been rigorously involved in the Chinese community. With his law background and being a Chinese university graduate who is familiar with the Societies Act, he naturally became the legal adviser to about twenty different Chinese organizations, including the Chinese Chamber of Commerce B.S.B., Chinese Chamber of Commerce K.B., Foochow Association K.B., Hainan Association K.B., Taiwan Graduates Association, Brunei Guang Hui Association B.S.B., Kwong Wai Siew Association K.B., Tokong (Chinese Temple) B.S.B., and Chinese Mechanical Association, Seria, etc. He provides free advisory service regarding rules and regulations pertaining to societies. Besides performing these duties, he was chairman of the Taiwan Graduates Association of Brunei Darussalam for four terms, president of the Rotary Club in Bandar Seri Begawan for three terms, and assistant governor of the International Rotary Club, district 3310, for one term. He has been one of the directors of Chung Hwa Middle School for over twenty years, making much contribution to the development of Chinese education.

Yu's involvements in community activities and contributions to the Chinese community are multifaceted, and manifested in the fields of legal consultation, cultural construction, and educational development. He is amiable and responsive and accedes to every request in terms of legal consultation, thus earning much respect from the leaders of various organizations. He is often invited to their directorial board's installation ceremonies. His law office is regularly patronized by the general public and enjoys a booming business.

Yu's wife is currently working in the academic field and she specializes in art and painting, and various Chinese musical instruments. They are planning to publish a book on calligraphy and art collection, and Yu is also presently occupied with the Chinese translation of the Brunei Societies Act, Nationality Act, and the narratives of the "Madtassan bin Lamat V Public Prosecutor" appeal case mentioned above.

Yu Khe Thai

(杨启泰,Yang Qitai, 1896–1983)
Community leader, business leader, Philippines

Yu Khe Thai was a respected Chinese community leader, a staunch defender and leader of the anti-Japanese movement, and an active supporter of Chinese education in the Philippines.

Yu was born in Bihu, Longxi, Fujian Province in 1896 of a wealthy businessman father, Yu Tiong Yee (杨忠懿), the fourth son of Yu Ti Vo (杨知母). His mother was Lim Kiak (林局). As a young boy, Yu joined his father at Gulangyu in Xiamen and studied at the Anglo Chinese School there. They later moved to the Philippines where Yu graduated from the Catholic Saint John College. After he graduated, he worked in his grandfather Yu Ti Vo's hardware, known by the Chinese trade name Sui Liong Hing (瑞隆兴铁业公司). Yu rose from the ranks to become chairman and general manager of Sui Liong Hing, which later became more popularly known as Yutivo Hardware.

Yutivo Hardware started as a single proprietorship hardware store in 1884 but later expanded and was incorporated into Yutivo and Sons Hardware in 1917, involved in hardware trading, import-export and merchandising. The corporation became a spare parts distributor of US-based General Motors Corporation in 1940. Despite the 1942–1945 Pacific War which crippled several businesses in the Philippines, the company managed to recover and expanded its operations as a distributor of GM trucks and later assembly rights for cars and trucks for General Motors.

Yu was very active in Chinese community organizations. Since its foundation in 1931, he was president of the Philippine Chinese Educational Association, a position he held for 40 years. The association was crucial in supporting high quality Chinese-language education in the Philippines. When Japan invaded China, he and fellow Chinese mobilized support for China and he became the vice chairman of the Federation of Overseas Chinese National Salvation Association (华侨救国联合会) and chairman of the Philippine-Chinese Anti Japanese Society (菲律宾华侨援助抗敌委员会), popularly known as the Kong Tiak Hue (抗敌会). Yu was likewise one of the leaders of the China National Salvation Committee, called Kiu Kok Sia (救国社) for short, and the Philippine chapter of the Boycott Japanese Goods Movement.

Like the rest of the overseas Chinese in Southeast Asia, the Chinese in the Philippines found the urgent need to modernize China's air force. Yu was made chairman of the Philippine chapter of the Association for Development of Aerial Defense of China (中国航空建设协会菲支会) organized by the Southern Chinese. The Association devised a scheme to sell aviation bonds to buy airplanes for China, to put up the Fujian aviation school and train pilots to fight the war.

When the Japanese aggression was brought to the Philippines, then a territory of the United States, the Huaqiao Anti-Japanese Movement was organized. Because of his active participation in the anti-Japanese movement even before the outbreak of war, Yu was among the first arrested when the Japanese occupied the Philippines in January 1942. But he did not succumb to the Japanese enticement for him to surrender. The Japanese were aware of the high stature he enjoyed in the Philippines and they did not dare physically harm him. However, his wealth and properties were all confiscated. He was given amnesty and released on April 1943.

At the end of World War II, Yu was tapped to be chairman of the Committee for the Huaqiao Business Revival and Development Movement (华侨商会复兴促进会) and the Huaqiao Welfare Committee (华侨福利促进委员会会) of the Chinese Chambers of Commerce (中华商会). Both committees were tasked to help their fellow Chinese get back on their feet, without waiting for government help or for reparations payment after the war. They especially helped care for the orphans whose parents were either arrested and killed by the Japanese or died in the war.

Due to his hard work and compassion for the welfare of the ethnic Chinese community, Yu was elected chairman of the Chinese Chambers of Commerce, where he participated all out in the rehabilitation of businesses destroyed by war. In the 1950s, Yu founded and became chairman of the Anti-Communist League and the Philippine chapter president of the Cultural Revival and Promotion movement. He was also president of the Yu and the Tang-Yu family associations.

As chairman of the Board of Trustees of Chiang Kai Shek High School, he was responsible for raising funds to make the school one of the best in infrastructure and facilities. From 1953 to 1954, during the crucial and conflict-ridden years that preceded the formation of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, Inc. (菲华商联总会), Yu became a significant unifying factor behind the successful organization of the Federation (商总) as the lead organization in the Chinese community.

The often acrimonious debates in the organizational meetings between the then Chinese Chambers of Commerce and the Federation were overcome when Yu was chosen as the neutral and mutually acceptable person to be the first president of the Federation in March 1954, a position he continuously held for four terms, until 1962. Concurrently, he was Chairman of the Board of Chiang Kai Shek High School, Chairman of the Anti-Communist League and a member of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Bureau of Taiwan (侨务委员会委员).

Being at the helm of these key organizations in the Chinese community, Yu played an active and leading role in the political, social, cultural, educational and charitable work of the Chinese community. All these he was able to pursue and support due to the solid economic base established by his family. Besides his wealth, his prestige with the Chinese community, Yu Khe Thai became Chairman of the Board of the Philippine Bank of Communications (交通银行) and General Manager to represent Taiwanese investors, primarily from 1955 to 1974 until the bank became all Filipino-owned in 1974 under Ralph Nubla. The bank played a crucial role in promoting investments from Taiwan to the Philippines and from Chinese Filipinos to Taiwan.

Throughout the presidency of the late Ferdinand Marcos, Yu Khe Thai was presidential consultant on national policy. A staunch anti-Communist leader who headed many of the Kuomintang-led organizations in the Philippines, Yu was one of the most respected leaders and protectors of the Chinese community who worked for the welfare of the Chinese community continuously for close to 40 years. At the same time, he was also a key figure in promoting unity, friendship and mutual understanding between the Chinese community and the mainstream Philippine society.

Despite the 1942–1945 Pacific War, which crippled several businesses in the Philippines, Yutivo and Sons managed to recover and expand its operations, not just because of the post-war demand for steel and construction supplies but also as a distributor of GM trucks. The following years saw Yutivo Corporation establishing an assembly plant to locally assemble GM cars and trucks. The Yutivo plant served as a pilot operation to develop low-volume GM completely knocked-down assembly procedures for a subsequent network of GM assembler-distributors worldwide. In 1972 Yutivo Corporation actively participated in the government's Progressive Car Manufacturing Program and was a major partner of General Motors Corp.

Today, Yutivo Corporation is one of the most technology-driven companies in the Philippines, dealing with computers, information technology, system design, engineering and integration, training, and equipment leasing.

Yu, Lily Monteverde

(杨莉华, Yang Lihua, 1939–)

Movie producer, Philippines

Lily Yu Monteverde, known as "Mother Lily" to Filipinos all over the country, is considered the mother of Philippine cinema, or, more popularly, the "Queen of Philippine Cinema". As the person behind one of the top three movie outfits in the country Regal Films — she has helped shape the lives of countless Filipinos. Believing that movies reflect life's causes and mirror an image of the struggles ordinary Filipinos deal with each day, she makes movies that serve to educate, inform, and somehow transform the lives of the movie-going public.

In promoting and championing Filipino movies, Mother Lily is unique in the relatively more conservative Chinese-Filipino community. Like many early Chinese immigrants, her father, Domingo Yu Chu (杨翼注), went to the Philippines from Nan'an (南安) in Fujian at a young age to seek better livelihood. He was happy to find that in this tropical country, coconuts were abundant and pursuing copra production held a big promise. Hence, he started to learn about coconuts and became one of the early entrepreneurs in the coconut industry. After several years of hard work and struggle, he accumulated enough wealth to establish the Mao Fa (茂发) Company, through which he earned more profits. Following the Chinese tradition of always being grateful for whatever bounty one has received, and also believing that the key to a secure and promising future lies in society's youth and their education, he established a school, Uno High School, for the Chinese in the Philippines. He wished the best for Chinese-Filipino youth, hence the name "Uno", which is Spanish for number one.

Mother Lily was born on 19 August 1939, the youngest of twelve children. As a child, she was headstrong and quite spoilt. Her parents were normally quite strict, but as she was the youngest, they were more patient with her, and her siblings were gentler with her as well. Mother Lily credits her family for igniting the passion she has for her chosen field. A critical inspiration was her father, Yu Chu. His courage, hard work, and perseverance were the values that contributed to his success in the business world. Her parents instilled independency and the sense of responsibility in her since she was young, and also the virtue of honesty that ensured the integrity of the financial dealings in her work involving millions of pesos. Another person who motivated her to do what she liked best was her brother, Dr Jose Yu Siek Pong (杨式榜), principal of Uno High School. A medical doctor by training, he had sacrificed a lucrative medical practice to continue his father's lifelong commitment to education, and pushed the school to produce upright and accomplished students. Jose Yu shaped the dynamics of Uno High School, which he led for more than thirty years until he passed away in 1997. Although he was a strict disciplinarian, his determination to get to know all his students, and his unfailing concern for their welfare, have earned him not only the respect and awe of students but their love as well. This leadership style might have inspired Mother Lily in her movie productions.

The Japanese Occupation was also a valuable learning experience for Mother Lily, and also served to test her family's enduring faith in one another. She was four years old at the time, and the whole family fled to Marinduque in south-western Luzon, to hide from the invaders. Here, she learned to work for her own meal – no rice meant they had to buy palay and mill this into rice themselves and the young girl was not exempted from this task. Thus already at that young age, she learned that she needed to work for what she wanted.

As she grew into her teens, Mother Lily got hooked on movies. She would even travel to where filming was taking place and this inspired her to get a movie-like life and work towards that goal. After finishing her secondary education at St Scholastica's College, she went on to pursue an associate in arts degree at Maryknoll (now Miriam) College. University life wasn't appealing to her because she felt there was so much more she wanted to do, so she left after only two years. While still at university, she got to know the Mao Fa Company's basketball team leader, Leonardo Monteverde (李旋国), who was from San Beda College, and who was not only excellent in basketball, but was also an effective organizer. They got married in 1961 and, to people who know the couple well, Mother Lily's success in the movie industry was in part because of the full support and encouragement of her husband.

Having dreamt of being in the movies, Mother Lily had initially wanted to be an actress, but was not too confident about her looks. So, with all she saved from working as a clerk at her in-laws' Montemart Department Store on a monthly salary of 600 pesos, she took her first step into the film industry in 1961 by buying two popcorn machines and stationing them at two movie houses. Following her heart, Mother Lily worked hard and became a movie producer at the Regal Films, from which she shaped the lives of countless Filipinos through her work. Her first offering in 1976 — Kayod sa Araw, Kayod sa Gabi (Hark Work in the Morning, Hard Work at Night) — became a smash hit. Forty years later, with many local and international awards still being reaped, Mother Lily is known throughout the country. While movies are mostly for entertainment, she believes that they should educate and inform as well, by reflecting the struggles of ordinary Filipinos.

During the martial law years, Mother Lily was afraid that the Marcos Government would arrest her when she produced Manila By Night (1980). She recounted that Imelda Marcos was upset because the movie showed an image of Manila different from her vision of it as good and beautiful. Director Ishmael Bernal was brave enough to show the country's poverty, prostitution, drug addicts, and the squatters (the homeless) instead. So not only did Imelda censor major portions of the movie, she also forced them to change the title to City After Dark. Four years later, Mother Lily had another run in with the Marcoses when Mrs Marcos ordered all copies of Sister Stella L (1984) confiscated. Fortunately, one copy had already been smuggled out to Hong Kong and was then screened at the Cannes Film Festival in France, where it received a standing ovation. Sister Stella is a nun who became involved in labour strikes after learning of the government's neglect of the poor and working classes. Her sworn duty to fight for the poor became complicated when her journalist friend was tortured and a union leader was kidnapped and killed. The plot reflected real conditions in the country during the dictatorship of Ferdinand Marcos.

Making movies does not mean being cooped up within the confines of a movie studio. Mother Lily puts up bazaars and supervises them closely. She says, "By putting up bazaars, I am able to feel the pulse of the ordinary people. I am able to experience and remain sensitive to their needs and wishes. In doing so, I am able to enrich and sharpen my instinct for my choices of the kinds of films that will click."

Under her stewardship, Regal Films has made more than 1,000 movies to date and has launched the careers of countless superstars in Philippine cinema. She also launched the careers of several outstanding directors from various professional backgrounds, such as production designer Mel Chionglo, screenwriter and university professor Jose Javier Reyes, production designers Don Escudero and Jeffrey Jeturian, screenwriter Jose Carreon, entertainment editor Lav Diaz, film editor Toto Natividad, to name a few. These names resound strongly in the Philippine cinema industry, all thanks to Mother Lily, who is now a legend in the history of Philippine cinema. She leaves a legacy of reviving the erstwhile moribund Philippine movie industry which now has many participants who owe their livelihood and careers to her.

Yuchengco, Alfonso T.

(杨应琳, Yang Yinglin, 1923–)

Entrepreneur, business leader, philanthropist, diplomat, Philippines

Alfonso T. Yuchengco's career has seen him establish a financial empire with business that range from insurance to banking, education, culture, and philanthropy. In his senior years, he heeded the call of his country and became a sterling diplomat, serving as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the People's Republic of China, then Japan, before being designated the Philippines' permanent representative to the United Nations.

Born on 6 February 1923, Alfonso T. Yuchengco is one of the most successful Filipino businessmen in the Philippines. He runs his businesses on the core values of discipline, diligence, honesty, and pride in being a Filipino citizen. Yuchengco has often said, "I won't go into any business that isn't good for the country or may tarnish the company's reputation. A good name is more important than a successful business." He acquired the foundations of business, work ethics, and values from his father, Enrique Yuchengco (杨仲清), as he trained under the companies the family established when they migrated to the Philippines from Nan'an in Fujian, China.

Enrique Yuchengco first went into a construction business and became a partner with prominent Filipino architect Tomas Mapua. By 1912, he and his wife, Maria Hao Tay, owned several lumber stores and had begun to make a name for themselves in the construction business. Later, Enrique engaged in other enterprises such as rice milling, tobacco trading, and wine making. In 1930, the Yuchengco patriarch realized that there were too few insurance companies in the Philippines, and thus decided to venture into fire and marine insurance as the springboard of the many businesses they were to establish later. The China Insurance and Surety Company was established the following year, with just seven employees, yet in the Chinese-Filipino community, the Yuchengcos are recognized as the pioneers of the insurance industry. Enrique Yuchengco was able to build up the insurance business based on integrity and trust. His other ventures did not cease operating and he was still doing rice trading in Northern Luzon, and construction and lumber trading in Manila. These enterprises became the trademark of the early Yuchengco conglomerate, built on a solid reputation of integrity, which spurred the growth of his companies.

Enrique Yuchengco nurtured his enterprises and continued to groom his only son, Alfonso, to take over. The younger Yuchengco completed his bachelor's degree in commerce from the University of the Philippines, and did a graduate course in accountancy from Columbia University in the United States. He taught accounting for a while at the Far Eastern University and the University of the East. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, they liquidated the biggest of the Yuchengco's holdings, China Insurance Company. The family survived with the money that the senior Yuchengco had saved up, and relied on the rice mills in the north to sustain their income. At that time the younger Yuchengco took it upon himself to augment the family savings by buying and selling soap. This entrepreneurial spirit that he displayed encouraged his father to send him to Pangasinan to oversee their rice mill. During this dark period, the younger man found ways to contribute money, medicine, and food to student fighter groups in Manila and the provinces. He felt it his duty to help in the war efforts against the Japanese in any way he could, as his father had been teaching him to be thankful to the Philippines, to which the family owed their luck and success,

Upon Liberation, Yuchengco went back to university and took the licensure examinations for certified public accountants. He then slowly took on the management of his father's enterprises, but instead of reopening the China Insurance Company, he formed a new enterprise — the Malayan Insurance Company, Inc. Over the years, Yuchengco had developed lasting friendships with his classmates, whom he later recruited to join him in his various businesses. He joined the Manila Jaycees in 1950, and has remained a perennial supporter of their many civic projects. Friends he had made in the non-profit group were added to his network of contacts. He travelled extensively to the United States, Europe, and Asia, establishing close ties with foreign corporations. The valuable contacts and opportunities he developed through his social network helped his companies expand rapidly.

Yuchengco dynamically piloted the diversification of the family's businesses to what it is today. His business expansions include two of the country's firsts. In the 1970s, he pioneered the pre-need business through Pacific Plans Inc. He also brought the first credit card business into the country when he brought in the Diner's Card. The exponential growth of Yuchengco's business interests in insurance, banking, investments, and education, among others, was the result of his indefatigable efforts and dreams to succeed. Companies such as Rizal Commercial Banking Corporation, Malayan Insurance, Great Pacific Life Assurance, Malayan Colleges, and House of Investments, are the core companies under the umbrella Yuchengco Group of Companies, which Alfonso Yuchengco diligently expanded through the years.

Yuchengco moulded a distinguished life with various achievements. He has been recognized as business leader and nationalist over the years, and was even appointed ambassador to the People's Republic of China in 1986 by the late President Corazon Aquino. The task was quite difficult as he had to place the Philippine-China relationship on a track consistent with his country's status as a newly restored democracy. Engaging in economic diplomacy, he broadened the range of the Philippines' trade with China, and laid the groundwork for economic cooperation with that booming country. In 1995, former President Fidel Ramos appointed him ambassador to Japan. As with what he did in China, Yuchengco helped increased direct Japanese investments in the Philippines. Yuchengco was then appointed by President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo as the permanent representative to the United Nations Headquarters in New York. During his stint at this body, Yuchengco secured a commitment for a U.N. Security Council seat for the Philippines, a first for the country. He resigned after fourteen months of service when he turned eighty. For his sterling performance as a diplomat, Yuchengco was tapped as presidential adviser for foreign affairs, a cabinet rank.

While Yuchengco served in the diplomatic corps, the Yuchengco Group of Companies was ably run by the next generation of Yuchengcos who, like their father, were trained as managers at an early age. Yuchengco's wife, Paz Sycip, is the daughter of Albino Sycip, one of the founders of China Bank. Despite his traditional Chinese-Filipino family background, Yuchengco's own family is considered unconventional. He accepted his eldest son's decision not to involve himself in the family business, and allowed his daughters to run the businesses' major operations. In 2005, he announced that his eldest daughter, Helen Yuchengco Dee, would succeed him. Helen Yuchengco is married to another banker, Peter Dee, a scion of the renowned Dee C. Chuan family, the key founder of China Bank. Helping Helen Dee in overseeing the Yuchengco Group of Companies is another daughter, Yvonne Yuchengco. These days, the fourth generation, Yuchengco's grandchildren, helps to oversee daily operations of the different businesses. Yuchengco also depends heavily on professional managers to help run his business, and he has never restrained them, granting them room instead to realise their ideas of growth and expansion.

While riding high in the successes of the family's many businesses, Alfonso Yuchengco has always reminded his kin and his business executives to share their bounty with the community. In 1970, he established the AY Foundation for his philanthropy, charitable donations, and long-term civic projects. The foundation's beneficiaries represent a broad range of activities that hold personal significance for Yuchengco, such as education, the arts, and the environment. In addition to the AY Foundation's spearheaded community outreach, cultural heritage sponsorships, scholarships, health care caravans, leadership training, and awards programmes, Yuchengco also opened the Yuchengco Museum in 2005 in the landmark business complex, RCBC Plaza, at the heart of the financial district of Makati.

In 2011 the conglomerate he leads celebrated its 100th anniversary. The group now includes fifty other companies engaged in education, information technology services, travel and tourism, and real estate.

Yuyitung, Quintin and Yuyitung, Rizal

(于长城,Yu Changcheng, 1917–90)
(于长庚,Yu Changgeng, 1922–2007)
Publisher, journalist, Philippines

Quintin and Rizal Yuyitung are hailed as champions of press freedom in the Philippines. The passion for truth as expressed in a free and independent medium was what Quintin and Rizal Yuyitung shared with their father Yu Yi Tung (于以同). It was this passion that led these three men to a common destiny that demanded the greatest sacrifice during the darkest periods in the history of their adopted country.

The Yuyitung family saga began in the 1900s when Yu Yi Tung arrived from China to teach in the only Chinese school in Manila during the early years of the American occupation of the Philippines. On Christmas Day of 1919, he began publishing the Chinese Commercial News or CCN (华侨商报), a monthly newsletter of the Manila Chinese Chamber of Commerce that was meant to keep Chinese businessmen informed on important events and the trends in trade and commerce.

The CCN's last monthly issue appeared in February 1922 after more than two years of publication. In April the same year, the CCN was reorganized as a publishing corporation and became a daily newspaper with Yu Yi Tung as owner-publisher. Its first issue had only two pages and a print run of fewer than a thousand copies. Gradually the CCN was recognized as a non-partisan Chinese daily reporting on important public events.

Yu Yi Tung married Kak Sui Kok (葛蕤谷) and their union produced two sons and a daughter. Quintin was born at the Mary Johnston Hospital in Tondo, Manila, on 30 October 1917. His father named him after Senator Quintin Paredes. Rizal, who was named after the Philippine national hero, Jose Rizal, was born on 16 September 1922 in the same hospital. He spent his early years in Xiamen, China, before returning to the Philippines.

While raising a family, Yu Yi Tung continued running the CCN, which was anchored on his steadfast belief that "the truth will prevail in a free and independent press and that false propaganda and cover-up will not stand the test of time". Because of this belief, Yu constantly found himself in the proverbial hot water, which was probably why he did not encourage his sons to join him in the family business, unlike other patriarchs of the the typical early twentieth-century Chinese families. Quintin took up business administration, while Rizal studied agriculture in Los Baños, Laguna.

In the 1920s the paper was accused of being pro-British when it published news that seemed favourable to the British at the height of the May thirtieth incident, where eleven Chinese student-protesters in Shanghai were gunned down by British troops on 30 May 1925. In the latter part of that decade, the CCN published both the good and bad news on the Koumintang and the Chinese Nationalist Army. But it became the foremost advocate of anti-Japanese sentiments when Japan invaded China and occupied Mukden in 1931. The paper called for the boycott of Japanese goods and raised funds to support Chinese resistance forces. The CCN reported both the victories and defeats of the Chinese against the Japanese so its readers would understand the war situation properly.

Quintin Yuyitung was working in a printing press when he met Yu Leng Suy (杨绫瑞), who was born and raised in Amoy, but had been a Manila resident since her high school days at St Stephen's High School. They were engaged in 1941 and married the following year. They had six children — four girls and two boys.

Yu Yi Tung closed down the CCN on New Year's Eve of 1941, before Japanese troops occupied Manila, which had been declared an open city. He quietly refused the Japanese demand for his paper to be used as a propaganda tool and was court-martialled and then executed on 15 April 1942.

On 15 April 1945, a few months after the war ended and on the occasion of Yu Yi Tung's death anniversary, the CCN resumed publication under the stewardship of the Yuyitung brothers. With Quintin as publisher and Rizal as editor-in-chief, the brothers decided to continue publishing the daily to honour their father's legacy.

Rizal Yuyitung married Veronica Lim in December 1958. Lim, of Chinese-Ilocano parentage, was a painter who hailed from Aparri. She completed her secondary education and a degree in fine arts at the University of Santo Tomas. They had four sons and three daughters.

The CCN flourished and became the leading Chinese daily in the Philippines under the Yuyitungs' leadership. The paper became the brothers' vehicle for their main advocacies: (1) genuine Chinese assimilation into Philippine mainstream society (2) repeal of the expensive, time-consuming, legal naturalization process, and (3) diplomatic recognition by the Philippines of the People's Republic of China as the legitimate government of the Chinese people, which was contrary to the largely American Cold War propaganda.

For continuously upholding truthful journalism like their father before them, the brothers caught the ire of powerful and influential people in the Chinese community and Philippine society, and gained their own share of controversies.

On 7 March 1962, Quintin and Rizal, together with nine CCN staff members, were arrested by intelligence agents of the Armed Forces of the Philippines and charged before the Deportation Board with publishing from 1949 to 1962 articles that were allegedly promoting the communist cause, and derogatory to the Philippine Government. Although born and raised in the Philippines, the Yuyitungs were Chinese citizens according to Philippine law. They were charged barely two months after Rizal Yuyitung had written a series of articles in which he pressed for the full integration of the Chinese resident minority into the national community through reorientation and re-education, and for which he was given an award by the National Press Club. Rizal Yuyitung was released after two weeks, but his brother was detained for six months.

The Philippine Government dropped the charges in 1968 since the evidence consisted mainly of news dispatches, all of which were translations of reports from international wire agencies. Quintin and Rizal Yuyitung complied with the government demand for a public apology and retraction which were published in the 14 May 1968 issue of the CCN.

But on 21 March 1970, the old charges against the Yuyitung brothers were revived through a letter that Defense Secretary Juan Ponce Enrile wrote to President Ferdinand Marcos. Two days later, immigration agents arrested Quintin and Rizal and detained them overnight at the Bureau of Immigration Commissioner's Office. The CCN's office was raided and searched. The brothers each posted bail of 10,000 pesos in cash and another 10,000 pesos in bond the following day and were released. But there was no rest for the Yuyitungs after their release as hearings on their case were conducted daily except Sundays.

While their case was pending before the Supreme Court, the Yuyitung brothers were snatched on the night of 4 May 1970 outside the Manila Overseas Press Club. They were forcibly taken to Basa Air Base in Batangas and put on board a Philippine Air Force plane that flew them to Taiwan. They were not allowed to pick up and bring personal belongings, much less inform their lawyers and families. The brothers were shown a copy of the deportation orders that Marcos had signed on Labour Day only when they were already in prison in Taiwan.

The brutal and inhuman manner of the Yuyitungs' deportation drew widespread protests from the student, media, and legal sectors in the Philippines. The International Press Institute condemned the act as a "violation of the declaration of human rights and the principle of press freedom" during its General Assembly in Hong Kong On 18 May 1970. The case of the Yuyitung brothers would stay on the IPI agenda until their release. As a gesture of gratitude, Rizal christened his seventh and youngest child, who was born the year he was arrested and deported, "Ipi" after the organization.

The CCN continued to operate even after the brothers' arrest through the efforts of its staff under their defence counsels, Juan Quijano and Joker Arroyo, who volunteered to help keep the paper running.

The Yuyitung brothers were tried in a military court in Taipei and sentenced after three-and-a-half hours of lopsided deliberations on 24 August 1970. Quintin was sentenced to two years of reformatory re-education; Rizal, three years. They were tried and sentenced in a country where they had never been for crimes they had allegedly committed in a country where they were born and raised.

The brothers' ordeal was a prelude to one of the darkest phases of Philippine history, where the press was silenced and journalists were jailed in Taipei so they could not exercise their freedom to tell the truth. Quintin was released from jail in Taipei on 16 August 1972. A month later, President Marcos declared martial law. This time, the CCN ceased operations. Rizal was released from prison exactly a year later. As both could not return to the Philippines, Quintin lived in exile in the United States, while Rizal lived in Canada.

While in exile, the Yuyitungs witnessed the vindication of their advocacies for which they had paid a heavy price. In 1975, the Philippines established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China. Also, the same year, President Marcos issued a presidential decree that granted Filipino citizenship to Chinese residents through the very procedure the Yuyitungs had championed in the past.

On 25 February 1986, the People Power Revolution toppled the Marcos regime. One of the first acts of the Aquino government on assuming office was to revoke President Marcos' deportation order for the Yuyitungs. Quintin and Rizal were thus able to come home to the Philippines after sixteen years of involuntary exile. On 12 June the same year, the CCN resumed publication after a break of fourteen years.

Quintin Yuyitung died of a stroke in San Francisco, the United States on 7 March 1990. His body was flown to Manila and later interred at the Manila Memorial Park on 14 March 1990. The Bantayog ng Mga Bayani Foundation honoured him as a hero on 30 November 1996. Rizal Yuyitung died in his home in Toronto, Canada, on 19 April 2007 after a five-year battle with cancer. He was cremated and his ashes were scattered in the Pacific Ocean. The Bantayog ng Mga Bayani Foundation also honoured Rizal as a hero on 30 November 2007.

The legacy of the Yuyitung brothers lives on. Democracy is strong as evidenced by the freedom the press rightfully enjoys.

Zhang Jing Yun

(张景云, 1940–)

Poet, translator, journalist, Malaysia

Zhang Jing Yun is well known as an outspoken current affairs and cultural commentator in Malaysian Chinese newspapers. He has also achieved considerable success as a poet, writer, and translator, and has a reputation for being a paradox. Even though he is a well respected journalist, poet and writer, he does not consider himself an author. While he is affable and capable of communicating well with individuals from all walks of life, he is not a member of any club or association. Despite his excellent writing ability and the numerous articles and commentaries he contributes to Chinese newspapers in Malaysia, he has decided not to be a member of the Association of Malaysian Chinese Writers. This decision was not as much rooted in vanity as in humility, for Zhang does not consider himself a "true writer", because he believes a "true writer" ought to be creative. He feels his writings are not true literary creations because they are merely analytical comments on what is unfolding in the world.

While Zhang may be modest about his writing abilities, he is also pragmatic. For instance, he is a member of the National Union of Journalists in Malaysia only because he knows being part of the union would safeguard his career in journalism. Despite his eccentricities, he remains a respected writer in the Malaysian Chinese community. At present, he is the chief cultural and current affairs commentator at Oriental Daily News (东方日报). He has previously been the chief cultural and current affairs commentator for a number of Chinese newspapers in Malaysia, such as New Bulletin or Xin Tong Bao (新通报) and Nanyang Business Daily, better known by its transliterated Chinese name, Nanyang Siang Pau (南洋商报). He has also spent some time at the Centre for Malaysian Chinese Studies as a researcher.

Zhang's ancestors hailed from Tong'an in the Fujian province of China, but Zhang himself was born in Burma (now known as the Union of Myanmar) on 11 January 1940. By the time the Second World War broke out, he was in Penang, an island in Peninsula Malaysia. He received much of his early education in Penang, but dropped out of school at the age of sixteen. Soon after leaving school, he worked in various jobs in Penang, Perlis, and Singapore. Anxious to make a living, Zhang took a wide variety of jobs. Before he became a cultural and current affairs commentator, he worked as a part-time teacher, a clerk at a rubber plantation, a painting worker, and a band manager at a nightclub.

Despite leaving school at that early age, he never stopped trying to improve himself through reading. This may be gleamed from his experiences in Singapore soon after leaving school. During his first visit to Singapore in 1958–60, he sought to improve his understanding of art by working as a manager of an art gallery. He also took the opportunity to broaden his cultural horizons by immersing himself in the political and social thought of the day. Intrigued by the different perceptions of the post-independence climate in Singapore, Zhang read books on modern literature, as well as social and political thought. During this time, he developed an interest in movies, cinematography, and art. He also attempted to pick up oil painting. While he was offered a chance to study in the Art Students League of New York in the United States at this time, a problem with his visa application meant that he could not enrol there. When he visited Singapore again in the 1970s, he started reading books on Buddhism, Taoism, as well as Indian and eastern religions. Eager to learn more, he also read books on science fiction and natural science.

Although Zhang lacked formal training in literary theory, his voracious reading appetite and analytical thought processes made him an able commentator and excellent writer. Because of the ideas he had picked up in reading and from analysing the socio-political and cultural environment around him, Zhang proved to be a prolific writer. Writing seemed to come naturally to Zhang, for he began writing short stories and novels in his secondary school days. He was only sixteen when he first tried his hand at poetry. His venture into poetry was a largely successful one, as his first volume of poems, On Fragrant Grass (言荃集), was published in 1977. As a writer, Zhang had many pennames, including Zhang Chen Yin (张尘因), Zhang Ya Lu (张哑侣), Yi Sha (一沙), Zhang Li Man (张里蛮), Zhang Guang Zhai (张光斋), Zhang You Jin (张友荆), Zhang Tianqi (张天器), Zhang Nai Guan (张乃管), Mr Wu Jie (芜阶先生), and Mr Bu Bi (补壁先生). Once he had made a name for himself as a poet and writer, he published several poems and art commentaries in English in the New Nation Press and in Commentary from the late 1960s to the early 1970s. It was an achievement for Zhang that his works appeared in Commentary because it was a bulletin published by the alumni of the National University of Singapore. Zhang's later publications were works of prose.

When he returned to Malaysia in 1976, he joined Nanyang Siang Pau as editor for the supplementary news column. By 1984 he was the newspaper's resident current affairs and cultural commentator. From then on, he also wrote special feature columns for the newspaper. In the late 1990s, Zhang regularly wrote a well received Sunday supplementary column in the Nanyang Siang Pau called "Jing Yun's Salon" (景云沙龙). He also published two volumes of prose in 2001 titled, As the Clouds Lose Heart, the Waters Head East (云无心，水长东), and Looking at Vegetarian Tit bits (见素小品).

In addition to "Jing Yun's Salon", Zhang also wrote a special column on culture, the arts, and the humanities in Nanyang Siang Pau in 1994–95. This column spanned 3,000 words and discussed a wide range of issues, such as social phenomena, western and eastern literature, the humanities, as well as the development and role of the intelligentsia. The popularity of Zhang's column lay in the fact that readers could write in to the newspaper to provide feedback or to discuss the issues it had highlighted. Zhang's articles in these columns were eventually compiled in the volume titled, As the Clouds Lose Heart, the Waters Head East mentioned above. Four of these articles also appear in the book, History of Malaysian Chinese Prose, edited by ZhongYiwen and Chen Dawei from Taiwan universities.

On top of being an excellent writer, Zhang is also a very good editor and translator. Although he had no formal education in English, he speaks the language fluently, and can translate from Chinese to English and vice versa. This is because he worked hard at practising and learning the language. Even though he lacks a university degree, Zhang is acknowledged as a well read man with a wide range of knowledge.

Chua Thian Poh

(蔡天宝, Cai Tianbao, 1948–)
Community leader, leading businessman, Singapore

Getting the location right is commonly believed to be the key to success for property investment. To property developer Chua Thian Poh, however, nothing beats the importance of timing.

Chua Thian Poh has come to that conclusion having experienced the ups and downs in business over the years. Born in Singapore on 11 July 1948 in what he described as a "traditional Chinese family", Chua was the seventh child in a family of 14 siblings. His father sent him to a Chinese school in the morning and an English school in the afternoon for his primary education so that he could acquire two languages. Chua, however, was not academically inclined. He went to Serangoon Garden Technical School and left at 16 with O-level qualifications to help out in his father's business.

His father, Chua Tiong Yean, was a builder of tongkang (bumboats) and operator of a lighterage service. In 1969, Chua struck out by himself and set up a company, Ho Bee, with his brother to supply metal hooks and spikes for the logging industry. He made his first million at the age of 21 from property investment. In the wake of the oil crisis of 1973, however, timber prices fell and his business went bust. He then went into the trading business in Jakarta, sourcing household products, electrical appliances and stationery from China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Korea and Japan, and re-exporting them from Singapore to Indonesia. He was based in Jakarta between 1973 and 1986 to look after the operations of his trading business. Riding on the Indonesian oil boom and strong domestic spending then, he said he ventured into Indonesia at the right time. However, he suffered millions of losses again in 1978 after the devaluation of the rupiah.

Anticipating an upturn of the property market in Singapore in 1986, he returned home and ventured into the property business. In 1987, he set up Ho Bee Investment and acquired an industrial building at a distressed sale. As land prices were bottoming out at that time, he seized the opportunity to develop a condominium project in Newton Road. By the time the properties were launched for sale in 1989, there was an influx of Hong Kong money to Singapore following the Tiananmen incident in China. Time was on his side and he quickly expanded his property business by taking on a larger condominium project in Bukit Timah Road and acquiring industrial properties.

In 1994, Chua turned his attention to London. He developed Parliament View apartments opposite the Houses of Parliament. "So we escaped the Asian Financial Crisis," recounted Chua in a media interview. Instead, he rode on the rise in London property prices as well as the appreciation of the pound. At about the same time, he diversified his businesses into videotapes and laser discs, film making and petrol kiosks. In 1993, he set up Ho Bee Media and dabbled in the publishing business.

Property development, however, remains the mainstay of his business. His property company, Ho Bee Investment, was listed on the Singapore Exchange in 1999. The listed company got a big break in 2003 when it won the bid at the maiden land tender at Sentosa Cove. The first condominium at the high-end waterfront housing district, The Berth by the Cove, and the first terrace housing development, The Berthside, set benchmark prices when they were launched for sale the following year. Subsequent developments like The Coast and the villas on Coral Island were also well received. The successful bet on Sentosa's waterfront housing district distinguished Ho Bee Investment in the property market. For his achievement in business he was conferred The 2006 Businessman of Year in the Singapore Business Awards jointly organized by the Business Times and DHL. Asked why he was the first developer to venture into the new waterfront district of Sentosa Cove, he attributed it to good timing and said, "You have to do the right thing at the right time."

As the timing was on his side in the early 1990s and the business thrived, Chua started playing an active role in community work. He recalled: "By the mid-1990s, my business was on track and when someone asked me to play a more active role in the business community and clan associations, I responded to the call."

In 1993, he joined the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry (SCCCI) as a council member. He became its deputy president in 2001 and president in 2005. He served as SCCCI President for two full-terms until 2009. A year later in 2010, he was elected in rapid succession as president of Singapore Hokkien Huay Kuan (a Fujian clan association) and president of the Singapore Federation of Chinese Clan Associations (SFCCA), an umbrella body for more than 200 clan groups. Wearing two hats in addition to being the immediate past president of the SCCCI, Chua thus became the leader of the Singapore Chinese community.

Chua is credited with inducting new, younger leaders and new immigrants into positions in the SCCCI and SFCCA. One of them is property developer Zhong Shengjian, a new immigrant from Guangdong and now a Singapore citizen. Asked in a media interview why he was shouldering the responsibility and burden of leading the Chinese community, Chua replied: "It all comes from the sense of duty I learnt from my family who taught me the principle of 取之社会，用之社会 (after you have made it, you have to give back to society)."

Chua has also been a supporter of many other community activities. He sits on the board of numerous civic and business organizations. Among his other appointments, he is the chairman of Business China, Trustee cum Chairman of the Finance and Establishment Committee of the Chinese Development Assistance Council as well as the Chairman of Ren Ci Hospital. He is also the chairman of the Bishan East Citizens' Consultative Committee.

In recent years, Chua has turned philanthropist and donated money to various tertiary institutions. In 2008, he gave the Singapore Management University S$3 million to establish the Ho Bee Professorship in Chinese Economy and Business. In the same year, he donated S$5 million to the Nanyang Technological University to set up the Chua Thian Poh Entrepreneurship Education Fund. And in 2011, he donated S$5 million to the National University of Singapore to run the Chua Thian Poh Community Leadership Programme. These donations have been matched by government grants.

The donations to tertiary institutions are apparently motivated by his experience from the school of hard-knocks. "I did not continue my education after secondary school. I realized later that a formal education is important. You can see the vast difference between the secondary-school students and university graduates when you put them together," he recounted. With the funds he set up, he hopes the younger generation would further their education.

Chua's wife, Doris, is an executive director of Ho Bee Holdings, and the majority shareholder of the listed Ho Bee Investment. The couple has two sons and two daughters. Two are in the family business. Chua's family wealth is estimated by Forbes, a US financial magazine, at US$555 million. In view of the debt crisis in the US and Europe and the slow sales in the high-end property market, Chua is setting his sights on developing a commercial property project in One North, a business park in Singapore. He is also looking at residential projects in London and Australia. For a man who believes in getting the timing right, Chua appears to be staying ahead of the business cycle.

Soeto Tjan

(司徒赞, Situ Zan, 1900–1978)

Educationist, community leader, Indonesia

Soeto Tjan was born in 1900 into a hawker's family in Kaiping 开平, Guangdong, China. In 1908 he lost his father and in 1911 he went to Kuala Lumpur to join his uncle who owned a small timber mill. Soeto went to a Chinese school in the morning and an English school in the afternoon. In 1915, at the age of fifteen, he graduated from primary school and returned to China for further studies, first in Shanghai and later at the Jinan Xuetang 暨南学堂, Nanjing, in the Teachers' Training Section. After graduation, he came to Indonesia in 1919 to take up the position of principal of a Chinese school (in Muntilan, Central Java) which was sponsored by the Guangzhao Huiguan (Cantonese Association). He was there for two years.

Between 1922 and 1934 he moved from place to place. When he was teaching in Palembang (Sumatra), he came to know a young teacher Liu Jin Duan 刘金端 who was a graduate of Nanyang Girls' Secondary School (Singapore) and the two got married in 1924. In 1925 he returned to China for a short while and was invited by Ang Jan Goan 洪渊源, a community leader, to go to Batavia (Jakarta) to be the principal of the Tiong Hoa Hwee Koan School, also known as Pa Hwa 八华, an engagement which lasted less than a year. Soeto then went to Central Java to work for an association lasting only a year. He returned to Batavia to take up the position of Chief Editor of Gongshang Ribao 工商日报. Not long after this, he went to Palembang again to become the principal of a school. Three years later (1932) he went to Singapore to work as the editor of a few Chinese newspapers. He eventually settled down in Jakarta in 1935 taking on the role of principal of Guang Ren School which was also sponsored by Guangzhao Huiguan. From 1935 to 1942 he was the chairman of Batavia's Federation of Chinese School Teachers Associations.

During the Sino-Japanese war, Soeto was active in raising funds for China as well as for Fuxing She 复兴社 which was an anti-Japanese organization. He and his two very young sons, Soeto Pasen and Soeto Meisen, were later detained during the Japanese Occupation of Java. Later, his wife was also detained. They were only released after Japan capitulated in August 1945.

During the Japanese occupation, only Chinese primary schools were allowed to hold classes. In 1945, soon after the Japanese surrender, Chinese teachers in Jakarta organized a meeting of various clan associations and decided to establish a temporary Lianhe Zhongxue 联合中学, also known as Lian Zhong 联中 (United Secondary School) in Jakarta. This Lian Zhong was an amalgamation of three schools: Guangren School (Cantonese), Huaqiao Gongxue (Hakka), and Fujian School (Hokkien). In the following year the school changed its name to Huaqiao Gongli Bacheng Zhongxue 华侨公立巴城中学 (Overseas Chinese Public Secondary School of Batavia), abbreviated as Ba Zhong 巴中, (Pa Chung in old spelling), and Soeto Tjan was appointed its principal. Under his leadership, Ba Zhong developed into one of the largest Chinese-medium secondary schools in Indonesia.

From 1945 to 1951 Soeto was the chairman of the Chinese School Teachers' General Association. He was not only active in the educational field but was also a socio-political activist. In November 1949, soon after the establishment of the People's Republic of China, Yang Xinrong 杨新容, a leftwing teacher who was the principal of Xin Hua School in Jakarta, formed and led a committee to "foster diplomatic relations between China and Indonesia" 促进中印建交工作委员会. In the following year, Indonesia and the PRC established diplomatic relations and the committee was renamed the Association for Fostering Overseas Chinese Unity in Jakarta 椰加达华侨团结促进会. Soeto Tjan and Yang Xinrong were both elected as vice chairmen. In April 1952 when the association changed its name to Yejiada Zhonghua Qiaotuan Zonghui 椰加达中华侨团总会, General Organization of Overseas Chinese Associations in Jakarta, abbreviated as Qiao Zong 侨总, Ang Jan Goan was elected chairman and Soeto Tjan continued to serve as deputy chairman. Ang who was an Indonesian citizen later resigned and was succeeded by Soeto Tjan.

Soeto Tjan was clearly pro-PRC and Qiao Zong was close to the PRC embassy; it eventually became the organization for citizens of the PRC. It often sent Indonesian Chinese delegations to visit the PRC led by Soeto himself. In 1959, while leading yet again a delegation of Indonesian Chinese to the PRC, he criticized the Indonesian Presidential Regulation No. 10 (1959) in Beijing which prohibited overseas Chinese from engaging in the retail trade in rural areas. When he returned to Indonesia in December that year, he was immediately arrested and in January 1960 was expelled from Indonesia.

From that year onward Soeto lived in the PRC, holding a number of positions: deputy director of the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies at Jinan University (Guangzhou), 1960–66?, committee member of China's Afro-Asian Association, member of the Guangdong Returned Overseas Chinese Association, and trustee of the Guangdong Overseas Chinese Investment Board. During the Cultural Revolution, he was unfairly treated due to his overseas Chinese background. However, after the reemergence of Deng Xiaoping, he was again appointed a committee member of the 5th CPPCC in February 1978. He died on 14 March 1978, a month after the appointment. His early publications include Geography of Dutch East Indies (南洋荷领东印度地理, Nanjing, 1922), Textbook of Dutch East Indies Geography (南洋荷印地理课本, Batavia, 1930), and Travels in China and Japan (中日游记, Batavia, 1935).

Soeto Tjan had five sons and two daughters. All of them left Indonesia.

Tjahaja Purnama, Basuki

(钟万学, Zhong Wanxue, alias Ahok, 1966–)
Engineer, businessman, politician, Indonesia

Basuki Tjahaja Purnama alias Ahok was elected as Deputy Governor of Jakarta in a heatedly contested election on 20 September 2012. He is the first Chinese Indonesian in the history of the Republic of Indonesia to become Deputy Governor of Jakarta. Many political analysts are of the view that the victory of Basuki, an ethnic Chinese, who is also a Christian, in this direct election of the Jakarta governor signifies a change in Indonesian racial politics.

Basuki was born in Manggar, Belitung Timur, on 29 June 1966 into a businessman family. His father, Tjung (Zhong in Hanyu pinyin) Kin Nam, of Hakka origin, had four sons and one daughter. Basuki is the eldest. Basuki finished his primary school and SMP (junior middle school) education in his hometown but went to Jakarta to receive his SMA (senior high school) education. As his father wanted him to be a doctor to serve in Belitung Timur, he enrolled in the Medical School at the Universitas

Kristen Indonesia (UKI) in Jakarta. His interest was not in medicine but in technology. After a week, he left UKI and registered at the Faculty of Mineral Technology, Department of Geological Technics at the Universitas Trisakti, also in Jakarta, and graduated in 1990. In 1994 he obtained a Master of Management (M.M.) degree from the Sekolah Tinggi Manajeman Prasetya Mulia in Jakarta.

From 1992 to 1994 he served as the director of PT Nurindra Ekapersada. Between 1994 and 1995 he served as assistant president-director of PT Simaxindo Primadaya. In 1995 he decided to return to Belitung Timur to set up a company to process sand using American and German technology. It was after his return to his hometown that he began to be interested in politics as he wanted to improve the life of the local population. In 2004 he joined a minor party, Partai Pembangunan Indonesia Baru (PPIB) led by an Indonesian intellectual Dr. Sjahrir and became the chairman of the PPIB Belitung Timur Branch. He participated in the local parliamentary election and was elected as a local MP in 2004. In the following year, he stood for the regency election for the Regent (Bupati) together with Chairul Effendi who was a member of another minor party. Basuki was elected as Regent while Chairul his deputy (2004–2009). It was during the 16 months of his administration, the living conditions of the local population were improved. Basuki managed to introduce the scheme of free health care and free education for the Belitung Timur residents. He also practised clean government, rejected kickbacks and illustrated to the population that he was serious about changing old practices in politics. He is rather impatient in doing this.

In 2007, he resigned from the Regent position in order to contest the governorship of Banka-Belitung province and left the position to his deputy. Due to Basuki's reputation as a clean and effective politician, former president Abdurahman Wahid (Gus Dur) campaigned for Basuki but Basuki was defeated by his rival. Nevertheless, Basuki did not leave politics. He wanted to change the Indonesian political landscape: he was advocating Bersih (clean), Transparen (transparent) and Profesional (professional), which is abbreviated as BTP, which are also the initials of Basuki Tjahaja Purnama. In 2006 (2008?), Basuki was selected as one of ten Indonesian figures who had changed Indonesia (Tokoh yang mengubah Indonesia) by Majalah Tempo, a leading Jakarta news weekly. In 2007 he was also awarded the title of Anti-Corruption Leader (Tokoh Anti-Korupsi) by the Gerakan Tiga Pilar Kemitraan (a federation of three organizations which advocates the partnership between the private sector and the government in combating corruption).

Basuki joined Partai Golkar and participated in the 2009 general elections. Before the elections he published his autobiography entitled "Merubah Indonesia: The Story of Basuki Tjahaja Purnama" expressing his ideas and his strong desire to serve his country. In the 2009 elections he was elected as a member of parliament (2009-2014). However, as a member of parliament representing Golkar, it seems that he was unable to do much.

In July 2012 the Jakarta Governor election took place. President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono's party, Partai Demokrat (PD), supported the incumbent governor Fauzi Bowo (known as Foke), a Muslim from Jakarta with his partner Nachrowi Ramli (known as Nara), to be the candidates for the governor and his deputy. These candidates were supported by five other parties, including Golkar. Nevertheless, those parties which did not support the Foke-Nara pair proposed their own candidates. Megawati's Partai Demokrasi Indonesia-Perjuangan (PDI-P) and Prabowo's Gerindra Party agreed to join forces to put up their candidates. The PDI-P selected Joko Widodo (better known as Jokowi) , a mayor of Surakarta (Central Java), a Muslim and portrayed by the media as a clean and able administrator, and Gerindra selected Basuki who left Golkar in order to participate in this election. Interestingly, even former Vice President Jusuf Kalla (from Golkar) also supported Basuki. Six pairs of candidates contested in this Jakarta election, among whom two were strongest. During the first round of the election, the government-backed candidates (Foke-Nara) only gained 34 per cent while the Jokowi-Basuki pair obtained 43 per cent of the votes. As no candidates exceeded 50 per cent of the votes, a second round of election between these two pairs was scheduled for 20 September.

Soon after the unexpected first round results were announced, the smear campaign against Jokowi-Basuki began. A YouTube video entitled "Chinese Cowboy Leads Jakarta" attempted to incite racial hatred, attacking Basuki as representative of an ethnic group who could not be trusted. One popular indigenous singer and preacher Rhoma Irama also urged the people not to vote for the pair of non-Muslim leaders. In fact, Jokowi is a Muslim and only Basuki is a Christian. The authorities eventually moved in and removed the racist video. It is worth noting that ethnicity is still used and will continue to be used as a political weapon, but not against Indonesians of Arab and Pakistani descent where the issue of ethnicity was never raised. It seems that Indonesians of Arab and Pakistani descent are "automatically" accepted as "Indonesians", primarily due to their Islamic religion.

Regardless of this, the results of the second round of elections were still in favour of the Jokowi-Basuki pair. From the quick count they got 53 per cent of the votes while the Foke-Nara pair only obtained 47 per cent. Many analysts interpreted this to indicate that Indonesian voters are more mature and they are much more concerned with the ability of the candidates rather than their ethnicity and religion.

Basuki is married to Veronika ST, a Chinese Indonesian; they have two sons and one daughter.
